Letter from the Editor

As the school year ends and graduation caps sail skyward, June offers a fitting time to reflect on the power of learning, past and present. This season of transition reminds us that education has long played a central role in shaping both personal lives and national legacies.

In this issue, we explore a lesser-known chapter of Civil War history: the postwar transformation of the University of North Carolina. The story reveals how the struggle to redefine higher education after Appomattox was just as fierce, and just as vital, as the conflicts fought on the battlefield. The story of UNC between 1865 and 1875 offers important insight into how institutions rebuild, who they serve, and what values they choose to preserve.

Whether you're a lifelong student of the war, or simply reflecting on the season's milestones in your own family, I hope this story reminds you, as it did me, that the Civil War's impact extended far beyond the fighting. It changed how Americans thought, taught, and imagined the future.

As always, thank you for being part of our Round Table.

President's Address

By Dr. Yelena Howell

Dear friends,

A Jewish sage with every reason to be confidently didactic counseled me on the eve of my doctoral graduation. In Pirket Avos 2:16 (The Wisdom of Our Sages), we turned to universally beneficial advice: “It is not incumbent upon you to finish the task, but neither are you free to absolve yourself from it.” Accomplishments are occasions to pause and reflect before giving ourselves back over to the flow of things that have no definitive beginning or end.

At the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, too, our programming, reflection and camaraderie did not begin three decades ago but rather emerged from the national Civil War Round Table movement, in its turn a phenomenon rooted in collective memory of the conflict. How far removed are we from the events and actors of the great drama of 1861-1865? Some would echo Faulkner’s sentiment: “the past is not even past.” As I kneel at the graves of my children’s fourth great-grandparents whose names are routinely spoken in our household, I recall that some of you have personally known people who, as children, had met Col. William Lamb and even sat in the lap of the Confederate commander of Fort Fisher. Distances between us are shorter than one might think.

Thank you for joining us again and again to remember, rediscover and reimagine. Clio is humanity’s eternal companion. Our living temple to American history appreciates your patronage and welcomes you this summer and beyond.

Warmest regards,

Angela Zombek On Fort Jefferson in the Civil War: Union Strategic Base in Remote Dry Tortugas

Our June 12, 2025, meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by club favorite Dr. Angela Zombek, Ph.D., associate professor of history at UNCW. Dr. Zombek, an expert on the prisoner of war experience in the Civil War, will talk about the strategic Union outpost of Fort Jefferson, the largest brick masonry structure in the Western Hemisphere, located on the remote island of Garden Key in the Dry Tortugas, 70 miles west of Key West.

Fort Jefferson, posted far out on the western entrance to the Florida Straits, is closer to Cuba than to the mainland of Florida. The fort encloses about 16 acres and was constructed with 16 million bricks. The site was recommended for military use by U.S. Army engineer Captain Robert E. Lee in the early 1840s. Construction began in 1846 under the direction of another U.S. Army engineer captain, Horatio Wright, who would rise to the role of commander of the VI Corps of the Army of the Potomac in 1864-65. Fort Jefferson was constructed as part of the Third System of Defense, which aimed to reduce the need for a standing army, protect American commerce, and defend the nation from foreign adversaries. No one anticipated that, come the 1860s, Ft. Jefferson would also be used to suppress a domestic rebellion.

Professor Zombek's talk will examine the experiences of Union soldiers assigned to garrison duty at Ft. Jefferson during the Civil War, and give an overview of the fort's wartime purposes, which ranged from defending the Florida Straits, to serving as a coaling station for naval vessels, to imprisoning Confederate POWs and Union soldiers who violated army rules and regulations while in the ranks.

Today, Fort Jefferson is the keystone of the remote and very beautiful Dry Tortugas National Park. The park can be reached by seaplane or a pleasant boat ride from Key West. With outstanding coral reefs, and marine life it is a premier snorkeling destination. Camping is also available in the park. Yet, it was much different in the 1860s, and, indeed, after the war the fort fell into disuse. It was plagued by a lack of fresh water and susceptibility to diseases like yellow fever.

Fort Jefferson National Monument was designated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt under the Antiquities Act in 1935. The monument was expanded in 1983 and re-designated as Dry Tortugas National Park on October 26, 1992 by an act of Congress.

Dry Tortugas was established to protect the island and marine ecosystems of the Dry Tortugas, to preserve Fort Jefferson and submerged cultural resources such as shipwrecks, and to allow for public access.

Dr. Zombek (Ph.D. University of Florida) is an historian of the Civil War Era and is Associate Professor of History at the University of North Carolina Wilmington. She is also coordinator of the Masters Program in History at UNCW and the managing editor of “Interpreting the Civil War” series at Kent State University. She is the author of Penitentiaries, Punishment, and Military Prisons: Familiar Responses to an Extraordinary Crisis during the America Civil War (Kent State University Press). Her current book project, Stronghold of the Union: Key West Under Martial Law, is under contract with The University Press of Florida.

Dr. Angela Zombek

The Sachsman Symposium on the 19th Century Press recently announced that Professor Zombek was named to deliver the signature Hazel Dicken-Garcia address at Augusta University in November 2025. Augusta University is located in Augusta, Georgia.

She is a native of Ohio and holds an MA from the University of Akron and a Ph.D. from the University of Florida. She recalls a visit to the Camp Chase historic site in Columbus, Ohio, as the spark that ignited her interest in Civil War history, especially the history of incarceration in the war. Camp Chase became a prison for captured Confederates and many died there. More than 400,000 soldiers—about 194,000 Union and 214,000 Confederate—were captured over the course of the war. Prison conditions were brutal with approximately 30,000 Union soldiers and 26,000 Confederates dying while imprisoned. Deaths occurred most often because of medical conditions including infectious diseases such as typhoid fever, cholera, yellow fever, malaria, etc. Many also died because of malnutrition and exposure to the elements.

Make plans to come and hear this fascinating story about a little known aspect of the Civil War. The meeting will take place on Thursday evening, June 12, beginning at 7 p.m. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John’s Episcopal Church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington.

The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Bring a friend! For more information about membership in the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, go to <http://www.cfcwrt.org> and pick “Join/Rejoin.” See you there!

A New Season of Learning: Reflections on Education and the Civil War's Intellectual Legacy

By Matthew Howell

As the school year winds down and families celebrate the achievements of graduates, I have found myself thinking deeply about education: its promise, its cost, and the legacies we carry into every classroom. This May, I beamed with pride as my wife completed her doctorate. Watching her, I am reminded that learning never ends. As I work toward my own Master's in American History, I am especially attuned to how the past has shaped our educational present.

While conducting research for a summer seminar in North Carolina history, I encountered an interesting article by historian Robin Brabham titled "Defining the American University: The University of North Carolina, 1865–1875." Published in the North Carolina Historical Review (1980), it examines a side of the Civil War era rarely discussed outside academia: how war and Reconstruction reshaped American higher education, particularly in the South.

For those of us who tend to dwell on troop movements, battlefield tactics, and command decisions, Brabham's work offers a valuable detour. It reminds us that the Civil War's impact extended well beyond the battlefield. It disrupted, then reimagined, institutions meant to shape minds and mold citizens. The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, the first public university in the nation, serves as his case study in postwar educational transformation. Brabham tells a story not of muskets or generals, but of classrooms, board meetings, and curriculum reform. Of how the Civil War reshaped the University of North Carolina and, in doing so, helped define what higher education in the United States would become.

The Ruins of Chapel Hill

In 1865, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill stood not in flames, but in ruin nonetheless. Although it was spared the physical destruction that befell many Southern towns, the institution was bankrupt, its campus deserted, and its moral authority in question. Enrollment had collapsed during the war. Many students and faculty joined the Confederate cause. The university's antebellum leadership, chiefly President David L. Swain, had tethered the school's identity to the Old South's social and political order. Now that order was gone. Swain, a former North Carolina governor and longtime president of the university, initially hoped to restore UNC as it had been. He lobbied the new state government for funds, preserved institutional records, and invited former students back. But the world was changing around him.

What Should a University Be?

Brabham chronicles the decade-long battle over what kind of institution UNC should become in the postwar South. Was it to remain a classical college steeped in Latin, Greek, and moral philosophy, reserved for the sons of privilege? Or should it transform into a modern university, one rooted in scientific advancement, professional training, and accessibility?

This was no idle question. Nationally, American higher education was undergoing a revolution. The Morrill Land Grant Act of 1862 had created a new model: publicly funded universities that would serve the "industrial classes," teaching agriculture, mechanical arts, and practical sciences. Institutions like Cornell and the newly established Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) embodied this vision. Could UNC follow suit?

Swain and his traditionalist allies resisted. They favored the old liberal arts model, believing it shaped moral leaders. But younger faculty and reformers, including Professor Andrew D. Hepburn, argued that UNC's future depended on embracing reform. Hepburn denounced the archaic curriculum and called for the introduction of electives, more rigorous admission standards, and the inclusion of modern subjects like chemistry and engineering. He wanted UNC to compete on the national stage.

A Vision Interrupted

The tipping point came in 1867, when a committee led by trustee and future president Kemp P. Battle proposed sweeping reforms. Their plan called for dividing the university into distinct schools, offering electives, emphasizing scientific and technical education, and raising the bar for graduation. Brabham details this moment as UNC's first real attempt to become a "modern university." But politics got in the way.

Kemp P. Battle

Reconstruction brought about a radical shift in North Carolina's state government. With power in the hands of Republicans and African American voters for the first time, a new university administration was installed, one that opposed Swain and fired many faculty members, including reformers.

The university briefly reopened in 1869 under new leadership, but lacked direction, funding, and students. By 1871, it closed entirely. It would not reopen until 1875, this time with the reforms of the 1860s largely abandoned. The moment had passed, but the ideas had not.

Legacy Beyond the Lost Cause

Brabham's article doesn't paint the UNC reform movement as an unqualified success. The plans of Battle and Hepburn were visionary but unrealized. Still, they mattered. They planted seeds. In the decades that followed, UNC would gradually adopt many of the reforms first proposed during Reconstruction—electives, scientific instruction, professional training—until it evolved into the public research university we know today.

Why should Civil War enthusiasts care?

Because this story reminds us that the war's legacy was not limited to what happened between 1861 and 1865. It extended into the reconstruction of every major American institution, including education. The University of North Carolina became a battleground not of soldiers, but of ideas. And as Brabham shows, the conflict over curriculum, access, and the meaning of a university was no less fierce than the one waged at Gettysburg.

A Personal Postscript

As students across the country toss their caps in the air this May and June, and as I watch my own family reach new academic heights, I cannot help but see a thread that connects us back to those classrooms of the 1860s. Our institutions were shaped not only by war, but by the determination to grow from it.

Brabham's article is a timely reminder that the Civil War's impact reverberated far beyond battlefields and statehouses. It reached into the heart of American institutions, where the work of reconstruction was not only political but intellectual. In the uneasy years after Appomattox, the University of North Carolina became a site of struggle over what knowledge should be preserved, what new paths should be blazed, and who ought to be invited into the halls of learning. These debates, once held in faculty meetings and trustee reports, still echo today as universities across the nation grapple with their public missions, their historical legacies, and the fragile balance between tradition and transformation in a time of abundant noise and uncertainty...all with needs of an ever-changing world in mind.

As we celebrate a season of endings and new beginnings, Brabham invites us to see the classroom as one of the great frontiers of Reconstruction. What happened in Chapel Hill between 1865 and 1875 was not just the story of a Southern university reinventing itself, it was part of the broader American story of reckoning, rebuilding, and reimagining what freedom, citizenship, and opportunity could mean in the aftermath of war. If we are to fully understand the Civil War's legacy, we must consider not only who won the war, but how the nation chose to educate the generations who came after.

A Look Back at the Battle of Hatteras Inlet Batteries (& Why We Should Discuss the Naval War More Often)

By Roman Berger

As regular readers of my newsletter musings might ascertain, I am not native to the Carolinas. Since relocating here in the middle of 2023, however, I have sought to learn a little bit more about the state I have called my home. I have tried to learn a little more about the region's history, particularly when it comes to the Civil War. This desire to research about the past and present led me to discover an interesting little facet. I've written before about how Fort Fisher's fall all but secured Union victory in the overall conflict.

However, the first major battle involving the State of North Carolina was also a naval conflict – the Battle of Hatteras Inlet Batteries from August 28th–29th, 1861. And looking up that battle has led me to suspect that the naval aspect of the Civil War feels overlooked in the general public's knowledge of the conflict.

It's a personal suspicion and a bit of a generalization, of course. Most students have (hopefully) seen the famed Scott's Great Snake cartoon in their history classes regarding the Anaconda Plan. The phrase "damn the torpedoes" stems from Admiral Farragut's command at the Battle of Mobile Bay. There might be some knowledge of Burnside's Expedition, as well. Yet, ask the general public, and it feels like the naval blockades take a backseat to the land effort and strategies of the two Armies; the naval war is seldom discussed.

It's an understandable oversight. After all, the vast majority of casualties were in land battles. These battles were influential – Gettysburg, Antietam, Vicksburg, Bull Run. These and more influenced the development of the nation as well as the future of military strategies. There is so much to explore and analyze with the armies of Grant, Lee, Longstreet, McClellan, Jackson, etc.

Yet, the naval aspect of the Civil War should not be ignored. Especially since the Anaconda Plan was imposed after Fort Sumter fell. The logic was simple; block the Confederate forces from gaining supplies from any foreign nation that would recognize or otherwise support them. It was the first overarching strategy of the conflict. This proved to be pivotal early in the war. The Battle of Hatteras Inlet Batteries stemmed from the Anaconda Plan, serving as an attempt from Union Major General Benjamin Butler to "capture an important haven for blockade runners", as per the National Park Service. It was a bid to confront forts built by the Confederacy specifically to facilitate blockade runners, with control over Pamlico Sound at stake.

It was the first major test of the Union Blockade's fortitude, as well as the first battle to directly involve the crucial economic state of North Carolina. After all, North Carolina was not just an agrarian state producing cash crops for export, it was also an ocean-bound state with ports relatively close to Raleigh and the Confederate capital of Richmond. Stopping ships from entering Hatteras Inlet would help compromise the economic activity of the Confederacy, and thus their ability to maintain a sustained war effort.

Silas Stringham and Benjamin Butler were sent to execute the plan, leading the Blockading Squadron and the 9th and 20th New York Infantries. The battle was relatively short and rather one-sided. Union forces were able to attack Fort Clark from well out at sea. Despite efforts from Samuel Barton, the Confederate firepower was no match. The next morning, Fort Hatteras was attacked and would fall by the end of the day. The Union secured the Hatteras Inlet with only one fatality, compared to four Confederate deaths and 691 captured soldiers.

This was the first Union victory in the war, and it was a rather notable triumph. After the disastrous Battle of Bull Run earlier that summer, victory here repaired Union morale to some extent. It was even larger strategically, though. The victory on the Outer Banks was arguably as pivotal to influencing the war as the defense of Gettysburg would be two years later. After all, any military force needed to be supplied with adequate munitions and other supplies. And the Agrarian South was not producing nearly enough firepower on its own; the Confederate war machine was far from the Union's capabilities. They would have had to go from the outside; the Union, trying to put the rebellion under control, found ways to make it as hard as possible. By taking the forts, the Union was able to narrow the Confederacy's possible ports of entry.

Without the ability to trade easily, Confederate successes were restricted. The limited nature of the Confederate Navy, also caused by the region's lesser industrial strength, did the South no favors. Not only did they prevent new material from going in, they also prevented the export of cotton, the king crop of the region. With a curtailed ability to obtain supplies, export cotton, and break the blockades, the disadvantages were clear from the start. By 1864, the Confederate economy was in freefall.

Of course, the rationale for why this particular battle is often overlooked is obvious, and these reasons can be applied to other naval battles in the Civil War, albeit to a lesser extent. The sheer death toll at other battles – including the earlier Battle of Bull Run – is more sobering, an underscoring of the tragic nature of war. Even in victory, the human cost is profound. Beyond that, the war went on for four years, with the war, strategies, and philosophies shifting in ways far beyond merely securing the perimeter. Lastly, the drama at Hatteras Inlet was quieter, the battle only lasting two days, and the conflicts over the next four years would make what happened at Hatteras Inlet look relatively minor.

But any less consequential?

In retrospect, the outcome at Hatteras Inlet would foreshadow the outcome of the Civil War, even if it didn't serve as a definitive “turning point” akin to Gettysburg. The Union effectively starved the South out of any chance of victory by striking at the Confederacy's economic productivity and outreach efforts via an effective naval blockade, and that was before the Emancipation Proclamation. Simply put, the Battle of Hatteras Inlet Batteries symbolized the gulf in resources between the sides as well as demonstrating how relatively small blows can prove consequential later on.

And it speaks to why it might be wise for lessons on the Civil War to include more than a cursory mention of the naval war efforts. Successful military campaigns require both short-term and long-term efforts, and the Union, though not executing a perfect campaign by any means, was able to capitalize well enough to secure the advantage at the end of the conflict. All of that can be traced back to one simple battle on the Outer Banks.

TRIP TO VICKSBURG WITH CLEVELAND CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE

Last year the Cleveland Civil War Round Table invited members of our round table to participate in their annual battlefield tour and trip. The destination was Gettysburg and the experience was top-notch in every way. Five members of our round table plus two guests went to Gettysburg in September and reveled in a two-day guided tour of the battlefield plus a moving and enlightening tour of the Spangler Farm field hospital site.

This year, our friends in Cleveland have invited us to participate in a tour of the Vicksburg Campaign from Bruinsburg to Vicksburg on 25-28 September, 2025. The trip includes expert guidance provided by Capt. Rick Martin, USAF (Ret.) who is also a retired Chief Ranger for Vicksburg National Military Park. On Friday, September 26, the tour will focus on Grant's movement across the Mississippi and the battles leading up to his investment of the fortress city of Vicksburg from the east. The next day will focus on the Union assaults and siege operations leading up to the capitulation of the Confederate command on July 4, 1863.

The cost of the trip is $175 which will cover the cost of the guide, any entrance fees and boxed lunches each day. Rooms have been reserved at the Courtyard by Marriott Vicksburg and breakfast is included in the room rate. The cost of the room and the cost of transportation to and from Vicksburg is at your own expense, as will be the cost of dinners.

We were lucky to hear Terry Winschel's excellent presentation on Vicksburg in February and this is a great opportunity to actually see the ground and learn more about this most pivotal campaign.

William B. Gould and his six sons. All served in WWI except William B. Gould, Jr., who served in the Spanish-American War. Source was National Park Service, which credited William B. Gould IV.

Nixon owned a house on Chestnut Street between 3rd and 4th, “where the Thalian Hall parking lot is located today,” Christina told us. Gould and his seven cohorts lived in the house and went to work at various locations in the city.

Owners such as Nixon received pay for the work performed by the men. The men had been planning the escape for some time and moved quickly. They rowed 28 nautical miles down the Cape Fear River and in the morning were picked up the USS Cambridge, a gunboat on blockade duty. Two other boatloads of escapees also made it to the fleet that night but it’s not clear whether they were enlisted into the Navy like the eight picked up by the Cambridge.

Gould served on the Cambridge and other ships, including the USS Niagara, a large steam-powered frigate that brought him to European waters in search of Confederate commerce raiders. He kept a diary of his service, the only known diary of a formerly enslaved sailor who served in the U.S. Navy during the Civil War.

He was discharged in late 1865 and married Cornelia Reed, a woman from Wilmington who had been dramatically saved from slavery by a fund-raising drive and brought to Massachusetts in 1858. Gould had met Cornelia prior to her exodus from North Carolina and corresponded with her extensively during the war.

The Goulds lived in Dedham, Massachusetts, raising a family of two daughters and six sons. Gould became a successful businessman plying his trade of plasterer and mason and becoming active in the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR), the leading association of Union veterans. He served as commander of his local post in 1892.

Gould’s sons served in the U.S. military and his descendants became distinguished in many fields. Notably, his great grandson, William B. Gould IV became a law professor at Stanford University and head of the National Labor Relations Board.

Gould's diary had been gathering dust in the attic of a descendant in Massachusetts since 1923 but by 1998, William B. Gould IV received a call from Jonathan Noffke, curator at the Bellamy Mansion that let him know that plaster work with the engraved initials of "WBG" had been uncovered at the mansion. That spurred Gould IV to get to work on turning his great grandfather's diary into a book. Gould IV made several trips to Wilmington, conferring with local historians including Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., and in 2002 published Diary of a Contraband.

The stirring life story of William B. Gould is capped by a 2023 ceremony naming a park in Dedham in his honor and the unveiling of an impressive statue of Gould, a fitting monument to an extraordinary life.

Dr. MaryBeth Allison continued our very successful Members Forum program with a presentation titled "Social Distortion in Prison Life: Life on the Inside for Civil War Prisoners of War." MaryBeth began by noting that more than 400,000 Civil War soldiers—North and South—became prisoners and that some 56,000 died in captivity. Neither side in the war was prepared for the huge numbers of prisoners and most of the deaths were due to illness, especially contagious diseases.

MaryBeth pointed out, however, that most prisoners survived their harrowing experiences and "lived beyond the suffering and sickness and vowed with steadfast determination to stay busy, maintain their sanity, and counter the social distortion of prison life."

She gave moving examples of the importance of religious faith and the efforts men went to in order to keep faith alive and observe religious ceremonies. Sports, crafts, and service—such as working in prison hospitals—also played an important role.

Over and over, she said, prisoners wrote of the importance of friendship, of having “tour guides” who could watch over their comrades and advise them of the best methods of coping with the terrible challenges of prison life. She recounted one story of a friend who seeing a buddy slipping into lethargy and indifference, punched him in order to bring him around.

Idleness, MaryBeth found, was the worst enemy of prison survival. Letters were a great morale booster to prisoners, as they were to all soldiers and sailors, but Dr. Allison found that letters were a double-edged sword. Bad news from home or a lack of correspondence could drive prisoners deeper into depression and suffocate their will to survive.

Both MaryBeth and Christina graciously answered questions and contributed greatly to the enjoyment of all in attendance.

Letter from the Editor

As May unfolds, we find ourselves reflecting on a month rich with historical significance. From the daring maneuvers at Chancellorsville to the brutal combat of the Overland Campaign, this was a time when the course of the Civil War, and the nation, shifted dramatically.

One of the war's most harrowing engagements, the Battle of Spotsylvania Court House, raged through much of this month in 1864. It was a truly brutal conflict and soldiers on both sides endured unimaginable conditions. It was there that my own third great-grandfather, Daniel Landmon Howell, lost his life at the Bloody Angle.

Remembering him this time of year is a personal reminder of how deeply the echoes of history reach into our own lives and families.

Whether you come to our meetings out of academic curiosity, personal ancestry, or a broader interest in the Civil War, your presence helps keep these stories alive. Thank you for being part of our community.

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

President's Address

By Dr. Yelena Howell

Dear friends,

May is a prominent month in Civil War history: Chancellorsville, "An Act to Raise Ten Thousand State Troops" and the meeting of the Secession Convention in Raleigh, the beginning of the siege of Vicksburg, the Battles of the Wilderness and Spotsylvania Court House, and Day One of the Battle of Seven Pines (Fair Oaks) are some of the milestones that spring to mind. Matt and I think of our own "Inman", not of Cold Mountain, but of Wayne County—Daniel Landmon Howell, family man and a reluctant recruit to the North Carolina 4th Infantry, mortally wounded in Virginia.

In our time, May is often the grand finale of Civil War round table program cycles before a summer hiatus. As you plan to rejuvenate and regroup in the upcoming months, please note that our organization will continue to offer scheduled programming. Your out-of-town guests are most welcome to join us to deepen their appreciation of American history and its local chapters. Our summer tradition of member forums provides unique opportunities for interested parties to highlight areas of their fascination and expertise. We are so proud of each and every speaker and encourage you to keep notes during your Civil War-related summer travels and reading adventures that may inspire you to lead future rounds of member presentations or to submit a piece for publication in our newsletter.

May also happens to be a great month to have a birthday. The children of May have a particular youthful vivacity about them. Please wish our Treasurer Ed LeStrange many happy returns on the 8th (the day of our meeting!) and congratulate Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. on another trip around the sun on the 27th. Though his star rose and set in April, 70 blessed years apart, William Wordsworth described the May vibe like no other:

And all the earth is gay;
Land and sea
Give themselves up to jollity,
And with the heart of May
Doth every Beast keep holiday.

If your special day is coming up as well, happy birthday to you! Many thanks to each of you for your involvement that keeps us moving forward and fosters our spirit of community, inquiry, and impassioned learning.

Warmest regards,

Yelena

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

The April 2025 meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table was a great success, with 42 engaged participants, including members, guests, and visitors. We're excited to welcome two new members to our ranks: Chauncey Lambeth, who found us on Facebook and has a keen interest in Civil War small arms, and Scotty Dawson, eager to explore the role of the Marines during the war.

We also had one membership renewal. Thank you for your continued support! A warm welcome goes out to our guests Michael and Alicia Taylor and Timothy Edman—we hope they enjoyed the meeting and will join us again soon!

In Memoriam

In Memoriam: Dwight Hughes From the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

This month, we pause to remember and honor the life of Dwight Hughes, a valued historian, veteran, and voice in the Civil War community who passed away in April 2025.

Dwight first joined us at the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table in September 2020 as our very first virtual speaker, presenting on the fascinating history of the CSS Shenandoah. Despite the technical glitches that came with our inaugural Zoom meeting, Dwight's professionalism, patience, and good humor left a lasting impression. His depth of knowledge and passion for naval history brought the Civil War at sea vividly to life.

A graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy and a Vietnam-era Navy veteran, Dwight dedicated much of his post-service life to researching and sharing the often-overlooked maritime stories of the Civil War. His contributions to Emerging Civil War and his books, including A Confederate Biography: The Cruise of the CSS Shenandoah, reflect his commitment to telling balanced, well-researched, and engaging stories from the water's edge.

We are grateful to have had the opportunity to learn from him and to count him as part of our extended community, even if only briefly. Our thoughts are with his wife, Judi, and all who knew and admired him.

Members who wish to send condolences may do so at the following address:

MEMBERS GRAZER AND ALLISON HEADLINE DOUBLE HEADER PRESENTATIONS

For our May 8 meeting, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will feature a special “Members Forum” presentation from two distinguished members. Christina Grazer is a guide at the Bellamy Mansion whose tours are in great demand. MaryBeth Allison recently earned her Ph.D. in History and is working on a book based on her dissertation. As usual, the round table meets at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church, in Wilmington, NC. The doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

A native Texan, Christina moved to Wilmington several years ago and quickly became enamored with the local history. The first time she drove past the Bellamy Mansion, the magnificent antebellum house at 5th and Market, she fell in love with it and for the past seven years has served as a Premium Tour Guide. According to Christina, the incredible story of William B. Gould awakened a deep passion for, as Paul Harvey put it, “the rest of the story”. As well as escorting visitors from around the world through the house, Christina has recently started giving tours of downtown Wilmington with the Wilmington True History group. She is looking forward to participating in the excitement and events surrounding the 250th birthday of our great country!

Christina will tell the story of William B. Gould, an enslaved artisan who worked on the construction of the mansion. He was responsible for much of the decorative plaster work seen in the moulding of the mansion. Gould and seven other enslaved men commandeered a small boat on a stormy September night in 1862 and rowed down the Cape Fear River—“28 nautical miles” according to Gould’s diary—and out to the USS Cambridge, a U.S. Navy ship on blockade duty in the open ocean. Gould went on to serve honorably and well in the U.S. Navy and after the war settled in Massachusetts with his wife, a fellow North Carolinian, and raised a distinguished family that has contributed to the country in many ways in succeeding generations, including extensive military service. Gould wrote a diary of his Civil War service and his great grandson, William B. Gould IV, a distinguished jurist, is the author of Diary of a Contraband: The Civil War Passage of a Black Sailor, which presents his great grandfather’s wartime diary along with much supporting information.

The publisher, Stanford University Press, wrote that after his escape from slavery, the elder Gould “served in the United States Navy for the remainder of the Civil War and left a diary of his experiences—one of only three known diaries of African American sailors from the period. It is distinguished not only by its details and eloquent tone, but also by its author’s reflection on the conduct of the war, on his own military engagements, on race, on race relations in the Navy and on what African Americans might expect after the war and during Reconstruction.” Christina will tell this stirring and little known story with skill and in-depth knowledge of Gould’s work and life.

Next, Dr. MaryBeth Allison, PhD, will focus on a little studied aspect of the Civil War prisoner of War experience. MaryBeth is a Civil War Era historian from Cambria County, in southwestern Pennsylvania. She received her B.A. in history from the Pennsylvania State University in 2005, with her senior capstone focusing on America’s response to the Holocaust.

After graduation, MaryBeth used her research and writing skills as a proposal manager at two companies focused on correctional products and services. In her own words, “feeling restless,” MaryBeth enrolled at Liberty University and obtained her M.A. in history in the fall of 2021, focusing on American history and European history, and, of course, Civil War history, delving into the world of Civil War prisons and prisoners of war. She ultimately returned to Liberty University for her PhD in history with her dissertation, “Shine a Light into the Darkness: Illuminating the Battles Fought by Civil War Prisoners of War.”

During her research, MaryBeth traveled considerably for primary sources, mainly prisoner diaries, manuscripts, and letters. Her travels took her to West Virginia University’s Regional History Center, Virginia Tech, the Library of Virginia, Andersonville National Historic Site, and Wilmington, NC, where she had the privilege to learn from Dr. Chris Fonvielle Jr. and Dr. Angela Zombek of the University of North Carolina Wilmington. We’re lucky to have her as a member of our round table in Wilmington.

Four hundred thousand Union and Confederate soldiers found themselves imprisoned by the enemy during the American Civil War. Of that number, over fifty-six thousand captives died in the prison camps while their comrades endured unspeakable conditions. The amount of misery and suffering inside these prisons is undeniable, and the history of Civil War prisons encompasses a dark chapter in American history.

Understanding the day-to-day life of prisoners of war is crucial to understanding their experience. MaryBeth focuses on the experience of Union POWs as they struggled with extreme levels of physical deprivation, psychological abuse, and brutal treatment at the hands of guards and, in some cases, fellow prisoners. They often coped through engagement in everyday activities such as letter-writing, Bible-reading, playing sports, and other means. In the process, these survivors formed a strong bond that enabled them to endure these difficult conditions.

Much scholarship exists on the prisons and the conditions of the prisons; however, MaryBeth's work focuses on the prisoners' experiences in their own words. Prisoners continued fighting battles, and most of all, they battled to find light in the darkness, as told in their letters, journals, and memoirs written after the war. Experiences of Civil War captives go beyond the suffering and excessively high death rates as MaryBeth explains how they lived: from captivity, through daily living where some worked, others enrolled in classes, to their battles to maintain their faith, and how they struggled after the cessation of the Dix-Hill Cartel exchanges, battling disease and the environmental conditions, and fighting to stay alive. Finally, she reveals how prisoners learned to heal and the symbolism of healing as former POWs and their healing within a once-fractured nation.

MaryBeth continues her work as a proposal manager while teaching part-time at Penn Highlands Community College. She published two academic journal articles and is currently working on her book manuscript, Shining Light into Darkness: Day-to-Day Lives of Civil War Prisoners of War. MaryBeth will be relocating to Beaufort, SC, this summer, along with her husband and their gang of cats, where she hopes to pursue more teaching opportunities and further her research and writing.

The May 8, 2025 meeting of the round table will be held at Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive, Wilmington. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to our meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. CFCWRT April Meeting Recap

By B.E. Bee

WADE SOKOLOSKY DELIVERS ENTERTAINING AND INFORMATIVE HOSPITALS PRESENTATION

On April 10, our round table welcomed back a highly respected favorite of the membership, Wade Sokolosky, Col. U.S. Army (Ret.). Wade is one of the most accomplished historians of the Civil War in North Carolina, especially the period at the end of the war encompassing the Carolinas Campaign of Gen. Wm. T. Sherman's army culminating in the Battle of Bentonville, March 19–21, 1865.

As part of his research, Wade has produced the most definitive studies of the Confederate hospital system in North Carolina. He spoke to us about Volume 1 in February 2023, and now that Volume 2, covering the last two years of the war has been published, he returned to tell us about that period.

He began with the declaratory—and informative—statement that the period was an unmitigated “disaster on the Lower Cape Fear.” In the years before the Civil War, the concept of a highly professional hospital providing comprehensive, advanced medical care as we know it today simply didn't exist. There were just three institutions in the state known as hospitals.

Two were “Marine Hospitals.” A system of “Marine Hospitals” was established by the U.S. federal government beginning in 1798 to care for ill and disabled seamen in the U.S. Merchant Marine, U.S. Coast Guard and others. Called the Marine Hospital Service, it evolved into the Public Health Service. At the outbreak of the Civil War, the Marine Hospital Service operated 27 facilities in the United States. Two were in North Carolina. The first was the Marine Hospital on Portsmouth Island near Cape Lookout. It was established in 1847. After a hurricane opened the Hatteras Inlet, seaborne traffic diminished in the area and plans were made to build a Marine Hospital in Wilmington. It was built in 1857 at Eighth and Nun streets. The third “hospital” in the state was the Dix Hill Hospital in Raleigh, built in 1856 to house patients who were mentally ill. In 1862 the U.S. Army controlled the Outer Banks and the soundside cities of North Carolina and utilized the Portsmouth Island Marine Hospital for U.S. soldiers and sailors.

Throughout his presentation, Wade chronicled and analyzed the contributions of the many women who served in the hospitals and, in so doing, broke down many societal barriers that had limited the ways in which women could contribute to society. Many served as nurses, and many also served as “stewards,” who, in effect, were managers of the different sorts of hospital facilities and disciplines such as pharmacy, hygiene and nutrition.

He noted, for example, Barbara Franks of Asheville, who was the head matron of the hospital established in Asheville. At the beginning of the war, Wade said, dozens of facilities were established in and around Richmond, VA, including hospitals established by the various states specifically for the soldiers from their states. Women from North Carolina flocked to those hospitals to provide care. It was found, he stated, that hospitals run by women experienced lower mortality rates.

Wade noted that there were privately operated hospitals, state-run hospitals and those operated by the Confederate government. North Carolina faced a particularly tumultuous situation at the beginning of the war as Governor John Ellis died in July 1861. He was succeeded by Henry T. Clark, the speaker of the N.C. Senate. Clark was an able leader but unable to rally the state to face the manifold threats of U.S. occupation of the sounds and major towns along the seaboard, the effects of the blockade, and raising, equipping and training tens of thousands of raw recruits.

And those recruits were especially susceptible to infectious diseases such as measles, chicken pox, typhus and typhoid fever caused by poor sanitation. Clark served as governor for only a short time and was succeeded by Zebulon Vance. Vance was an energetic, young man in his early 30s who became a lawyer and politician who originally opposed secession but changed his position after U.S. President Abraham Lincoln called for volunteers to put down the rebellious southern states. Surrounded by seceding states, South Carolina to the south, Virginia to the north and Tennessee to the west, North Carolina seceded as well. Vance volunteered for the Confederate army and became colonel of the 26th North Carolina infantry regiment, which he ably led in battle at New Bern in March 1862 and then in the Seven Days Campaign around Richmond. He was elected governor in 1862 and faced the emergencies of war with the concrete experience of soldiering on the battlefield and in camp.

There were many different types of hospitals, from temporary hospitals and field hospitals, garrison or post hospitals, specialty hospitals, wayside hospitals offering respite for sick or wounded soldiers being transported—usually by rail—from the “seat of war” back to their home states where they could recover or be discharged. The “general hospitals” were open to all sorts of military personnel from all states and with all sorts of medical problems. Many general hospitals were built or planned around the pavilion style hospital developed by British battlefield nurse Florence Nightingale. The pavilion style hospitals prioritized ventilation and comfort for the sick and wounded. In North Carolina most general hospitals used existing buildings. It was difficult to build new facilities at times. In Wilmington, for example, the competition for lumber was so great that it was impossible to build a new pavilion hospital.

The first medical director of N.C. hospitals was Napoleon Covey, an able administrator with many good ideas for organizing and building a system of facilities but he wasn’t from North Carolina and Governor Zebulon Vance forcefully argued for his reassignment so that a North Carolinian could be appointed in his place. From September of 1863 to the end of the war, Surgeon Peter E. Hines was the Medical Director.

By 1864, a system of hospitals existed throughout the state built around 14 general hospitals primarily spaced out along the major railroads of the state. Two were in Wilmington. Seven Wayside Hospitals recognized by the Confederate government were also in operation plus three state Waysides and a private facility, the Barbee Hospital in High Point.

Wade went on to chronicle the unprecedented challenges faced by the hospitals in 1864 and 1865 as they dealt with the thousands of wounded soldiers sent back to the state or passing through the state as a result of the intense combat of the Overland Campaign and the siege of Petersburg and Richmond and then in early 1865, the fall of Ft. Fisher and the “Two Weeks of Fury” associated with Sherman’s march into the state.

As Wilmington fell, then Fayetteville the Confederate facilities along the coast became untenable and Surgeon Hines and others moved to open new facilities in the Piedmont.

Wade traced the evacuation of Confederate wounded from the Second Battle of Fort Fisher in January 1865, discussing that although most were unable to be evacuated to Smithville (now Southport). USN Lieutenant William B. Cushing wrote that he captured 44 sick and wounded along with the surgeons and nurses ministering to them. Soon Ft. Anderson fell with its 32-bed medical facility and then in late February, Confederate forces evacuated Wilmington and the Confederate facilities in Wilmington were taken over by the U.S. Army.

As U.S. forces gained control of the railroads and towns in the Piedmont, medical care moved further west and north. Field hospitals sprang up as needed near the battlefields, notably Harper House on the Bentonville Battlefield. Amy Harper and women from the surrounding farms and the town of Bentonville cared for Confederate wounded left behind when the armies moved west. The time left to the Confederacy was short but the devoted medical staff and volunteer nurses worked at a feverish pace to care for the wounded from Aversboro, Bentonville, and Wise's Forks. Janie Smith, a volunteer nurse in Goldsboro who moved on to High Point, became a casualty as she died of illness contracted in the hospital.

Wade graciously fielded questions from the audience for about 15 minutes and added to the enjoyment and enrichment of the audience. He noted that he is looking at a third volume about Confederate medical care in North Carolina but plans to work on a volume about Sherman's Carolinas Campaign in South Carolina first.

Confederate General Joseph Johnston quipped in regard to Sherman's command that "there was no such army since the days of Julius Caesar." We in the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table may say that Wade Sokolosky deserves such lavish praise as well and we look forward to welcoming him back in the future.

The Battle of Spotsylvania Courthouse

By Matthew Howell

The Battle of Spotsylvania Court House: A Crucible of Persistence and Sacrifice May 8 – 21, 1864

In the early spring of 1864, the Civil War had entered a new and grueling phase. General U.S. Grant, newly appointed commander of all Union armies, had brought with him a determination to engage Confederate General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia head-on. This direct approach marked a shift from the more cautious strategies of earlier Union generals, and it would lead to some of the war's bloodiest and most enduring conflicts. Among these, the Battle of Spotsylvania Court House stands out as a symbol of the relentless human cost of war and the unyielding nature of both armies during this decisive period of the conflict.

The battle, which lasted from May 8 to May 21, 1864, was the second major engagement of Grant's Overland Campaign. After the brutal fighting at the Battle of the Wilderness, where both armies suffered heavy losses but neither could claim a decisive victory, Grant continued his advance toward Richmond. Lee, determined to protect the Confederate capital, set up defensive positions near the crossroads town of Spotsylvania Court House.

What followed was not a single battle, but a series of engagements that saw the two armies locked in a deadly contest for control of key terrain and the initiative. The most iconic phase of the battle occurred at the "Bloody Angle," a section of the Confederate line at the end of a salient. It was here that Union soldiers launched repeated assaults, attempting to break through Lee's entrenched defenses. The fighting at the Bloody Angle became a horrendous example of close-quarters combat, with soldiers on both sides fighting in the most extreme conditions. Men huddled in trenches, exchanging fire at point-blank range, as artillery and musketry tore into their ranks.

It was here, amid the smoke and blood, that the battle's devastating cost was realized. The Union's attempt to break the Confederate line came at a high price, but they did not relent. The fighting was intense and unyielding, with both armies sustaining enormous casualties. When the smoke finally cleared, approximately 30,000 soldiers—killed, wounded, or missing—had been left behind on the blood-soaked fields.

Despite the staggering losses, there was no clear victor. General Grant, however, was undeterred. His strategy was simple but brutal: to apply relentless pressure, preventing Lee from retreating and wearing down the Confederate forces until they could no longer fight. Lee, though a master tactician, found himself trapped in a war of attrition he could not sustain, as his army continued to be battered by Grant's forces and the Union's superior resources.

The significance of the Battle of Spotsylvania Court House lies in the determination shown by both sides. For the Union, it marked a shift toward sustained engagements. For the Confederacy, it revealed the increasing strain on their forces. The battle highlighted Grant's persistence and Lee's dogged defense, setting the stage for the protracted conflict that would follow. The high cost underscored the harsh realities of a war where both sides were unwavering in their commitment, but only one would ultimately prevail.

As we reflect on the Battle of Spotsylvania Court House, we are reminded of the bravery and sacrifice of the men who fought there. Their determination to push forward in the face of overwhelming odds and their willingness to endure unimaginable suffering serve as a testament to the human spirit in times of war. We are also reminded of the staggering cost of that persistence, both on the battlefield and in the lives of those who carried its memory long after the fighting ended.

In the end, Spotsylvania Court House was not just a military engagement; it was a crucible that tested the limits of endurance, resolve, and sacrifice. And though neither side could truly claim victory, both armies were irrevocably changed by the experience, setting the stage for the war's bitter, final year.

My eldest son, exploring the grounds of the battlefield.

He carries on the name of my 3rd great-grandfather, who fell in battle at this very spot.

Gettysburg: How it Might Have Been

By Major John Weisz

Gettysburg: How It Might Have Been

It's 6:00 AM, July 1st, 1863, and two great armies are moving towards their destiny in determining whether the Confederate States of America will win their independence.

As daylight arrives, General Robert E. Lee and his advance divisions move towards the sleepy town of Gettysburg. About 30 miles south, Union Commander George Gordon Meade is marching north. Neither side knows the outcome of what will be a momentous three-day battle, which will leave the field with a total of 22,000 killed, wounded, and missing.

In this meeting engagement, a small Union cavalry brigade, armed with repeating rifles, takes up good defensive positions and stops the 6,000 infantry of the Confederates in their tracks. Heth's division is effectively removed from the first day's fighting.

General John Buford acknowledges significant losses, but he holds the high ground after this one-hour engagement, and he still has another brigade to keep up the fight while the Union First Corps is coming up quickly to support them.

Confederate reinforcements from the north and northeast race to gain control of the town. Union infantry arrives first and fortifies Cemetery and Culp's Hills. They extend their lines along Cemetery Ridge, about one-third of the way to Little Round Top.

At this time, Meade's forces lack the artillery to retard the Confederate tidal wave. A seesaw fight along a three-mile front ensues, with the winners switching every hour until the rebels are ready to break through in several places.

But fate would intervene. Due to confusion, poor coordination, and little intelligence from JEB Stuart's cavalry division, the men in gray and butternut make several assaults, but are beaten back every time, suffering devastating casualties. The Confederates are done. As Longstreet's First Corps is still miles away, the "Grey Fox" admits defeat and plans the heartbreaking march home to Virginia.

Of course, the story above is fiction, predicated on the results of a board game using well-documented facts about the terrain, leaders, men, and their combat capabilities.

Unlike the actual battle, we see the differences:

- The two forces fight only about two miles south of the town. Neither side is interested in the two large hills, Little Round Top and Round Top.
- East of the town, there is limited fighting. In the actual battle, there were numerous bloody fights over all three days. In our game, the sun sets and the battle dies down. The next day, a strong force of Union infantry and artillery arrives, significantly reducing the Confederate ranks.
- Only the first 1.5 miles of the long and critical Cemetery Ridge saw moderate fighting.
- South of the town and to the southeast is where the Confederate forces threw everything at the Union and where Lee's army was decisively beaten back.

Is this how you remember the Battle of Gettysburg? Probably not.

The Gettysburg "Battle" I've just described was only a simulation, as mentioned before. It took place not in South-Central Pennsylvania but in the southern part of New Hanover County. The commanders are two members of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable: Byron Hovey represented Robert E. Lee, Commanding Officer of the Army of Northern Virginia, while John Pilli was the newly appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Potomac.

playing "Gettysburg."*

The battle described above was without bloodshed and was congenially conducted in a gentlemanly manner. It was "fought" on March 24, 2025. No people or pets were harmed, nor was any furniture damaged in the host's home.

The Battle Game, Gettysburg, was one of the first military simulation board games in the United States. It was created by two gentlemen in Baltimore, Maryland, and distributed by the Avalon Hill Company. At the peak of their success, they produced close to 100 military simulation games.

This particular game is relatively simple but sophisticated and challenging. It takes about 30 minutes to learn the rules. It comes with a 28 by 24-inch battle board with very accurate terrain features, vegetation, hills, creeks, and roads.

There are approximately 80 pieces that represent about 75,000 Confederate soldiers and 90,000 Union troops, each representing brigades of cavalry, artillery, and infantry. Each combat piece has a military designation (the name of the commander or number), with two numbers on each piece (showing relative combat factor and movement factor). Each turn is one hour, and each side moves units as few or as many as they need to engage or take and hold key terrain. When enemy units come close to each other, they engage in combat. There's a table that compares the combat factors, and with the help of a die roll, the combat result is generated. Units may be destroyed, pushed back, or recover ground based upon these factors.

For the Confederates to win, they must exit at least three divisions of infantry units off the southern end of the board.

I believe that both of our commanders learned more about the factors that governed military operations in this level of board game. Both John and Byron knew much about the battle from extensive reading and personal research, but to see the battlefield from the standpoint of the commanding officers resulted in a very lively discussion after the game.

I am John Weisz, a longtime member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. I served as the host, referee, and “War Correspondent” for the above narrative.

If you are interested in participating in the game or watching it, please email me at: hans52weisz@gmail.com or see me at the next meeting. Maybe you can change history with your tactical and operational acumen?

The next opportunity to do this would be in late May or early June, so don't delay!

Brunswick Civil War Round Table

The Round Table likes to consider combining bluegrass music with Civil War paintings as fine arts! That's how it will celebrate their 15th anniversary on Tuesday, May 6th at Generations Church on Route 211, near the St. James main gate.

Registration begins early at 5:30PM. Then it's Dear MariBella and the Pigkickers to play from 6:00PM to 6:45PM.

The program, featuring guest speaker Brad Gottfried and his story of artist and Union Captain James Hope, begins at 7:00PM. Everyone is invited. Guests only pay $10, and that can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues which could include a spouse.

Brad Gottfried will share his vast knowledge about James Hope during his presentation entitled, "The Battle of Antietam: Paintings of James Hope." Captain Hope was a professional artist, who recorded sketches of actual battles, and later converted them into full blown paintings. These paintings are considered to be some of the most important and detailed depictions of Civil War battles ever created.

TRIP TO VICKSBURG WITH CLEVELAND CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE

Last year the Cleveland Civil War Round Table invited members of our round table to participate in their annual battlefield tour and trip. The destination was Gettysburg and the experience was top-notch in every way. Five members of our round table plus two guests went to Gettysburg in September and reveled in a two-day guided tour of the battlefield plus a moving and enlightening tour of the Spangler Farm field hospital site.

This year, our friends in Cleveland have invited us to participate in a tour of the Vicksburg Campaign from Bruinsburg to Vicksburg on 25-28 September, 2025. The trip includes expert guidance provided by Capt. Rick Martin, USAF (Ret.) who is also a retired Chief Ranger for Vicksburg National Military Park. On Friday, September 26, the tour will focus on Grant's movement across the Mississippi and the battles leading up to his investment of the fortress city of Vicksburg from the east. The next day will focus on the Union assaults and siege operations leading up to the capitulation of the Confederate command on July 4, 1863.

The cost of the trip is $175 which will cover the cost of the guide, any entrance fees and boxed lunches each day. Rooms have been reserved at the Courtyard by Marriott Vicksburg and breakfast is included in the room rate. The cost of the room and the cost of transportation to and from Vicksburg is at your own expense, as will be the cost of dinners.

Full details are available at:

Feel free to contact Bill Jayne at jayne.bill@gmail.com or (910) 386-9203 if you have questions.

We were lucky to hear Terry Winschel's excellent presentation on Vicksburg in February and this is a great opportunity to actually see the ground and learn more about this most pivotal campaign.

Letter from the Editor

As spring arrives along the Cape Fear, the air turns gentler, and the landscape begins its annual transformation. Daffodils brighten gardens and old homesites, quietly marking the passage of time.

Azaleas burst into color, and the purple of redbuds and wisteria weaves through the trees and hedgerows. Cherry blossoms and dogwoods drift on the breeze, and the hush of early spring gives way to birdsong and brightness.

It's a time of renewal, a season I've always found both restorative and reflective.

Spring also brings a sense of motion, of stories reawakening. In history, this season reminds us that even the darkest chapters of the past are filled with change, consequence, and complexity.

Like the landscape around us, the study of the Civil War era continues to evolve. Fresh perspectives emerge, familiar narratives are challenged, and long-forgotten voices find new life.

I hope you enjoy this month's edition of The Runner, and find some time to savor all that this glorious season has to offer.

Wishing you a bright & thoughtful spring,

Matthew Howell

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear members and friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table,

Happy April—my favorite month if I had to pick one. All is lovely and new, and here I am failing to come up with a fresh and tasteful April Fool's Day number to fit the date! With 29 days left to wrap up my doctorate, there is too much competition for what bandwidth remains. If you have a favorite Civil War joke, a humorous story, or a fun prank to share, please feel free to send them to me at CapeFearRT@gmail.com

A fellow Howell, James (1594?-1666) of Wales, remarked, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." While you and I take our work seriously, we would be fools to take ourselves too seriously. We would be fools not to play, laugh, and enjoy simple pleasures as one day succeeds another. We would be fools not to let the spring sun warm our faces, not to take time out for people, places and events, not to keep moving forward with hope and joy.

A recent road trip to the country to spend time with two of my favorite North Carolina historians took me through fields of such vibrant vernal green that any Welshman would weep. Riding by old battlefields and homesteads, farms and townships stirred many reflections, chief among them the thought that we fool ourselves in seeing our lives as anything other than a union with those who have gone before us and those who journey with us today: our families, friends and communities. Still, why don't we look beyond the negative connotations of the word "fool"? Be a fool for an idea. A fool for people. A fool for love. A fool for a good joke and a fool for a good life.

Sincerely,

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

We were thrilled to welcome 48 attendees to our March meeting, including guests, visitors, and several new faces! The energy in the room was fantastic, and we're excited to see our community continue to grow.

So far this year, we've welcomed five new members and received three renewals through the website, an encouraging sign of our expanding reach. Please join us in welcoming the newest members to the Round Table:

- James Anderson returns to his Wilmington roots after over 30 years away. A lifelong student of Confederate history with deep genealogical ties to the war, James brings a keen interest in Fort Fisher, the defense of Charleston, and the H.L. Hunley. Outside of history, he enjoys bowling, live music, and family time with his two grown daughters.
- A.C. "Carl" Ward is a retired military veteran, local author, and seasoned consultant. Carl's academic and professional résumé spans from Appalachian State to Yale, and he brings a wealth of knowledge as a certified U.S. Army Military History Instructor. He and his wife, Jolene, reside at the beach with their cat, Heidi.
- Zack Bacon and Ken Keast joined us through the website. Welcome! We look forward to getting to know you better at upcoming meetings.

We are grateful for the continued enthusiasm and support of our members, new and returning, and we look forward to another great year of fellowship and learning.

Name Tags

Name tags are an amenity that facilitates communication among all attendees. Please be sure to return your badge at the end of each meeting or plan to bring it the next time you join us in person. If you need a new tag, just let me know.

Membership Renewals

Your renewal month is printed on your name tag. Please feel free to check with me in person or by email at CapeFearRT@gmail.com if you have a question about your renewal month. There are several easy ways to "reenlist":

- See membership options and renew online: <https://cfcwrt.org/>
- Mail a check to CFCWRT, 1008 Heron Run Dr., Leland, NC 28451
- See Ed Lestrage at the next meeting with a check or cash.
- See Yelena Howell for Venmo.

Spread the Word

Remember, we are all ambassadors for the Round Table. Please invite your family, friends, co-workers, and neighbors to join us. We will ensure every guest feels welcome.

Sincerely yours,

Kim Berger

NC's Confederate Hospitals Topic of Cape Fear Round Table

Our round table welcomes back a highly respected favorite of the membership, Wade Sokolosky, Col. U.S. Army (Ret.). Wade will present a program titled “North Carolina’s Confederate Hospitals” at the Thursday, April 10 meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. As usual, we meet at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church, Wilmington, NC.

The meeting offers an opportunity to engage with the speaker both before and after the presentation and to ask questions in a friendly, informal setting. The doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

A resident of the sound-side town of Beaufort, NC, where he grew up, Col. Sokolosky is a graduate of East Carolina University and a 25-year veteran of the U.S. Army. He is one of North Carolina's leading experts of the 1865 Carolinas Campaign, the name given to Union General William T. Sherman's audacious march across both South Carolina and North Carolina in the winter of 1864-65. Wade has lectured throughout the country speaking to Civil War round tables, various clubs and organizations, and at historical sites. He is a top-notch battlefield guide.

Col. Sokolosky's topic, “Confederate Hospitals in North Carolina,” is based on his recently published book, North Carolina's Confederate Hospitals, Vol. 2: 1864-65. Volume 1 of Col. Sokolosky's study covered the years 1861-63 and was published in 2022. Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., Professor Emeritus, UNC Wilmington, and one of the founders of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, wrote, “Wade Sokolosky, one of the leading historians of the Civil War in the Old North State, has turned his keen research skills on exploring the Confederate health care system.” Moreover, “he examines the organization and administration of care facilities on both the home front and the battlefield. Sokolosky's study is a constructive reference work and a captivating narrative of an overlooked but important aspect of North Carolina at war.”

In an informative and very positive review of Volume One the Civil War Books and Authors website wrote: “As Sokolosky abundantly demonstrates, management of the hospital system in North Carolina during this period mirrored many other aspects of the Confederate war effort in that it was subjected to frequent and often intense States Rights versus centralization clashes. With North Carolina governor Vance being one of the most ardent defenders of state prerogatives, that tug and pull between Richmond and Raleigh was present at all levels of medical department leadership and management. Who should manage, supply, and fund general hospitals in North Carolina was an ongoing subject of debate. As the war progressed, however, the forces of centralized integration gathered momentum, and by December 1863 the Confederate Medical Department was in charge of all of North Carolina's general hospitals and the majority of its wayside hospitals.”

The current volume will cover the period of more centralized control and the period of greatest stress as the forces of the Union penetrated into the state from four directions: General Sherman driving up from the south with his powerful veteran army of more than 60,000 men, Union naval and ground forces reducing the “Confederate Goliath” of Fort Fisher and closing the port of Wilmington, powerful ground forces moving up the railroad from New Bern to Goldsboro and General Stoneman’s 6,000-strong cavalry raid that wreaked havoc in the western part of the state.

Wade is the co-author (with Mark A. Smith) of To Prepare for Sherman's Coming: The Battle of Wise's Forks, March 1865, chosen as the winner of the Civil War Books and Authors Best Book of the Year for 2015.

The battlefield of Wyse Fork (contemporary spelling), just east of Kinston, has been largely saved from imminent threat of destruction by the NC Department of Transportation, thanks in great part to the efforts of Wade Sokolosky and a dedicated group of Civil War historians and preservationists centered on Kinston, who garnered support from the American Battlefield Trust and the federal Advisory Council on Historic Preservation. Our round table was a “consulting party” in the pivotal U.S. Army Corps of Engineers review that ended with the saving of crucial parts of the battlefield.

Fought over three days in March after the fall of Wilmington and just before the Battle of Bentonville, Wyse Fork saw two hastily formed armies of heterogeneous troops—the Confederates under Braxton Bragg and the Union under Jacob Cox—clash as part of a plan to halt Sherman's northward march toward Goldsboro and, ultimately, the battlefields of Virginia. More than 2,500 casualties were sustained. In the early 1990s the Federal Civil War Sites Advisory Commission surveyed some 10,500 armed conflicts during the Civil War and published a report that classified the encounters according to their historical significance. Of the 10,500 sites surveyed, Wyse Fork was listed as one of the 384 most significant clashes in the Civil War.

Wade Sokolosky and Mark Smith are also the authors of No Such Army Since the Days of Julius Caesar: Sherman's Carolinas Campaign from Fayetteville to Averagesboro. Books Monthly wrote of the volume that "Smith and Sokolosky are military historians with a particular interest in what happened in the Carolina States. What they bring to the table regarding Sherman and Johnston is remarkable, a revelation." Wade is also the author of Final Roll Call: Losses during the Carolinas Campaign.

The April 10, 2025 meeting of the round table will be held at Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive, Wilmington. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to our meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Bring a friend! For more information about membership in the Cape Fear Civil War Round table, go to <http://www.cfcwrt.org> and click on "Join/Rejoin." There is no charge for admission. See you there!

Si Harrington Delivers Fast-Paced Presentation on North Carolina and the Confederate Navy

With swift delivery and quick wit, North Carolina historian Sion “Si” Harrington III brought to a large audience of members and friends an informative overview of North Carolina and North Carolinians in the annals of the Confederate States Navy (CSN) in the “War Between the States.”

Si is a retired U.S. Army Lieutenant Colonel with service from 1970 to 2009. He had service on active duty, in the reserves and National Guard, including assignments in Grenada and Bosnia. He is a graduate of UNC Chapel Hill and holds a Masters in History from N.C. State. He worked as a teacher, ROTC instructor and military collection archivist with the NC Division Historical Resources. He is also the vice president of the N.C. Military Historical Society, which operates a very interesting and educational museum on the grounds of the Blakeslee Air Force Recreation Area in Kure Beach, near the Fort Fisher State Historic Site.

A native of Erwin, NC, a small town in Harnett County about half way between Raleigh and Fayetteville, Si is a lifelong student of history and has dedicated years of concentrated study and effort to documenting the history of the military in North Carolina and the history of Erwin and Harnett County, including the Civil War battle of Averasboro fought just before the battle of Bentonville. He is the author of numerous articles and the book-length Roster of North Carolinians in Confederate Naval Service.

Si began with an overview of the daunting challenges faced by the Confederate Navy at the beginning of the war and throughout the conflict. He thanked Andrew Duppsstadt, the Education & Interpretation Supervisor for the North Carolina Division of State Historic Sites and Charles Hawks for much of the material about the CSN’s challenges. Charles Hawks retired from the U.S. Navy (reserve) as a Commander and was a founder of the Raleigh Civil War Round Table.

One great asset of the CSN was former U.S. Senator Stephen Mallory who had served as the chair of the U.S. Senate Committee on Naval Affairs. Mallory was a knowledgeable, sagacious leader who greatly contributed to the CSN’s record. Si pointed out that, of course, the Confederacy had no navy at the beginning of the war. There were no warships and virtually no merchant ships available to the Confederacy that could be converted into military vessels.

In addition, the skilled work force needed to build and convert ships was not available except in very small numbers. There were only two navy yards, only three rolling mills to produce iron sheeting, no heavy machine shops and only one foundry for heavy guns. Coal and iron ore were also available only in very small quantities. With about 3,500 miles of shoreline, there were only ten “major” southern ports and three of them—New Bern, Beaufort and Wilmington—were in North Carolina.

The U.S. Navy only had 42 ships available at the beginning of the war to blockade the vast coastline of the South and the blockade was not effective at first. Si reported that early in the war about five out of every six runs into southern ports were successful. By the end of the war, however, more than 600 U.S. ships were much more effective. Of the ten southern ports, by 1865 all were closed except Wilmington, which was closed after the fall of Ft. Fisher. New Bern and Beaufort were taken by the Union early in the war and, in fact, Beaufort became the major support station for the force blockading Wilmington.

Many U.S. Navy officers resigned their commissions and offered their services to the nascent CSN. Si quoted from one North Carolinian, James Iredell Waddell, who wrote “In thus separating myself from association which I have cherished for twenty years, I wish it to be understood that no doctrine of the rights of secession, nor wish for disunion of the States impel me, but simply because my home is the home of my people in the South, and I could not bear arms against them.”

About 373 U.S. Navy officers out of a total of 1,554 at the beginning of the war, resigned and moved to the South. Many, including Admiral Samuel Phillips Lee, a cousin of Robert E. Lee, remained with the U.S. Navy. Still, the number of officers who “went south” was more than the CSN could use at first. Si also pointed out that few enlisted men went south, largely because they did not have the privilege of resigning. They could be apprehended and charged with treason.

Notably, we learned that no U.S. Navy ships were commandeered and taken south even though some were commanded by southern officers who resigned their commissions. CSN Secretary Mallory was faced with the need to decide on what sort of navy the Confederacy would try to create with this cadre of proven leaders but virtually no navy to command. Si broke down the decision as one that would decide if it would be a “Blue Water” navy that would serve on the high seas, the oceans and gulfs bordering the Confederacy, or a ‘Brown Water’ navy suited for the rivers, sounds and harbors. Most CSN ships were ultimately “brown water” vessels.

Nonetheless, Mallory devoted a great deal of attention to developing a force of privateers, “legalized pirates,” in Si’s words, and commerce raiders. The commerce raiders such as the Alabama, Florida and Shenandoah, were ships that were acquired in Europe and planned from the first as warships but by subterfuge portrayed as commercial vessels to preserve the neutrality of the European powers. The damage done to U.S. maritime trade was substantial and Si contended that the U.S. merchant trade did not fully recover until WWII. The CSN also displayed great ingenuity in building everything from ironclads to “tinclads,” cottonclads” and “timberclads,” as well as submarines, floating batteries and torpedo boats such as the “Davids” and the “Squibs.” Much credit was given to John Luke Porter, a U.S. Navy constructor who became the Chief Constructor of the CSN, based in Wilmington for much of the war.

Eventually, the Confederacy cobbled together a naval establishment that was high on ingenuity if a bit low on capacity. North Carolina, at one time or another, had at least nine shipyards or other naval activities. Some, such as the Fayetteville Naval Ordnance Depot, was very short-lived and others such as the “Edwards Ferry Shipyard” where the CSS Albemarle was built, were very primitive facilities. The Albemarle was known as the “cornfield ironclad” because it was primarily built in a field alongside the Roanoke River. One shipyard was located in Charlotte, far from the blue water. The Charlotte yard once employed 1,500 men and boys and using machinery taken from the U.S. Navy yard in Norfolk, produced nearly all the propellers, propeller shafts, anchors, gun carriages and many other parts needed by the CSN. Manufactured items were then shipped to the navy yards and other locations by rail. It remained in operation until 1865.

Si then turned to some of the naval engagements and campaigns in the waters of North Carolina.

First came the “Mosquito Fleet” of five light craft commissioned by the state to oppose the invasion under U.S. General Burnside early in the war. The Mosquito Fleet was “swatted” aside and Burnside’s joint force took control of the sounds inside the Outer Banks as well as key points such as Roanoke Island, New Bern and Beaufort.

A quick review of North Carolina personnel revealed that at least six Tar Heels served on the CSS Virginia (nee Merrimack) in the pivotal battle of Hampton Roads. J.B. Cunningham of Madison County is “said to have piloted the Virginia in her battle with the USS Monitor. William Francis Drake of Northampton County is “thought to have been the last survivor of the battle.” James M. Sheffield also served on the Virginia. Si estimates that more than 2,800 North Carolinians served in the Confederate Navy and Marine Corps.

Tar Heels were well represented among the commanding officers of the successful commerce raiders. John Newland Maffitt captained the CSS Florida as well as other Confederate ships. He settled in Wilmington after the war. The aforementioned James Iredell Waddell captained the CSS Shenandoah, the only Confederate ship to circumnavigate the globe and the last Confederate unit to lower the flag. In the remote North Pacific preying on whalers in 1865, the ship did not learn of the surrenders of Lee, Johnston and others until the fall of 1865. Captain Waddell then disarmed the ship and sailed it to Liverpool, England, where he lowered the Confederate flag on November 5, 1865.

There were four North Carolina built ironclads: the North Carolina, the Neuse, the Albemarle and the Raleigh. Like all Confederate ironclads, they were underpowered and handicapped by other weaknesses related to construction materials and techniques. The North Carolina was built with green lumber and succumbed to nautical “worms” that destroyed the integrity of the hull. She was sunk off Smithville (Southport) as a “floating battery.” The CSS Raleigh was also based in the Cape Fear River. An effective ironclad she engaged USN blockaders on May 5, 1864, but returning to the river she hit a sandbar near New Inlet and “broke her back.” The CSS Wilmington was more of a “monitor” in design with cannon to be housed in two casemates on low-freeboard deck. She was never completed and destroyed “on the stocks” in January 1865. The Neuse (or “Nuisance” as one crewman termed her) was built on the Neuse River above Kinston but saw little service and was burned by Confederate troops to prevent her capture in March 1865. Si talked briefly about the CSS Neuse museum in Kinston and the full-scale reproduction of the ship nearby. It’s an extremely educational exhibit well worth seeing.

Then there was the CSS Albemarle, built in a cornfield in Halifax County, the construction of the vessel was under the direction of 19-year-old soldier Gilbert Elliott. It was captained by James Wallace Cooke, born in Beaufort. He was North Carolina's highest ranking CS naval officer. In the Battle of Plymouth, April 19, 1864, the Neuse rammed and sank the USS Southfield and damaged the USS Miami. Captain Charles W. Flusser of the Miami was killed in the engagement. The Neuse rammed the Southfield and the sinking U.S. ship dragged the Neuse under where she was unable to evade the Miami. Flusser placed his ship as close to the Neuse as possible and was killed when a shot ricocheted off the Albemarle. A few weeks later, the southern ironclad ram again engaged U.S. ships, this time in Albemarle Sound. The ironclad fared well in the battle but damage to her smokestack compelled her to retreat. Still a great threat to the wooden U.S. ships in the sound, the Confederates repaired the ironclad and the U.S. Navy hatched a plan to sink her at her anchorage. On October 28, 1864, in a daring attack with a spar torpedo boat, U.S. Navy lieutenant William Cushing, a close friend of Lt. Commander Flusser, braved tremendous small arms fire to detonate his torpedo under the Albemarle, sinking her at the anchorage in Plymouth. He escaped by diving into the cold river waters and swimming downstream.

While none of the Confederate ironclads were capable enough to raise the blockade of U.S. Navy ships, they did a great deal to make the blockade more difficult and to challenge joint operations from closing various harbors, especially Charleston. Another example of southern ingenuity was the submarine Hunley. It was ultimately lost in Charleston Harbor when sinking the USS Housatonic on February 17, 1864. One of the crew was James A. Wickes of North Carolina.

Si also touched on blockade runners, the fall of Ft. Fisher, and the employment of "naval infantry" in the waning days of the war, especially at the Battle of Saylor's Creek in the Appomattox Campaign. He wound up his very educational talk with some concluding points. It would be hard to dispute Si's contention that the "CS Navy and Marine Corps did the best they could under the circumstances." Almost always understrength and lacking proper equipment, they "gave a good account of themselves in every engagement in which they participated."

The CSS Albemarle

Graciously answering many questions from the audience, Si also displayed one of his most prized possessions: an authentic Civil War summer-weight sailor's jumper with reinforced cuffs and back flap. One Internet source says that the back flap was part of the uniform because "until the early 1900s there were no haircut requirements for sailors, and sailors normally let their hair grow long. To keep their hair from getting caught up in the ship's rigging or equipment, they tied it back in a ponytail and dipped the ends in tar to hold it together. To keep the tar off their jumper shirts, sailors started wearing a button-on flap which was easier to wash. Especially when the sailors might only have one or two shirts anyway." Sounds plausible. Following tradition, U.S. Navy enlisted uniforms still have the back flap.

Study of the Civil War seems to be very much centered on the dramatic and large-scale land battles but the role of the naval forces, it can be argued, was pivotal. The U.S. Navy took New Orleans on their own early in the war, depriving the South of its largest city and by far the most important port. Grant's audacious and decisive Vicksburg campaign would not have been possible without the contribution of the U.S. Navy. Similarly, his "Overland" campaign in Virginia ultimately depended on U.S. control of the sea lanes and riverine system of Tidewater Virginia. The Confederate Navy showed great ingenuity, elan and sagaciousness in attacking U.S. maritime trade, resisting the blockade and challenging joint Army-Navy campaigns to close southern harbors.

Concluding the Storm

By Matthew Howell

Dale Gallon's "Coming Rain"

To My Fellow Round Table Members,

With this issue of The Runner, we conclude our five-part exploration of Brandon Carter's Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather. This final section offers a summary of Carter's findings and lays out the broader theories that have been proposed to explain the frequent appearance of rain or other precipitation in the wake of battle. Drawing on both 19th century speculation and modern meteorological knowledge, Carter closes his study with a reflection on the relationship between warfare and the natural world.

We are grateful to Brandon for sharing his full manuscript with the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, and for allowing us to present it in serialized form. His work, regardless of one's conclusions, is a reminder of the many creative ways Civil War history continues to inspire inquiry and debate. I also want to thank our readers for following along with this unique series over the past several months.

For a broader discussion of weather's influence on war, I once again recommend Kenneth Noe's The Howling Storm: Weather, Climate, and the American Civil War.

With appreciation,

Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather

By Brandon Carter, Esq.; Serialized by Matthew Howell

A Harvest of Death

Part 5: Theories and Conclusion

Of course, some post-combat rain could be coincidence. But it occurred far too frequently to be dismissed so easily. To demonstrate this, we must look at the annual precipitation averages of the battlefield areas.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Agency has kept daily rainfall and snowfall records for many cities for as far back as the 1890's. Though these records do not date back to the Civil War, it is reasonable to assume that the weather patterns of today's United States are not extremely different from those of the war era. Appendix II contains a partial list of those records that are relevant to the locations of Civil War battlefields. For example, the Manassas, Virginia, area played host to at least four major Civil War battles: First and Second Manassas, Ox Hill (Chantilly), and Bristoe Station. All four were either followed by or fought during rain. One each occurred in July, August, September, and October.

Precipitation histories have been kept at the Washington National Airport for sixty-five years. The airport is only about twenty-five miles from Manassas, so it is safe to assume that the weather between the two locations is extremely similar. The month of July there averages only nine days of rainfall. Thus, the odds of rain would be nine out of thirty-one, or roughly 29 percent. Nine days of rain is also the average for August, again 29 percent. The average in September is eight, or just under 26 percent. In October it rains on average only seven days, less than in any of the other twelve months. The percentage is less than 23 percent. In other words, it rains less than one out of every four days in October in Washington, D.C., and Northern Virginia. Yet 100 percent of the battles produced or at least preceded rain.

Although much more investigation is needed pending a definitive conclusion, the percentage of major Civil War battles that were followed by rain appears to be far greater than one should expect from the percentage of average daily rainfall in their respective locations (<http://www.ncdc.noaa.gov/oa/climate/online/ccd/prgeo1.txt>).

Theories for Post-Combat Rain

The idea of weather modification is not new. Many experiments have been done with clouds in hopes that someday man will be able to control the frequency of precipitation. Since the late nineteenth century, no studies have been done comparing combat and weather, but weather modification itself has been an important topic. Compounds have been discovered that are capable of “seeding” clouds, artificially causing rain. Some farmers have even implemented methods to turn hail into rain in an effort to prevent damage to their crops. The weather modification techniques of today are closely related to the accidental weather modification that occurred during the Civil War.

Powers offers a number of possible explanations or theories concerning why battles induced precipitation. Most center on the effects of the vibrations of a firing cannon, not the chemical makeup of black powder. He begins by describing the work of another scientist, a Professor Espy. Espy believed that large fires could create rain. He wrote that an ascending column of air created a vacuum, drawing air in other areas to it from all directions. Then, water vapor was condensed as the rising, expanding air cooled. A large fire could heat the air and cause it to ascend. Powers noted that a similar process occurred when moist Pacific air currents, which move from west to east in the Northern Hemisphere, strike the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The lower, warmer current rises and is then pressed into the cooler current above, causing a storm. This is now known as adiabatic cooling, and we know it to be fact.

Through my research, I have put together a theory on the relationship between Civil War combat and the precipitation that often followed. Civil War gunpowder contained three main components: charcoal, sulfur, and saltpeter, or potassium nitrate. Through correspondence with Dr. Bruce Boe of North Dakota-based Weather Modification, Inc., I have learned that potassium nitrate is an oxidizer. Oxidizers are used in cloud seeding to cause ice nuclei within clouds to have a hygroscopic effect, or to absorb moisture and create cloud droplets faster. Similar salts are used to create large cloud droplets, which accelerate the “warm rain” precipitation process. In other words, these oxidizers are used to hurry the process of raining, causing a cloud to rain before it normally would.

Precipitation followed many Civil War battles, and the war's participants were aware of that phenomenon. Many even put in writing their beliefs that the two were related. Weather modification itself is not a new topic, and millions of dollars are spent on it every year, mainly for agricultural reasons. In the first study of the relationship between combat and precipitation, Edward Powers offered theories in order to help farmers during times of drought and flooding. Powers, however, based his study on the concussion of cannon, not on the actual chemical makeup of black powder. After over a century of technological advancement, we can now offer new theories to explain this phenomenon. If a salt is formed from the combustion of black powder, then it is nearly certain that Civil War rifle and especially cannon fire caused rain to fall on or near the area of the fighting. Along with this revelation would come the putting to rest of a 140-year-old curiosity.

The Town With Charity For All – A Visit to Appomattox, 160 Years Later

April will mark 160 years since the epochal Battle of Appomattox in Virginia. While Civil War enthusiasts might argue about when the war's outcome became inevitable (I'm open to the Fort Fisher theory myself), Appomattox is indisputably the scene where the inevitable became reality. Robert E. Lee's inability to resupply his men after the fall of Richmond and his subsequent surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia to Ulysses S. Grant signaled the collapse of the Confederate war effort, as Southern armies laid down their arms over the following weeks while the remnants of the Southern government dissolved. Four years of war effectively ended.

Recently, I took a quick road trip to Appomattox to glimpse this most pivotal of sites in American history—the spot where the United States became singular once again and definitively. It remains a remarkable excursion, one that anyone with even a slight interest in the Civil War should take at least once in their lives.

Driving to Appomattox is itself a rather stunning endeavor. In my case, I drove through dozens of miles of rural and small-town America, trekking down roads with few of the “creature comforts” I’ve come to expect living in suburbia. It brought to mind the overwhelmingly agrarian landscape of the region during the war and how much of it was compromised by the sheer scale of destruction. Reaching Appomattox, one senses both the aura of history and the attempts to capitalize on it side by side. The town itself is quintessentially small-town America: local stores, national chains, and hotels, all of which cater to those who return the favor by visiting. And then you turn onto Route 24, and the world shifts a little bit. The streets, the path to the park, the dirt ground—all of it hints that this little part of Virginia means more.

Walking up the path from the parking lot to the visitor center—the reconstructed courthouse, a replacement for the original which burned down—I felt that this small historic town was as hallowed as promised. But it was where I went afterward that validated that feeling: the dirt road to the reconstructed McLean House. An attempt to move the dwelling to Washington around the turn of the 20th century failed. I'm thankful that it did. The McLean House, the home of a former grocer where Grant and Lee met on that spring day, belongs here.

It's unassuming, but that's what makes it so powerful. The nation's greatest conflict effectively ended not in a glamorous mansion or somber courtroom, but in a rather standard Virginian house. It feels very American, very salt-of-the-earth, and a bit idealistic. To think that these two men—whose strategies and philosophies are examined to the most minute level and who have often been treated as gods among men—would converse and undertake the most powerful military meeting in American history in an ordinary living room is humbling.

Of course, there are plenty of reminders of Antebellum society. Not only did the McLean House have slave quarters, consistent with the South's slave-driven economy, but the building next to the Clover Hill Tavern Kitchen was formerly used to house enslaved people. The building in question was being de-converted from a restroom—a sign of the increasing calls to acknowledge the impact of slavery on America, particularly during the Civil War. In that spirit, Appomattox tells multiple stories of the Civil War, stories being written and refined then and now.

Opinion Cont.

The site also stands as a notable testament to how the war ended and the path the nation would take toward reconciliation. There were casualties in the battle: 164 Union dead, 195 Confederate. Yet the nearby Clover Hill Tavern, an inn that had fallen on hard times during the war, became the site where scores of parole passes were printed. Grant allowed Lee's men, staring down military defeat and returning to land likely damaged by war, to be paroled immediately with their sidearms and horses. This largely agricultural fighting force was permitted to return to tend their lands and was even granted free rail transportation. And in that tavern, the printing press allowed for the start of a long, complicated healing process. Men who had taken up arms against their brethren were allowed to return to something resembling a normal life as smoothly as possible. Not forgotten, of course, but at least there could be a path to repairing the nation.

I suppose that's what makes Appomattox so striking: the absence of vindictiveness after so much pain in this one moment. But should we expect any less? It was Abraham Lincoln who, in his second inaugural address, proclaimed that peace postbellum should be sought "with malice toward none, with charity for all," a hope that, while justice was necessary, we must not act with ill will toward our brethren. It felt as though Grant and Lee held that spirit in mind while conversing in that parlor room. Tragically, five days after Lee's surrender, Lincoln would pay dearly while watching Our American Cousin, his words sullied by an assassin's bullet. The full promise of Appomattox was gunned down 142 miles from where it had sprung up.

But the gravitas of that moment still stands. After four years of brutal conflict, after the destruction of infrastructure, the deaths of hundreds of thousands of men, the devastation of towns and cities, to think the Civil War effectively ended with two men conversing about their military histories, Lee dressed for possible imprisonment and Grant walking in with mud on his boots, is still captivating. And it remains relevant. Even amid our deepest divisions, we can still find paths to our common humanity, show respect for our fellow man, and find the stories that unite us as Americans.

Guest speaker Sarah Bierle will give her presentation on John Pelham on Monday, April 1st. Pelham became known as “The Gallant Pelham” for his bravery in the “horse artillery,” and left a legacy as being one of the most skilled Confederate artillery officers of the Civil War.

In 1861, Pelham decided to resign from West Point just weeks prior to his graduation. He joined the Confederate army of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston as a lieutenant in the artillery. Despite his young age, Pelham’s well drilled and disciplined battery caught the eye of Gen. J.E.B. Stuart, who provided horses for his men and transformed the battery into “horse artillery,” making it more mobile than conventional artillery. Pelham was involved in over 60 military engagements over a two year period. He was eventually mortally wounded leaving a very emotional and envious legacy.

Sarah Bierle is the former managing editor of Emerging Civil War, and works for the Education Department at American Battlefield Trust.

TRIP TO VICKSBURG WITH CLEVELAND CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE

Last year the Cleveland Civil War Round Table invited members of our round table to participate in their annual battlefield tour and trip. The destination was Gettysburg and the experience was top-notch in every way. Five members of our round table plus two guests went to Gettysburg in September and reveled in a two-day guided tour of the battlefield plus a moving and enlightening tour of the Spangler Farm field hospital site.

This year, our friends in Cleveland have invited us to participate in a tour of the Vicksburg Campaign from Bruinsburg to Vicksburg on 25-28 September, 2025. The trip includes expert guidance provided by Capt. Rick Martin, USAF (Ret.) who is also a retired Chief Ranger for Vicksburg National Military Park. On Friday, September 26, the tour will focus on Grant's movement across the Mississippi and the battles leading up to his investment of the fortress city of Vicksburg from the east. The next day will focus on the Union assaults and siege operations leading up to the capitulation of the Confederate command on July 4, 1863.

The cost of the trip is $175 which will cover the cost of the guide, any entrance fees and boxed lunches each day. Rooms have been reserved at the Courtyard by Marriott Vicksburg and breakfast is included in the room rate. The cost of the room and the cost of transportation to and from Vicksburg is at your own expense, as will be the cost of dinners.

We were lucky to hear Terry Winschel's excellent presentation on Vicksburg in February and this is a great opportunity to actually see the ground and learn more about this most pivotal campaign.

Letter from the Editor

As we welcome the arrival of March, we are reminded that history, like the changing of seasons, is never static. It is shaped by those who study it, interpret it, and share it with others. This month, as always, we continue our mission at the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table to explore the complexities of the war that shaped our nation, while also considering its lasting impact on our understanding of history today.

One of the greatest strengths of our group is the diversity of our perspectives. Whether we are analyzing battlefield tactics, political leadership, or the lives of civilians caught in the storm of war, each new insight enriches our collective knowledge. The Civil War was not a singular narrative but a vast tapestry of experiences, struggles, and consequences, many of which are still being uncovered.

As we gather this month, I encourage each of you to continue engaging with our shared history with the same curiosity and passion that defines this Round Table. Let us keep pushing the boundaries of what we know. After all, history is not just about the past, it is about how we interpret it in the present and preserve it for the future.

Thank you for being part of this journey. I look forward to another enlightening meeting and to hearing the insights that each of you brings to the table.

Best regards,

Matthew Howell

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear Cape Fear Civil War Round Table members and friends:

If a wave of a magic wand could transport us back to medieval Europe, you and I would find ourselves in the heyday of monarchical epithets. We would hear current news of William the Conqueror and Philip the Fair, Sviatopolk the Accursed and Manuel the Bibliophile, Louis the Debonaire (a drop of his blood lives on in my own children) and John The Lover of Elegance, Etheldred the Unready and a host of other rulers whose character and destiny have been encapsulated in monikers they will truly never live down. Customs and conventions change, but human nature remains largely the same. Like the rulers of yore, each of us can be summed up in a word or two. While those anchor words may vary based on who describes us, each of us possesses salient qualities through which we consistently relate and contribute to the world around us. Civic organizations like CFCWRT run on a robust mix of individual strengths and interests. One person writes, another takes on audiovisual responsibilities; one enjoys fundraising while another keeps the books; one presents on topics of shared interest, yet another invites and takes care of presenters, and so on.

Each contributor to this living kaleidoscope could be playfully described as The Fair, The Scholar, The Adventurous, The Loyal, The Savvy, and so on. We all do best when we draw from our strengths. "Men must polish their particular way", counseled the legendary samurai Miyamoto Musashi in The Book of Five Rings. As you celebrate your unique gifts, please know that you have an evergreen invitation to explore a variety of options for closer engagement with our Round Table. We model shared leadership, progressive responsibility and appreciation for multiple ways of thinking and doing things. We also believe in a light touch: you are welcome to try a specific task or job and see if it is the right fit for you on an occasional, temporary or long-term basis. If your preferences change, we will cheerfully accommodate them: CapeFearRT@gmail.com

Thank you for journeying with us, and please enjoy the most beautiful season of "joy, awake, aglow" that is already overtaking us: <https://allpoetry.com/the-lark-ascending>

HISTORIAN COVERS THE SAGA OF NORTH CAROLINIANS IN THE CONFEDERATE NAVY

The next meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, now celebrating its 30th year of operation, is Thursday evening, March 13, 2025, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m. Members and friends are welcome. Members of the round table, remember you are our best recruiters. Invite a friend. There is no admission charge.

Our speaker will be Sion Harrington III. Si is a retired U.S. Army lieutenant colonel with service from 1970 to 2009. He had service on active duty, and in the reserves and National Guard, including assignments in Grenada and Bosnia. He is a graduate of UNC Chapel Hill and holds a masters in history from N.C. State. He worked as a teacher, ROTC instructor and military collection archivist with the NC Division Historical Resources. He is also the vice president of the N.C. Military Historical Society, which operates a very interesting and educational museum on the grounds of the Blakeslee Air Force Recreation Area in Kure Beach, near the Fort Fisher State Historic Site.

A native of Erwin, NC, a small town in Harnett County about half way between Raleigh and Fayetteville, Si is a lifelong student of history and has dedicated years of concentrated study and effort to documenting the history of the military in North Carolina and the history of Erwin and Harnett County, including the Civil War battle of Averasboro fought just before the battle of Bentonville. He is the author of numerous articles and the book-length Roster of North Carolinians in Confederate Naval Service.

Si has noted that “Perhaps the best way to describe this roster is by explaining what it is not. As hard as I tried to make it so, I cannot claim it is a comprehensive list of all North Carolinians who served the Confederacy on, or near, the water. It is this author’s humble attempt to document a group of men all too often under appreciated and superficially treated by historians of the conflict. North Carolina men and boys serving in the land forces were well documented by the North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources’ on-going multi-volume series North Carolina Troops, 1861-1865: A Roster. The fact that North Carolina naval personnel had no such annotated roster was sufficient justification for me to develop such a roster. It is my hope that by preserving and publishing the names and such service information as could be found that the Tar Heels who served the Confederate naval service may receive the recognition they so richly deserve.”

During the Civil War, the agricultural South faced a daunting opponent in the industrialized North, and nowhere was that more apparent than on water. The Confederacy began the war without a single warship to its name.

It was clear that to win, the Confederacy had to industrialize, which it was able to do...to some degree. In the effort to industrialize, the South took advantage of and initiated revolutionary changes that were occurring in naval warfare. The Confederacy would combat-test mines (torpedoes), submarines, semi-submersibles (Davids), and rifled cannon (Brooke guns) during the war. But the modern weapon in which the C.S. Navy initially placed its greatest faith was the armored ship, and by war's end it had commissioned and put into action a veritable fleet of ironclads, 23 in all, with five in North Carolina waters, including the CSN Wilmington.

The Confederate ironclads were neither the first commissioned, the first in battle, nor the most advanced. The concept of iron-armored ships was well known by naval officials. French ironclad floating batteries had engaged Russian shore batteries during the Crimean War. And both Great Britain and France had commissioned powerful armored warships by the time the American Civil War broke out.

Confederate Secretary of the Navy Stephen Mallory, aware of the South's deficiencies in warship construction, attempted to obtain armored vessels in Europe. Despite efforts by various naval agents, only one—the Stonewall—reached Confederate hands, but the war ended before she saw any action. Hampered by chronic shortages of iron and a dearth of manufacturing facilities for steam power plants, Confederate ironclads were almost always underpowered and unfit for service on the high seas. They usually ended up being dedicated to harbor defense where they often played an important role.

The south's largest city in 1860 was the metropolitan entrepôt of New Orleans. With a population of about 168,000, it was the sixth largest city in the United States. Yet, New Orleans was an outlier, one of a kind. The second largest city in the states that would secede from the union was Charleston. With about 40,000 inhabitants, however, Charleston was only the 22nd largest city in the country. Richmond was 25th with about 38,000. So, of the 25 largest cities in the country, 22 were in the north. The 100th largest city in the country, Wilmington, was the largest city in North Carolina with almost 10,000 residents.

North Carolina had a total population of almost 1,000,000 people in 1860 but about 332,000 were enslaved African-Americans, many of whom escaped slavery during the Civil War and joined the U.S. Army or the U.S. Navy. Of all the states in 1860, North Carolina was 12th largest in population but it had a long coastline, the most extensive sounds anywhere in North America, and a strong maritime tradition. Some of the most intrepid and notable figures in Confederate naval history were from North Carolina. To hear more about their story, come join us as we listen to Si Harrington's presentation. His presentation will cover naval battles, strategy, commerce raiders, and ironclads as they relate to North Carolina and North Carolinians. Take advantage of the relaxed atmosphere of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table to ask questions and discuss his book with the author.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall in St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to talk to other members of the round table. Ask a friend to come along and find out more about the round table. There is no cost for admission.

CFCWRT February Meeting

By Daniel J. Callaghan and Roman Berger

On February 13, 2025, the members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table were treated to a tour de force presentation of the complicated and decisive Vicksburg Campaign by one of the premier Vicksburg experts in the country. Terrence J. Winschel is the retired chief historian of Vicksburg National Military Park and a highly respected author of several histories of the campaign and its constituent parts.

Following his retirement from the National Park Service, Terry became the historian of the U.S. Army Research and Development Center and authored an excellent 27-part overview of the Vicksburg Campaign focusing on The Engineers at Vicksburg , available online.

Terry's presentation, channeling the words of President Abraham Lincoln, was titled "Unvexed to the Sea" and he began with a powerful passage about the absolute importance of the Mississippi River to commerce, transportation and unifying the country. The great river was an artery for moving raw materials, finished products, staples such as cotton and wheat, and much more from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, to Memphis to New Orleans.

New Orleans was by far the biggest city in the south and one of the most important ports in the entire country. Moreover, control of the river was crucial to the Confederacy's ability to transfer men, supplies and communications to and from the western states of Louisiana, Arkansas and Texas. And, as our former program leader Jim Gannon, put it, "Terry told the story concisely and interestingly."

Vicksburg was a fortress city perched high on a bluff overlooking Milliken's Bend, a natural bottleneck to navigation. Some 250 river miles south of Vicksburg, the Confederates held a smaller but similar fortress at Port Hudson, Louisiana. Between the two, the Red River fed into the Mississippi from the west, providing a highway for men and supplies. Both Vicksburg and Port Hudson were on the eastern side of the Mississippi. As long as the Confederates held the two fortresses, the Union was unable to interdict the flow across the "Father of Waters."

Confederate Major Samuel H. Lockett, chief of engineers, designed eight miles of fortifications around Vicksburg and mounted 172 guns to defend the place both from the river and from the land approach to the east. U.S. Navy efforts alone failed to defeat the Confederates and two major Army movements in late 1862 similarly failed.

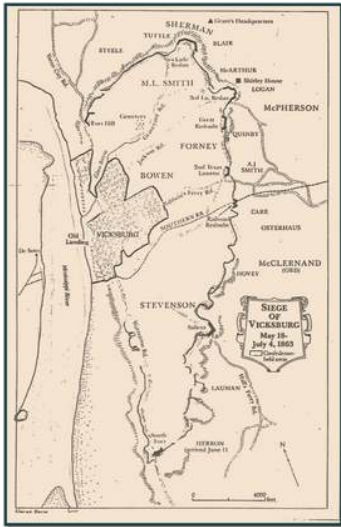

In early 1863, General U.S. Grant conceived a bold plan. He would move his Army south down the west bank of the Mississippi and cross over to the east side of the river and assault Vicksburg from the east. With the cooperation of the Navy's commander, Admiral David Dixon Porter, Grant presented the plan to his Army commanders. Every Army general who voiced an opinion opposed the plan. Undeterred, Grant moved ahead.

As the vanguard of the Union army marched south down the west side of the river, on the night of April 16, 1863, Admiral Porter steamed down river past the Vicksburg batteries. Although the ships were hit repeatedly, the big Confederate guns were emplaced too high on the bluff and couldn't depress their barrels low enough to hit the ships hugging the east bank.

With Navy transports south of the city, Grant would be able to move his army across to the east side. Bypassing the fortress at Grand Gulf, the vanguard of 17,000 men crossed the river at Bruinsburg on April 30. It was the largest amphibious operation in American military history until the Normandy invasion in 1944.

Once across the river, Grant moved east with lightening speed, winning a battle at Raymond on May 12 and, with part of his army, the capital of Jackson on May 14. Overall Confederate commander General Joseph Johnston indecisively remained east of Jackson and called on Vicksburg's commander General John C. Pemberton to leave his defenses at Vicksburg and attack Grant. Pemberton, however, had orders from Confederate President Jefferson Davis to hold Vicksburg. Jim Gannon again reports that "The campaign was decided at battle of Champion Hill on May 16. Confederate commander General John Pemberton only brought out three of his five divisions, and left two to defend Vicksburg. So he was well outnumbered at Champion Hill."

Driven back within their defenses at Vicksburg, Confederates were expected to be demoralized but two powerful Union assaults on May 19 and May 22 were thrown back with heavy losses. Grant then settled in to a classical siege. As troops dug "saps" perpendicular to the Confederate lines, others, including the "Lead Mine Men" of the 45th Illinois regiment, dug mines under the Confederate defenses. The Confederates knew the Union was mining and dug countermines to attempt to intercept the Union excavations. In the heat and humidity of the Mississippi summer, such work was taxing in the extreme but it went on relentlessly.

Meanwhile, the Union Navy maintained a heavy bombardment on the fortified city, driving civilians and soldiers alike underground. Some 2,500 to 3,000 civilians remained in the besieged city and there were about 100 civilian casualties. Terry related that for decades after the battle, children would discover the wartime caves and play in them. After several fatal cave-ins, the city undertook a public works project to fill in all the caves.

The Union exploded two mines with about a ton of explosives each in late June and early July but they failed to open the way for a decisive breakthrough. In the July 1 explosion, a black man named Abraham was blown 150 feet away landing within the Union lines unhurt. In fact, however, 13 mines were being dug and Grant decided to wait until all 13 were ready before the next attempt to break the Confederate defense.

In the meantime, hunger, illness and casualties had worn down the Confederate defenders to the point that their commanders believed the garrison was too weak to attempt to breakout through the Union cordon. There was only one alternative left: surrender.

On July 4, 1863, a day after the Confederate defeat at Gettysburg, Gen. John C. Pemberton surrendered 2,166 officers, 27,230 men, 172 cannon and about 60,000 rifles and muskets to General Grant. The prisoners were paroled, meaning they gave their word not to resume Confederate service until they were officially exchanged for Union prisoners held by the Confederates.

Once again, “the Father of Waters runs unvexed to the sea.”

Graciously, Terry Winschell answered many questions posed by the audience, including noted publisher Ted Savas whose company, Savas Beatie first published Terry’s history of the Vicksburg Campaign.

Continuing the Storm

Charles Carleton Coffin Drum-Beat of the Nation (New York, NY: Harper & Brothers, 1915)

To My Fellow Round Table Members,

Our exploration of Brandon Carter's Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather continues with Part 4, expanding beyond the Civil War to examine post-combat precipitation in other conflicts. While previous discussions have centered on battles along the Mississippi and in Virginia, this installment broadens the scope to include Perryville, Gettysburg, and even engagements from the Mexican War and Napoleonic campaigns. The persistent pattern of rain following battle, regardless of time period or location, raises intriguing questions: Is this phenomenon merely an environmental coincidence, or could the smoke, artillery fire, and atmospheric disturbances of combat have a tangible meteorological effect?

This section also highlights how inclement weather shaped military outcomes. From the torrential rains that delayed Lee's retreat after Gettysburg to the downpours that broke prolonged droughts in Kentucky and Mexico, precipitation has often played a decisive role in warfare. Notably, rain was not the only element to follow battle—snow and sleet also appeared in colder months, as seen after Stones River, Fort Donelson, and Franklin.

As we near the conclusion of Carter's study, I encourage you to consider both the scientific skepticism and the historical accounts that make this theory so compelling. For a broader discussion of weather's influence on war, I once again recommend Kenneth Noe's The Howling Storm: Weather, Climate, and the American Civil War.

Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather

Prang & Co. print of the painting, "Hancock at Gettysburg" by Thure de Thulstrup.

Part 4: Post-Combat Rain Beyond the Civil War

The Battle of Perryville, Kentucky, also led to rain. The battle, part of General Braxton Bragg's invasion of Kentucky, was to coincide with Lee's thrust into Maryland. Bragg, like Lee, was turned back. The battle, on the 8th of October, 1862, occurred during a drought. Powers informs us that the atmosphere was not conducive to a large downpour. Many men wrote about the difficult dry conditions, as both soldier and animal were deprived of water. Yet the battle was followed by a significant rain. Here, a severe drought was ended after a large Civil War battle (Powers 40).

Not surprisingly, one of the greatest rains followed one of the greatest battles of the war. The Battle of Gettysburg was the culmination of Lee's last large offensive into northern territory. The battle, fought from July 1st through 3rd in 1863, cost America over 50,000 casualties. Rain began on the night of the 3rd and did not let up until the 5th. It was severe, and the Potomac River flooded. Lee reached the Potomac on July 7 and quickly realized that a crossing at that time would not be feasible. He deployed his army in a defensive position and waited for a Union attack. The Confederates were not able to cross for nearly a week, as they finally returned to the Old Dominion on the night of the 13th. Lee's army was at a low point. Jackson was gone, and the Confederates had just suffered one of the worst defeats that any of them could have imagined. Lee was lucky to cross into Virginia with his army intact. This Union inactiveness, along with more of the same a few months later at Mine Run, led to the decision to place Ulysses Grant above General George Meade to coordinate all Union armies (Furgurson 4-5). The rains following Gettysburg nearly claimed Lee's army and contributed to the decision to elevate Grant to U.S. general-in-chief.

Due to space constraints, I will conclude the examples of the weather's effects on Civil War battles with Gettysburg. The main idea should by now be clear, and to avoid redundancy we will continue our study with other wars. By noting Appendix A, one can see that the pattern continues in the second half of the Civil War. There appears to be no difference between the two halves.

Post-combat rain was not a phenomenon linked only to the Civil War. Powers was able to document the weather after some of the major battles of the Mexican War, along with a few of Napoleon's great fights. February is part of the Mexican dry season. The Battle of Buena Vista, fought on the 22nd and 23rd of February in the year 1847, broke the dry spell. There had apparently been no rain for several months prior to the battle. According to Major General Henry Benham, an engineer present at the battle, "About one or two hours after the severe cannonading between 8 and 10 A.M. . . . we had a most violent rain-fall for some ten or fifteen minutes" (Powers 159). Rain also followed Monterey, Contreras, Churubusco, Molino Del Rey, and the final fight at Chapultepec (Powers 159).

North America was not the only location to witness the effects of rain after combat. Powers drew information from correspondence and histories written about Napoleon's campaigns in Europe. Rain followed battles at Dresden, Ligny, Eylau, and Sedan (Powers 73-75). This should come as no surprise, as the powder used was similar to that of the Civil War, if not exactly the same. The climate of Europe also closely resembles that of North America.

Though it occurred most often, rain was not the only form of precipitation that followed combat. Snow, sleet, and freezing rain occurred in the colder months. Sleet came on January 2, 1862, after the Battle of Stones River or Murfreesboro. It did, however, change to rain by the next day (Cozzens 181). The battle for Fort Donelson lasted from February 13 until February 15 of 1862. The night of the 13th saw rain, sleet, and snow, while the evening of the 15th witnessed snow (Cooling 147, 200). According to Union General James Milroy, a freezing rain followed the bloody fight at Franklin, also in Tennessee, on November 30, 1864 (Powers 157). Precipitation was to fall after combat, no matter the temperature.

The Blue, The Grey, and the Emerald: The Irish Diaspora in the American Civil War

March 17th marks the annual celebration of Saint Patrick's Day, the prime occasion when Irish history, culture, and diaspora are celebrated around the world. My family lineage traces back to Ireland on my mother's side; accordingly, I have sought to learn more about one of my ancestral homelands, exploring everything from politics to pop culture and, of course, history. In that spirit, I recently read When the Irish Invaded Canada by Christopher Klein. The book details the various raids conducted by the Fenian Army—a militia of Irishmen settled in America—against British military encampments in what was then Canada, a British colony.

Reading this book piqued my interest in a tangentially related topic.

Today, it is easy to argue that America has done more to celebrate Ireland than any other nation in the world. But it was not always this way. While Klein's book primarily focuses on post-war raids, it sheds light on how Irish Americans became involved in the American Civil War—half a century before Ireland erupted in its own rebellion and inter-island conflict. Much of this involvement can be traced back to the discrimination the Irish faced early on in America's "great experiment."

The Irish were an early example of how immigration shaped the American experience and how American culture and politics, in turn, shaped the diaspora. During the first half of the 19th century, millions of men, women, and children fled Éire. The primary catalyst was the treatment of the Irish people by the United Kingdom's government, which ranged from aloof at best to explicitly hostile at worst. This was particularly true during the Great Famine (1845–1852), when the failure of the potato crop, coupled with the policies of Prime Minister Lord Russell, led to mass starvation across Ireland. Hundreds of thousands of Ireland's native sons and daughters abandoned a land where Catholics were systematically excluded from many aspects of the economy and government. A considerable percentage of these refugees sought a fresh start in America—a land that, perhaps not coincidentally, had freed itself from British control decades earlier.

Opinion Cont.

However, the reality in America was sobering. The experience of Irish immigrants was arduous. Honest work was difficult to secure, in part due to a language barrier that affected many newly arrived Irish. Housing was often confined to decrepit tenements shared with multiple other expatriates, allowing diseases to spread rapidly. Compounding these struggles was the sheer discrimination the Irish faced at every level of life in their new home. They were accused of attempting to impose Catholicism on a largely Protestant and Anglo-descended America, as well as exploiting American resources rather than embracing the nation's ideals of liberty—an ironic charge, in this writer's opinion. The anti-Irish sentiment was so pervasive that an entire political party, the Know-Nothing American Party, was founded on suppressing Catholicism. In 1856, former President Millard Fillmore ran on its ticket, securing 21% of the popular vote.

The Irish had hoped that America would be their Tír na nÓg, the mythical land of eternal youth and prosperity. Many found instead a different kind of hell.

Meanwhile, the nation itself was violently fracturing. The fight over civil rights and the economic upheavals that accompanied it provided the impetus for the split. The irony cannot be overstated—especially since Irish Americans would lay down their lives as active participants in the Civil War. In fact, the first blood spilled in the conflict came from across the Atlantic: two Union soldiers born in Ireland, Daniel Hough and Edward Galloway, were killed by an accidental explosion of cartridges at the surrender ceremony of Fort Sumter. They were the first of at least half a million war dead over the next four years.

Incredibly, 200,000 Irishmen fought for the Union military, including 20% of all sailors. They made up half of the regular army when the war began, including a majority of the soldiers serving at Fort Sumter on April 12, 1861. The Confederacy was not lacking in Irish representation either; 20,000 Irishmen and their descendants fought under the Rebel banner. The Irish diaspora was as divided as any other facet of American life during this great conflict.

Given their pre-war experiences, this division makes sense. Military service at least guaranteed a job, food, some form of shelter, and a paycheck—no matter how brutal, meager, temporary, or risky. Given the discrimination and hardships the Irish faced in their daily lives, these were practical reasons to enlist in the armies of the new world.

Opinion Cont.

But there were also emotional motivations. Despite its many faults, America had taken in Irish emigrants when the United Kingdom had effectively driven them out. Shedding blood for their adopted homeland was a way to prove their mettle—to show that they were just as American as anyone born in the country over the previous 85 years. Dying for a nation carries a sobering weight; it is the supreme sacrifice for something greater than oneself. If one is willing to shed blood in defense of a country, should that country not recognize them as equals?

For some Irish, however, their dedication was not to their new homeland—regardless of which side of the battlefield they fought on—but to their old one, still under the British Parliament's thumb. According to Klein, some Irishmen viewed their participation in the war as a means of gaining military training for a future revolution to liberate Ireland from British rule. However, Fenian Brotherhood leader John O'Mahony argued that such an approach would be counterproductive if Irish soldiers perished in the conflict. This raises the question: how could the Irish both prove their mettle in battle and transfer valuable combat tactics back to the Emerald Isle? Their efforts were aided by Britain's formal neutrality in the conflict, much to the chagrin of American politicians.

The Irish fighters in the war were proud of their heritage and made little effort to hide it. Most notable was the 69th New York Infantry, which fought in every major battle in the Eastern Theater and suffered the third-highest casualty rate of any unit in the war. Thomas Francis Meagher, who had escaped imprisonment for an attempted revolution in 1848 and found refuge in America, rose to lead the Irish Brigade as a general. His ascent exemplified the ideals of American meritocracy—that even in a nation with a history of prejudice, anyone could rise to the occasion and prove their worth against the social odds.

Unfortunately, the brigade's heavy losses took their toll. By June 1864, the unit was formally disbanded due to the sheer number of casualties. However, Irish soldiers continued to fight in other brigades for the final year of the war. The influence of these fighters endured beyond the battlefield. As Klein noted, O'Mahony later led the Fenian Raids against British North America in the late 1860s. Though these raids ultimately failed, they—along with earlier Irish-American war efforts—foreshadowed the Irish Revolution and Civil War of the early 20th century.

Opinion Cont.

It is easy to conclude that, whether their dedication lay on one side of the Atlantic or the other, the contributions of Ireland's sons to the Civil War and the Irish independence movement were invaluable. The cliché persists that the Irish are a passionate, romantic, and sometimes fierce people—stereotypes without context. But considering how many Irish Americans laid down their lives for both their new homeland and their old one in the Civil War—a war fought in a land where they had lived for barely a decade—it is easy to see why the trope of the Fighting Irish endures.

So this March 17th, whether you are watching a parade, enjoying some corned beef, making a cup of Barry's tea, having a pint of Guinness, or listening to Thin Lizzy or U2, remember the Irishmen who laid their lives on the line for their nation and their people. Reflect on how these men, who faced adversity in both their old and new homes, still fought in the greatest conflict to ever occur on American soil—and in doing so, helped shape the nation we are today.

Bringing History to Life: The Story of George C. Beasley

By Matthew Howell

One of the most rewarding aspects of historical research is uncovering the lives of individuals who lived through extraordinary times, individuals whose stories may have faded from memory but whose experiences provide us with deeper insight into the past.

Recently, I had the opportunity to contribute my research on George C. Beasley to the North Carolina Civil War & Reconstruction History Center, where it was published as part of their ongoing effort to preserve and share the personal histories that shaped our state's Civil War experience. Beasley, a native of Cumberland County, was just 22 when he enlisted in Company F of the 1st North Carolina Infantry in 1861. His service began with the occupation of the U.S. Arsenal in Fayetteville, a pivotal site that would later play a significant role in supplying Confederate forces. Shortly afterward, he saw combat at the Battle of Big Bethel, one of the first major engagements of the war. When his original regiment disbanded, Beasley did not return home. He reenlisted with the 2nd North Carolina Light Artillery, also known as Starr's Light Battery. His story came to an abrupt and tragic end in 1864 when he was killed in action at the Battle of Fort Harrison at just 25 years old.

In many ways, Beasley's story is both unique and representative of the larger experience of North Carolinians during the war. More than 40,000 soldiers from the state lost their lives, their names often reduced to entries in regimental records and forgotten headstones in cemeteries across the South. Yet each of these men had a life before the war, a family, a community, people who mourned them and histories that deserve to be remembered. By revisiting these personal narratives, we move beyond statistics and battlefield movements and begin to understand the war through the lens of those who lived it. Understanding the past is not just about studying military strategy or political decisions, it is about recognizing the individuals who were shaped by, and in turn shaped, these pivotal events.

Click the link below to read more about George C. Beasley's story. While you're there, explore the hundreds of other stories preserved in the North Carolina Civil War & Reconstruction History Center's digital archive. It is an invaluable resource for exploring the lives of people that shaped our state's history.

Emerging Civil War

One of the most valuable types of Civil War history are the hundreds of “regimental histories” published in the last half of the 19th Century. Many contemporary authors have published updated regimental histories based on newly uncovered sources.

Former-member JoAnna McDonald, Ph.D., is an author and a contributor to the Emerging Civil War blog. She recently published two items about the Pennsylvania “Bucktail” regiments. JoAnna and Chris Mackowski, co-founder and editor in chief of the blog, have generously given us permission to republish these articles. We will share these two articles over the next two issues of our newsletter, beginning on the next page.

Do you have a favorite regiment? Perhaps one in which an ancestor served or one that you think played an outsized role in a pivotal battle? Write up an article and send it in to The Runner. Maybe just a regiment with a colorful nickname. What’s stopping you?

JoAnna M. McDonald, Ph.D., is a historian, writer, and public speaker specializing in military history and strategic studies. 13th Pennsylvania Reserves, “Bucktails”: Forever Proud

By JoAnna McDonald

Bucktails, 13th PA Reserves

Deer season has come and gone in most states, I think. I grew up in rural Pennsylvania. Here, the white tail deer roam through the meadows, forests . . . and backyards. Even though I no longer live in the north, when I see hunters don their gear, I think of the Pennsylvania soldiers who wore bucktails on their kepis and other head gear. There were three regiments that did so. Here's a look at the first “Bucktail” regiment, 13th Pennsylvania Reserves, and two of their toughest battles.

Marksmen Wanted

Colonel Kane

The call to arms went out to “marksmen” from several rural counties in April 1861. The woodsmen arrived at the recruiter’s office wearing buck tails on their hats. It was a great way to show their shooting expertise. The volunteers proudly wore their earned prizes on the front or side of their kepis. These were the first Bucktails.

Colonel Thomas L. Kane, a lawyer, organized and led the marksmen. The Bucktails saw action by the end of 1861. Colonel Kane was injured in the mouth at the battle of Dranesville, Virginia, on December 20, but stayed in the field. He was then wounded in the leg and captured at the battle of Harrisonburg, Virginia, June 6-7. 1862.

13th PA Reserves, State Colors

Major Roy Stone took over the regiment and led the men through the Peninsula Campaign, June 25 to July 1, 1862. The 13th Pennsylvania Reserves were part of the 1st Brigade of Brig. Gen. George McCall's division, Army of the Potomac. The Bucktail's first large scale battle took place at the battle of Mechanicsville on June 26, 1862. With their sister Pennsylvania regiments, the division had roughly 7,000 men.

The 13th Pennsylvania Reserves deployed in a defensive position near Meadow Bridge across Beaver Dam Creek and waited tensely. Around 3:30 pm, June 26, 1862, Maj. Gen. A. P. Hill's Confederate division smashed into the Union line. Hill counted 14,000 men in his division. The Louisiana and Georgia regiments led the attack.

One eyewitness recalled the fighting. “[S]o rapidly and so accurately did they [the Bucktails] ply their guns that the charging column halted, reeled back and sought shelter in the swamp.” The Confederates brought up more regiments. The Pennsylvanians poured the lead on and again repulsed the onslaught.

General Robert E. Lee got so frustrated that he ordered his divisions to concentrate their attack in another sector. The Pennsylvanians had a reprieve, but remained alert as the battle raged over on the Union left flank. The fighting lasted until nightfall, 9:00 p.m. Outnumbered and running out of ammunition, the entire line withdrew. The Bucktails took up the rear guard for McCall's division.

The 13th Pennsylvania Reserves paid a heavy price during the Peninsula Campaign. The regiment participated in the battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines Mill and White Oak Swamp (Frayser's Farm). Casualties amounted to 247 killed, wounded, or missing. Division commander Brig. Gen. McCall was wounded and captured near Frayser's Farm. Their new division commander wrote a report on the men's exemplary performance. “Men never behaved better; to their constancy and courage, after all, the good stand made against a greatly superior force is due, and Pennsylvania may forever be proud of the memories connected with deeds of her sons at Mechanicsville.”

COL. CHARLES F. TAYLOR

Colonel Taylor, 13th PA Reserves, KIA
Gettysburg, near Devils Den

The next summer the deeds of the 13th Pennsylvania Reserves were immortalized on the fields of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 1-3, 1863. The regiment and its division under Maj. Gen. Samuel Crawford waited anxiously behind Little Round Top on Thursday, July 2. Around 6:30 pm, the call to arms resounded through the ranks. “The moment was a critical one.”

Crawford seized the 13th’s flag and shouted, “Forward Reserves!” The division poured two volleys into the onrushing Georgians and South Carolinians, and, with a cheer, the line charged forward at a run. The exhausted Confederates reeled and withdrew. Some made a brief stand at a stonewall but most had had enough. The Pennsylvanians had helped save Little Round Top.

The fighting, however, wasn’t over. Texas, Alabama, and Arkansas boys remained tucked into the Devil’s Den area to the left of the Pennsylvania reserves. The Confederates laid down a nasty enfilading fire. Two companies were sent out to reconnoiter from the 13th Pennsylvania Reserves on the morning of Friday, July 3.

The vicinity of Devil’s Den was admirably suited to the tactics employed by the Bucktails, as cover both of rocks and trees abounded. Possessing Sharps rifles, they were able to reload, when necessary, without exposing any portions of their bodies, an advantage not possessed by their opponents. Utilizing this advantage to the utmost, they poured in a hot fire. The fire in return immediately became severe, and as they crept nearer, of an intensity that plainly showed that the enemy was far too strong numerically to be routed by the small force sent against them. The Bucktails, therefore, stayed behind cover, devoting themselves to picking off their antagonists whenever chances offered. At this game they entirely outclassed the Confederates.

So, with a rebel yell, the Rebs leapt from their cover and drove the Pennsylvanians back to the stonewall. The Confederates were finally dislodged from Devils Den later that evening on July 3. The battle was over. The 13th Pennsylvania Reserves counted their casualties. Out of 349 men, 2 officers and 9 suffered mortal wounds, and their colonel was among the dead. In addition, there were 8 officers and 27 men wounded, and 2 men captured or missing.

Survivors of the 13th PA Reserves

There would be no respite for the veteran Bucktails. For the next year, the regiment participated in all the major campaigns: Overland Campaign, battle of Wilderness, battle of Spotsylvania Court House, and skirmished at the battle of North Anna River. The regiment's last battle was Totopotomoy Creek (Bethesda Church), May 30–31, 1864.

Governor Curtin welcomed the Bucktails home at the capital in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

May you all find a happy welcome to your homes! May you ever be marked as brave men who served their country faithfully in times of great peril. May you never regret that you belonged to the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, fighting on every battle-field of the Republic.

Weaponizing Food: From Antietam to Vicksburg A Program by Dr. Judkin Brown & Dr. Timothy Silver

During the Civil War, “weaponizing food” referred to the strategic use of food as a tool of war. This involved tactics aimed at disrupting the enemy’s food supply, thereby weakening their forces and undermining their war effort. Many tactical options became reality. Like simply cutting off enemy supply lines; foraging and raiding farms and businesses; using scorched earth tactics by destroying crops and livestock; or, surrounding cities or fortifications to cut off access to food supplies. In essence, weaponizing led to hunger, malnutrition and suffering, leading to overall deteriorating battle morale and effectiveness, on both sides. This brief description leads us to an even more interesting discussion when popular returning guest speakers Dr. Judkin Browning and Dr. Timothy Silver delve into their topic entitled, “Weaponizing Food: From Antietam to Vicksburg” at the Tuesday, March 4th meeting at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach.

Registration begins at 6:15 PM, with the program starting at 7:00 PM. The visitor fee is $10, which can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues.

CIVIL WAR LADIES' FORUM

The Forum (sponsored by the Brunswick Civil War Round Table) looks forward to its upcoming annual meeting on Monday, March 10th by greeting guest speaker Mary Duffy, widow and Smithville tavern owner during the 1800's. Actually Mary is Liz Fuller, president of the Southport Historical Society, who will portray Mary in her Civil War period dress. The meeting will be held in Murrow Hall at Trinity United Methodist Church in Southport.

Mary Duffy has a wealth of stories and some little known secrets to tell about life during the War of Southern Independence, and eager to share the spirit, resolve, and determination these women of Smithville experienced.

Liz Fuller is a popular local historian who is a frequent speaker at local historical and civic organizations on a wide variety of topics relating to Southport's history. She will be joined by Carolee Morris who will be reading a selection from Mark Twain's Tom Sawyer, complementing Liz Fuller's presentation.

The program will take place from 6:00PM to 8:00PM. It is free to all women members of the Brunswick Civil War Round Table. There is a $5 fee for guests, which can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues to the Round Table, and can include a spouse. Letter from the Editor

Hello, Members and Friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table!

February brings another month of engaging discussions and shared learning at the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. As we continue exploring history together, it's also a time to recognize how far we've come.

You may notice a change in our newsletter's volume number. When we re-envisioned The Runner a few years ago, we started fresh with a new count. But history matters, and after thoughtful consideration, we've decided to honor our full legacy by restoring the original numbering. That means we aren't in Volume 3—we're in Volume 31, reaching back to our first issue in 1995.

This adjustment may be small, but it reflects something bigger—the strength and longevity of our organization. For over three decades, our members have come together to share in the study of history, and we look forward to carrying that tradition forward.

See you at the next meeting!

Warm regards,

Matthew Howell

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear members and friends,

Our winter 2025 concludes with another action-packed month ahead. Brunswick Town Fort Anderson State Historic Site and Cameron Art Museum will host special programs this February to mark the 160th anniversaries of the fall of Fort Anderson and the Battle of Forks Road (for details on those and more, please refer to p. 11 of the newsletter).

What do you think of when you reflect on the Wilmington Campaign? I can't help but think of courage, duty, suffering and jubilation, of families and communities drastically changed, of names and stories redeemed from oblivion by devoted historians—stories we keep alive with our own devotion to the appreciation of history. A new book may not have the sweeping impact of a music album release, but its impact is deep, permanent, real. A public history event may not command the crowds that a popular concert does, and yet it brings together diverse community members who are no less excited to be there.

If I could meet one historical figure, you would find me in the company of the French aviator and writer Antoine de Saint-Exupéry (1900–1944). As I imagine gazing into his eyes and uttering a breathless bonjour, I am savoring these timeless lines from Airman's Odyssey: “Love does not consist of gazing at each other, but in looking outward together in the same direction.” My fellow history lovers, that is what binds us: we look outward in the same direction as we continue to share meaningful experiences. I hope to see you at our tour of Fort Fisher on February 8, at our next meeting on February 13, and at other events of interest that you will find listed here in The Runner.

Gratefully yours,

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

Despite the cold weather, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table's January meeting had a strong turnout, with 41 members attending to learn about Confederate and U.S. Marines during the Civil War. The discussion covered Marine uniforms, major battles, and the loss of several ironclads, with thanks to Andrew Dupstadt for his informative presentation.

We welcomed three new members: Jeff Schoolcraft, originally from Gettysburg, who found us online and enjoys history, travel, and fishing. He has four adult daughters (ages 28 to 35) and works as a kitchen and bath remodeler. Clyde Parrish and Deborah Mosca joined after meeting Yelena at the Fort Fisher Anniversary Event on January 18. They relocated to Wilmington from San Diego in 2014 and are interested in local history and Civil War demonstrations. They have two adult sons, Josh (36) and Robbie (33). Clyde is retired, Deborah still works, and Robbie volunteers at Eden Village. Other interests they share include classic cars, food, and wine.

Let's be sure to make them feel welcome at February's meeting!

Money Matters

By Michael McDonald & Yelena Howell

We have decided to include a snapshot of our active membership numbers and finances once a quarter and annually. For the fourth quarter of 2024:

- Our revenue was $994.70, of which roughly 40% came from sponsors, 40% from Wreaths Across America, and 20% from membership dues and raffles.
- Our expenses were $1,085.41

*Please expect natural variation in income and expenses from quarter to quarter based on the number of renewals and our hosting costs that are lower during the summer months.

Thank you very much for joining us, renewing your memberships, and giving in numerous other ways that sustain our organization!

CAPE FEAR CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE FEATURES DISTINGUISHED VICKSBURG HISTORIAN

The next meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, now celebrating its 30th year of operation, is Thursday evening, February 13, 2025, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m. Members and friends are welcome.

The February program is titled "Triumph and Defeat: The Vicksburg Campaign" Our speaker is Terrence Winschel, the retired chief historian of the Vicksburg National Military Park.

Terry Winschel is a native of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and a graduate of The Pennsylvania State University. He also holds M.S.S. (Master of Social Science) and Ed.S. (Education Specialist) degrees from Mississippi College. Mr. Winschel retired in 2012 following a thirty-five-year-long career with the National Park Service, most of which time he served as Historian at Vicksburg National Military Park. He also served at Gettysburg National Military Park, Fredericksburg and Spotsylvania County Battlefields National Military Park, and Valley Forge National Historic Park. In 2016, Mr. Winschel returned to work in a part-time capacity with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers as Historian at the Engineer Research and Development Center and retired in 2023.

Terry has written 100 articles on the Civil War and is author of Triumph & Defeat: The Vicksburg Campaign, Vols. I and II, Vicksburg is the Key: The Struggle for the Mississippi River, The Civil War Diary of a Common Soldier, and Vicksburg: Fall of the Confederate Gibraltar.

Control of the Mississippi River was vital to the economic and military interests of both the North and South during the Civil War. President Abraham Lincoln considered it the "key to victory," and gathered in hand sizable land and naval forces to reclaim control of the lower Mississippi River Valley and thus split the South in two, achieve a major objective of the Anaconda Plan, and effectively seal the doom of Richmond.

From Cairo, Illinois, south to the Gulf of Mexico, Union and Confederate land and naval forces struggled for control of the Mississippi River. By late summer of 1862 only Vicksburg, Mississippi, and Port Hudson, Louisiana, posed major obstacles to U.S. domination of the river. With the capture of these two posts in July 1863, the North reestablished control of the river. A joyous President Lincoln exclaimed, "The Father of Waters again goes unvexed to the sea."

Mr. Winschel's presentation will detail the economic and military significance of the Mississippi River, cover the early military operations for control of the river, and focus on the climactic campaign which resulted in the fall of Vicksburg.

Was Antietam the bloodiest battle of the Civil War? Was Gettysburg the most pivotal battle of the Civil War? Was Spotsylvania the most bitterly fought? Most Civil War buffs tend to focus on the Eastern Theater and the titanic clashes of the Army of the Potomac versus the Army of Northern Virginia.

Nonetheless, the study of the Civil War in the Western Theater is more popular now than ever before, and the center of that interest is the months-long Vicksburg Campaign. Terry's book offers ten chapters of insights into what has been declared by many to have been the most decisive campaign of the Civil War.

The essays cover a wide range of topics, including military operations, naval engagements, leading personalities, and even a specific family caught up in the nightmarish 47-day siege that nearly cost them their lives. Come to the meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table to hear about this and more. This month's meeting will be held in the sanctuary of St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear.

The church parking lot is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to talk to other members of the round table. Ask a friend to come along and find out more about the round table.

See you there!

Marines in Civil War North Carolina

By Marcus L. Crassus

On January 9, the Civil War Round Table rang in the new year with a presentation by Andrew Duppstadt on Confederate and U.S. Marines in North Carolina during the Civil War. Andrew is the Education and Interpretation Supervisor for the North Carolina Division of State Historic Sites. He is a native of eastern North Carolina and holder of bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of North Carolina, Wilmington. This was the eighth time Andrew has spoken to the round table. It was 23 years since his first appearance in January of 2002 when he talked about the CSS Neuse.

He first set the stage with "Some Important Numbers." Some 321 U.S. Navy and Marine Corps officers resigned at the beginning of the Civil War and "went South" to serve in the Confederate navy or Marine Corps. That number of 321 was significant in light of the fact that there was a total of just 2,234 officers in the U.S. Navy and Marine Corps, of which almost 15 percent joined the Confederacy. Andrew also pointed out that at the time of the Civil War the mission of the Marines was basically to serve onboard ships or Navy installations to maintain order.

Historically, Marines had made small-scale landings to seize enemy ships or sometimes to assault enemy forts but, primarily, their role was confined to shipboard duties. In this regard, he noted that by the end of the war, the U.S. Navy had approximately 670 ships while the Confederate total was approximately 130.

He then presented several interesting slides showing Marine uniforms. It was of note to see that the historic U.S. Marine uniforms displayed many similarities to contemporary U.S. Marine Corps uniforms. For example, an artistic depiction of the 1864 officer's uniform featured the same dark blue pants and Navy blue jacket. Most Marine uniforms, including the 1864 officer's uniform employed the frock coat, however.

The depictions, including photographs of contemporary reenactors, were somewhat idealized with gleaming white crossed belts across the chest and, in many period photographs, the dress shako hat. In everyday use, the kepi replaced the shako and the belts were often stored away. White pants for summer were authorized. Andrew pointed out that Confederate uniforms were more often observed in the absence of uniform dress than in prescribed identical clothing. Some wore Navy uniforms, some wore captured U.S. clothing and, often, the men eschewed the prescribed gray clothing and, because of their nautical connections, sought out anything blue.

Marines played little role in North Carolina operations until the end of the war when Marines on both sides fought in the battles of Fort Fisher. An exception was the detachment of Confederate Marines under Captain Thomas S. Wilson who fought in the USS Underwriter expedition in February 1864. Confederate Marines also served on ships such as the CSS Raleigh and the CSS North Carolina based in the Cape Fear River, and, of course, U.S. Marines served onboard the many U.S. Navy ships involved in the blockade.

On May 6, 1864, the CSS Raleigh escorted blockade runners across the Cape Fear River bar and engaged the U.S. fleet. The heavy ship, however, ran aground and broke its keel on the return to the river. The CSS North Carolina, Andrew said, “was completely unseaworthy” due to damage from “worms” and sank near Southport.

Confederate Marines manned artillery at Fort Fisher and Battery Buchanan in December 1864 and January 1865 with their numbers augmented by a detachment from Savannah who came to Confederate Point after the fall of Savannah to Union General William T. Sherman’s forces. Some 400 U.S. Marine volunteers from the U.S. fleet went ashore on January 15 and took part in the joint Navy/Marine Corps assault down the beach toward the Northeast Bastion. Poorly planned and executed, the assault was a tragic failure except for the fact that it distracted the Confederate defenders from the U.S. Army assault on the river side of the fort. The Marines were led by Captain Lucien L. Dawson, a Texan who did not resign his commission at the beginning of the war and remained loyal to the U.S. Of the approximately 400 Marines engaged, 61 became casualties.

Andrew heartily recommended several book-length studies of Civil War Marines, especially recommended the four-part study of the U.S. Marine Corps in the Civil War by David M. Sullivan. Our speaker graciously stayed to answer many questions from the audience and visit with attendees at the end of the meeting.

We all look forward to Andrew’s next visit to our round table!

Continuing the Storm

By Matthew Howell

Charles Carleton Coffin Drum-Beat of the Nation (New York, NY: Harper & Brothers, 1915)

To My Fellow Round Table Members,

As we continue our exploration of Brandon Carter's compelling essay, Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather, Part 3 delves into the theories behind post-combat rain. Expanding on Edward Powers' meticulous observations, Carter examines striking patterns along the Mississippi River, where nearly every engagement—from New Madrid to Vicksburg—was followed by rainfall. Even in Virginia, during the exceptionally wet spring of 1862, rain appeared to coincide with key battles, from McDowell and Cross Keys to the grueling Peninsula Campaign. Powers even suggested that the intensity of artillery fire influenced the amount of rain that followed.

This section also highlights how storms shaped crucial moments, such as the aftermath of Second Manassas, where relentless downpours stalled Confederate pursuit, mired supply wagons, and forced desperate tactical decisions. Was this an environmental coincidence, or did the violence of war truly have atmospheric consequences?

Enjoy this unique perspective on Civil War history! As you ponder absorbing questions of correlation and causation, please note a comprehensive 2020 resource, Kenneth Noe's The Howling Storm: Weather, Climate, and the American Civil War, available at libraries and on Amazon at <https://www.tinyurl.com/ACWwx20>. Professor Noe characterized the belief that battle noise caused rain as a "myth."

Matthew Howell, Editor, CFCWRT

Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather

By Brandon Carter, Esq.; Serialized by Matthew Howell

A hand painted lithograph by New York printmaking company Currier & Ives depicting the Confederate and Union forces fighting during the Battle of Second Manassas in August of 1862.

Part 3: Theories on Post-Combat Rain

Powers found an extremely strong connection between combat and rain in action along the Mississippi River. He noted that nearly any fight of any size along its banks was followed by rain. Among these battles were New Madrid in Missouri, Forts Jackson and St. Philip near New Orleans, engagements near Vicksburg, and four separate occasions at Island No. 10 (Powers 23-30). Also fought in the Western Theater was the bloody battle of Shiloh. A Union soldier who remembered Shiloh, on the Tennessee River, wrote that “in this case, the theory was clearly demonstrated that great battles bring on copious rains, for it continued to rain for several days, although the general tendency of the weather had been clear and pleasant” (Miller 35). Confrontations in the Red River Campaign were also followed by precipitation.

The spring of 1862 was exceptionally wet in Virginia. That combat caused such a protracted rainy season extending over several months seems questionable, yet it did appear to influence it, triggering precipitation on specific days. This is visible in both Jackson’s Shenandoah Valley Campaign and McClellan’s fruitless adventure up the Virginia Peninsula. Captain N. J. Manning of the 23rd Ohio Volunteers noted rain after the battles at Cross Keys and McDowell. McDowell resulted in less than 900 combined casualties – not a large battle by any means. Manning also wrote that “the quantity of rain seemed to be in proportion to the amount of artillery firing” (Powers 187). Rain also followed Winchester and Port Republic. The Peninsula Campaign was dominated by poor weather. It started as early as the capture of Yorktown on May 2. The trend continued with the Battles of Williamsburg, Seven Pines, Savage’s Station, and of course, Malvern Hill. Roads were nearly impassable, and the armies made little, if any, daily progress.

The rain that fell at the conclusion of the Second Battle of Manassas had huge implications for both sides. It began on the night of August 30, 1862, just as the hostilities were winding down. The rain ended any Confederate hope for a final blow to U.S. General John Pope's Army of Virginia (Robertson, Stonewall Jackson: The Man, the Soldier, the Legend, 575). Lee ordered Jackson to undertake a roundabout pursuit of the defeated enemy. The steady downpour did not let up until 8 A.M. on the morning of September 1. Supply wagons were caught in the mud, and the men were desperate for food (Robertson, Stonewall Jackson: The Man, the Soldier, the Legend, 579). Not long after 4:00 P.M., Confederates from A. P. Hill's division attacked the Union IX Corps near Ox Hill. The rain began anew, again in torrents. Powder was soaked. Hill ordered Brigadier General Lawrence Branch to hold the Union men off with the bayonet. Branch soon responded that his rifles could not be fired, and Hill relayed this information to Jackson. Stonewall merely replied that the Yankee ammunition was wet, too (Robertson, General A. P. Hill: The Story of a Confederate Warrior, 128). Then confusion set in. Men could barely see in front of them.

Union General Philip Kearny became overly excited and rode forward in the blinding rain. He crossed into the lines of the 55th Virginia and was called on to surrender. Instead, he turned his mount and pressed back to his lines as quickly as the horse could run. It was too late; he was killed in the saddle. Kearny was the second Union general to die that day. Even more confusion occurred in the Union lines after the deaths of their generals. They pulled back after nightfall, but the rain kept the Confederates from noticing (Robertson, Stonewall Jackson: The Man, the Soldier, the Legend, 581). This was not the only disaster caused by the post-combat rain that day.

Thirty Years of Newsletters

By Bill Jayne

We are lucky to have a record of most of our monthly newsletters going back to April 1995. George Slaton, our first president, was also the newsletter editor until September 2001 when Bob Cooke took over. Somewhere around November 2002, the newsletter acquired a name—The Runner—which it retains unto this day.

September 2005 was the last edition of The Runner to be printed and mailed out in “hard copy” via the U.S. Postal Service (snail mail). In September 2011 Tim Winstead took over the editor’s responsibility until 2018. Sherry Hewitt became editor in February 2019 and then Fred Claridge in April 2023. Matthew Howell has been our editor since September of 2024.

Our webmaster, Richard Buggeln, has scanned all the hard copies of past newsletters and uploaded them to the CFCWRT Website. We now have the complete collection on the Website from 1995 through the present.

They are presented by year and there is also a concatenated version that a user can look at. It is 140 megabytes (very large) but that file is a PDF, which is searchable and downloadable.

The Anonymous Fort Fisher: Why Does The Battle Feel Overlooked Outside of Cape Fear?

On January 18, 2025, the Fort Fisher Visitors Center held an event to reintroduce locals and tourists to the newly rebuilt museum and adjoining battleground. Among the day's events was a talk by former CFCWRT President Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. on his book Fort Fisher Illustrated. The event coincided with the 160th anniversary of the Fort's capitulation to Union forces in the dying months of the Civil War. The Battle of Fort Fisher is one of the largest flashpoints in the region's history and a major focal point for many historians of the area, chief among them the aforementioned Dr. Fonvielle.

Yet I doubt the gravitas of this anniversary would be felt the same way if I spoke to, say, a history enthusiast on my native Long Island.

As a Northerner who took Advanced Placement History in high school and majored in History after four years in my state collegiate system, I can confirm that we learned nothing about Fort Fisher—neither the fort nor the battle. I imagine those who took official state history courses learned even less about the site and its history. This isn't too shocking; the New York U.S. History curriculum is inherently centered on the Empire State and its role in the national story. However, a cursory look reveals that the battle fades into the background on a nationwide scale. Some of the most prolific books on the conflict relegate discussions of the battle to a few pages. For example, Battle Cry of Freedom dedicates, at most, five pages to the conflict. While Shelby Foote's trilogy offers more detailed coverage, it's more suited for dedicated researchers looking for a full chronology of the war. To gain a complete picture, you would need to turn to scholarship focused specifically on the battle, such as Dr. Fonvielle's writings.

The January 1865 Second Battle of Fort Fisher seems to have fallen into relative obscurity outside of the Carolinas. Even as a history enthusiast, my knowledge of the battle was limited until I relocated here in 2023. Before then, the conflict simply didn't cross my mind. On one hand, this is understandable. Most scholarship contends that the Union victory was a fait accompli after the fall of Atlanta and Sherman's subsequent March to the Sea; this is often what casual readers take away. It's an understandable argument, but the fact that Wilmington—then the largest city in North Carolina—remained accessible to Confederate ships hinted that the Confederate government still had a faint lifeline. One could argue that it was Fort Fisher's fall and the closure of that lifeline that hastened the collapse of Jefferson Davis's government and cemented the timeline for the Confederacy's surrender.

Opinion Cont.

It's worth noting that Fort Fisher's fall was no easy capitulation. During the three-day battle, Union casualties totaled over 1,000 out of nearly 12,000 men, while Confederate casualties numbered almost 2,000 from a force of 8,300. The fight was bloody, and its consequences were dramatic. The South was completely cut off from global trade and critical supplies. Any faint hope of international recognition evaporated, and Wilmington—the Carolinas' largest city, geographically closer to Washington than Atlanta—fell to Northern forces a month later. This further symbolic blow paved the way to Appomattox.

So why does this battle feel dwarfed outside the region?

Personally, I think media plays a significant role. Gone with the Wind, one of the cornerstones of American literature and cinema, centers on the fall of Atlanta. Inevitably, that event has become a key moment in public consciousness for those envisioning the Confederacy's defeat. Additionally, thirty-three years after Fort Fisher's fall, the Massacre of 1898 supplanted the fort's capitulation as the most significant historical event in Cape Fear history. The repercussions of that event relegated Wilmington to near-obscurity for much of the 20th century, as other Carolinian cities surpassed it in prominence.

Further, as mentioned earlier, Fort Fisher's fall served more as a nail in the coffin for the Confederate war effort than a decisive turning point. Casual observers of history tend to focus on grand, defining moments in the national story, and the Civil War offers no shortage of these: Bull Run, Gettysburg, Sherman's March, Antietam, and Vicksburg, to name a few. Even if Fort Fisher had remained in Confederate hands, it's difficult to imagine a scenario where the Union did not secure victory within months.

Still, it's worth pondering: What might have happened if Fort Fisher hadn't fallen? Could the Confederacy have held out longer? Might they have secured enough supplies to launch a desperate offensive, boosting morale? Could Lincoln have survived the bullet of an enraged John Wilkes Booth, and how would he have approached Reconstruction under such circumstances? How many men—whose postwar contributions helped shape the nation—might have died in extended conflict or even within the battle itself? These are questions we'll never truly answer.

But speculation is deeply compelling.

The Butterfly Effect is an intriguing theory: one small change can lead to profound, cascading consequences. Fort Fisher might serve as a fascinating case study of the Butterfly Effect that never was. From the leadership strategies employed to the long-term impact of the fort's fall, there's much to analyze about how this moment shaped the Carolinas and broader American history over the next century and a half.

Studying history involves more than recounting events; it's about analyzing strategies, drawing lessons, and, sometimes, imagining the possibilities of what might have been. These unknowns can provide new perspectives on the national and regional stories that continue to shape the United States.

“Never Such a Campaign: The Battle of Second Manassas” A Presentation by Kevin Pawlak

The upcoming Brunswick Civil War Round Table meeting will take place on Tuesday, February 4, 2025, featuring guest historian Kevin Pawlak. He will present "Never Such A Campaign: The Battle of Second Manassas," discussing the brutal and decisive Confederate victory that allowed Gen. Robert E. Lee's army to cross into the North. The presentation will explore the battle's scale, tactics, and impact, including Stonewall Jackson's surprise attack and the Union's retreat. Pawlak, a respected battlefield guide and historian, has extensive experience in Civil War research and preservation.

Registration begins at 6:15 PM, with the program starting at 7:00 PM. The visitor fee is $10, which can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues.

Letter from the Editor

Happy New Year, Members and Friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table!

I hope this message finds you well-rested and rejuvenated after a joyful holiday season spent with family and friends. As we step into the new year, let us carry forward the warmth and goodwill of the holidays, turning them into positive energy for the weeks and months ahead.

With 2025 upon us, we look forward to a prosperous and productive year for our Round Table. We are excited to share all that we have planned and invite you to participate in all of our upcoming programs, and special events.

This January also marks a particularly meaningful milestone in our community's story—160 years since the fall of Fort Fisher. The capture of this once-imposing Confederate stronghold was a pivotal moment as the war approached its end.

The year 1865 brought with it dramatic transformations, culminating in April with Lee's surrender and the assassination of President Lincoln. Reflecting on this anniversary gives us not only an opportunity to remember the immense sacrifices made by those involved but also to understand how these events shaped the cultural and historical landscape we live in today.

As we commemorate this historic anniversary, let us renew our commitment to learning, sharing, and honoring our past. May 2025 bring growth, understanding, and increased fellowship to our Round Table, so that we may continue to serve as thoughtful stewards of history for both our community and future generations.

Warm regards,

Matthew Howell

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear members and friends,

Marvelous “visions of sugarplums” are fading away like a dream, winter deepens, and the stark reality of festive excesses and New Year’s resolutions comes into focus. The beginning of the year can be sluggish. Not so for us: in the Lower Cape Fear, January and February will be anything but slow. The “high holy days” of regionally and nationally significant Civil War events are upon us. The year 2025 heralds the 160th anniversary of the Wilmington Campaign, with the momentous fall of Fort Fisher in January of 1865 precipitating a domino effect that brought down the embattled Confederacy. Several grand commemorative programs will take place at area historic sites.

Please refer to the contents section for additional information and join us in representing our organization (email CapeFearRT@gmail.com with your availability at Ft. Fisher on January 18th of half an hour or more if you would like to come staff our booth with us).

I am excited and hope you are, too! Relentless professional, family and civic demands notwithstanding, ongoing appreciation and preservation of local history also matter a great deal. There are remarkable speakers, reenactments and tours in the pipeline. Why don't we all partake and take part as able? Far beyond a way to wile away a Saturday afternoon among like-minded others, actively focusing on American history is a duty of citizenship and a solemn privilege. As you plan to make the most of upcoming programs, please take a lot of pictures and notes that we will gladly feature in the next Runner.

Nothing noteworthy happens without intent and passion. Indeed, “he’s a fool who plays it cool”—not he who errs on the side of engagement. Don’t cool your jets, don’t cool your hearts and minds, and don’t cool your schedules. The only cool and cold we need this winter belong in the weather forecast. In every other regard, January 2025 is red hot! I will see you in the field and at our upcoming meeting.

Best,

Tune in live to our next meeting at <https://www.youtube.com/@CapeFearCivilWarRoundTable>
and view our archives anytime at <https://cfcwrt.org/>

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

I hope this joyous holiday season finds you and your families well. Thirty-two members attended our audience-focused December 2024 meeting. We enjoyed sharing the festivities with every one of you and thought fondly of those of you who were with us in spirit.

As Membership Chair, my goal is to streamline the meeting check-in process. I now offer an alphabetical sign-in sheet where members can simply initial by their names. A second sheet is for new folks and guests. Current members can also use this sheet to update their contact information. I continue to welcome any feedback on process optimization.

Name Tags

Name tags are an amenity that facilitates communication among all attendees. Please be sure to return your badge at the end of each meeting or plan to bring it the next time you join us in person. If you need a new tag, just let me know.

Membership Renewals

Your renewal month is printed on your name tag. Please feel free to check with me in person or by email at CapeFearRT@gmail.com if you have a question about your renewal month. There are several easy ways to “reenlist”:

- See membership options and renew online: <https://cfcwrt.org/>
- Mail a check to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft Dr NE, Leland, NC 28451
- See Mike McDonald at the next meeting with a check or cash.
- See Yelena Howell for Venmo.

Spread the Word

Remember, we are all ambassadors for the Round Table. Please invite your family, friends, co-workers, and neighbors to join us. We will ensure every guest feels welcome.

Sincerely yours,

Kim Berger

CFCWRT December Meeting

By John Gough

WAR GAME PUTS ARMCHAIR GENERALS IN THE SADDLE

On 12 December round table member John Weisz presented a war game of sorts to an enthusiastic holiday audience. Prior to the meeting members enjoyed eggnog (spiked or not), mulled wine, wine, snacks and three fantastic cakes from W.C. Pag, a.k.a, William Jordan, sutler and cook extraordinaire. In addition, former president Chris Fonvielle, Ph.D., was on hand with copies of his newest book presenting 19th-century artwork on the subject of Ft. Fisher. The subject of the meeting was “Generalship: Theory and Substance.” John noted that great generalship may be analyzed by looking at eight salient characteristics.

Characteristics of Great Generals:

- Risk – analyzing acting on incomplete information
- Tenacity – ‘tending to hold fast’
- Flexibility – ability to change plans when opportunities or crisis arise
- Innovation – being bold and imaginative when the odds are bad
- Mastering Information – know what is needed & what supports the plan
- Empowerment – mentoring & encouraging independent thought
- Moral Courage – making the right decision, sticking with it & accepting & ‘owning’ the consequences
- Vision – imagining how future technology, tactics/strategy or human factors can give advantage to military success

Besides defining what generalship was and the characteristics behind it, John led the audience in a participatory exercise intended to illuminate the elements of Civil War generalship.

Audience members first formed several teams of from two to four members. West Pointer Weisz provided participants with information and maps and options to decide which way to defeat the enemy. Using a contemporary military term, the acronym METT-T, summarized the information provided to each team: Mission, Enemy, Terrain, Troop availability and Time.

William Jordan's Delicious Cakes

Three scenarios were played and the various solutions were rationalized. Teams came up with various rationales and options and Retired Lt. Colonel Weisz was impressed with many well-thought-out solutions arrived at by the participants.

Fictitious names—"Big Tom Junction," "Princeton" and "Knox"—tagged the three scenarios but they were all based on actual Civil War engagements. The scenarios corresponded to actual battles in the Atlanta Campaign of 1864, pitting Major General William Tecumseh Sherman of the U.S. Army against General Joseph E. Johnston of the Confederate Army.

Sherman, of course, succeeded in driving Johnston back into entrenchments around Atlanta. Major battles occurred around Dalton, Resaca and Kennesaw Mountain north of Atlanta and Sherman also maneuvered his adversary out of strong defensive positions in several cases. Eventually, the Confederates abandoned Atlanta on September 1. According to Weisz, the campaign demonstrated Sherman's tactical and operational expertise.

British military writer, Captain Basil Lidell Hart published a biography of the victor of the Atlanta Campaign in the 1920s. It was called Sherman: Soldier, Realist, American. Lidell Hart considered Sherman the most outstanding general of the Civil War. He explained that the campaign tied down resources needed in other theaters, had a positive psychological and political effect by lowering enemy's national morale and contributing to the election of Abraham Lincoln in the United States, and sustained high morale in his own army by constantly moving forward and avoiding frontal assaults for the most part.

Tactical & Operational Expertise

- Respect entrenchments !!!
- Mentor subordinates [let them learn from mistakes]
- Put the enemy on defense to secure his tenuous Line of Communication (LOC)
- Well planned and executed operations will allow distance from OUR LOC for reasonable periods of time
- Threaten many points of the enemy's position(s)
- Bad weather and terrain can be used to advantage (against enemy)
- Keep the enemy commander "on the horns of Dilemma" [Captain Basil Lidell Hart, Strategy]

Sherman remained in the Army after the war and was promoted to General, commanding the entire U.S. Army from 1869 to 1884. As commanding general, Sherman's vision was for a large professional army. Congress's was for a small frontier force supplemented by militia. Congress won. He had more successful influence over West Point where, while he was a jealous guardian of tradition, he oversaw the transformation of the academy from a de facto school for engineers to a school truly for soldiers. He was also not a traditionalist when it came to uniforms and weaponry, where he was always on the side of practicality and firepower.

Was he the greatest general of the Civil War? Second? Third? Such rankings are largely specious in the opinion of this writer but there's no doubt that our enjoyable audience participation program gave those in attendance a deeper understanding of the elements of good generalship as well as the challenges facing those who exercised such responsibility in the Civil War.

CFCWRT January Meeting

By Bill Jayne

Yes, the Marines Were Here in the Civil War

The next meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, now celebrating its 30th year of operation, is Thursday evening, January 9, 2025, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m. Members and friends are welcome. The best means of publicizing our round table is by word of mouth.

The January program is titled "US and Confederate Marines in North Carolina During the Civil War." Our speaker is Andrew Duppstadt, a crowd-pleasing favorite of our round table. This will be the eighth time Andrew has addressed our group going back more than 20 years.

His talk will take a brief look at the history of both the U.S. and Confederate Marine Corps in the Civil War and their involvement in actions in North Carolina. The Marine Corps tends to get overlooked in the broader scope of Civil War history, particularly the Confederate Marines, but both services were present in the Old North State, especially in the last year of the conflict, and both played crucial roles in the Second Battle of Fort Fisher in January 1865.

A veteran of the public history field with over 20 years experience, Andrew Duppstadt is currently the Education & Interpretation Supervisor for the North Carolina Division of State Historic Sites. He earned a BA in History and an MA in Public History from the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. Previously, he had worked at Fort Fisher State Historic Site, Tryon Palace Historic Sites and Gardens, and the CSS Neuse State Historic Site. Andrew also serves as an Adjunct Instructor of History at UNC-Pembroke and Coastal Carolina Community College, teaching classes in American History and North Carolina History. Originally from Jacksonville, NC, Andrew currently resides in Kinston and is based at the NC Historic Sites East Region Office.

Interestingly, both the U.S. and Confederate Marine officers at the center of the second battle of Ft. Fisher, fought 160 years ago on January 15, 1865, had ties to distinguished families with somewhat conflicting loyalties. The U.S. Marine detachment that took part in the assault on the fort was led by Captain (later Major) Lucien Leconte Dawson who was born in Natchez, Mississippi in 1836.

He was a son of a Maryland born former U.S. Army officer named James L. Dawson and the former Miss Sophia Elizabeth Baylor, a member of the historically prominent Baylor family of 19th century Kentucky, Alabama, and Texas.

A month old when the Alamo fell in Texas, Lucien accompanied his family from Mississippi to Arkansas during 1836-1842 and thence to the Indian Territory (Oklahoma) during 1842-44, where his father had found employment as a (Creek) Indian Agent.

Eventually, his mother and father divorced and with his mother and siblings, Lucien joined the Baylor family in the then independent Republic of Texas. In 1859, he was appointed from the state of Texas as a 2nd Lt USMC. Throughout his Marine Corps career, L.L. Dawson was carried on the rolls as a citizen of Texas.

Despite his ties to prominent Confederates in the Baylor family, Dawson remained loyal to the United States and served under the Stars and Stripes throughout the Civil War. In fact, at one point Confederate officials listed him as a Confederate officer because of his prominent family connections, but he never served in the Confederate military and never resigned his U.S. commission.

His Confederate counterpart at Ft. Fisher was Captain Alfred C. van Benthuyssen, a member of a family that traced their origin to 17th Century Dutch settlers in New York who became very prominent in the history of the Empire State, particularly in Albany and the Hudson Valley. Remember, what we know today as New York was the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam until 1664 when the British took over the colony and named it New York.

Members of the van Benthuyssen family emigrated to the south and Captain van Benthuyssen was born in Natchez, Mississippi in 1836. He was connected to the family of Eliza van Benthuyssen who became the wife of Joseph E. Davis, the older brother of Confederate President Jefferson Davis.

Make plans to come and hear the story of the Marines in North Carolina and take advantage of the chance to get to better know one of the more prominent public historians of eastern North Carolina.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall in St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, and talk to other members of the round table. Ask a friend to come along and find out more about the round table. For information about membership, go to our website at <http://cfcwrt.org> and click on "Join".

See you there!

Continuing the Storm

To My Fellow Round Table Members,

In last month's newsletter, we began Brandon Carter's thought-provoking essay, Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather. In Part 1, we explored the aftermath of Malvern Hill, where torrential rain followed the brutal fighting, washing away the blood of the fallen but adding misery to the Union retreat. Drawing on Edward Powers' 19th-century work, War and the Weather, Carter introduced the intriguing idea that the violence of battle might influence weather patterns—a phenomenon that captured the attention of Civil War soldiers and historians alike.

In this month's installment, Part 2, Carter delves deeper, documenting patterns of post-combat precipitation across the Civil War. From Manassas to the siege of Lexington and even naval clashes like the Monitor and Merrimac, his research highlights the frequency and impact of rain following significant engagements. Drawing on letters, diaries, and Powers' meticulous observations, this section examines how weather influenced campaigns, disrupted troop movements, and shaped the experience of war.

Enjoy this unique perspective on Civil War history! As you ponder absorbing questions of correlation and causation, please note a comprehensive 2020 resource, Kenneth Noe's The Howling Storm: Weather, Climate, and the American Civil War, available at libraries and on Amazon at <https://www.tinyurl.com/ACWwx20>

By Brandon Carter, Esq.; Serialized by Matthew Howell

"Charge of Duryee's Zouaves (Fifth Regiment New York Volunteers) at The Battle of Great Bethel" Harpers Weekly June 29, 1861, page 409.

Part 2: Battles and Patterns of Post-Combat Rain

Precipitation followed battles in all theaters of the war and at all times of the year. The Appendix documents each Civil War battle that was followed by precipitation (within two days after the end of the fighting), as well as those which were not. One can quickly note that the pattern of combat preceding rain began with the first land battle of the war in June of 1861, and the last occurrence took place less than two weeks before the end of hostilities. I have gathered the data from various studies done on specific battles, works containing the weather logs of ships, diaries, journals, memoirs, and especially from Powers' book. He gathered data mainly through letters sent to him by the people who experienced the battles and their effects on weather firsthand. In a few cases, battles were fought during rainstorms. I have identified these in the chart. For the most part, however, rain followed very agreeable weather during combat.

Wet weather impaired the reliability of black powder, and movement of large armies over dirt roads or ground turned to mud created quagmires with which horse-drawn artillery and wagons could scarcely deal. Thus, Civil War commanders preferred to wait for dry conditions for maneuver and fighting.

Though it has already been noted that rain followed the war's first battle, the minor fight at Big Bethel, Virginia, on June 10, 1861, the first major battle of the war appears to have had an even greater effect on the weather. The first battle of Manassas or Bull Run was fought in Northern Virginia on July 21, 1861. The day dawned hot and clear, and a pitiless sun would both illuminate and exacerbate man's inhumanity to man until firing ceased late in the afternoon.

The battle, which resulted in a Confederate victory, cost America nearly 5,000 casualties. Afterward the Union army resorted to what came to be known as the “Great Skedaddle,” as Federal soldiers almost literally ran the twenty-five miles back to Washington. Both Stonewall Jackson and President Jefferson Davis saw the importance of this and hoped for a pursuit of the demoralized enemy. The Confederates were exhausted and disorganized from the day’s fighting, however, and few troops followed the Union army that night. The next morning, Confederate officers awoke to heavy rain which would continue throughout the day. Any hope of pressing the defeated enemy was ended (Davis 244-45). After the war, some Confederates felt that this was one of the best opportunities the South had had to crush the Union army and win independence (Alexander 110). With the close of July 22, post-combat rain had made its first real effect on the course of the war.

The siege of Lexington, Missouri, which took place in September of that same year, is unique in that some Union officers apparently told their men that the continued artillery fire would bring them rain. The troops badly needed water, and their officers needed all the arguments they could muster to encourage the men to hold out as long as possible. It did in fact rain on the 17th. The men had no buckets with which to catch the water, so they wrung it out of their blankets. Powers got most of this information from General John McNulta, who was present at the fighting (Powers 154). This makes it clear that at least some Civil War soldiers saw a relationship between heavy cannonading and precipitation.

Even the world’s first ironclad warship to see combat appears to have had an effect on the weather. On March 8, 1862, the CSS Virginia (built out of the hull of the former USS Merrimac) ran wild through Hampton Roads, Virginia. Four U.S. vessels were sunk or run aground (Sears, To the Gates of Richmond, 15). The next day, during the famous fight between the Virginia and the USS Monitor, a rain set in. Powers received a good deal of this information from one Fred M. Patrick, a member of the 10th New York Volunteers. Mr. Patrick noted in his correspondence with Powers that he had believed that cannonading caused rain since 1861. He had even formed his own theory to explain the matter. He wrote, “It struck me as a curious fact that the amount of rain which fell after each battle, seemed to be very nearly in proportion to the amount of powder that was burnt” (Powers 188). This would not be the only time that a naval fight was followed by rainfall.

Civil War Hospitals: Challenges and Triumphs - A Presentation by Col. Wade Sokolosky (Ret.)

Throughout the Civil War, hospitals played a vital role in saving lives and treating both physical and emotional traumas. Yet, they faced immense challenges, from unsanitary conditions and overcrowding to scarce supplies and limited medical knowledge. To explore this often-overlooked aspect of Civil War history, the Brunswick Civil War Round Table welcomes returning guest speaker Col. Wade Sokolosky (Ret.) for an enlightening presentation at their upcoming meeting.

The event will take place on Tuesday, January 7th, at Hatch Auditorium, Caswell Beach. Registration begins at 6:15 PM, with the program starting at 7:00 PM. Visitors are welcome for a $10 fee, which can be applied toward a $25 annual membership, including a spouse.

Col. Sokolosky, a leading expert on North Carolina's Confederate hospitals and the 1865 Carolinas Campaign, will delve into the critical role hospitals played during the war. Drawing from firsthand accounts, he will detail the challenges and innovations that shaped medical care, including the expansion of hospital networks along North Carolina's railroads as Confederate resources dwindled.

A 25-year U.S. Army veteran and author of North Carolina's Confederate Hospitals, Vol. 1, 1861–1863, Sokolosky offers a unique perspective on how hospitals adapted to meet the increasing demands of wartime. His talk will shed light on both the successes and limitations of Civil War medical practices.

The Timely Arrival of Gun Crew at Fort Fisher

By Yelena Howell

James C. Horton, affectionately known as Jim, is an acclaimed professional artist based in the Lower Cape Fear and an active, steadfast member of our organization. Jim's historical portfolio includes Civil War landmarks and scenes north and south of the Mason-Dixon line. Blockade Runner, Guns of Fort Fisher, Cushing and the Monticello, and Beery's Shipyard illustrate instantly recognizable local themes.

The collection is now joined by A Gun Crew at Fort Fisher, a 16" x 20" oil painting. The crew, commanded by Colonel William Lamb, loads a shell into a 32-pounder cannon to protect a blockade runner from U.S. gunboats. Congratulations to Jim on finishing this piece just in time for the 160th anniversary of the massive action at Fort Fisher that irreparably compromised the aorta of the Confederacy's failing heart (a former cardiac ICU nurse's choice of metaphor does not begin to approach the magnitude of bloodshed at the fall of the Fort, a chapter in our history that merits somber remembrance).

We will continue to feature announcements of Jim Horton's future public exhibits and new pieces. To peruse his work, connect with the artist, and purchase originals and prints, please visit <https://www.hortonart.net/>

Read Your Way to January 18, 2025

By Yelena Howell

The body of nonfiction and fiction dedicated to the fall of Fort Fisher and the Wilmington Campaign is robust and growing. With the 160th anniversary of the decisive Second Battle of Fort Fisher now imminent, I would recommend to a serious student of history a two-step refresher over the next two weeks.

1. Fort Fisher Illustrated: Art of the Battle (Fonvielle & Browning, 2024).

This new book brings together the vast majority of extant XIX-century art featuring the Fort with expert commentary on the origin, veracity and significance of each piece. Visual learners and those desiring a succinct narrative summary will benefit tremendously from spending time here. Copies are available at Fort Fisher Visitor Center and directly from the authors:

2. Your choice of a scholarly non plus ultra, an abridged and more accessible account, or a journalistic masterpiece:

- If you can devote the next two weeks to a comprehensive review: The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope (Fonvielle, 2001).
- If you are shorter on time and would prefer a compressed take: Rebel Gibraltar: Fort Fisher and Wilmington, C.S.A. (Walker, 2005).
- If you appreciate the engrossing style of excellent journalism: Confederate Goliath: The Battle of Fort Fisher (Gragg, 1991).

While this is but my personal, focused pick from a broad bibliography, focus, availability and accessibility of book selections are senior to breadth as we review the basics to make the most of the upcoming commemorative program at Fort Fisher State Historic Site. Have you read these books and what other works would you recommend? Please let us know via this engaging reader's poll:

I believe in our collective and individual ability to strengthen our Round Table in a variety of ways. There are multiple opportunities to contribute our time and treasure throughout each program year—it all adds up! Thank you for every single bit of it! How do you know if giving in a specific way is right for you? You just know. It should feel right, and it should feel fun.

Our organization has another Sterling sponsor: yours truly! I sent Mike McDonald a check for an additional $20 to upgrade my current membership. When my renewal date comes up in August, I plan to re-enlist as a Gold member and, by then, a certified Family Nurse Practitioner.

In January and February, as a final-semester student, I am available to see you in primary and urgent care in Wilmington under the supervision of an award-winning internal medicine physician. Exclusive to our members, this winter I will be offering complementary follow-up over the phone, by email or in your home to see how you are and to make sure all your questions and concerns are addressed. Disclaimer: there is no program or clinic requirement or incentive for me to bring in patients or to provide additional care. House calls can supplement, but do not replace your regular home health services.

Letter from the Editor

Dear Members of the CFCWRT,

As the calendar turns to December, we enter a season of reflection and celebration. It's a time to look back on the year's accomplishments, the enriching discussions we've shared, and the growing appreciation for the history we all hold dear.

As we prepare to bid farewell to 2024, we also look ahead to a momentous occasion in 2025: the 160th anniversary of the battles at Fort Fisher and the closing days of the Civil War. These pivotal events in our nation's history offer a powerful lens through which we can examine themes of courage, sacrifice, and transformation. Fort Fisher, the "Gibraltar of the South," played a decisive role in shaping the course of the war, and its fall marked the beginning of the Confederacy's end.

Our Round Table will undoubtedly have much to explore in the coming months as we commemorate this anniversary and reflect on the broader lessons of the Civil War. It is our shared mission to keep this history alive, ensuring it continues to inform and inspire.

As we enjoy the festivities of the holiday season, let us also take pride in our dedication to studying and preserving the past. Together, we can finish this year strong and look forward to an even more engaging 2025.

Wishing you all a merry Christmas, happy holidays, and a healthy, prosperous New Year!

With warm regards,

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear members and friends,

“You got a fast car” because somehow, the year 2024 is already in the rearview mirror. These months have been quite eventful for our organization and the local community, not to mention the broader arenas of which we are a part. I hope that your involvement with the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has provided you with a measure of intellectual and social stimulation, a sense of belonging and continuity, and the anticipation of more talks, books, and trips to come. From this perspective, “it was a very good year”, and I am grateful to be completing it in your company.

Perhaps facetiously, my Sinatra-worshipping father used to warn me, a reader of dictionaries and a daydreamer, that I was sure to be a student until the ripe old age of 40. I have surpassed Viktor's forecast by five years and counting and am inspired by the steadfast commitment of my betters to lifelong learning. One of the mythical father archetypes of Western civilization, Ulysses, proclaims to us through Lord Tennyson:

I am a part of all that I have met;
Yet all experience is an arch where thro'
Gleams that untravell'd world whose margin fades
For ever and forever when I move.

When times are uncertain and time is inescapable, ruthlessly short and agonizingly long by turns, why not allow the promises of the “untravell'd world” of pages you will yet read and write, words you will yet hear and say, music you will yet revisit and discover and a myriad other glimmers of hope to continue carrying you forward along with the precious cargo of memories of where you have been? After thirty years' worth of great get-togethers, we are on our way to the next twelve meetings. Our Roundtable is our Roundtable. Thank you, fellow travelers, for your ongoing interest and support, and please enjoy the holiday season with your loved ones.

Warmest regards,

Tune in live to our next meeting at <https://www.youtube.com/@CapeFearCivilWarRoundTable>
and view our archives anytime at <https://cfcwrt.org/>

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table's November 2024 meeting was well-attended, even with the chilly and rainy weather. A total of 46 participants joined us, including several guests and family members.

Linda Lashley was accompanied by her son, John, while James Steele brought his son, Daniel. John Pilli introduced his friend, Dale Hafer, to the group. Kevin Poggi also attended as a visitor and expressed interest in becoming a member soon. We hope all our guests enjoyed John Quarstein's presentation on The Battle of Mobile Bay and look forward to seeing them again at our December meeting.

As Membership Chair, I've been working to streamline the check-in process. To make things easier, I've created an alphabetical sign-in sheet where members can simply initial by their names. A second sheet will always be available for new members, guests, and any missing names. Current members can also use this sheet to update their contact information. Despite these efforts, there are still three members who were not officially accounted for at the November meeting. If you think you may be one of them, please let me know. I also welcome any feedback on the new procedure!

Name Tags

Name tags remain a work in progress. A few were missing at the November meeting, but replacements will be ready for December. Ideally, name tags should be handed in at the end of each meeting to ensure their availability for the next one. If you prefer to take yours home, that's fine—just remember to bring it back and sign in for the meeting.

Membership Renewals

Renewal reminders were emailed to five members. We had two renewals in November, including the Bergers.

If your membership anniversary is in December or if you are otherwise renewing, you can submit your fee in one of three ways:

Mail it to: CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451

Renew online at: <https://form.jotform.com/213434374836156>

Your membership anniversary month is printed on the bottom of your name tag. If you're unsure about your renewal status, feel free to reach out for clarification.

Spread the Word

Remember, we are all ambassadors for the Round Table. Invite your family, friends, co-workers, and neighbors to join us. We will ensure every guest feels welcome.

“Sink Before Surrender!” John Quarstein Presents The Battle of Mobile Bay

On November 14, 2024, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table once again welcomed renowned speaker and historian John Quarstein to regale us with a stirring presentation about one of the legendary nautical engagements of the Civil War. John is a native of the Eastern Shore of Maryland and divides his time now between his family farm in Still Pond, Maryland, and the historic Chamberlin Hotel in Hampton, Virginia. In addition to naval history, he is an expert on duck decoys and noted that a breakfast of oysters and whiskey is a good way to begin a day of duck hunting on the Eastern Shore.

Mr. Quarstein last spoke to us in September 2023, talking about the CSS Albemarle. He has authored 20 books (with a 21st soon to be published) and has written numerous articles, exhibits, essays, and documentaries. His titles include A History of Ironclads: The Power of Iron over Wood; CSS Virginia: Sink Before Surrender, and The Monitor Boys: The Crew of the Union’s First Ironclad. He is the winner of the 2012 Henry Adams Prize for excellence in historical literature.

Quarstein has also produced, narrated and written several PBS documentaries including the film series “Civil War in Hampton Roads,” a Silver Telly Award winner. Quarstein is the recipient of the National Trust for Historic Preservation’s President’s Award for Historic Preservation, the Civil War Society’s Preservation Award, and the Daughters of the American Revolution Gold Historians Medal. He has been a guest on C-Span multiple times and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary.

On August 5, 1864, U.S. Navy Rear Admiral David Farragut’s fleet of 18 ships, including four ironclad ships of the monitor type, in what amounted to a frontal assault, forced its way through a narrow channel obstructed by torpedoes (naval mines) and swept by artillery fire from nearby forts, and defeated a Confederate force commanded by Admiral Franklin Buchanan.

It was a battle of wills between the two highest ranking officers of each navy. Buchanan, born in 1800, joined the U.S. Navy as a midshipman in 1815. He had a sterling career as a naval officer, serving with distinction in the Mexican War, commanding a ship in the expeditions of Commodore Matthew Perry and the opening of Japan to western trade, first commandant of the U.S. Naval Academy and commanding officer of the Washington Navy Yard.

Illuminating the strange divisions surrounding the leadership of the country around the time of the beginning of the Civil War, Mr. Quarstein told us that Captain Buchanan hosted a wedding reception at the Navy Yard that was attended by Abraham Lincoln. A young girl in attendance wore a dress with a Confederate flag design and was treated by Lincoln with good humor. More seriously, Buchanan, a veteran of more than 40 years service in the U.S. Navy, submitted his resignation from the service on April 22, 1861, because he thought his home state of Maryland would secede from the United States. Within a week, however, it became clear that Maryland would not secede and that federal control of the state would continue to allow the passage of troops from northern states. He again wrote to Navy Secretary Gideon Welles and requested the withdrawal of his resignation but Welles responded with the news that Buchanan's name had been "stricken from the rolls of the Navy" on April 22, the date of Buchanan's original letter of resignation.

Farragut, a year younger than Buchanan, was, perhaps even more of a "sea dog." Orphaned at a very young age, he was adopted by Commodore David Porter, the father of David Dixon Porter of Civil War fame. Farragut became a midshipman on his adoptive father's ship at the age of nine. Named James Glasgow Farragut at birth, the boy's father, a native of Minorca, Spain, was a Revolutionary War veteran and friend of David Porter, Sr. David Porter Sr., met and befriended Jordi Farragut Mesquida, from the Spanish Balearic island of Minorca. Mesquida joined the American navy in the Revolutionary War and changed his name to George Farragut. Entertainingly, from then on in his presentation, Mr. Quarstein, simply referred to the various David Porters as Porter 1, 2 and 3.

In late spring 1808, David 1 suffered sunstroke, and George Farragut took him into his home, where his wife Elizabeth Farragut cared for him. Already weakened by tuberculosis, he died on June 22, 1808. Elizabeth Farragut died of yellow fever the same day. Motherless, the Farragut children were to be placed with friends and relatives. Thus began young Farragut's long association with Porter 2 and Porter 3. Compounding the confusion, young George Farragut decided to change his first name to "David" when he became a midshipman at the very young age of nine. At the incredibly young age of 12, during the War of 1812, the youngster was given command of prize vessel taken by Porter 2's ship, the Essex.

As the Civil War unfolded, both Buchanan and Farragut played major roles and earned even greater distinction. Buchanan commanded the CSS Virginia (vice USS Merrimack—with a "k") in the fateful battle of Hampton Roads. On March 8, 1862, the ironclad Virginia, making just five knots, attacked the wooden-hulled steamships of the U.S. Navy, destroying two large steam frigates and killing approximately 240 Union sailors. In the fighting, however, Buchanan was seriously wounded by fire from U.S. forces on shore. Buchanan did not command the Virginia in its momentous clash with the USS Monitor in Hampton Roads the next day. His wound was serious and as he slowly recovered, he was transferred to the major port of Mobile, Alabama on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico.

By 1864, the stage was set for a furious clash at Mobile Bay. On board the USS Hartford, a wooden-hulled steam frigate, Farragut entered Mobile Bay, Alabama, 5 August 1864, in two columns, with ironclad monitors leading and a fleet of wooden ships following. When the lead monitor, the USS Tecumseh, was demolished by a mine, the wooden ship Brooklyn stopped, and the line drifted in confusion toward Fort Morgan. As disaster seemed imminent, Farragut gave the orders embodied by his famous words—"Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead!" He swung his own ship clear and headed across the mines, which failed to explode. The fleet followed and anchored above the forts, which, now isolated, surrendered one by one. The torpedoes to which Farragut and his contemporaries referred would today be described as moored mines. Mr. Quarstein explained that most scholarship states that Admiral Farragut said "Damn the torpedoes! Four bells! Captain Drayton, go ahead! Jouett, full speed!" That was, perhaps understandably, shortened to the more pithy version known by all students of American history.

At the head of a seriously outgunned flotilla of ships, most of which were not ready for battle as the Union fleet quickly stormed past the forts, Confederate Admiral Buchanan onboard the ironclad CSN Tennessee, ordered his lieutenants to "Sink before surrender," and directed the iron monster to attack the entire U.S. fleet. Mr. Quarstein told us that at this point Farragut reportedly, said "I didn't think Old Buck was such a fool." Buchanan, nonetheless, fought furiously and at one point Farragut's second in command, Captain Percival Drayton saw Buchanan onboard the Tennessee and threw his binoculars at him, calling him an "infernal traitor." Drayton was a South Carolinian who remained loyal to the Union.

As the Tennessee absorbed murderous punishment from the Union fleet, Buchanan was once again wounded. Taken below for medical treatment, he once again enjoined his officers to "sink before surrender," but with the ship unable to defend itself, surrender came and the battle ended.

Although the city of Mobile remained in Confederate hands until 1865, the port was essentially closed to shipping and the Union victory became the first in a string of major Confederate defeats, including the fall of Atlanta and the Battle of Cedar Creek in the Shenandoah Valley that ensured electoral victory for Abraham Lincoln in the election of 1864, thus cementing Confederate defeat.

Graciously, Mr. Quarstein stayed for an extensive question-and-answer period after his presentation and also signed books for members of the audience. Such opportunities for personal contact with notable speakers are hallmarks of the round table. Our stated purpose is to "broaden the knowledge, understanding and interpretation" of the Civil War Era and this presentation achieved that purpose, par excellence.

Audience Participation Program Focuses On Generalship: Theory and Substance

Tropical Storm Debby threatened the area back in August and we decided to cancel our program on August 11 rather than have members driving on flooded roads. As it turned out, Debby wasn't as severe as expected but emphasizing safety was the best course. Member John Weisz was poised to present the program back in August but instead we moved him in the schedule to December 12.

So now, we have the pleasure of inviting all members and friends to the December program titled, "Generalship: Theory and Substance." This audience-participation program will be presented by round table member John Weisz, a West Point graduate and retired U.S. Army officer. The meeting will be held on Thursday evening, December 12, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

John graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in 1974 with a degree in Engineering and minors in German and Military History. He retired from the Army in 1994 as a Lieutenant Colonel. He served in several leadership roles in Armored Cavalry, Armor and Infantry units and on the General Staff at Ft. Knox, KY. He is a graduate of the Command and General Staff School and the Defense Logistics Executive program. He has published several articles in military journals.

For the program, John will describe the characteristics of successful generals in the Civil War. He will bring the audience into the study of campaigns through practical exercises. Teams will form and will be provided with the information needed by the commander and several options as to which maneuver to execute. The audience will not be provided with the identity of the generals and where the engagements were fought ahead of the exercise but, by the end, will surely be able to determine who and where.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall in St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, and talk to other members of the round table. Remember, you are a recruiter. Ask a friend to come along and find out more about the round table. For information about membership, go to our website at <http://cfcwrt.org> and click on "Join".

See you there!

Unveiling the Storm: Introducing War and Weather

By Matt Howell

Dear Members,

It is with great excitement that I introduce our new serialized feature, Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather. Our member and sponsor Brandon Carter, Esq., authored this study in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Bachelor of Arts degree in History at the Virginia Military Institute in 2008.

Drawing on Edward Powers' seminal 19th-century work War and the Weather—as well as firsthand accounts from soldiers, historical records, and modern meteorological theories—this series uncovers the unique interplay between combat and the environment.

Carter weaves a compelling narrative that spans Civil War campaigns, the Mexican-American War, and even Napoleon's battles. His exploration of this topic will captivate readers with its blend of military history and environmental science.

The series will be published in five concise installments:

- Part 1: Introduction to the phenomenon and Malvern Hill, the first key example of post-battle rain.
- Part 2: Patterns of post-combat precipitation during the Civil War.
- Part 3: Edward Powers' early theories on the relationship between combat and weather.
- Part 4: Connections to other wars, including the Mexican-American War and Napoleon's campaigns.
- Part 5: Modern insights into weather modification and a conclusion on Powers' legacy.

Each installment offers a rich and accessible look into this underexplored topic. We are thrilled to bring you this series and invite you to dive into the first chapter below.

Enjoy this unique perspective on Civil War history! As you ponder absorbing questions of correlation and causation, please note a comprehensive 2020 resource, Kenneth Noe's The Howling Storm: Weather, Climate, and the American Civil War, available at libraries and on Amazon at <https://www.tinyurl.com/ACWwx20>

Coincidence or Chemistry: Civil War Combat and its Effects on Weather

By Brandon Carter, Esq.; Serialized by Matthew Howell

Part 1: Malvern Hill & the Phenomenon of Post-Battle Rain

July 1, 1862, dawned hot and humid in the fields east of Richmond, Virginia. Over the course of one week, Confederate General Robert E. Lee, in his first campaign as commander of the Army of Northern Virginia, had pressed General George B. McClellan's

Watercolor of the battle of Malvern Hill by Sneden

Union army from the outskirts of Richmond almost to Harrison's Landing, nearly twenty miles down the James. Only six days earlier, Union troops could set their watches by the bells of Richmond's churches. Now, they were in full retreat, or conducting a "change of base" as McClellan called it. The 1st of July would be the last day of fighting in what came to be known as the Seven Days Battles.

The Union position on Malvern Hill was as strong as any McClellan had ever held, or ever would hold. His engineers set up just under forty cannon across the crest of the hill, along with two divisions of infantry. Both flanks were protected by reserves. Gunboats provided additional artillery support from the James. All told, nearly 80,000 Union troops occupied Malvern Hill. The battle, which lasted until nightfall, cost each side dearly. Over 1,000 men were killed outright. The Confederates lost 5,650 men killed, wounded, or captured in their fruitless attacks. The Union army had lost 3,007 troops. The day had been a clear-cut Union victory. The scene after the battle was gruesome. General D. H. Hill famously remarked, "It was not war – it was murder." One Union officer still on the field early on the morning of July 2 said of the Confederate casualties that "enough were alive and moving to give the field a singular crawling effect."

Throughout the day on July 1, through the ebb and tide of the Confederate waves of attack, one thing was constant: Union artillery fire. Malvern Hill was unusual because it was one of the few battles of the entire Civil War in which at least half, if not more, of an army's casualties had been inflicted due to artillery fire. Early on the morning of July 2, something not so unusual happened. It had first occurred after the war's first significant land battle at Big Bethel, Virginia, on June 10, 1861. It was a natural phenomenon that soldiers took as a bittersweet occurrence. It was raining.

Lt. Col. William Ogden McDonald, a surgeon in General Graham's brigade of the Union IV Corps, was understandably tired after Malvern Hill. He fell asleep by one of the roads that the Union army would be taking to their new base on the James River. He was awakened early the next morning by the noise of the retreating army. He joined his brigade on their march to Harrison's Landing on the James. Soon after, the rain began. It came in torrents. Lt. Col. McDonald noticed what seemed to be a link between the battle and rain. He observed, "And as was usually the case after a big battle it began to rain." He then spoke of the quickly deteriorating conditions of the march: "We marched along for a few miles thro [sic] the mud and rain." The Union march to the James would be miserable, but the rain that made it so was at the same time cleansing the blood of the dead and dying still on the hill from the sandy Virginia soil.

Civil War soldiers frequently made such observations in letters and diaries, and later in memoirs and regimental histories. However, since the close of the Civil War, only one attempt at a comprehensive, analytical study of the effects of combat on weather has been made. First published in 1871 and issued again as a revised edition in 1890, Edward Powers' War and the Weather contains letters sent to him from forty-two men who witnessed war firsthand, as well as his and their theories as to why precipitation so often followed battles. These letters are invaluable in not only determining what kind of weather followed battles, but also for the explanations that their writers offered to explain this phenomenon. As already noted, the rain that followed many battles was bittersweet to the men involved. For some, like General McClellan during his retreat to the James, it was an unpleasant nuisance. For others, like Joshua L. Chamberlain of Maine, it brought some relief.

Chamberlain was wounded a number of times during the war and was left to lie for periods of time following battles until help finally arrived. He wrote to Powers in a postwar letter that "these rains are balm to the fever and anguish of the poor body that is promoted to the ranks of 'casualties.'" Precipitation played a significant part in shaping the conduct of the Civil War, and Civil War soldiers played a significant part in, quite literally, triggering the precipitation. Yet the subject of war and weather has been all but ignored by scholars since Powers, and his book all but forgotten.

During the Civil War it rained with greater frequency than can be attributed to random chance after battles from Pennsylvania to Florida, from Virginia to Louisiana. Rain was mixed with snow after some fights. Precipitation also followed battles in the Mexican and in 19th-century European wars. We will begin by identifying the Civil War's major battles, and by identifying which ones were followed by precipitation.

Opinion

By Roman Berger

Take Your Children and Grandchildren to Civil War Sites!

Recently, I had the opportunity to glance at a copy of The Civil War Monitor – specifically, Volume 14, No. 3. In the digital age, the unique nature of opening up a periodical is something to treasure; processing information put to paper might carry a certain weight not exactly found in information put onto the web. While glancing through to see what type of articles would be found in a magazine of this nature, I happened upon an infographic concerning the “Profile of a Civil War Traveler”, based on reader surveys (Pg. 12-13). And one statistic cited in that survey caught my eye – a stat that I took as somewhat concerning.

According to The Civil War Monitor, the average age for a first visit to a Civil War battlefield or a related site is 22 years old.

On one hand, the fact that people in their twenties are still exploring and studying battlefields in the most consequential war in this nation’s history, a war that was some generations separated from our daily lives, is surely heartening for us history enthusiasts. It speaks to the engagement that civilians have with the national story and the success of enthusiasts in keeping interest alive. But the fact that age is firmly in adulthood does make me wonder – how many adults are using their vacation time to explore this great nation of ours? In fact, given that older age, a more pressing question presents itself; should we find ways to get kids and teenagers to visit these battlefields at a formative age? And why?

It makes sense that families with sparse resources and vacation time would want to use it in more “exciting” locales – theme parks, beach cities, you name it. The memories from those trips last forever for all who undertake them, and a battlefield might be unfairly written off as “boring” to younger eyes at first glance, at least for those adults who might not have a vested interest in Civil War history.

But surely trips to explore the crucibles that this nation has been forged under are equally as important, with the battlefields and related sites in the Civil War being particularly pivotal. Gettysburg (which was cited in that same article as the most common “opening salvo” with an overwhelming majority at 52.8%) is a critical locale in the formation and maintenance of American society – you can arguably divide America in a “before Gettysburg” and “after Gettysburg” given the sheer tactical and emotional impact of that conflict. Here in Cape Fear, Fort Fisher’s capitulation served as the nail in the coffin for the Confederacy, which collapsed weeks later. Even smaller scale battlefields and historical sites can grant massive insight for younger viewers, as well as open undiscovered paths in their minds.

By Roman Berger

Historical sites and battlefields so often have technological artifacts used at the time of the conflict – surely, the weaponry and armory might encourage a young visitor to consider a STEM-focused career. The dedication of the nurses on the battlefield concerning the casualties might have some other visitors contemplate a career in the medical field, astonished at how far medical treatment has come from the field hospitals in Vicksburg and Antietam. And that's beyond the philosophical rationale behind visiting these battlefields – understanding the issues that propelled the underlying conflict and the resulting battles, how military strategies influenced the endgame of the conflict's outcome, the gravitas of giving your life for something beyond your self-interest.

But it's pivotal for our national storytelling and our national development to encourage our youth to visit these battlefields. This is hallowed ground we are dealing with – so many of the Civil War dead are at eternal rest in these battlefields. My concern is that, without a lot of young people going to these sites, they will not only lose interest in our history, they will be quick to overlook the sobering nature of these pivotal sites in American history. Why do you think there is an interest in preserving these battlefields? Right now, as development proceeds – especially in the fast-growing modern South – there is cause for concern that Civil War battlefields, sites where brother warred against brother, could be swept aside by tract housing and chain stores.

It makes me wonder how we can put a stop to this encroachment before it starts, or at least, stop it before it reaches fever pitch. Parents and grandparents should take the initiative and take their children to pivotal sites in the Civil War. It should be treated with the same priority as a traditional summer vacation – what might seem a bit boring at first glance to young children could awaken in them a passion for preserving this nation's history and related artifacts, if not other career interests.

Beyond that – given that not everybody in this country has the resources to do so – schools should include in their history curriculum trips to pivotal Civil War sites nearby. (Here, the newly renovated Fort Fisher Museum is surely a great opportunity for students across Cape Fear to visit a very epochal Civil War battleground.) Local libraries should also sponsor bus trips to these sites. We need community programs to entice young Americans and their families to visit these sites that so often set the stage for America's contemporary state.

Our national history must be taught to and maintained by new voices. There is so much that one can extrapolate from a trip to a Civil War battlefield; so many paths can be opened, and by bringing a new generation to these sites, these paths can be open at the right time to shape lives in very dramatic ways.

Welcome to the Table, Sterling, Gold and Platinum Sponsors!

By Yelena Howell

We now have an additional membership category: sponsorship, with Sterling, Gold and Platinum options at $50, $100, and $250 per year, respectively. In November 2024, an extra $400 boosted our programming budget as our very first sponsors partnered with us in supporting our mission.

These fine companies offer top-notch services that may be of interest to our members. Corporate sponsorship of our Roundtable is by invitation extended to those whose work merits whole-hearted endorsement. Meanwhile, individuals also have the option to join or renew our memberships as Sterling, Gold or Platinum that includes personal or couples' membership along with advertising privileges and recognition. Sterling status is an additional $20 per year as compared to our regular annual dues. CFCWRT thanks you for your support in any way that fits your preferences while respecting your numerous other financial and time commitments.

Wilmington True History Tours is the brainchild of Mr. & Mrs. Brandon Carter, Esq. In addition to his successful legal career, Brandon runs the most popular history tour company in Savannah, Georgia. (You guessed it: its name is Savannah True History Tours!) "Here, there and everywhere", he is renowned for his professionalism, customer care, and devotion to evidence-based history presented in a captivating manner. In Wilmington, Brandon collaborates with our very own Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. and other highly experienced tour guides to deliver the best walking tours year-round. Tremendous thanks to Wilmington True History Tours for contributing to our local culture and economy and for their Sterling Sponsorship! You are invited to peruse and bookmark their webpage:

Pickles & Taps, to whom we offer a resounding thanks, stepped up as a Platinum Sponsor! More details about their business continues on the following page.

My personal thanks to each of you for embracing our new sponsorship category and to our benefactors for following along with us and for your gracious gifts. With due recognition of multitudes of worthy civic causes that merit financial support, I am truly grateful for sponsoring relationships with us that have been carefully considered and found worthwhile.

Please join me in patronizing these businesses as desired. Links to their contact information and offerings will be provided concisely and regularly in our group communications as a token of our appreciation and reciprocity. Questions and feedback: CapeFearRT@gmail.com

Pickle & Taps: Supporting the CFCWRT & Serving Wilmington

By Matt Howell

We are thrilled to welcome Pickle & Taps as a Platinum Sponsor of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table! Jason and Kayse Beasley, the husband-and-wife team behind this exciting new venture, have shown incredible generosity in supporting our group at the highest sponsorship level. Their dedication to fostering community partnerships is as strong as their passion for pickleball.

Set to open in mid-December at the corner of 13th and Marstellar, Pickle & Taps is Wilmington's first indoor pickleball facility. With 10 indoor courts and a welcoming atmosphere, it is the perfect space for players of all levels to gather. Guests can enjoy not only great games but also beer, wine, and snacks in a comfortable, community-focused environment.

Jason and Kayse are eager to share their love of pickleball with the Wilmington community. They have created a space where both seasoned players and beginners can connect, grow, and have fun. The Beasleys encourage any pickleball enthusiasts in our membership to join them for a game or two when the facility opens.

Their mission is to grow the love of pickleball, support local businesses, strengthen community, and give back through charities. Their values reflect this commitment: do the right thing, grow, build, innovate, give back, and have fun.

We are proud to have Pickle & Taps as part of our Round Table family and look forward to supporting their mission to bring people together through the joy of pickleball. Let us show our gratitude by visiting their facility and spreading the word about this fantastic addition to Wilmington!

Brunswick Civil War Round Table

We are pleased to announce that Union General Ulysses S. Grant will return, in person, to the Tuesday, December 3rd monthly meeting of the Round Table. His return engagement is by popular demand recalling his ZOOM presentation during COVID back in December, 2020 when he captivated his audience on a variety of true-life and entertaining subjects. His opinions about the Civil War cover a myriad of events and personal observations, raising our curiosity as to what he will decide to discuss this time during his visit.

Actually Gen. Grant is portrayed by Dr. E.C. (Curt) Fields, Jr., educational consultant and living historian. He will appear in his Union uniform and favorite cigar. This will be a program not to be missed given his deep respect and admiration for Grant.

In fact, he is a living replica of Grant with the same height and body type.

The meeting will be held at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach. Everyone is welcome. Registration begins at 6:15PM. The program starts at 7:00PM. The visitor fee is $10, and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues which can include a spouse for all nine monthly meetings.

For more information, email president John Butler at Brunswickcwrt@gmail.com or call him at (404) 229-9425. Visit BCWRT online at <https://brunswickcivilwarroundtable.com/> or <https://www.facebook.com/brunswickcivilwarroundtable>

Wreaths Across America December Update

Tremendous thanks to each of our supporters! CFCWRT has exceeded our annual goal of 50 wreaths. We are at 62! Our special gratitude to Kimberly Jordan (Mrs. William) and Mr. Bruce Patterson for tirelessly championing this patriotic cause year in and year out.

Join us on at 12 noon on Saturday, December 14, 2024, at the Wilmington National Cemetery, 2011 Market Street, to remember and honor our veterans through the laying of remembrance wreaths and the act of saying the name of each and every veteran aloud.

Your support is dearly appreciated. Not only have you provided wreaths to cover 62 Christian military graves, but you have collectively contributed a rebate of $$5 \times 62 = \310 to our Roundtable's programming budget.

Letter from the Editor

Dear Members of the CFCWRT,

As we enter a new month, I am filled with a profound sense of pride and gratitude. I am honored to have joined this wonderful organization, especially as we celebrate the significant milestone of turning 30!

Over three decades, we have built a vibrant community of history enthusiasts, educators, and advocates, all committed to the mission of honoring and exploring our past while inspiring future generations.

I am particularly proud of the appointment of our first female president, Yelena Howell. As her husband for 13 years, I have witnessed firsthand how truly amazing she is. Her passion for history and unwavering commitment to fostering a sense of community will undoubtedly help us continue to thrive and grow. I am excited to see her dynamic leadership in action!

I was also honored to celebrate our anniversary with you at Indochine. It was an evening filled with laughter, great conversation, and, of course, delicious food. It was a joy to see familiar faces and finally meet those I have heard so much about.

As we look to the future, let us remember the spirit of collaboration and passion that have brought us to this point. I invite you all to participate in our upcoming events, share your ideas, and continue to engage with one another. Together, we can honor our past while embracing the exciting opportunities ahead.

Thank you for being part of this incredible journey. Here's to many more years of exploration and celebration of our shared history!

Warm regards,

Matthew Howell

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

President's Address

By Yelena Howell

Dear members and friends,

All the lonely people

Where do they all come from?

Some folks, it seems, are wired to be inveterate students of history. Each and every one of us is wired for sharing our interests with others and regular doses of companionship and camaraderie. A sting of loneliness can propel us to seek out meaningful social interactions. If the impulse for connection is not adequately met, loneliness can become a chronic stressor that affects our sense of well-being, quality of life, and our very neurobiology, increasing our susceptibility to neurodegenerative changes. At times, I have felt the shadow of Eleanor Rigby (or Eleanor Vance—it is, after all, Halloween season), but allow me to try on Father McKenzie's ever-hopeful shoes as I conclude my homily on the importance of sustained fellowship. Our round table has entered its 31st year, providing a unique social circle where people from all walks of life continue to gather in the name of our esprit de corps: appreciation for American stories, history of the American Civil War, and lifelong learning.

It was such a joy to see some of you at our festive October get-together and to feel the goodwill of yet more of our hosts who were with us in spirit. In addressing you, I truly meant it: we embrace your diverse interests, viewpoints, life experiences, areas of expertise, abilities and varying capabilities to participate in our organization throughout your tenure. Civic engagement is a potent antidote to alienation; ongoing intellectual and social curiosity, to listlessness and apathy that have a way of aging us faster than hard work and the good sun on our cheeks can (though I do endorse regular use of sunscreen). We are finishing this year strong and heading into a bounteous 2025. See you in November and beyond!

Sincerely yours,

Yelena Howell

Membership Report

By Kim Berger

This month may have been quiet on the Membership front, but there's still plenty to look forward to! We didn't gain any new members, and we had just one renewal by mail. If November marks your membership anniversary, don't forget to renew!

You can mail your fee to CFCWRT at 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451, pay Mike at our November meeting, or renew online. Check the bottom of your name tag for your anniversary month, or just ask me if you're unsure!

Our October meeting at Indochine was a wonderful gathering, with 51 attendees—including 30 current and inactive members along with their families. It was a fantastic evening filled with great conversation and delicious food. A big thank you to Yelena for organizing such a delightful event and for treating us to her amazing homemade chocolate cake!

Let's keep the momentum going—remember, we're all recruiters! Invite your family, friends, co-workers, and neighbors. We promise to make everyone feel welcome!

Money Matters

By Michael McDonald & Yelena Howell

We have decided to include a snapshot of our active membership numbers and finances once a quarter and annually. For the third quarter of 2004:

- We boast 97 members
- Our income was $1,422.60
- Our expenses were $425.10

*Please expect natural variation in income and expenses from quarter to quarter based on the number of renewals and our hosting costs that are lower during the summer months.

Thank you very much for joining us, renewing your memberships, and giving in numerous other ways that sustain our organization! For additional details, please contact Treasurer Michael McDonald or President Yelena Howell, and we will be glad to address your questions.

The Round Table's 30th Anniversary Bash

By Bill Jayne

Fifty-one members and guests of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table enjoyed a festive and lively evening at Indochine, Wilmington's distinctive and popular Vietnamese and Thai restaurant on Wayne Drive near Market Street, on the evening of October 10. In attendance were officers President Yelena Howell, Secretary/Historian Fred Claridge, Quartermaster William Jordan, executive committee members Al Turner, Jim Gannon, Kim Berger, Roman Berger, Tom O'Connor and immediate past president Bill Jayne as well as other past presidents Chris Fonvielle, David Norris and Bob Cooke and advisor Dr. Angela Zombek, Ph.D. Webmaster Richard Buggeln and newsletter editor Matt Howell also joined us.

We gathered in the banquet space in the garden to enjoy the banquet menu and then short reflections from our presidents. Newly installed president, Yelena Howell—our first elected president and our first woman president—began the proceedings by reading a gracious letter from George Slaton, our first president. The letter in full is presented in The Runner on page 5. George now lives in Davidson, N.C., and was unable to attend the festive event because of a recent operation.

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) was established in 1994 and George led the organization until the year 2000. He recalls that an organization called the Civil War Round Table Associates met in Wilmington in the summer of 1993. The organization was founded and led by legendary battlefield preservationist and Civil War activist, Jerry Russell, and their primary purpose was to encourage Civil War Round Tables to get involved in battlefield preservation.

The Wilmington event included a workshop on "How to Start a Civil War Round Table." That workshop motivated George and others to establish a round table in Wilmington. Contributing to the momentum was Civil War publisher Ted Savas and prospective authors Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley. Ted, then leading the publishing company of Savas Woodbury, first published Chris Fonvielle's The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, and Mark Bradley's The Battle of Bentonville: Last Stand in the Carolinas.

The new club soon got rolling and the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table first met at the University of North Carolina, Wilmington (UNCW) in October 1994. The first speaker was Chris Fonvielle. Although he is a Wilmington native, in 1994 Chris was living in the Outer Banks but, fittingly, he spoke about the Wilmington Campaign.

Dr. Fonvielle, now retired, soon joined the faculty of UNCW and became more regularly involved with the round table. Professor Fonvielle led the CFCWRT from 2000 through 2006. At the commemorative dinner at Indochine, Chris reminded the audience of the atmosphere surrounding Civil War history in the 1990s. There was a great deal of interest sparked by mass entertainment such as Ken Burns' PBS documentary series on the Civil War and perhaps the nostalgia of those who recalled the Civil War Centennial from 1961 to '65 played a part. Noting that history tends to telescope time, he recalled the story of Lt. Col. John W. Taylor of the 36th NC who was served at Ft. Fisher and was badly wounded at Bentonville in 1865. Two of the colonel's grandsons were present to hear Chris's talk on the Wilmington Campaign at the first meeting of the round table in 1994.

Under the leadership of David Norris (2006–10) the round table moved several times but enjoyed several outings. David recalling Chris's point about nostalgia and the Civil War Centennial, said that he still thinks of the Civil War as having taken place 100 years ago. David, an artist and author of many historical articles for magazines and journals, noted that Civil War Round Tables like ours play an important role in encouraging writers and researchers who continue to advance our understanding of the Civil War.

Up next, our fourth president, Bob Cooke (2010 to 2018), told the audience that he moved to Wilmington in 1994 and joined the round table in 1995. He was the editor of the newsletter for many years and recounted the many steps necessary to prepare, print and mail a newsletter in those days and how thankful he was when the digital age allowed clubs like ours to send newsletters electronically. He compared our group—and most clubs such as ours—to a living organism that is born, grows, and matures. The president, Bob said, is the head, the members are the life blood of the organism and the “steering committee,” the cadre of leaders, is the backbone. Our round table is growing and set to remain healthy well into the future, Bob said, as he led the group in a round of applause for the round table.

Finally, immediate past president Bill Jayne thanked everyone at the event for all their support over the years when he was president from 2018 to 2024. Echoing the remarks of the previous presidents, he remarked on the importance of history as we continue to broaden our knowledge of the past and try to apply its lessons to the present. He noted his excitement over the adoption of bylaws and the election of officers and his optimism for the future with a great new set of leaders at the helm of our club.

President Yelena Howell closed the meeting portion of the event by thanking everyone for coming and inviting everyone to participate in the activities of the round table in any way they found interesting.

A Letter from Founding President, George Slaton

7 October 2024

Dear Round Table Members

I can't adequately express how gratifying it feels to think of so many of you gathered this evening to celebrate the 30th Anniversary of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table!

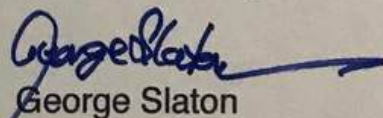

I recall the first meeting of the Round Table in October, 1994. The steering committee had sent out numerous invitations, but we had no idea what the turnout would be. We were both surprised and pleased that, in spite of a heavy rain, about 70 people attended that night to enjoy Chris Fonvielle's presentation.

From that initial meeting thirty years ago until now, the Round Table has hosted innumerable speakers, sponsored great battlefield tours and preservation projects, deepened the historical interest and knowledge of countless members, and provided enjoyable fellowship for so many.

Most recently I've been in touch with your former president, Bill Jayne, and your new president, Yelena Howell. I'm impressed with their enthusiastic and capable leadership and their ability to inspire participation in this organization.

My thanks to every one of you as you carry forward the traditions of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and as you lead others to the study of this momentous period in our American history!

With kindest regards

George Slaton

CFCWRT November Meeting

By Bill Jayne

Kicking off our 30th “campaign,” the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will feature a repeat appearance by John V. Quarstein, the director emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at the Mariners’ Museum and retired director of the Virginia War Museum in Newport News, Virginia.

As usual, the meeting of the round table will be held on Thursday evening, November 14, at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Mr. Quarstein last spoke to us in September 2023, talking about the CSS Albemarle. He has authored 19 books and has written numerous articles, exhibits, essays, and documentaries. His titles include A History of Ironclads: The Power of Iron over Wood; CSS Virginia: Sink Before Surrender, and The Monitor Boys: The Crew of the Union’s First Ironclad. He is the winner of the 2012 Henry Adams Prize for excellence in historical literature.

Quarstein has also produced, narrated and written several PBS documentaries including the film series “Civil War in Hampton Roads,” a Silver Telly Award winner. Quarstein is the recipient of the National Trust for Historic Preservation’s President’s Award for Historic Preservation, the Civil War Society’s Preservation Award, and the Daughters of the American Revolution Gold Historians Medal. He has been a guest on C-Span multiple times and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary.

John is one of the top experts on the Naval War and will speak to us about the legendary and furious battle of Mobile Bay in August 1864, pitting famous U.S. Navy Admiral David Farragut against Confederate States Navy Admiral Franklin Buchanan.

Born in Baltimore in 1800, Franklin Buchanan joined the U.S. Navy as a midshipman in 1815. He had a sterling record as a naval officer, including service in the Mexican War, becoming the first superintendent of the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis and commanding ships in Commodore Perry’s missions to Japan.

As the Civil War began, Buchanan was commandant of the Washington Navy Yard. He thought of himself as a southerner because Maryland was a slave state. Nonetheless, he proclaimed that he was not a secessionist but sought an assignment overseas so that he would not be called upon to fight against family members and neighbors. U.S. Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, responded by having Buchanan stricken from the U.S. Navy rolls.

While many serving U.S. Navy officers resigned their commissions and joined the Confederacy, it should be noted that by no means did all southern born officers leave the U.S. Navy. Famously, Admiral Samuel Phillips Lee, born in Fairfax County, Virginia, and a cousin of Robert E. Lee, remained loyal to the United States, saying “When I find the word Virginia in my commission, I will join the Confederacy.”

Buchanan, barred from serving in the U.S. Navy, retired to his home in Easton, Maryland, where he remained until September 1861 when he accepted a commission as a captain in the Confederate States Navy.

Come to learn and be entertained by a world-class speaker who will tell about the life and times of Franklin Buchanan from the momentous battle of Hampton Roads between the USS Monitor and the CSS Virginia, to the desperate, close-quarters naval combat in Mobile Bay, Alabama, in 1864 where his opponent, Admiral David Farragut, USN, led his fleet into the bay. It's a tale of great courage, drama and legendary leadership.

The meeting will be held in Elebash Hall of St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, talk to members of the round table and discover new interests. See you there!

Historic Day at Fort Fisher as New Visitor Center Opens

By Matt Howell

After years of anticipation and a month-long delay due to severe weather and flooding, Fort Fisher celebrated the opening of its new Visitor Center with a memorable ribbon-cutting ceremony. The event drew local and state historians, elected officials, and history enthusiasts who gathered to mark this landmark moment for our community and state.

Set to open to the public on October 30th, 2024, the new Visitor Center replaces the original facility, which was designed for just 25,000 annual visitors—a number far exceeded by last year’s record-breaking one million visitors. This new center not only meets the needs of Fort Fisher’s growing popularity but also serves as a space dedicated to telling the site’s story in a more comprehensive, inclusive way, celebrating the diverse groups that helped shape its history.

Speakers at the ceremony emphasized this commitment to inclusive storytelling, highlighting the contributions of people of color to Fort Fisher’s past and the importance of preserving Indigenous perspectives. Representatives from the Lumbee tribe were on-site to help commemorate the occasion, sharing insights into Fort Fisher’s cultural significance for Indigenous communities across North Carolina.

A cherished landmark, Fort Fisher has long drawn those interested in the region’s past, and this new Visitor Center will allow an even wider audience to engage with its layered history. From its critical wartime role to its enduring cultural impact, Fort Fisher’s story resonates with countless visitors each year. This facility now stands ready to deepen our connection to that history and ensure it endures for generations to come.

With updated exhibits and a strong focus on representing diverse voices, the Visitor Center invites everyone to experience Fort Fisher’s past in a new light. This state-of-the-art addition honors Fort Fisher’s legacy, celebrating its impact on our community and preserving its stories for generations to come.

Could the Round Table Influence Development of NC History Museum?

The North Carolina Museum of History, located across the street from the Legislative Building in Raleigh, is one of the most important attractions for anybody interested in the development of and culture within the Tar Heel State. As the museum undergoes a major renovation that will see the building close down for the next two years, it has sought out feedback and recommendations from the state's academics and citizens – pivotal in any event, especially so given North Carolina's brisk growth.

Who better to provide such feedback than members of historical roundtables?

On October 3rd, at the New Hanover County Main Library in Downtown Wilmington, members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round table participated in a conversation with North Carolina Museum of History staff members, and Brocade Studio, a Richmond-based planning firm that has worked on the American Civil War Museum in Richmond and Dix Park in Raleigh. Round table members who participated in the meeting included President Yelena Howell, Immediate Past President Bill Jayne, Professor Emeritus and former President Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Membership Chair Kim Berger, former president David Norris, Audio-Visual Coordinator Roman Berger, Quartermaster William Jordan, Executive Committee member Tom O'Connor and Pat Garrow, retired archaeologist and program committee member – a sample size spanning age groups, birth locations, and careers.

The meeting concerned the artifacts that the Museum was looking to include in their collection. Over-arching that, museum representatives were seeking ways to attract larger and newer crowds and spark interest in history from a younger age. Members of the Civil War Roundtable encouraged the museum to research North Carolina's role in the epochal conflict. Ideas proposed included the Piedmont Quaker Belt, the role of Women on the Homefront, the coastal operations at Fort Fisher, money's role in crafting and preserving power, an exploration of Governor Zebulon Vance, the Native American Experience in the Conflict, and the exploration of pension records. The veteran experience, including USCT veterans and white North Carolinians who served in U.S. units, and the power of community in motivating Confederate soldiers were also brought up.

Meeting participants, however, also thought in the long term. How can the Museum ensure that interest in history is grown for all visitors of all ages across this state?

By Roman Berger

Multiple ideas were suggested to ensure the museum's longevity and reach, maintain continued interest over the next quarter-century, and increase the impact on visitors. These ideas included:

- displaying multiple perspectives to try and get into the minds of the citizens at the time, all to explore how perspectives evolved and gain new insight from state residents who had been overlooked;
- trying to decode propaganda and the rationale behind the messages, so we can see how messages are applied today and with what strategies and appeals;
- unearthing and purchasing rare artifacts such as old battle flags, to construct more authentic and striking exhibitions that make the museum unique;
- expanding educational outreach beyond the 4th and 8th Grade visits;
- and establishing a traveling museum, so students who would not normally take trips to the museum (particularly in under-served communities and those further away from the museum) can explore this cross-section of North Carolinian life and history.

Indeed, the end goal of all involved in the meeting is to invigorate that interest in local and regional history. North Carolina has a rich historical tapestry, with impacts both positive and negative, and a well-curated and unique museum is pivotal to introducing and explaining the past. The Museum Representatives appeared cognizant of such an ethos, and that made the feedback and response from these experts highly valuable. It helped that the CFCWRT participants were experts in varied fields from academic history, archaeology, and education to graphic art, genealogy, reenacting, veterans affairs, and well-informed devotees of history.

As a member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, my suggestions naturally centered on the impact of the Civil War within the state. And while it should not be the exclusive domain of the museum – the history of North Carolina spans centuries before and after the four-year war—surely the Civil War will have a significant presence in the museum. Its impacts on the state's society, economy, and political scene not only reverberate over the next 160 years from 1865 to today, these effects yield lessons that are just as relevant for citizens young and old today. The Civil War and the study of the conflict is almost certainly the most important story in American history, and a vibrant exploration of the conflict is absolutely necessary to understand the story of the state.

By Roman Berger

Further, it's my belief that should the Museum take up on the suggestions to expand their educational outreach, the dividends will be evident in a more historically astute and intellectually curious student population. That investment will prove to be very wise for both the Museum and the state's culture, and may ensure that interest in this most fascinating of conflicts persists in the general public well after our lifetimes.

Of course, there is bias in this analysis, but I'm sure that the round table member suggestions could only be of positive impact for the museum's redevelopment and for Civil War roundtables across the state. By providing our input to museums such as the State Museum, the benefits are shared far and wide.

Following the conversation, Brocade Studio told the CFCWRT, "Thank you so much for hosting us last Thursday for a really insightful and dynamic conversation. We were struck by the thoughtfulness of the group - it was one of our favorite conversation groups all week."

Spotlight on Fort Fisher Illustrated

By Yelena Howell

On Monday, October 21, 2024, Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. premiered a conversation about Fort Fisher Illustrated: Art of the Battle at Federal Point Historic Preservation Society.

Co-authored with Dr. Robert M. Browning Jr., the book focuses on nineteenth-century art that brought the terrible grandeur of the First and Second Battles of Fort Fisher to American and European audiences.

With jewel-like vividness, reproductions of an estimated 99% of extant paintings, drawings, and lithographs are set amid the expert historians' commentary on sources, context, and veracity of images shaping public perception of the events of Christmas 1864 and mid-January of 1865 that effectively ended blockade running and ushered in the fall of Confederate Wilmington. Likewise, Fonvielle's talk on Fort Fisher Illustrated masterfully sets a sequential show of images in the volume amid facts and evidence, enabling listeners to reconstruct a coherent, lurid timeline of war and art. Comprehensive compilation of material along with analytical consideration of its pedigree and historical accuracy echo the spirit of Curious Tales from Old Wilmington and the Lower Cape Fear Region: The Truth Behind the Legends which also aims to preserve fully, appraise, and engage.

Copies of Fort Fisher Illustrated: Art of the Battle are expected to be available for sale by November 12, with a more detailed look at the contents to follow. Stay tuned for more upcoming talks and book signings, starting with a reprise on November 7 in Southport (refer to the November area events section of The Runner).

Visit <https://www.chrisfonvielle.com/> for updates on Dr. Fonvielle's books and events and to get in touch with him.

Brunswick Civil War Round Table

The Beefsteak Raid, or Cattle Raid, was part of the Siege of Petersburg in September, 1864, when 3,000 Confederate troops trekked 100 miles to attack 3,000 head of cattle. Why? They were running out of food.

This incredible phase of the war entitled “The Beefsteak Raid at Petersburg” will be discussed by popular historian, author, and lecturer, Will Greene, at the Tuesday, November 5th meeting. Registration begins at 6:15PM. The program starts at 7:00PM. The visitor fee is $10, and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues, which can include a spouse.

October 2024 | Volume 2 | Number 10

Dear Members of the CFCWRT:

As we transition into fall, we find ourselves in a season of reflection and renewal. The cooler air reminds us of the many autumns past, where our ancestors walked the same land, facing their own challenges and uncertainties during the Civil War. While we often look to history for perspective, recent events in our state have brought us a different kind of struggle.

The recent flooding in western North Carolina has been a reminder of nature's unpredictable power. Our thoughts are with those affected by this disaster, and we hope for swift recovery and support for the impacted communities. As we continue to explore and discuss the history of this region, we also remain mindful of the present and the resilience of those around us.

Thank you for your continued dedication to preserving and sharing the history we all cherish. I look forward to seeing you at our next meeting.

Warm regards,

Matthew Howell

President's Report

By: Yelena Howell

Thank you for your confidence in us and welcome to our 2024-2025 program year!

Dear members and friends,

We appreciate your support of our newly elected Executive Committee and those who continue with us as sustaining leaders in every area of operations of our round table. From day one, our top priority is upholding the greatest good of our organization and nurturing the next generation of officers who will assume the reins in 1-2 years, after our terms are up. As a fellow American, I am truly honored to assume the responsibilities of CFCWRT presidency for this year and, possibly, for one more year beyond our 2024-2025 season.

May the example of America's most celebrated leader, George Washington, continue to inspire each of us to lead from where we are:

"He was not a brilliant strategist or tactician, not a gifted orator, not an intellectual. At several critical moments he had shown marked indecision. He had made serious mistakes in judgment. But experience had been his great teacher from boyhood, and in his greatest test, he learned steadily from experience." (McCullough, David. 1776. Simon and Schuster, 2005, p. 293).

Immediate Past President Bill Jayne, Vice President Chris Langlois and I, along with the rest of our think and action tank, welcome your feedback and involvement at any time. Are you inclined toward accounting or media production? Do you enjoy writing? Does the idea of more field trips excite you? Please let us know, and we will connect with you deeper so that you can give it a try. Keep in touch by email at CapeFearRT@gmail.com or text me at (910) 431-6102. Things are what we make them—"let's go"!

Warm regards,

Yelena

Our thoughts are with our neighbors affected by severe weather this September. If you are able, would you consider a donation to the American Red Cross, Samaritan Purse, Catholic Charities USA, Episcopal Relief & Development, or another organization of your choice? At our October meeting and by other arrangement, Yelena will gratefully accept physical items like canned foods, especially with tabs for easy opening, baby and adult diapers and wipes, Lysol wipes, hand sanitizer, and packs of heavy-duty trash bags. These will be donated to reputable local relief efforts to be batched and transported to areas in need. Thank you for your ongoing caring concern for our region.

Membership Report

By: Kim Berger

After the August gathering was canceled due to the inclement weather, we enjoyed our September meeting hosting Author/Editor/Publisher Ted Savas.

We had 56 participants in attendance during this presentation which introduced us to new material about George Washington Rains and the Augusta Powder Works Factory. Members, new and old, voted on the new slate of officers.

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table welcomed new members Eric & Susan VanCamp, Paul Johnson, Hugh Daughtry, and Dr. MaryBeth Allison, historian. We also had several guests who we are hoping will join us next month as members.

Thirteen members renewed their annual memberships.

Thank you all for your patience with me as I adjust to the new role of Membership Chair. I appreciate all the guidance and support as I grow within the role at the Round Table.

Sincerely,

Kim

George Washington Rains & Confederate Strategy

By: Bill Jayne

On September 12, 2024, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table met for a momentous meeting that marked the end of the club's 29th year of operation and saw the first election of officers in the history of the group. There were 56 people in attendance including 48 members (counting spouses) who voted in five new officers and five at-large members of the Executive Committee.

Elected as president was Yelena B. Howell, energetic, hard-working, devoted to the history of the region and full of new ideas to maintain and improve the health of the round table. She will be a great president.

Vice president is Chris Langlois, Fred Claridge is secretary/historian, Mike McDonald is the treasurer and William Jordan is the quartermaster.

They will each serve a one-year term. The president and vice president may run for an additional term but the bylaws limit them to a maximum of two one-year terms. That is, they are limited to two years in each office. The other three officers are not term-limited.

In addition to the five officers, the Executive Committee comprises five at-large members and the immediate past president as an ex-officio member. Thus, there are 11 members of the Executive Committee. Bill Jayne is the immediate past president and the five at-large members are Al Turner, Jim Gannon, Kim Berger, Roman Berger and Tom O'Connor.

Immediately after the election, Bill Jayne turned the meeting over to the new president, Yelena Howell, and she introduced our dynamic and engaging speaker of the evening, Ted Savas.

Ted is a lawyer who has become a full-time historian and publisher. His company, Savas Beatie, specializes in Civil War books. The provocative title of his talk was "Handshakes, Gambling and Gunpowder: How George Washington Rains and Jefferson Davis Changed the Course of the Civil War."

Ted has been researching the story of George W. Rains for more than 40 years and co-authored the 2007 book Never for Want of Powder about Rains' Augusta Powder Mill. Ted has noted that "George Washington Rains is the most important personality of the Civil War you've probably never heard of. Without him, there would have been no long and bloody war, no Vicksburg or Gettysburg, and Robert E. Lee would be but a footnote in history. Abraham Lincoln would have completed his second term (if there was one), and U. S. Grant would have never reached the White House.

“Rains organized, built, and operated the only major gunpowder factory in the Confederacy--a two-mile complex that enabled the South to fight for four long years. Its internal daily records, coupled with Rains' private writings, reveal stunning facts unknown to nearly every historian who has written on the war. From this day forth, you will never look at Union strategy and command decisions the same way.”

Early in the war President Jefferson Davis realized the Confederacy's need to supply its own gunpowder. Accordingly Davis selected Col. George Washington Rains, an 1842 graduate of West Point, to build a gunpowder factory. In their Army careers, Rains and Davis had met several times including frontier duty at Ft. Gibson, Indian Territory. Rains, a native of New Bern, N.C., was the younger brother of Confederate General Gabriel Rains who became the architect of the Confederacy's mine warfare program.

George Rains had resigned his U.S. Army commission in 1856 and married the wealthy Frances Ramsdell in New York. He then ran the Washington Iron Works in Newburgh, N.Y., an important industrial facility located very close to West Point. An engineer and accomplished chemist, he relied primarily on a written pamphlet rather than on practical experience in building the powder mill, yet he succeeded in designing a model of efficiency and safety. He sited the facilities at Augusta, Georgia, because of the city's central location, canal transportation, access to water power, railroad facilities, and relative security from attack.

Today a lone chimney along the Savannah River stands as the only reminder of the munitions facility that once occupied that site.

Walking constantly and working entirely from memory, Ted Savas unreeled a story of constant improvisation and adjustment as Rains, Davis and others such as Confederate Ordnance Bureau chief, General Josiah Gorgas, worked tirelessly to mask Confederate gunpowder shortages in 1861 as they built the new powder mill in Augusta, Ga.

In early 1862 Union victories at Forts Henry and Donelson cracked open the Confederate cordon and made the two modest gunpowder mills in Tennessee untenable. Ted contended that shortages of powder rendered the Confederacy exceedingly vulnerable at that point but the Union's strategic deficiencies and dysfunctional military command structure failed to realize the Confederacy's critical vulnerability and act on it. By mid 1862 the Augusta powder mill had kicked in and went on to provide 95 percent of all the gunpowder used by the Confederacy in the course of the war.

Ted then turned to the ending campaigns of the war and brought up the question of why Union General William T. Sherman led his army to Savannah instead of toward the strategically critical target of the Augusta powder mill. After the fall of Atlanta, Sherman focused on Hood's Confederate army, which was moving west and north back toward Chattanooga, and then after detaching a powerful force under General George Thomas to deal with Hood, he prepared his force for the demanding march to the sea.

Hood abandoned Atlanta on September 1, 1864 and Sherman began his march to the sea on November 15. Sherman's 62,000-man army reached Savannah on December 21, 1864. Ted Savas contended that the Augusta mill was eminently vulnerable during all that time and that its fall to Union forces would have effectively ended the Confederacy's ability to supply its forces with the copious amounts of gunpowder needed to sustain the war.

Ted has written: "Rains and other Confederate authorities had no way of knowing that Sherman would feint at Macon and Augusta to divide the paltry number of Rebel soldiers available to oppose him, and then drive through the yawning gap to link up with the Union Navy at Savannah. That decision was the biggest strategic mistake of his career, and he would repeat the same mistake under nearly the exact same circumstances three months later. The consequences would lengthen the war by months and increase the casualty lists by many tens of thousands of men."

Sherman, Ted Savas and others have noted, was more focused on avoiding guerrilla warfare and ending southern resistance by demonstrating the inability of Confederate forces to defend against the armies of the Union. Members of the round table were energized and fascinated by this creative presentation and asked many questions graciously answered by our speaker.

Next month will focus on a look back at 30 years of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and a glimpse of the bright future of the club. See you on October 10!

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table to Celebrate 30th Year

By: Bill Jayne

Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) was established in 1994 and to mark the 30th anniversary of the founding of the club, the round table is hosting a special event to look back on its history. As members of the round table, you've heard by now of the special dinner meeting to be held at Indochine Restaurant on October 10.

The event is open to members only but it will be back to "business as usual" in November. John Quarstein, an extraordinary speaker and one of the nation's premier historians of Civil War maritime history, will be the speaker on November 14, talking about the Battle of Mobile Bay and Confederate Admiral Franklin Buchanan, who was perhaps the most aggressive senior naval officer to join the Confederate Navy.

The Civil War Round Table movement began in Chicago in 1941. Civil War Round Tables (also referred to as Roundtables or CWRTs) are independent organizations that share a common objective in promoting and expanding interest in the study of the military, political and sociological history of the American Civil War. There are hundreds of such organizations throughout the U.S., with some in other countries as well.

Here in the Lower Cape Fear, the first president of Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table was George Slaton who led the organization until the year 2000. George, who now lives in the Davidson, NC, area, recalls that an organization called the Civil War Round Table Associates met in Wilmington in the summer of 1993. The organization was founded and led by legendary battlefield preservationist and Civil War activist, Jerry Russell, and their primary purpose was to encourage Civil War Round Tables to get involved in battlefield preservation.

The Wilmington event included a workshop on "How to Start a Civil War Round Table." That workshop motivated George and others to establish a round table in Wilmington. Contributing to the momentum was Civil War publisher Ted Savas and prospective authors Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley. Ted, then leading the publishing company of Savas Woodbury, first published Chris Fonvielle's The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, and Mark Bradley's The Battle of Bentonville: Last Stand in the Carolinas. George Slaton noted "It was a momentous weekend!"

It took some time to get rolling and the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table first met at the University of North Carolina, Wilmington (UNCW) in October 1994. The first speaker was Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Ph.D., who later joined the faculty of UNCW. Professor Fonvielle, now retired, is the premier historian of the Lower Cape Fear from Colonial times through the Civil War. Following George Slaton, Professor Fonvielle led the CFCWRT from 2000 through 2006. The meeting site changed from UNCW to St. John's Episcopal Church and then to St. Andrew's on the Sound Episcopal Church. Under the leadership of David Norris (2006-10) and Bob Cooke (2010 to 2018), the organization grew steadily and many nationally known speakers and authors spoke to the group as well as accomplished local historians.

From 1997 through 2005 the organization featured tours to locations such as Richmond and its vicinity, Sharpsburg, Md., and Spotsylvania County, Va. From 2006 through 2011 tours were shortened to locations in North Carolina that could be reached within a day rather than requiring overnight travel. Today, the round table features opportunities focused on local attractions such as the Wilmington Railroad Museum, a great attraction that preserves the history of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, the lifeline that connected the south's last blockade running port with the Army of Northern Virginia. Dr. Fonvielle has led many tours for the round table including a hike through the maritime forest to discover the earthworks of the "Sugar Loaf Line," a boat tour on the Cape Fear River and an evening tour of Ft. Fisher that ended well after dark looking out on the ocean as "friendly enemies," heroes of the 1865 battle, Col. William Lamb, CSA, and Brigadier General Newton Martin Curtis, USA, did in 1893.

The CFCWRT is actively involved in supporting Fort Fisher and Fort Anderson, the NC Historical Sites in the area, the J. Ryder Lewis historical park in Carolina Beach, as well as the NC Maritime Museum in Southport. We have also featured speakers from the Latimer House, the museum of the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society, in Wilmington.

Beginning in 2018, the round table moved to Harbor Church in Wilmington and then back to St. John's Episcopal Church in midtown Wilmington. Bill Jayne was been president of the club from 2018 and saw it through the devastating Hurricane Florence in 2018 and the COVID phenomenon. As of 2024, the round table has more members than it did in 2018.

The October dinner meeting will feature brief remarks by all of the five past presidents of the round table. The Civil War Round Table movement began as both an educational and social event always centered on dinner as well as a speaker. Over the years, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has hosted many dinner meetings. For example, in October 1997, distinguished historian and author Craig Symonds spoke about Patrick Cleburne, "The Stonewall of the West," at a dinner meeting at the Cape Fear Club.

Not only does this year mark a significant chronological milestone, in the 2023-24 "campaign" year, members of the club developed the first set of written bylaws to govern the round table, including rules for electing new officers every year. Those bylaws were approved at the May 2024 meeting.

At our September 2024 meeting, members elected new officers, at-large members of an executive committee and set the group on a course for sustained excellence in programs, tours and educational endeavors.

Dramatizing the historic first of electing officers, the new president of the round table is Yelena Howell, our first woman president! As the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table embarks on its 31st year, all systems are go.

Brunswick Civil War Round Table

“Closing Down the Kingdom: The Wilmington Campaign” is the title of popular local historian Chris Fonvielle’s presentation to be held at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach on Tuesday, October 1st .

Registration begins at 6:15PM, and the program starts at 7:00PM. Everyone is welcome. The visitor fee is $10, and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues, which can include a spouse.

Chris will discuss Union military operations to capture, and Confederate efforts to defend, Wilmington, the South’s main seaport and most important city by late 1864. This will include the two battles for Fort Fisher which were the largest U.S. Navy bombardments of the Civil War.

By capturing Wilmington, the Union blockade was complete, and it gave General Sherman’s forces a base of supply and a route to the sea. Just months later the Civil War was declared over.

Chris is a prolific author, tour guide, and professor emeritus in the History Dept. at UNCW. He is a native of Wilmington with a lifelong interest in history, including the Civil War, North Carolina, and the Cape Fear region.

For more information, contact president John Butler at (404) 229-9425, or email to him at Brunswickcwr@gmail.com.

Wreaths Across America

Our CWRT actively supports the Wilmington Community effort to cover over 5,200 graves at the Wilmington National Cemetery with a Christmas wreath each year.

Our organizational goal is some 75 wreaths. Our CWRT has met or exceeded that modest goal in all but one of the previous campaigns. Of interest, to our membership is that, in addition to contributing to the ILM goal, each wreath garners $.50 to our CWRT treasury. Each wreath is only $17 or five for $85 (the most popular, nation-wide purchase).

Please give your personal check to Kim Jordan, in multiples of $17, made out to Wreaths Across America and she will do the rest. Better still, save Kim the task of forwarding your check to Maine, by just using your credit card at the CFCWRT web site, As the instructions say, click on the WAA picture and make your purchase.

Your efforts and generosity are sincerely appreciated.

If you prefer to sponsor a wreath online, here is CFCWRT's 2024 link:

CFCWRT Members Enjoy Gettysburg Field Trip

By: Bill Jayne

Five Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) members and two guests took advantage of a gracious invitation from the Cleveland (OH) CWRT to participate in their annual field trip to a Civil War battlefield. This year, from September 19th to the 22nd, the destination was the king of Civil War battlefields, Gettysburg.

Approximately 70 participants began the weekend with a Thursday evening get-together at the Comfort Suites right on Baltimore Pike near the Gettysburg Visitors Center. Former Cleveland CWRT President Bob Pence, the organizer of this year's tour, handed out name tags and in-depth information packets and then presented a very professional program on the prelude to the Battle of Gettysburg.

Bob did an amazing job organizing this trip, beginning with regular emails starting in December. He provided Gettysburg reading lists, links to informative video presentations and interesting facts, as well as keeping track of all the minutiae of meal choices and financial details.

The spiral bound notebook provided to participants is a great reference work that I will keep on my shelf along with my Gettysburg books. In addition to the schedule and a list of participants, detailed maps and an order of battle were included.

The order of battle details every regiment and battery, it provides "Engaged Strength," killed, wounded, captured/missing and percentage of loss down to the brigade level. Want to know which Army of Northern Virginia brigade suffered the highest percentage loss in the three-day battle? With a percentage loss of 65.2 percent of its engaged strength, Iverson's all North Carolina brigade of Rodes' Division in Ewell's II Corps, had the greatest loss.

Friday, September 20, dawned perfectly clear and sunny and temperatures eventually reached the neighborhood of 90 but it was a beautiful—if warm—day to visit the Seminary Ridge Museum, climb to the cupola of the historic Lutheran Seminary and look out to the west in the same way Union Cavalry General John Buford did on July 1, 1863.

We then toured Seminary Ridge and in the afternoon continued on to McPherson Ridge, Oak Knoll, Barlow Knoll and ending up on East Cemetery Hill where the remnants of the Union I and XI corps retreated to be joined by Hancock's I Corps and Slocum's XII Corps.

Highly knowledgeable and experienced guide Jon Thompson brought us through an informative day that ended with a moving talk and rendition of Taps at the Soldiers National Cemetery.

Saturday, September 21, was cloudy and cooler. Although we missed the beautiful long views stretching west to the mountains, the cooler temperatures were welcome. With Jon Thompson as our guide, we started at Little Round Top, went down to the Wheatfield and then to the Peach Orchard, where General Robert E. Lee's plan to find the left flank of the Union army and attack along that axis was abundantly clear.

The failure, also abundantly clear, was that poor reconnaissance caused confusion about the location of the left flank of the Army of the Potomac. The view from the Peach Orchard shines a bright light on the murk of the second day of the Battle of Gettysburg. A brief but informative stop on Culp's Hill brought the morning tour to a close.

Crossing the field of Pickett's Charge

The afternoon, after another convenient and tasty box lunch from Jersey Mike's, was devoted to the fighting on July 3, especially Pickett's Charge. All of the CFCWRT stalwarts, along with most of the tour participants, bused to Seminary Ridge and the Virginia Memorial and then walked across the fields of Pickett's Charge.

Saturday evening brought one of the great highlights of the tour, a catered dinner at the Gettysburg Visitors Center. Imagine having the Visitors Center all to yourself with a viewing of the National Park Service movie about Gettysburg, narrated by Morgan Freeman, an unhurried and uncrowded view of the incomparable cyclorama and time to take in all of the museum.

Sunday morning, before returning home, we visited the Spangler Farm, a beautifully preserved and restored property owned by the Gettysburg Foundation. Perfectly located between the Taneytown Road and the Baltimore Pike, it became the XI Corps Field Hospital. The barn, where operations occurred, the farm house, and the summer kitchen, where Confederate General Lewis Armistead died, are pristine and the program is memorable and informative.

CFCWRT participants were Christina Grazer, Drew Peck, Tom Piech, John Bolger, Sr. and Bill Jayne. Guests John Bolger, Jr., and Joe Roman also enjoyed the tour.

We don't know where Cleveland's tour is headed next year, but I'm ready to sign up!

The Destruction of Civil War Sites Through Metal Detecting

By: Patrick H. Garrow, RPA

Most of us who are interested in Civil War history are aware of the continuing loss of Civil War battlefields, forts, and camp sites to development. What most are not aware of is the increasing lost opportunity to understand Civil War sites through metal detecting by hobbyists or looters. Civil War fortifications and landscapes are only part of the picture to understanding what went on within a Civil War site. Documentary history exists for most larger scale battles, and letters, drawings, and secondary histories provide insights into camp life and what at least some men on both sides faced daily. None of those sources provide a full, detailed account of what went on within a battle or the details of everyday life in both armies.

Removing artifacts from any archaeological site without proper recordation and maintenance of the chain of custody of the artifacts destroys part or in many cases all the information that site contains. It is important to think of every Civil War site as a unique book that contains information that can be important to understanding the past. Metal detection of that site and removing its metal artifacts can be tantamount to burning that book.

Those of us who have studied aspects of Civil War history in detail understand the biased or incomplete nature of documentary history. Official accounts and even the letters and diaries of those responsible for the historic record were often based on an incomplete understanding of the events they recorded. This was sometimes due to the fog of war or simply the inability to see beyond the small part of the event they observed. Accounts were often written to glorify the roles of the writers or to defend their mistakes.

The artifacts left behind by those who took part in a battle or lived on a campsite are often the only evidence through which an unbiased and more complete account of what occurred can be reconstructed. That ability no longer exists in cases where the artifacts have been removed. Systematic metal detecting in the hands of an expert can reveal the configuration of a Civil War camp and identification of the soldiers who occupied it, as well as the state of supply at a precise moment in time. Metal detecting on Civil War battlefields can yield important information on troop movements during the battle and the exact avenues of attacks and defenses during the battle.

This author was based in Atlanta for many years as a professional archaeologist and investigated numerous Civil War sites. Those sites all had one unfortunate trait in common. Each site had been so completely metal detected by hobbyists or looters that they almost completely lacked metal artifacts. Fortifications survived in some cases, but the artifact content of the sites did not. There is no way to capture the information that has already been lost on Civil War sites. That loss is being increased every weekend through unregulated metal detecting on both private and public land. It is time we recognize the destruction of information on those sites and take steps to educate the public about this unfortunate problem.

Two Haunting Photos from the Franklin Battlefield

By: Jim Gannon

Several civil war soldiers describe battles in which the bullets flew so thick that men bent forward as if they were walking into a rainstorm or a hail storm. This photo seems to illustrate how many bullets could be flying, almost randomly, about a Civil War battlefield.

The sunlight is shining through bullet holes made by Confederate fire. I took this photo from inside the farm office building at the Carter House on the Franklin Battlefield in Tennessee. This one room wooden building is just a few yards behind the Union line. There were about fifty or sixty yards between the opposing troops at this point on the line. The Union line consisted of shallow trenches hurriedly dug by the retreating Union forces after an all night forced march.

The Union force of roughly 27,000 men under Major General John Schofield was retreating as fast as possible toward Nashville, where prepared positions and more Union forces would welcome them.

However, the Union troops were delayed several hours at Franklin while a bridge was being repaired and that delay allowed the following Confederate Army of Tennessee to force a battle. Confederate General John Bell Hood who commanded roughly as many troops as Schofield was desperate to destroy this Union force separately before it could combine with the other Union forces in Nashville. So the Confederates attacked this line head on about 4PM and, unusual for the Civil War, kept on attacking in the darkness.

In the end, the Confederate attacks proved a disaster, as the Confederates suffered ruinous casualties that the South could never hope to replace, and during the night when the bridge was ready, Schofield's troops made the orderly withdrawal to Nashville that he intended.

The photo also calls to mind the remarks Heros von Borcke, a Prussian Army officer, who served with distinction on J. E. B. Stuart's staff. In his memoirs, Heros expressed his strong conviction that most casualties were caused by bullets aimed at someone other than the person who was hit.

Perhaps that was a bit of self delusion to justify what sometimes seemed like courage to the point of foolhardiness by Borcke and many other Civil War Officers who exposed themselves to enemy fire in order to inspire their troops. Nevertheless, the bullet holes all over the house suggest that Borcke could be right. In any event, the Confederate Officers at Franklin clearly led from the front.

Fourteen Confederate Generals became casualties (six killed, seven wounded and one captured.) Above is a photo of the back porch at the Carnton home where on the morning of December 1, 1864 lay the bodies of four Confederate Generals (Patrick Cleburne, Hiram Granbury, John Adams and Otho Strahl) while some of their troops said a final goodbye.

If you get the opportunity, it is a very haunting place to visit.

American Battlefield Trust Recommended Reading List

The American Battlefield Trust recently announced a recommended reading list for both the Revolutionary War and the American Civil War. The Civil War books, many of which have been available at our monthly raffle, includes the Trusts first-ever book prize for exceptional works of history and biography.

In no particular order, except for the Trust's exceptional works recognition of Elizabeth Varon's Longstreet:

Longstreet: The Confederate General Who Defied the South* by Elizabeth Varon

The American Heritage History of the Civil War* by Bruce Catton

The Battle Cry of Freedom* by James McPherson (Pulitzer Prize)

The Civil War: A Narrative* by Shelby Foote (Three volumes)

The Army of the Potomac* by Bruce Catton (Three volumes)

The American Battlefield Trust, successor to The Civil War Trust, The Civil War Battlefield Trust and others similar organizations is the leader in saving America's history and hallowed ground. In addition to preserving forever over 58,000 acres of battlefield land, member commitment makes possible all aspects of the Trusts mission to preserve, educate and inspire. The Trust deserves your active support.

September 2024 | Volume 2 | Number 9

Dear Members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table,

I am deeply honored to have been entrusted with the responsibility of serving as your newsletter editor. This role is a privilege, and I look forward to continuing the tradition of excellence that has defined our organization.

I want to extend my heartfelt thanks to Fred Claridge, our previous editor, whose dedication, wisdom, and hard work have been invaluable. Fred has set a high standard, and I am grateful for his support as I step into this role.

Thank you for your confidence in me. I look forward to serving you and contributing to our shared passion for history.

Warm regards,

Matthew Howell

Editor, Cape Fear Civil War Round Table Newsletter

President's Report

By: Bill Jayne

I have had the privilege and honor to preside over more than 60 meetings of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table since 2018. It has been an honor to be in the company of previous presidents including George Slaton, Dr. Chris Fonvielle, David Norris and Bob Cooke.

I have not regularly submitted a "President's Report" for The Runner, rather choosing to only write such a report when there was something of more than routine import to communicate. This report is such a case.

In the past year we have developed and adopted bylaws to govern our round table in the future. Of most importance, I think, we have adopted rules to govern the orderly transition of leadership to new officers every year.

We will have five officers: President, Vice President, Secretary/Historian, Treasurer and Quartermaster. All will serve one-year terms. The president and vice president are limited to only two consecutive terms. The other three officers are not limited to a specific number of terms.

As the first order of business at our September meeting, we will elect the new officers for the 2024-25 term. We will also elect the at-large members of our inaugural executive committee. The executive committee will comprise the five officers, the immediate past president, and five at-large members. As immediate past president, I will serve as a member of the 11-person Executive Committee. An ad-hoc nominating committee has agreed on a slate of officers and executive committee members to put before the membership of the round table.

PRESIDENT: The nominee is Yelena Howell, our current Director of Tours and Trips. She has proven herself to be a most loyal, dependable and effective member of the round table. She is energetic, creative, and personable. Yelena Howell (Mrs. Matt) is a mother of three and a proud U.S. citizen of approximately two decades. Matt Howell, a native of eastern North Carolina, will be taking over the editorship of our newsletter.

Yelena hails from northern Russia, although the happiest days of her childhood passed in the Crimea and Mariupol, Ukraine. She holds a Bachelor of Arts degree in French Literature with a History minor and a Master of Science in Educational Psychology from the University of Tennessee.

She is also a certificated commercial pilot and flight instructor and a registered nurse of 16 years currently pursuing a doctorate in the Family Nurse Practitioner program at UNCW. Lena, as friends call her, loves field trips and is an impassioned student of Southern history and literature. Her simple motto is "let's go!" I thank her for her support and help during my term as president and I thank her for volunteering to serve as our first elected president. She will make a wonderful president.

VICE PRESIDENT: Chris Langlois has quickly become a valued member of the round table team. He has stepped in to assist with any job needed, especially with set-up of the meeting room, raffles and book sales.

He is a native of Jeanerette, Louisiana, who has worked at several important public safety and emergency management posts around the country. He started as a firefighter and has risen in the ranks to public safety director.

Among other professional accomplishments, Chris is a graduate of the Executive Fire Officer Program at the National Fire Academy, has a bachelor's degree in Public Fire Administration from Upper Iowa University and a master's degree in Executive Fire Service Leadership from Grand Canyon University, and holds numerous certifications from the International Fire Service Accreditation Congress. His interest in history goes back to ancestors who fought in the Civil War.

SECRETARY/HISTORIAN: Fred Claridge has been editor of our newsletter, The Runner, for more than a year. He has done an excellent job, putting out an informative, interesting newsletter that is timely and reliable. Like Chris Langlois, Fred has had a distinguished career in emergency medical and public safety services.

Fred grew up in Falls Church, Virginia, and is a graduate of Atlantic Christian College (now Barton College) in Wilson, N.C. He is retired but he worked in increasingly important jobs in EMS in North Carolina, Kentucky, and California, including director of emergency medical services for two large counties in Northern California. His bachelors degree was in History and he is a dedicated volunteer at the Bentonville State Historic Site as well as with our round table.

TREASURER: Mike McDonald, a Harvard graduate with a degree in economics, has been doing a great job as treasurer and has agreed to stay on for at least one more term. He provides the leadership of the round table with a wealth of pertinent information about our finances and membership trends. A native of Maryland, Mike said he grew up thinking "damn Yankee" was one word.

QUARTERMASTER: William Jordan is a digital creator who is a reenactor cook par excellence. He specializes in camp cooking from the 18th and 19th centuries and reenacts a sutler named "W. C. Pag."

William has spoiled the round table membership with his cooking at past meetings as well as presenting an informative program about sutlers. He has also successfully run our raffle program for the past year, adding very importantly to our budget.

William's wife, Kim, is an active member of the round table, too, directing our Wreaths Across America program. Son, David, is also an avid reenactor and has given the membership informative programs about drum calls.

By: Bill Jayne

To recap, the slate of officers recommended for election is:

President: Yelena Howell

Vice President: Chris Langlois

Secretary/Historian: Fred Claridge

Treasurer: Mike McDonald

Quartermaster: William Jordan

We will also be electing five at-large members of the Executive Committee. The Executive Committee comprises the five elected officers plus five elected directors, plus the immediate past President, for a total of up to eleven members. The Executive Committee is responsible for conducting the business of the Round Table and will report to the membership as required. Perhaps the most important function of the Executive Committee is to serve as the Nominating Committee. The Executive Committee will also have oversight over functional activities of the round table such as Membership, Program, Tours, Newsletter, etc.

The nominees for at-large members of the Executive Committee are:

Al Turner – our current Vice President.

Jim Gannon – leader of our Program function, which selects and works with our speakers.

Kim Berger – our Membership chair.

Roman Berger – our Audio-Visual Chief.

Tom O'Connor – a graduate of the USMA at West Point, Tom has been an active member of the round table.

I need to take some time to try to appropriately thank Colonel Bruce E. Patterson, U.S. Army (ret.). Most recently, Bruce has been the secretary of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table as well as membership director. I don't think I would have made it through my six-year term as president without Bruce's great leadership, support, guidance and assistance. Moreover, I've been greatly blessed to have had the opportunity to get to know him better and count him as a friend.

Born on December 13, 1930, Bruce marked his 90th birthday a few years ago with a family get-together facilitated by Zoom, a technology that even Dick Tracy couldn't have imagined in 1930 (actually, the comic strip detective with his wrist radio, etc., didn't make his debut until 1931).

In addition to his current duties as secretary and membership director, Bruce has been our treasurer at times, functioned as the key liaison with our speakers, facilitating their visits to Wilmington and their remote presentations when that was necessary. He is also a key volunteer for several other endeavors including the Southeast North Carolina Military Officers Association, the Remembering our Military Heroes group, Wreaths Across America, the N.C. Military Historical Society and the Wilmington Philatelic Society.

Originally from New York City, Bruce grew up in a small town in Western Massachusetts and joined the U.S. Army in 1948 after graduating from high school. He graduated from Officers Candidate School in 1951 and was commissioned in the Field Artillery, which was fitting since his father was a Coast Artilleryman who served in France in World War I. Bruce also counts Civil War veterans among his ancestors and perhaps that helps account, in part, for his interest and expertise in history.

Bruce went on to a distinguished career in the Army, retiring as a Colonel in 1979. He was inducted into the Hall of Fame of the OCS Alumni Organization. He holds an MBA from George Washington University and is a graduate of the Command and General Staff College, the Armed Forces Staff College and the Army War College.

With election of our new slate of officers and Executive Committee members, Bruce will step down from his various posts and enjoy the camaraderie and conviviality of our club. Best wishes, Bruce, and many thanks.

Membership Report

By: Bruce Patterson

In what became my penultimate membership report, I noted that we had a renewal challenge awaiting us in August and I fully expected to receive several, if not many renewals at the August meeting.

As you are all aware, the August meeting never occurred, thanks to a storm called Debby. I am pleased to report however, that we received 14 renewals during the period and while that number is short of our goal, it is a substantial number, given the circumstances.

Our next meeting is 12 September and our Treasurer, Mike McDonald will be most happy to receive both August and September renewals that evening. If in doubt as to your renewal month, just check your name tag. Your renewal month appears at the bottom of the tag.

As always, you may mail your $30 renewal to CFCWRT 8387 E Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or you may renew online if that is more convenient.

As was announced in last month's Runner and effective at our next meeting, member Kim Berger will be assuming the duties associated with the Membership Chair. Her resume is solid, and she is far more charming than myself. In short, it's been a fun run, and I thank you all for your cooperation, indeed, your round table membership. I plan to remain active in round table activities.

Bruce Patterson

Tropical Storm Debby Cancels August Meeting

In early August, the National Weather Service predicted the “potential for Extreme Flooding Rain across all of northeast South Carolina and southeast North Carolina” because of Tropical Storm Debby. “Life-threatening flash flooding” and “tropical storm force winds” were also in the forecast. Local governments closed their offices and warned residents of the Lower Cape Fear to stay home on August 8, when our meeting was scheduled.

In light of the forecast, I decided to cancel the regularly scheduled meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table on Thursday evening, August 8. Hopefully, all our members and friends were made aware of the fact that the meeting had been cancelled. As it turned out, the storm had little serious impact in our area and that’s a good thing. I hope everyone is safe.

We were planning to elect new officers at the August meeting but, instead, election of officers will be the first order of business at our September 12 meeting.

The August meeting was to feature the third session in our summer Members Forum series. Titled “Generalship: Theory and Substance,” this audience-participation program was to have been presented by round table member John Weisz, a West Point graduate and retired U.S. Army officer.

The presentation has been re-scheduled for December 2024. John will describe the characteristics of successful generals in the Civil War. He will bring the audience into the study of campaigns through practical exercises. Teams will form and will be provided with the information needed by the commander and several options as to which maneuver to execute. The audience will not be provided with the identity of the generals and where the engagements were fought ahead of the exercise but, by the end, will surely be able to determine who and where. Looking forward to the program in December!

Wreaths Across America

Wreaths Across America - that annual Wilmington community-wide effort, to place a Christmas wreath on every Christian grave located within our Wilmington National Cemetery (some 5200 wreaths).

Our Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has been a part of that effort for the past decade and have contributed greatly to the success of the community effort. We planned to begin our campaign a month earlier than usual, but a storm called Debbie thought differently, thus our inaugural 2024 effort begins at our September 12th meeting.

Please consider contributing to this worthy effort by purchasing a wreath, priced at only $17 each. We can accept your personal check made out to Wreaths Across America (WAA) or cash. Many members purchase a package of 5 wreaths at $85. Recall please that our round table receives $5 for every sponsored wreath, thus this effort also becomes a fund-raising benefit for us as well.

Please see members Kim Jordan or Bruce Patterson at the next meeting to make your contribution.

September Meeting Features Jefferson Davis, George W. Rains, and the Confederate Gunpowder Strategy

Our Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites all members and friends to attend the first meeting of our 2024–25 “Campaign” year. This year marks the significant milestone of 30 years of learning about the history of the Civil War through stimulating, entertaining presentations by some of the foremost Civil War historians in the country. As usual, the meeting will be held on Thursday evening, September 12, at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Fittingly, our first speaker this campaign year is Theodore P. “Ted” Savas. A native of northern Iowa, Ted has a B.A. in history, most of a Masters, and a Juris Doctorate (with Honors) from the University of Iowa College of Law. He practiced law for many years in Silicon Valley, taught adjunct college classes in history, business, and politics for 20 years, and has been a full-time publisher and writer since 1990.

An organization called the Civil War Round Table Associates met in Wilmington in the summer of 1993 and Ted was one of the speakers at the conference. That conference became the catalyst for the establishment of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table in 1994.

Ted has authored many books as well as publishing literally hundreds of important military history studies. He is the owner of Savas-Beatie Publishing. He was one of the authors of Never for Want of Powder: The Confederate Powder Works in Augusta, Georgia, with co-authors C. L. Bragg, Gordon A. Blaker, Charles D. Ross, and Stephanie A. T. Jacobe.

We have all been taught to believe Confederate President Jefferson Davis made a significant strategic mistake during the first year of the war by choosing to defend nearly every square mile of Confederate territory, and that this mistake helped doom the Confederacy. This strategy is known as the “Perimeter Defense.” The Union, of course, famously adopted the “Anaconda Plan” devised by chief Union general Winfield Scott. Scott’s plan called for a naval blockade of the south coupled with a powerful joint Army–Navy offensive down the Mississippi River.

While controlling the waters along the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, the United States sought to defend the line of the Ohio River in the north and gain control of the Mississippi River in the west and then invade the south at key points to end the rebellion. In a letter to Major General George B. McClellan, Lt. General Scott said his strategy aimed “to envelop the insurgent states and bring them to terms with less bloodshed than any other plan.” Should the plan to open the Mississippi to U.S. control fail, General Scott foresaw the necessity of conquering “the seceding states by invading armies.” His prediction, of course, was right on point.

The U.S. Army Center for Military History states: “in 1861 the geographic situation appeared to favor the South. Borrowing from the antebellum U.S. Army system, Davis divided the Confederacy into eight departments. He dispersed his military forces around the Confederacy’s perimeter in the hope that the sheer size of the new nation would work in its favor by making it difficult for Federal commanders to coordinate multiple thrusts into Southern territory. The Southerners planned to counter Federal offensives by transferring troops from unthreatened areas to reinforce any department under attack. A successful defense of Confederate borders would demonstrate that the new nation could protect its sovereignty, increasing its chances of international recognition.”

According to Ted Savas, it is demonstrably false to blame the loss of the war on Davis’s Perimeter Defense Strategy, and a significant body of objective evidence proves it. Davis’s vision and decision-making were well-reasoned and much more successful than even he believed possible.

Ted links Davis’s success to the immensely significant but generally unknown Confederate Colonel George Washington Rains, one of the two “Bomb Brothers.” George Rains was a native of New Bern, N.C., who graduated from West Point and became an officer in the U.S. Army. He was always fascinated by chemistry and became a noted expert on chemistry, including a stint as an assistant professor at West Point. After U.S. service that included combat in the Seminole Wars in Florida and the War with Mexico, he left the Army and became proprietor of an iron works in New York’s Hudson Valley, manufacturing steam engines and boilers. His older brother, Gabriel, also graduated from West Point and went on to become a Confederate general in charge of the Confederacy’s mine program, devising, manufacturing and planting “infernal machines” including both land mines and nautical mines.

In partnership with George Rains, Jefferson Davis employed a strategy that avoided defeat early in the war and contributed to the Confederacy’s chances for ultimate success. Although little remembered today, Col. Rains went on to establish the Confederacy’s very modern and very successful gunpowder works in Augusta, GA. The war you think you understand was not the war that was actually waged, according to Ted Savas.

The meeting will be held in Elebash Hall in St. John’s Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, and talk to members of the round table. And, remember, we will be electing new officers in September. Bring a friend! For information about membership in the round table, go to our website at <http://cfewrt.org> and click on “Join”.

See you there!

Brunswick Civil War Round Table Announcement

Returning on Tuesday, September 3rd to captivate his audience with another dramatic performance is popular historian Chris Mackowski, award-winning author and co-founder of Emerging Civil War. His presentation is entitled, “The Battle of Spotsylvania Court House.”

Chris will describe one of the bloodiest battles of the war between Generals Lee and Grant; a battle that cost over 30,000 lives over a 12-day period in May, 1864. It was an incredible battle that ended in a draw. Lee then retreated to Richmond, and Grant ordered his troops to continue their march also toward Richmond. Both were determined to be victorious, and eventually put an end to the war.

This will be the first meeting of the new season, and will take place at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach. Everyone is welcome. Registration for this first meeting begins Tuesday, the day after Labor Day, at 6:15PM. The program starts at 7:00PM.

The guest fee remains $10, and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues, which can include a spouse. For more information, contact president John Butler at Brunswickcwr@gmail.com, or call him at (404) 229-9425. “Don’t Use The Stuff!”

By: Bill Jayne

The venerable, tabloid-style Civil War News has transitioned to a glossy, bimonthly magazine. The first issue has an interesting article about Civil War food titled “Peanuts and Parched Corn.” Apparently “peanut coffee” was a thing in the south because it was difficult to import coffee beans because of the blockade and given all the other supplies needed by the Confederacy.

So, several alternatives to coffee sprouted up. The magazine article says that peanut coffee was made from $\frac{1}{3}$ cup of peanuts, $\frac{1}{3}$ cup rye or wheat, and $\frac{1}{3}$ cup of cow peas (black-eyed peas). “The three ingredients are roasted black, then ground up and brewed.”

Interestingly enough, the article then quotes the Wilmington, N.C., Daily Journal of October 3, 1861, for a review of the finished cup. The newspaper opined:

“Don’t use the stuff. There isn’t one cook in five hundred who ever did anything else than ruin it. Some of the papers are recommending substitute-parched beans, rye, peans, acorns, etc. Swamp mud will blacken water just as effectually but neither will it make coffee...Think of paying forty cents a pound for charcoal to embitter and blacken the water you drink. The practice should be suppressed by the Board of Health, if there were no war to do it.”

The Runner will be getting a new captain starting with the next issue. Matt Howell has graciously volunteered to take over commanding this vessel as the new editor. As he's recently shown, he is more than qualified to take over and run with it (pun intended)! It has been my pleasure to christen and launch this newest iteration of the newsletter for some sixteen issues. Thanks to my steadfast contributors, it has been a great way to be involved with the Roundtable. I'm looking forward to some new challenges and tasks. Thanks for the privilege of guiding "her" through the blockade!

Next Members Forum Looks At Generalship: Theory and Substance

by Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites all members and friends to the third session in our summer Members Forum series. Titled "Generalship: Theory and Substance," this audience-participation program will be presented by round table member John Weisz, a West Point graduate and retired U.S. Army officer. The meeting will be held on Thursday evening, August 8, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

In June, retired archaeologist Pat Garrow of the round table presented an enlightening program on the phenomenon of "Galvanized Yankees," captured Confederates who joined the Union army, and also discussed the thousands of white North Carolinians who joined the Union army on their own. Many of them were from northeastern North Carolina, an area that was generally controlled by the Union through much of the war. We also enjoyed a savory sample of Civil War cooking from superlative re-enactor chef William Jordan.

In July we heard from retired Emergency Medical Services chief Fred Claridge, an active volunteer at the Bentonville Battlefield, who told us about battlefield medicine in the Civil War. Fred is also our newsletter editor. In addition, President Bill Jayne talked about the myths surrounding the use of rifled muskets in the Civil War. Conventional wisdom declares that because the rifle muskets such as the Springfield model 1861 had the potential to be accurate at a much greater range than older smoothbore muskets, the high casualty rates of assaults were due to the use of outmoded linear formations that were decimated at long-range by the newer weapons. Close study, however, shows that most musket fire occurred at ranges similar to the practical range of the smoothbores. This was due to the fact that it was difficult to estimate ranges correctly and Civil War soldiers weren't trained in marksmanship except for a few exceptions.

The Members Forum on August 8, 2024, will be presented by member John Weisz. John graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in 1974 with a degree in Engineering and minors in German and Military History. He retired from the Army in 1994 as a Lieutenant Colonel. He served in several leadership roles in Armored Cavalry, Armor and Infantry units and on the General Staff at Ft. Knox, KY. He is a graduate of the Command and General Staff School and the Defense Logistics Executive program. He has published several articles in military journals.

John will describe the characteristics of successful generals in the Civil War. He will bring the audience into the study of campaigns through practical exercises. Teams will form and will be provided with the information needed by the commander and several options as to which maneuver to execute. The audience will not be provided with the identity of the generals and where the engagements were fought ahead of the exercise but, by the end, will surely be able to determine who and where.

Apparently “peanut coffee” was a thing in the south because it was difficult to import coffee beans because of the blockade and given all the other supplies needed by the Confederacy. So, several alternatives to coffee sprouted up. The magazine article says that peanut coffee was made from 1/3 cup of peanuts, 1/3 cup rye or wheat, and 1/3 cup of cow peas (black-eyed peas). “The three ingredients are roasted black, then ground up and brewed.”

Interestingly enough, the article then quotes the Wilmington, N.C., Daily Journal of October 3, 1861, for a review of the finished cup. The newspaper opined:

“Don’t use the stuff. There isn’t one cook in five hundred who ever did anything else than ruin it. Some of the papers are recommending substitute-parched beans, rye, peas, acorns, etc. Swamp mud will blacken water just as effectively, but neither will it make coffee ... Think of paying forty cents a pound for charcoal to embitter and blacken the water you drink. The practice should be suppressed by the Board of Health, if there were no war to do it.”

Kim Berger Named New Membership Chair

President Bill Jayne has announced that he has appointed Kim Berger to lead our round table's membership activity. Kim replaces Bruce Patterson who has served as membership chair, on and off, for many years. Great thanks are due to Bruce Patterson for all he has done for the round table over the years.

On volunteering for the membership job, Kim wrote:

It is with great pleasure and enthusiasm that I take this opportunity to introduce myself as the new Membership Chair for CFCWRT. Having recently relocated to the Wilmington area with my family, I am honored to join such a remarkable organization and look forward to making a meaningful impact within our community.

Professionally, I am a New York State certified educator in English Language Arts for students in grades 7-12, and a Teaching Literacy instructor for Birth-12th grade students. In addition to my teaching background, I served as a volunteer firefighter and EMT for 14 years in New York. I also volunteered for the Mondays at Long Island's Racine Cancer Care Foundation as a Community Outreach coordinator.

Please invite your friends and neighbors to join us for our programs. We welcome everyone to be part of our community. I am looking forward to meeting and working with all of you.

Kim was born in Queens, NY, and raised in the Hamlet of Nesconset near Stony Brook, Long Island. Nesconset is in the township of Smithtown, about halfway between Manhattan and the Hamptons.

She notes that both of her parents were raised in Greenpoint, Brooklyn, just blocks from where the USS Monitor was built. Kim's mother actually attended John Ericcson Middle School, named for the inventor and industrialist who famously built the innovative "cheese box on a raft" that fought a momentous draw with the Confederate ironclad CSS Virginia (ex USS Merrimack) in 1862. Her father was a history buff but was especially interested in the Civil War. So she reports, "I grew up surrounded by Civil War books and at a young age, I was drawn to the maps."

Kim graduated from Dowling College with a BA in 1999. Dowling College was a small private college on the south shore of Long Island. It was housed in an old Vanderbilt Mansion and grounds. She obtained her MS degree from Touro University. Touro is a worldwide learning institution with opportunities throughout the United States, as well as Russia, Germany, and Israel.

Kim and husband Thomas "Tommy," have been happily married for almost 28 years. Son Roman is an active member of our round table as well and we know him as our audio-visual chair. Their youngest son, Russell lives in Troy, NY, and is a PhD Candidate in Physics at RPI (Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute).

Thank you, Kim, for volunteering to help lead our round table.

Wreaths Across America Campaign Begins Next Month

by Bruce Patterson, CFCWRT Secretary

Our Cape Fear CWRT is beginning our annual Wreaths Across America campaign next month with a goal of purchasing not less than 75 wreaths, for the Wilmington National Cemetery, in December.

This is a Wilmington Community effort, one that has been largely successful in years past. It is our goal, indeed our intent, to place a Christmas Wreath on every Christian grave in the Wilmington National Cemetery this Christmas.

Member Kim Jordan has volunteered to chair our effort again this year and to that end is beginning the drive a month early in the hopes that our unit goal of 75 will be met before the end of October.

Cost is $17 per wreath. A bundle of 5 wreaths (the most popular purchase) is $85. Wreaths will be placed on graves, in a community-wide effort, on Saturday, December 14th.

See Kim at one of the next three CWRT meetings and join in this wonderful project. Cash or check (Wreaths Across America) please. Should you desire to purchase directly online, she can accommodate you, but the process is somewhat difficult to navigate while being sure that our CWRT receives credit for your purchase. For each wreath purchased, our CWRT receives $5, thus this also becomes an important fund-raising effort.

Last Meeting Program Featured Member Presentations on the Bentonville Battlefield and the Effectiveness of Civil War Muskets

by Yelena Howell, Tours and Trips Committee

“For me, the Harper House is the most sacred place [at Bentonville].” - Fred Claridge

On July 11th, Fred Claridge and Bill Jayne delivered stimulating member presentations on the past and present of Bentonville Battlefield State Historic Site and the role of musketry in Civil War casualties. Fred extolled well-preserved historical and natural vistas at Bentonville, best explored in cooler times of the year. Coming from a medical background, he provided important details on period military medicine and the role of the Harper House as a field hospital in 1865.

Bill reexamined assertions and historical data on the effective range of Civil War musket fire that, in practice, differed significantly from the theoretical range of this class of arms. He recommended books by Prof. Earl J. Hess, The Rifle Musket in Civil War Combat: Reality and Myth and Civil War Infantry Tactics: Training, Combat, and Small-Unit Effectiveness and Jack Coggins' Arms and Equipment of the Civil War. Bill's presentation underscored the importance of questioning assumptions and examining a wider range, if you would pardon the pun, of extant evidence.

Many thanks to the two excellent speakers and to our engaged audiences! We look forward to seeing you again on August 8th. In the meanwhile, if you have travel stories, research, or photos to share, we welcome submissions for The Runner. The deadline for the next newsletter is Thursday, July 25.

Member Forums in the summer months are a good way for our members to speak about topics that are of interest to them. Consider speaking if you want to spread your knowledge.

[Editor's Note: The staff at Bentonville Battlefield gave us permission to reprint this interesting post from their blog site "From the Trenches." If you've never checked out that blog, you should. There is always something reflecting current research to be found there. We hope you will find the recent post informative.]

But What About the Dead: Raleigh National Cemetery and John Knapp

Written and photographed by Rachel McLaughlin,
Bentonville Battlefield Staff

One question often asked on our Harper House tours is "But what about the dead?"

People are often curious what the armies did with the remains of the fallen. The answer is simple: It was common to bury the Union and Confederate dead where they fell, i.e. the battlefield.

There is a panel about this subject located in the monument area of Bentonville Battlefield. The signage here mostly focuses on the Confederate dead and the monuments placed at Bentonville in commemoration of soldiers on both sides who fell here; Reason being there are 20 unknown graves of Confederate soldiers in this area. For more information on the Confederate monuments and graves, check out "A Monumental Mystery" a Youtube Video from Bentonville Battlefield Staff Member Derrick Brown explaining the history of this area. In the corner of this sign, however, is the mention of one soldier in the 21st Michigan Infantry, John M. Knapp, or J. M. Knapp, from Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Knapp was 21 years young when he enlisted on August 9th, 1862 at Grand Rapids, MI as a Private. At the battle of Stones River, Tennessee, (Dec. 31st, 1862 - Jan. 2nd, 1863) Knapp was wounded and taken prisoner but was later paroled. According to The City of Grand Rapids and Kent County, Mich.: Up to Date, Containing Biographical Sketches of Prominent and Representative Citizens, Knapp was familiar with blacksmithing tools because of his father's business ventures, which paid off well when his regiment was assigned to Engineer duty while in Tennessee in 1863-1864. He fell wounded again at the Battle of Bentonville during the intense fighting on the Cole Plantation on March 19th. The story continues that he “stopped a moment to aid a wounded comrade and was himself shot through while performing this human act. He crawled along while thus wounded, for more than a mile, but died a few hours later.”

Like the rest of the deceased, John Knapp was buried on the battlefield; It was common practice for the victor to take charge of this endeavor. According to a report posted in the Raleigh newspaper The Daily Standard on May 11th, 1865, “[Sherman] directed General Howard and the cavalry to remain at Bentonville during the 22nd, to bury the dead and remove the wounded...”

During and after the war, there was a national concentrated effort to keep an accurate record of the fallen Union soldiers and in 1862 the Omnibus Act was passed which “directed the president to purchase land to be used as a national cemetery for the soldiers who shall die in the service to the country.” This effort led to the creation of National Cemeteries around the country in which Civil War soldiers could be buried and honored. During this time, however, Confederate soldiers were not awarded any benefits from the United States, including burial in National Cemeteries. The only Confederate Soldiers who would be interred into these cemeteries were those who were captured as prisoners or died while being treated in Union hospitals.

In 1865, when Sherman had possession over the city of Raleigh, the Raleigh National Cemetery was established. this time, workers contracted by the United States government reinterred, or moved, bodies from Averasboro, Bentonville, Goldsboro, Greensboro, Franklinton, and Henderson.

You can view the original burial ledger for John Knapp in line 200 (if enlarged).

According to the National Register of Historic Places information: “Graves were originally marked with headboards, painted and lettered that were later replaced with upright marble markers.”

The friends and family of John M. Knapp grieved his loss through letters and memorials. These men saw their own friends and fellow soldiers pass away in bloody combat. It’s important to remember that these men had relationships with one another after traveling together, fighting together, and surviving together. Through the correspondence that is available, it was clear that Knapp had a lasting impact on his friends and family.

In Michigan where Knapp’s parents are buried is a marker on the back of their headstones that commemorates their son.

A letter was from friend Clark L. Reed to John Knapp’s Parents writes:

“As the last token of friendship and remembrance of my Brother Soldier and companion in arms, I plucked from our Earth a nice little wild plum tree filled with white blossoms and planted it at his head praying as I done so.”

In another letter friend of Knapp, Amherst Cheney laments:

“My joy will be mingled with sorrow for the many whose epitaph will be “He was buried where he fell. The soldierly and kind Cha. Hillton; the brave fearless Blackhall; my friend Knapp; the prompt and efficient Lozo, and many others belonging to my company are now sleeping their last sleep. They fell fighting for truth and justice...”

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table Highlights Bentonville Battlefield Update and “Myth of the Rifle Musket”

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The July 11 meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) features a presentation by Fred Claridge, our newsletter editor and an avid volunteer at the Bentonville Battlefield State Historic Site, and President Bill Jayne talking about the outsized reputation of the rifle musket as the cause of high casualties in the Civil War.

Many thanks to Matt Howell for taking the helm of The Runner during my unexpected medical misadventure last month. Matt did an outstanding job delivering the cargo to port despite taking over in a storm. Much appreciated Matt! - Editor -

The presentations are part of the group’s Members Forum series. Most Civil War Round Tables across the country take the summer off but Cape Fear relies on the interests and scholarship of its members to continue to present informative programs throughout the summer. Most of these programs are more interactive than the standard lecture format the round table relies on throughout most of the “campaign” year.

The Battle of Bentonville, fought March 19-21, 1865, was the last full-scale action of the Civil War in which a Confederate army was able to mount a tactical offensive. This major battle,

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

We are pleased to announce the June membership of Dan and Susan Hickman. The Hickmans reside in Wilmington and are long-time residents following Dan's very successful military and academic careers. As students of history, especially local history, we are especially pleased when a long-time Wilmingtonian joins our ranks.

A word about membership renewal. Please check you name tag. It reflects your month for annual renewal. If your tag reflects July, then your renewal is due prior to July 31st. You may renew on-line or by mail by sending your renewal fee ($30.) to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451. Better still, just give a check to Treasurer Mike McDonald at the July meeting. Mike will also accept your credit card payment. Lots of options folks but let's keep our ranks full.

Lastly, a reminder that every member is s recruiter. Bring a friend or neighbor to the next meeting. Visitors usually join following attendance.

And - we are looking for someone to help out with our attendance duties. Please stay tuned for more information on that opportunity to help!

the largest ever fought in North Carolina, was the only significant attempt to defeat the large Union army of Gen. William T. Sherman during its march through the Carolinas in the spring of 1865.

The site in Johnston County is less than 90 miles from Wilmington and it is one of the most pristine of all Civil War battlefields in the country. The area around the battlefield has remained largely agricultural and rural and one sees the terrain where the battle was fought much as the soldiers would have seen it almost 160 years ago.

In 1929 Fred Olds, of the NC Hall of History (forerunner of today's North Carolina Museum of History), wrote of a springtime battlefield tour recently enjoyed in remote southeastern Johnston County. He was truly amazed by what he found.

"One of the best-preserved battle fields of the War between the States is that of Bentonville," Olds asserted, noting that the field "still reveals lines of entrenchments so perfectly preserved as to be startling. They reach for miles." Extensive ground cover and little new construction in the area had kept the battlefield relatively undisturbed. Marveling at the pristine field fortifications, then adorned with fragrant arbutus blossoms, Olds observed that "nature has in the years which have passed cared for them with infinite tenderness." As he toured "no end of rifle pits," probably along the Sam Howell Branch, he found them "as distinct and well preserved as if they had been dug but a few years ago. Time has stood very still in that once bloody area."

The state of North Carolina has acquired extensive portions of the battlefield and assisted by the National Park Service and the American Battlefield Trust, it has continued to locate and map battlefield fortifications and other features. Moreover, the park has in recent years been able to develop new interpretative trails to bring people closer to these features and to better understand the highly significant battle.

From the perspective of a dedicated volunteer who has seen many of these new developments reach fruition in the past two years, Fred Claridge will give us an update on this jewel of battlefield preservation.

In a second Member Forum presentation, Bill Jayne will take a look at the impact of the rifle musket on Civil War combat. In the immediate buildup to the outbreak of war in 1861, the rifle musket had replaced the smoothbore musket as the standard infantry weapon. A “musket” is an individual long weapon loaded by the muzzle. The smoothbore musket common to America’s Revolutionary War through the War with Mexico, fired a round ball that was propelled by black powder down a long barrel that was smooth on the inside. Effective range of the weapon was less than 150 yards.

The rifle musket was still loaded by the muzzle in a painstaking process but “rifling,” (something like the ridges and grooves of a bolt or screw) caused the projectile to spin and thus remain truer to its trajectory as it left the barrel of the weapon. This weapon, in general, was seen to have an effective range of about 500 yards.

“The prevailing view of this weapon has been that it revolutionized warfare because of its increased range. Participants and latter-day historians alike have assumed that because the rifle deepened the killing zone so much—from roughly 100 yards to about 500 yards—it produced significant results.” This quotation is from the Introduction to The Rifle Musket in Civil War Combat: Reality and Myth, by Earl J. Hess. Dr. Hess, Ph.D., is a retired professor of history at Lincoln Memorial University in Harrowgate, Tennessee. He is a prolific author whose books have been published by several prestigious academic presses. A native of rural Missouri, Dr. Hess received his Ph.D. from Purdue University.

The problem with the prevailing wisdom, which tends to portray the American Civil War as “the first modern war,” largely because of the rifle musket, is that it has seldom been subjected to rigorous analysis. Dr. Hess and others have pointed out that several factors limited the effective range of the rifle musket. Chief among those factors was the exaggerated parabolic arc of the projectile. Civil War long arms fired a large projectile, more than half an inch in diameter, with a relatively small amount of propellant. So, the projectile didn’t travel in a more or less flat flight, it rose and then, as gravity took over, came back to earth. When the weapon was sighted at 300 yards, there were two killing zones: from zero to about 75 yards, and then from about 250 yards to 350 yards. Opposing soldiers in the middle were relatively safe. A well-trained rifleman could estimate the range and adjust his sights in order to hit a target at well over 300 yards. The problem was, very few Civil War riflemen were trained marksmen. As the war progressed, specialized skirmish and sniper units benefited from training and began to have an effect.

Was, then, the new-fangled rifle musket the cause of the high casualties in Civil War battles? Dr. Hess wrote: “At best, the rifle musket had an incremental effect on changing the nature of combat for a few selected functions on the battlefield, such as skirmishing and sniping. It did not revolutionize warfare.” Within ten years, the rifle musket was a museum piece, replaced by breech-loading rifles and then bolt-action, magazine-fed rifles that were tremendously more powerful, easy to operate and a recruit could learn to accurately aim the weapon in a week of training.

Perhaps more important, in terms of causing high casualties, was the lack of training of higher-ranking officers. Not one general, north or south, had ever commanded a field force of more than a regiment or two in combat; that is 1,000 to 2,000 men. By 1862, however, men with no relevant experience and precious little academic preparation, were commanding armies in the neighborhood of 100,000 men.

Make plans to come and participate in these discussions. As usual, the meeting will take place on Thursday evening, July 11, beginning at 7 p.m. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John’s Episcopal Church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Bring a friend! See you there.

Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson Site Lecture Series in July

Join us at Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson State Historic Site for a guest lecture series that examines the construction and historical significance of Civil War era fortifications along the Carolina coast from a number of perspectives. July 2, 9, and 23 6:00-8:00 PM. $3 admission.

Built atop the remnants of the colonial town, Brunswick, Fort Anderson protected the Cape Fear River and supply lines to Wilmington. Wilmington was a critical port for supply lines throughout the Confederacy and to General Lee's Army of Northern Virginia in Petersburg and Richmond. Although originally named Fort St. Phillip after the colonial Anglican Church ruins within the fortress, the fort was renamed in honor of Brigadier General George Burgwyn Anderson who died after complications from injuries suffered at Antietam. Lieutenant Thomas Rowland led the construction of Fort St. Phillip, which began on March 24, 1862. The earthwork was nearly a mile long and ran from the Cape Fear River to Orton Pond.¹

Members Pat Garrow and William Jordan Bring History Alive

By H. W. Walker, Runner Special Correspondent

Inaugurating the seventh iteration of our Members Forum series, retired archaeologist and author, Pat Garrow, told the story of the “Galvanized Yankees,” blue on the outside, gray on the inside. Galvanization was a relatively new process in Civil War days but the process of dipping iron or steel in molten zinc was growing by leaps and bounds because the zinc retarded rust on the ferrous metals being increasingly used for ships, trains, building structures, bridges, etc. Pat’s presentation was punctuated by an intermission featuring member William Jordan reenacting the role of victualer and chef W.C. Pag, and wowing everyone with fantastic 19th Century treats like “French Salad,” a kind of chicken salad served on lettuce leaves. More than 40 members and friends enjoyed the meeting.

Pat’s presentation was based on his second “Galvanized” book. His first book, published by the University of Tennessee press, focused on Union soldiers who grasped the opportunity to escape from Confederate prison by serving in the Confederate army. Titled Changing Sides, the book looked at the phenomenon through the lens of the various units that were formed for limited military duty. The experiment was largely a failure as former Union soldiers tended to desert their Confederate units as soon as feasible. Such deserters gave Union generals valuable intelligence at the battle of Bentonville in early 1865.

His second book, Gray to Blue, will focus on the opposite phenomenon, Confederate POWs who used the opportunity to serve in U.S. Army units in order to escape prison. This volume is scheduled to be published by the University of Tennessee Press in 2025. Pat also focused on the experience of Union units composed of white southerners from Confederate states who abandoned allegiance to the Confederacy.

Pat’s research revealed that 3,156 white men were enlisted within the state by the Union to serve in units such as the 1st and 2nd North Carolina Infantry regiments in the U.S. Army. More than 5,000 white men born in North Carolina enlisted elsewhere. In all, Pat told us, 8,191 white men born in North Carolina fought for the Union.

The 2nd NC (Union) was raised from November 1863 to February 1864 in northeastern North Carolina. The area was a Union enclave throughout the war and most of the territory was controlled by the Union. Union supporters in the far northeastern counties of the state were often called “Buffaloes,” but not all the men in the regiment came from those counties.

The men were generally a little older than those in most Union regiments, but enlistees were as young as 14. For more about these Union soldiers, see the nearby article by John Wetherington about his ancestor, Ruel Wetherington, who served in the 2nd N.C.

The 2nd N.C. had a very unfortunate history as one company was captured virtually en masse. In February 1864, Company F was assigned to defend a blockhouse at Beech Grove near New Bern and as the Confederate army under Gen. George Pickett operated in the area, it surrounded the blockhouse, and it was surrendered by a Union Lieutenant from the 132nd N.Y. who was in command.

As the prisoners were marched toward Kinston, Confederate soldiers in Pickett’s force recognized some members of the 2nd N.C. who had served in Confederate units earlier in the war. Some of them had deserted. Ultimately, 22 men were executed by the Confederates and the rest sent to prison camps. Only three of the captives survived the war, according to Pat’s research.

After the intermission to enjoy W.C. Pag’s repast, Pat completed his presentation noting that 28 Federal units contained “Galvanized Yankees.” Many other units were formed outright from Unionists in places like East Tennessee and Northern Alabama. The 28 units, however, contained soldiers who had first served in Confederate units. Many of them were recruited from Point Lookout prison located in Maryland where the Potomac River empties into Chesapeake Bay.

One of the units formed was the 1st U.S. Volunteer Infantry. Recruits were subjected to a medical examination but only about 10 percent were disqualified. Some 94 of the volunteers examined had scars from gunshot wounds. A plurality of the volunteers, 486, came from North Carolina. The unit served as guards in Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, and took part in raids in the Tidewater area, including Elizabeth City, N.C. Those raids, Pat added, “produced nothing but desertions.”

Because of the desertions and fears of Confederate executions if the men were captured, on August 8, 1864, the 1st U.S.V.I. was shipped west to Chicago. From there, the regiment was divided into two battalions and traveled further west. One battalion—named the Dimon Battalion for its commander—went all the way to Fort Rice in what is now North Dakota. They suffered from poor leadership and supply problems but they did fight against Sioux warriors and help protect settlements. Many died of illness and a fair number deserted. They were mustered out of service on November 7, 1865.

The other battalion, known as the Tamblyn Battalion because of its commander Col. William L.

Tamblyn, served in other locations in Minnesota and Dakota Territory. Its experience was similar to the other battalion, and many men deserted. Interestingly, one deserter was Wright Batchelor, an ancestor of Michael K. Brantley, who told us his story, "Reluctant Confederate," in November 2022. Batchelor deserted the battalion in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and walked all the way to Petersburg, Virginia, and somehow rejoined his old Confederate unit. The Tamblyn Battalion remained in service until the men were mustered out on May 21, 1866.

Pat summarized the service of the 1st USVI by noting that 195 men deserted, 121 died in service (only five as a result of enemy action) and 78 received medical discharges. Of the more than 1,000 who served in the regiment, 394 men did not complete their service.

Thanks to members Pat Garrow and William Jordan (assisted by wife Kim and son David) for an informative and enjoyable meeting.

The food was great at our June event. There was so much to choose from.

Ruel Wetherington (24 October 1824 – 1 February 1912)

By John Wetherington, CFCWRT Member

[Editor's Note: We hope you enjoy this article on one of our member's ancestors - Ruel Wetherington. We have included some of the archival documents he discovered throughout the article. We also humbly apologize for the text gremlins which prevented us from fixing a number of the paragraphs. They're still quite readable - but have some strange spacing anomalies we were powerless to fix. Thanks for your patience!]

The recent lecture by Pat Garrow on "Galvanized Yankees" reminded me of the research I had done on my Great Grandfather, Ruel Wetherington.

In May of 1861, Ruel enlisted in Company F, of the 2nd Infantry Battalion, CSA. He enlisted in New Bern, NC, but was later discharged for medical reasons: The records state: "Discharged by order of Surgeon Courts July 9, 1861, at Camp Advance, NC, on account of physical disability."

In April 1863, in Craven County, Ruel enlisted in Company B, 67th NC Infantry Regiment of the Confederate Army (Whitford's Partisan Rangers).

Union General Ambrose Burnside had captured New Bern in early 1862 and the Union held the city and much of the surrounding area for the remainder of the war. North Carolinians had always been ambivalent about the war. North Carolina was the last state to secede from the Union. Unionists, deserters, and opportunists in the occupied territories, seeing their chance, began enlisting in the Union army. Many were promised bounties ranging from $100 to $300, most of which was never paid. They were promised their duties would be guarding Federal logistics and building fortifications, and that they would never be called away from their home county.

On January 13, 1864, Ruel Wetherington enlisted in Company F, Second North Carolina Union Volunteer Infantry of the Union Army at New Bern. (Not to be confused with the same company and regiment designation on the southern side.) About NC were former Confederate soldiers. According to essays such as “Little Souled Mercenaries?” The Buffaloes of Eastern North Carolina during the Civil War by Judkin Jay Browning, published in the July 2000 issue of The North Carolina Historical Review, many had enlisted in local defense units to avoid harsh Confederate conscription practices, which often resulted in men being removed from their homes with no time to try to provide for their families.

Ruel was 35 years old. He was born and raised in the Tuscarora/Cove City region of Craven County, NC – about midway between Union held New Bern and Confederate held Kinston. On Jan 18th, 1864, part of the 2nd NC was sent to the “Masked Battery” at Beech Grove overlooking the Neuse River, near what is now called Bachelor's Creek – Ruel’s home ground.

They joined fourteen men from the 132nd Reg’t, NY Infantry.

At this same time, Gen. R. E. Lee decided the time was ripe to re-capture New Bern and directed Gen. George Pickett in Kinston to accomplish it. Beech Grove on the Federal right flank, though concealed by darkness and heavy fog, came under attack. The men of North Carolina were not allowed to lead the Union troops to safety without orders, even though they were well acquainted with their home terrain. On Feb 2nd, 1864, the battery was immediately surrendered by Lt Leith of New York with not a man lost to battle.

As the Union prisoners were led back to Kinston (in their new blue uniforms), a member of Picket's troops recognized two of the former confederates. In the end, after three separate courts martial, twenty-seven of the captives from Beech Grove were charged with desertion. Twenty-six others were declared POWs and sent to prison camps, including Andersonville. Twenty-one of those charged were hanged in Kinston, with many of their wives and friends looking on. Among those hanged was Sergeant Jessie James Summerlin. His body was carried twenty miles to his wife Catherine Dail Summerlin by the sympathetic Sheriff.

Of the twenty-seven "Galvanized Yankees" captured at Beech Grove, only four survived to see the next month: The court martial board was reconvened in Goldsboro to consider the fate of the remaining men. Two of them were hanged. Two were sentenced to hard labor, and two men, George Hawkins and (my Great Grandfather) Ruel Wetherington, were sentenced to be branded on their left hips with the letter "D" four inches in length. In addition, each was ordered to have a five- foot-long chain and twelve-pound ball attached to his left ankle and to work at hard labor on government projects for the duration of the war.

The US Army General Hospital in Annapolis, MD, carried Ruel Wetherington on the roster of the 2nd NC Volunteers (Union) as 'absent' since April 12, 1864. The roster was contained in a Register of "enlisted men, rebel deserters, and refugees detained at Camp Distribution awaiting orders" to be transferred on Sept 18, 1864, from Alexandria, VA, to New Berne, and 'present' in the 2nd Reg't on Sept-Nov 1864.

He was transferred to the 1st NC Vols, Beaufort, NC, on Nov 30th, appearing on their rolls on Feb 27, 1865. It appears that Ruel Wetherington was exchanged by the Confederates sometime in mid 1864 and passed into U.S. control.

Catherine Dail Summerlin, whose husband, Sgt Summerlin, was hanged, married Ruel Wetherington on May 20, 1866, to be his second wife, of three. She applied for a Widow's Pension (based on the death of Sgt. Jesse J Summerlin) in August 1867. She died in October 1873, age 37.

Ruel married his third wife, my Great Grandmother, Sarah E Woods, in August 1880.

Sarah applied for an Invalid's Pension in August, 1888, and a Widow's Pension on Feb 19, 1912, stating Ruel was in F & C Company 2nd NC Inf, and F Co, 1st NC Inf. Ruel died in Tuscarora, NC, Feb 1, 1912, and was buried in Cove City, not far from Beech Grove. He never received the $300 bounty, although it was carried as being owed on most of the reports.

As for why Ruel enlisted in the Union army: I assume 1) the local economy was very bad, 2) the Yankees were convenient, and 3) the people didn't want to join the Confederacy in late 1864. But that's a guess. And, $300 was a LOT of money.

As for the chronology: Ruel was in the hospital in Annapolis/Baltimore (Hospital Muster Roll, Mar & Apr '64 of West's Bldg USA General Hospital, Baltimore, MD. Company Muster Roll, May & Jun '64, "Absent in Gen Hospital, Annapolis, since April 12, 1864") which was Yankee territory. There's a neighborhood in Annapolis called Parole, after Camp Parole, (I lived just a few miles from there) where prisoners were exchanged or paroled.

When he was transferred from Alexandria, VA, it was Union territory. Beaufort, NC was, of course, also Union territory-that's where Burnside came ashore in 1862 prior to his assault on New Bern.

At some point between Feb 2, and April 12, 1864, Ruel was exchanged between the US and Confederate armies. Company Muster Roll of Sept - Dec 1864, for Co C, 2nd NC show him 'present.' On Feb 27, 1865, he is transferred from 2nd NC to the 1st NC Inf Vols in Beaufort, NC.

Diverse Audience Bonds over Juneteenth Observance at Wilmington National Cemetery

By Yelena Howell, CFCWRT Tours and Trips Committee

Freedom jubilation in Wilmington rises toward its 30th consecutive year since Abdul Rahman Shareef's co-founding of the local Juneteenth Committee in 1995, with numerous community events spanning an annual week of remembrance and celebration. On June 17th, 2024, the incomparable Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. delivered the keynote address at the solemn gathering at the Wilmington National Cemetery to honor the legacy of the USCT, 500 of whom are interred there. A reverent assembly of community leaders and townspeople fellowshiped together, sacred and secular words of tribute to courage through difficult, proud chapters of American history were delivered, creating a sense of shared gratitude and hope.

As both our round table and the Wilmington Juneteenth Committee near the big 3-0, the pillars behind the lookalike Sanskrit symbol "om" come to mind: unity, thought, speech, and action.

We thank our sponsors, who make it possible for us to thrive as an organization. It would be much harder without their support!

We find and develop outstanding original military and general history manuscripts and bring them to you in the form of quality books you will be proud to read, own, and keep for a lifetime.

THE OFFICIAL NEWSLETTER OF THE CAPE FEAR CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE

Our intrepid pilot (AKA newsletter editor) Fred Claridge hit a figurative shoal last week. On May 20, Fred went to the emergency room because of significant problems walking and loss of feeling in his lower body. Doctors quickly discovered a mass on his spinal column that was pressing against his spinal cord. The next day Fred underwent an operation to remove the mass and a piece of spine. Pins, etc., were put in to stabilize his spine.

Thankfully, it was discovered the tumor was benign and Fred is now resting at home after the difficult ordeal. We solicit your best wishes and prayers for Fred's speedy recovery. He's been our newsletter editor for a year and he's done a great job. Fair winds and following seas, Fred, and we hope to see your steady hand on the wheel of the "Runner" again very soon.

And we offer our great thanks to Matt Howell who stepped in at a critical moment to take the wheel and deftly maneuver the Runner to a safe berth. Thank you, Matt!

PRESIDENT'S REPORT

As the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table approaches the anniversary of our first meeting 30 years ago, we can proudly announce that in the past year the leadership of the round table has produced our first set of bylaws. The bylaws were approved by approximately 40 members in attendance at the May 9, 2024 meeting.

I want to thank all those who participated in the many meetings we held to craft these bylaws. Officers Al Turner, Bruce Patterson and Mike McDonald all played a key role. Jim Gannon, Fred Claridge, William Jordan, Ray Repage, Bob Ferro and others also contributed greatly. Ed Gibson participated in those meetings and added much to the end result. Sadly, Ed is no longer with us to reap the benefits of our new organizational structure.

CFCWRT President, Bill Jayne

The biggest change effected by the bylaws is that we now have a blueprint for sustaining healthy leadership of the organization. There are five officers: President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer and Quartermaster. Each officer will be elected by the membership for a one-year term. The President and Vice President are limited to two, one-year terms. That is, the President and Vice President cannot serve in those positions for more than two consecutive years. The other three officers are also elected for a one-year term but their number of terms is not limited. The bylaws state that the Vice President is expected to succeed the President.

This organizational structure will bring in new leadership with new energy, new ideas and new commitment. For the past 30 years, we have had just five presidents. Each served for six years except for one who served for four and his successor who served for eight years. Moreover, although there was some consistency in this pattern, each president served indefinitely. We are living in an age of rapid change. I feel confident that new leadership, openness to new ideas, and a welcoming attitude toward new contributors, will help the round table to thrive in such a period.

Several people have stepped up and offered to serve as officers in the year ahead. Not all the positions have been spoken for, however, and we still welcome any and all volunteers. Please read over the bylaws looking especially at Articles 7, 8, 9 and 10. We want to be able to present the strongest possible slate of officers for approval of the membership at the August meeting. If you're willing to contribute to the success of our round table, please contact me. My contact information is below.

Article 8 deals with the Executive Committee which will be an important part of the governance of the round table. In addition to the five officers, the Executive Committee will comprise six additional members for a total of eleven maximum. The immediate past president will be a member plus five people from the membership at large.

Article 9 deals with the functional activities of the round table such as selecting and liaison with speakers, the newsletter, tours and special events, etc. Members of the Executive Committee will guide these functional activities and also serve as the Nominating Committee for new officers.

At this point, let me emphatically add two points for you to consider. Number one, we have a very healthy cadre of volunteers who are familiar with the workings of the club and donate their time and talents to keep us healthy. Number two, I don't plan to fade away into the sunset like a lonesome cowboy at the end of the movie. I hope to serve our new president and the other officers as a member of the executive committee and to remain active in both internal and external communications. Communications, whether you want to call it public relations or outreach, isn't an assigned duty of the president or any of the officers under the new bylaws.

There are a lot of new things that can be done and the new officers will put their own stamp on our operation, making our round table even better. We can do a lot more in battlefield preservation, encouraging young people to get involved, recognition of outstanding Civil War writers...and more. So, "Let's go!"

CFCWRT President, Bill Jayne

Greetings, CFCWRT Members! A couple of brief announcements this month...

The May meeting saw us add six new members (including one couple) and welcome back a returning member. Brian Ballweg, and Ed Dominelli both hail from Wilmington, while Tom Thurman and Charles Gallucci show Castle Hayne as their residence. Returning member, Bob Maffitt (well steeped in blockade history) and Fort Fisher Site Manager Jim Steele are also Wilmington residents and following our Cape Fear River cruise, Mike & Dot Hamby (Wrightsville Beach) joined as well.

Indeed, the Membership Chair is pleased with our recruiting efforts where every member is a recruiter. Recall please, that our Cape Fear CWRT features an all-year program with our very popular member forum's scheduled for June thru August. Program Chair, Jim Gannon has performed yeoman service in lining up interesting and educational programs for the balance of the year. Our thanks to him and to all concerned.

Please renew as your anniversary month approaches (month shown on name tag) and either pay online, by cash or check at the next meeting or mail to our CFCWRT Treasurer at:

8387 East Highcroft Drive
Leland, NC 28451.

Professor Angie Zombek Regales Big Crowd With Story of Key West

By J. Fulton Reynolds

Dr. Angela Zombek, Ph.D., associate professor of history at UNCW, presented a lively program on Key West during the Civil War to a large group of approximately 50 members and guests at our May 9 meeting.

Dr. Zombek, an expert on the prisoner of war experience in the Civil War, provided much interesting background about Key West and Fort Zachary Taylor. Long recognized as a strategic point because of the narrowness of the Straits of Florida, Key West was a perfect harbor for any power attempting to control the sea lanes between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean. Less than 100 miles wide from Florida to Cuba, the straits were regularly patrolled by U.S. ships in the pre-war era.

In 1822, Captain (later Commodore) David Porter was given command of the West Indies Squadron and on April 23, 1823 he established the Naval Station at Key West in the newly acquired Territory of Florida. This was the first permanent settlement on the island. The mission of the squadron was suppressing piracy in the West Indies. Pirates were operating freely near the coasts of Cuba and Puerto Rico. Commodore Porter assembled a Mosquito fleet of eight shallow draft schooners and five 20-oared barges to be used together with the USS Sea Gull, the first steam vessel to see active service. Porter was now able to follow the pirates into their havens in the shallow waters and channels of the islands. Porter's authoritarian style did not make him popular in Key West or in Congress. In fact, in 1833 he proclaimed martial law on the strategic island, a forerunner of things to come in the 1860s.

Commodore Porter, the father of Admiral David Dixon Porter, commander of the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron in the Civil War, was also the stepfather of Admiral David Glasgow Farragut of the Civil War.

In the decades before the Civil War, Key West was an important port for U.S. Navy ships engaged in the enforcement of the federal law ending the transatlantic slave trade. Although the law outlawing the slave trade went into effect in 1808, smugglers continued to acquire human beings in Africa, pack them into unsanitary ships and attempt to import them into the United States to be sold as slaves.

For example, we learned that as late as April 30, 1860, U.S. Navy ships brought into Key West the bark Wildfire with 510 Africans to be sold as slaves. Approximately, 90 had died in the passage across the Atlantic from West Africa.

While the international slave trade was illegal, slavery was still legal in Florida and, as Dr Zombek explained, the U.S. Army ironically became the largest user of enslaved labor as they constructed the massive masonry Fort Zachary Taylor to protect the harbor of Key West.

The U.S. Army moved quickly to cement control of Key West when war broke out in 1861. William H. French, a Captain at the start of the Civil War, commanded the 1st U.S. Artillery, which was stationed at Fort Duncan, Eagle Pass, Texas. He refused to surrender his garrison to the Confederate-aligned state authorities as they requested. Instead, he moved his men to the mouth of the Río Grande in sixteen days and sailed to Key West, where he quartered at the Federal military post there, Fort Zachary Taylor and helped secure the fort from Confederate seizure. Shortly thereafter, he was elevated to major and assumed command of the base in conjunction with the Union Navy. He went on to achieve the rank of Major General and commanded the III Corps of the Army of the Potomac after Gettysburg.

Dr. Zombek went on to chronicle the salient events of the war at Key West as Federal officers maneuvered adroitly to maintain control of the strategic post. Enslaved people remained in Key West until the Emancipation Proclamation went into effect on January 1, 1863, at which time they were freed. Technically, perhaps, the slaves freed in 1863 weren't covered by the proclamation because Key West had never been under control of Confederate authorities. Regardless, they became free and later in 1864 a U.S Colored Troops regiment garrisoned the post.

The last act was the arrest of George Davis, the attorney general of the Confederate States of America in 1864 and 65. Davis, a native of Wilmington, became general counsel of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad. Born in 1820 he became a Confederate senator and then attorney general. As Richmond fell and the Army of Northern Virginia surrendered in April 1865, Davis fled south and attempted to flee to England. He was captured at Key West on October 18, 1865. He was imprisoned at Ft. Hamilton in New York but freed by President Andrew Johnson in January 1866.

Dr. Zombek (PhD University of Florida) is an historian of the Civil War Era and is Associate Professor of History at the University of North Carolina Wilmington. She is also coordinator of the Masters Program in History at UNCW and the managing editor of “Interpreting the Civil War” series at Kent State University. She is the author of Penitentiaries, Punishment, and Military Prisons: Familiar Responses to an Extraordinary Crisis during the America Civil War (Kent State University Press). Her current book project, Stronghold of the Union: Key West Under Martial Law, is under contract with The University Press of Florida.

A great favorite of our round table,
Professor Zombek will be back soon!

Member Forum at Next Meeting Highlights

“Galvanized Yankees” and Camp Food

Our June 13 meeting features a presentation by member Pat Garrow, a retired archaeologist with an MA degree from the University of Georgia who will talk about the “Galvanized Yankees,” Confederate prisoners of war who volunteered to serve in the Union army in order to escape the prison camps and for other reasons including disillusionment with the Confederate cause.

Pat will present his soon to be published book about Confederate soldiers who joined the Union Army to escape imprisonment. This book is a companion volume to his earlier book about Union prisoners of war who changed sides to join the Confederate army.

Confederate prisoners at Camp Douglas, Chicago, Illinois

The new book updates and extends Dee Brown’s classic volume Galvanized Yankees. Pat’s book is titled From Gray to Blue, and it’s under contract with the University of Tennessee Press. Pat will address the six regiments of US volunteers raised in Union prisons and sent to the western frontier to protect settlers and travelers and will go well beyond that to address lesser known units such as the Union Regiments raised in North Carolina.

More than 6,000 Confederates served in the Union army. Some of them were “Galvanized Confederates,” that is Union soldiers who had been captured and imprisoned but accepted the chance to serve in the Confederate army in order to escape the deadly prison pens of the Civil War,

More than 400,000 soldiers—about 194,000 Union and 214,000 Confederate—were captured over the course of the war. Prison conditions were brutal with approximately 30,000 Union soldiers and 26,000 Confederates dying while imprisoned. Deaths occurred most often because of medical conditions including infectious diseases such as typhoid fever, cholera, yellow fever, malaria, etc. Many also died because of malnutrition and exposure to the elements.

Several regiments of Galvanized Yankees (Blue or Yankee on the outside but Gray or Rebel on the inside) served on the frontier, especially in Minnesota, to protect settlers from hostile Indians, and that part of the story is fairly well known. Pat's research has gone much deeper into the subject, however.

In addition to Pat's presentation, CFCWRT member William Jordan, a talented and expert reenactor cook, will offer some savory samples from his campfire. William recently prepared a massive feast at the Eastern Carolina Village and Farm Museum in Greenville. William and wife Kim prepared a feast of turkey, pork tenderloin, boiled ham and corned beef for 47 people at the museum's "Celebration of Trades and Skills of the 1800s." Guests included the Pitt County Commissioners. And it was all done over the campfire!

The June 13 meeting begins the seventh year of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table's "Member Forum" series of summer programs. Most Civil War Round Tables take the summer off but our round table is able to call on the talents and knowledge of our members to present programs through the summer.

Make plans to come and hear this fascinating story. The meeting will take place on Thursday evening, June 13, beginning at 7 p.m. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal Church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Bring a friend! Civil War Uninterrupted: Jefferson Davis, George Washington Rains, and the Confederate Gunpowder Strategy

We have all been taught to believe Jefferson Davis made a significant strategic mistake during the first year of the war by choosing to defend nearly every square mile of Confederate territory, and that this mistake helped doom the Confederacy. According to Ted Savas, this is demonstrably false, and a significant body of objective evidence proves it. Davis's vision and decision-making were well-reasoned and much more successful than even he believed possible. Because of the partnership with George Rains and the strategy those two men employed to ward off invasion long enough to set the Confederacy up to fight.

The war you think you understand was not the war that was actually waged.

Theodore P. Savas is a luminary in the world of Civil War publishing. He is both an author and a publisher. He is the co-founder and majority partner of Savas Beatie, an award-winning independent book trade publishing company that specializes in military and general history, and especially the American Civil War.

Ted has a B.A. in history, most of a Masters, and a Juris Doctorate (with Honors) from the University of Iowa College of Law. He practiced law for many years in Silicon Valley, taught adjunct college classes in history, business, and politics for 20 years. He also founded and plays in the west coast rock band Arminius, flying back to Northern California to open for larger acts. Ted has no idea what he wants to do when he grows up. Cape Fear Civil War Round Table 30th Anniversary Celebration

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table held its first meeting in 1994, thirty years ago this coming October. To mark this important anniversary, our speaker for the October 10, 2024 meeting will be Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., Professor Emeritus in the Department of History at UNC Wilmington.

In 1994, the CFCWRT invited Chris, who lived in Currituck, North Carolina at the time, to be its premier speaker. He spoke on the Lower Cape Fear during the Civil War. After returning to his hometown of Wilmington the following year, Chris became active in the Round Table and eventually served as its second president, 2000 to 2006.

The first president was George Slaton (1994-2000), who now lives in Davidson, North Carolina. George has also been invited to the meeting, as have our other two presidents, David Norris (2006-10) and Bob Cooke (2010-18).

Chris will talk to us about the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table's early days and why we still find the Civil War so important and fascinating.

Much has changed since 1994. In fact, it often seems as if the pace of change has accelerated more quickly than we could have imagined. Yet, our organization is still growing and thriving.

Make plans to be with us on October 10, 2024 as we look back on the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table's past thirty years and look forward to the next thirty.

John Quarstein

Admiral Buchanan and The Battle of Mobile Bay

The CFCWRT is thrilled to welcome back the very popular and engaging John Quarstein. John, a premier Civil War naval war expert, will be speaking on the subject of "Admiral Buchanan and the Battle of Mobile Bay."

Able, courageous, and experienced, Admiral Franklin Buchanan was perhaps the most aggressive senior officer to join the Confederate Navy. His strategic flair, discipline, and heroic qualities made him respected and admired by all those around him.

After being put in command of CSS Virginia, Buchanan led efforts that resulted in the Confederacy's greatest naval victory before being appointed as the first Admiral in the Confederate Navy and selected to command the naval defenses in Mobile Bay, Alabama. As Admiral, he oversaw the construction of multiple ironclads and was on board CSS Tennessee during its battle against David Glasgow Farragut's Union Fleet in 1864.

John V. Quarstein is a nationally known speaker and an award-winning historian, preservationist, and author. John served as the director of the Virginia War Museum until his retirement and is now Director Emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at The Mariners' Museum in Newport News, Virginia. He has authored 18 books with three more on the way. He has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary.

John's deep interest in all things related to the Civil War stems from his youth living on Fort Monroe, walking where heroes like Abraham Lincoln and R. E. Lee once stood. An avid collector of decoys, waterfowl/maritime art, and oriental rugs, John lives among them in his home, the 1757 Herbert House on Sunset Creek in Hampton, Virginia. On the National Register of Historic Places, this is the only house to have survived August 7, 1861, burning of Hampton.

Bert Dunkerly

The Battle of Stones River, Tennessee

With the fate of Middle Tennessee yet to be determined, President Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation went into effect on January 1, 1863. The president had signed the proclamation back in September of 1862, but he needed battlefield victories to bolster its authority. The stakes being gambled outside Murfreesboro along Stones River were enormous.

The battle of Stones River became a significant turning point of the Civil War, and one that had the highest percentage of casualties on both sides of any Civil War battle.

Lincoln himself would often look back on that fragile time and ponder all that was at stake. "I can never forget whilst I remember anything," he told Federal commander Maj. Gen. William S. Rosecrans, "that about the end of last year and the beginning of this, you gave us a hard-earned victory, which, had there been a defeat instead the nation could scarcely have lived over."

Robert M. Dunkerly (Bert) is a historian, award-winning author, and speaker who is actively involved in historic preservation and research. He holds a degree in History from St. Vincent College and a Masters in Historic Preservation from Middle Tennessee State University. He has worked at nine historic sites, written eleven books and over twenty articles. His research includes archaeology, colonial life, military history, and historic commemoration.

Dunkerly is currently a Park Ranger at Richmond National Battlefield Park. He has visited over 400 battlefields and over 700 historic sites worldwide.

UNCW Professor Angela Zombek to Speak on Key West in the Civil War: Union Stronghold Was No Tropical Paradise

by Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Our May 9 meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by Dr. Angela Zombek, Ph.D., associate professor of history at UNCW. Dr. Zombek, an expert on the prisoner of war experience in the Civil War, will talk about the strategic Union outpost of Key West, including the use of Fort Zachary Taylor as a prison for blockade runners, Confederate sympathizers and Union miscreants. It was no “Margaritaville.”

Fort Taylor, on the southwest tip of Key West, overlooks the watery pass where the waters of the Gulf of Mexico blend into the Atlantic Ocean. Cruise ships pass, and fade into the background as beachgoers soak up sun, swim, snorkel, and witness magnificent sunsets, but it was much different from 1861 to 1865.

Today, Fort Zachary Taylor Historic State Park is one of the most sought-after attractions in Key West and in the Florida Park System, but during the Civil War, Fort Taylor was the “Gibraltar” of the Gulf,” defending U.S. interests against European powers in the Western Hemisphere, and headquartering the Union Navy’s East Gulf Blockading Squadron. According to the American Battlefield Trust, “Union seamen brought 299 captured blockade runners, their crews, and tons of supplies to Key West, which contributed to the Union victory as supplies in the Confederacy became scarce. U.S. authorities auctioned off captured vessels and cargo and held blockade runners and disloyal civilians – from Key West and elsewhere – in Fort Taylor.”

Membership Report

Before the war, Americans North and South recognized Key West’s significance. In 1856, the Key West newspaper Key of the Gulf contended that Forts Taylor and Jefferson on the tiny island of the Dry Tortugas west of Key West would, in any maritime struggle, “constitute the most important rallying points for all the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico” since the waters between the Florida Keys, Cuba, and the Bahamas would be an attractive theater for naval warfare. Fort Taylor guarded these waters and oversaw the “entire cotton crop of the country” on its way to market.

Dr. Zombek (PhD University of Florida) is an historian of the Civil War Era and is Associate Professor of History at the University of North Carolina Wilmington. She is also coordinator of the Masters Program in History at UNCW and the managing editor of “Interpreting the Civil War” series at Kent State University. She is the author of Penitentiaries, Punishment, and Military Prisons: Familiar Responses to an Extraordinary Crisis during the America Civil War (Kent State University Press). Her current book project, Stronghold of the Union: Key West Under Martial Law, is under contract with The University Press of Florida.

She is a native of Ohio and holds an MA from the University of Akron and a Ph.D. from the University of Florida. She recalls a visit to the Camp Chase historic site in Columbus, Ohio, as the spark that ignited her interest in Civil War history, especially the history of incarceration in the war. Camp Chase became a prison for captured Confederates, and many died there. More than 400,000 soldiers—about 194,000 Union and 214,000 Confederate—were captured over the course of the war. Prison conditions were brutal with approximately 30,000 Union soldiers and 26,000 Confederates dying while imprisoned. Deaths occurred most often because of medical conditions including infectious diseases such as typhoid fever, cholera, yellow fever, malaria, etc. Many also died because of malnutrition and exposure to the elements.

But Professor Zombek's talk will go beyond the topic of incarceration. "The Civil War looks different from Key West," she notes. Despite Florida's secession, Union troops secured and occupied Key West, a strategic military and economic outpost, for the U.S. throughout the entire Civil War. The Union garrison, including the 2nd United States Colored Infantry come 1864, fortified Key West against potential Confederate and foreign attacks, confronted civilians with Confederate sympathies, and enforced both confiscation policy and the Emancipation Proclamation, from which Key West was not exempt despite the fact that it remained under U.S. control.

To maintain control, Union martial law cracked down on Confederate sympathizers, blockade runners, smugglers and even Union malcontents, including some draft protesters from New York City. At least one British citizen was held when he was captured trying to run the blockade. Most blockade running ships were built in the United Kingdom and British citizens often served on the ships. Cotton from the south escaped through the blockade and the small, fast ships "ran" to neutral harbors like the Bahamas and Havana, Cuba, where the cotton was loaded onto larger ships bound for Europe. In Europe, the cotton was sold, and the Confederacy bought weapons and other military supplies (and private blockade runners bought scarce consumer goods such as coffee, luxury clothing and so forth) to be carried back to the intermediate ports where they were loaded onto the blockade runners for the dangerous voyage into the blockaded south. By 1864 most Confederate ports were closed to significant blockade running and only Wilmington remained to supply essential supplies to the beleaguered Confederate armies.

Make plans to come and hear this fascinating story about a little known aspect of the Civil War. The meeting will take place on Thursday evening, May 9, beginning at 7 p.m. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal Church at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in

Edward Charles “Hoot” Gibson, 64

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

We of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, and indeed all those in the wider community of history lovers in Eastern North Carolina, were stunned to learn of the sudden and unexpected death of our friend Ed Gibson on Wednesday, April 3, 2024.

Edward Charles “Hoot” Gibson 64, passed away peacefully at home of natural causes. He leaves a great hole in this world, for his family, friends and all that knew him.

Ed was a charter member of the round table and was an intensely loyal and supportive member of the group. When we were struck by the twin scourges of Hurricane Florence and the COVID phenomenon, Ed was always there to provide whatever help and support that was needed. He was our ever-reliable audiovisual guru and also brought his encyclopedic memory to bear in presentations at Oakdale Cemetery and at other events.

Ed was born July 20, 1959 on base at Camp Lejeune in Jacksonville, North Carolina to Elwood and Elizabeth (Dieterle) Gibson. He received his bachelor's degree from UNCW and had Certificates of training from NC State. Ed spent his life in service of others through his work with the City of Wilmington Police Department, the City of Burgaw Police Department, and as a Magistrate for North Carolina District 5. He also served as a reservist in the United States Coast Guard.

Ed had a passion for history, which led him to be involved with many groups in addition to the round table, including the North Carolina Military History Society and the Sons of the Union Veterans, where he served as commander of the General Ruger Camp of the SUV. He also loved to read, geocache and smoke a fine cigar. Ed traveled to most of the states of the country. He loved looking for hidden caches and made many friends along the way on his adventures.

A Celebration of Ed's Life will be held 2:00 PM Saturday May 11, 2024 at North Topsail Shores Baptist Church, 808 Old Folkstone Road Sneads Ferry, NC 28460.

The family will have a time of Visitation one hour prior to the service at the Church, also will be broadcast on the churches Facebook Livestream. In lieu of flowers please make donations to North Topsail Shores Baptist Church. 808 Old Folkstone Rd, Sneads Ferry, NC 28460.

Brunswick Civil War Roundtable Event May 7th

U.S. Navy Captain Edward W. Gantt (Ret.) will be the guest speaker at its Tuesday, May 7th meeting. His presentation is entitled, "Contributions of the United States Colored Troops during the Civil War." This meeting will also mark this organization's 14th anniversary. The meeting will be held at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach at 7:00 PM. Everyone is welcome.

The United States Colored Troops played a critical role in the war. Over 180,000 African Americans enlisted, accounting for roughly 10% of the Union Army. Their regiments fought with courage and distinction, challenging racist notions about their fighting ability.

Capt. Gantt has had a celebrated career. U.S. Army Airborne and Ranger schools. Helicopter door gunner and crew chief in South Vietnam. Naval Aviation Officer Candidate School where he received his Naval Flight Officer "Wings of Gold." Career duty included over 2,000 hours flying time. Upon retirement, he became a teacher and is an active re-enactor.

The guest fee is $10, and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues, which can include a spouse. For more information, email Brunswickcwrt@gmail.com. Or you may visit their website at Brunswickcivilwarroundtable.com or their Facebook page.

Victor Vignola Contrasts Differences in Command At Pivotal 1862 Battle of Fair Oaks/Seven Pines

By T. Jonathan Jackson, CFCWRT Correspondent

Award winning author Victor Vignola traveled from Upstate New York's Hudson Valley to far-off Wilmington to address our round table at the April 11 meeting. Vic noted that his car has over 300,000 miles on it, so long-distance road trips aren't unusual for him. His topic was Contrasts in Command: The Battle of Fair Oaks, May 31-June 1, 1862.

His many trips to the battlefields of Virginia engendered interest in the battle of Fair Oaks/Seven Pines (two phases of the same battle) on May 31 and June 1, 1862. McClellan led the Army of the Potomac up the Peninsula between the James and the York rivers to the outskirts of Richmond, the Confederate capital. His march had been slowed by abysmal weather, Union fears for the security of Washington City, and McClellan's inherent caution and lack of audacity. The Confederate army under Joe Johnston had also been cautious and reluctant to engage the larger Union army, but Confederate ingenuity and intrepidity had also served to slow McClellan's progress. With the armies less than 10 miles from Richmond, Johnston had run out of room to retreat.

Finally, McClellan made a move that left his army vulnerable because it was divided by the flooded Chickahominy, a river that Vignola said is "best described as the Rodney Dangerfield of rivers; it gets no respect...it's a swamp!" Easily forded in dry periods, it was now a flooded tangle of undergrowth, trees, mud and flowing water hundreds of yards wide. One corps, to be followed by another was south of the river while the rest of the Army of the Potomac was north of the Chickahominy, now a formidable barrier.

Vignola, with extensive and welcome cooperation and guidance from National Park Service historian Robert E. L. “Bobby” Krick, poured over the primary sources related to the battle and also visited the places where the battle took place. Unfortunately, most of the battlefield had been “developed” with houses, light commercial buildings and the nearby Richmond International Airport and Interstate 64. Maybe we feel a need these days to move fast because we have destroyed so much of our root structure (just a thought from your diligent correspondent).

Focusing on the remaining 12 acres of the Adams farm, Vic rediscovered what happened when nearly 200,000 men clashed with the fate of the Confederate capital in the balance.

As Bobby Krick wrote in the foreword to Contrasts in Command, “No truly accurate unraveling of the Fair Oaks portion of the May 31 fight existed until now. Nearly everything in the following pages is fresh and convincing. Author Vignola even has reoriented the traditional alignment of the combatants by nearly 90 degrees. His work has reconfigured the boundaries of the Fair Oaks action and shows that room remains for original research and new discoveries.”

About 40 members and guests heard Vignola present the entire story of Fair Oaks with hardly a reference to his notes. His command of the subject matter and his energetic and engaging style was entertaining and enlightening. Many questions ensued, enlarging the enjoyment of the audience.

The after event presentation.

Award-Winning Story Tells How Contrasting Command Decisions Led to Confederate Misstep at Battle of Fair Oaks

by Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Our April 11 meeting features a presentation by Victor Vignola on the battle of Fair Oaks, Virginia, on May 31 and June 1, 1862. The presentation is based on first-time author Vignola's award-winning study of the large, important but generally overlooked battle.

On March 17, 1862, Union Major General George B. McClellan landed at Ft. Monroe near the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay. By the end of May, he had slowly but surely moved the huge Army of the Potomac, with over 100,000 men, up the peninsula between the James and the York Rivers. Now, he was poised on the doorstep of the Confederate capital of Richmond. It was a crucial time as the Confederacy had suffered the loss of New Orleans, the south's largest city and most important port, and several strategic locations on the Atlantic Coast. Perhaps the end was near. The only bright spot was the Shenandoah Valley where Confederate Lt. General Thomas J. "Stonewall" Jackson had won a series of improbable victories and caused a certain amount of panic on the part of the U.S. government in Washington, D.C.

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

We are pleased to welcome new members Thomas Piech, residing in Livingston, Tennessee and Steven Rauschkolb hailing from Leland to our Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable.

New members as well as membership renewals, remain the key to successful, non-profit volunteer organizations such as ours. Please check you name tag as it reflects your individual renewal month. You may renew online or in person at our next meeting. If you prefer to mail your membership fee, just mail it to CFCWRT, 8387 E. Highcroft NE, Leland NC 28451.

Remember please that every member is a recruiter and that our CWRT needs your active recruiting amongst your network of neighbors and friends. A great way to introduce member candidates is to bring them to the next meeting or better still invite them to join us on our April 27th Historical Cape Fear River Cruise.

One of our members passed away recently - Ed Gibson. Please see the memoriam on page 5. We will get more information out to our members as it becomes available. Fair winds and following seas Ed. We will miss you.

Confederate General Joseph E. Johnston (shown) had skillfully retreated with his outnumbered army but now he was out of room. Reinforced to about 85,000 men, the Confederates looked for the opportunity to strike. In a spring notable for historic rainfalls across the country, Johnston saw a golden opportunity when McClellan moved about a quarter of his army across the rain-swollen Chickahominy River.

Johnston reacted quickly with a plan to defeat the isolated Union force, a victory that would certainly force McClellan to either retreat or fight with an army that was actually outnumbered.

Victor Vignola is a lifelong history student who, upon retirement from New York State government, devoted his energy and formidable skills to researching the overlooked battle of Fair Oaks/Seven Pines. He is a graduate of the State University of New York at New Paltz and a resident of the Hudson Valley's Orange County, an area steeped in rich history including George Washington's headquarters at Newburgh.

Fair Oaks and Seven Pines aren't like the tandem identifiers of Manassas/Bull Run and Sharpsburg/Antietam. That is, those well-known battles were given different names by the contending forces; the southerners naming the engagements for nearby towns and the northerners naming them for water courses that dominated the two battlefields. Fair Oaks and Seven Pines were two different sectors of the same battle. In spite of the fact that more than 70,000 soldiers were engaged and more than 11,000 became casualties—including the Confederate commander, General Joseph E. Johnston—the battle has attracted little scholarly attention.

One reason for the lack of attention is the battle is considered a draw, a deadly but indecisive clash that resulted in little but damage to both armies. Perhaps we have an illogical or indefensible tendency to “keep score,” and see battles as wins or losses, like a sporting contest, rather than a point on a continuum, part of a campaign. At Fair Oaks and Seven Pines, the Union army suffered a loss of momentum, and perhaps confidence, while the Confederates experienced an obvious failure to destroy almost a third of the threatening force. The Confederates also “lost” the services of Gen. Johnston who was badly wounded. The quotation marks around “lost” refer to the fact that General Robert E. Lee was given command of the Confederate army in Virginia and the rest, as they say, is history. Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia wrote an amazing record of martial prowess and prolonged the war for three more years. Gen. Johnston, never a favorite of Confederate President Jefferson Davis was given a command in the Western Theater, relieved twice, brought back twice and ultimately surrendered to Maj. General William T. Sherman at Bennett Place, N.C., about a week after Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox.

Another reason for the lack of attention is that, sadly, almost the entire battlefield has been lost to development. Sandwiched between the Richmond International Airport and Interstate 64, close to the urban center of Richmond, almost none of the land where the battle was fought has been preserved. Vignola’s book became the catalyst for the preservation of 12 key acres of the Fair Oaks portion of the fight by the American Battlefield Trust. Unable to view the site of a battle, a contemporary student faces a much more difficult task to unravel the various movements of units and explicate the decisions of commanders.

It's likely that Fair Oaks/Seven Pines will be overlooked no longer. Not only has Vic Vignola's book led to the signal accomplishment of preservation of the last remaining part of the battlefield, it has garnered the prestigious Fletcher Pratt Award for the best non-fiction book on the Civil War published during the year. The award is presented by the Civil War Round Table of New York City. Previous winners include famous authors such as Dr. James M. McPherson, Ron Chernow, Ed Bearss and many other prestigious authors.

Vignola's work is also a finalist for the American Battlefield Trust's first annual prize for history. The trust announced that the "prize will be made annually to a work of military history or biography that underscores the essential role of the nation's military conflicts on the founding, formation and perpetuation of our exceptional country. In creating this award, sponsored entirely by a generous donor, the Trust is encouraging authors to create works that showcase the rich research potential of historic battlefields."

Vignola's work not only brings to light a forgotten battlefield, it shines a bright beam on the personalities and "Contrasts in Command" that led to the result of this momentous clash.

The meeting will take place on Thursday evening, April 11, beginning at 7 p.m. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Bring a friend! Successful "Spring Fling" Held at the Bellamy Mansion

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

More than 20 attended the Round Table's "Spring Fling" at the Bellamy Mansion Museum at 5th and Market in historic downtown Wilmington. Bellamy Executive Director Gareth Evans and Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Ph.D., presented an informal and insight-packed look at the history of the house and what took place there during the Civil War and its immediate aftermath. Thanks is too small a word for Yelena Howell and all that she did to put the outing together and ensure it was a convivial and informational event. We were especially pleased to see Mr. and Mrs. Gannon, Mr. and Mrs. Buggeln, Mr. and Mrs. Burger, Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, and, of course, Mr. and Mrs. Howell. Sign up now for the Civil War Round Table cruise on the Cape Fear River with Dr. Fonvielle: Saturday, April 27, at 9:45 a.m.

The Bellamy Mansion was built between 1859 and 1861 so predates the Civil War. It includes several architectural styles in its design. It has twenty-two rooms and was built by both enslaved and free craftsmen. It was built for Dr. John D. Bellamy, a physician and plantation owner.

In Memoriam

Edward C. Gibson, 64, passed away unexpectedly on April 3. He was a charter member of Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and remained a strong supporter of the group. He regularly ran the audio-visual operation for our meetings. Ed was a descendant of a soldier in the 147th Pennsylvania Infantry. He was commander of the Major General Thomas Ruger Camp #1 of Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War. He was known for his encyclopedic memory and can-do spirit. Ed will be greatly missed.

Sarah Kay Bierle's Presentation on the Hancock Family Emphasizes that "History is About People"

By Marty Green, CFCWRT Correspondent

Sarah Kay Bierle, managing editor-of the Emerging Civil War blog, presented an engaging and insight-filled talk about the family of Union General Winfield Scott Hancock - "From California to Gettysburg," and indeed before and after.

Sarah's personable approach made the family come alive, particularly Almira Russell Hancock, the wife of the general. As the young wife of a junior officer she was reluctant to follow the paths laid out in the pre-Civil War army, full of postings to primitive and uncomfortable places on the various frontiers of the growing republic.

Yet, she reported that a comment

from then U.S. Army Colonel Robert E. Lee made a powerful impact on her and she went on to graciously and courageously share the hardships of the frontier army with her husband and, soon, two young children.

[At left, members of the Roundtable listen intently to Ms. Bierle's presentation. Her point about the war being about people is often forgotten.]

Approximately 40 members and friends attended the presentation including visitor Dan Hickman, retired Army Brigadier General and author of A Thousand Chances: A Memoir of Life and Death in the Air Cavalry During the Pivotal Year of the Vietnam War. In addition to his service as a combat helicopter pilot in the Vietnam War, General Hickman commanded the 30th Heavy Separate Brigade (Armored) of the NC National Guard in Iraq. We also welcomed two new members, Steve Rauschkolb and Tom Piech. Steve is a director of the Civil War Round Table Congress.

We need more contributors to the Runner newsletter. We're looking for book reviews, short pieces about trips you've taken to a historic Civil War site (like Jim Gannon's in this issue), a brief bit of history other members might find interesting, or your experiences with the Roundtable itself. This newsletter belongs to you - the members of the Roundtable. Let's all take more of an active part.

A Brief History of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) was established in 1994 and our first president was George Slaton who led the organization until the year 2000.

George, who now lives in the Davidson, NC, area, recalls that an organization called the Civil War Round Table Associates met in Wilmington in the summer of 1993. The organization was founded and led by legendary battlefield preservationist and Civil War activist, Jerry Russell, and their primary purpose was to encourage Civil War Round Tables to get involved in battlefield preservation.

The Wilmington event included a workshop on “How to Start a Civil War Round Table.” That workshop motivated George and others to establish a round table in Wilmington. Contributing to the momentum was Civil War publisher Ted Savas and prospective authors Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley. Ted, then leading the publishing company of Savas Woodbury, first published Chris Fonvielle’s The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, and Mark Bradley’s The Battle of Bentonville: Last Stand in the Carolinas. George noted “It was a momentous weekend!”

It took some time to get rolling and the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table first met at the University of North Carolina, Wilmington (UNCW) in October 1994. The first speaker was Chris Fonvielle, who later joined the faculty of UNCW. Professor Fonvielle, now retired, is the premier historian of the Lower Cape Fear from Colonial times through the Civil War. Following George Slaton, Professor Fonvielle led the CFCWRT from 2000 through 2006. The meeting site changed from UNCW to St. John’s Episcopal Church and then to St. Andrew’s on the Sound Episcopal Church. Under the leadership of David Norris (2006-10) and Bob Cooke (2010 to 2018), the organization grew steadily and many nationally known speakers and authors spoke to the group as well as accomplished local historians.

From 1997 through 2005 the organization featured tours to locations such as Richmond and its vicinity, Sharpsburg, Md., and Spotsylvania County, Va. From 2006 through 2011 tours were shortened to locations in North Carolina that could be reached within a day rather than requiring overnight travel. Today, the round table features opportunities focused on local attractions such as the Wilmington Railroad Museum, a great attraction that preserves the history of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad, the lifeline that connected the south’s last blockade running port with the Army of Northern Virginia.

Dr. Fonvielle has led many tours for the round table including a hike through the maritime forest to discover the earthworks of the “Sugar Loaf Line,” a boat tour on the Cape Fear River and an evening tour of Ft. Fisher that ended well after dark looking out on the ocean as “friendly enemies,” heroes of the 1865 battle, Col. William Lamb, CSA, and Brigadier General Newton Martin Curtis, USA, did in 1893.

The CFCWRT is actively involved in supporting Fort Fisher and Fort Anderson, the NC Historical Sites in the area, the J. Ryder Lewis historical park in Carolina Beach, as well as the NC Maritime Museum in Southport. We have also featured speakers from the Latimer House, the museum of the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society, in Wilmington.

Beginning in 2018, the Round Table the round table moved to Harbor Church in Wilmington and then back to St. John's Episcopal Church in midtown Wilmington. Bill Jayne has been president of the club since 2018 and has seen it through the devastating Hurricane Florence in 2018 and the COVID phenomenon. As of 2024, the round table has more members than it did in 2018.

We now present a summer program featuring "member forums". in which members present short programs (approximately 15 minutes) on specific topics of their choosing. We have also offered seminar-style round table discussions on specific topics such as the failure of Confederate forces to attack the Union landing force before its assault on Fort Fisher.

Bentonville Battlefield Commemorates 159th Anniversary

By Fred Claridge, Newsletter Editor

Bentonville Battlefield commemorated the 159th Anniversary of the battle at an all day event on March 16. The weather cooperated; it was a beautiful sunny day. A major theme of this year's event was Civil War medicine. Several re-enactors portrayed Civil War surgeons, including one re-enactor who portrayed a surgeon who was actually at the battle. Another re-enactor displayed a surgical kit actually used by his three-times great uncle - Dr. Bleeker Hovey - during the war. A highlight was the participation of the National Museum of Civil War medicine. Museum staff came down from their home base of Frederick, Maryland to give several presentations and to display a canvas stretcher that was actually used at the Battle of Bentonville. It carried bloodstains from soldiers who were wounded there. Quite a sight to see for visitors and the public alike. Several organizations were also represented at the event, and a number of tours were given. The battlefield is lucky to have the Harper House which served as a field hospital during the battle open to the public. Roundtable members are encouraged to visit the battlefield someday if you haven't made it up that way. It's an important part of Civil War and North Carolina history. Pictures of the event can be seen below and on the following page.

The Hunley Submarine is Still Hard to Find But a Visit Excels

By Jim Gannon, Program Director

It took over 130 years for scientists to locate the wreck of the Confederate submarine, the CSS Hunley. Using my GPS on a recent visit to Charleston, I found the Hunley was still hard to find because my GPS insisted we should go down a road that is closed for reconstruction. However, our persistence in finding a more circuitous route was well rewarded. Our visit far exceeded expectations.

The Hunley sank in Charleston's outer harbor on 17 February 1864 after sinking the USS Housatonic, a Union ship on blockade duty. The Hunley thus became the first combat submarine in world history to sink a ship. However, the Hunley never returned after the attack and the exact location of the wreck was unknown until 1995. The ship was raised in 2000, and despite study by many experts, uncertainty remains regarding her final moments and the cause of her sinking.

The ship alone would be the worth the visit. It is both fascinating and humbling to see her resting in her preservative pool and appreciate the courage of the men who were willing to take this experimental contraption into battle against real Naval ships of war. However, there is an outstanding museum there as well that tells the whole story of the building of the ship, the experience of the crew, and the final voyage. In particular, the facial recreations of the crew members are haunting.

The museum also includes a recreation of the ship's crew compartment that was built for a movie. It is available for visitors to sit in and appreciate the cramped positions of the crew, as illustrated in the photo showing me at a crewman's station at the crank which turned the ship's propeller. Note, as squeezed as I was, the movie prop is actually a little more spacious than the ship.

Special mention must be made of the outstanding docents. The day we went we were able to see two different and outstanding presentations both similar in quality and duration to the presentations that we have at our own Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. One in particular focused on the research that has been done regarding what may have happened to the Hunley and its crew during and after the attack, and what could have caused the vessel to sink.

If you have the opportunity, your own search for the CSS Hunley will be the worth the effort.

Richmond had a number of Confederate hospitals, but Chimborazo was by far the largest and best equipped of all the Confederate hospitals across the south. At its busiest times, the hospital housed nearly 4,000 patients. Compare that to most hospitals today which may have 250 to 350 beds. Approximately 75,000 wounded were treated at this hospital during its time of operation. None of the original hospital exists unfortunately, but the small museum is fascinating.

March Meeting Features Emerging Civil War Historian's Program on "From California to Gettysburg: The Hancock Family"

by Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Our March 14 meeting features a presentation by Sarah Kay Bierle titled "From California to Gettysburg: The Hancock Family." In 1858, Winfield and Almira Hancock and their two children moved to California. As a U.S. Army officer, Captain Winfield S. Hancock's duties had taken the family to several remote outposts, but their time in California would be some of their most memorable days. The American Civil War began while the Hancocks were in California, and this conflict presented challenging choices. Their decision—made in California—would help keep the Golden State in the Union and also impact one of the great eastern battles of the war.

Sarah Kay Bierle is a native of California but she graduated from Thomas Edison State University in Trenton, N.J., with a BA in History, and now lives in Central Virginia within easy distance of several major battlefields of the Civil War. She serves as managing editor at Emerging Civil War (ECW). ECW is a public history-oriented platform for sharing original scholarship related to the American Civil War. ECW seeks to encourage a diversity of perspectives in the scholarship it presents. They work to identify and spotlight the next generation of Civil War historians and the fresh ideas they bring to the historical conversation.

Ms. Bierle also works in the Education Department at American Battlefield Trust. She has spent years exploring ways to share quality historical research in ways that will inform and inspire modern audiences, including school presentations, writing, and speaking engagements. Sarah has published three historical fiction books and her first nonfiction book, Call Out the Cadets: The Battle of New Market, is part of the Emerging Civil War series. She is currently working on a short biography of John Pelham for the ECW series.

Her presentation focusing on the Winfield Scott Hancock family fits within her interest in exploring the American Civil War era and seeking to better understand the multi-layered stories. She writes: "Military or civilian, enslaved or free, blue or gray... every story fits together to help us gain a deeper and more complete portrait of our past. It is vital to continue conversing about this era of history, remembering to strip away myths and seeing that people really lived, suffered, loved, and lost. I believe that discussion about history can take various forms, but that listening, conversing, and pursuing an informed, gracious understanding is most important."

Capt. Hancock and his wife, Almira Russell Hancock, along with their two children, had served at several posts from St. Louis to Florida and then Kansas, Utah and California. An 1840 graduate of West Point, Hancock had distinguished himself in the Mexican War and served with many officers who would become notable leaders in the Civil War. In the Army's Department of the Pacific, one of the best friends of the Hancock family was Major Lewis A. Armistead, who chose to side with the Confederacy, while Hancock, a native of Pennsylvania remained loyal to the Union.

It might be said that in 1860, the professional officer corps of the U.S. Army, most of them graduates of West Point, were a family of sorts, and like many American families, they were split by the war. Research by Dick Crews of the Cleveland Civil War Round Table reveals that there were 977 graduates of the West Point classes of 1833 through 1861 alive at the beginning of the Civil War in 1861. Some 259 (26%) joined the Confederacy and 638 (65%) remained with the U.S. Army. Eight graduates didn't serve with either army in the war. Thirty-nine southerners, like General George H. Thomas, remained with the Union and 32 northerners, such as Gen. John C. Pemberton, served in the Confederate army. Ninety-five West Pointers were killed in the war, and 141 wounded.

Almira R. Hancock

Captain Hancock and son Russell

In the war, both Hancock and Armistead rose to General rank and, at the climactic ending of the titanic Battle of Gettysburg on July 3, 1863, Armistead was killed leading his brigade in the assault against the center of the Union line commanded by Hancock. Hancock was badly wounded in the battle and although he recovered to once again lead troops in the war—and run unsuccessfully for president in 1880—his health was damaged by the wound and he died in 1886. His birthday, by the way, was February 14, 1824, and this most recently past Valentine's Day marks his 200th birthday.

In commenting on the Hancock family, Ms. Bierle notes that “It does not detract from General Hancock's character to acknowledge that Almira helped make him a successful man. Her faithfulness, wisdom, determination, and domestic skills contributed to his respect among his superiors and peers. In the ancient Proverbs of Solomon, the writer questioned, ‘Who can find a virtuous wife? For her worth is far above rubies. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sits among the elders of the land.’ Almira Russell Hancock's life is a positive example of how one courageously faithful lady can stand beside a man of strong character and enhance his success.”

The meeting will take place on Thursday evening, March 14. Doors open at 6:30. As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington, easily accessed via Park Avenue, off Independence Boulevard.

In search of Captain H. B. Middleton or: Why was a Future Italian Count in the Confederate Army?

By Jim Gannon, CFCWRT Program Director

Recently I visited Middleton Place historic site on the Ashley River near Charleston. Among the numerous artifacts on display in a cabinet, I noticed a document, a parole, issued at Appomattox to Captain H. B. Middleton of the 1st South Carolina Infantry. I was quite fascinated by it and wondered, “Who was this man? And what happened to him after the war?”

I started my inquiry with the National Park Service’s online data base of Civil War Soldiers. It turns out that there were two different regiments that bore the name of 1st South Carolina and there were quite a number of men from South Carolina named Middleton who served in the war. However, after some poking about, I found our Captain. He enlisted as a private and finished the war as a captain in a regiment known as Hagood’s 1st South Carolina. I would later learn that he was 18 years old at the start of the war and at first served in a signal unit and an artillery unit before serving with Hagood’s regiment in Northern Virginia. The unit participated in some of the war’s most famous battles such as Fredericksburg, Sharpsburg, The Wilderness, Cold Harbor, and Petersburg and suffered heavy casualties. The NPS data base lists 2,147 officers and men who served in the regiment at some point during the Civil War. Captain Middleton was among only 222 who were still in the ranks at Appomattox.

So, what happened next? I think we can assume that it was a dismal homecoming after Appomattox. The photo at left shows the heap of rubble which is all that is left today of the main plantation house of Middletown Place. The house was burned by the 46th New York late in the war and the remaining, load bearing brick walls, were toppled by a post war earthquake. (Another flanking large house was restored and is now a museum well worth visiting.) According to the docent at Middleton Place, the family was heavily invested in Confederate bonds and most of the vast wealth of the family was gone at the end of war.

However, the 22-year-old H.B. still had some unique opportunities that most veterans didn’t. Poking around the internet I stumbled onto a self-described “genealogical document” published in 1900. I learned that Captain H. B. Middleton’s full name was Henry Bentivoglio Van Ness Middleton. H.B. was born in 1843 in Charleston but educated in Paris before attending the South Carolina Military Academy (a predecessor to the Citadel.) He came from a long line of extremely wealthy and politically active Middletons and his ancestors included a member of the Continental Congress, a signer of the

An 1860s Papal Zouave

Declaration of Independence, and diplomats to Russia and Spain. His mother was an Italian woman, Pauline, the Countess of Bentivoglio. So, soon after the war, H.B. moved permanently to Italy where he became a captain of the Papal Zouaves, a military unit which was part of the army of the Papal States. H.B., like his father, would marry an Italian Countess in 1869, and their son would grow up to be an officer in the Italian Navy.

And eventually, in a world faraway from Appomattox, our veteran would become the Count of Bentivoglio, a title that was prominently intertwined with Italian history for hundreds of years.

Beautiful Set of Time-Life Civil War Series Books Being Raffled

By Mike McDonald, CFCWRT Treasurer

The Round Table is auctioning off a beautiful set of the Time-Life Civil War Series books to benefit the Roundtable. This is a complete set of the famous Time-Life series, all 28 volumes, including a unique index that allows the reader to find the complete story of each important person, each battle, each significant building, and even horses! Book titles include:

The War Begins
The Coastal War
Gettysburg
Sherman's March
War's Aftermath
Jackson's Valley Campaign
The Southern Home Front
Grant At Petersburg
The Assassination

And there are 19 other volumes, each with hundreds of little-known details, dozens of pictures, maps, charts, etc. that bring our nation's history to life.

This is not only an entertaining set of books, but also a reference work you will use for many years. You can go to the Roundtable's webpage <http://www.cfcwrt.org/> to get instructions on how to bid.

On March 16th, the Bentonville Battlefield will honor the 159th anniversary of the battle. The Museum of Civil War Medicine is going to be there for demonstrations. See the flyer on page 7.

Additional Upcoming Events in March and April

Yelena Howell, our Tours and Trips Director, provides lyrical details on two more upcoming and fascinating opportunities.

Yet men have we, whom we revere,
Now names, and men still housing here.
—George Meredith, “The Lark Ascending” (1881)

Ladies and gentlemen:

We would like to invite you to two special events now that the exuberant joy of March returns to the Lower Cape Fear, with not a snowflake to our credit this passing winter. (In the mood for a stunning Victorian poem set to the music it inspired? Let George Meredith and Ralph Vaughan Williams take your breath away: <http://tinyurl.com/OnALark>)

In the mood, too, for a spring soirée at the Bellamy Mansion Museum? Join us for wine and light hors d'œuvre on Tuesday, March 19, from 6 until 8 p.m. “Men we revere”, Executive Director Gareth Evans and Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., will preside over a scholarly discussion of the history and architecture of the famous historic home that was completed in 1861 and served as Federal headquarters after the fall of Wilmington in February of 1865.

RSVP with your preference of red or white wine or soft drink and any food allergies to Yelena by email at ybh2035@uncw.edu or text (910) 431-6102. Tickets are $20 ea. Checks, PayPal, and Venmo payments are appreciated and will remain refundable through 10 a.m. the day of the event. Cash payments are welcome at the next round table meeting on March 14.

Please be advised of accessibility issues at the Museum that has not been modified with an elevator or ramp entry. There are stairs to climb and descend.

The following month, we will be taking a private cruise down the Cape Fear River with Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. narrating and Capt. Ned Rhodes of Wilmington Water Tours at the helm. Join us on Saturday, April 27th, between 945 and 1145 a.m. for a Civil War-themed excursion. Tickets are available now for $45 ea. Invite a friend or your beau/belle and reserve your seats directly with Yelena (contact information above).

Chris Mackowski's Tour d'force Presentation on the Battle of Jackson, Mississippi, May 14, 1863

By S.K. Zook, Runner Correspondent

Prof. Chris Mackowski, founder and editor-in-chief of the Emerging Civil War blog, gave one of the most memorable presentations our round table has received on February 8. Without notes to refer to, Mackowski wove an interesting story around the personalities of the leaders and the impressions of the soldiers as U.S. Grant's Army of the Tennessee, moved quickly and confidently to eliminate a threat to its rear as it moved to isolate the essential Confederate fortress of Vicksburg.

Mackowski quickly reviewed the record and biographical details of U.S. Grant, emphasizing his greatest strength; “He just wouldn’t give up,” we were told. Turned back in six or seven attempts to neutralize Vicksburg, Grant kept trying until he found the solution in the spring of 1863. Crossing the mighty Mississippi River below Vicksburg, he moved inland with the equivalent of a Civil War blitzkrieg so that he could attack Vicksburg from practicable ground east of the city.

We learned that one of the oft repeated cliches of the campaign—that Grant cut himself off from his supply line in order to achieve his goal—was a myth. It was only after the Battle of Raymond on May 12, about two weeks and 40 miles into the campaign, that Grant decided to abandon his supply line in order to move quickly against the growing threat of Confederate General Joseph Johnston’s force converging on the Mississippi state capital of Jackson.

Johnston, we heard, didn’t want to be there. Although he was the highest-ranking U.S. Army officer to resign his commission and shift his allegiance to the Confederacy, his seniority in the rebel army was below that of three men he had outranked before.

Confederate President Jefferson Davis, a West Point graduate and former U.S. Secretary of War, stated that Johnston’s position behind the other three was because Johnston’s last U.S. rank of brigadier general had been tied to his staff post as Quartermaster General and the U.S. Army recognized his grade as a line officer as lieutenant colonel, not brigadier general.

Wounded at the Battle of Fair Oaks a year before the Battle of Jackson, Johnston was replaced by Robert E. Lee and although Davis gave him the important command of the Department of the West, the feud between the two leaders was never resolved. We also learned that Johnston and Davis differed on strategy.

As president and commander in chief, Davis felt driven to defend territory. “With a dozen governors tugging at him...’What about me?’ ‘You must defend my state,’ etc., as Mackowski put it, the political pressure was understandable.

Johnston, on the other hand, felt the way to victory meant the south had to conserve the power of its forces, maintaining the mobility of its armies. On the Peninsula of Virginia in 1862, however, that strategy had led to the Union army’s advance to the gates of Richmond, as Johnston continually gave up ground.

Prof. Mackowski was extremely critical of Johnston for what seemed to be his reluctance to give his best to stopping Grant, but also for seeming to place the defense of his own reputation above his duty to defend Vicksburg.

The battle itself was full of interesting anecdotes, including the part played by “Old Abe,” the eagle mascot of the 8th Wisconsin in the “Live Eagle Brigade” of BG Joseph Mower. Perhaps predictably, Johnston directed his subordinates to fight a delaying action while he retreated away from Jackson—and Vicksburg. Tragically for his cause, he had commanded Lt. General John C. Pemberton, commander of the Vicksburg defenses, to move against Grant. President Davis had ordered Pemberton to hold Vicksburg. Pemberton sought to obey both conflicting orders and split his forces. Ultimately, he faced Grant’s superior Army at Champion Hill and was soundly defeated, losing more than 4,000 men who would be needed to defend the river fort.

More than 50 members and friends attended the presentation including former Round Table president Chris Fonvielle, professor emeritus of history at UNCW, UNCW Asst. Professor of History Angela Zombek, Civil War publisher and author Ted Savas and author Sam Hood.

We welcomed new member Thomas Bello, who also won the special raffle of a custom line drawing created by Mason Jones with historically authentic, handmade quills and historic inks.

February Program to Feature Battle of Jackson, 1863

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Our February meeting features a presentation by Prof. Chris Mackowski, one of the most engaging and energetic speakers on the national Civil War circuit. He will focus on the subject of one of his recent books, The Battle of Jackson: May 14, 1863, published in 2022. The presentation is scheduled for Thursday evening, February 8, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Chris Mackowski, Ph.D., is the editor-in-chief and co-founder of Emerging Civil War and the series editor of the award-winning Emerging Civil War Series, published by Savas Beatie. Chris is a writing professor in the Jandoli School of Communication at St. Bonaventure University in Allegany, NY, where he also serves as associate dean for undergraduate programs. Chris is also historian-in-residence at Stevenson Ridge, a historic property on the Spotsylvania battlefield in central Virginia. He has worked as a historian for the National Park Service at Fredericksburg & Spotsylvania National Military Park, where he gives tours at four major Civil War battlefields (Fredericksburg,

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

2024 got off to a great start with a most informative and interesting discussion by Fort Fisher Site Manager, Jim Steele during which he detailed the progress on new site development and the new museum building construction. It was quite a process to get the project through to fruition, taking many years and a lot of hard work by many people. We departed the meeting that evening, as excited as our speaker, anticipating a project completion by early fall.

We were also very pleased to welcome two new members, Raoul Rebillard and Alex Efird, both residing in Wilmington. Gentlemen, welcome aboard!

Lastly, if your membership was due for renewal in January (or February for that matter) you may renew by mailing your check to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft, NE, Leland, NC 28451. You may also join or renew online or (best option) bring to our February 8th meeting and give it to our friendly Treasurer, Mike McDonald. He will be the distinguished gentlemen who doubles as the Round Table haberdasher who can also fit you to a new logo polo shirt or cap.

Recall please, that your month of membership renewal is printed on your name tag.

Chancellorsville, Wilderness, and Spotsylvania), as well as at the building where Stonewall Jackson died.

Chris has authored or co-authored more than 25 books and edited a half-dozen essay collections on the Civil War, and his articles have appeared in all the major Civil War magazines. Chris serves as vice president on the board of directors for the Central Virginia Battlefields Trust, he serves on the advisory board of the Civil War Roundtable Congress. He is also a member of the Antietam Institute and the U. S. Grant Homestead Association. In 2023, he was honored with the Houston Civil War Round Table's Frank Vandiver Award and also selected as the Copie Hill Fellow at the American Battlefield Trust.

Although Chris grew up in northwestern Pennsylvania and earned his bachelors' degree in communications at the University of Pittsburgh, he describes himself as a "Stonewall Jackson fanboy," and says that his fascination with the acclaimed Confederate general was his doorway into study of the Civil War. His book about the Battle of Jackson is dedicated to his eldest son, Jackson.

He also notes "I am a huge believer in the idea that battlefields teach us something about our history that we can't learn in any other way, so preserving those battlefields is vital." Unfortunately, as Dr. Mackowski notes in his book, the National Park Service assessment of Jackson's core battlefield areas overlays atop a busy state capital, with virtually no preserved space.

Jackson, Mississippi, was the third Confederate state capital to fall to Union forces. When Maj. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant captured the important rail junction in May 1863, however, he did so almost as an afterthought. Drawing on dozens of primary sources, contextualized by the latest scholarship on Grant's Vicksburg campaign, The Battle of Jackson, Mississippi, May 14, 1863, offers the most comprehensive account ever published on the fall of the Magnolia State's capital during Grant's inexorable march on Vicksburg.

General Grant had his eyes set not on Jackson but on Vicksburg, the “Gibraltar of the Confederacy,” strategically located on the Mississippi River the invaluable prize that had eluded him for the better part of a year. Vicksburg is located about half-way between Memphis, Tennessee, to the north, and New Orleans to the south. To get at Vicksburg, Grant finally marched south on the far side of the Mississippi River and crossed onto Mississippi soil to approach Vicksburg by land from the east. As he drove a wedge between Confederate General John Pemberton to the west, a chance encounter with Confederates at Raymond alerted him to a potential threat massing farther east in Jackson under the leadership of General Joseph E. Johnston, one of the Confederacy's most respected field officers. Jackson is about 40 miles east of Vicksburg.

Mississippi was also the home of Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederacy. In addition to being the state capital, Jackson was a vital transportation and communications hub and a major Confederate industrial center, and its fall removed vital logistical support for the Southern army holding Vicksburg. “It is hard to understand why most works on the Vicksburg campaign devote but few pages to the battle of Jackson,” Terrence Winschel retired historian of Vicksburg National Military Park, has written.

Grant turned on a dime and made for Jackson to confront the growing danger. He had no way of knowing that Johnston was already planning to abandon the vital state capital. The Southern general’s behavior has long puzzled historians, and some believe his stint in Jackson was the nadir of his long career. The loss of Jackson isolated Vicksburg and helped set up a major confrontation between Federal and Confederate forces a few days later at Champion Hill in one of the most decisive battles of the war. The capital’s fall demonstrated that Grant could march into Jefferson Davis’ home state and move about with impunity, and not even an acclaimed military leader like Joe Johnston could stop him.

Most people interested in Civil War military history focus their attention on the titanic contest between the Union’s Army of the Potomac and the Confederacy’s Army of Northern Virginia in the Eastern Theater, but Grant’s Vicksburg campaign, especially the movement of his army from the crossing of the Mississippi River to the gates of Vicksburg is often viewed as the most “bold and masterly” in the Civil War, according to one of his opposing generals, Stephen Dill Lee. Historian Donald L. Miller in his volume on Vicksburg, wrote: “It was a Civil War blitzkrieg. In eighteen days, Grant’s army had marched nearly two hundred miles; won five battles—four in six days; inflicted a loss of 5,787 killed, wounded, and missing; compelled the abandonment of two Confederate strongholds...captured the capital of Mississippi,” and pushed the opposing army into a confined space where a siege would result in an inevitable victory for the Union.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. See you there! Bring a friend! 2024 Member Forum Coming Up in July - We Need RT Speakers

By Jim Gannon, CFCWRT Program Director

Next summer will feature another member forum to give an opportunity to our own Round Table members to share a short (10-20 minute) presentation on some aspect of the Civil War that they personally find interesting and that they feel would be of interest to the Round Table.

This could be the story of an ancestor, something about a particular soldier or sailor, an event, an incident or anecdote, a little-known fact, or something about uniforms, equipment or technology. It could also be something involving local civil war sites or people. The presentations should be factual, accurate and of general interest. If you elect to use a visual presentation, the usual computer and A/V equipment will be available.

Please contact Jim Gannon at 910-789-0069 or ljimgannon@gmail.com if you would like to make a presentation.

January Program Features Jim Steele, Fort Fisher Site Manager, on the Long Road to the Development of the New Visitors Center

By Paul R. Revere, Special Correspondent

Our first meeting of 2024, our 30th year of continuous operation, featured Jim Steele, site manager of the Ft. Fisher State Historic Site, who, with masterly command of the details, gave our members an insider's view of the evolution and development of the magnificent project now under construction at Ft. Fisher.

The $25 million plus project includes a new, 22,219 square foot, two-story visitors center with greatly expanded exhibit space, staff workspace, gift shop, multipurpose room, catering kitchen and multiple seating areas. It also includes a new Underwater Archaeology building, and perhaps the greatest improvement of all, the reconstruction of several traverses, or mounds, that were demolished by the Army in WWII to build an airstrip for training purposes. The replica traverses will provide underground areas that visitors will be able to access safely to gain an understanding of the kinds of facilities the fort's defenders actually used.

Jim, a U.S. Navy veteran who earned his Masters Degree in History at the University of South Carolina, has been at Ft. Fisher for 16 years and he explained that he began working on the new visitors center project almost immediately because the existing facility, built in the 1960s for an estimated 25,000 visitors per year has been woefully inadequate for decades. Preparation for the project began with several false starts that involved in-depth planning that was extremely time consuming but failed to advance the project.

Ultimately, legislative support pushed the project to the forefront and allowed for the hiring of design professionals to prepare the plans for a project that will professionally serve the more than one million visitors who currently access the site every year. A “soft opening” is scheduled to occur late this summer followed by the full opening soon after.

More than 40 members attended and enjoyed the program along with an enhanced raffle that featured a guided tour of the Aversasboro battlefield as well as the choice of several high-quality Civil War books. Thanks to William Jordan for the Aversasboro tour and also to Karen and Mike Budziszewski for refreshments.

We also welcomed new members Alex Efird, Jr., and Raoul “Reb” Rebillard.

Jim Steele presented on the many challenges faced by planners in making the new visitor center a reality. It took patience and a “long view” to get to the point where ground was finally broken. Financing took several legislative sessions, and a lot of hard work by people dedicated to providing a great learning experience about the fort and its history.

Not Originally a Tarheel, But He is One Now Forever

By Ed Gibson, CFCWRT Member/Audio-Visual Manager

One morning while sitting at coffee with several of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable members, I heard President Bill Jayne mention that there was a member of the 147th Pennsylvania buried at the Wilmington National Cemetery. Bill was stationed at the cemetery for several years and knows a lot of the history of the place. I asked him to repeat what he had said because my great-grandfather was a member of that unit. Bill explained that Isaac Whitmer had been killed by friendly fire when Sherman's troops occupied Fayetteville in March of 1865 and was later interred at Wilmington National Cemetery.

I proceeded to do some Internet research into Isaac Whitmer after visiting his grave at the cemetery. Whitmer was the Sergeant Major of the regiment and had been recommended for promotion to Lieutenant but was never sworn in as an officer. I also found a diary written by M. S. Schroyer who was a member of Company G of the regiment. The following is from Schroyer's diary:

The four corps and cavalry crossed Cape Fear River at this place, having only one pontoon bridge. General Joe Johnson was now in command of the Rebel forces and we had more or less skirmishing every day. Late in the afternoon of March 13, Monday, we were marched into the town of Fayetteville.

CHAPTER LXVIII

At this time the regiment was about ready to move and the boys were scattered around town. All were ordered to report at once. Sergeant Major Witmer had been sent over on the opposite side of the square where part of the regiment had been, previously detailed to help extinguish the fire. On his way back he passed General Beard's headquarters of the 14th corps when two citizens from the opposite side of the street accused the Sergeant of being one who helped steal a barrel of flour. The guard called out Halt! When Witmer replied that he was a member of the 20th army corps, that he had nothing to do with the flour. For some reason unknown to any of us, Witmer did not stop. The guard again called Halt! but he passed on, when the guard raised his gun and fired, the ball entering the back part of his head, passing thru and coming out just back of the forehead. (The guard who shot him was a member of the 105th Ohio regiment, Beard's brigade, 14th army corps.) The boys of the regiment were so worked up and fearing a riot the Colonel moved the regiment across the river, leaving a detail to take charge of the corpse and give him a decent burial.

The funeral took place on the night of the 13th, or rather early on the morning of the 14th. The detail was as follows: Lieutenant B. T. Parks, Sergeant A. M. Eby, George D. Griggs, Jacob Garman, and the writer. We had a good deal of trouble in getting material for making a box. Thirty-two pieces of boards were used to construct it. We had been refused hatchet, nails, etc., by the citizens, but we took the liberty of looking for what we needed. When finished, a small bunch of hay was put in the box upon which to lay the head, a web of muslin was secured, and several layers were put into the box, then the corpse was tenderly lifted off the ground, where he had been lying since he was shot, then several sheets of muslin was spread over him. This was the first and only corpse the writer ever prepared for burial and we did the best we could. This was all done in the dark hours of the night.

After taking a last sad look upon our dear friend and comrade. the box was nailed shut and we waited for the morning. When at last dawn appeared, we inquired of two darkies, who were passing, whether they knew where the cemetery was and they said they did. We told them we wanted them to go with us to the burying ground, but they said they had business for their master and could not go.

We told them they must. We saw a buggy in an alley but could not use it, as the box would not fit either way we might fix it. The only way we had was to tear off the top and place the box on the springs; then with a darkey in the shafts and the other pushing we moved out to the cemetery. When there the colored fellows left us, and we dug a grave. After depositing the corpse, Sergeant Eby placed a headboard and upon it inscribed the deceased's name, and the regiment, rank and company to which he belonged.

While we were digging the grave a little boy came, sat down and watched us. A new grave had just been made near the one we had dug. When this little fellow said: "You bury your man better than this one right here was buried." We asked him why, and he said: "You put yours in a box, the other was just thrown into the hole like a brute."

The guard who shot Witmer was relieved at once and another placed on his post. Later he was tried by military court martial and acquitted. After the burial the detail left the cemetery, crossed the river and marched hard to catch up to the regiment.

Whitmer mustered in with the 147th Regiment in 1862. He had been commissioned as a 1st Lieutenant on October 7th, 1864, in Company I but never mustered in as a Lieutenant before he was killed. His body was reburied in Wilmington National Cemetery.

Sergeant Major Whitmer may not have been born a Tarheel, but he is one now forever.

Many people enjoyed the movie "Lincoln" directed by Steven Spielberg and starring Daniel Day Lewis who did a phenomenal job portraying Mr. Lincoln. But you may not know about an older movie titled "Abe Lincoln in Illinois" - a 1940 biographical drama starring Raymond Massey. It follows Lincoln from Kentucky to his election as president. It's been on TCM, and you may find it online. Well worth a look.

Lucky Raffle Winners from Last Month's Meeting

By William Jordan, CFCWRT Member

Congratulations to CFCWRT member John Moore! John won January's grand prize: two spots for Colonel Wade Sokolosky's tour of Averasboro in February.

If you didn't win there are a few spots remaining for Wade's Averasboro tour. He is also offering a revamped and expanded tour of the Bentonville battlefield. Please contact him at nchistoricaltours@gmail.com to reserve your spots!

Our next grand prize will be a custom line ink drawing by historical artist Mason Jones.

Mason, from Kinston, North Carolina, creates unique pieces of art using his own handmade quills and historic inks. Mason will discuss what YOU want him to draw and will deliver up to an 8x10 image. You will own the original!

Mason is an avid historian and is dedicated to helping preserve the threatened parts of the Kinston battlefield. He regularly reenacts with the 7th North Carolina State Troops as well as volunteering at the CSS Neuse II and Tryon Palace.

Thank you for supporting the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. Raffle proceeds benefit the Roundtable directly and are an important source of income for us. We try to get some good prizes that make our members appreciative.

January Program to Feature Fort Fisher Visitor Center Project

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The January meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by Jim Steele about the new Fort Fisher visitors center and other projects at the state's most visited historic site. The presentation is scheduled for Thursday evening, January 11, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Jim Steele has been manager of Fort Fisher State Historic Site for 16 years. He came here from South Carolina, where he was a state park ranger managing the Rivers Bridge battlefield. Jim is a veteran of the U.S. Navy, and earned both his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of South Carolina.

Jim's presentation will be about the new Fort Fisher visitor center and other improvements, and the journey it took to get from the idea phase of this project to the construction phase.

A new interpretive center is coming to Fort Fisher State Historic Site in Kure Beach. Nearly three times larger than its 1965 predecessor, the new center will welcome more than a million

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

The end of the calendar year gives us an opportunity to review our procedures and examine statistics related to membership and attendance. Although we lost several members who chose not to renew or who had simply aged out, we also gained back several members who had departed years ago and were, thankfully, able to rejoin and become active once again.

We are grateful for each and every member and through our active recruiting and renewal procedures, maintain a relatively consistent membership. We are additionally heartened by the fact that our per capita attendance remains at a very respectable level. Recall please, that every member is also a recruiter. Please bring friends and/or neighbors to future a meeting.

We wrap up 2023 by welcoming Peter G. Dorosko (Radian Road, Wilmington) to the round table. Great to have Peter aboard.

Looking forward to 2024, please recall that your month of renewal is listed on your name tag. You may renew on-line, at the next meeting or by mailing your check ($30.) to Treasurer Mike McDonald at CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 29451.

annual visitors and showcase museum exhibits about the history of Fort Fisher. In addition, the Underwater Archaeology Branch of the Office of State Archaeology will receive a new conservation lab.

These projects were in the planning stage for many years, but it took a long time for full funding to be secured for both projects. The Friends of Fort Fisher, Inc., the historic site's official support group, has been instrumental in the planning and in obtaining funding. The project budget is approximately $25.5 million, most of which has been appropriated over several budget years. Work began in late 2022.

Plans are also in place to reconstruct a portion of Fort Fisher's earthen ramparts that were demolished during World War II for the construction of an airstrip. Much of the gigantic fort that guarded the "new inlet" entrance the Cape Fear River has been eroded by the ocean. It was an L-shaped fort with about one mile of fortifications on the sea face and one-third of a mile on the land face. Known as the "Gibraltar of the South," it was the key to maintaining access to the port of Wilmington for the blockade runners that provided critical supplies for the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia.

Jim explained, "A new interpretive center and restored earthworks will be welcome additions to Fort Fisher. The exhibits will cover Fort Fisher history in a broad, all-inclusive manner and feature something for every visitor. Visitation at Fort Fisher now exceeds one million visitors a year, and it is time for facilities that can accommodate such crowds and for historical interpretation that sets new standards in museum exhibits and scholarship."

Located at 1610 Fort Fisher Blvd S, Kure Beach, N.C. 28449, Fort Fisher is part of the Division of State Historic Sites in the N.C. Department of Natural and Cultural Resources (NCDNCR), the state agency with a vision to be the leader in using the state's natural and cultural resources to build the social, cultural, educational, and economic future of North Carolina. "In 2021, we finally exceeded 1 million visitors," Jim said.

That number clearly wasn't in mind when the site's visitor center was designed more than a half-century ago. The center, which has been sitting since 1965 at the entrance to the historic site at the southern end of Pleasure Island in New Hanover County, was designed for 25,000 visitors a year.

The project includes a new center, three times larger than the current building, to house updated exhibits in an open, airy indoor space that will offer views of the natural, picturesque landscape strategically located near the mouth of the Cape Fear River at the Atlantic Ocean.

There will be a 120-person capacity multipurpose room available to rent, a gift shop overlooking the fort's earthworks, a second-story balcony, a theater that will sit 100 people, and a changeable exhibit gallery of artifacts from the North Carolina Underwater Archeology Center.

The underwater archeology center, or UAC, is housed at Fort Fisher in a series of buildings, some built during World War II. A new lab is also under construction several yards from the visitor center. The lab is not open to the public.

The new visitor center and archaeology facility carry a price tag of $25.5 million, funds primarily secured through state budget appropriations.

The project also includes reconstruction of a series of Civil War-era mounds on the land face. To clear the site for a runway, the Army bulldozed three of the mounds after activating Fort Fisher as a training base during World War II. A fourth mound was taken out during construction of U.S. 421, which ends at the N.C. Department of Transportation's Fort Fisher ferry terminal.

The idea is to tell a complete and inclusive history of Fort Fisher, one where reconstructed underground bunkers will give visitors a real sense of life in a Confederate fort, one built of mostly earth and sand by soldiers and more than 500 free and enslaved African Americans.

Construction of the visitor center is expected to be complete in mid- to late May 2024. Once the building is open to the public, the current center is to be torn down.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John's Episcopal at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. See you there!

We rely on the submission of content to the Runner to fill it up every month. Whether it's an article on an aspect of the Civil War you're interested in, a book review, or even a description of a site you visited, original writing by Roundtable members is what fills our pages. Please consider submitting something.

“Hold the Date” for These Upcoming Speakers

February 8

Chris Mackowski—The Battle for Jackson, MS

Nationally known speaker, founder of “Emerging Civil War,” prolific author, Professor Mackowski talks about the 1863 battle for Mississippi’s capital, part of the Vicksburg campaign.

March 14

Sarah Kay Bierle—From California to Gettysburg The Hancock Family

Author, speaker, and researcher focusing on the American Civil War. Sarah graduated from Thomas Edison State University with a BA in History, she is managing editor at Emerging Civil War, and works in the Educational Department of the American Battlefield Trust. Much of Sarah’s research focuses on real people and their trials and successes of everyday life, and the Winfield Scott Hancock family is a prime example.

Victor Vignola—Contrasts in Command; The Battle of Fair Oaks, 1862

Vic Vignola, a lifelong student of the Civil War, has written articles for publication in “North and South Magazine” and Contrasts in Command is his first book. The book is listed as one of Top 10 Books reviewed in 2023 by the highly regarded Civil War Books and Authors site. Vic graduated from SUNY-New Paltz with a degree in economics and business. He lives with his family in Orange County, New York, home of the 124th New York Infantry “Orange Blossoms” Regiment. The battle of Fair Oaks/Seven Pines has been little studied although it was a large, bloody, pivotal battle on the outskirts of Richmond that saw Joseph Johnston fail to defeat a section of McClellan’s army dangerously exposed and cut off by flooded rivers and streams. Johnston not only failed, he was wounded and gave way to Robert E. Lee in command of the main Confederate army.

May 9

Angela Zombek—Key West: Union Stronghold

Angela Zombek will speak to us about the subject of her latest book—Stronghold of the Union: Key West Under Martial Law which will be published by The University Press of Florida. Dr.

Zombek is a Copie Hill Civil War Fellow with the American Battlefield Trust and an assistant professor of history, Civil War Era, at UNCW. She holds a PhD in 19th Century U.S. History from the University of Florida. Key West was held by the Union from early in the war and became a valuable key in the control of shipping lanes.

December Meeting Featured Talk on the Common Soldier

By B.R. Scurry, Correspondent

Our December 14 meeting featured Dr. Ev Smith's very professional overview of the lives of "Billy Yank" and "Johnny Reb" in the Civil War. Replete with viewings of Dr. Smith's authentic period weapons including various swords, a revolver, a muzzle loading rifle musket and a breech loading rifle, the presentation covered uniforms, tactics, weapons and logistics.

Dr. Smith earned his Ph.D. at UNC Chapel Hill and completed a career with NC state government. He is very much involved in historic preservation in Wilmington and was one of the key movers in the preservation of the WWII era USO building on Second Street.

In addition, USMC Gunnery Sergeant Peter Keen, an avid reenactor of Civil War through Vietnam War scenarios brought a sample of his Union uniforms and accouterments, including many uniform pieces handmade to exacting authentic standards.

We also welcomed new member Peter Dorosko.

Editor's Note: In an effort to keep the Runner as timely as possible, events scheduled to take place several months in the future may be held for a later issue when Roundtable members are more likely to remember them. Bigger events may be run sooner.

A Visit to the Levin Cole House in Johnston County

By Fred Claridge, Runner Editor

These are pictures of the ruins of the Levin Cole farmhouse on Battlefield Road in Johnston County - not far from the Bentonville Battlefield. They were taken recently. Much older pictures are also included here.

Levin Cole was a slave until he was freed. He might have been freed either during or right after the battle. Or perhaps he became emancipated later, when the war ended.

Unfortunately, not much detail is known about Cole's life. An extensive internet search doesn't provide much information or many leads. Records, even birth and census records, are sometimes conflicting, inaccurate or incomplete for slaves and former slaves. In some cases, they never existed. A couple of us from the battlefield did find some information however at the Johnston County Historical Society in Smithfield. The director there was very helpful. There are a few records contained in various volumes in the Society's library about the Cole house and farm. Other records show his family tree.

Cole married Harriet Morris. Both the white Cole and Morris families had farms near the battlefield, so it's likely that both Levin and Harriet were slaves on those respective farms. As per custom, they took their owners last names. Together, Levin and Harriet had either seven or nine children, depending on the source reviewed. Famous descendants of the Coles (through marriage) include Theolonius Monk, the revered jazz musician, and Art Monk, the Hall of Fame receiver for the Washington Redskins during their championship years.

The Cole house was most likely built in the early 1870s according to a report by Cole's great grandson O.V. Cogdell. An early drawing of the floorplan of the house exists (it's impossible to know exactly when it was done) that shows a single story with a porch and three main rooms. An "L" addition to the house was completed later. The drawing also documents the planting of an oak tree on the site in 1872.

According to a book on historic Johnston County architecture, the Cole farmhouse was considered the oldest and most substantial dwelling built by a former slave still standing in the county when the book was published in 2016.

There are also some copies of agricultural records of the Cole farm at the Historical Association, completed in 1880. The farm consisted of 120 acres, sixty of them tilled for crops, and sixty which remained as woodland and forest. Of the tilled acres, twenty acres were planted with Indian corn, one acre with wheat, ten acres with peas, four acres with cotton, one acre with sweet potatoes, one acre with forty apple trees, and one acre with forty peach trees. Ten acres were devoted to wood products. The farm was considered successful and Cole is thought to have become a well-to-do businessman in the community.

A cemetery not far from the house serves as a family plot. It's the final resting place for Levin and Harriet who were both buried there in the early 1900s. Other family members are buried there as well. There are twenty-two graves in all.

Unfortunately, like many older dwellings and buildings on the backroads of North Carolina, the Cole farmhouse is gradually being overtaken by nature and the elements. It's relatively structurally intact, but hard to get close to because of all the vegetation growing up around it. The "L" section is no longer there. Nor is the porch. But the condition of the house doesn't negate the fact that for many years it served as the residence and workplace of former slaves who did their best to live a productive life with their family in post-war North Carolina. No doubt they worked very hard their entire lives.

Descendants of the Cole family still live in the area, including one who lives directly in front of the cemetery.

Places like this remind us that history is all around us. Sometimes you have to look a little bit to find it. Maybe hike some. Or even move a few branches. But it's there nonetheless and still has much to teach us.

We thank our sponsors, who make it possible for us to thrive as an organization. It would be much harder without their support!

We find and develop outstanding original military and general history manuscripts and bring them to you in the form of quality books you will be proud to read, own, and keep for a lifetime.

December Program to Feature Dr. Everard Smith on “Civil Warriors”

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The December meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by Dr. Everard Smith, Ph.D., titled “Civil Warriors.” The presentation is scheduled for Thursday evening, December 14, at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Local historian, former UNCW professor, and Round Table favorite, Dr. Everard Smith returns to our Round Table with another fascinating presentation on a totally new topic. Ev will focus on the volunteer soldier and some of the things he used and experienced in his everyday Army life. The presentation will be an overview of weapons, uniforms, tactics, medicine, and camp life of both sides including a display of a few actual relics.

A native of Washington, D.C., Dr. Smith received his B.A. degree from Yale and his Ph.D. in history from UNC Chapel Hill. From 1991 to 1993, he was a senior administrative officer and adjunct professor of history at UNCW. From 1994 until his retirement in 2015, he was employed

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

Since our last report, members not only enjoyed our regular November meeting (reviewed elsewhere), but also a visit to the Wilmington Railroad Museum. The museum event was a special evening during which members enjoyed a discussion of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad (Circa 1864-65) that linked Wilmington to Confederate General Lee's forces entrenched around Petersburg Virginia in the waning days of that great conflict. A wine and deli table enhanced a most delightful event that included a museum tour coupled with an opportunity to view the museum's extensive model train operation.

We are always pleased to welcome new members and we did so at the November meeting. Mother-son duo, Kim and Roman Berger join us from the Riverhead CWRT (Riverhead, LI, NY) and now reside in Leland (Magnolia at Mallory Creek). Nick Savastano, a Brunswick CWRT member and residing in Southport, joins us as well. Welcome aboard folks!

A reminder that all members are recruiters. Should your membership be up for renewal, please send your $30 annual dues to Treasurer Mike McDonald at CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 29451.

by the North Carolina Department of Information Technology as a senior networking analyst for voice, video, and data.

Dr. Smith's service to the community includes membership on the Wilmington Historic Preservation Commission; on the Preservation Action committee of the Historic Wilmington Foundation; and on the City Council-appointed Advisory Board of the Hannah Block Historic USO Building and Community Arts Center, of which he was the chairman. He is a frequent public speaker on the Civil War and WWII periods, and has often conducted local history tours for visiting cruise ship passengers and other tourist groups. An active preservationist, Dr. Smith was a leader in the local movement to preserve the Hannah Block Building when it was endangered in the 1990s. He is the owner of the Larkins House, a 170-year-old home on Dock Street in the downtown Historic District.

Abner Small, a private in the 16th Maine Infantry, wrote a diary with a wealth of detail about soldier life in the Union's Army of the Potomac. He wrote that the regulation load of a Union infantryman was 58 pounds of "Army essentials." He also noted that uniforms came in only two sizes and that if you were a small man, you were to be "pitied," and if you were a big man, you were to be pitied "even more."

A haversack, carried over the shoulder, "often stinks with its mixture of bacon, pork, salt junk [usually salted beef], sugar, coffee, tea, desiccated vegetables, rice, bits of yesterday's dinner, and old scraps husbanded with miserly care against a day of want sure to come."

Shoes often wore out after hard marching and heavy items such as an overcoat or shelter half were thrown away. This phenomenon affected both sides to a great degree but Confederates relied more heavily on state governments for supplies such as uniforms so some units fared better than others.

There were no “miracle” fabrics to make uniforms more comfortable and durable and accouterments relied heavily on leather and metal. Rifled muskets were difficult to reload and not really all that accurate, especially since few soldiers received anything like systematic training in marksmanship. The most common weapon was a Springfield Model 1861 that was 56 inches long. The average soldier was about 5’7” or 5’8” tall. The rifle weighed about nine pounds.

Dr. Smith will fill the audience in on what camp life was like for the Civil War soldier and how battles were fought.

As usual, the meeting will be held in Elebash Hall at the rear of St. John’s Episcopal at 1219 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington. The church parking lot and entrance to the meeting room is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. See you there!

A Confederate soldier on the left and a Union soldier on the right. Dr. Smith’s lecture will focus on the lives of ordinary soldiers, including camp life and what it was like to fight in battle. It should be a very interesting evening, leaving attendees with a better “feel” for what these men really experienced.

In November, the Roundtable Enjoyed Ed Lowe's Lively Presentation about Longstreet's Missed Opportunity

By S.R. Gist, Runner Correspondent

Our November 9 meeting featured a fast-paced lively exposition of the little studied campaign of Confederate Lt. General James Longstreet in eastern Tennessee in the waning days of 1863. Col. Ed Lowe told how, after playing a key role in Gen. Braxton Bragg's smashing victory at Chickamauga, Longstreet and two divisions from the Army of Northern Virginia were detached from Bragg's Army of Tennessee on a mission to wrest control of Eastern Tennessee from the Union command of Major General Ambrose Burnside.

Lowe, author of A Fine Opportunity Lost: Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863-April 1864, explained that for a number of reasons, including bad weather and challenging terrain, Longstreet failed in his mission and East Tennessee, strongly pro-Union, was preserved from Confederate control.

Col. Lowe, U.S. Army (ret) is a graduate of the U.S. Command and General Staff College in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and his analysis was very instructive in terms of better understanding the many failures of Civil War campaigns. His analysis of the ill will and poor coordination between Longstreet and his subordinate commanders—Lafayette McLaws, Evander Law and Micah Jenkins led to many missed opportunities.

We also welcomed new members Roman and Kim Berger and Nicholas Savastano.

More pictures from the November meeting. As our Roundtable Secretary Bruce Patterson pointed out in a few sentences that had to be cut for space (sorry Bruce), the Elebash Hall in the Saint John's Episcopal Church at 1209 Forest Hills Drive in Wilmington is a very comfortable meeting place. There's plenty of parking and easy access.

As Bruce also pointed out (in more sentences that had to be cut), you may also pay membership renewals by credit card at <http://www.cfcwrt.org> or simply bring your check or cash to the December 13th meeting. We welcome early renewals.

Hope to see you in December!

Who was James Longstreet?

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Harold Knudsen, who spoke to our roundtable in September 2022, was one of many who attended a festival of sorts marking the 30th anniversary of the release of the movie “Gettysburg.” The Ted Turner financed movie, based on Michael Shaara’s novel, Gods and Generals, has become one of the most well-known artistic representations of the American Civil War.

Lt. Col. Knudsen, USA (ret) is the author of The Confederacy’s Most Modern General about Lt. Gen. James Longstreet, the commander of the I Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia. Famously, Shaara’s novel and the “Gettysburg” film portray Longstreet in a pivotal role as the obedient but reluctant commander of the Confederate forces that assailed Little Round Top on the second day of the battle instead of moving around the flank of the position and then charge across wide open field to assault the center of the Union line on the third day.

Last month, we heard Col. Ed Lowe, USA (ret) talk again about Longstreet and his “opportunity lost” in Eastern Tennessee at the end of 1863. The exciting thing about looking again at the controversies, personalities and failed operations that characterized the Civil War is the fact that we continue to learn more about the history of this most pivotal event in our American saga.

In addition to Harold Knudsen’s book about Longstreet’s modern qualities and Ed Lowe’s soon to be released book about Longstreet in Eastern Tennessee, Cory M. Pfarr has written the recently published Righting the Longstreet Record at Gettysburg: Six Matters of Controversy and Confusion.

Why is Longstreet “suddenly” such a prevalent subject of Civil War scholarship? Elizabeth R. Varon, a professor of History at the University of Virginia has recently written Longstreet: The Confederate General Who Defied the South, a biography of Longstreet, a book that focuses a great deal of attention on Longstreet’s post-war life and does a lot to tie together the war and its aftermath, “Reconstruction.”

In a fine interview on the Abraham Lincoln Book Shop’s YouTube channel, Professor Varon discussed her book that was just released prior to Thanksgiving. One point she made resonated with me. She explained how the digitalization of sources ranging from newspapers and letters to official records has revolutionized research. Merely by typing “Longstreet” into a search function on, say, an archive of digitized historic newspapers, one can get a wealth of information that was literally buried in the past.

For example, she talked about the Longstreet who—while he firmly supported the idea of trying to engineer a battle fought on the tactical defensive—did not “sabotage” victory at Gettysburg by his reluctance to launch offensive assaults on strong Union positions. A search of southern newspapers after Gettysburg showed Longstreet was not scapegoated for the defeat at the time.

So, by looking longer and harder at the life and career of James Longstreet, perhaps we can come to a better understanding of how the north won the Civil War and also how Reconstruction unraveled in the years after the war.

Harper House Restoration Update 11/14/2023

Following a rigorous process of sanding and testing to ensure the highest quality work is being done, the restoration process is finally moving forward with painting the historic Harper House, beginning with primer. This process has taken a while because the restoration is being held to a very high standard of long-term preservation.

We continue to offer guided tours of the Harper House daily at 10:00, 12:00, 2:00, 4:00. Tickets are only $2 for adults and $1 for children (ages 5-12) and seniors (age 55+).

Come see us soon and follow us for more updates!

Editor's Note: The Harper House will look as it did during the Battle of Bentonville when the painting is finished. New windows and repaired and repainted shutters will also be a part of the renovation. The house is in remarkably good shape for having been built in 1855. Guided tours of the house are still available during much of the renovation work and are held four times a day at 10, Noon, 2 and 4.

The History and Importance of Civil War Roundtables

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

We often hear that there's a dichotomy between "Civil War Nerds," and those who are just "fans," that is members who are simply interested in the subject. Nerds know all the campaigns and battles, when they were fought, where, who the leaders were, what was the result. Fans don't want to have to rely on having all that information in their heads, they just want to hear an interesting, informative story.

In my mind, regardless of whether you think you're a "nerd" or a "fan" the Civil War Round Table is for you. Program Director Jim Gannon has an article in this newsletter about how we put together our slate of speakers, our "program" for the upcoming months. We try to get speakers who are not only knowledgeable and authoritative - "nerds" - but also entertaining.

When the Civil War Round Table movement started in December 1940, it was probably tilted more toward the nerd side of the scale. It's an interesting history and, I think, enlightening. Ralph G. Newman was "a master raconteur, minor league baseball player, Lincoln scholar, manuscript appraiser, prominent civic leader and hopeless bibliophile." He founded the renowned Abraham Lincoln Book Shop

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

Our membership roll remains pretty constant with two (really three) members joining in October.

We welcome Chris Langlois (Leland, Waterford) to our membership. Chris became an active participant immediately, by managing the raffle and stacking chairs at meeting conclusion, at his first meeting.

We are also pleased to announce that long-time -ago members, Mike and Karen Budziszewski (Wilmington, Beau Rivage) have rejoined the round table. Mike, many will recall, was Vice President of the CFCWRT, a decade or more ago. Karen, likewise, was active in the organization and was at the forefront when refreshments were served. Welcome home Mike and Karen.

A reminder folks that your name tag now reflects the month of your due's renewal. Just send your $30 check to Treasurer Mike McDonald at CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451. You may also pay online by credit card at <http://wwwcfcwrt.org> or better still, just bring your cash or check to the November 9th meeting and give it to Treasurer Mike.

Remember, every member is a recruiter, so bring a friend or neighbor to our November meeting. We have ample parking and seating !

Editor's Note: Thanks to Bruce for these monthly updates!

in Chicago. By the way, the book shop has a fascinating YouTube channel with author interviews and other talks about Civil War subjects.

The Chicago Civil War Round Table is still going strong. And no wonder. It started off with historians such as Carl Sandburg, Bruce Catton and T. Harry Williams among the group who met for dinner and then listened to a presentation on Stonewall Jackson's Valley Campaign.

The round table movement continued to grow across the country, and in December 1960, President Dwight D. Eisenhower issued a proclamation asking the American people to take a direct and active part in the Centennial of the Civil War (1961-65) to commemorate a conflict he called the country's "most tragic experience." During the Centennial, the round table movement grew exponentially.

Ike requested all federal, state and local government agencies "to encourage, foster and participate in the Centennial" for the "purpose of enriching the knowledge and appreciation of the war," and "marking this memorable period truly a centennial for all Americans." This gets pretty close to our round table's purpose. We are an "association of people with a common interest in the history of the American Civil War and Reconstruction... The Round Table's purpose is to broaden the knowledge, understanding, and interpretation of the era." The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table kicked off in December 1994. It was a time when the Ken Burns PBS documentary and Ted Turner's movie, "Gettysburg," had reignited general interest in the conflict, and, once again, the round table movement grew by leaps and bounds. If Chicago's round table leaned toward the "nerd" side of the equation, the TV and movie phenomena balanced things out and many more fans got involved.

Today, our round table is strong but in order to stay strong, we need everybody so we can bring in speakers who are knowledgeable and entertaining.

It's been a generation since the last big boost to the movement and although we, as a nation, as a people, still grapple with the paramount issues that gave rise to the Civil War, fewer and fewer people seem to be interested in Civil War history or, for that matter, any kind of history.

Times change and the place of historical study in the culture changes, too. New technologies—whether it's ground-penetrating radar or the amazing search capabilities of the computer—keep giving us new perspectives and new information. History is what happened, but we keep finding out more about “what happened.” Memory, on the other hand, is how we think about and interpret what happened.

There's more to do on both fronts and that's why the Civil War is still so important. There are lots of ways to get involved in moving us forward. Send me an email or give me a phone call if you'd like to devote a couple of hours once in a while to helping our club prosper—help us enrich our knowledge and appreciation of the Civil War.

The Wreaths Across America Campaign - You Can Help

By Bruce Patterson, CFCWRT Secretary

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, as in years past, has joined in the community-wide effort to place wreaths on the more than 5,000 graves in the Wilmington National Cemetery on Saturday December 16th.

Each wreath costs $17. Your contribution may be made by check, payable to Wreaths Across America, or cash (in multiples of seventeen dollars) to Kim Jordan or Bruce Patterson. We will continue collections at all CWRT activities, including the special program at the Railroad Museum, on Monday 30 October.

Stop by the Wilmington National Cemetery, anytime beginning Sunday, December 17th and be inspired by the community tribute to the fallen military which dates back to the Civil War era.

Formidable Civil War Figures from the Eastern Theater Clash in the Mountains of Tennessee

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

This month's meeting of our Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by Col. Ed Lowe titled "A Fine Opportunity Lost: Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign." The presentation is scheduled for Thursday evening, November 9, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Col. Lowe served 26 years on active duty in the U.S. Army, with deployments to Operation Desert Shield/Storm, Haiti, Afghanistan, and Iraq. He attended North Georgia College and has graduate degrees from California State University, the U.S. Army War College, U.S. Command & General Staff College, and Webster's University. He is an adjunct professor for the University of Maryland/Global Campus and Elizabethtown College, where he teaches history and government. Ed is also president of the Chickamauga-Chattanooga Civil War Round Table.

Ed will speak to our round table about Lieutenant General James Longstreet's campaign in East Tennessee in 1863. His book, A Fine Opportunity Lost: Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863-April 1864, was recently published by Savas Beatie as part of their "Emerging Civil War" series.

This is a story of personalities and politics as much as it is a story of military operations. From the very beginning of the war, East Tennessee was largely pro-Union. Tennessee was the last state to vote for secession and in the decisive vote in June 1861, 105,000 Tennesseans voted for secession and 47,000 voted against. Those proportions were reversed in East Tennessee where 33,000 citizens voted against secession while only 14,000 voted for secession.

Unlike other slave states with split loyalties—including Missouri, Kentucky and Maryland—the Confederacy controlled the state and, in effect, occupied the mountainous area of East Tennessee. Andrew Johnson was from East Tennessee and he remained in the U.S. Senate after his state's secession. In 1862, when the Union Army had largely re-asserted U.S. control over most of the state, Johnson was named military governor. Yet, wedged in between the Confederate controlled states of Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia, the Confederacy held control in East Tennessee. Like other border states, however, a guerrilla war of sorts made life and security perilous for all sides. Moreover, men from Eastern Tennessee formed approximately 30 Union regiments and fought for the U.S. throughout the war. President Abraham Lincoln, motivated by the paramount requirement to maintain control over the border states and to relieve the suffering of Union supporters in Confederate territory, repeatedly urged his military commanders to reassert control over Eastern Tennessee.

Into this complicated scenario, came two highly significant Civil War personalities in late 1863.

Union Major General Ambrose Burnside (whose opulent facial hair gave rise to the term “sideburns”) had been named commander of the Army of the Potomac in late 1862 as the political leadership of the country floundered to find a competent general to lead its most important army in Virginia. Burnside, unfortunately, led the Army of the Potomac to a tragically destructive and futile defeat at Fredericksburg in December 1862. Relieved of command, he was sent west into Kentucky with his IX Corps, and orders to command the “Army of the Ohio” and, along with the XXIII Corps, gain control of Eastern Kentucky. He moved with cautious competence and soon controlled Knoxville and much of the disputed region. As larger armies maneuvered and fought to reduce the Confederate stronghold at Vicksburg, Mississippi, and expel Confederate General Braxton Bragg’s army from southeastern Tennessee, Burnside consolidated control over Eastern Kentucky.

Gen. Ambrose Burnside

The Confederacy’s “most hated general,” Braxton Bragg commanded the Army of Tennessee and after two hard-fought battles in Kentucky and middle Tennessee, found his army maneuvered into the strategic pocket of southeastern Tennessee, the gateway to Atlanta and the deep south. Not only had Bragg failed to control Kentucky and Tennessee for the Confederacy, his subordinate generals had grown to detest the man and worked to undermine his authority. Bragg, however, had the support of Confederate President Jefferson Davis and it was decided to send General James Longstreet and his redoubtable First Corps from the Army of Northern Virginia to Bragg’s Army of Tennessee. The First Corps arrived just in time to play a key role in a smashing Confederate victory at Chickamauga, near the city of Chattanooga. Bragg, however, failed to press his victory to neutralize the Union army in southeastern Tennessee. Dissension in the army continued to fester like an infected wound and Longstreet, too, joined the chorus of influential voices calling for Bragg’s removal.

Davis “rushed” to Tennessee on the south’s inefficient railroad system and ultimately decided to remove Bragg and bring him to Richmond to serve as his military advisor. General Joseph E. Johnston, another Confederate general with a checkered record and a disputatious nature, was named commander of the Army of Tennessee and Longstreet and his troops were given the assignment of ousting Burnside from Eastern Kentucky.

So, in November 1863, Longstreet and Burnside, these two imposing figures from the Eastern Theater were poised to clash as independent commanders in the politically charged region of Eastern Tennessee.

Battle of Fort Sanders, Knoxville, Tennessee

Col. Lowe has studied these two figures and their campaign in depth and will tell the story of their clash. The meeting will be held in Elebash Hall of St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, talk to members of the round table and discover new interests.

Brunswick Civil War Roundtable Event

The much-anticipated program by Dwight Hughes, U.S. Naval Academy graduate, author, historian, and frequent speaker on the Civil War Navy will be the guest at the Tuesday, November 7th meeting. His presentation is entitled, "The Naval Civil War in Theaters Near and Far." He was originally scheduled for the October 3rd meeting but had to cancel but is now rescheduled. The meeting will be held at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach. Everyone is welcome. The visitor fee is $10 and can be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues, which may include a spouse. Registration begins at 6:15PM. The program starts at 7:00PM. For more information contact president John Butler at Brunswickcwrt@gmail.com, or call him at (404) 229-9425. How We Put Together Our Programs

By Jim Gannon, Program Director

We are sometimes asked, “How do we put together our program of speakers?”

Our Program Committee gets together roughly once a month for a very unstructured lunch meeting to review our progress, kick around some ideas, and have some fun. The committee includes Bill Jayne, Al Turner, Bruce Patterson, Mike McDonald, Jim Horton, Pat Garrow, Fred Claridge and the committee chair, Jim Gannon. Suggestions for speakers come from our membership as well as the committee members. We also get ideas from on line sources such as the Emerging Civil War Blog and the publisher, Savas Beattie, has been helpful to us.

Our goal is to offer a balanced program that includes local historians, nationally known authors, and our own membership. We also strive for a mix of topics which includes campaign/battle histories, coverage of special topics, and stories about people. We want a program that will appeal to people new to Civil War history as well as those who are more advanced in their study of the Civil War. Another consideration is that we want to find great historians that are also great speakers. To do this, we check out potential speakers on You Tube and sometimes contact other round tables. We also have to always keep an eye on the budget as we often provide a hotel room and help with travel expenses for out of town speakers. Travel expenses can sometimes be limiting. For example, Western Theatre speakers are often located far away from us.

When we select a speaker, our Round Table will send a detailed invitation to the speaker. At this time we will confirm all the details of the event: topic, location, date, times, addresses, alternate contact information, any arrangements about hotel or expenses. Well known authors are sometimes booked as much as a year in advance, so we try to confirm our Fall, Winter and Spring speakers about 11 to 13 months out. We usually reserve the summer months for Member Forums, but we like to confirm these several months in advance also.

This is a team effort and our whole Round Table can take pride in the quality of our program and the speakers we have been able to attract. Historians tell us they like to come to our Round Table because of the great interest and appreciation that all our members show for their work. That reputation helps us to continue to attract outstanding speakers.

Raleigh's Civil War Earthworks Tour

Join in the search for the remains of Raleigh's Civil War Earthworks with historian Al Bredenberg. Built between 1862 – 1863, this nine-mile fortification ringed the Capital City to protect it against Union attacks. Over 160 years later the City of Raleigh Museum will sponsor a hunt to find remnants of the massive structure that will take participants to across the city to uncover where and why this earthwork was built. The tour takes place on November 12th from 9 a.m. to noon. Tickets are $20 and seats are limited to 25. Please arrive early for receipts to be checked and to meet the trolley on time. Receipts are required to board the trolley and will be emailed to you when purchased online or at the City of Raleigh Museum. Digital or printed receipts will be accepted. If you need assistance or have any questions, please call \(919\) 996-2220.

Busy October Meeting Features Operational History

By Felix K. Zollicoffer

Our October 12 meeting featured a through operational history of the XII Corps of the Army of the Potomac at the Battle of Antietam. Chris Bryan, author of Cedar Mountain to Antietam, told the story of the understrength corps through the intense fighting on the right flank of the Union attack.

We also welcomed new member Chris Langlois and returning members Mike and Karen Budziszewski. Ned Rhodes told us about the October 30 event at the Wilmington Railroad Museum, Kim Jordan updated us on the annual Wreaths Across America drive and Treasurer Mike McDonald told us about the new fundraising project hosted on our website.

We are auctioning off the Time-Life books series on the American West (as seen below). Twenty volumes tell the story of the American West in words and hundreds of fascinating illustrations. It's easy to bid online and help raise money for the round table. Just go to the website to make a bid.

FORKS ROAD AND THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR MUSEUM: THE WILMINGTON CONNECTION

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

The American Civil War Museum (ACWM) in Richmond recently developed a “pop-up exhibit” at the prestigious facility housed in the historic Tredegar Iron Works, an exhibit with a very significant and obvious Wilmington connection but with a more personal and interesting twist beyond the obvious.

First of all, the American Civil War Museum maintains three unique sites: The American Civil War Museum – Historic Tredegar and the White House of the Confederacy, both in Richmond, VA; and The American Civil War Museum–Appomattox, in Appomattox, VA. In 2013, the museum was formed by a consolidation of the American Civil War Center and the Museum of the Confederacy. In May 2019 they opened a new, state-of-the-art facility at Historic Tredegar. The new, building encases the original Tredegar Iron Works ruin wall, and features storage space to protect its unparalleled collection of artifacts.

Speaking of state of the art, what is a “pop-up exhibit”? One definition is “A pop-up exhibition is a temporary art event, less formal than a gallery or museum but more formal than private artistic showing of work.” In an amazingly short period of time, the museum developed an exhibit that capitalized on a chance conversation in Wilmington.

Aliyah Harrison, Digital Engagement Manager for ACWM, told the story in the Summer 2023 edition of “Ironclad,” the ACWM magazine. Aliyah earned her Bachelor’s degree in Communications at UNCW before going on to a Masters at George Mason University. She has strong North Carolina roots. Her father, Army Brigadier General Richard Harrison was born in the tiny northeast North Carolina town of Seabury. He graduated from Elizabeth City State University and is now commanding general of the 32nd Army Artillery and Missile Defense Command in Ft. Bliss, Texas. In the course of his career he and his family were posted at (then) Ft. Bragg and Aliyah lived there from 2006 to 2014, except for a two-year hiatus in the middle.

Daniel Jones and Aliyah Harrison at Cameron Art Museum, Wilmington

So, during a birthday gathering at UNCW not very long ago, Aliyah and fellow UNCW alum Daniel Jones naturally enough started talking about their jobs. Daniel, a graduate of the History program at UNCW, is cultural curator at the Cameron Art Museum (CAM) in Wilmington. Now, let Aliyah tell the story: Daniel “explained that in November 2021 [CAM]...unveiled an outdoor art sculpture called ‘Boundless.’ The sculpture commemorates the more than 1,800 United States Colored Troops who fought for two consecutive days in February 1865 on the ground where the museum now stands.” She continued: “Artist Stephen Hayes, also from North Carolina, created a life-size bronze sculpture using the facial features of eleven African American men connected to the site, including USCT descendants, re-enactors, veterans, and community leaders. Daniel also let me know that he collaborated with Stephen Hayes to develop a tour for school groups and museum visitors and that he conducts it every Friday. To our surprise, this traditionally insignificant encounter was leading us to connect our institutions in ways we could have never imagined!”

Here at the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, we’re proud to note that we have a special connection to the site as well. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., author, professor emeritus of history, and former president of our round table, played the key role in developing the history of the Forks Road encounter and preserving the site. In 2002 members of our round table helped restore a section of Confederate earthworks just north of the “Boundless” statue on land donated by Bruce Cameron for the Cameron Art Museum. Mr. Cameron ensured that the site of the battle would be preserved.

Boundless statue on the Forks Road battlefield, Cameron Art Museum, Wilmington

From a military history perspective, after the fall of Ft. Fisher, Union forces outflanked Confederate defenses anchored on the “Sugar Loaf Line” in Carolina Beach by shipping significant forces across the river and taking Ft. Anderson. With the Sugar Loaf Line untenable, Confederate units retreated north toward the City of Wilmington. Before Confederate troops were ordered to evacuate the city, a sharp encounter at the site of the Cameron Art Museum left two Union USCT (U.S. Colored Troops) soldiers dead and 48 wounded (eight to ten died later of their wounds) as the Union troops bravely assaulted the strong defensive position. For more information, check out Chris's book Glory at Wilmington: The Battle of Forks Road. Buy here.

The “Boundless” statue, according to CAM, is the “first sculpture park in the nation dedicated to honoring the USCT.” Aliyah immediately saw the importance of the Boundless project and potential connections for ACWM. She wrote: “as a member of the ACWM’s Marketing team, my goal was to find ways to show our visitors the similarities between our museums. Firstly, we are both part of the Civil War Trails. Secondly, we share stories of the Civil War that are not well-known. Lastly, our sites have significant historical value as they played a crucial role in the end of the war, showing visitors that Civil War history can be found everywhere.” That’s how history can be marketed so that more people become interested.

Artifacts on display at the ACWM. The special exhibit will be up through Jan. 2024.

ACWM staff travelled to Wilmington and interviewed Daniel and CAM Executive Director Heather Wilson and gathered film and still photographs of the statue and the park. Back in Richmond, ACWM Collections staff revealed artifacts related to the USCT that had never been exhibited and even some artifacts from Wilmington. Moreover, they had muster rolls of the five USCT regiments that assaulted the Forks Road fortifications.

It was more than enough to put together a very informative and engaging exhibit on short notice. The exhibit, titled “Beyond Valor: United States Colored Troops & the Fight for Freedom” opened on June 2. And, the muster rolls allowed the ACWM to help with the CAM project to connect descendants of the USCT soldiers with their ancestors who fought.

If you haven’t seen the moving “Boundless” statue at Wilmington’s CAM, I urge you to take the time to visit the park on the museum grounds at Independence Boulevard and S. 17th Street in Wilmington. It’s in a beautiful location and is quite moving. And, the ACWM museum at Historic Tredegar is well worth a special trip.

12/14/23 Everard Smith

Civil Warriors: An overview of weapons, uniforms, tactics, medicine, and camp life of both sides including a display of a few actual relics.

Local historian, former UNCW professor, and Round Table favorite, Dr. Everard Smith returns to our Round Table with another fascinating presentation on a totally new topic. Ev will focus on the volunteer soldier and some of the things he used and experienced in his everyday Army life. His thoroughly researched presentation will include some surprising details and a display of some actual relics of the civil war.

A native of Washington, D.C., Dr. Smith received his B.A. degree from Yale and his Ph.D. in history from UNC Chapel Hill. From 1991 to 1993, he was a senior administrative officer and adjunct professor of history at UNCW. From 1994 until his retirement in 2015, he was employed by the North Carolina Department of Information Technology as a senior networking analyst for voice, video, and data.

Dr. Smith's service to the community includes membership on the Wilmington Historic Preservation Commission; on the Preservation Action committee of the Historic Wilmington Foundation; and on the City Council-appointed Advisory Board of the Hannah Block Historic USO Building and Community Arts Center, of which he was the chairman. He is a frequent public speaker on the Civil War and WWII periods, and has often conducted local history tours for visiting cruise ship passengers and other tourist groups. An active preservationist, Dr. Smith was a leader in the local movement to preserve the Hannah Block Building when it was endangered in the 1990s. He is the owner of the Larkins House, a 170-year-old home on Dock Street in the downtown Historic District.

1/11/24 Pat Garrow

Author of "Grey to Blue: Galvanized Yankees in the Union Army"

Pat Garrow is a CFCWRT member, author, historian and professional archeologist.

Pat will present his soon to be published book about Confederate soldiers who joined the Union Army to escape imprisonment. This book is a companion volume to Pat's earlier book "Changing Sides: Union Prisoners of War Who Joined the Confederate Army."

Pat's new book updates and extends Dee Brown's classic volume "Galvanized Yankees." Pat will address the six regiments of US volunteers raised in Union prisons and sent to the western frontier to protect settlers and travelers and will go well beyond that to address lesser known units such as the Union Regiments raised in North Carolina.

Pat has authored, co-authored or edited nine books or monographs and over 50 articles during a career in archaeology that spanned 50 years of work throughout the US and in the Virgin Islands. His projects have included a number of major data recoveries, including the excavation of a Colonial ship in made land of Lower Manhattan, a de Soto contact village site in the interior of Georgia, a deeply buried prehistoric site in West Virginia, and many other historic and prehistoric sites from Connecticut to Florida to Phoenix.

In Heavenly Peace - A Bentonville Holiday Event

Experience the Harper House as a family residence, not as a Civil War field hospital. This holiday season, you are invited to tour the home of John and Amy Harper as it may have appeared after the conclusion of the Civil War. The event is on December 2nd from 4 - 8 p.m. Come enjoy the beauty of a 19th century Christmas aglow with candlelight. Also enjoy period refreshments in the kitchen, festive music by a warm campfire, and a ride on the Bentonville Holiday wagon. You can also paint your own ornament to take home! Do not miss your chance to experience Christmas by candlelight at Bentonville Battlefield! $5 admission for adults, FREE for kids 8 and under!

Editor's Note: This really is a beautiful and festive event. You'll enjoy it if you go.

CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE HOSTS YOUNG HISTORIAN DISCUSSING A MAJOR TURNING POINT IN THE WAR

By Jim Gannon, CFCWRT Programs Director

This month's Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table features a presentation by M. Chris Bryan on the Union XII Corps from Cedar Mountain to Antietam in 1862. Chris Bryan earned a B.S. in History from the United States Naval Academy, an M.A. in Liberal Arts from St. John's College, Annapolis, and a Masters in Historic Preservation from the University of Maryland, College Park. The former naval aviator works as a project manager and lives in southern Maryland with his wife and two children. This is his first book.

The meeting of the round table will be held on Thursday evening, October 12, at our normal meeting place, centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

James M. McPherson, perhaps the most highly respected of all living Civil War historians, wrote in Battle Cry of Freedom, that there were

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

The September meeting was special in many regards. We experienced a very exciting and interesting kickoff to the program year with a presentation by John Quarstein and we welcomed two new members: Diane Speer (Leland) and Robert Timson (Southport) to our round table membership.

Remember folks, every member is a recruiter. Please continue to bring friends and neighbors to our monthly meetings. There is ample room in both the parking lot and the meeting hall. The acoustics are great by the way.

Lastly, just a word about dues. Your name tag reflects the month in which your membership fee is due. You will also receive an email notification from the membership chair. We offer you many payment options, the best being either cash or check, handed to our Treasurer, Mike McDonald at the next meeting. But Mike can also take credit cards and you always have an on-line option as well.

Your annual dues are used to pay the following reoccurring expenses: * rent of meeting place, *speaker expenses including an honorarium and travel, *web site and domain expense and other miscellaneous expenses such as printing, zoom fees and equipment. In short, we depend on your fees and support.

four major turning points that “defined the eventual outcome” of the war. Professor McPherson explains that each of those four turning points could have gone either way, perhaps changing the result of the war.

Two of the four turning points occurred in 1862 when the conflict was just entering its second year. The first was in the summer of 1862 when Confederate counter-offensives in both the eastern and western theaters arrested the momentum of “a seemingly imminent Union victory.” The second occurred in the fall of 1862 when battles at Antietam [Maryland] and Perryville [Kentucky] “threw back Confederate invasions, forestalled European mediation and recognition of the Confederacy...and set the stage for the Emancipation Proclamation.”

The soldiers who are the subject of Chris Bryan’s book played a significant role in both of these momentous turning points. The story he tells is the story of the formation of this often luckless command as the II Corps in Maj. Gen. John Pope’s Army of Virginia on June 26, 1862. The corps endured a bloody and demoralizing loss after coming within a whisker of defeating Maj. Gen. “Stonewall” Jackson at Cedar Mountain on August 9, 1862, and then suffered through the hardships of Pope’s campaign before and after the Battle of Second Manassas, and its resurgence after entering Maryland and joining the reorganized Army of the Potomac. The reorganization also included the relief of the corps’

Major General Nathaniel Banks

commander, Major General Nathaniel Banks, a “political general” who had been governor of Massachusetts and speaker of the House of Representatives but had no military experience. As part of the Army of the Potomac, the command was designated the XII Corps.

The undersized command found significant success on the field at Antietam. Its soldiers swept through the East Woods and the Miller Cornfield, permanently clearing both of Confederates, repelled multiple Southern assaults against the Dunker Church plateau, and eventually secured a foothold beyond the Dunker Church in the West Woods. This important piece of high ground had been the Union objective all morning, and its occupation threatened the center and rear of Gen. Robert E. Lee's embattled Army of Northern Virginia. Unfortunately, their new commander, Major General Joseph Mansfield, a West Pointer with decades of distinguished military service, was mortally wounded at Antietam. Federal leadership largely ignored the corps' signal achievement and the opportunity it presented. The XII Corps' achievement is especially notable given its string of disappointments and hardships in the months leading up to Antietam.

Major General Joseph Mansfield

Bryan's story is a hybrid unit history and leadership and character assessment, and it puts the XII Corps' actions in proper context by providing significant and substantive treatment to its Confederate opponents. His unique study, based on extensive archival research, newspapers, and other important resources, and complete with detailed maps and images, is a compelling story of a little-studied yet consequential corps and fills a longstanding historiographical gap.

The meeting will be held in the sanctuary of St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, talk to members of the round table and discover new interests. See you there! And bring a friend...or two.

Restoration work on the Harper House Field Hospital Site at the Bentonville Battlefield continues with good progress being made. Workers had to strip - by hand - seventeen layers of paint applied to the house since its construction in 1855. State experts and battlefield staff are regularly checking the work to make sure it's done properly. It will be repainted in the colors the house wore during the battle - light cream with dark green shutters. The work will take months before it's complete.

President's Message

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

Upon being asked to serve as a panelist, I grasped the pleasant opportunity to travel to Gettysburg for the Civil War Round Table Congress "Sustainability Conference" from August 25-27. It's always inspiring to visit Gettysburg and it was energizing to share an intensive conference experience with dozens of others from around the country who are dedicated to the round table movement. About 88 attendees represented approximately 35 round tables from as far away as Puget Sound, Washington. Plus, many organizations such as Civil War Trails, American Battlefield Trust and Central Virginia Battlefield Trust were represented.

The conference began on Friday evening with a reception at the Seminary Ridge Museum and Education Center. This is the original building of the Lutheran Seminary and attendees got the chance to climb to the belvedere where Union Cavalry General John Buford viewed the approaching Confederate units converging on Gettysburg. The evening ended with Prof. Chris Mackowski's tour d'force presentation titled "What if Stonewall Had Been at Gettysburg." Chris will make his second visit to our round table in February 2024. Don't miss it! Chris is a top-notch historian who is also extremely entertaining.

The meat of the conference was concentrated on the Saturday session at the beautiful Adams County Historical Society building. We had a huge and well-appointed meeting hall equipped with the best presentation technology. There were three panel discussions.

I had been asked to participate in the first panel titled "Emerging from the Pandemic." Every member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table should be proud that our club went from a low of less than 40 members in January 2021 to more than 90 members today. We survived the COVID phenomenon and we are stronger now than we were before it. I shared the stage with the moderator representing the Civil War Round Table Congress board of directors and three great representatives of the round table movement from Indianapolis, Cleveland and Harrisburg, PA.

My presentation focused on how we emphasized speaker quality, fundraising and diversified outreach to bring membership levels back up to a healthy level. In addition, we added value to the round table experience with popular tours and special events. We also, like most successful round tables, ultimately decided to use Zoom to maintain connection with our members during the months when we were unable to meet in person.

The period from April 2020 through August 2020 was particularly trying because we were unable to meet and had not yet decided to try Zoom. Some months we thought we would be able to meet only to have the Governor or the county say, “No, you can’t meet after all.” Throughout this period, Ed Gibson and Bruce Patterson were indispensable. I can’t thank them enough for their help.

Next was the “Community Partnership Panel” where round tables talked about the potential for strengthening the club by means of partnering with agencies and organizations involved in historic preservation, education and planning. We have a strong historic preservation community in the Wilmington area and we can do a lot more in terms of partnering with them. For example, we can have joint meetings. Scholarships and awards can help build relationships with educational agencies. We can do joint trips to battlefields and other attractions. Outreach at public events—“tabling” as it’s called—can be expanded beyond what we now do with Fort Fisher once a year.

The next panel talked about the CWRT Congress’s “Sustainability Challenge,” a formal plan with ten modules for improving sustainability. Check out the Sustainability Challenge here: <http://www.cwrtcongress.org/challenge.html>. Finally, a high-powered panel of young historians and history professionals talked about “Target Marketing Younger Members.” “Go where they are!” was one strong message. How about we have a special meeting at a brewery? We’re already talking about that one. Homeschoolers may be an audience. One young historian, Jonathan Noyalas from Shenandoah University, pointed out that “Facebook is for old people,” according to his students. After years of hard work—thank you, Yelena Howell—we have a good Facebook group page but now it looks like we may have to develop an additional social media channel.

President Bill Jayne representing the CFCWRT.

So, what’s next? I’ve empaneled a committee of leaders, including our officers, to develop a set of bylaws for our club. We’re starting our 30th year but we don’t have a written set of rules for governing the round table. Historically, our presidents have served for an average of six years.

In this day and age, the challenges are too great for just naming a “president for life” and hoping that he or she will hang in there for six years before leaving this mortal coil or just walking away. So, I will step down in August 2024 and we will have some bylaws to govern the choice of our next president and slate of officers. It’s gonna be great! Wait and see.

Hardy B Marshman: A Young Soldier in the 24th North Carolina Infantry Regiment from 1863-1865

By Al Turner, CFCWRT Vice-President

A few weeks ago, I was visiting relatives at Topsail Island, N.C. My sister-in-law was downsizing her home and moving. During my visit, she gave me an album of family pictures which she thought would be important to me and my family. As I thumbed through the album, I discovered a typed five-page single spaced description of a relative's service in the Confederate Army. The paper was obviously old and appeared to be typed on a typewriter and not a computer. It had been written by the soldier's great-great-grandson. It was a very interesting read and provided insight into the history of the 24th North Carolina Infantry Regiment and the experiences of Hardy B Marshburn a young soldier in the unit.

Private Hardy B Marshburn was born in 1845 and raised on a farm in Onslow County near Richlands, North Carolina. He was 16 years old at the start of the Civil War and finally persuaded his parents to let him join the Confederate Army just before his 18th birthday.

Hardy learned that the 24th N.C. Troops were encamped in Kenansville, N.C., so he made his way there. On February 8th, 1863, he enlisted with Company B, (also known as the "Onslow Guards") 24th Regiment North Carolina Troops, General Robert Ransom's Brigade, Army of Northern Virginia. Pvt. Marshburn was promised thirteen dollars a month, but the pay was running up to six months behind and by the time he got paid, it wasn't worth as much as it was six months before. None of this mattered to Private Hardy, because like so many others, he was there only to do his duty to defend his homeland.

As a raw recruit Hardy was considered a "fresh fish" by the veterans. There was little time for basic training as we know it today and his combat training would literally be on the job. For a young inexperienced soldier with little training like Hardy, it was a very dangerous endeavor. Fortunately, he was in the company of some very seasoned and hardened veterans who had fought at Antietam and Fredericksburg.

On July 4, 1863, Hardy would get his first taste of fighting at Bottoms Bridge, on the Chickahominy River. Later the 24th N.C. was ordered back into North Carolina to protect the vital Weldon Railroad bridge where they helped repulse the Federal Cavalry at the battle of Boone's Mill.

In January 1864, the brigade took part in a failed attempt to recapture New Bern, which had been captured by the Federals in March 1862.

In April, Hardy found himself in extremely heavy fighting while trying to penetrate Federal defenses in the town of Plymouth, N.C. Ransom's brigade and General Robert F. Hokes brigade, with help from the Confederate Ironclad, Albemarle, successfully attacked the town and the Federals surrendered around 10:00 a.m. on April 20th.

In late April another attempt to recapture New Bern was under way. But, before preparations to assault the city were completed, the brigade received orders to move to Petersburg. The 24th N.C. Troops were engaged in the defense of Drewry's Bluff on May 12-16 and saw action at Bermuda Hundred on May 16-20.

On June 15, the 24th N.C. joined General P.G.T. Beauregard in the defense of Petersburg. The brigade marched all night to get to Petersburg. Upon arrival the next morning, they were immediately sent to the Confederate line where they were under constant attack throughout June 16. That night they drove the enemy back from some captured works. The next morning, they repulsed another Federal Assault. That evening, after having no rest for at least two full days, men of the 24th N.C. were finally relieved and marched to the rear.

Thus, began the Siege of Petersburg that would last for the next ten months. That July was extremely hot, and the brigade was under constant bombardment from Union guns, mortars and sharpshooters. Pvt. Marshburn and the rest of the 24th N.C. spent July digging entrenchments that would become their home for the next few months.

During the siege the Federal Army devised a plan to dig a tunnel underneath the Confederate line of defense, blow it up with explosives, thereby opening a breach in the Confederate line. The tunnel was completed on July 23rd at 3:30 a.m. On July 30th the explosives blew an enormous hole - 200 feet long, 50 feet wide and 30 feet deep. At least 278 Confederate soldiers were killed in the blast.

The 24th N.C. had been just to the left of the "Crater" so they moved to the right to seal the broken trench line. The regiment fought hard to prevent the attacking Federals from breaking through. Much of the fighting was bloody and hand to hand. Bodies were piled up three and four deep in the bottom of the crater. The Union Army suffered 3800 casualties, while the Confederates suffered 1500 in just a few hours. By about 2:00 p.m., the Battle of the Crater was over.

Life at Petersburg was becoming unbearable for the Confederate soldier. The men were literally starving to death. Their clothes were ragged, and many had no shoes. Often there were times when a rat could be found, it would become stew for the day. Some soldiers even boiled their haversacks, hoping to get some kind of flavor for a soup. As a result of an effort throughout the North to deliver dinner to the Union's "gallant soldiers and sailors", the Federal Army at Petersburg celebrated Thanksgiving 1864 with a feast of turkey, chicken, pies and fruit. No such celebration took place in Lee's starving army.

The winter of 1864-1865 was terribly cold. Many soldiers died from disease and from the effects of the cold. The Confederacy began enlisting young boys and old men because desertion was on the rise. Plus, as one officer said, much of the Confederate Army had been "worn out, killed out and starved out." Even with all the hardships of soldier life, Pvt. Marshburn was present and accounted for at every single roll call.

Finally, the hard winter was over and General Lee called on General John B. Gordon to devise a plan and find a likely place to batter through the enemy works and break the Federal grip on Petersburg. General Gordon planned an attack of Fort Stedman. The 24th N.C. Troops were a part of this attack.

At 4: 00 a.m., on March 25, 1865, the attack was launched with great success, but as the Federal Army came to life, they counter attacked with such force, that Lee had no choice but to withdraw. This was the last offensive assault for the Confederate Army, and it had cost the Confederates 600 killed, 2,400 wounded, 1,000 missing or captured. The 24th N.C. Troops suffered heavy casualties. Two of its companies lost over half their number as prisoners of war. Pvt. Marshburn was wounded with a gunshot to the right arm. He was immediately taken to a Richmond Hospital. One week later, on April 3, 1865, he was captured in the hospital by the invading Federal Army. No details of the severity of his wound are available but considering the state of medical care during the Civil War and the fact he was wounded seriously enough to be hospitalized, it is amazing that he did not lose his arm.

On April 9, 1865, General Robert E. Lee surrendered his Confederate Army at Appomattox Court House. Fifty-five members of the 24th Regiment N.C. Troops were present to receive their paroles. It would not be until April 26, 1865, that Pvt. Hardy B. Marshburn would take the Oath of Allegiance and be paroled. Hardy came back to Richlands with a broken spirit. The cause, for which he fought, was lost forever. He had left home a 17-year-old boy and returned a 20-year-old man who had experienced the horror and trauma of combat in a bloody war.

After some time of recuperation, Hardy went back to doing the only thing he knew besides soldiering which was farming. He eventually married and raised a family on the family farm in Onslow County. Hardy Marshburn died at the young age of 52.

On October 27, 1996, a memorial service was held at Hardy's gravesite on the Marshburn family farm to dedicate a Confederate tombstone given by the Veterans Administration to Marshburn's descendants. In accordance with an act of March 9, 1906, congress authorized a special style upright marble or granite headstone to mark the graves of eligible Confederate States of America (CSA) soldiers/sailors. Congress adopted the same size and material for Confederate headstones as for Union deceased but altered the design to give the stones a pointed rather than rounded top and inscribed with the Southern Cross of Honor.

i This article relied heavily on the writings of Bob and Warren Jarman who compiled the history of Hardy B Marshburn.

ii A chronological history of the 24th North Carolina Infantry Regiment is available at <https://civilwarintheeast.com/confederate-regiments/north-carolina/24th-north-carolina-infantry-regiment/>

iii The terms "gallant soldiers and sailors" were used during the campaign by The Union League in 1864 to help promote providing Thanksgiving Dinner for all federal soldiers and sailors. The Union League Committee Treasurer was Theodore Roosevelt father of the future president with the same name.

iv Unverified sources indicate that the Confederates could see the celebrations taking place and out of respect would not fire on them.

v Legend has it that Confederate tombstones are cut to a point so no Union soldiers could sit on top on them.

September CFCWRT Meeting Report

By Tim Winstead, Former "Runner" Editor

Are you interested in Civil War Naval actions? If so, read on. If not, read on anyhow because these actions started with Scott's Anaconda Plan and ended with the surrender of the CSS Shenandoah on November 6, 1865.

At our Cape Fear CWRT Meeting Thursday night, September 14, we had an engaging speaker who addressed the North Carolina cornfield built CSS ALBEMARLE and its actions against Union presence in the eastern area of North Carolina. John V. Quarstein, a Chesapeake area native and historian, told the story of the 19-year-old contractor, Gilbert Elliott, and his efforts that almost changed the war's course during 1864.

If you want to read numerous interesting articles, check out marinersmuseum.org and John's blog for the more complete story of the CSS ALBEMARLE and many other naval actions.

[More pictures from last month's meeting.]

John Quarstein was an amazing speaker who kept the audience entertained as he shared his very special knowledge of ironclads and the role they played during the war. An animated speaker, he made the history fun. We hope to have him back someday.

We thank our sponsors, who make it possible for us to thrive as an organization. It would be much harder without their support!

Civil Warriors: An overview of weapons, uniforms, tactics, medicine, and camp life of both sides including a display of a few actual relics.

Local historian, former UNCW professor, and Round Table favorite, Dr. Everard Smith returns to our Round Table with another fascinating presentation on a totally new topic. Ev will focus on the volunteer soldier and some of the things he used and experienced in his everyday Army life. His thoroughly researched presentation will include some surprising details and a display of some actual relics of the civil war.

A native of Washington, D.C., Dr. Smith received his B.A. degree from Yale and his Ph.D. in history from UNC Chapel Hill. From 1991 to 1993, he was a senior administrative officer and adjunct professor of history at UNCW. From 1994 until his retirement in 2015, he was employed by the North Carolina Department of Information Technology as a senior networking analyst for voice, video, and data.

Dr. Smith's service to the community includes membership on the Wilmington Historic Preservation Commission; on the Preservation Action committee of the Historic Wilmington Foundation; and on the City Council-appointed Advisory Board of the Hannah Block Historic USO Building and Community Arts Center, of which he was the chairman. He is a frequent public speaker on the Civil War and WWII periods, and has often conducted local history tours for visiting cruise ship passengers and other tourist groups. An active preservationist, Dr. Smith was a leader in the local movement to preserve the Hannah Block Building when it was endangered in the 1990s. He is the owner of the Larkins House, a 170-year-old home on Dock Street in the downtown Historic District.

Editor's Note: Remember that the battle for Wyse Fork isn't quite over. Almost every day, battlefields from the wars fought in this country face extinction due to the rush to develop the lands on which they were fought. Such a battle is going on now in North Carolina with the land where the Battle of Wyse Fork took place. There are a number of ways to help in the fight to save this sacred ground. You can simply go to last month's newsletter to get some valuable information on what to do. Mostly, it involves people who are interested in preserving these historic sites taking action - something as simple as writing an email or a letter, calling a state representative, donating to the organizations who seek to protect these lands or taking one of the tours starting to develop to tell this important story. It's easy to sit back and think "someone else will take care of it. I don't really have to put forth the effort." When that attitude prevails, these lands tend to disappear. Once they're gone, they're gone forever.

As people who care about what happened in the Civil War, this is our battle today. Obviously, the bullets aren't flying and we aren't facing any artillery barrages, but the battle is very real nonetheless. There are strong forces at work trying to claim that land for their own purposes. There are alternatives to taking that land. The battle is worth fighting because the land is worth protecting.

CFCWRT's 30th Campaign Opens with John Quarstein September Program on Actions on Our Inland Waterways

By Bill Jayne, CFCWRT President

After a successful summer program featuring presentations by our members, including two interactive discussions, we begin the Round Table's 30th Campaign this fall. Our first speaker was Dr. Chris Fonvielle in October 1994. Our speaker this September will be John Quarstein. John is a nationally known speaker and an award-winning historian, preservationist, and author, whose name will be familiar to many of our members.

John served as the director of the Virginia War Museum until his retirement in 2008 after 30 years of service. He is now Director Emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at The Mariners' Museum in Newport News, Virginia.

John has authored 19 books and has written numerous articles, exhibits, essays, and documentaries. His titles include A History of Ironclads: The Power of Iron over Wood; CSS Virginia: Sink Before Surrender; and The Monitor Boys: The Crew of the Union's First Ironclad. He is the winner of the 2012 Henry Adams Prize for excellence in historical literature. Quarstein

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson
CFCWRT Secretary

We finished our summer with a membership of just over 90-family units. Our largest renewal challenge, however, begins this month due to the preponderance of members originally joining in September. (a family unit is defined as a membership paid for a family, be it a single or multiple member unit).

September renewal members have been notified. You may send your $30. annual fee to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or better still, just bring your renewal fee to our September 14th meeting. You may also pay on-line by credit card at <http://www.cfwrt.org> Treasurer Mike McDonald will also accept your credit card at the meeting.

We begin the season of increased activity and to that end, Program Chair, Jim Gannon, has scheduled a really terrific lineup of speakers.

With The Runner, our monthly newsletter, resuming regular publication, we can promise a productive and most enjoyable program year. We are not only encouraging renewals but asking members to bring friends and neighbors to our next meeting. We have ample seating and parking at St John's Episcopal Church, our regular meeting venue.

has also produced, narrated and written several PBS documentaries including the film series Civil War in Hampton Roads, a Silver Telly Award winner. Quarstein is the recipient of the National Trust for Historic Preservation's President's Award for Historic Preservation, the Civil War Society's Preservation Award, and the Daughters of the American Revolution Gold Historians Medal. He has been a guest on CSpan multiple times and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary.

John is an expert on the Naval War and will speak to us about the Civil War actions that occurred along North Carolina's inland waterways, specifically the actions at Edenton, Plymouth and New Bern in 1864.

The meeting of the round table will be held on Thursday evening, September 14, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. There is ample time to browse our used books table, talk to members of the round table and discover new interests. See you there!

November Program to feature Colonel (Ret.) Ed Lowe

By Jim Gannon, CFCWRT Programs Director

11/9/23 Col. (Ret) Ed Lowe

Author of “A Fine Opportunity Lost: Longstreet’s East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863 April 1864.”

In November the CFCWRT will welcome Col. Ed Lowe who served 26 years on active duty in the U.S. Army, with deployments to Operation Desert Shield/Storm, Haiti, Afghanistan, and Iraq. Ed attended North Georgia College and has graduate degrees from California State University, the U.S. Army War College, U.S. Command & General Staff College, and Webster’s University. He is an adjunct professor for the University of Maryland/Global Campus and Elizabethtown College, where he teaches history and government. Ed will speak to us about Lieutenant General James Longstreet’s campaign in East Tennessee.

Longstreet’s deployment to East Tennessee promised a chance to shine. The commander of the First Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia had long been overshadowed by his commander, Robert E. Lee, and Second Corps commander, Stonewall Jackson. Lee had nonetheless leaned heavily on Longstreet, whom he called his “Old Warhorse.” Reassigned to the Western Theater because of sliding fortunes there, the Old Warhorse hoped to run free with—finally—an independent command of his own.

For his Union opponent, Maj. Gen. Ambrose Burnside, East Tennessee offered an opportunity for redemption. Burnside’s early war success had been overshadowed by his disastrous turn at the head of the Army of the Potomac, where he suffered a dramatically lopsided loss at the battle of Fredericksburg followed by the humiliation of “The Mud March.”

Removed from army command and shuffled to a less prominent theater, Burnside suddenly found his quiet corner of the war getting noisy and worrisome. The mid-September loss by the Union Army of the Cumberland at the battle of Chickamauga left it besieged in Chattanooga, Tennessee. That, in turn, opened the door to Union-leaning East Tennessee and imperiled Burnside’s isolated force around Knoxville, the region’s most important city. A strong move by Confederates would create political turmoil for Federal forces and cut off Burnside's ability to come to Chattanooga's aid.

Into that breach marched Longstreet, fresh off his tide-turning role in the Confederate victory at Chickamauga. The Old Warhorse finally had the independent command he had longed for and an opportunity to capitalize on the momentum he had helped create.

Longstreet's First Corps and Burnside's IX Corps had shared battlefields at Second Manassas, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. Unexpectedly, these two old foes from the Eastern Theater now found themselves transplanted in the Western—familiar adversaries on unfamiliar ground. The fate of East Tennessee hung in the balance, and the reputations of the commanders would be won or lost.

The Next Program at the Brunswick CWRT

Editor's Note: As a “sister” organization, we have an agreement with the Brunswick Civil War Roundtable to publicize each others programs. Members from that roundtable often attend our meetings and vice versa. If you get a chance, check out this interesting local BCWRT program:

The first monthly meeting of the new season begins on Tuesday, September 5th when popular Civil War historian Max Longley will present “Marble Nash Taylor and Edward Stanly: North Carolina's Two Civil War Union Generals.” A curious event took place on Hatteras Island involving two unique and charismatic individuals, President Lincoln, and two short-lived governorships of North Carolina. The meeting will be held at Hatch Auditorium on Caswell Beach.

Registration begins at 6:15PM. The program starts at 7:00PM. The visitor fee is $10, and can include a spouse, and could be applied toward the $25 annual membership dues. For more information, contact president John Butler at Brunswickcwr@gmail.com, or call him at (404) 229-9425. Or, visit their website at Brunswickcivilwarroundtable.com. or their Facebook page for additional information, news, and updates.

Were West Point Graduates Responsible for the High Casualty Lists of the Civil War? Part Two

By John Weisz, CFCWRT Member

Victory on the battlefield in the Mexican War, was much more likely to be a predictor of victory in the Civil War when leadership and moral courage were applied by higher level officers. Towards the end of the war it would lead to dramatic success and even annihilation of Confederate forces by the Federal armies.

Two particularly important characteristics of a commander's success are physical and moral courage. Appreciating the statistics relative to casualties of general officers in the first part of this article, it shows that physical courage on the battlefield was not in short supply and those numerous casualties among officers was definitely not limited to the USMA grads.

With this in mind let us investigate a significant characteristic of strong and successful commanders..

Moral Courage is characterized by one's ability to take decisive action despite the risk of adverse consequences. It requires agile thinking and the ability to quickly analyze alternatives without sacrificing deliberate thought. Furthermore, the commander who works against the plans of a superior due to his timelier and 'from the front' knowledge of the situation at hand, would likely face great risk to his career. Moral courage is the act of doing the right thing, understanding the possible consequences and not backing off from sound decision.

An example of the lack of moral courage is the case of George McClellan. In the Peninsula campaign, early in 1862, McClellan cautiously crawled with his Army of 100,000 up the Peninsula while facing less than 13,000 Confederates. This weak execution gave other Confederate units time to entrench up to and around Richmond. Subsequently, the Federals were pushed back, and the strategic goal of taking the Confederate capital was lost. It took three more years and over 500,000 additional fatalities to finally end the war.

McClellan based his hesitancy on the very inaccurate and overestimated intelligence of the Pinkerton spies and detectives. Seemingly, the Union commander took the intelligence at face value and pursued no other sources of intelligence in estimating the Confederate army's size. Some historians suggested that he used these inflated numbers as "insurance," that is, as an excuse for him to use in the event of losing a battle.

His own staff and field subordinates, as well as Lincoln, knew of his problem in making decisions; and when he finally did act, the rare battlefield opportunities were already lost. Besides the slow march up the James River, once he was aggressively attacked by General Lee and the seven days battles, he ordered a hasty retreat back to his base on that peninsula; in essence being beat back by a force significantly smaller than the size of his command.

Later, during the Antietam campaign, he squandered opportunities to defeat Lee in detail even though he had captured Confederate plans outlining exact locations where all Lee's scattered forces were.

Again, believing that he was outnumbered he deployed his corps piece meal, thus allowing the Confederates to move their reserves to threatened points during the battle. Even after Lee was forced to withdraw and pull his army back to Virginia, McClellan forfeited several opportunities to attack and annihilate Lee's force when they were trapped on the northern bank of a flooded Potomac River.

Robert E Lee was the exact opposite of 'Mac.' Lee took risks and accepted responsibilities for his failures. In terms of moral courage. His shortcomings were in terms of not weighing all the available alternatives; often to the point of recklessness. A significant cause for this was his narrow view of the war and the capabilities of his men. After his early victories he believed that his men could defeat twice the number of Federal soldiers on any given battlefield. When he faced defeats, he was devastated and took a while to recover from his failures. His moral courage however did rest on his own acceptance of responsibility for failures rather than blaming his subordinates or the spirit of his men.

Some other examples where lack of moral courage resulted in failures:

- "Fighting Joe" Hooker's loss of nerve at the time victory was in sight at the Battle of Chancellorsville in May 1863. At the critical moment he became disoriented and was unable to give orders. The result was no overall direction of the campaign for several days, in which the Confederates regained the initiative and forced the Federals to retreat back to their starting point in the battle. (This all occurring when Hooker had twice the number of men as the Confederate forces and 4x the number when either of Lee's corps were separated).
- Braxton Bragg, at both Shiloh and Chickamauga; where indecisiveness led him to delay deployments and sacrifice surprise over an already disorganized enemy army.

The original hypothesis of this article was that USMA graduates themselves were responsible for the high casualty rates during the war. This article seems to be wholly unfounded on the basis of the preceding facts. For every commander who could not quickly decide on viable course of actions, several others were 'modern thinkers' using ingenuity and understanding of the variables in warfare to deliver solutions in how did defeat the enemy with less casualties; mostly because of their moral courage based on analysis, determination and dedication to more strategic purpose of their planning and execution than their contemporaries.

In short, it wasn't Jomini tactics and operational examples from Napoleon's campaigns, deficits in staff work, communications or logistics and the improved rifling of small arms and cannon that caused monstrous numbers of deaths from battle, wounds or disease. Defeat was 'snatched from the jaws of victory' when commanders on both sides lacked the guts to make a decision and fight it out to victory. Moral courage!

Unfortunately, the Bentonville Battlefield Symposium scheduled for this month had to be canceled.

Thanks to John Weisz for leading the group in a "you're in command" program at our August meeting. Great fun!

Editor's Note: We received information from the Save Wyse Fork Battlefield campaign. As you may know, there are a number of dedicated people working hard to save this important piece of Civil War history. We're reprinting some of this information here to guide CFCWRT members who are interested in helping in this and conservation efforts in other areas. Once these cultural treasures are gone, we can't get them back. It takes people like us to save them - especially in our backyard.

The Save Wyse Fork Battlefield group reports that: "We received some positive news from the NPS last week! We have been invited to apply for a Battlefield Land Acquisition Grant that would allow us to preserve more of the battlefield while we wait other avenues to pan out. More to come as we prepare our grant application."

From the NPS:

Battlefield Land Acquisition Grants from the NPS American Battlefield Protection Program empower preservation partners nationwide to acquire and preserve threatened Revolutionary War, War of 1812 and Civil War battlefields. In addition, the program administers three other grant opportunities: Preservation Planning Grants, which are open to all sites of armed conflict on American soil, and the newly authorized Battlefield Restoration and Battlefield Interpretation Grants. This financial assistance generates community-driven stewardship of historic resources at the state, tribal and local levels.

H.R. 3448 – American Battlefields Protection Program Enhancement Act

From the National Parks Conservation Association:

NPCA supports this legislation which strengthens the ability to protect and rehabilitate battlefields across the country through the American Battlefield Protection Program managed by the National Park Service. The bill also expands the list of organizations and entities, including tribes, eligible to directly receive American Battlefield Protection Program grants, targets ABPP grants towards priority battlefield protection, enhancement, and restoration projects, and "creates a process for expanding and updating battlefield boundaries." (<https://www.npca.org/articles/3546-position-on-h-r-386-h-r-1318-h-r-3448>)

From the American Battlefield Trust:

From Gettysburg and Antietam to Bentonville and Yorktown, the American Battlefield Protection Program has aided the preservation of more than 35,000 acres of hallowed ground across 21 states. Managed by the National Park Service, the program administers grants to preserve, restore and interpret America's hallowed grounds related to the Revolutionary War, War of 1812, and the Civil War.

The American Battlefield Protection Program Enhancement Act (H.R.3448) would make key modifications to the existing program, helping to strengthen it to ensure its continued success for years to come.

The legislation would allow non-profits and tribes to apply directly for these grants, saving valuable time and ensuring key land acquisitions can move quickly and efficiently. Additionally, the legislation would widen the scope of ABPP's restoration grants to all NPS identified battlegrounds and ensure land acquisitions grants can be used to preserve our most significant battlefields from our nation's founding conflicts. Finally, it would create a mechanism for the National Park Service to update the Congressionally authorized reports identifying the key Revolutionary War, War of 182 and Civil War battlefields when there is new research, archaeology or study that shows a larger battlefield than originally known.

Now more than ever, as we see development threats rise against the backdrop of our nation's hallowed ground, the strengthening of the program is key to continue the preservation of the nation's heritage, especially as we gear up for our nation's 250th commemoration.

Building our Army of Believers

All of you, who read this weekly briefing, are part of our army of believers. The power of your passion to save this important piece of history cannot be understated. Citizen advocacy is what this country is built on and it is no different here. Your voices matter and your voices tell the story of Wyse Fork so that it is not forgotten or destroyed.

From: The Partnership for a More Perfect Union at the Congressional Management Foundation:

1. Direct constituent interactions have more influence on lawmakers' decisions than other advocacy strategies. In three surveys of congressional staff over a 10-year span, 99% (2004), 97% (2010), and 94% (2015) said that "in-person visits from constituents" would have "some" or "a lot" of influence on an undecided lawmaker.
2. Congress places a high value on groups and citizens who have built relationships with the legislator and staff. When asked what advocacy groups should do to help build relationships with the office, 79% of staff surveyed said "meet or get to know the Legislative Assistant with jurisdiction over their issue area" and 62% said "meet or get to know the District/State Director."
3. Citizen advocates are more influential and contribute to better public policy when they provide personalized and local information to Congress. 9 out of 10 (91%) congressional staffers surveyed said it would be helpful to have "information about the impact the bill/issue would have on the district or state." However, only 9% report they receive that information frequently. Similarly, 79% said a personal story from a constituent related to the bill or issue would be helpful, but only 18% report they receive it frequently.
4. Citizens have significant potential to enhance their advocacy skills and influence Congress. After concluding 40 hours of CMF/Feeding America advanced advocacy training conducted over four months, citizen-advocates from local food banks met their Members and congressional staff. Whereas 12% of congressional staff report that the typical constituent they meet with is "very prepared," 97% of the congressional staff who met advanced advocacy trainees agreed that these citizen-advocates were "very prepared" for their meetings.

2023 Antietam Memorial Illumination

Editor's Note: This event is supposed to be soul-stirring and humbling according to the people who have seen it. There is a luminary for every one of the casualties suffered on that bloody day - the bloodiest single day of the war. It can be rained out (as per my personal experience so far), but we're going to try again this year. The information below is from the National Park Service:

Antietam National Battlefield will present the Annual Memorial Illumination on Saturday, December 2, 2023 to honor the 23,000 casualties from the Battle of Antietam on September 17, 1862.

The event is a driving tour open to the public starting at 6:00 pm. Cars enter the park by traveling west on Route 34 and lining up on the shoulder of the road. Cars are allowed to enter the event until midnight. Walking is not allowed.

The temporary visitor center is closed that day except for the park store and the lobby which will be open from 9:00 am until 3:00 pm. Visitor services during the day will be limited and only porta-johns will be available. The northern end of the park, north of Route 34, will close at 3:00 pm.

We thank our sponsors, who make it possible for us to thrive as an organization. It would be much harder without their support!

We find and develop outstanding original military and general history manuscripts and bring them to you in the form of quality books you will be proud to read, own, and keep for a lifetime.

August Battle Scenario Puts You in Command at Gettysburg

By Bill Jayne, President

All members of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable are encouraged to attend. In June, members of the round table presented fascinating and enlightening programs on the surprisingly prevalent use of anesthesia in treating wounds and an entertaining look at camp cooking in the armies, accompanied by VERY tasty samples. In July, the round table held a classic, seminar-style discussion about the pivotal battle of Cedar Creek, just a few weeks before the presidential election of 1864.

The August meeting will be held on Thursday evening, August 10, at centrally located St. John's Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

The Summer Forum on August 10, 2023, is based on a scenario that will allow all members to participate in making decisions as though they were Major General John Buford, Commanding Officer of the First Cavalry Division of the Army of the Potomac on the first day at Gettysburg.

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson, Secretary

We welcomed two new members at our July meeting, Drew Peck from Burgaw and Jack Berry who recently moved into Trinity Landing in Wilmington. Welcome Gentlemen! We have also had recent returnees from our pre-COVID membership and thus welcome back Alan & Beverly Hunsberger and George Holston. Their memberships bring our total membership to over 90 but our current venue, St John's Episcopal Church, is large enough to accommodate.

Our mid-summer, member forums have been popular, and we thus present the third in the series, A War Game of Sorts, led by member John Weisz.

August renewing members (you will be notified) may send their $30 annual fee to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or better still, just bring your renewal fee to our August 10th meeting. You may also pay on-line at <http://www.cfcwrt.org> or by credit card at our meeting.

Per our membership system, your membership is good for a full 12 months and your renewal is thus a year from your prior payment. Due to our prior system, where everyone re-enlisted in August, there will be a significant number of members receiving renewal notices in August. Please respond accordingly.

Would-be commanders will be presented with a mission statement, maps and some relevant facts. Four options for executing the mission will be presented and the audience will offer their solutions to the problem.

It should be stated that the solutions will not require the detailed analysis and planning that would characterize the planning of a real civil war engagement. The goal is to engage as much of the audience as possible to help find the best solutions. Among the four possible options, the one actually used in the campaign will be discussed with the impact that decision of General Buford's had on the battle Of Gettysburg and the ultimate outcome of the war.

On June 3, 1863, soon after his celebrated victory over Union Maj. Gen. Jospeh Hooker at the Battle of Chancellorsville, near Fredericksburg, Virginia, Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee leads his troops north in his second invasion of enemy territory. The 75,000-man Army of Northern Virginia is in high spirits. In addition to seeking fresh supplies such as horses, shoes and other goods, the depleted soldiers look forward to availing themselves of food from the bountiful fields in Pennsylvania farm country, sustenance the war-ravaged landscape of Virginia can no longer provide.

Lee's southern army shields its presence from the Union by traveling north in the Shenandoah Valley as the opposing cavalry commands clash repeatedly over the mountain passes. Hooker also heads north, but he is reluctant to engage with Lee directly after the Union's humiliating defeat at Chancellorsville. Hooker is ultimately relieved of command in late June. His successor, Maj. Gen. George Gordon Meade, continues to move the 90,000-man Army of the Potomac northward in grueling marches of 20 miles per day or more, all the while following orders to keep his army between Lee and Washington, D.C.

Early in the morning of July 1, a Confederate infantry division under Maj. Gen. Henry Heth marches toward Gettysburg to seize supplies. In an unplanned engagement, they confront Union cavalry. Union Brig. Gen. John Buford chooses to engage the larger Confederate unit, thereby slowing the Confederate advance until the infantry of the Union I and XI Corps under Maj. Gen. John F. Reynolds arrives. Reynolds is killed in action. Soon Confederate reinforcements reach the scene. By late afternoon, the wool-clad troops are battling ferociously in the sweltering heat. Thirty thousand Confederates overwhelm 20,000 Federals, who fall back through Gettysburg and fortify Cemetery Hill south of town.

The Battle of Gettysburg marked, perhaps, the most significant turning point of the Civil War. With more than 50,000 estimated casualties combined in the two armies, the three-day engagement was the bloodiest single battle of the conflict. Gettysburg ended Confederate general Robert E. Lee's ambitious second quest to invade the North and bring the Civil War to a swift end. The loss at Gettysburg dashed the hopes of the Confederate States of America to become an independent nation.

After a year of defensive victories in Virginia, Lee's objective was to win a battle north of the Mason-Dixon line in the hopes of forcing a negotiated end to the fighting. His loss at Gettysburg prevented him from realizing that goal. Instead, the defeated general fled south with a wagon train of wounded soldiers straining toward the Potomac. Victorious Union General George Meade pursued the retreating army but was unable to trap Lee and force a Confederate surrender. The bitterly divisive war raged on for another two years.

Union General John Buford

The meeting will be held in Elebash Hall in St. John's Episcopal Church. Enter at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table and talk to members of the round table. See you there!

At the Battle of Gettysburg, a group of nuns from the Sisters of Charity convent (located in nearby Emmitsburg) provided medical care at field dressing stations, in field hospitals and on the very battlefield itself. They were easily distinguishable from the large white habits they wore on their heads (think the Flying Nun). Their neutrality was respected by both sides as they were there to care for the wounded. They had no political leanings. They were credited as being great caregivers.

10/12/23 Chris Bryan

Author of "Cedar Mountain to Antietam:

A Civil War Campaign History of the Union XII Corps, July - September 1862"

Chris Bryan's book is both a unit history and a leadership and character assessment. It is a compelling story of a little studied yet consequential corps and fills a long standing gap in the history of the civil war. It is the story of how this often luckless command began as part of MG John Pope's Army of Virginia in June 1862, endured defeat after coming within a whisker of defeating MG Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain, suffered through the hardships of the campaigns before and after Second Manassas, but despite it all, found its resurgence in Maryland as part of the rebuilt Army of the Potomac.

The Union XII Corps found significant success on the field at Antietam. Its soldiers swept through the East Woods and the Miller Cornfield, permanently clearing both of the Confederates, repelled multiple Southern assaults against the Dunker Church plateau, and eventually secured a foothold beyond the Dunker Church in the West Woods. This important piece of high ground had been the Union Objective all morning, and its occupation threatened the center and rear of General Lee's army. The XII Corps' achievement is especially notable given its string of disappointments and hardships in the months leading up to Antietam.

Chris Bryan is a native of Franklin County, Pennsylvania. After graduating from the United States Naval Academy with a B.S. in History, he served as a naval aviator for eight years. He has since worked as a project manager, during which time he earned an M.A. in Liberal Arts from St. John's College in Annapolis, Maryland and a Masters in Historic Preservation from the University of Maryland, College Park where his studies focused on architectural investigations of antebellum domestic and agricultural outbuildings in the Chesapeake Bay region. He has remained active with historic preservation and architectural investigations.

Don't forget to purchase books and merchandise at our meetings. The books, shirts, and hats sold contribute to the funding available for speakers and their expenses. Plus, the clothing is a good way to "fly the flag" of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable when you're out and about. The shirts come in all sizes and many colors and the hats are adjustable. Reading the books - of course - increases your knowledge about the intricacies of the Civil War. It's a win-win for you and the organization!

Were West Point Graduates Responsible for the High Casualty Rates of the Civil War?

By John Weisz, CFCWRT Member

What were the contributions of West Pointers to the outcome of the Civil War?

To begin with let's look at a few facts about the United States Military Academy [USMA]. It was established at West Point New York in 1802. Within 59 years of its founding, the Civil War broke out and the foundation of the institution seemed to be in jeopardy. Military Academy was the first school in the United States for training officers in the infantry, cavalry, artillery, engineering and fortification science. It undoubtedly contributed much to the leadership during the battles, and in logistics and strategic planning in the ACW.

During the war, The Academy ...

- Produced 445 generals [294 fought for the Union, and 151 for the Confederacy].
- Suffered 105 fatalities killed and 151 seriously wounded [57% of those engaged].
- USMA graduates commanded one or both armies in every one of the 60 major battles of the war.

Although these statistics show a significant physical commitment to the Civil War, they don't show, on the whole, many great tactical innovations or operational successes, other than by a few modern thinkers like Grant, Sherman, Longstreet and Sheridan.

Founded in 1802, The United States Military Academy [USMA] is an institute for engineering and science, as well. West Point began with a rocky start with a total of two dozen cadets and staff at its birth. The first four superintendents either resigned or were fired. The next superintendent was one of the earliest graduates, who provided exemplary service in peace and war. Sylvanus Thayer immediately took steps to provide more discipline and academic regimen to an otherwise failing program.

In 1815, Sylvanus Thayer was sent to Europe to study the military systems and schools of the major military powers. Most of his time was spent at the École Polytechnique and in obtaining engineering and military texts. Thayer brought back over a thousand books, maps and artifacts from France. Most of these now reside in the Thayer Collection of the Academy Library.

Upon returning to the United States in 1817, Thayer began his tenure as Superintendent of the Academy which ended in 1833. To this day he is known as "the Father of the Academy" for the work he did to revise and revitalize USMA's curriculum. The French influence, particularly Napoleon's campaigns and maxims, were embedded in the academic experience of generations of graduating classes and subsequently throughout the Army as well as the scientific, engineering and transportation fields. The Academy had strong ties to the École Polytechnique and St. Cyr, the French military academy which was founded shortly after West point. Hence the strong influence of Napoleonic legends and tactics, many of which were collected in Jomini's work, The Art of War.

With this resulting improved school for soldiering, much was expected (and delivered) by subsequent graduates. General Winfield Scott, Commander-in-Chief in the Mexican War, sang their praises in their service of that war. Scott made a toast to the graduates of West Point that it was his "fixed opinion" that the war was won mainly because of the service and leadership of the Academy graduates

This tribute was significantly contributed by the work of Captain Robert E Lee, who was Scott's chief engineer and scout, and Lee's firm grasp of terrain and fortifications. His tactical acumen allowed the Army to screen American forces from Mexican view and locate 'seams' between the main Mexican battle lines. This would later to be essential in exploiting opportunities for major breakthroughs of enemy positions.

Not to be forgotten, were the young leaders like Jefferson Davis, Albert Sidney Johnston, Thomas 'Stonewall' Jackson, US Grant and others who led their companies superbly. This war was one where small units could make a significant impact to turn the tide of battle against the more unwieldy Mexican Army (which, by the way, were firmly devoted to Napoleon's legacy. Santa Ana was so impressed that he even, arrogantly referred to himself as the 'Napoleon of the West.'

One does wonder how the tactical and operational expertise Lee showed in 1846 and 1847, later occasionally failed him from 1862 to 1865; where his plans and execution often led to horrendous casualties without an accompanying victory. On several occasions, he threw men up against entrenched positions, such as at Malvern Hill and Gettysburg.

It is true that the cadets were versed in the brilliant campaigns of Napoleon, however Napoleon had an entirely different army from that of the Confederate or Union troops. Although conscripted, the French soldiers were green at first but were absorbed by the veterans of the many French campaigns where they soon became professional and veteran themselves.

The American soldiers were a different breed. Following their officers, but they could also think for themselves; a characteristic of 'democratic soldiers.'

The tactics of maneuvering regiments on the battlefield were similar in these two eras of warfare but the weapons were not. ACW infantry fired rifled muskets, which were much more accurate and deadly.

Other differences between AWC and Napoleonic warfare are:

- Terrain in Europe was much wider and open, with a better road system for tactical infantry movement. Looking at warfare in Northern Virginia, Tennessee in Northern Georgia, the Civil War commanders could not readily send out several corps along different routes and expect them to meet at its designated point at the most opportune time directed by the commander. There were, of course, exceptions. Sherman did very well in his 'March to the Sea' to keep all three of his corps within two day's march of each other. Lee had success in the Second Antietam campaign, and Jackson's subordinates, during the Shenandoah Valley campaign, would usually converge to fight a battle almost always at their preordained times. But generally, operations were often delayed as the army commander would wait patiently for supporting troops or flanking divisions to settle into their designated jump off points.

- Communications were basically the same, however the use of the telegraph should have provided a quantum leap in control of the various fighting corps in supporting services. At Chancellorsville, however, that technology suffered many mechanical and human shortcomings that led to the isolation of the two major elements of Hooker's plan and subsequent retreat.
- Lines of Communication [LOC]. Napoleon's tactics were based on the need to separate the fighting body of the army from the enemy's logistics base. Most commanders on both sides were extremely sensitive to exposing their LOC to interdiction by the enemy. Yet at Gettysburg, Lee ignored Longstreet's pleas to go around the Round Tops and put himself between the Army of the Potomac and Washington DC. This was a much less costly alternative to climbing the little Round Top or Cemetery Ridge, in terms of soldiers lost for limited gains

We have shown how the influence of Napoleonic tactics and operations strategy heavily influenced the new Academy and its graduates up to 1850. In the Mexican war, however, it was the initiative of company and field grade officers using their tactical analysis of terrain, understanding of their soldiers and those of the enemy to seize opportunities on the battlefield before them. They would outthink and outmaneuver their enemy without a large expenditure of manpower and other resources. Their instincts and basic training in tactics at the Academy bore more fruit in that earlier war than when they commanded crops and armies in the ACW.

Editor's Note: Due to its length, John's article will be divided into two parts. This is the end of part one. Part two will run in next month's Runner.

The Harper House at Bentonville Battlefield is getting a new paint job. 15 - 17 layers of paint have to be removed first. Hard work. Then the exterior will be painted in the colors believed to exist at the time of the battle. All in an effort to be as historically accurate as possible. Stay tuned.

John Quarstein Will Be Speaker on 9/14/23

CSS Albemarle and the actions at Edenton, Plymouth and New Bern

We are honored to have John V. Quarstein as our September Speaker. John is a nationally known speaker and an award-winning historian, preservationist, and author, whose name will be familiar to many of our members.

John served as the director of the Virginia War Museum until his retirement in 2008 after 30 years of service. He is now Director Emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at The Mariners' Museum in Newport News, Virginia.

John has authored 19 books and has written numerous articles, exhibits, essays, and documentaries. His titles include A History of Ironclads: The Power of Iron over Wood; CSS Virginia: Sink Before Surrender, and The Monitor Boys: The Crew of the Union's First Ironclad. He is the winner of the 2012 Henry Adams Prize for excellence in historical literature. Quarstein has also produced, narrated and written several PBS documentaries including the film series Civil War in Hampton Roads, a Silver Telly Award winner. Quarstein is the recipient of the National Trust for Historic Preservation's President's Award for Historic Preservation, the Civil War Society's Preservation Award, and the Daughters of the American Revolution Gold Historians Medal. He has been a guest on C- Span multiple times and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary.

John is the expert on the Naval War and will speak to us about the Civil War actions that occurred along North Carolina's inland waterways, specifically the actions at Edenton, Plymouth and New Bern.

Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863 - April 1864"

Confederate General Longstreet's First Corps and Union General Burnside's IX Corps had already shared battlefields at Second Manassas, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. Unexpectedly, these two old foes from the Eastern Theater now found themselves transplanted to the Western Theater —familiar adversaries on unfamiliar ground. The fate of East Tennessee hung in the balance, and new reputations could be won or lost. General James Longstreet's deployment to East Tennessee gave him the chance for an independent command. For his Union opponent, Major General Ambrose Burnside, the Western Theater offered an opportunity for redemption from past failures. Colonel Ed Lowe USA (Ret) tells the story of how this was "a fine opportunity lost" for both men.

Cedar Creek and the Significance of Contingency

By Bill Jayne, President

Our next meeting on July 13 will be a classic round table discussion—something like a seminar—in which all members in attendance will have the opportunity to talk about the Battle of Cedar Creek, October 19, 1864, in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia. The Civil War Round Table movement began in Chicago in the 1940s in something like this format. See ground rules for the discussion in the box nearby.

The question before the club is: Was the Battle of Cedar Creek a case of the Union “snatching victory from the jaws of defeat,” or a case of the Confederate army allowing victory to slip from its grasp and, in effect, “snatching defeat from the jaws of victory.”

What’s the significance of this question? One of the preeminent Civil War historians of the last half century is James M. McPherson, professor emeritus of History at Princeton

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson, Secretary

We are pleased to report, at this mid-way point of the year, that our paid membership remains at 87.

We have entered our member forum season. These summer months are ideal for members to bring a friend and/or neighbor to our regularly scheduled monthly meeting, as attendance is predictably lower during those months and your invitee may then experience how a traditional CWRT operates.

July renewing members (you have been duly notified) may send their $30 annual membership renewal fee to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or better still, just bring your renewal fee to our July 13th meeting. You may also pay on-line at <http://www.cfcwrt.org> or by credit card at our monthly meeting. We thank you for your support.

University. His Battle Cry of Freedom is, quite likely, the most influential volume of Civil War history published in the last 50 years.

The last chapter of Battle Cry of Freedom, “Epilogue: To the Shoals of Victory,” analyzes the reasons for Confederate defeat and Union victory. He wrote: “Most attempts to explain southern defeat or northern victory lack the dimension of contingency—the recognition that at numerous critical points during the war things might have gone altogether differently.”

He then names four “major turning points”:

1. The summer of 1862 when Jackson and Lee in the east, and Bragg and Kirby Smith in the west, “arrested the momentum of a seemingly imminent Union victory.”
2. The fall of 1862 when “battles at Antietam and Perryville threw back Confederate invasions, forestalled European mediation...and set the stage for the Emancipation Proclamation.”
3. Summer and fall of 1863 when Vicksburg, Gettysburg and Chattanooga “turned the tide toward ultimate northern victory.”
4. Finally, “one more reversal of that tide seemed possible in the summer of 1864 when appalling Union casualties and apparent lack of progress especially in Virginia brought the North to the brink of peace negotiations and the election of a Democratic president. But the capture of Atlanta and Sheridan’s destruction of Early’s army in the Shenandoah Valley (emphasis added) clinched matters for the North.”

When Professor McPherson writes of “Sheridan’s destruction of Early’s army in the Shenandoah Valley,” he’s talking about the Battle of Cedar Creek. In other words, Cedar Creek is of vital importance because it was one of the critical turning points of the war when what followed was contingent on the outcome of this particular battle.

Read up on Cedar Creek and come to the meeting on July 13 ready to enjoy a challenging and interesting opportunity to discuss this critical battle.

Members of the Cape Fear CWRT participate in an earlier roundtable discussion on the Battle of Fort Fisher. Rules of “decorum” are used.

Here are a few books to give you some detail on the Battle of Cedar Creek.

The Shenandoah Valley Campaign of 1864, edited by the renowned historian

Gary W. Gallagher, is an excellent thematic over- view of the context of the Battle of Cedar Creek and includes two very enlightening chapters on Cedar Creek itself. A very important chapter by Joseph T. Glatthaar looks at the campaign through the lens of General U.S. Grant’s strategy. From Winchester to Cedar Creek by Jeffrey D. Wert is a more straightforward, chronological battle history that provides much useful information about the three Confederate defeats that occurred before the Battle of Cedar Creek. The Guns of Cedar Creek by Thomas A. Lewis is a battle history that focuses more on Cedar Creek. The Battle of Cedar Creek by Jonathan A. Noyalas is a more recent battle history prepared for the Civil War Sesquicentennial Series. A book I have found very useful is a self-guided tour of the battlefield by Col. Joseph W. A. Whitehorne, U.S. Army (ret.).

The powerful and fascinating personalities who guided and moved this dramatic battle are worth reading about either in their own memoirs, biographies or anthologized writings in books like Battles and Leaders. Their personalities are central to analysis of the battle. Union General Philip Sheridan, was an 1853 graduate of West Point from Ohio. An Irish Catholic, he was an under- sized and very aggressive leader who rose to the pinnacle of his profession as the commanding general of the U.S. Army in the 1880s. Grant sent Maj. Gen. Sheridan to the Shenandoah Valley as commander of the newly consolidated Middle Division of the Army. His command was known as the Army of the Shenandoah. Sheridan brought unified, focused command to a large, extremely powerful force of three infantry corps plus a provisional division and a superbly equipped cavalry corps of more than 8,000 men. He commanded a total force of about 31,600 effectives at Cedar Creek, including 1,856 artillerymen serving 90 guns, according to Col. Whitehorne.

Much older than Sheridan, Lt. Gen. Jubal Early, graduated West Point in 1837. He was a Virginia native connected to many of the most prominent FFVs (First Families of Virginia). He left the Army after brief service in the Seminole War and then studied law and rose to political prominence in Virginia. He volunteered for the state militia in the War with Mexico but his unit arrived in Mexico too late to see combat. His aggressive style of leadership brought him to the attention of Robert E. Lee and he soon rose through the command structure as attrition removed leaders such as Thomas J. Jackson and Richard S. Ewell. By 1864, Lt. Gen. Early commanded the "Army of the Valley," composed primarily of the redoubtable II Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia. Col. Whitehorse estimates his strength as approximately 21,000 at Cedar Creek including 5,300 cavalry and 1,100 artillerymen serving more than 40 guns. He notes, however, that some estimate Confederate strength as low as 12,780. The National Park Service estimates the size of the Army of the Valley as "14,000-15,000 men."

Some other personalities are also of great interest and importance to the conduct of the battle. On the Confederate side, Maj. Gen. John B. Gordon of Georgia was crucial. Maj. Gen. Horatio Wright played an important role in Sheridan's army but many other generals such as Crook, Geary, and Custer added to the complexity of the engagement. Col. Rutherford B. Hayes (yes, that Rutherford B. Hayes who later became president of the United States) commanded a brigade caught up in the initial surprise of the Confederate assault.

The weather also played a role in the battle. Typical of autumn in the Shenandoah Valley, the weather was generally dry with warm days and cool nights. However, the battlefield is enveloped by the Shenandoah River and Cedar Creek and overshadowed by the imposing landform of Massanutten Mountain. In the crucial hours around dawn on October 19, 1864, fog prevailed over much of the battlefield.

The Union counter-attack took place later that day from about 4 - 5 p.m.

8/10/23: CFCWRT Audience Participation Program "A War Game of Sorts" led by John Weisz

The game will focus upon the options available to Major General John Buford leading a division of US cavalry and searching for the main Confederate force which has invaded southern Pennsylvania and Maryland. The audience will play the role of General Buford and will be presented four possible courses of action available to Buford.

After our audience discussion we will poll the participants and then review the actual decision made by Buford and why he made that choice. Was he following or disregarding his orders? Did he understand his new boss' (General Meade's) plan? What information did he have? What information did he lack?

If you were John Buford what would you do?

By Bill Jayne, President

Approximately 30 members of the round table attended a special double feature starring fellow members William Jordan and Dr. Charles Ewell, M.D. William is a dedicated re-enactor who is an expert at 18th and 19th Century cooking. Dr. Ewell, a descendant of CSA Lt. General Richard S. Ewell, is a dedicated historian and an anesthesiologist.

William told us about sutlers and how they supplied the armies with foodstuffs from oysters, sausages, eggs, flour, lemons to cheese and butter. They also supplied all sorts of everyday items such as hair brushes, buttons, boot and shoe polish, needles, thread, etc. And, although it was mostly illegal, they sold whiskey, brandy and other liquors to the troops. Most were attached to a regiment or brigade and usually printed or minted their own tokens or scrip to ensure that soldiers would come back to the sutler to spend more of his money.

Fortified by the sutlers, when circumstances allowed, soldiers were able to cook some pretty decent meals. After William's presentation, the audience enjoyed an alfresco intermission where he and wife Kim served an authentic barbecue of pork roast, soft bread, burgoo, lemonade, and gingerbread. One put the pork on the bread, topped it with burgoo and—Presto!—a delicious and filling meal.

As mentioned in the article, the food was delicious and was enjoyed by many members of the roundtable. It was suggested that William and Kim attend every meeting to ensure that we have a good understanding of Civil War era foods and desserts!

For the next feature, Dr. Ewell gave us a history of the development of ether and chloroform in the 1840s and how the two agents were soon adopted by many surgeons to help patients tolerate surgeries. Chloroform acted faster so it was often the first choice in military applications. The English used anesthesia fairly widely in the Crimean War but the French were slower to adopt it.

By the Civil War, anesthesia was widely used by both sides. The south developed factories to produce ether and chloroform in Richmond, Virginia, and Columbia, S.C. but it was never as widely available as it was in the Union armies. The Union reported that 80,000 anesthetics were given in the military. In 8,900 cases they recorded the type of anesthesia used. In those cases, chloroform was used 76% of the times, ether accounted for 15%, and a mixture of the two accounted for 9%. Only 37 chloroform deaths were recorded, along with 4 attributed to ether and two to a mixture. Thirteen deaths happened before surgery started. Half of the deaths were for minor procedures.

Charlie also talked about the very liberal administration of painkillers such as laudanum and other forms of opium. Such use led to a large number of addicted veterans, a problem that was noted into the early 1900s.

We're lucky in our round table to have such knowledgeable and talented members willing to share their stories with us. Thanks to William and Kim Jordan, and Dr. Charlie Ewell.

The invention of anesthesia certainly made for more humane surgery.

From Pat Garrow

I took this photograph on Saturday June 10 at an excavation that is being done by the Public Archaeology Corps of Wilmington. The find is a bar shot found in flood deposits from the 1769 hurricane that was one of the worst storms of the century to hit Wilmington. It had to have been dropped there, sometime after the hurricane and probably before the Revolutionary War. Bar shot was shot from a cannon and spun from end to end to take out ship rigging, sails, and masts. It could also be used as an anti-personnel device.

We excavate on the site every other Saturday and we have a web site that can be found by googling Public Archaeology Corps. Call me at 865 548 8802 if you have questions.

Sarah Kay Bierle to be our March 2024 speaker

“From California to Gettysburg: The Hancock Family”

In 1858, Winfield and Almira Hancock and their two children moved to California. As a U.S. Army officer, Winfield S. Hancock’s duties had taken the family to several remote outposts, but their time in California would be some of their most memorable days. The American Civil War began while the Hancocks were in California, and this conflict presented challenging choices. Their decision—made in California—would help keep the Golden State in the Union and also impact one of the great eastern battles of the Civil War.

We are excited to welcome Sarah Kay Bierle to our Round Table. Sarah is a nationally known speaker and author. She serves as managing editor at the Emerging Civil War blog, and works in the Education Department at the American Battlefield Trust. She has spent years exploring ways to share quality historical research in ways that will inform and inspire modern audiences, including school presentations, writing, and speaking engagements. Sarah has published four books, including “Call Out The Cadets: The Battle of New Market” which is part of the Emerging Civil War series, and published by Savas Beattie.

Treasurer’s Report

By Mike McDonald, Treasurer

The year started with a substantial cushion, dollars we can use to attract speakers from other cities. Although the cushion has shrunk a bit, it is still substantial - more than adequate for the balance of the year.

We have no financial problems.

The bank requires us to maintain a $3,000 balance to avoid a monthly fee of $100 (for all small business accounts). And we need about $1,000 to $1,500 to handle normal expenses for several months. In case something awful happens (like COVID). The $1,000 would be for speaker commitments, rents, and web/internet fees.

So far, revenue and expenses are pretty much as budgeted, but neither matches 2022. Our income for the January to June period has been about $2,000, exactly what was budgeted way back in 2022. And our expenses have been about $2,600, within $100 of the budget.

The imbalance ($2,000 income versus $2,600 in expenses) is not worrisome because our “cushion” is much greater than $600. We planned for the July to December period to produce more income than January to June.

Last year was different - for January to June 2022, our income was almost $1,000 greater. Emily Lapisardi had a moving presentation at Oakdale Cemetery which was attended by seventy some people, mostly members and guests. Oakdale provided $500 to help us with expenses, which was recorded as income. And we had a silent auction that also produced extra dollars. Both of these items were missing in 2023, so total revenue is less.

This year, our July to December budget is considerably more than the $2,000 left from the first half of the year. We expect inputs from planned tours and events, from logo-embroidered hats and shirts, books, from raffles and auctions.

In October, we will again support Wreaths Across America, as we have for many years.

Grant and Twain: The Story of a Friendship That Changed America by Mark Perry gets rave reviews. Twain helped Grant publish his memoirs (they were published by Twain’s nephew). Grant worked feverishly to complete his memoirs (pun intended) as he was trying to finish them before his bad health (cancer) incapacitated him. Grant had an easy to read and understand writing style which made his memoir very popular. Twain had actually served as an editor, but didn’t feel the need to make many changes. Their friendship was said to be beneficial to both men. Grant’s family ended up making much more money from the memoir than they would have and Twain gained ideas for his writing.

Gettysburg To Mark 160th Anniversary This Year

By Bill Jayne, President

This year marks the 160th anniversary of Gettysburg. One of the organizations marking the anniversary with special events is pcntv.com, a nonprofit cable television network “dedicated to educating, connecting, and celebrating Pennsylvania’s past, present, and future. “ PCN receives no state or federal tax dollars. You can watch PCN’s Gettysburg coverage on cable or by streaming with PCN Select. PCNTV Gettysburg.

From their news release:

Programming will air from July 1 to 3 with four new Battlewalks featured each night beginning at 7 p.m. In partnership with the Gettysburg National Military Park, PCN has televised Battlewalks on the anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg since 1995.

The Bentonville Battlefield unveiled a new tour stop on June 28th at the Flowers Crossroads section of the battlefield. It's the eleventh tour stop on the driving tour completed so far; number twelve is in the planning stages. Funds for the signage were provided by the Friends of Bentonville Battlefield (FOBB). Information on the panels is written by battlefield staff.

July Round Table Discussion will be "Victory from the Jaws of Defeat"

By Bill Jayne, President

As part of our expanded summer program, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will host a true "round table" discussion about the battle of Cedar Creek in October 1864.

The fall of 1864 was, of course, a pivotal time of political decision making. In the United States, the National Union Party of Abraham Lincoln ran against the Democratic Party standard bearer, former Union General George B. McClellan.

The summer of 1864 was a terrible time of trial for the North. Grant and Meade drove the Union armies of the east to Petersburg and Richmond,

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson, Secretary

Thanks in part to superb programs, Bob Browning in April and Ed Gantt in May for example, plus a very welcoming venue at St. John's Episcopal Church, our membership remains steady with a net gain of one for a total paid membership of 87 which includes remote and associate members.

Attendance at the May meeting was 52 and we can thus claim a very respectable 60% per capita attendance. Thankfully, we return to St. Johns for the balance of the year and have ample room to accommodate a larger audience as the Cape Fear Museum is limited as to capacity.

Renewing members may send their $30 annual membership fee to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or bring your check to our June 8th meeting. You may also pay on-line at <http://www.cfcwrt.org> or by credit card at our monthly meeting. Membership renewal notices are sent, via email, during the first week of your renewal month. Meeting attendees may have noticed that your new name tag reflects the month of your membership renewal.

Please attend our monthly meetings during the summer months and bring a neighbor or friend. We have room to grow. We're lucky to have so many people in our area interested in the Civil War.

inflicting terrible losses on the Army of Northern Virginia but absorbing astronomical casualties themselves.

Sherman drove the Confederate Army of Tennessee back onto the defenses of Atlanta, but the pace of advance seemed glacial and a decisive victory still much in doubt.

Close to home for Lincoln and the political leaders of the north, a small but ferocious army under Confederate Lieutenant General Jubal Early arrived at the gates of the Federal City itself like some reincarnation of the "barbarians" assaulting Rome as the empire decayed.

In August, Lincoln received some political visitors to the White House to discuss the upcoming election and they ventured the opinion that the sitting president would lose the election. Lincoln responded, "You think I don't know I am going to be beaten, but I do and unless some great change takes place badly beaten."

Finally, the tide turned. Farragut damned the torpedoes and closed Mobile Bay, Sherman cut the Confederate supply line and drove the Army of Tennessee out of Atlanta, and Grant detailed Major General Philip Sheridan to the Shenandoah Valley to dispose of Early's Army of the Valley.

Sheridan won resounding victories at Winchester and Fisher's Hill and by October all seemed well. On October 16, Sheridan departed the valley heading for Washington City and a conference, leaving his army of about 31,000 men under the command of Maj. Gen. Horatio Wright, commander of the stalwart VI Corps of the Army of the Potomac. Camped on the north side of Cedar Creek, a tributary of the North Fork of the Shenandoah, the situation seemed secure.

Gen. Early's army of about 21,000 was south of the creek but connected to Richmond by good roads and rail. The Union intercepted a Confederate message suggesting that Gen. Robert E. Lee was about to send reinforcements to Early. It was a planted message and very unlikely, but, even so, Sheridan cautioned Wright to look carefully to his defenses. Sheridan also ordered the very powerful Union Cavalry Corps back to Cedar Creek.

With a deep creek to their front and an even more forbidding river gorge to their left (east), the Union put their strongest forces on the right (west) and middle, blocking the Valley Pike running north to south.

The relative weakness of the Union left, gave Early an opportunity to mount a risky surprise attack. At dawn on October 19, 1864, Kershaw's Confederate division crossed the creek at a ford to attack the Union left. Another division crossed the Valley Pike bridge and added its weight to the surprise attack and then, Maj. Gen. John B. Gordon's division, after crossing the Shenandoah at a ford, attacked the left flank and rear of the Union forces.

The initial assaults were spectacularly successful for the Confederates and although Union troops fought doggedly in spots, the army gave ground for miles, fighting at Belle Grove Plantation, around the village of Middletown and by late morning, the Confederate attack ran out of steam.

In a famous ride on his famous horse Rienzi, Sheridan turned back from Winchester and hurried to the battlefield. He helped rally the Union forces and then planned a counterattack that proved crushingly successful.

CSA General John Gordon reconnoitering Union lines from the Confederate signal station on Signal Knob on the north end of Massanutten Mountain in the Shenandoah Valley.

The discussion will focus on the Confederate pause. Gen. Gordon urged Early to continue the assault against the unbroken Union VI Corps, but Early seemed confident they would retire. Writing later, Early seemed to say that Confederate troops, stopping to pillage Union camps, led to disorganization and weakness that prevented further attacks.

By late mid-afternoon, Sheridan had rallied the Union forces and positioned them for a counterattack. The powerful Union cavalry turned the counterattack into a crushing defeat for the Confederates, a defeat that finally drove them from the Shenandoah Valley and gave a significant boost to Lincoln's reelection campaign.

More will be forthcoming, but there is plenty of time to read about the battle and form your opinions so you can participate in the discussion on July 13.

Was it a case of Sheridan snatching victory from the jaws of defeat, or Early snatching defeat from the jaws of victory?

Bill Jordan: Civil War Cooking

There was a whole lot more to Civil War Cooking than salt pork and hardtack crackers. Civil War era cooks used different ingredients than we usually do in order to achieve some very good meals. Bill will dispel the myth that the food was always unpalatable. (Bill might even bring a sample.)

Charles Ewell: Civil War Anesthesia

Although anesthesia was "discovered" less than two decades before the civil war, any controversy about the benefits was settled early in this conflict. Charles will summarize the milestones that led to general anesthesia and focus on the details of its use in civil war surgery. There are some misconceptions about surgery during the civil war which probably arose from depictions in the movies. Charles will dispel these and try to put the successful organization of anesthesia services into the context of the rapid transformation of surgery from the barber shop to something resembling what we have now. Charles's role as an anesthesiologist brings an interesting and different perspective to his subject.

7/13/23: A Round Table discussion led by CFCWRT President Bill Jayne

Victory Snatched from the Jaws of Defeat...or Vice Versa?

The initial Confederate assaults at the battle of Cedar Creek, October, 1864, came while Sheridan was away, and were spectacularly successful. However, by afternoon, the Confederate attack ran out of steam. In his famous ride, Sheridan turned back from Winchester and hurried to the battlefield, helped rally the Union forces, and ordered a counterattack that proved crushingly successful. The Round Table discussion will focus on the Confederate pause that afternoon. Gen. Gordon urged Early to continue the assault against the stalwart Union VI Corps, but Early seemed confident they would retire. Writing later, Early seemed to lay the blame for the defeat upon the Confederate troops, who, by stopping to pillage Union camps, became too disorganized for further attacks. More will be forthcoming before our meeting, but there is plenty of time to read about the battle and form your opinions before our discussion.

"A War Game of Sorts" led by John Weisz

The game will focus upon the options available to Major General John Buford leading a division of US cavalry and searching for the main Confederate force which has invaded southern Pennsylvania and Maryland. The audience will play the role of General Buford and will be presented four possible courses of action available to Buford. After our audience discussion we will poll the participants and then review the actual decision made by Buford and why he made that choice. If you were John Buford what would you do?

Chris Bryan's book is both a unit history and a leadership and character assessment. It is a compelling story of a little studied yet consequential corps and fills a long standing gap in the history of the civil war. It is the story of how this often luckless command began as part of MG John Pope's Army of Virginia in June 1862, endured defeat after coming within a whisker of defeating MG Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain, suffered through the hardships of the campaigns before and after Second Manassas, but despite it all, found its resurgence in Maryland as part of the rebuilt Army of the Potomac. Chris Bryan is a former naval aviator and USNA graduate, and is active with historic preservation and architectural investigations.

Author of "A Fine Opportunity Lost:

Confederate General Longstreet's First Corps and Union General Burnside's IX Corps had already shared battlefields at Second Manassas, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. Unexpectedly, these two old foes from the Eastern Theater now found themselves transplanted to the Western Theater —familiar adversaries on unfamiliar ground. The fate of East Tennessee hung in the balance, and new reputations could be won or lost. General James Longstreet's deployment to East Tennessee gave him the chance for an independent command. For his Union opponent, Major General Ambrose Burnside, the Western Theater offered an opportunity for redemption from past failures. Colonel Ed Lowe USA (Ret) tells the story of how this was "a fine opportunity lost" for both men.

Did you know that Carl Sandburg spent fifteen years researching his biography of Abraham Lincoln? The biography, when complete came in at six volumes and won a Pulitzer Prize. One of Sandburg's prize possessions was a table made from wood from the White House ceiling from Lincoln's time there.

Alfred Nugent and His Amputated Arm

By Fred Claridge, Newsletter Editor

Whenever we give a tour of the Harper House Field Hospital Site, we usually try to include some information about individual wounded soldiers who were treated there. Sometimes, we talk about the surgeons who performed the operations and cared for those wounded. We believe adding those personal stories gives our visitors a better feel for what it was like in this small but very busy hospital site during the battle. We see that as our mission - to make the important history that happened here come alive and to be meaningful for our visitors.

The Harper House Field Hospital Site at Bentonville.

One of the wounded we talk about is a young 17-year-old private from the state of Wisconsin named Alfred Nugent. He was only 15 when he enlisted in 1864. Alfred was severely wounded in his right arm on the first day of the battle, the bones in his arm completely shattered - as was often the case with the type of bullets used at the time. He was transported by horse-drawn ambulance to the front yard of the Harper House where an Assistant Surgeon examined him and made him a priority 1 casualty. He required a quick amputation to save his life, so would have been taken inside promptly for surgery. After being put to sleep with chloroform poured on a sponge by Surgeon James T. Reeve, the amputation took approximately ten to fifteen minutes. Surgeons didn't have the luxury of spending hours on one patient. There were simply too many wounded. And back then, if you were wounded in the head, chest or abdomen, you were prioritized as a low priority, since there was very little that could be done for you. Alfred received his amputation and was taken to the recovery area.

For several years, we told Alfred's story a certain way - based on the best information we had available. Stories from that time period tend to morph a bit over time. It was the team's belief that when Alfred was recovering after his surgery the next day, he found his own arm in the pile of arms and legs outside a window of the amputation room. He recognized it because one of the fingers on his right hand was deformed. Visitors tend to be fascinated by that story. Kids love it.

For almost four years, staff at the battlefield have been conducting extensive research to confirm the details of Alfred's story. We never stop researching here. That's what we do. We want to present as accurate a representation of what happened here as we can. Recently, Colby Lipscomb, the Battlefield's Education Coordinator, found a letter to the editor from an 1886 newspaper (12/15/1886) from a gentleman named J. Max Clark. Apparently, Clark was a buddy of Alfred's who recounted an experience he had at the Bentonville battlefield. The letter had originally been sent to Alfred and was reprinted. That letter provided us with some much-needed detail about the "legend" of Alfred's arm. As a result, we've changed our presentation of that story. The biggest change is that J. Max found the arm, not Alfred. It's still a cool story.

The "Amputation Room" at the Harper House. It was the house parlor before the battle. Note the door in use.

Clark's letter is typical of the writing of the time. It's very wordy and full of hyperbole. There's also a fair amount of self-aggrandizement. The section that we find most interesting is the paragraph (a long one) where he describes his encounter with Alfred at the Harper House. That paragraph is included in its entirety here:

"I remember probably more of you in fact than you do of me. Let me recall to your mind an incident which will prove that I do. On the morning after the fight at Bentonville, I went over to the hospital to visit you. I found you sitting jauntily head up on a pillow looking just as saucy and plucky as you had always done, and the first thing you asked me to do was to fill your pipe and light it. I was afraid it was not best to let you smoke, but you said the doctor told you you might, so I went into the backyard to light it, after having filled it from your old jacket pocket which was near at hand. When I got to the backyard, I had to put a coal in the pipe to light it, and then to keep it from going out, had to pull where I went into the ward where you were, when I went to your bedside I was so sick I could hardly stand and had to sit down on the bunk to keep from falling, but I never smoked, and the few whiffs were too much for me. You were wounded if I remember correctly on the skirmish line just at the time or a little before our line gave way the first time in the afternoon and before we went to look you up the next morning the first thing that surely proved that you were inside the hospital was your arm in the pile of limbs on the outside with the crippled finger and thumb sticking out from the ghastly heap."

So, there it was. Alfred didn't find his arm, but someone did. And the owner of the arm was recognized because of the deformed finger. Since most of the enlisted men were taken out the back door of the house to recover under the stars, we're a little unsure about what Clark means by going out to the "backyard" from "inside" the hospital. It's possible Alfred was inside the house for a time or Clark is talking about one of the tents we believe were set up out back. At any rate, we had most of the story right. As an aside, we also learned that J. Max had a tough time with his first inhalations of tobacco. We know that Alfred would have been moved out from around the Harper House with the rest of the Union wounded on the last day of the battle. Most likely, he was transferred to a general hospital in New Bern for further treatment. He mustered out of the Army on May 16th, slightly less than two months after the battle. He lived for several more decades. He went back to Wisconsin and started a family. He was one of the many wounded of the battle who survived because they received a timely amputation by a skilled surgeon.

When I think about Alfred, I try to imagine what it must have been like for a 17-year-old boy to go through what he did. The searing pain and heat when a bullet tears into his right arm. The bumpy ambulance ride as he's rushed to the Harper House field hospital. Soon after arriving in the front yard of the house, Alfred is placed on a canvas stretcher and carried inside the house for his surgery. He's then placed on a door which serves as an operating table. A tired looking surgeon in a bloody apron stands over him. He tells Alfred that he has sustained a serious injury to his arm and that it will have to be amputated. Alfred watches nervously as the surgeon pours liquid from a green tin onto a sponge; the surgeon tells him to breathe deeply as the sponge is held over his nose and mouth. Alfred's vision becomes blurry as he begins to feel dizzy and sleepy. Then blackness. When he awakens, Alfred is outside laying under a tree. When he looks where his right arm used to be he sees a stump just below the shoulder covered by a bloody bandage. There are other wounded laying all around him. He will lay under that tree for two days before he is loaded into an ambulance wagon for the trip that will begin his long road home. For Alfred, the war is over. But his new life is just beginning ...

Alfred's story may change again someday. As could any story we tell here. That's how history works. More research leads to more insight and harder facts. But the important thing is that we have a good understanding of what happened here to a young soldier, seriously wounded in battle. It's those individual stories, that added together, make for the grand sweep of important historical events. And we owe it to men like Alfred to tell their stories.

Notes: The full letter can be found on ancestry.com. Unfortunately, we've never been able to find a picture of Alfred Nugent. He must have looked very young at the time of the battle. If you happen upon one in your research travels, please let us know about it at the battlefield. It would mean a lot to us to be able to put a face to his story.

Our May Events with Ed Gantt on United States Colored Troops

[Thanks to all the members who submitted photos of the events for the newsletter.]

Captain Ed Gantt helped our roundtable with two events in May - a presentation to the Roundtable on Thursday night and a public event at the Wilmington National Cemetery on the following Friday afternoon. He talked about the research he's been doing since retiring fifteen years ago after a distinguished military career.

There were over 209,000 USCTs between 1863 - 1865. Over 5,000 came from North Carolina. He described the history of how the units were formed and talked about the many battles they played an important role in. Many of those battles were fought in our area - including at Fort Fisher.

Perhaps most moving was his statement at the end of his presentation on Friday at the cemetery when he said that he had found four Gantts who served in the USCT, and that it felt like one or more of them may be ancestors giving him a little push from behind to find them. We certainly wish him luck in that endeavor. Thanks Captain Gantt.

MAY PROGRAM FEATURES USCT AND THEIR ROLE IN CIVIL WAR

By Bill Jayne, President

Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites the public to attend a presentation by retired U.S. Navy Captain Edward Gantt. The May 11 meeting will be held at the Cape Fear Museum at 814 Market Street in Wilmington. He will present "The United States Colored Troops in the Civil War." Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

During the presentation, Capt. Gantt will address the contributions of African American soldiers in the USCT with special attention to their activities in southeastern North Carolina. USCT played an important role in the Battle of Ft. Fisher on January 15, 1865, and led the advance up the peninsula from Ft. Fisher to Wilmington from mid-January to the fall of the city on February 22.

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson, Secretary

The April meeting, with presenter Dr. Robert (Bob) Browning, was well attended. The meeting was buoyed by six new memberships that brings our total paid membership to 86, six of whom are either remote or associate. Several of our members attend via Zoom but even so our attendance reflects a current and growing interest in history, specifically Civil War history.

That brings me to what I call the key to membership (no surprises here) and while great speakers, interesting topics, wonderful visual aids and a centrally located and comfortable meeting place are essential to maintaining a successful program, the key to membership remains a content member who will renew promptly and recruit from neighbors and friends. You, the content member is the key to membership.

Our rolls are enhanced by returning members Mike O'Brien and Ann Polanski, (Wilmington) and new members John & Nancy Wetherington from Castle Hayne, John Lewis, Ed Lestrangle and Mike Anthony from Leland and William Lees from Wilmington. Welcome aboard folks. Hope to see all at our May 11th meeting.

Renewing members may send their $30 annual membership fee to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or better still, bring a check to our May 11th meeting being held at the Cape Fear Museum (one time only). You may also pay online or by credit card.

First came the little-known fighting along the Sugar Loaf line in Carolina Beach. The Sugar Loaf line was a Confederate defensive line that ran from the ocean near today's J. Ryder Lewis Civil War Park on Myrtle Sound all the way to the Sugar Loaf dune in Carolina Beach State Park on the Cape Fear River. The Lewis Civil War Park preserves and interprets the earthwork trenches and other fortifications that can be found all the way across the island. Today, by the way, we know the location as "Pleasure Island," but it wasn't an island until the 1920's when the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers dredged Snow's Cut to carry the Intracoastal Waterway from the sounds to the Cape Fear River, avoiding a dangerous voyage around or through Frying Pan Shoals. Until Snow's Cut was constructed, the narrow stretch of land from Wilmington to Federal Point, below Fort Fisher, was a peninsula unobstructed by water but full of marshes and dense maritime forest.

On February 11, 1865, five brigades of Union troops, about 12,000 men including those held in reserve, attacked the Confederate line manned by General Robert Hoke's five to six thousand Confederates. On the Union center and left, the assault was led by nine regiments of USCT, including the battle tested 4th and 5th USCT regiments. These units had figured prominently in the fighting between Grant and Lee around Richmond in 1864 and their ranks including nine men who eventually received the Medal of Honor for their valor in the Richmond fighting.

The attack was pressed with fighting all along the line and support from Federal gunboats on both the ocean side and the river side. More than 100 casualties were incurred, notably 16 men killed in action and 76 wounded in the 4th USCT alone. Finally, Union commanders Major Generals Alfred Terry and John Schofield decided the Confederate defensive line was too strong and halted the attack. In overall command, General Schofield transferred troops across the river to overcome Ft. Anderson on the western bank and thereby outflank the Confederates at Sugar Loaf. Ft. Anderson was abandoned on February 18 and Hoke retreated toward Wilmington.

On February 20 and 21, Union and Confederate forces clashed once again in the Battle of Forks Road around the intersection of modern-day 17th Street and Independence Boulevard. USCT brigades led the attack up the Federal Point Road where they encountered well-entrenched Confederates once again. There were about 50 Federal casualties before General Hoke, under orders, abandoned the defenses and marched out of Wilmington up today's Castle Hayne Road.

Capt. Gantt will address the background of the USCT as well as their contributions in both Eastern and Western theaters of the war. It's a complicated story, of course. Originally not allowed to join the Army, by the end of the war, some 180,000 to 200,000 Blacks served in the United States Colored Troops (USCT) and comprised ten percent of the U. S. Army. There were at least 166 regiments of Black soldiers, who fought in approximately 450 battle actions and were instrumental in helping to win the Civil War and freedom for their people.

Gantt was born in Maryland and saw combat as a helicopter door gunner and crew chief during a 12-month tour in South Vietnam. His first stint in the service included graduation from the U.S. Army Airborne and Ranger schools.

After his Army service, and following graduation from Howard University, he re-entered the armed forces serving as a naval aviator, including a tour as commanding officer of Fighter Squadron 31 at Naval Air Station Miramar (at that time the home of Top Gun).

In July 2000, Gantt took command of the Navy boot camp at Great Lakes, Illinois. At Recruit Training Command (the Navy's only boot camp), he was responsible for the development of nearly 50,000 sailors annually. He retired from the Navy in September 2003 after 30 years of active service and began a new career as a high school teacher in the Washington, D.C. area.

In the spring of 2014, Gantt began an association with the 23rd Infantry Regiment USCT Civil War re-enactors and living historians. He is currently a member of Company B, 54th Massachusetts Civil War re-enactors and president of the re-formed 23rd Regiment USCT in Spotsylvania, Virginia.

Capt. Gantt will also present a special program on Friday, May 12, at Wilmington National Cemetery, beginning at 4 p.m. Established in 1867, the historic cemetery is located at 2011 Market Street and is the final resting place of more than 500 USCT soldiers, the vast majority buried as unknowns. The round table will accept donations from adults who attend but not from school. There is no parking in the cemetery.

We will open the Friday event, scheduled to begin at 4 p.m., to the general public and request a donation of $10 except for school children.

If you’ve never been there, Harpers Ferry in West Virginia is well worth a visit. Not only is it one of the most historic locations in the country, it’s also a beautiful spot nestled up on a bluff between the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers. The NPS does a great job of interpreting the history of John Brown’s raid there.

Bill Jordan: Civil War Cooking

There was a whole lot more to Civil War Cooking than salt pork and hardtack crackers. Civil War era cooks used different ingredients than we usually do in order to achieve some very good meals. Bill will dispel the myth that the food was always unpalatable. (Bill might even bring a sample.)

Charles Ewell: Civil War Anesthesia

Although anesthesia was "discovered" less than two decades before the civil war, any controversy about the benefits was settled early in this conflict. Charles will summarize the milestones that led to general anesthesia and focus on the details of its use in civil war surgery. There are some misconceptions about surgery during the civil war which probably arose from depictions in the movies. Charles will dispel these and try to put the successful organization of anesthesia services into the context of the rapid transformation of surgery from the barber shop to something resembling what we have now. Charles's role as an anesthesiologist brings an interesting and different perspective to his subject.

7/13/23: A Round Table discussion led by CFCWRT President Bill Jayne

Victory Snatched from the Jaws of Defeat...or Vice Versa?

The initial Confederate assaults at the battle of Cedar Creek, October, 1864, came while Sheridan was away, and were spectacularly successful. However, by afternoon, the Confederate attack ran out of steam. In his famous ride, Sheridan turned back from Winchester and hurried to the battlefield, helped rally the Union forces, and ordered a counterattack that proved crushingly successful. The Round Table discussion will focus on the Confederate pause that afternoon. Gen. Gordon urged Early to continue the assault against the stalwart Union VI Corps, but Early seemed confident they would retire. Writing later, Early seemed to lay the blame for the defeat upon the Confederate troops, who, by stopping to pillage Union camps, became too disorganized for further attacks. More will be forthcoming before our meeting, but there is plenty of time to read about the battle and form your opinions before our discussion.

8/10/23: Audience Participation

"A War Game of Sorts" led by John Weisz

The game will focus upon the options available to Major General John Buford leading a division of US cavalry and searching for the main Confederate force which has invaded southern Pennsylvania and Maryland. The audience will play the role of General Buford and will be presented four possible courses of action available to Buford. After our audience discussion we will poll the participants and then review the actual decision made by Buford and why he made that choice. If you were John Buford what would you do?

A great site to visit is Bennett Place near Durham where General Joseph E. Johnston surrendered to General William T. Sherman. It was the largest surrender of troops in the war - nearly 90,000. Johnston and Sherman became lifelong friends after their experience together at Bennett Place.

Changing Sides During the Civil War

By Patrick H. Garrow, Roundtable Member

I became interested in soldiers who changed sides while working on an archaeological site associated with the Confederate Florence Prison in Florence, South Carolina. Hundreds of Union prisoners held in Charleston and then in Florence expressed interest in joining the Confederate army in late 1864. Those men and many others were allowed to do so, which resulted in the creation of four Confederate units made up entirely of former Union soldiers. The first unit raised was sent to Savannah to man a section of the defenses around the city as Sherman's army approached the city. The "galvanized Confederates" tried to mutiny and were arrested and returned to Florence prison. Seven of their number were executed after a brief trial. A second unit became a regiment of pioneers who improved or built roads and bridges ahead of Johnston's army's march through the Carolinas and to its eventual surrender. A third unit was rushed to Salisbury, North Carolina, to defend the city from Stoneman's raid and arrived there as the Confederate defenses were crumbling. Many of the former Union soldiers were captured and taken to a prison in Nashville. The last unit, 1,000 strong, was raised for use in the western theater with Hood's Army. Two thirds of those men were sent to Mississippi, where over 200 of them were captured at the battle of Egypt Station during Grierson's second raid. Those men were taken to Camp Douglas, where most joined a Union regiment of galvanized Yankees that was shipped to the western frontier. The galvanized Confederates were documented in a book titled Changing Sides Union Prisoners of War Who Joined the Confederate Army, which was published by the University of Tennessee Press. That book is available from UT Press, Amazon, and most other major online book sellers.

I am currently under contract to the University of Tennessee Press for a companion volume that deals with former Confederate soldiers who joined the Union army. The tentative title of that book is Gray to Blue: Galvanized Yankees in the Union Army, which is scheduled to be published in late 2023 or early 2024. The purpose of the second volume is to expand and update Dee Brown's classic work Galvanized Yankees. Dee Brown restricted his volume almost entirely to five regiments and one battalion raised from Confederate prisoners of war sent to the western frontier to protect the Oregon Trail, the Overland Trail, and the Santa Fe Trail. Research has revealed that there were many more men raised both from Union prisons and from among deserters from the Confederate army who joined existing Union regiments and battalions. An unknown number of men completed their term of service in the Confederate Army and then changed sides and joined the Union army. The Union raised units in every state in the south except South Carolina and enlisted over 10,000 men in those units. Four such units were raised in North Carolina.

The two-volume set, when completed, will represent the first thorough treatment of men who changed sides during the American Civil War. It is important to understand the Civil War from the perspective of its battles and leaders. Perhaps it is more important understand the war from the perspectives of the men who fought it.

CSS Albemarle and the actions at Edenton, Plymouth and New Bern

John V. Quarstein is a nationally known speaker and an award-winning historian, preservationist, and author. John served as the director of the Virginia War Museum until his retirement and is now Director Emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at The Mariners' Museum in Newport News, Virginia. He has authored 18 books and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary. John is an expert on the Naval War and will speak to us about the Civil War actions that occurred along North Carolina's inland waterways.

10/12/23 Chris Bryan

Author of "Cedar Mountain to Antietam:
A Civil War Campaign History of the Union XII Corps, July - September 1862"

Chris Bryan's book is both a unit history and a leadership and character assessment. It is a compelling story of a little studied yet consequential corps and fills a long standing gap in the history of the civil war. It is the story of how this often luckless command began as part of MG John Pope's Army of Virginia in June 1862, endured defeat after coming within a whisker of defeating MG Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain, suffered through the hardships of the campaigns before and after Second Manassas, but despite it all, found its resurgence in Maryland as part of the rebuilt Army of the Potomac. Chris Bryan is a former naval aviator and USNA graduate, and is active with historic preservation and architectural investigations.

11/9/23 Ed Lowe

Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863 - April 1864"

Confederate General Longstreet's First Corps and Union General Burnside's IX Corps had already shared battlefields at Second Manassas, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. Unexpectedly, these two old foes from the Eastern Theater now found themselves transplanted to the Western Theater—familiar adversaries on unfamiliar ground. The fate of East Tennessee hung in the balance, and new reputations could be won or lost. General James Longstreet's deployment to East Tennessee gave him the chance for an independent command. For his Union opponent, Major General Ambrose Burnside, the Western Theater offered an opportunity for redemption from past failures. Colonel Ed Lowe USA (Ret) tells the story of how this was "a fine opportunity lost" for both men.

Next month, look for a page dedicated to our sponsors. Our sponsors mean a lot to the CFCWRT. We couldn't do much of what we do without them. We'll print all their logos in our next issue.

April's event featured Dr. Robert L. Browning's presentation on "Success is All that was Expected: The Failed Efforts to Take Charleston." Dr. Browning told the fascinating story of the Union's unsuccessful attempt to use ironclads to destroy the forts protecting Charleston Harbor. The forts were stronger than expected and there were challenges with the design of the ironclads themselves. A great program that was enjoyed by all. Here are some photos of the fellowship enjoyed at the meeting. See you on Thursday evening!

"She's a Real Veteran:" Lucy Nichols and the 23rd Indiana at Bentonville

December 1898, over 30 years after the end of the Civil War, the Owensboro Messenger Inquirer printed an article titled "She's a Real Veteran." "By a special act of Congress," the article explains, "Aunt Lucy Nichols of this city will receive a pension of $12 a month." Written so casually, it's not immediately clear how revolutionary it is that a black woman was being granted a pension from the United States government for work she did as part of the military during the Civil War. That quietly revolutionary story is that of Lucy Nichols.

Lucy Higgs was born April 10th, 1838 in Halifax County, North Carolina. Enslaved from birth by the Higgs family, we know very little about her early life. Lucy involuntarily moved with the Higgs around the south as she grew up within the confines of slavery. Lucy established a family, marrying a man also enslaved by the Higgs family and gave birth to a child just before the Civil War broke out. While living in Western Tennessee in 1862, Lucy's enslavers decided to move her and her family further south. Before this move was possible, Lucy took her liberty into her own hands and self-emancipated with her young daughter Mona. Less is known about what happened to Mona's father, although some sources claim he self-emancipated as well and joined with a different US Army regiment, potentially serving with the United States Colored Troops.

Lucy and Mona traveled 30 miles under pursuit by their enslavers before finding sanctuary with the 23rd Indiana infantry regiment stationed in Bolivar, TN. Citing the Confiscation Act of 1862, the Hoosier soldiers provided safety and shelter, but most importantly their invocation of the Confiscation Act of 1862 granted legal freedom to Lucy and Mona. This law specifically allowed for the United States government to seize any property owned by people who aided in or participated in the rebellion. Since the Confederate government considered enslaved people property, the Confiscations Act granted many people their freedom.

Lucy Nichols in 1898

“All slaves of persons who shall hereafter be engaged in rebellion against the government of the United States, or who shall in any way give aid or comfort thereto, escaping from such persons and taking refuge within the lines of the army; and all slaves captured from such persons or deserted by them and coming under the control of the government of the United States; and all slaves of such person found on or being within any place occupied by rebel forces and afterwards occupied by the forces of the United States, shall be deemed captives of war, and shall be forever free of their servitude, and not again held as slaves.”- Confiscation Act of 1862

To show her gratitude Lucy remained with the 23rd Indiana, serving as a cook, laundress, and nurse. With no connection to her husband, who later died due to illness, staying with the regiment ensured Lucy and Mona’s safety in what was a terrifying world for freedom seekers whose freedom was still very much in question as the war raged on.

While the 23rd Indiana was celebrating the surrender of Vicksburg July 1863, Mona fell ill and tragically passed away. Mona’s death left Lucy “absolutely alone but,” according to a postwar newspaper article, “she still clung to the regiment.” The heartbroken Indianans organized an ‘elaborate funeral’ to lay young Mona to rest.

Lucy remained with the regiment throughout the remainder of the war, providing necessary services to the men. As the 23rd advanced through Georgia and the Carolinas her own life was often at risk as she worked near the front lines, providing vital care to the wounded and sick and support to the rest of the regiment.

By the Battle of Bentonville in March 1865, Lucy had been with the regiment for nearly three years. Part of Sherman’s Right Wing, they arrived after the heaviest fighting had ended. Although the 23rd Indiana saw limited action at Bentonville, their presence was noted. Lucy, as a nurse, may have been called into action to help care for the wounded of other regiments but primary sources have yet to be found to provide insight into her role here.

After the surrender at Bennett Place, Lucy traveled with her regiment to Washington DC and marched with them in the Grand Review of the Armies, one of the final acts of the Civil War. Lucy’s freedom was now secure, but it had come at a high cost. Within just a few years she lost her husband and daughter. With little else to her name and nowhere to go, Lucy chose to accept the invitation of the men of the regiment to return with them to New Albany, Indiana.

Lucy lived out the rest of her life in New Albany, where she became a vital part of the community and remained close with many of the men of the 23rd Indiana. In 1870, she married John Nichols and lived with him until his death in 1910. She attended every reunion and many other events as a member of the regiment, including marching in some of the first Memorial Day parades. Lucy became one of the only female members of the Grand Army of the Republic, a national fraternal organization of US Army Civil War veterans.

In 1892, thirty years after Lucy joined with the 23rd Indiana as their nurse, the United States Congress passed an act granting a federal pension to “all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses, under contract or otherwise, during the late war of the rebellion.” Pensions had become essential in providing monetary relief to those who served the Union during the war and who needed financial help as they aged. This act extended that assistance to many more who labored in the service of the Union. However, after applying for pension twice, Lucy Nichols was denied, most likely due to her race.

In 1895, 55 of the 23rd Indiana veterans campaigned for Lucy to get her earned pension from the US government. It was December 1898 before their complaints were finally heard and Congress passed a special act specifically to grant a federal pension of $12 a month for the rest of her life to Lucy Nichols. This special act of Congress made Lucy a minor celebrity and articles like the one below were printed in newspapers across Indiana and Kentucky. After 30 years, Lucy finally began to receive the recognition she deserved and had been given by her friends in the 23rd Indiana.

In 1915, five years after her husband’s death, Lucy was admitted to the Floyd County Poor Farm. She died there a few weeks later on January 29, 1915 at the age of 76. Tragically, the location of her grave is unknown.

Not until the 21st century did history begin to recognize Lucy for her acts during the Civil War. In 2011, a historical plaque was erected near her church, the Second Baptist Church of New Albany. In 2019, the church unveiled a nine-foot-tall statue of Lucy and her daughter Mona, further cementing her legacy within the community. With these monuments and the written sources and photographs that remain, we are fortunate to be able to tell the story of Lucy Nichols. Her strength and valor gained not just her freedom from slavery but her work with the 23rd Indiana helped ensure the freedom of so many others.

Research is actively ongoing to find more information about Lucy and others like her as it relates to the Battle of Bentonville. For more information about Lucy Nichols, her incredible life, and the rest of the 23rd Indiana regiment, check out these resources below:

Auction Items Up for Bid to Benefit Roundtable

First of all, we are auctioning off a brand-new set of the Battles and Leaders series reprinted by Castle in 1990. The original volumes were published in 1887 by Century Company. The subtitle tells the tale: "Being for the most part contributions by Union and Confederate Officers." A central part of the "battle of the books," Battles and Leaders of the Civil War, became the best-selling and most frequently cited works ever published on the Civil War.

The set we are offering was donated to us and was wrapped in shrink wrap. The four volumes sell for $100 on Amazon and other book sellers ask for considerably more.

We are also offering a beautiful framed, limited edition of seven Civil War commemorative stamps. The ensemble was sold by Hanford Heirlooms and is numbered "161/10,000". These stamps are not only collector's items, they are historical artifacts. The three-cent Sherman-Grant-Sheridan stamp was issued in 1937 and caused considerable controversy (mostly among southerners) because... Sherman. The four-cent Lee-Jackson stamp was issued in 1937 and caused considerable controversy (mostly among southerners) because the portrait of General Lee has only two stars on the collar. [According to Wikipedia: "At the outbreak of war, Lee was appointed to command all of Virginia's forces, which then encompassed the Provisional Army of Virginia and the Virginia State Navy. He was appointed a Major General by the Virginia Governor, but upon the formation of the Confederate States Army, he was named one of its first five full generals. Lee did not wear the insignia of a Confederate general, but only the three stars of a Confederate colonel, equivalent to his last U.S. Army rank. He did not intend to wear a general's insignia until the Civil War had been won and he could be promoted, in peacetime, to general in the Confederate Army."] Seriously, it's a very important and attractive piece of memorabilia donated by one of our most generous members.

If you want to bid virtually, just send me an email or text.

The Bentonville Battlefield held the 158th Anniversary Commemoration of the battle in March. Wade Sokolosky led a tour with re-enactors, cannons were fired, the Huckleberry Brothers Band played period music and artisans demonstrated crafts from that era. Pictures can be found on the next page.

The Return of the Prodigal Newsletter

By Fred Claridge, Newsletter Editor

Welcome to the newly “rebooted” Runner Newsletter - the official newsletter of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable. At my first meeting at the roundtable, I checked a box suggesting I would be interested in helping with the newsletter. The next thing I knew I had coffee with Bill and a new title as the Editor of the Newsletter. This is a new experience for me, so we’ll learn all about what goes into putting together a newsletter together. Thanks to everyone who agreed to help and who submitted content for this first issue. Our hope as a newsletter staff is that we’ll get contributions from a number of our members. This is your newsletter after all. Let us know what you’d like to see in it. Better yet, don’t just tell us what you’d like to see, write it up and turn it in.

Membership Report

By Bruce Patterson, Secretary

Membership in our Round Table stands at 79 paid members, 5 of whom are either remote or Associate. With attendance at approximately 48 attending regularly scheduled meeting, we can claim a very respectful 63% per capita attendance. While Zoom attendance is not significantly large, we continue to provide that service to remote members, visitors, and local members who may, for whatever reason, be unable to attend meetings in person.

Although our Zoom attendance is low, we have, during the height of the pandemic, had attendance at a single meeting from as far away as Tasmania, Australia, and Glasgow Scotland. This writer can attest to the thrill of talking to and communicating with folks that far apart.

Your membership chair will report monthly, reminding members that our membership year is for 12-months, calculated on a monthly basis, thus members who joined or renewed in April 2022, are due for renewal. Please remit your annual dues of $30. to CFCWRT, 8387 East Highcroft NE, Leland, NC 28451 or better still, bring a check to our next meeting on April 13th. You may also pay online or in person by credit card at the monthly meeting. Next month - the key to membership.

The layout will no doubt change and improve as I figure out what I'm doing, but we feel good about getting something together before the April meeting. Thanks to Bill for all his contributions and for helping to line up some regular contributors. We will always be open to members of the roundtable for your contributions.

As a history major in college, and as a volunteer at the Bentonville Battlefield, I love Civil War history - especially the medical component. One of the treasures we have at Bentonville is a farmhouse used as a field hospital by the Union Army for the three-day battle there. It's set up as it would have looked during the battle - with doors on tables as operating tables, a Hospital Stewards office, and an officer recovery room. The upstairs remains as a set of bedrooms - which the Harper family stayed in during the battle. That would have been a memorable experience to say the least. Not to mention that 54 wounded Confederate soldiers were left at the house after the battle, under the care of the Harper family. 24 of them died; 20 unknowns are buried next to the Harper family burial ground across the road from the visitor center. If you haven't been to Bentonville in a while, come by and take a tour of the Harper House and drive the battlefield. It's a great way to learn about the biggest Civil War battle in North Carolina. We just commemorated the 158th anniversary of the battle on March 18th with an extended tour by Wade Sokolosky, re-enactors, period music by the Huckleberry Brothers and gun and cannon firing. We estimate over 4,600 people attended - a great turnout on a very cold day. A full re-enactment is on tap in 2025.

Please read through the newsletter. We think there's some interesting content here that would be worth your time. A good deal of information about upcoming events can be found here too. And again, don't hesitate to let us know if there's something you'd like to see or even better, something you'd like to contribute. Until next month ...

Cape Fear Round Table Discusses “Success is All That Was Expected; The Failed Effort to Take Charleston”

By Bill Jayne, President

Wilmington’s Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites the public to attend a presentation by Robert M. Browning, Jr., Ph.D., on April 13th talking about the Union’s herculean efforts to close the harbor and take the city of Charleston, S.C., in 1863. The round table meets at centrally located St. John’s Episcopal Church in Midtown Wilmington near Independence Mall. Doors open at 6:30 and the meeting begins at 7:00 p.m.

Dr. Browning, retired chief historian of the U.S. Coast Guard, is the foremost scholar on the Union blockade and has authored three books centered on the activities of the U.S. Navy’s various blockading squadrons. A native of North Carolina, he earned his Ph.D. at the University of Alabama. He is the author of six books and more than four dozen articles relating to the Coast Guard, the Civil War, and U.S. naval and maritime history.

President Lincoln proclaimed a blockade of the 3,500-mile coastline on April 19, 1861, soon after the fall of Ft. Sumter. In all the years since, the role of the U.S. Navy in putting down the rebellion has received little attention compared to the monumental clashes of the armies at places like Gettysburg and Chickamauga.

Yet, the role of the navy was crucial to victory. When the blockade was proclaimed, there were only three armed vessels ready for service on the Atlantic coast. By the end of the war, however, the U.S. Navy comprised 671 ships of all kinds from the revolutionary new ironclad monitors to shallow draft wooden gunboats. Enforcement of the blockade was never airtight but by 1864 only custom built blockade running ships could effectively evade the noose that was strangling the Confederate economy. In addition, the navy provided essential logistical, transport and gunfire support for army operations.

In 1993 Dr. Browning published From Cape Charles to the Cape Fear, which chronicles the establishment of the crucial blockade from the entrance to Chesapeake Bay south to the mouth of the Cape Fear River. It was crucial to control this stretch of the coast and the inland waters of Chesapeake Bay, James River and the North Carolina sound country.

In 2002, he added Success is All That Was Expected, a history of the South Atlantic squadron that sailed the coast from the Cape Fear to Florida. This story covers the harrowing engagements between ships and forts, daring amphibious assaults, and the evolution of submarine warfare in the form of the CSS Hunley. In Lincoln’s Trident, he continued his magisterial series to chronicle the squadron that operated in the Gulf of Mexico.

Charleston, of course, was the “seat of rebellion,” the most important city in South Carolina, the state that led the way in secession and the place where the most destructive war in the nation’s history erupted when southern forces fired on Fort Sumter dominating the entrance to the harbor. By 1863, Charleston remained a potent symbol and was also the most important blockade running port in the Confederacy. Its railroads connected the port to the primary Confederate armies in both Virginia and Tennessee.

The summer of 1863 seemed even at the time, the most fateful of the war. Vicksburg fell and “the father of waters once again goes unvexed to the sea,” and the Army of Northern Virginia reached its “high water mark” at Gettysburg, and then receded. What would have happened if Charleston had fallen in that summer?

The entrance to Charleston harbor—through a narrow channel— was guarded by two powerful forts Ft. Moultrie on Sullivan’s Island and Ft. Sumter in the middle of the passage. The distance from Ft. Moultrie to Ft. Sumter is only 1800 yards. On April 7, 1863, Admiral Samuel F. DuPont took a fleet of nine U.S. Navy ironclads, including seven monitors, into that narrow space and attempted to reduce the forts or run through the gauntlet into the harbor. An effective barrier in the channel and the overwhelming volume of accurate fire from the forts stopped the attempt although more effective planning and joint Army-Navy operations might have led to success.

The campaign then shifted to the fragile barrier island known as Morris Island. Most of the island has since washed into the ocean but in 1863 it was the scene of fierce fighting in which the Union army eventually reduced Battery Wagner and other Confederate positions, allowing them to virtually close off the main shipping channel, which ran parallel to Morris Island and batter Ft. Sumter into a pile of rubble that was no longer effective as an artillery platform but as a lightly manned infantry post anchored the obstructions that prevented Union warships from steaming into the harbor.

Although the Confederates didn’t abandon the fort and the city until 1865 when Sherman advanced through South Carolina, it was no longer the premier blockade running port in the south. That distinction fell to Wilmington.

Knowing the Navy’s role in isolating the Confederate economy and preventing the movement of troops and supplies within the South is crucial to understanding of the outcomes of the Civil War, as well as the importance of naval power in military conflicts.

The meeting will be held in Elebash Hall, at the rear of the church, which is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive. The church parking lot, close to the entrance to the meeting room, is easily accessed via Park Avenue off of Independence Boulevard. Doors open at 6:30 p.m. and there is ample time to browse our used books table, talk to members and meet Dr. Browning. For information about membership, go to our website at <http://cfcwrt.org> and click on “Join”. See you there! (Pictures for this article on the next page.)

Charleston is a city steeped in history and is a fascinating place to explore. Almost the entire downtown area is a historic district, on a peninsula between the Ashley and Cooper rivers. Much of the old architecture remains - as does the very "southern" feel of the city. And it's not far from our area.

Bill Jordan: Civil War Cooking

There was a whole lot more to Civil War Cooking than salt pork and hardtack crackers. Civil War era cooks used different ingredients than we usually do in order to achieve some very good meals. Bill will dispel the myth that the food was always unpalatable. (Bill might even bring a sample.)

Charles Ewell: Civil War Anesthesia

Although anesthesia was "discovered" less than two decades before the civil war, any controversy about the benefits was settled early in this conflict. Charles will summarize the milestones that led to general anesthesia and focus on the details of its use in civil war surgery. There are some misconceptions about surgery during the civil war which probably arose from depictions in the movies. Charles will dispel these and try to put the successful organization of anesthesia services into the context of the rapid transformation of surgery from the barber shop to something resembling what we have now. Charles's role as an anesthesiologist brings an interesting and different perspective to his subject.

7/13/23: A Round Table discussion led by CFCWRT President Bill Jayne

Victory Snatched from the Jaws of Defeat...or Vice Versa?

The initial Confederate assaults at the battle of Cedar Creek, October, 1864, came while Sheridan was away, and were spectacularly successful. However, by afternoon, the Confederate attack ran out of steam. In his famous ride, Sheridan turned back from Winchester and hurried to the battlefield, helped rally the Union forces, and ordered a counterattack that proved crushingly successful. The Round Table discussion will focus on the Confederate pause that afternoon. Gen. Gordon urged Early to continue the assault against the stalwart Union VI Corps, but Early seemed confident they would retire. Writing later, Early seemed to lay the blame for the defeat upon the Confederate troops, who, by stopping to pillage Union camps, became too disorganized for further attacks. More will be forthcoming before our meeting, but there is plenty of time to read about the battle and form your opinions before our discussion.

8/10/23: Audience Participation

"A War Game of Sorts" led by John Weisz

The game will focus upon the options available to Major General John Buford leading a division of US cavalry and searching for the main Confederate force which has invaded southern Pennsylvania and Maryland. The audience will play the role of General Buford and will be presented four possible courses of action available to Buford. After our audience discussion we will poll the participants and then review the actual decision made by Buford and why he made that choice. If you were John Buford what would you do?

If you're interested in Civil War medicine, check out the National Museum of Civil War Medicine in Frederick, Maryland. It's fascinating.

May Program Scheduled For Cape Fear Museum USCT Expert Will Talk On Their Role in the Civil War

By Bill Jayne, President

Our May 11 meeting will be held at the Cape Fear Museum at 814 Market Street in Wilmington. Retired U.S. Navy Captain Edward Gantt will present “The United States Colored Troops in the Civil War.”

During the presentation, Capt. Gantt will address the contributions of African American soldiers in the USCT with special attention to their activities in southeastern North Carolina. USCT played an important role in the Battle of Ft. Fisher on January 15, 1865 and led the advance up the peninsula from Ft. Fisher to Wilmington from mid-January to the fall of the city on February 22.

They fought at the Sugar Loaf line in Carolina Beach and the Battle of Forks Road around the intersection of modern-day 17th Street and Independence Boulevard.

Capt. Gantt will address the background of the USCT as well as their contributions in both Eastern and Western theaters of the war. It’s a complicated story, of course. Originally not allowed to join the Army, by the end of the war, some 180,000 to 200,000 Blacks served in the United States Colored Troops (USCT) and comprised ten percent of the U. S. Army. There were at least 166 regiments of Black soldiers, who fought in approximately 450 battle actions and were instrumental in helping to win the Civil War and freedom for their people.

Gantt was born in Maryland and saw combat as a helicopter door gunner and crew chief during a 12-month tour in South Vietnam. His first stint in the service included graduation from the U.S. Army Airborne and Ranger schools.

After his Army service, and following graduation from Howard University, he re-entered the armed forces serving as a naval aviator, including a tour as commanding officer of Fighter Squadron 31 at Naval Air Station Miramar (at that time the home of Top Gun).

In July 2000, Gantt took command of the Navy boot camp at Great Lakes, Illinois. At Recruit Training Command (the Navy’s only boot camp), he was responsible for the development of nearly 50,000 sailors annually. He retired from the Navy in September 2003 after 30 years of active service and began a new career as a high school teacher in the Washington, D.C. area.

In the spring of 2014, Gantt began an association with the 23rd Infantry Regiment USCT Civil War re-enactors and living historians. He is currently a member of Company B, 54th Massachusetts Civil War re-enactors and president of the re-formed 23rd Regiment USCT in Spotsylvania, Virginia. (continued on next page)

Capt. Gantt will also present a special program on Friday, May 12, at Wilmington National Cemetery. Established in 1867, the historic cemetery is located at 2011 Market Street and is the final resting place of more than 500 USCT soldiers, the vast majority buried as unknowns.

We will open the Friday event, scheduled to begin at 4 p.m., to the general public and request a donation of $10 except for school children.

Members enjoy perusing the book table.

John served as the director of the Virginia War Museum until his retirement and is now Director Emeritus of the USS Monitor Center at The Mariners' Museum in Newport News, Virginia. He has authored 18 books and has served as an adjunct professor at the College of William & Mary. John is an expert on the Naval War and will speak to us about the Civil War actions that occurred along North Carolina's inland waterways.

10/12/23 Chris Bryan

Author of "Cedar Mountain to Antietam:
A Civil War Campaign History of the Union XII Corps, July - September 1862"

Chris Bryan's book is both a unit history and a leadership and character assessment. It is a compelling story of a little studied yet consequential corps and fills a long standing gap in the history of the civil war. It is the story of how this often luckless command began as part of MG John Pope's Army of Virginia in June 1862, endured defeat after coming within a whisker of defeating MG Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain, suffered through the hardships of the campaigns before and after Second Manassas, but despite it all, found its resurgence in Maryland as part of the rebuilt Army of the Potomac. Chris Bryan is a former naval aviator and USNA graduate, and is active with historic preservation and architectural investigations.

11/9/23 Ed Lowe

Author of "A Fine Opportunity Lost:
Longstreet's East Tennessee Campaign, November 1863 - April 1864"

Confederate General Longstreet's First Corps and Union General Burnside's IX Corps had already shared battlefields at Second Manassas, South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg. Unexpectedly, these two old foes from the Eastern Theater now found themselves transplanted to the Western Theater—familiar adversaries on unfamiliar ground. The fate of East Tennessee hung in the balance, and new reputations could be won or lost. General James Longstreet's deployment to East Tennessee gave him the chance for an independent command. For his Union opponent, Major General Ambrose Burnside, the Western Theater offered an opportunity for redemption from past failures. Colonel Ed Lowe USA (Ret) tells the story of how this was "a fine opportunity lost" for both men.

What's the best Civil War movie you've ever seen? "Glory" and "Lincoln" and "Gettysburg" come to mind. What are some others?

12/14/23 Everard Smith

Civil Warriors: An overview of weapons, uniforms, tactics, medicine, and camp life of both sides including a display of a few actual relics.

Local historian, former UNCW professor, and Round Table favorite, Dr. Everard Smith returns to our Round Table with another fascinating presentation on a totally new topic. Ev will focus on the volunteer soldier and some of the things he used and experienced in his everyday Army life. His thoroughly researched presentation will include some surprising details and a display of some actual relics of the civil war.

1/11/24 Pat Garrow

Author of "Grey to Blue: Galvanized Yankees in the Union Army"

Pat Garrow is a CFCWRT member, author, historian and professional archeologist. Pat will present his soon to be published book about Confederate soldiers who joined the Union Army to escape imprisonment. This book is a companion volume to Pat's earlier book that about Union prisoners of war who changed sides to joined the Confederate army. The new book updates and extends Dee Brown's classic volume "Galvanized Yankees." Pat will address the six regiments of US volunteers raised in Union prisons and sent to the western frontier to protect settlers and travelers and will go well beyond that to address lesser known units such as the Union Regiments raised in North Carolina.

2/8/24. Chris Mackowski

Author of "The Battle of Jackson, Mississippi, May 14, 1863"

CFCWRT welcomes back one of our most dynamic speakers, Dr. Chris Mackowski. Chris is a nationally known speaker, and also very well known for his work as the Editor in Chief of the Emerging Civil War blog. He is the author of more than a dozen books, and will speak to us about his recent work, "The Battle of Jackson." General Grant had his eyes set on Vicksburg, not Jackson, when he crossed the river south of Vicksburg and marched into the interior of Mississippi. A chance encounter with a small Confederate force at Raymond alerted Grant to the Confederate threat massing further east in Jackson under General Joseph Johnston. Chris will tell the story of how Grant turned his army on a dime to quickly capture Jackson and destroy this vital transportation and communications hub, thus isolating Vicksburg and setting the stage for the Union victories at Champion Hill and Vicksburg.

The American Battlefield Trust has preserved more than 53,000 acres of land on which battles from the Civil War, Revolutionary War, and the War of 1812 were fought. A Tour of the Sugar Loaf Line

By Bill Jayne, President

On a beautiful day of sunshine with temperatures in the 50s, about 20 members and friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table were treated to an eye-opening tour of the Sugar Loaf Lines in Carolina Beach. It was Saturday, February 18, a week after the anniversary of the engagement on February 11, 1865, when several brigades of Union troops, spearheaded by nine regiments of U.S. Colored Troops (USCT) attempted to force the strongly fortified Confederate line of General Robert Hoke's veteran division. The group met at 9 a.m. at J. Ryder Lewis Park in Carolina Beach near the Publix supermarket. Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Ph.D., professor emeritus of history at UNCW, was our leader, and there is none better.

Lewis Park preserves the remains of the Confederate defensive line that stretched from the inlet in Carolina Beach all the way to the Sugar Loaf sand dune on the Cape Fear River—a fortified line that held up the Union advance on Wilmington after the fall of Ft. Fisher. Remember that in those days, Carolina Beach to Fort Fisher was a peninsula not an island. It wasn't cut off from the mainland until Snow's Cut was excavated by the U.S. Corps of Engineers in 1929. It was not until the Union army sent strong forces across the river and took Fort Anderson that the Confederates under Gen. Robert Hoke, fell back toward Wilmington. We toured the well interpreted new park and then caravanned in our cars to a parking area near the Carolina Beach fire station on Dow Road. From there we tramped into the maritime forest heading toward the Sugar Loaf dune on the Cape Fear River.

The woods were full of earthworks, some several feet high, running east and west across the landscape. Once we reached Sugar Loaf and turned back toward the ocean, we were treated to the remains of a line of rifle pits, or fox holes (often called "Gopher Holes" in Civil War times) discovered by Dr. Fonvielle. Your round table puts together very informative and entertaining tours of the Civil War sites in our area. Be sure to be on the lookout for our next tour!

CFCWRT Treasurers Report

By Mike McDonald, Treasurer

Your Round Table is financially in excellent shape. In years past, the first few months were short on revenue and long on expenses; but not this year. We usually have out of town Speakers who travel some distance, and therefore need a hotel night after our evening meeting. Our quarterly rent is due at St. John's church, and only a few Members pay dues (start their new year) in Jan/Feb/Mar.

But this year two of our Speakers didn't need a hotel, and 4 new Members found us. Plus we had revenue from a great tour of the Sugar Loaf area, two Silent Auctions, and very successful book raffles at the meetings.

The net result has been a small net gain for the first quarter 2023, instead of the loss we had last year. We had more in our bank account (at Bank of America) ending March, than we did ending December. So, we are a bit ahead of our budget --- hopefully we can continue that through the balance of the year.

Speaking of December, we had a very good year in 2023, financially speaking. Much of our success was due to two factors: We developed a lot of opportunities for Members and tours, silent auctions, book raffles, logo clothing. Each of these generated a small amount of revenue for the Round Table. Together, they totaled about half of all revenue. (continued on next page)

Many New Members have found us in the last two years—about 20-25 in both of the last 2 years. Each Member contributes his or her $30, and that is the other half of our revenue. It is great to have them and we appreciate all their involvement. If your friends, family, neighbors have an interest in our subject, bring them along to a meeting --- no obligation, we will be glad to welcome them!

Lastly, our mailing address (snail mail) is 8387 E Highcroft Dr, Leland, 28451.

February Presentation on Confederate Hospitals

By Bill Jayne, President

On February 9, Wade Sokolosky presented an energetic, informative lecture on the Confederate hospitals in North Carolina. Wade is one of the premier historians of Sherman's Carolinas Campaign and his research into the battles of 1865, especially, drew him into the subject of the hospitals and the Confederate medical system.

It was a lively meeting as 54 members and guests, plus eight on Zoom, heard a story that illustrated the difficulties caused by the Confederate tension between states' rights and national control, a tension that greatly affected military affairs. Would the hospitals be run by the military, by the state government, by the Confederate government in Richmond? It's a story that's not often considered but it's one that greatly affected morale, both military and civilian and contributed directly to the Confederacy's ability to maintain itself.

Highlights of the meeting included presentation of an Honorary Life Membership certificate to David Norris, a past president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. David was joined by other past presidents Bob Cooke and Dr. Chris Fonvielle. All three were cited many times in Wade's book North Carolina's Confederate Hospitals, Volume 1: 1861-1863.

Yelena Howell, one of the administrators of our Facebook group, received an autographed copy of Wade's book in recognition of her brief interview of the author that was posted on Facebook. To follow the Facebook group, search for Cape Fear Civil War Round Table group. Here's the link <https://www.facebook.com/groups/1696952227331256>.

Book sales and raffle activity was brisk, and our speaker was pleased to receive a framed print of member Jim Horton's painting of "The Guns of Fort Fisher," as a memento of his visit to the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

Lincoln's Gettysburg Address

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate—we can not consecrate—we can not hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

—Abraham Lincoln

CFCWRT Monthly Notes – February 2023

On February 9, Wade Sokolosky, presented an energetic, informative lecture on the Confederate hospitals in North Carolina. Wade is one of the premier historians of Sherman's Carolinas Campaign and his research into the battles of 1865, especially, drew him into the subject of the hospitals and the Confederate medical system.

Wade receives a framed print of member Jim Horton's "Guns of Fort Fisher" as a memento of his visit to our round table.

It was a lively meeting as 54 members and guests, plus eight on Zoom, heard a story that illustrated the difficulties caused by the Confederate tension between states rights and national control, a tension that greatly affected military affairs. Would the hospitals be run by the military, by the state government, by the Confederate government in Richmond? It's a story that's not often considered but it's one that greatly affected morale, both military and civilian and contributed directly to the Confederacy's ability to maintain itself.

Highlights of the meeting included presentation of an Honorary Life Membership certificate to David Norris, a past president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. David was joined by other past presidents Bob Cooke and Dr. Chris Fonvielle. All three were cited many times in Wade's book, North Carolina's Confederate Hospitals, Volume 1: 1861-1863.

Former president David Norris receives a certificate naming him an honorary life member of the round table for his many contributions.

Yelena Howell, one of the administrator's of our Facebook group, received an autographed copy of Wade's book in recognition of her brief interview of the author that was posted on Facebook. To follow the Facebook group, search for Cape Fear Civil War Round Table group. Here's the link <https://www.facebook.com/groups/1696952227331256>.

Book sales and raffle activity was brisk and our speaker was pleased to receive a framed print of member Jim Horton's painting of "The Guns of Fort Fisher," as a memento of his visit to the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

MONTHLY NOTES—JANUARY 2023

On January 12, Jim McKee, site manager of Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson State Historic Site near Orton Plantation on the west side of the Cape Fear River, presented an entertaining, lively and informative lecture on the Ft. Anderson Garrison Flag and its connection to President Abraham Lincoln's assassination. By the way, if you haven't been to Fort Anderson already, saddle up and move out!

It was a lively meeting as 54 members and guests heard an interesting mystery story of a lost Confederate garrison flag that somehow made the circuitous voyage from an obscure southern fort to the hands of the President of the United States. As the president spoke at the National Hotel, we learned that a famous actor was listening intently near a specific lamp post. The actor, of course, was John Wilkes Booth, who—perhaps—was enraged by the President's remarks as he received the Confederate artifact. Did Booth, at that point, decide to jettison his idea of kidnapping the president and, instead, decide to assassinate him, probably the most tragic single event in the history of our nation?

Make plans to join your fellow Civil War history students at the next meeting of our round table on February 9.

Following a very active May (regular meeting, a Historic River Cruise with Dr. Chris Fonvielle and an evening tour of Fort Fisher conducted by the aforementioned and wonderfully animated Dr. Chris), June brought us an even more active three-day period of local history.

At our regular meeting on June 9, approximately 40 members in attendance and about 10 virtual viewers via Zoom, were treated to a splendid presentation by Emily Lapisardi discussing her book, Rose Greenhow's My Imprisonment: An Annotated Edition. One member said the talk “was one of the best that I’ve heard from CFCWRT.

Research was awesome and she brought it all together in a perfect narrative style. Not one minute of boredom.”

Then, on Friday evening, Emily appeared as Rose herself at a dramatic presentation at the Greenhow burial site in Oakdale Cemetery. Her dramatic, authentically costumed presentation was a soliloquy of about 45 minutes taken almost verbatim from Rose’s writings and testimonies. There were no notes and the only pauses were caused by airplanes flying over the cemetery. Approximately 60 attended. Thanks to Oakdale Cemetery for their great support of this event.

Finally, on Saturday, June 11, Emily, once again in period costume and in character, made an appearance at the annual Fort Fisher living history anniversary (date slipped by weather conditions on January 15th). In photo at left, Emily and member Kim Jordan visited while Kim's son, David, brought his drum calls to the reenactors marching nearby. Emily also had a chance to examine Rose Greenhow's authentic traveling trunk, salvaged from the wreck of the Condor after Mrs. Greenhow drowned off Ft. Fisher in October 1864. Posing with Emily are Chris Fonvielle and Yelena Howell, our tour director.

Residing in the Lower Cape Fear has permitted, indeed encouraged, us all to be keenly aware of the history that surrounds us.

Our Cape Fear CWRT does NOT stand-down during the summer months, but rather we will meet on the usual second Thursday throughout the summer months with a modified format, one that has proven very popular, even during the Covid years. The July 14th meeting will feature members John Weisz discussing Civil War Battlefield Tactics and Yelena Howell discussing Battlefield Nursing. Summer meetings will hold to the usual schedule as to time and place.

Please mark 11 August as our second member's forum featuring Lance Bevins and Pat Garrow along with David Jordan presenting drum calls.

President Bill Jayne, in his opening remarks at the June meeting, paid tribute to Sherry and Bill Hewitt who are re-locating to Texas. Sherry made major contributions to our Round Table, first as editor of the Runner and then as membership chair. Sherry also introduced candy to the meet, greet and join function of the membership chair. They will be missed! Likewise, the candy.

Bill Jayne also highlighted our web site, <http://www.cfcwrt.org> and the fact that several logo items are now available for purchase. Of course, we invite you to visit the web site as time permits or if you just want a place to hang out on the internet.

December Presentation: How WV Became a State

The creation of the state of West Virginia in the midst of the American Civil War is an often overlooked and little-known event to all but the serious Civil War history enthusiast. However, the story has been given more attention in the past decade, with at least two books published on the topic and another in progress. West Virginia's creation brought to light numerous legal and constitutional issues and highlighted intrastate sectional diversity on a level not seen elsewhere in the states. Even Confederate states with relatively high numbers of Union sympathizers like North Carolina and Tennessee did not schism as a result; only Virginia did. West Virginia was a region of a southern state that had more in common with its neighbors to the north than with its brethren to the east and its creation was wrapped up in issues of slavery, race, culture, and economics. Early in the war, the region was hotly contested, but was largely forgotten about when the focus of the war shifted farther south, and West Virginia officially entered the Union. Even so, West Virginia was still a somewhat divided state, that provided only slightly more manpower to the Union cause than it did to the Confederacy. But the new state's politicians were firmly committed to the Union and worked with the federal government to remain part of it.

Did you know...?

Stonewall Jackson was born in Clarksburg, Virginia in 1824. Clarksburg, in Harrison County, was part of what became West Virginia in 1863.

There are writings which indicate that in Jackson's early childhood, he was called "The Real Macaroni", though the origin of the nickname and whether it really existed are unclear.

Battle Flag - 1st WV Veteran Infantry
Listed on the flag are the battles in which they fought.

The U.S. state of West Virginia was formed out of western Virginia and added to the Union as a direct result of the American Civil War, in which it became the only modern state to have declared its independence from the Confederacy.

November Presentation: Betty Vaughn, Christmas in the Civil War

Betty Vaughn, an artist, teacher and writer of historical fiction, narrated a PowerPoint presentation giving a comprehensive history of the traditions of Christmas going to their European origins and continuing to the evolution of customs in this country. She explained the differences in celebration between those in the North and the South and the underlying causes for the disparity between them. In the north it tended to be a quiet religious celebration in the home...after a day of work. The South followed more liberal English customs. The Dutch in New York were responsible for several of our traditions. The original Dutch customs were explained, as well as the way they would eventually be adapted and popularized. Thomas Nast, the famous German-born cartoonist who grew up in New York around the time of the Civil War, was responsible for many of our iconic symbols of Christmas. It is interesting to note Thanksgiving was declared a national holiday years before Christmas! The program discussed the Christmas hymns that were sung by our soldiers as they huddled by their campfires. The food, decorations, candy, cookies, and religious observations of the period were traced to their origin. The use of period photos and imagery are enhanced with automation and music where appropriate.

January 13th: Ernest Dollar, Author and Public Historian (Director, City of Raleigh Museum), speaking about "NC Military Operations in 1865"

February 10th: Jim Horton, Artist (Member of CFCWRT), speaking about his Civil War historic paintings

March 10th: Charles Knight, Author and Public Historian (Curator of Military History at NC Museum of History), speaking about his book From Arlington to Appomattox: Robert E. Lee's Civil War Day by Day 1861-1865

Trivia Questions

1. What Union spy, destined to gain fame for a daring railroad exploit, won the confidence of Confederates by smuggling quinine to them?
2. What raiders, captured by Confederates, were treated as civilian spies because they were out of uniform?

New Bern Battlefield Trip

On December 4th, members and friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable gathered for a trip to the New Bern Battlefield Park.

New Bern Battlefield Park is the ground where nearly one third of the Civil War Battle of New Bern occurred. The park is in near pristine condition: unmarked by development or agriculture, the “redans” or fighting positions remain as they were a century and a half ago. Today the Battlefield Park includes over 30 acres of the original battlefield. The Gateway Plaza leads to a unique 20 foot diameter color ground map and signage that provides an overview of the battle.

The park's Gateway Plaza provides an overview of the battlefield and effectively orients visitors. Guide Brian Kraus, in blue checked shirt, explains the map.

Friends of Fort Fisher

The Friends of Fort Fisher is a member driven non-profit organization devoted to supporting the activities and needs of Fort Fisher, an official North Carolina State Historic Site. Membership in the Friends consist of individuals, governments, foundations and businesses who make gifts that support programming, special events and site improvements.

The Friends are involved with the State in an exciting project to replace the outdated and inadequate visitors center built in the 1950's to accommodate 25,000 annual visitors. We will soon have 1 million people annually visiting the Fort making it the most visited state historic site in North Carolina. The Friends are working with the State to design and construct a new visitors center with modern exhibits which will highlight the history of the area and the Fort. Our goal is to focus on all the people who were involved in the initial construction of the Fort and those who defended or attacked the Fort in the January 1865 battle which was instrumental in ending the American Civil War.

The Friends invite you to join our membership and to also consider ways you can support the building campaign. One of the Friends goals is to construct three of the original 50 foot earthen mounds that was central to the Fort's defense and operations. The State will build the $21M visitors center and the Friend will raise $3M for the mounds. We invite your participation in this important mission.

Fort Fisher, in New Hanover County south of Wilmington, was the largest earthwork fortification in the Confederacy and for four years (1861-65) played a vital role in the Southern war effort. Located at Confederate Point (now called Federal Point) the fort guarded the New Inlet entrance to the Cape Fear River and kept the port of Wilmington open to the blockade-runners, upon whom the Confederacy heavily relied to supply its armies. With the fall of Fort Morgan on Mobile Bay in August, 1864, Fort Fisher became the last important coastal fortification under Confederate control. When the fort fell to Union forces on January 15, 1865 -- after the heaviest naval bombardment of land fortifications known to that date -- the only remaining link between the already-doomed Confederacy and the outside world was broken.

The Public Archaeology Corps

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table member Pat Garrow recently lent his expertise to the excavation of a segment of the Confederate earthworks on the Cameron Art Museum grounds that date to The Forks Road battle that occurred immediately before the Confederate evacuation of Wilmington. That excavation exposed the original ground surface beneath the earthworks during dedication of a statute dedicated to the US Colored Troops involved in that battle.

Pat is a (semi) retired professional archaeologist who has worked in the field for more than 50 years. He holds a MA in Archaeology from the University of Georgia. He recently went back to The Chieftains Museum (Major Ridge Home) in Rome, Georgia, to lead the investigation of a site thought to have been a kitchen at the home of the Cherokee chief who was one of the signers of the Treaty of New Echota that led to the forced removal of the tribe. Pat originally worked on the Chieftains site in 1969-71. He is pictured at the far right of the photo below.

A native of Newport News, Virginia, he is also the author of Changing Sides: Union Prisoners of War Who Joined the Confederate Army.

The Forks Road excavation was an example of the public education/public outreach projects undertaken by Public Archaeology Corps (PAC). PAC has a long-term excavation underway at 10 S. Front Street in downtown Wilmington. That excavation has encountered archaeological deposits from the 18th century, and will continue on selected weekends.

Membership in the PAC is open to all interested parties. Please go to the PAC website to become a member and for additional information and for notices of upcoming excavations.

The Public Archaeology Corps is a 501(C) (3) nonprofit organization that is dedicated to public education, public outreach, and researching endangered archaeological sites on private land that are not protected by federal or state laws. The PAC includes professional archaeologists, historians, and interested citizens.

Archaeologists Locate Underwater Artifacts

Sonar image of four Confederate cribs in Savannah River (USACE, Savannah)

Archaeologists using sonar to scan the bottom of the Savannah River have located the remnants of four underwater obstructions placed by Confederate defenders during the Civil War.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineer's Savannah office last week released a video and press release on the discovery of the so-called cribs, which were intended to prevent a Federal attack on the Georgia city.

"A crib is actually the wooden structure that would have held rubble, in this case mostly bricks," Will Wilson, an archaeologist with Commonwealth Heritage Group said in the video. "This is a fairly simple frame system that is (put) in place really to hold the rubble and provide an obstruction to ships that might want to pass up the river."

Wilson and others recorded 3D images ahead of dives on two of the crib sites. The dives are underway, Corps officials said this week.

While tourists coming to the popular coastal destination gaze upon the supertankers coming from or to the Atlantic Ocean, they likely have no idea what lies beneath the river's surface: Remnants of vessels, pieces of Native American pottery that washed down stream, and other items deposited over the centuries.

The Corps began new fact finding and artifacts recovery in the past couple weeks.

The project follows the discovery earlier this year of three historic artillery pieces in the river.

The cannons appear to have been made in the mid-1700s, and some theorize they may have been carried by the HMS Rose, a British warship that took part in the siege of Savannah during the Revolutionary War.

The Rose was scuttled to block the channel from French ships that might come to the aid of colonists trying to retake the city.

"A definitive conclusion on their origins is still pending and may require future conservation efforts to study any identifying marks that may tie the artifacts to a specific vessel or wreck,” the Corps said.

It’s possible the artillery pieces were on a Confederate warship, such as the CSS Georgia, which was used in conjunction with cribs to defend the city.

The cannons were found this past February in the general vicinity of where the Rebel ironclad was scuttled in December 1864 during the Civil War. Most of the ironclad’s wreckage was removed a few years back as part of the Corps’ deepening of the Savannah harbor.

The ironclad itself was an obstruction: Too slow to travel downstream and engage the enemy, the CSS Georgia was a floating battery stationed near Fort Jackson, another defensive bastion a few miles east of downtown.

Confederate torpedoes in Charleston at war's end (Library of Congress)

Smaller batteries dotted the river banks toward Fort Pulaski, near Tybee Island. The fort fell to Union forces in 1862 and the city was effectively bottled up for the remainder of the conflict.

In its press release, the Corps said investigators this spring “found additional artifacts related to the cannons on the river bottom. The exact number and types of artifacts remaining in the Savannah River will be determined through the current and upcoming investigations, and these materials will be recovered for further study.”

Corps spokesman Billy Birdwell told the Picket on Tuesday that the crib dives and artifact recovery are part of necessary clearing for ongoing deepening of the harbor.

He said divers are working in an area filled with all kinds of debris, from before and after the Civil War. Dozens of cribs were placed in the river during the Civil War.

The Confederacy used a wide array of weapons and obstructions to defend against advances on Savannah from the sea. Besides forts and warships, wooden cribs, pile dams, torpedoes (mines), snags, logs and dozens of shipwrecks were employed.

A 2007 report by New South Associates on the CSS Georgia said the ironclad was situated to protect obstructions from Federal wrecking parties.

“The obstructions themselves were double-lines of sunken structures, comprised of cribs put together with 18 to 20-inch timbers, and loaded with bricks. Except for a small opening to allow Confederate patrol boats to go in and out, these obstructions stretched across the navigable width of the river. In the south channel, these cribs were reported to have a height of 30 to 35 feet,” the report says.

Shore batteries supported Fort Jackson.

“There were two lines of obstructions in the vicinity of Fort Jackson. The line furthest downstream, on either side of the head of Elba Island, appears to have been Georgia’s first home,” New South Associates said. “A more irregular line of obstructions was also laid in the immediate vicinity of Fort Jackson, upstream from the first line. This line too appears to have had moorings for Georgia.”

Wilson, the archaeologist speaking in the Corps video, said the cribs being investigated now are north of the river channel, a bit outside of freighter traffic.

An 1865 map in the collection of the Library of Congress shows a narrow waterway labeled “obstructed by cribs” not far from CSS Georgia and Fort Jackson. The river’s flow has changed since then and some land that appeared in the map is now underwater. It is unclear exactly where these cribs being studied by the Corps were discovered.

A map by Robert Knox Sneden, a renowned Union mapmaker, shows Southern batteries and obstructions all the way to Fort Pulaski.

An 1874 account of the fortifications in and around Savannah includes this description:

“The guns in these positions were supplied with an average of rather more than one hundred rounds of ammunition to the piece. As additional obstructions to an ascent of the Savannah river by the enemy, cribs, filled with brick and stone, had been sunk in the channel below the forts and under cover of their guns. Below the Thunderbolt battery the river was impeded by quantities of live oak logs.”

All of these defensive weapons did the trick: Savannah did not succumb to the Federal navy. Instead, it fell to the Union army during Sherman’s March to the Sea.

After the war, contractors were hired to raise obstructions, including cribs, sunken vessels, piles, snags and torpedoes, so that commercial traffic could safely resume. They even got part of the CSS Georgia. (Interestingly, there were complaints during the Civil War of obstructions left over from the Revolutionary War).

W. Todd Groce, president and CEO of the Georgia Historical Society, told the Picket a friend in 1996 discovered a Confederate torpedo buried in the mud along the river and downstream from the city.

“It was one of the old wooden barrel types. He excavated it and kept it in a big tub of water so it would not dry out and disintegrate.” The man wanted to donate it to the society, but it did not have proper facilities to care for and display it, Groce said.

Stay tuned to the Picket for an update on this project.

Fort Jackson, area of placed cribs (Library of Congress)

“These submerged crib obstructions are believed to be some of the last remaining examples of this type of obstruction placed in the Savannah River during the Civil War,” the Corps said.

Trivia Answers

1. James J. Andrews was a Kentucky civilian who worked for the Union Army during the early years of the American Civil War. He led a daring raid behind enemy lines on the Western and Atlantic Railroad, known as The Great Locomotive Chase. Andrews and seven fellow raiders were caught at the end of the chase and executed by the Confederates on the charge of spying.
2. Army volunteers who followed Civilian James J. Andrews. In April 1862, Andrews proposed a scheme to Major General Ormsby M. Mitchel to seize a locomotive in northern Georgia and drive it to Chattanooga, Tennessee, where he would rendezvous with Mitchel's attacking Union Army. On April 12th Andrews, another civilian, William "Bill" Campbell, and 24 volunteers from three Ohio infantry regiments garbed in civilian clothes, stole a locomotive known as The General at Big Shanty, near Kennesaw, Georgia. They headed north, destroying tracks and telegraph wires along the way in an effort to discourage pursuers and render the railroad useless for supplying the Confederate troops in Tennessee. William Allen Fuller, the conductor of the stolen train pursued the train hijackers on foot, by handcar, and in a variety of other locomotives, most notably the "Texas", in which he gave chase for 51 miles (82 km) in reverse. After an 87 miles (140 km) chase, the General lost power just north of Ringgold, Georgia, and Andrews and his raiders scattered. He was captured soon afterwards and identified as the leader. The captured military raiders were treated as civilian spies because they were out of uniform.
3. Benjamin Hardin Helm was Mary Todd Lincoln's brother-in-law. He came into Abraham Lincoln's Kentucky family circle when he married Emilie Todd, Mary Lincoln's half sister, in 1856.

Benjamin Hardin Helm had attended the U.S. Military Academy at West Point and graduated ninth in his class in 1851. After serving briefly on the Texas frontier before illness forced his resignation from the army, he studied law and entered practice in Elizabethtown before being elected to the Kentucky House of Representatives in 1855. A year before the Civil War started, he became an assistant inspector general in the Kentucky State Guard.

As the Civil War began, President Lincoln offered his brother-in-law a commission as paymaster in the Union army. He turned down the offer and helped recruit the First Kentucky Cavalry Regiment for the Confederate army. Commissioned a colonel, Helm quickly rose in rank when he was promoted to brigadier general after the battle of Shiloh and served under fellow Kentuckian General John C. Breckinridge in Mississippi and Louisiana. Eventually, General Helm became commander of the First Kentucky Infantry Brigade (the "Orphan Brigade") and was killed at the battle of Chickamauga in northern Georgia on September 20, 1863. When President Lincoln learned of his brother-in-law's death in battle, he was deeply moved and told one member of his cabinet that he felt like David in the Bible when he learned that his son Absalom had been killed.

Walt Disney made a movie of Andrews' exploits in 1956 called The Great Locomotive Chase starring Fess Parker as Andrews.

Civil War This and That

In the aftermath of battle, soldiers from both sides often swarmed over the field to loot the dead. A gold watch was seldom ignored and any wallet full of currency went into the pocket of the finder. Respectable women attached to the army performed various camp and nursing duties were known as Vivi-andières.

Transportation magnate Cornelius Vanderbilt prized each of his ships. But as a patriotic gesture, he agreed to sell a 1,700-ton vessel that bore his name to the Federal government - at his own price. He asked for, and received, exactly one dollar.

Nov. Presentation: Betty Vaughn, Christmas in the Civil War

Betty Vaughn, an artist, teacher and writer of historical fiction, will narrate a PowerPoint presentation giving a comprehensive history of the traditions of Christmas going to their European origins and continuing to the evolution of customs in this country. She explains the differences in celebration between those in the North and the South and the underlying causes for the disparity between them. While in the north it tended to be a quiet religious celebration, the South followed more liberal English customs. The Dutch in New York were responsible for several of our traditions. The original Dutch customs will be explained, as well as the way they would eventually be adapted and popularized. Thomas Nast, the famous German-born cartoonist who grew up in New York around the time of the Civil War, was responsible for many of our iconic symbols of Christmas. It is interesting to note Thanksgiving was declared a national holiday years before Christmas! The program discusses the Christmas hymns that were sung by our soldiers as they huddled by their campfires. The food, decorations, candy, cookies, and religious observations of the period will be traced to their origin with an explanation of why and how they changed. The use of period photos and imagery are enhanced with automation and music where appropriate. It is particularly noteworthy that many songs and customs date to this period in history.

Betty Vaughn is well known for her novels, especially those belonging to the genre of historical fiction. She has received numerous awards from the NC Society of Historians for the following historical novels set in the Civil War Period: The Man in the Chimney, Turbulent Waters, The Intrepid Miss LaRoque, and Run, Cissy, Run. Each of these books feature actual people living in the area at the time and factual events, fictionalizing only the main characters.

The Mystery of Sarah Slater, a biography, explores the mysterious courier who lived in North Carolina during the war and disappeared while carrying messages and gold to the Confederate outpost in Montreal just after the fall of Richmond. This book was also an award winner due to the extensive research presented. She was sought by investigators who wanted to question her in connection to the Lincoln assassination, but they could not find her.

Mrs. Vaughn received awards for writing while in school and afterwards. Graduating from East Carolina University, the prize-winning watercolorist pursued a career in teaching AP art history and painting. Later she took up writing full time. Her first novel, a contemporary fiction, is Yesterday's Magnolia.

Union Blockade by Robert M. Browning, Jr.

Robert M. Browning, Jr., Ph.D., retired chief historian of the U.S. Coast Guard informed and entertained our round table on Thursday evening, October 14, with a great presentation on the Union blockade with special focus on the blockade of Wilmington and the special difficulties the Navy faced.

With two entrances into the Cape Fear River, and a large, dangerous shelf of shoals in between, the Navy had to develop a large enough squadron, an efficient supply depot and doctrine that would allow them to intercept the fast, purpose-built blockade running steamers that exported cotton and imported munitions and other scarce items for the beleaguered Confederacy.

Frying Pan Shoals forced the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron to, in effect, maintain two blockades; one off the mouth of the river and the other at New Inlet. Now closed off, New Inlet just below Fort Fisher was a very difficult nut for the Navy to crack.

Acting Rear Admiral Samuel P. Lee, a Virginian and distant cousin of Robert E. Lee, took over in September 1862 and developed different tactics to try to intercept blockade runners entering the river. He used smaller, faster ships, such as steam tugs, to patrol closer to the bars at the entrance to the inlets and called them “bartenders,” sometimes keeping them within a mile and a half of the beach. Other lines of ships patrolled further out.

Rear Admiral David Dixon Porter replaced Lee in October 1864 and was given many more ships to enforce the blockade. His tactical disposition amounted to three half-circles with the most distant line about 130 miles from the beach and stretching from Beaufort in the north to a point south of the mouth of the Cape Fear River. See maps on the next page.

The duty was boring, frustrating and sometimes humiliating because the blockade runners had all the advantages of initiative. They could choose the time and the place to enter or exit the river and make their run to or from Bermuda or to or from Nassau, Bahamas.

Blockade running remained potentially very profitable even as the Union Navy became more effective at stopping the trade. Eventually, many of the most effective blockading ships were blockade runners that had been captured. In those days ships and cargos captured by the Navy greatly enriched the officers and men of the fleet with prize money.

An audience of about 25 live and 12 virtual viewers contributed to a very lively question-and-answer session after the presentation and all thanked Dr. Browning for his excellent presentation.

A recording of the presentation is available on YouTube through our home page.

Dr. Rutherford - Development and Use of Civil War Land Mines

In September, Professor Kenneth Rutherford, Ph.D., gave our round table a most informative and personally moving presentation about the development and use of land mines by the Confederate army in the Civil War.

Dr. Rutherford is a leader in the worldwide effort to ban the use of landmines and ameliorate the damage done to civilians by mines and other explosive ordnance. He shared in the receipt of a Nobel Peace Prize awarded to the International Campaign to Ban Landmines in 1997.

As an aid worker in Somalia in 1993 he was grievously wounded when his vehicle hit a landmine. The incident led to the amputation of both legs.

Today, in addition to writing books such as America's Buried History: Landmines in the Civil War, Dr. Rutherford teaches at James Madison University and finds time to serve as a director of the Shenandoah Valley Battlefield Foundation.

His presentation was most powerful and enlightening. Our visit with Ken was made even more meaningful when retired Professor Chris Fonvielle, a founding member of our round table and our second president, led a tour of Fort Fisher for Professor Rutherford the next morning.

The Confederates had deployed command detonated landmines at Fort Fisher to oppose a land assault but the naval bombardment disrupted the mine field and the wires that were intended to detonate the devices so they didn't play a role in the battle in January 1865.

Trivia Questions

1. Who was the only man on either side, Confederate or Union, who started in the war as a private and ended as a lieutenant general?
2. What soldier of fortune, who had fought with Garibaldi for the unification of Italy in 1860, led a company of former convicts from New Orleans that was called the "Tiger Rifles"?
3. Whose activities as a Partisan Ranger were so successful that General Grant ordered that he be hanged without trial if captured?
4. As an unenrolled drummer, nine-year-old Johnny Clem of Ohio received how much pay?
5. When Federal gunboats bombarded Fort McRee, Florida, with five thousand shells in November 1861, how many defenders died?

Did you Know..?

British ship builders in Liverpool, England, knew they were working for the CSA when they produced No. 290. At least, that was the verdict of an international tribunal in 1872. Renamed the CSS Alabama, the sleek 1,050-ton sailing vessel was equipped with an auxiliary steam engine. Pounded mercilessly by a warship of the US Navy, she sank in French waters. But a post-war arbitration panel awarded the US damages of $15.5 million in gold to compensate for "negligence" shown by the British in filling a Confederate order.

Field Trip: New Bern Battlefield Park

The Cape Fear Round Table is planning a trip to the New Bern Battlefield Park. The park is more than 30 acres and in superb fashion interprets the March 14, 1862 battle that secured New Bern as a base for the Union throughout the war.

New Bern Battlefield Park comprises the ground where nearly one third of the Civil War Battle of New Bern occurred. The park is in near pristine condition: unmarked by development or agriculture, the “redans” or fighting positions remain as they were a century and a half ago. You can literally walk in the footsteps of young Confederate and Union soldiers who were here on that fateful day: March 14, 1862.

Some of you may recall Brian Kraus’s excellent presentation on the battle at a meeting in May 2019. Brian has agreed to be our guide for the visit.

The park is owned and maintained by the New Bern Historical Society and its volunteers. An impressive feature of the park are the many period earthworks preserved on the grounds. It also includes a “unique 20 foot diameter color ground map and signage that provides an overview of the battle and a starting point for tours.”

On the morning of December 4, 2021, we will meet in a central location in Wilmington to travel to the battlefield in New Bern. The means of transportation will depend on the number of participants and we will share the cost of transportation.

Please bring a “brown bag” lunch and drinks to maximize the time we can spend visiting the battlefield.

The tour of the battlefield and, potentially, outlying sites such as the location of the Union landing and the original Croatan Line that wasn’t defended by the Confederates, will take approximately three hours. Overall, this is an all-day event.

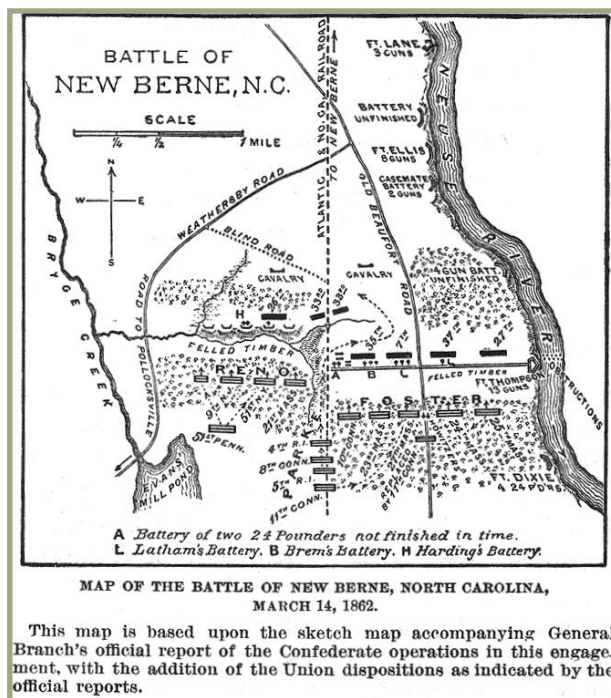

In case of inclement weather, we’ll reschedule for December 11th.

More information about the park is contained at this website.

Trivia Answers

Nathan Bedford Forrest

Chatham Roberdeau Wheat

John Singleton Mosby

Johnny Clem

1. Nathan Bedford Forrest - Despite having no formal military training, Forrest rose from the rank of private to lieutenant general, serving as a cavalry officer at numerous engagements including the Battles of Shiloh, Chickamauga, Brice's Crossroads and Second Franklin.
2. Chatham Roberdeau Wheat - Wheat was born in Alexandria, Virginia, the son of an Episcopal clergyman and member of a distinguished Maryland family. After graduating from the University of Nashville in 1845, he studied law for a year in Memphis, Tennessee, before volunteering for service in the Mexican War. There he earned a captain's commission and, returning to civilian life, he settled in New Orleans, began a legal practice, entered politics, and was elected to the Louisiana legislature. He abandoned a promising career to join filibustering expeditions to Latin America, and by 1860 he was in Italy, fighting with English volunteers in Giuseppe Garibaldi's revolutionary forces. When the Civil War began, he returned to the United States, organized the 1st Louisiana Special Battalion, and was appointed its commander, with the rank of Major. One company of the battalion was composed of unsavory characters and former convicts from New Orleans who styled themselves the "Tiger Rifles." The name stuck to the entire battalion, and "Wheat's Tigers" soon left Louisiana for Virginia. The Tigers saw their initial action at First Bull Run.
3. John Singleton Mosby - The 43rd Battalion, "Mosby's Rangers", were partisans who melted into the civilian population when not on a raid, and at one-point General Grant ordered several captured partisans hanged for being out of uniform. Nonetheless when raiding they did wear Confederate gray at least in some fashion. When the Union began hanging Mosby's men they captured, this quickly became the norm for Mosby's men when they captured Union soldiers. This continued until late in November 1864 when Mosby wrote to General Philip Sheridan and requested that both sides return to treating prisoners of war more humanely. Both sides agreed and there were no more executions.
4. Thirteen dollars per month, which was soldier's pay but was contributed by officers and men of the Twenty-second Michigan until he was old enough to enlist.
5. About half a dozen - At 10:00 AM on the morning of November 22, 1861, the Union batteries at Fort Pickens opened fire on the Confederate steamers docked at the Navy Yard wharf. The steamers escaped the line of fire with minimal damage, but the Confederate guns at Forts McRee and Barrancas returned fire. The Union ships USS Richmond and USS Niagara soon moved closer to shore and joined the Union barrage, firing primarily at Fort McRee. Union guns shot off the flagstaffs at both McRee and Barrancas. The artillery battle continued the next day. In all, Union troops expended 5,000 rounds of ammunition while Confederate troops returned some 1,000 shots. Although Fort McRee survived, it was badly battered. Large chunks of the wall were blown away while other portions had holes shot clean through by the cannon shells. In one area a section of wall totally collapsed. Most of the wood decking within the fort had gone up in flames while one powder magazine caved in, killing six Confederates in the process.

Locomotives Up the Turnpike - The Civil War Career of Quartermaster Captain Thomas R. Sharp CSA by David L. Bright

David L. Bright

When the Civil War began, the railroads of the Confederate States had the immense job of collecting the men, supplies and equipment needed to create a government and its armed forces. Railroads had never been used in the direct support of a war and the new nation soon learned that its railroad resources were far short of what would be needed. Thomas R. Sharp, a young Richmond-based railroad superintendent was tapped by the new government to haul to the Confederate railroads the cars and locomotives captured by the future Stonewall Jackson from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad near Martinsburg, Virginia.

Sharp hired dozens of men and hundreds of horses and wagons to haul the rolling stock south on the Valley of Virginia Turnpike, from Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry to Winchester to Strasburg. Seventeen locomotives and well over 100 cars were hauled over the country roads to intersections with the Manassas Gap Railroad and the Virginia Central Railroad, then on to Richmond.

The locomotives had been burned before Capt. Sharp could begin to haul them, and he had to essentially take them apart to reduce the weight to be hauled. This led to Sharp being assigned to repair the locomotives, as well as haul them. While some repairing was accomplished in Richmond, most was done in the Confederate Locomotive Shop, in Raleigh, created and run by Sharp.

By the summer of 1863, Sharp had been assigned to be the superintendent of the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad, a critical road in the supply chain supporting Richmond and the main Confederate army. Later, Sharp was given responsibility for coordinating the railroad transportation of all of central and western South Carolina. As Gen. Sherman approached, in 1865, Sharp assisted in the evacuation of Columbia, and then worked to improve the railroads between Charlotte and Salisbury, N. C. Capt. Sharp's story has never been told before and is a unique adventure.

With this site, David presents the details behind the railroads. Here you will find each railroad, its location and length, its type and size of rail, the number of cars and locomotives it had when the war started, and the names and technical data of each locomotive. He also provided lists of stations on each road and comments about most Confederate cities, taken from a Confederate railroad guide. I have also posted well over 20,400 transcriptions of the railroad issues-related documents that I continue to find and post.

This site was specifically created because it is so hard to locate this information. Most of the important terms are defined in Data Definitions and discussed in the Essays section.

Fascine Knife: A type of sawtooth bayonet developed in 1864.

Horological Torpedo: A torpedo set off through a timekeeping device, i.e., a time bomb. Horological means “pertaining to a timepiece.” Besides using this formal term for the weapon, people also referred to it in simpler ways, such as “clock-work torpedo.”

Pigeon Shot: A Confederate term for a smoothbore projectile in which, after it cleared the muzzle, springs popped out a pair of triangular wings to stabilize flight. Previously pigeon shot meant small-sized bird shot.

Shaler Bullet: A Union .58 caliber bullet that, after firing, separated into three pieces as it flew towards the target.

The Blockade of Wilmington and

Cape Fear Round Table Features Historian of the Blockade
"How did Naval power contribute to the winning of the war?"

Robert Browning, Jr.

Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites you to attend a "hybrid" live and virtual Zoom presentation at Harbor United Methodist Church, 4853 Masonboro Loop, on Thursday evening, October 14. Our speaker will be Robert M. Browning, Jr., Ph.D., talking about the Union blockade. Dr. Browning, retired chief historian of the U.S. Coast Guard, is the acknowledged expert of the blockade.

President Lincoln proclaimed a blockade of the 3,500-mile coastline on April 19, 1861, soon after the fall of Ft. Sumter. In all the years since, the role of the U.S. Navy in putting down the rebellion has received little attention compared to the monumental clashes of the armies at places like Gettysburg and Chickamauga.

Yet, the role of the navy was crucial to victory. When the blockade was proclaimed, there were only three armed vessels ready for service on the Atlantic coast. By the end of the war, however, the U.S. Navy comprised 671 ships of all kinds from the revolutionary new ironclad monitors to shallow draft wooden gunboats. Enforcement of the blockade was never airtight but by 1864 only custom-built blockade running ships could effectively evade the noose that was strangling the Confederate economy. In addition, the navy provided essential logistical, transport and gunfire support for army operations.

In 1993 Dr. Browning published From Cape Charles to the Cape Fear, which chronicles the establishment of the crucial blockade from the entrance to Chesapeake Bay south to the mouth of the Cape Fear River. It was crucial to control this stretch of the coast and the inland waters of Chesapeake Bay, James River and the North Carolina sound country.

In 2002, he added Success is All That Was Expected, a history of the South Atlantic squadron that sailed the coast from the Cape Fear to Florida. This story covers the harrowing engagements between ships and forts, daring amphibious assaults, and the evolution of submarine warfare in the form of the CSS Hunley. In Lincoln's Trident, he continued his magisterial series to chronicle the squadron that operated in the Gulf of Mexico.

Knowing the Navy's role in isolating the Confederate economy and preventing the movement of troops and supplies within the South is crucial to understanding of the outcomes of the Civil War, as well as the importance of naval power in military conflicts.

November Presentation: Betty Vaughn, Christmas in the Civil War

Our featured speaker for November is Betty Vaughn, an artist, teacher and writer of historical fiction. Scheduled for November 11, Veterans Day, Ms. Vaughn will narrate a Power-Point presentation giving a comprehensive history of the traditions of Christmas going to their European origins and continuing to the evolution of customs in this country. She explains the differences in celebration between those in the North and the South and the underlying causes for the disparity between them. In the north it tended to be a quiet religious celebration in the home...after a day of work. The South followed more liberal English customs. The Dutch in New York were responsible for several of our traditions. The original Dutch customs will be explained, as well as the way they would eventually be adapted and popularized. There was no notable distinction between Catholic and Protestant celebrations in the South. Thomas Nast, the famous German-born cartoonist who grew up in New York around the time of the Civil War, was responsible for many of our iconic symbols of Christmas. It is interesting to note Thanksgiving was declared a national holiday years before Christmas! The program discusses the Christmas hymns that were sung by our soldiers as they huddled by their campfires. The food, decorations, candy, cookies, and religious observations of the period will be traced to their origin with an explanation of why and how they changed. The use of period photos and imagery are enhanced with automation and music where appropriate. While we have all celebrated the holiday, few of us know how our customs evolved. It is particularly noteworthy that many songs and customs date to this period in history.

Betty Vaughn is well known for her novels, especially those belonging to the genre of historical fiction. She has received numerous awards from the NC Society of Historians for the following historical novels set in the Civil War Period: The Man in the Chimney, Turbulent Waters, The Intrepid Miss LaRoque, and Run, Cissy, Run. Each of these books feature actual people living in the area at the time and factual events, fictionalizing only the main characters.

The Mystery of Sarah Slater, a biography, explores the mysterious courier who lived in North Carolina during the war and disappeared while carrying messages and gold to the Confederate outpost in Montreal just after the fall of Richmond. This book was also an award winner due to the extensive research presented. She was sought by investigators who wanted to question her in connection to the Lincoln assassination, but they could not find her.

Mrs. Vaughn received awards for writing while in school and afterwards. Graduating from East Carolina University, the prize-winning watercolorist pursued a career in teaching AP art history and painting. Later she took up writing full time. Her first novel, a contemporary fiction, is Yesterday's Magnolia.

You are certain to fall in love with her characters and her ability to keep you enthralled. Described as a seasoned writer by critics, Mrs. Vaughn uses issues faced by people in everyday life making it easy to relate to her well-delineated characters. However, the beauty of her work remains in her mastery of literary technique, which enables her to use words in a way that does not sound superficial, farfetched, or boring. Her ability to keep the readers interested in the story to the very end bears testimony to her expertise as a writer.

Wreaths Across America

It's October and time to turn our attention towards Christmas activities.

During the months of October and November, the citizens of Wilmington (and surrounding environs) will be raising funds with which to cover the graves in our National Cemetery, with Christmas wreaths. Wreaths Across America will once again, honor all veterans with an appropriate wreath to be placed, with ceremony, on 18 December.

Our Round Table has traditionally supported this community effort with individual contributions, in increments of $15, with a generous contribution, last year exceeding 70 wreaths. As an incentive, WAA returns to the sponsoring organizations (CFCWRT) five dollars ($5) which we apply to our speaker's fund.

Contributing is very simple, especially this year. Just write a check (in $15 increments) to Wreaths Across America. Mail to PO Box 15750, Wilmington, NC 28408 or give to any Committee member or Bruce Patterson at the next meeting. Checks will be bundled and sent directly to WAA. If you prefer, you may contribute by credit card, by simply visiting the WAA web site, click the red Sponsor Wreath button, designate the Wilmington National Cemetery, and apply the CFCWRT code (NC0240P). All contributions are tax deductible (if you itemize) and gratefully appreciated by our community and this organization.

Book Review: The Boy Generals: George Custer, Wesley Merritt, and the Cavalry of the Army of the Potomac

Reviewed by Doug Crenshaw

By Adolfo Ovies
Savas Beatie, 2021

Adolfo Ovies has undertaken a massive project in writing a three-volume history of the relationship between George Armstrong Custer and Wesley Merritt. The Boy Generals is the first book of that study. Ovies spends considerable time separately discussing the backgrounds of each man, from their early years at West Point through their work as staff officers during the Peninsula Campaign. While both men enjoyed the perks of their positions, each eagerly sought a more active role in leading troops in combat.

The book doesn't get too far into their interpersonal relationship; that will likely be revealed in upcoming volumes. It does develop their characters: Custer is the flamboyant type, while Merritt is more reserved. But more than that, Ovies shows the transition in cavalry tactics through his study of each man. As Eric Wittenberg says in the foreword, "their personal relationship was a microcosm of the tension between the hussars and the dragoons." Custer was the "hussar" who preferred the shock and glory of the saber charge. However, with the advent of more modern weapons, the days of the charging hussar were numbered. Merritt was a "dragoon," a cavalryman who would dismount and use the repeating rifle to good effect.

Ovies' work is also more than a story about Custer and Merritt. It goes into detail about the development of the Federal cavalry, particularly during the Brandy Station to Gettysburg period. He also delves into the lack of effectiveness of leaders such as Philip St. George Cooke and Alfred Pleasonton.

The book is well-written and engaging; at times it's difficult to put down. The story of Brandy Station, Aldie, etc. are of interest, but it's Gettysburg where Ovies' writing really shines. There Merritt's role is disappointing. On July 3 Judson Kilpatrick ordered Merritt's and Elon Farnsworth's troopers to attack the Confederate right flank. Unfortunately, the attacks were not properly timed and were ineffective.

Custer's experience that day was quite different. While he had been ordered to move to the South field, David Gregg, a solid cavalry commander, countermanded the order and told him to stay on the East field. There they met J.E.B. Stuart's massed attack behind the Federal lines. Custer displayed his trademark personal bravery and hussar style, and the blue-coats stopped the Confederate attack. Ovies' writing on the actions of this day is riveting.

If you are interested in the story of the Federal cavalry, this book is for you. Following the development of the Federal cavalry will be interesting, as will the relationship between Merritt and Custer. I know I am eagerly waiting for the second volume.

Maj Gen George Meade

Brig Gen Edward Wild

1. Major General Philip Kearny - known as "The One Armed Devil" and called "the bravest man I ever knew" by LTG Winfield Scott, lived a life that not only straddled continents, but also the line between genius and insanity. In 1847 during the Battle of Churubusco Kearny's badly wounded left arm was amputated. He rehabilitated himself by re-learning to ride a horse by holding the reins with his teeth and his sword in his right hand.
2. Major General George Crook - He was assigned to the 4th US infantry as brevet second lieutenant, serving in California from 1852 to 1861. He served in Oregon and northern California, fighting against several Native American tribes. He was promoted to captain in 1860 and ordered east in 1861. With the beginning of the Civil War, he was made colonel of the 36th Ohio Volunteer Infantry. In February 1865, Crook was captured by Confederate raiders at Cumberland, Maryland, and held as a prisoner until exchanged on March 20th. After the Civil War, Crook was assigned to the 23rd US Infantry, on frontier duty in the Pacific Northwest, and served with distinction through the Indian Wars. He fought the Paiute in the rugged desert of eastern Oregon, pacifying the region within a year. When President Ulysses S. Grant sent him to Arizona to fight the Apache, he reorganized his command, employed Indian scouts, and put constant pressure on the roving war parties. In two years most of the Apache were on reservations. General William Sherman said the greatest Indian fighter of them all was General Crook.
3. Brigadier General Joseph King Fenno Mansfield - He was appointed to the U. S. military academy, where during part of the fourth year he acted as assistant professor of natural philosophy, and was graduated in 1822, standing second in a class of forty. At the battle of Antietam he fell mortally wounded early in the day while cheering on his troops in a charge.
4. Major General George Gordon Meade - Meade was a perfectionist with a volatile temper. His men gave him the nickname the "Old Snapping Turtle". All of the major Northern newspapers sent war correspondents to cover the Army of the Potomac. But when one Philadelphia Inquirer reporter published rumors that Meade had wanted to retreat after the Battle of the Wilderness, the outraged general expelled the offending journalist from camp. Stinging from the rebuke of one of their own, several other newsmen conspired to write only negative stories about Meade. Henceforth, Grant would get the credit for the Army of Potomac's victories while Meade's name only appeared in articles where reporters could blame him for defeats.
5. Brigadier General Edward Augustus Wild - When President Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation, Massachusetts Governor John Andrew called for the creation of an African American regiment, forming the 54th Massachusetts Infantry. Inspired by the success of the 54th, Andrew pushed for the creation of an entire brigade of United State Colored Troops to be led by the newly promoted Brigadier General Edward A. Wild. In April 1863 the "African Brigade" made its way to North Carolina to recruit local freedmen. While recruiting, Wild liberated hundreds of slaves from plantations. The Brigade's remarkable success in the Carolinas showcased the efficiency of United States Colored Troops to the nation. In early 1865, Wild's men performed picket duty along the Appomattox River. They were a part of the large force of black troops under Godfrey Weitzel that occupied the former Confederate national capital, Richmond, Virginia, holding that city through the end of the war. Wild's men were among those troops who witnessed the historic visit of President Abraham Lincoln to Richmond following the city's fall to the Union forces.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Admiral Raphael Semmes

Although Semmes originally was paroled with the rest of the army, he was later arrested and imprisoned at the New York City Navy Yard. Charges of treason, piracy, and ill-treatment of prisoners proved groundless, however, and Semmes was released after three months without having been brought to trial. After a good deal of behind-the-scenes political machinations, all charges were eventually dropped, and he was finally released on April 7, 1866. He was elected probate judge of Mobile County in May 1866 but prohibited from taking office by U.S. authorities. After Semmes's release, he worked as a professor of philosophy and literature at Louisiana State Seminary (now Louisiana State University). After brief employment as a professor he worked as the editor of the Memphis Daily Bulletin. Later, Semmes returned to Mobile, where he practiced law, delivered lectures, and wrote Memoirs of Service Afloat During the War Between the States.

He enjoyed Point Clear on Mobile Bay as often as he could, spending long summers there. He and the Catholic Bishop raced sailboats – theirs was naturally named ALABAMA and naturally they won – against the young Jesuit candidates for the priesthood, summering at Loyola Villa on Mobile Bay. He helped to start raising money to build the lovely heart pine summer church on Mobile Bay at Battles Wharf, Sacred Heart.

He died at Point Clear on August 30, 1877, after contracting food poisoning, and was buried in that city's Catholic Cemetery. Southerners in search of heroes of their "Lost Cause" found Raphael Semmes well suited to the role. The cavalier officer had inflicted considerable harm to the enemy, had fought a gallant duel, and after the war gained sympathy for his imprisonment by the federal government. A bronze statue of Semmes was dedicated in Mobile on June 27, 1900, to honor his contributions to the Confederate cause.

September Presentation: Ken Rutherford - Landmines in the Civil War

On September 9th, the CFCW Round Table will welcome James Madison University Professor Kenneth R. Rutherford, a prominent leader in the International Campaign to Ban Landmines, an organization that was awarded the 1997 Nobel Peace Prize.

The appearance of landmines in warfare has an ancient history but the “infernal machines” were first widely used in the Civil War. They were used almost exclusively by the Confederacy because the technology limited them generally to defensive uses and the Confederacy was on the strategic defensive throughout the war.

Mines were most often called “torpedoes” in the Civil War from the Latin “torpore” which meant to be stiff, torpid or inert. Robert Fulton, credited with the development of the first practical steamboats, first used the term to describe a device filled with gunpowder that could be exploded under a ship. Working for France, his devices were used to sink two ships in 1801 and 1805.

The use of mines in naval combat in the Civil War is much better known than their use on land. One of the most memorable quotes from the Civil War was the sentence credited to Admiral David Farragut who was reputed to have ordered his fleet to “Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead” at the Battle of Mobile Bay on August 5, 1864. The famous battle cry (or something close to it) was uttered immediately after the ironclad USS Tecumseh hit a floating mine and sank almost immediately with the loss of almost all of its 120-man crew.

By the end of the war, however, torpedoes had been widely used on land, especially to defend forts such as Fort McAllister near Savannah, and Battery Wagner where the African-American troops of the 54th Massachusetts lost heavily traversing a minefield before reaching the walls of the fort near Charleston.

Ken Rutherford’s passion for the subject began in 2011, when he read a historical marker in Virginia that incorrectly stated landmines were first deployed during the war in 1864. The weapon was actually first used in 1862 during the Peninsula Campaign. Rutherford dug deep into the history of landmines. He traces their development from before the war through the establishment of

October Presentation: Robert M. Browning, Jr. - Union Blockade

In October, we will welcome Robert M. Browning, Jr., Ph.D., to speak to us about the Union blockade. Dr. Browning, retired chief historian of the U.S. Coast Guard, is the acknowledged expert of the blockade. He has authored three “magisterial” volumes chronicling and analyzing the three most significant blockading squadrons of the U.S. Navy. He earned his Ph.D. in history from the University of Alabama and joined the Coast Guard in 1989, retiring in 2015.

Published in 1993, From Cape Charles to the Cape Fear: The North Atlantic Blockading Squadron during the Civil War chronicles the establishment of the crucial U.S. Navy blockade of the Confederate coast from the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay south to the mouth of the Cape Fear River. It was crucial to control this stretch of the coast and the inland waters of Chesapeake Bay, the James and other Virginia rivers and the North Carolina sound country. The Armed Forces Journal wrote of this volume: “Highly recommended for its convincing demonstration of the significant influence of naval power on the eastern campaigns—a theater that was thought of almost exclusively in terms of its land warfare.”

In 2002, Dr. Browning added Success is All That Was Expected: The South Atlantic Blockading Squadron during the Civil War to his history of the Union blockade.

Success Is All That Was Expected is a comprehensive operational history of the Union naval blockade that monitored the southern Atlantic coast from South Carolina to Florida during the American Civil War. Created in 1861 by the order of President Abraham Lincoln and charged with halting Confederate maritime commerce and closing Southern ports, the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron was the largest of the four Union coastal blockading squadrons for much of the conflict. This story covers the harrowing engagements between ships and forts, daring amphibious assaults, the battles between ironclad vessels, the harassment of Confederate blockade runners, and the incredible evolution of underwater warfare in the form of the CSS Hunley.

The world’s leading scholar of Union naval blockades during the Civil War, historian Robert Browning, reveals the squadron’s numerous tactical accomplishments. He also illustrates how its success was constantly hampered by indecisive leaders in Washington who failed to express their strategic vision as well as by reputation-conscious naval commanders who were reluctant to press the fight when the specter of failure loomed. Despite lost opportunities, unfulfilled expectations, and failures along the way, the bravery, sacrifice, and vigilance of these fighting men played a crucial role in the Union’s ultimate victory.

In Lincoln’s Trident: The West Gulf Blockading Squadron during the Civil War, Robert M. Browning Jr. continues his magisterial series about the Union’s naval blockade of the Confederacy during the American Civil War. Established by the Navy Department in 1862, the West Gulf Blockading Squadron operated from St. Andrews Bay (Panama City), Florida to the Rio Grande River. As with the Navy’s blockade squadrons operating in the Atlantic, the mission of the West Gulf Blockading Squadron was to cripple the South’s economy by halting imports and disrupting cotton exports, the South’s main source of hard currency. The blockade also limited transportation within the South and participated in combined operations with Union land forces.

The history of the squadron comprises myriad parts and players, deployed in a variety of missions across the thousand-mile-wide Western Theater. From disorganized beginnings, the squadron's leaders and sailors had to overcome setbacks, unfulfilled expectations, and lost opportunities. Browning masterfully captures the many variables that influenced the strategic choices of Navy commanders as they both doggedly pursued unchanging long-term goals as well as improvised and reacted to short-term opportunities.

Notable among its leaders was David Glasgow Farragut, believed by many to be America's greatest naval hero, who led the squadron through most of the war and the climactic Battle of Mobile Bay. Under his legendary leadership, the squadron not only sealed Confederate sea ports, but also made feints and thrusts up the Mississippi River as far north as Vicksburg, Mississippi.

Knowing the Navy's role in isolating the Confederate economy and preventing the movement of troops and supplies within the South is crucial to understanding of the outcomes of the Civil War, as well as the importance of naval power in military conflicts. With thirty-five maps and illustrations, Lincoln's Trident expounds upon an essential part of the Civil War as well as naval and American history.

"... This comprehensive work will stand as the definitive treatment of its topic. Recommended."

—CHOICE

"The herculean task of patrolling the one thousand miles of shoreline between St. Andrews Bay, Fla., and the Rio Grande fell to the West Gulf Blockading Squadron. In Lincoln's Trident, Browning presents what will surely be the definitive study for years to come, if not forever. The depth and breadth of his research is incredible. . . In truth, I don't know that I have ever seen a more impressive documentary foundation. . . How the blockade was maintained, and how under Farragut's superb leadership it helped shorten the war, are beautifully answered in this big and important book."

—Alabama Review

"The story of the Union blockade in our part of the world is beautifully and thoroughly told in a new book, Lincoln's Trident: The West Gulf Blockading Squadron during the Civil War by Robert Browning Jr., chief historian of the U.S. Coast Guard and author of several books."

—Mobile Bay

"It is an extremely well-researched, highly readable book about the West Gulf Squadron, it informs, it engages and it educates. It explains the problems of blockading and of fighting in rivers, it praises when due and criticizes when necessary. It complements Browning's other Civil War books on the blockading squadrons and is a welcome addition to the naval view of the war."

—The Mariner's Mirror

"In recent years, some of the most valuable contributions to the naval bookshelf have been authored by U.S. Coast Guard chief historian Robert Browning, whose Union blockading squadron studies remain unmatched in magnitude of research and content. Each new release in his series is a significant event in Civil War publishing and Browning's newest book, Lincoln's Trident: The West Gulf Blockading Squadron during the Civil War, is more than the qualitative equal of its North and South Atlantic squadron predecessors."

Volunteers wanted

Social media is a potent communications tool for an organization like our Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. We have an active Facebook presence and it has helped to raise awareness of our mission and our speakers, but MUCH MORE could be done.

Our Facebook page (perhaps it should be converted to a “group”) needs renovation. I follow many other Civil War Round Table groups around the country and I’m impressed by the way some round tables develop original content almost every day. Often, it’s something as simple as following a “Civil War Day by Day” blueprint to come up with ideas. Once the topic is chosen, a bit of Internet research can practically write the item.

Many round table Facebook groups rely on sharing content from other sources such as other round tables, the American Battlefield Trust, the Library of Congress, and others. We’ve made good use of this technique. Most round tables do a very good job of promoting upcoming meetings and we could do much better in that regard.

There’s a lot more than Facebook out there in the “universe” of social media: Instagram, Twitter, etc. If you’re interested in helping out, please contact Bill Jayne at jayne.bill@gmail.com or (910) 386-9203, or just bring it up at our next meeting. Thanks!

Union Major General Daniel E. Sickles was visiting the White House one night in December 1863 when there was a confrontation over Confederate sympathies of Mary Todd Lincoln's half-sister, Emilie Todd Helm. Sickles went up to the President's office to complain about “that rebel” in the White House. “Excuse me, General Sickles, my wife and I are in the habit of choosing our own guests,” responded President Lincoln. “We do not need from our friends either advice or assistance in the matter. Besides, ‘the little ‘rebel’ came because I ordered her to come, it was not of her own volition.”

Arming the Confederacy: Virginia's Mineral Contributions to the Confederate War Effort

by Robert C. Whisonant

The American Civil War is often seen as the first truly industrialized total war, one that consumed enormous amounts of human and material resources. But the two opponents were not evenly matched; the North had a preponderant share of raw materials, manufacturing ability, and population. On the eve of battle in April 1861, most of the mines, forges, and foundries in America were located in Union states. Some 90 per cent of the manufacturing capacity resided there—their factories made 97 percent of the firearms, 94 per cent of the cloth, 93 percent of the pig iron, and over 90 per cent of the boots and shoes. The disparity in the capability to make items necessary to the conduct of hostilities rested primarily on the North's possession of more mineral riches, most particularly iron and coal, the foundation of heavy industry.

Within the Confederacy, Virginia had long been the foremost mineral producer. The greatest concentration of this natural wealth lay in the mountainous southwestern quarter of the state where large deposits of saltpeter, lead, salt, iron, and coal had been exploited for over a century. In addition, mines in the region yielded some copper, zinc, gold, and silver from time to time. To be sure, other parts of the South had mineral resources, notably Alabama with important iron and coal operations; none, however, rivaled the richness and variety of the troves in Southwest Virginia. This did not go unnoticed by Federal strategists intent on bringing down the Confederate war machine.

Part IV ~ Coal

By the 1860s, coal was rapidly replacing wood to power the new iron machines essential to conflict, especially railroad locomotives and armored warships, and to fuel the factories that made such devices. Nowhere is the growing importance of coal better exemplified than by the March 9, 1862, clash between the USS Monitor and the CSS Virginia on the waters of Hampton Roads, Virginia. That benchmark day witnessed two historic firsts in naval engagements: both warships were covered with iron plate and both were propelled by coal-fired steam engines. Coal and iron were now inextricably linked as keys to the successful prosecution of warfare.

In mid-19th century America, one Northern state—Pennsylvania—possessed three-fourths of the world's known deposits of anthracite. This hot-burning, carbon-rich coal was extremely desirable for the high-temperature furnaces making pig iron. The anthracite-fired metal was much less expensive to make than that from the less efficient charcoal-burning furnaces more commonly used in the South. The abundance of anthracite had prompted a fundamental relocation of American iron manufacturing to Pennsylvania in the antebellum years. There the numbers of furnaces and forges grew rapidly and gave rise to a supporting network of railroads, all of which had the North's heavy industry well on the way to world-class status when open warfare finally erupted in 1861.

In contrast, the states that comprised the Confederacy, with the notable exception of Virginia, had failed to build up a strong coal mining industry to undergird iron making. Besides Virginia, sizeable accumulations of bituminous coal had been found in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama. The Midlothian coalfields, however, just west of Richmond were much more developed than any others in the South. Discovered around 1700, Midlothian coal became the first in America to undergo commercial-scale production in 1748. A century later, these mines were providing energy for the forges and foundries in the capital city and had even given rise to a small railroad network, similar to the much larger Pennsylvania system. During the war, the Midlothian fields produced over 100,000 tons of coal annually. Much of that output went directly to the Tredegar Iron Works, the heart of the Confederate industrial war effort.

Across the state from the Richmond fields, Southwest Virginia coal had been mined in Montgomery County near Blacksburg since the late 1700s. Known generally as the Valley coal fields, these beds are semi-anthracites, significantly higher in grade than the bituminous Midlothian coal. During the war, the Confederate government obtained coal from one of the Montgomery County mines and shipped it eastward to Richmond and Norfolk. The tradition has grown up that this coal was placed in the bunkers of the South's first armored warship and stoked her engines in the epic battle with the Monitor.

In summary, Virginia turned out massive amounts of niter, lead, salt, iron, and coal for the Confederacy. The state also contributed copper and zinc, though in much smaller quantities. Some historians have contended that one of the main reasons for shifting the Confederate capital from Montgomery, Alabama, to Richmond in 1861 was to ensure that Virginia's industrial might and vast natural resources would be staunchly defended to the very end, as indeed they were. Lee, Jackson, and the Army of Northern Virginia would go on to great glory and legendary status, but from the beginning, perceptive Confederate leaders knew that Virginia's mineral wealth and manufacturing based on those resources would be requisite to arming and sustaining the South in a prolonged, resource-intensive conflagration.

Vulnus sclopetarium

Fading from the vernacular, the Latin phrase vulnus sclopetarium is a quaint, mystifying, and fascinating term that is translated as gunshot wound. Trauma surgeons, military surgeons, and scholars of the medical aspects of the Civil War may be familiar with the term. Vulnus is easily deciphered from ancient Latin as wound, whereas the origin of sclopetarium proves more difficult to discern. Since there were no guns present in ancient Rome because guns were not invented until around the 13th century; hence, no Latin word for them existed. Sclopetarium is classified as neo-Latin, and deconstruction of the word reveals that sclopetaria means gun, but that destination was arrived at via a convoluted path. The suffix -arium implies a place. Remarriage of the two parts suggests that the gun is an instrument of injury, which is typically incurred on a battlefield.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Union Major General Daniel Sickles

Sickles served as military governor of the Carolinas from 1865 to 1867. President Andrew Johnson's views differed from those of Sickles, however, and the President relieved Sickles of his command. Sickles was mustered out of the service January 1, 1868, and was placed on the retired list with the full rank of Major General on April 14, 1869.

In spring 1869, President Grant appointed him United States Minister to Spain, a post which he retained until March 20, 1874. He continued his reputation as a ladies' man in the Spanish royal court. In 1871, Sickles remarried Senorita Carmina Creagh, the daughter of a Spanish Councilor of State. He converted to Catholicism, and fathered two children with her. After relinquishing his position as minister, Sickles continued to live abroad until 1880.

Sickles returned to New York alone and re-entered politics, living out the remainder of his life in New York City. He lived apart from his wife and children for almost thirty years.

In 1886, at the age of 67, Sickles was re-elected to Congress, where he made important legislative contributions to the preservation of the Gettysburg Battlefield, a site he often visited during his later years.

What has gotten lost amidst the negative Sickles portrayals is the often commendable work that he did in preserving the Gettysburg battlefield. Dan Sickles was a driving force in the early preservation and development of Gettysburg National Military Park. In addition to establishing the appropriate legislation in Congress, he was the leader in marking New York's positions and monuments on the battlefield. Few veterans contributed as much to memorializing the battlefield as he did. Many men played significant roles on the battlefield, and many were significant in developing the National Military Park as we know it today. But Sickles is unique in having made significant contributions both during and after the battle. For more in-depth information check out this link: Dan Sickles: Battlefield Preservationist

Sickles died of "cerebral hemorrhage" at New York City on May 3, 1914 at the age of 94. He is buried at Arlington National Cemetery.

VOLUME 3 ISSUE 7

August Presentation - Colby Stevens

On August 12 the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will welcome Colby Stevens, site manager of the Bentonville Battlefield State Historic Site.

The Battle of Bentonville, fought March 19-21, 1865, was the largest battle ever fought in the state of North Carolina, dwarfing the size of battles such as Fort Fisher, New Bern and the Revolutionary War battle of Guilford Courthouse. Approximately 80,000 troops clashed, yet, it's often overlooked because the end of the war was so near and it seems anticlimactic.

The situation was, indeed, desperate for the Confederacy. Union Major General William T. Sherman had led his superb, veteran army on an audacious and destructive march through Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina. Unsupported by a conventional supply line, his forces cut a swath through the heart of the rebellious southern states, brushing aside ineffectual attempts to stop them and overcoming daunting physical obstacles such as winter rains, flooded streams and swamps in their path. Of Sherman's 60,000-man army, his opponent Confederate General Joseph E. Johnston said there "was no such army since the days of Julius Caesar."

As the fourth spring of the terrible Civil War arrived, Sherman's force neared the strategic railroad junction of Goldsboro where he would be resupplied and reinforced by about 30,000 additional federal troops arriving from Wilmington and New Bern.

Colby Stevens

To mislead Confederate forces and to move with maximum speed, Sherman divided his force into two wings. In a desperate gamble, Johnston gathered his forces from as far away as Tennessee and launched his 20,000 men at one of Sherman's wings at a point at which the two wings were relatively far apart and hoped to defeat one wing and then turn against the other.

The story of the battle is compelling and there are many questions regarding tactical decisions and the ultimate outcome of the clash.

The state of North Carolina administers the Bentonville Battlefield Historic Site and has done an excellent job with almost 2,000 acres saved, including an historic house that played an important role in the battle, a visitors center and an expanding network of trails that add immensely to the observer's ability to interpret the battle.

According to the American Battlefield Trust, "thirty years ago, there were only a few acres of protected land at this incredibly important site, the last full-scale action of the Civil War. In hundreds of letters, diaries and reports, men on both sides bore witness to the ferocity of this three-day battle, saying things like 'all agree that it was one of the hottest places we were ever in.' " The Trust currently has a campaign underway to preserve even more land. Colby Stevens, is going to fill us in on not only the history of the battle but the current state of the historic site, including recent improvements. Colby grew up in the small town of Coats, NC, in Harnett County, about half way between Fayetteville and Raleigh. Cody went on to earn a Masters Degree in Public History from Appalachian State and quickly rose through the ranks of the NC Division of State Historic Sites, and came to Bentonville in March of 2019.

What is "Public History"? Public historians come in all shapes and sizes. They may be historical consultants, museum professionals, government historians, archivists, oral historians, cultural resource managers, curators, film and media producers, historical interpreters, historic preservationists, policy advisers, local historians, and community activists, among many, many other job descriptions. All share an interest and commitment to making history relevant and useful in the public sphere.

Although public historians can sometimes be teachers, public history is usually defined as history beyond the walls of the traditional classroom. It's a very challenging and important field of intellectual endeavor and we're very lucky to have some great public historians in our area, including Colby Stevens.

As a student of the Carolinas Campaign Colby Stevens has always been fascinated with history of the lower Cape Fear region. His interest in the Civil War began as a spectator at the 143rd Anniversary of the Battle of Averasboro. That initial interest, stoked by research, fueled by volunteer service at several historic sites, and funneled by earning a MA in Public History developed into a passion to learn and share the Civil War history of the Old North State. His first day at Bentonville, in March of 2019, was truly a homecoming. During grad school he served as the Buck Dunn Intern and after graduation returned as a temporary employee to the site. Before coming to Bentonville Battlefield he worked at Gov. Aycock Birthplace and House in the Horseshoe State Historic Sites. His time at Aycock Birthplace focused on 19th century farming and gardening. He spent his mornings working the land and evenings talking to the chickens/guineas/and sheep – thankfully they did not talk back! As manager of House in the Horseshoe he dove into the struggles and bloodshed of the Revolutionary backcountry. Both sites helped mold and grow his passion of NC history. With guidance from the staff, community, and Friends of Bentonville Battlefield he has striven to continue the drive of battlefield preservation at Bentonville. Bentonville is more than a battlefield, it's a story – a story one can connect with in the Harper House, experience on the walking trails, and witness from the trenches – it is a story that he is grateful to share, and one that must be told for generations to come.

June Presentation ~ Members Forum

Our June presentation was opened with a drum tattoo of the Star Spangled Banner by the 26th North Carolina Regiment Drummer David Jordan.

CFCWRT Member and former editor of The Runner Tim Winstead unraveled a fascinating story of his great-great uncle. A Confederate soldier from North Carolina, his relative, William Pearson, Company A, 55th North Carolina, was captured on the first day of Gettysburg, July 1, 1863. William H. Pearson never returned to North Carolina. With considerable sleuthing on Tim's part his resting place was located and restored.

Tim Winstead Tim is still researching his great-great-grandmother and her tireless efforts to free her sick husband from a Civil War POW Camp at Point Lookout MD.

Lower Cape Fear artist and CFCWRT member Jim Horton, discussed his search and discovery in the story of Elijah Hawke, his great-great-grandfather, who served in the 2nd Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery Regiment.

Echoes of Battle - Bentonville Battlefield

Nightfall, March 19, 1865, the first day of fighting is over. A Union stretcher bearer recalled that "all over the woods could be seen officers & men with pine torches in their hands seeking after some fallen comrade or friend to take him to a hospital if alive & bury him if dead..."

This scene and others will be recreated on the evening of October 23, 2021 during "Echoes of Battle," a one of a kind program depicting the chaos and confusion of the early morning and nighttime on March 19 in Bentonville. Join us for a nighttime wagon ride and a candlelit walk through the woods featuring vignettes performed by Civil War reenactors. The program takes place from 7:00pm to 10:30pm. Tickets will go on sale October 1 for Friends of Bentonville Battlefield members only. Go to www.fobb.net for information about becoming a member. Remaining tickets will be sold to the public starting on October 11. A link for ticket information will be posted at www.fobb.net. Tickets for the night tours are extremely limited and cost $20 each. As this is a time-limited, one-night only program, we will sell out of tickets. Warning: This program will simulate combat trauma and may not be suitable for all audiences.

...The Rest of the Story

Adelbert Ames was the great-grandfather of George Plimpton. John F. Kennedy, through George Plimpton, is indirectly responsible for a full-length biography of General Ames. In Profiles in Courage, Kennedy relied on Reconstruction-era historical texts to produce a brief but misleading, false, and devastating portrait of Ames's administration of Mississippi in his profile of Mississippi Senator Lucius Q.C. Lamar. Ames's daughter Blanche Ames Ames, a formidable figure in Massachusetts, bombarded the then-senator with letters complaining about the depiction, and continued her barrage after Kennedy entered the White House. President Kennedy then turned to his friend Plimpton to tell Blanche, Plimpton's grandmother, that she was "interfering with state business." Her response was to write her own book about her father, Adelbert Ames, in 1964.

Trivia Questions

1. What Virginia-born artillerist named his four cannons Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John?
2. Who was the last surviving full-rank Civil War General?
3. In battle, while cavalry and artillery relied on buglers for directive signals, whom did the infantry rely on for directions of maneuvers?
4. What state provided the Union with only about 500 fighting men, who served in the Second Massachusetts Cavalry?
5. At what age did future rear admiral David D. Porter, USN, go to sea?

Did you know...?

Wealthy Ross Winans of Baltimore, a strong backer of the Confederate cause, decided to invest part of his fortune in what became perhaps the most unusual heavy weapon in the era. His patented steam cannon attracted the interested attention of Abraham Lincoln. Reputedly, Lincoln offered amnesty to Winans in exchange for the plans from which his steam cannon was built. When it was assembled, trained horses bolted at the sight of it, and strong men shuddered. But there's no record that it produced a single battlefield casualty.

Arming the Confederacy: Virginia's Mineral Contributions to the Confederate War Effort

by Robert C. Whisonant

The American Civil War is often seen as the first truly industrialized total war, one that consumed enormous amounts of human and material resources. But the two opponents were not evenly matched; the North had a preponderant share of raw materials, manufacturing ability, and population. On the eve of battle in April 1861, most of the mines, forges, and foundries in America were located in Union states. Some 90 per cent of the manufacturing capacity resided there—their factories made 97 percent of the firearms, 94 per cent of the cloth, 93 percent of the pig iron, and over 90 per cent of the boots and shoes. The disparity in the capability to make items necessary to the conduct of hostilities rested primarily on the North's possession of more mineral riches, most particularly iron and coal, the foundation of heavy industry.

Within the Confederacy, Virginia had long been the foremost mineral producer. The greatest concentration of this natural wealth lay in the mountainous southwestern quarter of the state where large deposits of saltpeter, lead, salt, iron, and coal had been exploited for over a century. In addition, mines in the region yielded some copper, zinc, gold, and silver from time to time. To be sure, other parts of the South had mineral resources, notably Alabama with important iron and coal operations; none, however, rivaled the richness and variety of the troves in Southwest Virginia. This did not go unnoticed by Federal strategists intent on bringing down the Confederate war machine.

Part IV ~ Iron

Iron, a mainstay of warfare for thousands of years, became even more indispensable in the Civil War. Railroads, ordnance, armor plate for the new ironclad warships, and a host of tools and machines vital to both civilians and the military required huge quantities of iron and steel. When war came, the Richmond-Petersburg complex of iron and steel mills, highly dependent on the state's iron and coal resources, constituted nearly all of the Southern heavy industry. The crown jewel was the gigantic Tredegar Iron Works in the capital city, the only operation in the South that could make the big guns and iron plate needed immediately. It was a Tredegar mortar that lofted the signal shot opening the bombardment of Fort Sumter. Of the 48 pieces that shelled the fort, this company made at least 20. By the end of hostilities, Tredegar had manufactured almost half of the Confederate cannon and 90 per cent of the artillery ammunition.

Although not as well developed as Virginia's, some iron industry did exist in other Confederate states as the war got underway. Alabama in particular possessed considerable reserves of ore, and furnaces and forges had sprung up at Selma and elsewhere across the state in the antebellum years. In the course of the conflict, the Alabama iron operations expanded swiftly and managed to overtake the Virginia producers. In the end, the two states generated about 90 per cent of the Confederate iron. Smaller iron works were located in five other Southern states – North and South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Mississippi.

Though the domestic iron output increased during the war, the Confederacy never had enough. The amounts necessary just for the railroads completely overwhelmed the production system. To maintain and extend the lines would use an estimated 50,000 tons of rolled steel a year, yet the combined capacity of all the Southern furnaces totaled only about 20,000 tons a year. Moreover, the Confederate tracks and rolling stock began the war much inferior to the North's, and soon the persistent lack of iron made simply keeping the trains running the most pressing problem. As early as 1862, work crews routinely ripped out rails from smaller lines to replace those in the more valuable arteries. The last rail ever made in the Confederacy had been manufactured the year before.

Iron making began with the smelting of ore in charcoal-fired furnaces to produce the refined bars or "pigs" for shipment to the larger forges and foundries such as the Tredegar Works. The exact numbers and locations of the Southern furnaces are not known, but a detailed Niter and Mining Bureau report in January 1865 noted that the national government operated seven furnaces in 1864 – three in Virginia and two each in Alabama and Texas. Forty-five more privately-owned furnaces were in blast at one time or another that year, 20 of them in Virginia and nine in Alabama. About 80 per cent of the Virginia furnaces lay in the western mountains where they remained relatively safe from harm until late in the contest.

No Union campaign ever targeted the western Virginia iron furnaces as the single operational goal. Like the niter caves, the furnace sites were too numerous and too scattered to be the primary focus of an enemy offensive. Regardless, Federal raiders often found them when they penetrated deeper into the remote highlands as the war went on. In summer 1864, Union Major General David Hunter led a force into the southern Shenandoah Valley, hoping to take Staunton and then attack Lynchburg, an important industrial and rail center. Though driven away from Lynchburg, the Northern soldiers discovered three of the biggest and best Tredegar-owned furnaces during the foray which they reduced to smoldering ruins. In December 1864, General George Stoneman invaded Southwest Virginia to assault Saltville, the lead mines near Wytheville, and the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. His troopers came upon and pillaged several iron operations.

Brig Gen Wm Pendleton

Brig Gen Adelbert Ames

Rear Adm David D Porter

1. Brigadier General William Nelson Pendleton, an ordained Episcopal rector. William Nelson Pendleton was an American teacher, Episcopal priest, and soldier. He served as a Confederate general during the American Civil War, noted for his position as Gen. Robert E. Lee's chief of artillery for most of the conflict. After the war, Pendleton returned to his priestly duties and also wrote religious materials. Camp Pendleton in Virginia Beach, Virginia, is named in his honor.
2. Adelbert Ames, born in Maine in 1835 and dies in Florida in 1933. Adelbert C. Ames was an American sailor, soldier, and politician who served with distinction as a Union Army general during the American Civil War. A Radical Republican, he was military governor, U.S. Senator, and civilian governor in Reconstruction-era Mississippi.
3. Drummers. In the 19th century, drums were used as invaluable communication devices in camps and on battlefields. The drummers in both the Union and Confederate armies were required to learn dozens of drum calls, and the playing of each call would tell the soldiers they were required to perform a specific task.
4. California. California's involvement in the American Civil War included sending gold east to support the war effort, recruiting volunteer combat units to replace regular U.S. Army units sent east, in the area west of the Rocky Mountains, maintaining and building numerous camps and fortifications, suppressing secessionist activity (many of these secessionists went east to fight for the Confederacy) and securing the New Mexico Territory against the Confederacy.
5. Ten. Porter began naval service as a midshipman at the age of 10 years under his father, Commodore David Porter, on the frigate USS John Adams. For the remainder of his life, he was associated with the sea.

The Rev. William N. Pendleton became a minister of Grace Episcopal Church in Richmond, VA in 1853 and retained that post until his death 30 years later. When the war broke out, he asked for and was granted a leave of absence. Without military experience, he was elected captain of the Rockbridge Artillery, where he named the four cannons of his battery Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

Each of the four evangelists roared so effectively that the pastor on leave, soon made a colonel, was chosen by Joseph E. Johnston to serve as his chief of artillery.

*After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?Union Major General Lewis Wallace

Major General
Lewis Wallace

Following President Lincoln's death, Wallace was appointed to the military commission that investigated the Lincoln assassination conspirators. The commission was dissolved in June 1865. In mid-August 1865, Wallace was appointed head of an eight-member military commission that investigated the conduct of Henry Wirz, the Confederate commandant in charge of the South's Andersonville prison camp.

Wallace returned to Indiana in 1867 to practice law, but he turned to politics. Wallace made two unsuccessful bids for a seat in Congress (in 1868 and 1870), and supported Republican presidential candidate Rutherford B. Hayes in the 1876 election. As a reward for his political support, Hayes appointed Wallace as governor of the New Mexico Territory, where he served from August 1878 to March 1881.

Wallace was involved in efforts to resolve New Mexico's Lincoln County War, a contentious and violent disagreement among the county's residents, and tried to end a series of Apache raids on territorial settlers. Wallace resigned from his duties as territorial governor in March 1881, and waited for a new political appointment.

His next assignment came in March 1881, when Republican president James A. Garfield appointed Wallace to an overseas diplomatic post in Constantinople, Turkey, as U.S. Minister to the Ottoman Empire. Wallace became a trusted friend of Sultan Abdul Hamid II. When a crisis developed between the Turkish and British governments over control of Egypt, Wallace served as an intermediary between the sultan and Lord Dufferin, the British ambassador. Although Wallace's efforts were unsuccessful, he earned respect for his efforts and a promotion in the U.S. diplomatic service. Wallace remained in this post until 1885.

The election of Grover Cleveland, the Democratic candidate for president, ended Wallace's political appointment.

Wallace confessed in his autobiography that he took up writing as a diversion from studying law. Although he wrote several books, Wallace is best known for his historical adventure story, Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ, which established his fame as an author.

In 1843, Wallace began writing his first novel, The Fair God, but it was not published until 1873. The popular historical novel, with Cortez's conquest of Mexico as its central theme, was based on William H. Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico. Wallace's book sold seven thousand copies in its first year. Its sales continued to rise after Wallace's reputation as an author was established with the publication of subsequent novels.

Ben-Hur made Wallace a wealthy man and established his reputation as a famous author. Only 2,800 copies were sold in the first seven months after its release, but the book became popular among readers around the world. By 1886, it was earning Wallace about $11,000 in annual royalties (equivalent to $290,000 in 2015 dollars), and provided Wallace's family with financial security. By 1889, Harper and Brothers had sold 400,000 copies and the book had been translated into several languages.

In 1900, Ben-Hur became the best-selling American novel of the 19th century. At the time of Ben-Hur's one hundredth anniversary in 1980, it had "never been out of print" and had been adapted for the stage and several motion pictures. One historian, Victor Davis Hanson, has argued that Ben-Hur drew from Wallace's life, particularly his experiences at Shiloh, and the damage it did to his reputation. The book's main character, Judah Ben-Hur, accidentally causes injury to a high-ranking Roman commander, for which he and his family suffer tribulations and calumny.

Wallace wrote subsequent novels and biographies, but Ben-Hur remained his most important work. Wallace considered The Prince of India; or, Why Constantinople Fell (1893) as his best novel. Wallace was writing his autobiography when he died in 1905. His wife Susan completed it with the assistance of another author from Crawfordsville. It was published posthumously in 1906.

Wallace continued to write after his return from Turkey. He also patented several of his own inventions, built a seven-story apartment building in Indianapolis, The Blacherne, and drew up plans for a private study at his home in Crawfordsville. Wallace remained active in veterans' groups, including writing a speech for the dedication of the battlefield at the Chickamauga.

Wallace, seventy-seven years old, died at home in Crawfordsville on February 15, 1905. Wallace is buried in Crawfordsville Oak Hill Cemetery.

Following Wallace's death, the State of Indiana commissioned the sculptor Andrew O'Connor to create a marble statue of Wallace dressed in a military uniform for the National Statuary Hall Collection in the U.S. Capitol. The statue was unveiled during a ceremony held on January 11, 1910. Wallace is the only novelist honored in the hall. A bronze copy of the statue is installed on the grounds of Wallace's study in Crawfordsville.

May Presentation - Salmon P. Chase by Walter Stahr

Biographer sheds light on the relationship between Lincoln and Salmon P. Chase, one of the President's "Team of Rivals"

Walter Stahr

Approximately two dozen members and friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table tuned in via Zoom on Thursday evening, May 13, to hear award-winning biographer Walter Stahr talk about his upcoming biography of Salmon P. Chase and the relationship between Lincoln and his ambitious Secretary of the Treasury.

Coming to us from California, Walter talked a little bit about the similarities between Lincoln and Chase—both lawyers, both Midwesterners, both defended fugitive slaves and were in favor of rights for black Americans. But there were also major differences: Chase was a well-educated member of a distinguished family with New England roots and Lincoln, of course, was self-educated and a son of the frontier.

Mr. Stahr's biographies rely greatly on period writings rather than secondary sources such as memoirs written, in many cases, decades after the events. As a former governor and senator of Ohio and a longtime leader of the abolitionist movement, Chase was seen as a favorite for the Republican nomination in 1860, as was New Yorker W.H. Seward. It was realized, however, that in order for the Republican nominee to win the general election, he would have to carry almost all of the northern states. Both Chase and Seward were seen as "too radical" on slavery to sweep the northern vote and the nomination went to Lincoln.

Rather than sulk, however, both Seward and Chase campaigned energetically for Lincoln and both became extremely successful cabinet members, contributing greatly to the success of the Union. As Secretary of the Treasury, Chase led and administered bond drives and the establishment of a national bank that controlled the flow of funds necessary to pursue the massive war effort. Before the Civil War and Chase's term in office, there was no single currency in the country. States and banks issued their own currency, and the chaos of such a system could not support a successful war effort. Confederate efforts to finance the war effort varied by state and were largely ineffective, leading to runaway inflation.

Chase also became involved directly in some military affairs, including the celebrated expedition to Hampton Roads, Virginia, in May 1862 as McClellan finally began moving the Army of the Potomac up the Peninsula and after the momentous draw between the ironclad monsters, the USS Monitor and the CSS Virginia (aka Merrimack).

Lincoln led a group including Chase and Secretary of War Stanton to the war zone and, when McClellan was found to be "too busy" to speak to the Commander in Chief, the political leaders took matters into their own hands, quickly inducing Major General John E. Wool (like Lt. Gen. Winfield Scott, a veteran of the War of 1812) and Rear Admiral Louis Goldsborough to move on Norfolk, home port of the Virginia.

Chase and Lincoln quickly found landing places near Norfolk, on the southern shore of Hampton Roads, and ordered Wool to move several thousand Union soldiers across the waterway to gain control of the navy yard and the city of Norfolk. Union Brigadier General Egbert Viele, who accompanied the presidential party, found the various regiments of the landing party in some disarray and Chase took control. The Treasury Secretary negotiated the surrender of the city in a meeting with the mayor and city council but not before retreating confederates burned much of the city and destroyed the navy yard much more thoroughly than the Union had done the job the year before when Confederates took over.

Rhetorically posing the question of whether Chase and Lincoln were political rivals, Walter said the answer was that the usual view of their rivalry was “only partly true.” In the “Cabinet Crisis” of December 1862, after the disastrous Union defeat at Fredericksburg, the Republican senatorial delegation worked to effect a reorganization of the cabinet, focusing their aim on Secretary of State Seward, who was portrayed as insufficiently abolitionist and somehow holding a mysterious influence over the president. Chase had given many senators to believe that there was a lack of unity within the cabinet and that Seward was at fault. Seward submitted his resignation to Lincoln on the grounds of removing himself as a distraction and an obstacle to the war effort. Lincoln refused to accept it. A subsequent meeting at the White House brought together the leading senators and members of the cabinet except for Seward. Lincoln directed the meeting to a point at which Chase was put on the spot and failed to back up his previous suggestion that Seward was a negative influence. Soon after, Chase told Lincoln that he had written his resignation and Lincoln quickly told Chase to give him the piece of paper. Lincoln asked both cabinet secretaries to withdraw their resignations and go back to their work. Both did.

Nonetheless, many “radical” Republicans favored Chase’s approach to abolition and black rights and, as the war dragged on through 1863 and 1864 a “boomlet” developed favoring Chase as the Republican nominee in 1864. Lincoln adroitly maneuvered through the shoals of the political crisis and by summer had been renominated. Once again, however, there arose difficulties in the relationship between the President and the Treasury Secretary and Chase again submitted his resignation. This time, Lincoln accepted it.

Still, however, Chase supported the party and the president and campaigned in the fall. When an opening occurred with the death of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Lincoln nominated Chase and he was quickly confirmed.

Reconstruction of the Union loomed as the war rapidly came to a victorious end for the Lincoln government and Chase was in a powerful position to help achieve quick and effective reunification. Tragically, of course, the assassin John Wilkes Booth once again plunged the nation into chaos.

Chase was a strong supporter of universal suffrage for all men, both black and former Confederates (except for some high-ranking officials) and, Mr. Stahr related an interesting story about Chief Justice Chase accompanying a Treasury Department fact-finding mission to southern ports and how he visited Wilmington in May of 1865, meeting with noted North Carolina anti-secessionist Bartholomew Moore and black leaders including Johnathan Gibbs, a Dartmouth College graduate. Although Chase worked to influence Lincoln’s successor, Andrew Johnson, he was unsuccessful. Johnson’s reconstruction program effectively disenfranchised blacks.

We thank Walter Stahr for his masterful presentation and his gracious response to the many questions from his interested audience. Much more of the story of the fascinating figure of Salmon P. Chase remains to be told in Mr. Stahr’s book, which will soon be available.

Did you know...?

When the Civil War broke out after the shots on Ft Sumter on April 12, 1861 many thought the war would start and be over in a matter of months. However, when the Union and Confederate armies showed up to fight the First Battle of Bull Run (Manassas) on July 21, 1861, they began fighting on retired Virginia militia Major Wilbur McLean's farm.

Concerned for his family's safety, he moved them to a place in Virginia called Appomattox Court House. Little did he know that four years later, General Robert E. Lee would surrender to General Ulysses S. Grant at Appomattox Court House on April 9, 1865, and would choose McLean's parlor to sign the surrender. Unable to escape the war it can be said that the Civil War started in McLean's backyard in 1861 and ended in his parlor in 1865.

The Confederacy's Most Modern General by Harold M. Knudsen

The Civil War is often called the first “modern war.” The Civil War spawned a host of “firsts” and is often looked upon as a precursor to the larger and more deadly 20th century conflicts. Confederate General James Longstreet made some of the most profound modern contributions to the art of war. Retired Lieutenant Colonel Harold M. Knudsen explains what he did and how he did it in The Confederacy's Most Modern General: James Longstreet and the American Civil War.

Initially, commanders on both sides extensively utilized Napoleonic tactics that were obsolete because of the advent of the rifled musket and better artillery. Some professional army officers, like Union Generals U. S. Grant and William T. Sherman, worked to improve tactics, operations, and strategies. On the Confederate side, a careful comparison of Longstreet's body of work in the field to modern military doctrine reveals several large-scale innovations. He understood early that the tactical defense was generally dominant over the offense, which was something few grasped in 1862. His thinking demonstrated a clear evolution beginning on the field at First Manassas in July 1861. It developed through the bloody fighting of 1862, and culminated in the brilliant defensive victory at Fredericksburg that December. The lethality with which his riflemen mowed down repeated Union assaults hinted at what was to come in World War I. Longstreet's ability to launch and control powerful offensives was on display at Second Manassas in August 1862, and his offensive plan at Chickamauga in Georgia the following September was similar, if not the forerunner to, World War II tactical-level German armored tactics. Other areas show progressive applications with artillery, staff work, force projection, and operational-level thinking.

LTC Knudsen's thoughtful study ties comparatives from the Napoleonic era through World War II and beyond back to the Civil War, and in doing so, demonstrates that Longstreet evolved his thinking across several battles, and how his innovations appeared in future wars. Longstreet was not the sole agent of all modern change away from the Napoleonic method, but his contributions were very significant, executed on a large scale, and demonstrated that he was a modern thinker unparalleled in the Confederate Army.

Unfortunately, many Civil War students have a one-sided view of Longstreet. His legacy fell victim to bitter postwar Southern politics when “Old Pete” supported Reconstruction bills, accepted postings with the Grant Administration, and dared to criticize General Robert E. Lee. His military record was attacked by Lost Cause proponents who viewed his politics and actions as scandalous. More modern writers have taken up the cudgel with their pens, skewing the general's legacy.

The Confederacy's Most Modern General draws heavily on 20th Century Army doctrine, field training, staff planning, command, and combat experience, and is the first serious treatment of Longstreet's generalship vis a vis modern warfare. Not everyone will agree with LTC's Knudsen's conclusions, but it will now be impossible to write about the general without referencing this important study.

by Robert C. Whisonant

The American Civil War is often seen as the first truly industrialized total war, one that consumed enormous amounts of human and material resources. But the two opponents were not evenly matched; the North had a preponderant share of raw materials, manufacturing ability, and population. On the eve of battle in April 1861, most of the mines, forges, and foundries in America were located in Union states. Some 90 per cent of the manufacturing capacity resided there—their factories made 97 percent of the firearms, 94 per cent of the cloth, 93 percent of the pig iron, and over 90 per cent of the boots and shoes. The disparity in the capability to make items necessary to the conduct of hostilities rested primarily on the North's possession of more mineral riches, most particularly iron and coal, the foundation of heavy industry.

Within the Confederacy, Virginia had long been the foremost mineral producer. The greatest concentration of this natural wealth lay in the mountainous southwestern quarter of the state where large deposits of saltpeter, lead, salt, iron, and coal had been exploited for over a century. In addition, mines in the region yielded some copper, zinc, gold, and silver from time to time. To be sure, other parts of the South had mineral resources, notably Alabama with important iron and coal operations; none, however, rivaled the richness and variety of the troves in Southwest Virginia. This did not go unnoticed by Federal strategists intent on bringing down the Confederate war machine.

Part III ~ Salt

Of all Virginia's mineral contributions, perhaps none held more importance to both the general population and the military forces of the Confederacy than salt. Early in the conflict, Union Major General William Tecumseh Sherman branded salt as a fundamental strategic resource: "Salt is eminently contraband, because of its use in curing meats, without which armies cannot be subsisted." Besides preserving meat and other perishables, salt is essential in the human diet and in the Civil War, every soldier's ration included it. Livestock required salt as well; a lack of it apparently fostered an outbreak of hoof and mouth disease among the cavalry horses of Lee's army in 1862. Treating animal hides to make leather involved salt. Armies of that day used tremendous amounts of leather for soldiers' shoes and accessories, and for horses' bridles and saddles. Salt had a host of other applications in manufacturing pharmaceuticals and other chemical compounds.

In Civil War times, salt production typically involved one of three methods: evaporation from saline springs or wells (the most common), boiling down sea water or water from salt lakes, and mining ancient layers of rock salt. At the outbreak of fighting, the Southern states had five noteworthy salt operations, these being on the Kanawha River near Charleston, Virginia (after June 1863, West Virginia); along Goose Creek in southeastern Kentucky; in Clarke County in southwestern Alabama; at Avery Island in southern Louisiana; and, most prolific of all, in southwestern Virginia at Saltville. The South lost the Goose Creek works almost immediately after the war commenced, as well as those on the Kanawha. The fall of Vicksburg on July 4, 1863, denied all of the extensive Louisiana sources to the eastern Confederacy. Thus, by mid-summer 1863, even though the Alabama brines still produced salt in the Gulf Coast area, Saltville was by far the major supplier to the states east of the Mississippi.

Native Americans took salt from the Saltville Valley's abundant briny springs and ponds for thousands of years before white settlers began commercial endeavors in the late 1700s. In subsequent decades, entrepreneurs dug numerous wells to bring more brines to the surface where they were heated in iron kettles atop brick furnaces to precipitate the salt. By 1860, Saltville had grown to be one of the three largest salt-making centers in the United States. (The Kanawha works in northwestern Virginia and the massive installations at the Onondaga springs near Syracuse, New York, were the other two.)

In late summer of 1861, Stuart, Buchanan, and Company, the prime Saltville enterprise, negotiated a contract with the national government to provide salt "to and for the uses of the Confederate State armies." Within the next year, Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, South Carolina, Florida, and Virginia all worked out separate agreements with local businesses to procure the mineral or erected their own operations. At the peak of wartime production, the physical plant at Saltville included as many as 300 buildings containing 38 furnaces and 2,600 kettles. Salt output reached a maximum of four million bushels (200 million pounds) in 1864.

Union sorties into the region to demolish the salt works began early, yet none reached Saltville before the fall of 1864. That changed on October 2, when a Federal unit from Kentucky that included a regiment of black soldiers, the 5th United States Colored Cavalry (5th USCC), stormed the defenses at Saltville only to be turned back. The Northerners withdrew in haste, leaving many of their wounded on the battlefield. The next day, Confederates sought out and shot the helpless still-living men of the 5th USCC left behind in what became known as the Saltville Massacre; a few whites were executed as well. The number of blacks murdered is in dispute, but something between 50 and 150 is commonly cited. Another Union command returned on December 20, broke through the defenders, and devastated much, though not all, of the salt works. A few weeks later, Saltville was up and running again, this time making salt until peace returned.

Although salt shortages happened from time to time during the struggle, thanks to Saltville more than any other source, the scarcity was never severe enough to cause serious problems for the military. Confederate Commissary General Lucius Bellinger Northrop noted in January 1865 that "...the supply of salt has always been sufficient and the Virginia works were able to meet demand for the army." At the war's conclusion, Saltville had provided approximately two-thirds of the Confederate salt.

North Carolina Museum of History

Raleigh, North Carolina

Far from home, North Carolinians played a pivotal role in many of the actions in Virginia's Shenandoah Valley during the Civil War, from Stonewall Jackson's early campaigns to the epic fights of the 1864 Shenandoah Campaign. On Saturday, October 23, 2021, the Shenandoah Valley Battlefields Foundation will present a Civil War conference, "Tar Heels in the Valley": North Carolina Soldiers in the Shenandoah Valley, that will look back on the experiences of those North Carolina soldiers.

Held at the North Carolina Museum of History in Raleigh, North Carolina, the conference will focus on famous personalities such as Gen. Stephen D. Ramseur, the experiences and hardships of everyday foot soldiers, and battles such as Harper's Ferry, Second Winchester, and Cedar Creek. Speakers will include Keith Bohannon, Michael Hardy, Scott Mingus, and Brian Steel Wills.

Cost: $30; Pre-registration is required.

1. Pap or Uncle George

"Under the shadow of a spreading oak, near Snodgrass house, is a grizzled soldier, calm, silent, immovable, who resolves to hold the field until night comes ... hemmed in by appalling ruin yet supreme above disaster ... The Rock of Chickamauga."

J. S. Ostrander

Two September Days

Fondly given by his men. His men trusted him not to needlessly risk their lives in no-hope attacks (unlike many other union generals who were pressured into doing some tragic things). His men knew he would have the odds in their favor with superior planning, tactics, and resources in place, and having done so, he would expect each of them to do their utmost to defeat the enemy and help end the war. This resulted in some spectacular actions such as the spontaneous charge up Missionary Ridge. Only a Thomas inspired army could pull off such a feat of arms. Thomas resisted Grant's urging for an early attack until he knew that Hooker's men were close to flanking Bragg's position from Lookout Mountain. With one eye on Hooker and seeing the daring frontal attack pressed home with vigor, the Confederate line dissolved. A similar attack was not successfully accomplished by any other army - North or South. At Nashville he was quite willing to be fired rather than send his men out to attack during an ice storm which would have needlessly raised the number of casualties and might lead to an inconclusive battle. He hated inconclusive battles because he knew that it only meant that another battle would need to be fought with additional loss of life.

The Rock of Chickamauga

The first usage of this term may have come from General James A. Garfield (future president). Garfield, after he had joined Thomas on Horseshoe Ridge, dispatched a message informing Rosecrans in Chattanooga that Thomas was fighting off the Confederates and was "standing like a rock". Reprinted in newspapers all over the country, the message made a national hero of Thomas, who would be known for the rest of his life as the "Rock of Chickamauga."

Also, Secretary of War Stanton later wrote: "You stood like a rock and that stand gives you fame which will grow brighter as the ages go by."

"There is nothing finer in history than Thomas at Chickamauga."

2. Johnny Shiloh or The Drummer Boy of Chickamauga

Johnny was a tag-along drummer boy and after proving his worth, he was enrolled as a volunteer soldier in the 22nd Michigan. He served as a courier and was wounded twice. He served ably at the Battle of Chickamauga where the 22nd Michigan fought well in the rear guard action. He was captured with his regiment but was able to escape. He later claimed he killed a Confederate officer during that action which was probably not true.

In 1871 President Grant approved his application for a commission. By 1903 he was a colonel and assistant quartermaster general. He retired as a major general in 1916 and died in 1937.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Union Major General George H. Thomas

President Andrew Johnson asks the Senate to confirm Thomas to the rank of brevet Lt. General. President Johnson wants to replace U.S. Grant as Commander-in-Chief of the Army because Grant is openly running for president.

Johnson was the War Governor of Tennessee and knew Thomas well and held him in high regard. He was prepared to promote Thomas over Generals Grant, Sherman, Meade and Sheridan. Thomas, ever the honorable gentleman and soldier, quickly asks the President to recall the nomination as he knows it is inspired primarily by politics.

With the end of the Civil War, Thomas continued in military service, commanding the Department of the Cumberland through 1869 and leading the fight against the campaign of terror and intimidation of the newly formed Ku Klux Klan. In 1869, Thomas was transferred to San Francisco to command the Division of the Pacific.

General Thomas dies of a stroke in San Francisco on March 28, 1870, on duty at his headquarters of the Military Division of the Pacific. A very private person, he had no intention of leaving memoirs, but was content that in the fullness of time, history would do him justice. He was buried in his wife's hometown of Troy, New York with full military honors.

From Benjamin F. Scribner, How Soldiers Were Made:

The General frequently rallied me upon my large and increasing family, and said, "I think you might name one of your children for me." So when my next son was born I wrote to him announcing that "George Henry Thomas Scribner has this day reported in person for duty." The General was at Washington, and by return of mail I received a document bearing all the official marks of special orders, with the following extract: "George Henry Thomas Scribner having reported in person for duty, is hereby assigned to the care of his mother until further orders."

<https://generalthomas.com>

This web site is dedicated to the life of Major General George H. Thomas. He commanded the Army of the Cumberland after the Battle of Chickamauga, and he was one of the few great generals of the American Civil War. However today, for a number of reasons, General Thomas is relatively unknown to the general public. This website will address these issues.

Thomas was a Southerner and a career soldier who, at great personal loss, stood by the Union. George Henry Thomas was a man of honor and courage in a time of great turmoil. His story deserves to be known by future generations of Americans.

Civil War Phrases

Hell-fire stew - A blend of everything available and edible (and sometimes inedible!)

Hellhound - A Confederate term for a Northern gunboat.

Here's your mule - A nonsense-slang expression used by Union troops to mean "We've been here."

Hunky - Fine, in good condition. This term became a popular slang expression just as the war was beginning. The word evolved from English dialectal hunk ("home base" in children's games), itself from Dutch honk ("home base"). Late in the war, or just after the war, the term expanded to hunky-dory.

Join us on the evening of May 13th for a Zoom presentation by Walter Stahr on "Chase and Lincoln."

Walter Stahr was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1957, grew up in Arcadia, California, and went away for high school, to the Phillips Exeter Academy in New Hampshire. Then it was back west, to Stanford University, then back east, to Harvard, where he studied law and public policy.

After graduating from Harvard Law School in 1982, Stahr worked in international law for several years, including a posting to Hong Kong. He then spent time working in the Securities and Exchange Commission before returning to international law on behalf of investment companies.

In 2008, he and his family, including two children, moved to Exeter, New Hampshire, where he began working on his Civil War biographies while his wife taught mathematics. In 2014 they once again moved to southern California, and we are lucky to be able to bring Walter Stahr to our audience via Zoom.

Walter Stahr is a very accomplished and entertaining speaker, as you can see from the videos posted on his website.

Chase was governor of Ohio, an outspoken U.S. senator, and nationally renowned defense attorney for fugitives escaping slavery. He played a key role in the establishment of the Republican Party. Without Chase's groundwork, Lincoln could never have been elected president in 1860, states Stahr's publisher, Simon and Schuster.

Tapped by Lincoln as his Secretary of the Treasury, Chase not only brilliantly funded the Civil War effort—marketing bonds directly to the public when northern banks balked—but also modernized the country's financial institutions, pushing legislation through Congress to create the first national bank and a single national currency. Once considered a rival for the presidency in 1864, he would soon find himself appointed by Lincoln to lead the Su-

Historical Tidbit ~ Joseph Wheeler - Nathan Forrest

In late January 1863, Major General Joseph Wheeler set off with about 2,000 troopers to again interrupt Federal navigation on the Cumberland River. Along the way, Forrest with 800 men joined him. Unfortunately, the Federals were aware of Wheeler's presence and purposely avoided sending vessels upstream on the Cumberland. For that reason, Wheeler decided to strike the Federal base at Dover, Tennessee. The Yankees repulsed the February 23rd attack.

After the Yankees refused a Confederate demand for surrender, Wheeler ordered his guns to hammer the post. "Little Joe," as he was also called, planned to launch a coordinated attack with Brig. Gen. John Wharton and Nathan Forrest's dismounted troopers. Forrest, who assumed the Yankees were abandoning the place, ordered his men to mount up and charge. The Federals met the screaming Rebels with withering rifle and artillery fire that shattered the attack and killed or wounded almost a quarter of Forrest's men. Forrest dismounted his men and joined Wharton's attack, which achieved some success at first but could not breach the Federal earthworks. With casualties mounting, Wheeler called off the attack. Dover remained in Federal hands.

Forrest was in a foul mood. He had objected to the attack before it began. "I mean no disrespect to you," he told Wheeler. "You know my feelings of personal friendship for you; you can have my sword if you demand it; but there is one thing I do want you to put in that report to General Bragg, tell him that I will be in my coffin before I will fight again under your command."

Wheeler declined to take his sword. "As the commanding officer I take all the blame and responsibility for this failure," he told Forrest.

Lifeline of the Confederacy - Stephen Wise

On April 8, a large audience of more than 40 enjoyed Stephen Wise's enlightening and entertaining presentation of the "Lifeline of the Confederacy." Included in this large audience was John Messner, curator of transport and technology from the Riverside Museum in Glasgow, Scotland, and a Civil War historian from Hobart, Tasmania, Australia.

Much of Professor Wise's talk focused on the specialized ships that were built for the blockade running trade. Ultimately, sleek, shallow-draft, fast ships were built in Scotland and England to bring luxury items, ordnance and war materiel from intermediate stops such as Nassau, the Bahamas, Bermuda and Havana, Cuba, to southern ports. The Union blockade never totally succeeded in preventing the ships from making their way into harbors such as New Orleans, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston and Wilmington. However, joint Army-Navy operations did succeed in seizing the forts that guarded the approaches to the harbors and, in cases such as New Orleans, the largest port in the Confederacy, they took the port city itself. By late 1863, Wilmington was the only port able to support a substantial maritime trade through the blockade.

Ultimately, blockade running was indeed the "lifeline" of the Confederacy, according to Professor Wise, and the Confederate "defeat was not because of a lack of material."

Arming the Confederacy: Virginia's Mineral Contributions to the Confederate War Effort

by Robert C. Whisonant

The American Civil War is often seen as the first truly industrialized total war, one that consumed enormous amounts of human and material resources. But the two opponents were not evenly matched; the North had a preponderant share of raw materials, manufacturing ability, and population. On the eve of battle in April 1861, most of the mines, forges, and foundries in America were located in Union states. Some 90 per cent of the manufacturing capacity resided there—their factories made 97 percent of the firearms, 94 per cent of the cloth, 93 percent of the pig iron, and over 90 per cent of the boots and shoes. The disparity in the capability to make items necessary to the conduct of hostilities rested primarily on the North's possession of more mineral riches, most particularly iron and coal, the foundation of heavy industry.

To be sure, other parts of the South had mineral resources, notably Alabama with important iron and coal operations; none, however, rivaled the richness and variety of the troves in Southwest Virginia. This did not go unnoticed by Federal strategists intent on bringing down the Confederate war machine.

Part II ~ Lead

Lead was another strategic mineral product critical to Civil War armed forces. Without it, weapons would lack ammunition – no bullets for the rifles nor pellets for the shrapnel shells. In 1847, French Army Captain Claude-Etienne Minié had introduced an innovative lead bullet that transformed firearm technology. It was the first projectile to effectively grip the rifling or spiral grooves cut into a musket barrel. This spinning, aerodynamically shaped missile discharged from a rifled musket dramatically improved marksmanship and rate of fire over that of the old smoothbores. First used in substantial numbers by the British against Russian troops in the Crimean War (1853-1855), the Minié bullet led directly to the horrific totals of killed and maimed men on American Civil War battlefields.

Both Union and Confederate infantry fought almost exclusively with rifles shooting Minié bullets. Estimates are that 90 per cent of the casualties came from such weapons. Fighting men commonly referred to the “hailstorm of lead” tearing into them on battlefields; often they advanced leaning forward as if walking into a driving rain. Prodigious stores of lead were required to conduct such engagements, but the Confederacy had only one large-scale lead mining and smelting facility within its borders—the Wythe County operations deep in the mountains of southwestern Virginia. Just a handful of sporadically active workings were present elsewhere, and no significant domestic lead deposits besides Wythe County existed. It would be the Southwest Virginia mines together with importation that supplied the majority of Confederate lead.

The Wythe County mines opened in the mid-1700s and served as the main source of lead balls for the muskets of the patriot armies during the Revolutionary War. The mines continued to operate into the first half of the 19th century, sending lead shot to markets throughout the Southern states. On March 8, 1860, with war clouds gathering, the Wythe County works were reorganized and incorporated as the Union Lead Mine Company, an ironic name for the foremost Confederate lead provider.

At the onset of fighting, the Richmond government demanded that the Union mines owners work the facilities to their maximum capacity or give them up for operation by the government. The company directors chose the former and round-the-clock activity commenced. The actual lead bullets were not made at the Wythe County site. Rather, the workmen dug out the ore, processed it in the smelters, cast the molten lead into ingots, and shipped the lead bars by rail to Richmond and Petersburg to be molded into ammunition. Production records are incomplete, but over three million pounds of lead, an estimated one-third of the total consumed by the Confederacy, are known to have come from the Union mines.

Still, even with this prolific output from Virginia, lead became increasingly scarce as the contest ground on. The government asked citizens for contributions of common household items containing lead, such as pipes, roofing materials, window weights, and eating utensils. In 1863, the city of Mobile ripped up unused lead water mains and shipped them off to the munitions plants. On occasion, officers directed soldiers back onto battlefields after the fighting ceased to scavenge for bullets to be recycled into fresh rounds.

The Northern high command eventually came to recognize the extreme importance of the Wythe County lead works and mounted a number of raids to destroy them. A July 1863 attack led by Union Colonel John T. Toland resulted in a pitched battle on the streets of Wytheville, about 10 miles away from the mines. Although the Federals won the engagement, Toland was killed and his soldiers withdrew back into West Virginia. Another expedition occurred in May 1864 in which Union cavalry under Brigadier General Woods William Averell clashed with Confederates led by Brigadier General John Hunt Morgan just north of Wytheville. Morgan drove Averell away and the lead works again escaped unscathed. In December 1864, a Northern force under Major General George Stoneman at last reached the mines and did much damage. The mines were running again by March 1865, but Stoneman's men returned in April and laid waste to the facilities two days before Lee's surrender at Appomattox.

After hostilities ceased, Confederate Ordnance officer Colonel William Broun summed up the contribution of the Wythe County mines: "Our lead was obtained chiefly, and in the last years of the war entirely, from the lead mines at Wytheville Virginia. The mines were worked night and day, and the lead converted into bullets as fast as received."

Trivia Answers

1. Antietam contains one of two Irish Brigade monuments.

The monument to the Irish Brigade at Antietam is at the base of the observation tower at the end of the Sunken Road (or Bloody Lane). (Sunken Road East tour map). It was dedicated on October 25, 1997.

The heart of the monument is a ten foot tall, fifteen ton block of granite brought from County Wicklow, Ireland. On the front of the monument a bronze bas-relief shows the charge of the Irish brigade at Antietam. On the rear of the monument is a bas-relief of Brigadier General Thomas Francis Meagher, who raised the brigade and commanded it until early 1863. The bronze reliefs were created by sculptor Ron Tunison,

US Brig Gen Alexander Schimmelfennig

2. Company A, 43rd Battalion, 1st Virginia Cavalry, was a partisan ranger unit noted for its lightning-quick raids and its ability to elude Union Army pursuers and disappear, blending in with local farmers and townsmen.
3. U.S. Brigadier General Alexander Schimmelfennig had the longest name.

He (July 20, 1824 – September 5, 1865) was a Prussian soldier and political revolutionary. After the German revolutions of 1848–1849, he immigrated to the United States, where he served as a Union Army general in the American Civil War.

Schimmelfennig had the honor of accepting Charleston's surrender on February 18, 1865. During his time of service in the swamps about Charleston, he contracted a virulent form of tuberculosis which ultimately led to his death in Wernersville, Pennsylvania.

Gen George McClellan

4. George McClellan was only 15 when he entered West Point.
A studious child, McClellan made the decision to enter military service at age 15 and was accepted to West Point despite being several months shy of the age requirement of 16. McClellan ranked second in his class upon graduation from West Point in 1846.
5. General A.S. Johnston was the highest ranking officer to be killed in the war (at Shiloh).

He was reappointed to the U.S. Army in 1849 and joined the Confederacy at the start of the Civil War in 1861. Johnston was appointed a full general and served in the war's Western Theater as commander of all Confederate troops between Texas and the Appalachian Mountains. Following a string of Confederate losses in early 1862, Johnston engaged Union forces at the Battle of Shiloh (April 6-7, 1862). The battle ended in a Union victory and Johnston was mortally wounded. He died at the age of 59.

Confederate Major General Joseph Wheeler

In the years after the war, Wheeler married Daniella Jones Sherrod, a widow whom he had met while fighting in northern Alabama. The couple would have seven children. He became a planter and lawyer in Alabama. Elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in a hotly contested race in 1880, Wheeler served most of the term only to have the results of the election overturned. His opponent, Col. William M. Lowe, a fiery leader of the Independent Democrats, took over the seat but died soon after. Wheeler returned to Congress in 1885 to replace Lowe and served there until 1900.

With the outbreak of the Spanish-American War in 1898, Wheeler volunteered his services to President William McKinley. Accepting, McKinley appointed him a major general of volunteers. Taking command of the cavalry division in Major General William Shafter's V Corps, Wheeler's force included Lieutenant Colonel Theodore Roosevelt's famed "Rough Riders."

Arriving in Cuba, Wheeler scouted ahead of Shafter's main force and engaged the Spanish at Las Guasimas on June 24. Though his troops took the brunt of the fighting, they forced the enemy to continue their retreat towards Santiago. Falling ill, Wheeler missed the opening parts of the Battle of San Juan Hill, but rushed to the scene when the fighting began to take command. Wheeler led his division through the Siege of Santiago and served on the peace commission after the city's fall.

Later Life

Returning from Cuba, Wheeler was dispatched to the Philippines for service in the Philippine-American War. Arriving in August 1899, he led a brigade in Brigadier General Arthur MacArthur's division until early 1900. During this time, Wheeler was mustered out of the volunteer service and commissioned as a brigadier general in the regular army.

Brig Gen Joseph Wheeler

Returning home, he was given an appointment as a brigadier general in the US Army and placed in command of the Department of the Lakes. He remained in this post until his retirement on September 10, 1900. Retiring to New York, Wheeler died on January 25, 1906 after a protracted illness. In recognition of his service in the Spanish-American and Philippine-American Wars, he was buried at Arlington National Cemetery.

April Presentation on Blockade Running

Our April presentation will be “Lifeline of the Confederacy” by Stephen R. Wise, the recognized expert on blockade running in the Civil War.

Stephen R. Wise is the director of the Parris Island Museum and the Cultural Resources Manager for the Marine Corps Recruit Depot at Parris Island, S.C. A native of Toledo, Ohio, he received his bachelor’s degree from Wittenberg University, his master’s from Bowling Green State University and his doctorate in history from the University of South Carolina at Columbia. In addition to his duties aboard MCRD Parris Island, he is also an adjunct professor at the University of South Carolina at Beaufort.

Stephen R. Wise

He is the author of Gate of Hell: Campaign for Charleston Harbor 1863, and Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War. Both scholarly books were published by the University of South Carolina press.

The “Journal of Southern History” wrote of Lifeline that “No previous work has offered a comprehensive and analytical look at this topic until now.” The History Book Club said “no overall and encompassing work on this exciting episode in Civil War history has come forth until now.”

Wilmington became the last and most vital link in the supply line that brought ordnance, medical supplies, manufactured war materiel and other necessary items to the Confederate war effort, most notably the Army of Northern Virginia. If you ever had any questions about blockade running, this is your opportunity to learn from the expert.

Tune in on Zoom at 7 p.m. on April 10 to hear Steve Wise on “The Lifeline of the Confederacy.”

Biographer of Lincoln's Cabinet Members to Preview Newest Book on Salmon Chase

Walter Stahr

Volumes have been written about Abraham Lincoln's conduct of the Civil War and all of them, to some degree, attempt to analyze the potentially explosive mixture of personalities, personal histories, political leanings, ambition and abilities that comprised his cabinet. Cabinet members were the tools Lincoln worked with on the political front, and they were powerful but dangerous, prone to detonate if not handled properly.

Most of those volumes, however, fail to analyze the men of that "Team of Rivals" in full and satisfactory detail. Walter Stahr is in the process of remedying that situation. His 2012 biography of William Henry Seward, Lincoln's Secretary of State, tells an illuminating American story of "Lincoln's Indispensable Man" (the subtitle of Stahr's biography).

Doris Kearns Goodwin, author of the Pulitzer Prize winning Team of Rivals, says, "This magnificent biography finally provides what William Henry Seward so justly deserves—a full, terrific and complex portrait of his endlessly fascinating life."

Five years later, suggesting the care and scholarly rigor with which Stahr writes, he published Stanton: Lincoln's War Secretary.

Amanda Foreman, author of A World on Fire: Britain's Crucial Role in the American Civil War, wrote: "Walter Stahr's Stanton offers a masterly account of one of the great characters of the Civil War. The Secretary of War from 1862-1865 was irascible, autocratic, and vengeful, but also steadfast, punctilious, and practical. This fascinating biography reveals how such a complex and unlikely figure came to play such a vital role at the country's hour of peril."

And now, soon to be published, comes, Salmon P. Chase: Antislavery Agitator, Treasury Secretary, Chief Justice. Salmon Chase was among the most influential Americans of his century. Chase was governor of Ohio, an outspoken U.S. senator, and nationally renowned defense attorney for fugitives escaping slavery. He played a key role in the establishment of the Republican Party. Without Chase's groundwork, Lincoln could never have been elected president in 1860, states Stahr's publisher, Simon and Schuster.

Tapped by Lincoln as his Secretary of the Treasury, Chase not only brilliantly funded the Civil War effort—marketing bonds directly to the public when northern banks balked—but also modernized the country's financial institutions, pushing legislation through Congress to create the first national bank and a single national currency. Once considered a rival for the presidency in 1864, he would soon find himself appointed by Lincoln to lead the Supreme Court, where he continued his advocacy for black rights during the first decade of Reconstruction.

"Drawing on previously overlooked sources, Walter Stahr sheds new light on this complex and fascinating political figure, as well as on the pivotal events of the Civil War and its aftermath. Salmon P. Chase tells the story of a man at the center of the fight for racial justice in America," the publisher writes.

Walter Stahr was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1957, grew up in Arcadia, California, and went away for high school, to the Phillips Exeter Academy in New Hampshire. Then it was back west, to Stanford University, then back east, to Harvard, where he studied law and public policy.

After graduating from Harvard Law School in 1982, Stahr worked in international law for several years, including a posting to Hong Kong. He then spent time working in the Securities and Exchange Commission before returning to international law on behalf of investment companies.

In 2008, he and his family, including two children, moved to Exeter, New Hampshire, where he began working on his Civil War biographies while his wife taught mathematics. In 2014 they once again moved to southern California, and we are lucky to be able to bring Walter Stahr to our audience via Zoom.

Walter Stahr is a very accomplished and entertaining speaker, as you can see from the videos posted on his website.

I've read both his biographies on Seward and Stanton and I look forward to reading Chase.

Join us on the evening of May 13 for a Zoom presentation by Walter Stahr on "Chase and Lincoln."

*The Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign ~
An Overlooked Aspect of the Battle*

A dedicated audience of Cape Fear Civil War Round Table members and friends tuned in to Zoom on Thursday evening, March, 11, to hear Brad Gottfried discuss the "Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign." Thanks to Ed Gibson, the presentation went off flawlessly. The bad news is that we are still prevented from meeting in person as we normally do, but the good news is that we're mastering the virtual technology.

Brad moved quickly and surely through the long, difficult and complex campaign that saw the Confederate cavalry of J.E.B. Stuart face off against the Union cavalry of Alfred Pleasanton. From Brandy Station on June 9, 1863, the largest cavalry battle ever fought in North America, to Falling Waters on July 14, 1863—the denouement of the Gettysburg campaign—we followed the campaign in a series of dozens of maps that added immeasurably to understanding the complexity of the campaign.

The presentation was based on Dr. Gottfried's latest in his series of atlases, The Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign. For information about the book, check out the publisher's page.

Or, go to Brad Gottfried's website and order it directly from the author. Let him know that you learned about the book through our round table, and you'll get an autographed copy.

Brad's presentation ended with an in-depth discussion of the battles around Falling Waters as Lee's Army of Northern Virginia, encumbered with huge wagon trains, thousands of wounded, and depleted regiments, barely eluded destruction as the Union cavalry moved to pin them against the high waters of the Potomac. A lively Q&A followed.

Born in 1828 near Kelso in the Scottish Borders, Wyllie went to sea as an apprentice seaman in 1852 and quickly rose through the ranks. By 1862 he had gained his masters certificate in Liverpool, and there he took command of his first vessel, the Bonita. He sailed for Nassau, then a booming port involved in running contraband through the Union blockade of the Confederate States, at that time fighting in the American Civil War. Sailors from Britain rushed to man these vessels as great fortunes could be made if a successful run was made into a Confederate port.

Two agents of the State of North Carolina, Thomas Crossan and John White, were travelling to Britain on the orders of Governor Zebulon Vance to purchase ships to run the blockade. This set Wyllie's career as a blockade runner on course. White and Crossan arranged the purchase of the Clyde-built paddle steamer Lord Clyde and, just five months after docking in Liverpool as commander of the Bonita, Wyllie took command of the Lord Clyde, renamed the Ad-Vance.

Two more commands of blockade runners followed; he was captured again and then evaded the American authorities through an ingenious, and at sometimes unbelievable, escape to Scotland. The role that Wyllie played during the Civil War is explored in depth and reveals that he was a constant face, and force, in the crew of the steamer with his actions and abilities being greatly appreciated by both crew and owners alike.

The most comprehensive history of the Ad-Vance is provided, from the day she left Glasgow until her capture off the Carolina coast. Many fascinating contemporary passenger diaries, personal recollections from crew, letters and telegrams between Wyllie and Governor Vance, official records of the war and newspaper reports are included.

Arming the Confederacy: Virginia's Mineral Contributions to the Confederate War Effort

by Robert C. Whisonant

The American Civil War is often seen as the first truly industrialized total war, one that consumed enormous amounts of human and material resources. But the two opponents were not evenly matched; the North had a preponderant share of raw materials, manufacturing ability, and population. On the eve of battle in April 1861, most of the mines, forges, and foundries in America were located in Union states. Some 90 per cent of the manufacturing capacity resided there—their factories made 97 percent of the firearms, 94 per cent of the cloth, 93 percent of the pig iron, and over 90 per cent of the boots and shoes. The disparity in the capability to make items necessary to the conduct of hostilities rested primarily on the North's possession of more mineral riches, most particularly iron and coal, the foundation of heavy industry.

Within the Confederacy, Virginia had long been the foremost mineral producer. The greatest concentration of this natural wealth lay in the mountainous southwestern quarter of the state where large deposits of saltpeter, lead, salt, iron, and coal had been exploited for over a century. In addition, mines in the region yielded some copper, zinc, gold, and silver from time to time. To be sure, other parts of the South had mineral resources, notably Alabama with important iron and coal operations; none, however, rivaled the richness and variety of the troves in Southwest Virginia. This did not go unnoticed by Federal strategists intent on bringing down the Confederate war machine.

Part I ~ Saltpeter

One of the natural resources most crucial to waging war in the Civil War era was an organic substance called saltpeter, known more commonly to the Confederates as niter. Potassium nitrate refined from niter provided the explosive power in the black gunpowder then used by the world's armies and navies. Each powder grain had 75 per cent nitrate, 15 per cent charcoal, and 10 per cent sulfur. Niter had been mined in the United States since the earliest days of settlement, yet by 1860 most was imported, owing to decreased need in the long antebellum years of peace. The Confederacy continued to import saltpeter and gunpowder throughout the struggle, but the ever-tightening Union blockade of Southern ports soon proved the need for a stable home-grown niter and powder industry.

Once the opening shots thundered at Fort Sumter, the South acted quickly to ensure a steady supply of niter for the new powder mills being built. In April 1862, the Richmond government passed legislation to establish a Niter Corps within the Ordnance Department. A year later the government made the Niter Corps an independent agency and renamed it the Niter and Mining Bureau. This action enlarged the Bureau's staff while handing it the responsibility for acquiring not just nitrates but also iron, copper, lead, coal, and zinc. An extremely able manager, Colonel Isaac Munroe St. John, headed the Bureau for the war's duration. Despite increasing labor shortages and Federal capture of geographic areas harboring the saltpeter resources, St. John managed to expand niter production almost to the end of fighting.

The South had three domestic niter sources: cave sediments, the most plentiful; "dirt" under old buildings such as outhouses, barns, and stables; and nitriaries, or artificial niter beds. Caverns in the limestone belts of the Appalachian Mountains held immense volumes of high quality niter. This saltpeter is not primarily due to bat guano, as is commonly believed, but in fact occurs when underground waters dissolve nitrate in deciduous forest soils, then carry it into caverns where the nitrate precipitates in the cave sediments. The conditions of soil, water, and temperature necessary to generate the resource are best developed in the southeastern United States. Consequently, the mountain states of the old Confederacy had most of the niter caves in North America, from which excellent gunpowder, as good as any that could be imported, was derived.

To make that powder, impurities had to be removed from the raw niter. The first steps usually took place at the extraction site where workmen placed the saltpeter in tubs or barrels, then mixed it with water and potassium salts obtained by soaking wood ashes. Next came boiling in cast iron kettles until the crystals of potassium nitrate appeared. The ultimate destination of this crudely processed niter was the gunpowder mill where further refining by washing and boiling took place. Mill workers added sulfur and charcoal to the enriched nitrate, making the resultant compound highly explosive. Final processing dampened the mixture and pressed it into solid cakes. Vibrating wire screens separated the grains into different sizes – smaller ones for muskets and pistols and bigger ones for cannon.

Early in the war, nitrieries composed of a variety of human, animal, and vegetable waste were set up, usually near major cities. Workmen tended these “nitrate gardens” assiduously, wetting them down with urine from time to time, then turning the decomposing compost over to generate thin layers of saltpeter. The war years saw at least 13 nitrieries established, including some near Richmond; at Selma and Mobile, Alabama; at Charleston, South Carolina; and at Savannah and Macon, Georgia. Although a reliable source, the artificial beds needed months of cultivation before generating usable quantities of niter. Ultimately, most had not had enough time to yield significant nitrate crops before the close of combat in 1865.

Caves contributed the bulk of the Confederate domestic niter supply. Virginia, with an abundance of saltpeter caverns in the western highlands, led all other states by providing nearly 30 per cent of the total. The dispersed nature of the cave installations and their location in remote sections kept them relatively safe from Union raiders. With a dependable internal supply of niter and ongoing (albeit limited) importation, gunpowder shortages were generally not a problem for Rebel armies. In fact, when peace came, the Augusta Powder Works alone had 70,000 pounds on hand. The United States Artillery School used the leftover Augusta powder for gunnery practice at Fortress Monroe owing to its superb quality.

History Talk – “Meade: The Price of Victory” 7:00 – 8:00 pm (EDT)

John Selby of Roanoke College examines Union general George Meade. Meade’s performance during his two-year tenure as commander of the Army of the Potomac was overshadowed by his successor: Ulysses S. Grant. Selby characterizes Meade as a more active, thoughtful, and enterprising commander than has been assumed, bringing him into focus as one of the war’s more effective Union generals. A member of the faculty of Roanoke College since 1986, Selby is well-known in the Roanoke Valley for the history tours he leads for students and adults.

History Talk – “U.S. Grant at Appomattox: Ending the Union’s War of Deliverance” 7:00 – 8:00 pm (EDT)

Elizabeth Varon of the University of Virginia discusses the Civil War’s last eastern campaign. Varon argues that the theme of deliverance was essential in mobilizing a Unionist coalition of Northerners and anti-Confederate Southerners. Interweaving military and social history, she offers a new perspective on a major battle. Varon is the author of several books including “Appomattox: Victory, Defeat and Freedom at the End of the Civil War” (2013), which received several awards and was named one of Civil War Monitor’s Best Books of 2014.

Battle Brief – “Battle of the Wilderness” 12:00 – 1:00 pm (EDT)

Teacher Workshop – “Using the Lessons of Civil War Leaders in the Classroom” 4:00 – 5:00 pm (EDT)

Leadership is at the core of the United States Army. To be successful, leaders must inspire and influence others to accomplish the goal. In this virtual workshop, Museum educators explore the importance of personal courage, humility and trust in shaping a leader; and examine the influence of leadership on larger organizational success and failure. Museum Educators share online resources, artifact spotlights, Soldier stories and primary sources and discuss teaching Civil War history through the lens of leadership. Participants are encouraged to ask questions and share ideas for integrating leadership themes into curriculum.

History Talk – “The Military Career of Ambrose Burnside” 7:00 – 8:00 pm (EDT)

Major General
Ambrose Burnside

National Park Service historian Frank O’Reilly of the Fredericksburg-Spotsylvania National Military Parks looks at Maj. Gen. Ambrose Burnside, the Union commander at the Battle of Fredericksburg. As a Union Army general in the American Civil War, Burnside conducted successful campaigns in North Carolina and East Tennessee but suffered defeats at the Battle of Fredericksburg and Battle of the Crater. O’Reilly examines an officer who’s fair and trusting nature set him up to be a scapegoat for military disaster. O’Reilly is the author of “The Fredericksburg Campaign: Winter War on the Rappahannock,” which received a 2003 nomination for the Pulitzer Prize in Letters.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Union Major General George Gordon Meade

Meade remained in the U.S. Army after the end of the Civil War and served as the commanding officer of the Division of the Atlantic, headquartered in Pennsylvania. In 1868 Meade briefly served in Atlanta as the governor of the Third Military District, a temporary government that controlled Georgia, Alabama and Florida during Reconstruction. As commander of the 3rd Military District in the south, Meade was noted for his firm justice, which helped to make the Reconstruction period following the war less painful.

After the war, he returned to Philadelphia and his native state as Military commander taking up residence in Philadelphia while engaged in many civic activities, including founding Fairmount Park, the Lincoln Institution for the orphans of veterans, and supporting many cultural institutions.

Having long suffered from complications caused by his war wounds, Meade died from the complications of his battle wound in 1872 at the age of 56, while still on active duty in the army, mourned by the entire nation. He was buried with great pomp and ceremony in Historic Laurel Hill Cemetery in his hometown of Philadelphia.

Nickname: Old Snapping Turtle

Legacy:

There are statues memorializing Meade throughout the United States, including statues at Gettysburg National Military Park, the George Gordon Meade Memorial statue by Charles Grafly, in Washington DC, and one atop the Smith Memorial Arch in Fairmount Park in Philadelphia by Daniel Chester French. The United States Army's Fort George G. Meade in Fort Meade, Maryland, is named for him, as are Meade County, Kansas, and Meade County, South Dakota. The Old Baldy Civil War Round Table in Philadelphia is named in honor of Meade's horse during the war. In World War II, the United States liberty ship SS George G. Meade was named in his honor.

One-thousand-dollar Treasury notes, also called Coin notes, of the Series 1890 and 1891, feature portraits of Meade on the obverse. The 1890 Series note is called the Grand Watermelon Note by collectors, because the large zeroes on the reverse resemble the pattern on a watermelon.

Civil War Phrases

French leave ~ An unauthorized furlough. The term was often used in the expressions to take a French and to take French leave. The expression came from the eighteenth century French custom of going away from a social gathering without bothering to take leave of the host or hostess: French leave was recorded in this social sense as early as 1771.

Fresh fish ~ A new recruit in the service or a new prisoner in a prisoner-of-war camp.

Ghost ~ A white horse.

Gopher ~ A playful nickname soldiers gave each other because each man spent so much of his time digging, or huddled up in, a gopher hole.

to Grab a root ~ To eat.

The Maps of the Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign

March 11th will bring us a Zoom presentation on the "Maps of the Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign" by Bradley M. Gottfried.

Brad Gottfried is the holder of a Ph.D. in Zoology who capped a successful career in higher education with the post of president of the College of Southern Maryland, a multi-campus community college in the historic Maryland counties south and east of Washington, D.C.

Brad is the author of more than a dozen Civil War history books dating back more than 20 years, including an innovative series of six books based on maps, with two more nearing completion. Brad has focused on the Eastern Theater.

The topic of his presentation on March 11th is the cavalry in the Gettysburg campaign, from the pivotal battle of Brandy Station, the largest cavalry battle ever to occur in North America, on June 9, 1863, to July 14, 1863, with short discussions about the prelude to Brandy Station and the denouement of the Gettysburg campaign once the Army of Northern Virginia regained Confederate territory in Virginia and the Army of the Potomac moved to maintain contact.

In the Gettysburg Campaign, the Cavalry Corps of the Army of the Potomac grew to a strength of about 12,000 troopers. Major General J.E.B. Stuart's Cavalry Division of the Army of Northern Virginia numbered about 6,400. These two commands, spent most of that five-week period in the saddle, fighting more than a dozen major battles or engagements, marching well over 200 miles, and incurring thousands of casualties in combat that was often fierce, fast-moving and short-lived.

Was the cavalry important? Stuart successfully fended off the efforts of his counterpart, Brigadier General Alfred Pleasanton, to open up the passes of the Blue Ridge Mountains to learn the movements of Lee's infantry, and the maps and commentary in the book clearly show how well the Union cavalry fought and how poorly their commanders used them, sending in squadrons and regiments piecemeal when a coordinated, massed attack might easily have overwhelmed their opponents.

Finally closing up to the Army of Northern Virginia, Stuart's troopers drove hard to threaten the Union rear but the Union cavalry stopped them and threatened Lee's right flank as well.

This will be an enlightening and interesting presentation. Tune in!

April Presentation on Blockade Running

COVID has caused another change to our schedule but the good news is that our April presentation will be “Lifeline of the Confederacy” by Stephen R. Wise, the recognized expert on blockade running in the Civil War.

Stephen R. Wise is the director of the Parris Island Museum and the Cultural Resources Manager for the Marine Corps Recruit Depot at Parris Island, S.C. A native of Toledo, Ohio, he received his bachelor’s degree from Wittenberg University, his master’s from Bowling Green State University and his doctorate in history from the University of South Carolina at Columbia. In addition to his duties aboard MCRD Parris Island, he is also an adjunct professor at the University of South Carolina at Beaufort.

He is the author of Gate of Hell: Campaign for Charleston Harbor 1863, and Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War. Both scholarly books were published by the University of South Carolina press.

The “Journal of Southern History” wrote of Lifeline that “No previous work has offered a comprehensive and analytical look at this topic until now.” The History Book Club said “no overall and encompassing work on this exciting episode in Civil War history has come forth until now.”

Wilmington became the last and most vital link in the supply line that brought ordnance, medical supplies, manufactured war materiel and other necessary items to the Confederate war effort, most notably the Army of Northern Virginia. If you ever had any questions about blockade running, this is your opportunity to learn from the expert.

Tune in on Zoom at 7 p.m. on April 10 to hear Steve Wise on “The Lifeline of the Confederacy.”

May 13th Ray Flowers (Interpreter Fort Fisher Historical Site), Blockade Runners

North Carolina's principal seaport could not have been better suited for running the blockade. The town was safely out of range of any Federal bombardment from the ocean, and its close proximity to the major transshipment points for incoming European goods was ideal. Nassau in the Bahamas was 570 miles away, while Bermuda was 674 miles due east of Wilmington. Transatlantic merchantmen ferried goods earmarked for the Confederacy to these and other neutral ports. Here the materials were off-loaded onto sleek, shallow draft steamers for the last leg of the journey: the dash through the Federal blockade lines and into the Cape Fear River, under protection of Fort Fisher's formidable defensive works. Having safely delivered their cargoes the runners then returned through the blockade to the transshipment points, usually bearing Southern export items such as cotton, naval stores or lumber.

The Federal blockade consisted of three main lines: farthest line was the cruiser line: whose ships patrolled the ocean with a sharp lookout for incoming vessels headed for Cape Fear, the middle line, followed by a line of "bar tenders" just off the shoal waters of Cape Fear. The navy's lighter vessels ventured in as close to the river inlets as they dared, especially at night. Blockaders close within range of Confederate shore batteries were sure to draw hostile fire. As the war progressed the blockade became more and more effective, but the navy could not meet the challenge of stopping all shipping trade helpful to the Confederate cause. The danger of tackling blockade runners under the guns of Fort Fisher, the largest earthen fort in the Confederacy, was the key to the river defense system below Wilmington.

Book Review ~ Without Warning: The Saga of Gettysburg, A Reluctant Union Hero, and the Men He Inspired ~ by Terry C. Pierce

Between plans and their execution rage the winds of war. The winds of chance. The winds of choice. The winds of political ambition and human error--and human schemes.

The winds of war grow dark around General George Meade, appointed to command the Army of the Potomac just three days before a brewing battle against Robert E. Lee, charismatic leader of the Confederate forces. No one--not even the outgoing commander--seems to know where Lee's army is, except that they are somewhere on Northern soil, possibly pushing toward a decisive battle deep in the heart of the Union.

Bound by duty to take a position he did not seek and does not want, Meade reluctantly accepts Lincoln's appointment, and overnight, the fate of nearly 100,000 Union soldiers is in his hands.

Meade is a planner--a quiet, capable engineer whose commitment to modesty and restraint is second only to his commitment to honor, duty, and country. While the winds of war swirl around him, he struggles to concoct a battle plan without even the most basic information, in order to defeat an enemy he cannot find, on ground he has not yet seen. Thwarted by insufficient military intelligence, and betrayed by the machinations of an unscrupulous general with dreams of glory, Meade knows it will take all his skill and the heroism of his troops to best the formidable and hitherto undefeated Lee. The fate of the Republic itself hangs in the balance.

Without Warning is the gripping saga of the Battle of Gettysburg, the Union patriots who fought it, and the man who led them. It scrutinizes the role character plays in leadership and the challenge of the unexpected. Built firmly upon the annals of history, this epic historical novel brings to vivid life seven unforgettable days in the lives and trials of a Union general and his men as they brave the winds of war to save the United States of America.

History of Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) was established in 1994 and first met at the University of North Carolina, Wilmington (UNCW). In October 1994, the first speaker was Chris Fonvielle, who later joined the faculty of UNCW. Professor Fonvielle, now retired, is the premier historian of the Lower Cape Fear from Colonial times through the Civil War. Our first president was George Slaton who led the organization until the year 2000.

Chris Fonvielle speaks at dedication of Joseph Ryder Lewis Park in Carolina Beach.

Following George Slaton, Professor Fonvielle led the CFCWRT from 2000 through 2006. The meeting site changed from UNCW to St. John's Episcopal Church and then to St. Andrew's on the Sound Episcopal Church. Under the leadership of David Norris (2006-10) and Bob Cooke (2010 to 2018), the organization grew steadily and many nationally known speakers and authors spoke to the group as well as accomplished local historians.

From 1997 through 2005 the organization featured tours to locations such as Richmond and its vicinity, Sharpsburg, Md., and Spotsylvania County, Va. From 2006 through 2011 tours were shortened to locations in North Carolina that could be reached within a day rather than requiring overnight travel. Tours were discontinued in 2012 because of a lack of sufficient interest.

The CFCWRT is actively involved in supporting Fort Fisher and Fort Anderson, the NC Historical Sites in the area, as well as the NC Maritime Museum in Southport. We provided a substantial donation in 2020 that facilitated the establishment of the Joseph Ryder Lewis, Jr. historical park in Carolina Beach. The park preserves a portion of the "Sugar Loaf Line," a defensive fortification that ran from an arm of Masonboro Sound to the Sugar Loaf dune on the Cape Fear River.

David Norris leads round table discussion

In addition to nationally known speakers, the round table regularly features speakers from local state historical sites and the Latimer House, the museum of the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society, in Wilmington.

Beginning in 2018, the Round Table has presented a summer program featuring a seminar-style round table discussion on a specific topic such as the failure of Confederate forces to attack the Union landing force before its assault on Fort Fisher. We have also featured tours of local sites for the general public and a members

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Union Brigadier General Joshua L. Chamberlain

After the war, Chamberlain returned to Maine and was elected to four terms as Maine's governor, a post he held until 1870. During his tenure, he encouraged the state to ratify the 14th Amendment (which made all freedmen and women citizens of the United States). He also played a key role in the first years of the Maine College of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts, which later became the University of Maine in Orono.

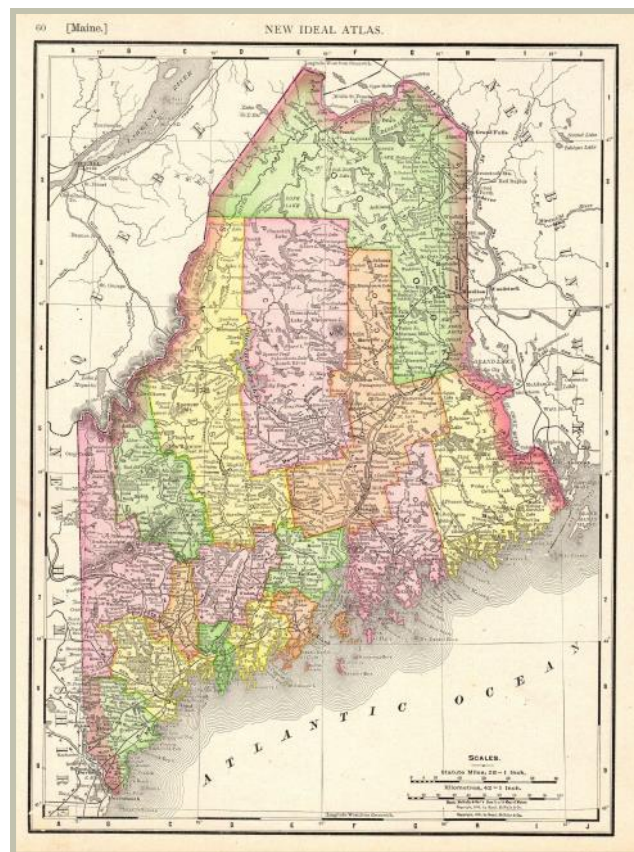

Gov. Joshua Chamberlain

Following his governorship, Chamberlain served as president of Bowdoin College and during his tenure made some controversial changes. He began by adding science and engineering courses to the classical curriculum, but the school reverted to its original program one year later.

Chamberlain left his post at Bowdoin in 1883 and moved to Portland, Maine, where he served as surveyor of the port and began investing in Florida real estate. Chamberlain also began writing about his Civil War experiences, including the posthumously published memoir of Appomattox: The Passing of the Armies. His wife, Fanny, died in 1905; Joshua Chamberlain died on February 24, 1914, at the age of 85.

Dictator: A nickname for the heavy thirteen-inch sea-coast mortar mounted on a railroad flatcar and used by the Federals at the siege of Petersburg, Virginia, in 1864. Aka Petersburg Express.

Double Note: A piece of paper money with different issues printed on the two sides. Common in the South because of the paper shortage.

Eight-Day Man: A contemptuous term for someone who joined the army for only a brief period.

First-call Men: Men who responded to the initial plea for Union soldiers and volunteered for three years' service in 1861.

Foot Cavalry: Stonewall Jackson's infantrymen. So called because of their legendary swiftness afoot.

Lee's Pyrrhic Victory at Chancellorsville

Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites you to attend a virtual lecture by JoAnna M. McDonald, Ph.D., on the topic of "Chancellorsville: A Pyrrhic Victory." The lecture, via Zoom, will be presented on Thursday, February 11, 2021, at 7 p.m. JoAnna, a member of our council, is a contributor to the Emerging Civil War blog. She will look at the casualties suffered by the Army of Northern Virginia at Chancellorsville, especially at the level of field grade and general grade officers. How did those losses affect the Army at Gettysburg? Almost all Civil War buffs know the story of Stonewall Jackson's loss at Chancellorsville and how that may have affected the performance of his vaunted II Corps at Gettysburg, but that wasn't the entire story.

JoAnna M. McDonald, Ph.D., is a historian, writer, and public speaker. Author of eleven books on the Civil War and WWII, as well as numerous journal and newsletter articles regarding U.S. Marine Corps history, JoAnna's next book is R. E. Lee's Grand Strategy & Strategic Leadership: Caught in a Paradoxical Paradigm.

The Maps of the Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign

March 11th will bring us a Zoom presentation on the “Maps of the Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign” by Bradley M. Gottfried.

Brad Gottfried is the holder of a Ph.D. in Zoology who capped a successful career in higher education with the post of president of the College of Southern Maryland, a multi-campus community college in the historic Maryland counties south and east of Washington, D.C.

Perhaps one may be forgiven, however, for thinking his real interest is Civil War history. Brad is the author of more than a dozen Civil War history books dating back more than 20 years, including an innovative series of six books based on maps, with two more nearing completion. Brad has focused on the Eastern Theater.

The topic of his presentation on March 11th is the cavalry in the Gettysburg campaign, from the pivotal battle of Brandy Station, the largest cavalry battle ever to occur in North America, on June 9, 1863, to July 14, 1863, with short discussions about the prelude to Brandy Station and the denouement of the Gettysburg campaign once the Army of Northern Virginia regained Confederate territory in Virginia and the Army of the Potomac moved to maintain contact.

Brad’s map books follow an original format of text on the left hand side of each page spread and a map or two on the right hand side. The text is keyed to the maps with circled numbers. There are 82, full-color maps with great detail down to the location of stone-walls, fences, wood lots, tilled fields and minor creek beds, that were important to the movement of cavalry on a Civil War battlefield. The scale is usually very large, often less than 500 yards to the inch, and—hold on to your hat—the orientation is not always with north pointing toward the top of the page.

The change in orientation can lead to a little confusion at first but once the reader becomes accustomed to the change in convention, the value becomes obvious. Fitting the relevant action to a page setting sometimes poses a difficult choice between omitting important items or minimizing the scale to fit everything in. When the scale gets smaller—say ten miles to the inch—one is unable to include important detail like fences, houses, barns, etc. So, Brad’s innovative solution was to sometimes change the convention so that north is to the left, instead of up, or even to the right.

Dr. Gottfried, also an Antietam Battlefield Guide and a Gettysburg Town Guide, explains that “The idea for this series [of map-based books] came about when I was seeking a better way to visualize, understand, and appreciate the Battle of Gettysburg and other major campaigns of the Civil War.”

In the case of the Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign, I would venture to say that the maps are indispensable and go a long way to understanding the importance of both the Union and Confederate cavalry arms and appreciating the experience of the leaders and troopers of those units.

Overshadowed by the vast size and protracted violence of Civil War infantry and artillery engagements (one thinks of unrelenting battle at the “Mule Shoe” during the Spotsylvania campaign, where 20 hours of close combat cost roughly 17,000 casualties), the importance and value of the mounted arm is often seen as merely ancillary and, somehow dilettantish.

In the five or so weeks of the Gettysburg Campaign, the Cavalry Corps of the Army of the Potomac grew to a strength of about 12,000 troopers. Major General J.E.B. Stuart's Cavalry Division of the Army of Northern Virginia numbered about 6,400. These two commands, spent most of that five-week period in the saddle, fighting more than a dozen major battles or engagements, marching well over 200 miles, and incurring thousands of casualties in combat that was often fierce, fast-moving and short-lived in the case of mounted combat or drawn-out dangerous dismounted combat with high stakes, including the possibility of an entire unit being cut off or captured when suddenly faced with enemy reinforcements.

Was the cavalry important? Stuart successfully fended off the efforts of his counterpart, Brigadier General Alfred Pleasanton, to open up the passes of the Blue Ridge Mountains to learn the movements of Lee's infantry, and the maps and commentary in the book clearly show how well the Union cavalry fought and how poorly their commanders used them, sending in squadrons and regiments piecemeal when a coordinated, massed attack might easily have overwhelmed their opponents.

Then, the folly of Stuart's circuitous ride around the Army of the Potomac becomes clearer than ever. Worn out by constant riding, the Confederate cavalry was kept away from the Army of Northern Virginia leaving Lee bereft of intelligence about Union movements. Taking advantage of the freedom to operate, Brigadier General John Buford's Union division cut off the Confederate infantry and on July 1 made a stand on McPherson's Ridge south of the town of Gettysburg that was obviously one of the keys to the ultimate Union victory.

Finally closing up to the Army of Northern Virginia, Stuart's troopers drove hard to threaten the Union rear but the Union cavalry stopped them and threatened Lee's right flank as well.

This will be an enlightening and interesting presentation. Tune in!

The Confederate Stamp Alliance recently announced that, by an overwhelming majority, the alliance would change its name to the Civil War Philatelic Society and that their quarterly journal will become the Civil War Philatelist.

The change was made for a myriad of reasons, among them being a recognition of today's reality, a chance to save the alliance from a dwindling membership and advertisers plus the opportunity to broaden membership and philatelic interest.

To that end, if any Cape Fear CWRT member is interested in Civil War era philatelic matters, especially Confederate, please contact Bruce Patterson for an opportunity that includes free philatelic material, journals and supplies. A committee of historians and citizens dedicated to our local history, along with the staff of the Town of Carolina Beach have completed the preservation and development of the Joseph Ryder Lewis Jr., Civil War Park located around the remnants of the fortifications of the "Sugar Loaf Line of Defense."

This project was made possible by the Town of Carolina Beach, The Federal Point Historic Preservation Society and its volunteers, along with the following contributors: the Joseph Ryder Lewis Jr, Family; staff from the North Carolina Department of Natural and Cultural Resources, Fort Fisher and Underwater Archaeology Branch; Brunswick Civil War Round Table; Cape Fear Civil War Round Table; Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War Foundation, Milford, Ohio; the Island Gazette; Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr.; Daniel Ray Norris/ Slapdash Publishing; and SEPI Engineering and Construction.

Joseph Ryder Lewis Jr. Civil War Park

Welcome to the Joseph Ryder Lewis Jr. Civil War Park. Mr. Lewis (1926-2010) was a Carolina Beach resident, U.S. Army veteran, and member of the Federal Point Historic Preservation Society. Keenly interested in Cape Fear history, he donated 12 acres that included Confederate earthworks of the so-called "Sugar Loaf lines" to the Town of Carolina Beach for a public Civil War park.

The Sugar Loaf lines served as auxiliary defenses to Fort Fisher 4 1/2 miles to the south. They also helped guard Wilmington, North Carolina, the South's main seaport for maritime trade with Europe, and by late 1864 the Confederacy's most important city.

Confederate commerce vessels, called blockade-runners, smuggled vital military supplies for General Robert E. Lee's forces in Virginia, as well as goods for civilians, through the U.S. Navy's blockade of Southern seaports. Great Britain became the Confederacy's major trading partner.

Blockade-runner Colonel Lamb

To protect the Confederacy's "life preserving" business, engineers built a vast network of forts and batteries at the mouth of the Cape Fear River and along the beaches and river shores in both New Hanover and Brunswick Counties. Fort Fisher, which guarded the northern entryway into the river at New Inlet, became the strongest and best armed seacoast fortification in North America.

As Union forces prepared to attack Fort Fisher in the autumn of 1864, Maj. Gen. W.H.C. Whiting, commander of the Department of the Cape Fear, expanded existing defenses to meet the serious threat. He selected a "strong position" on Federal Point, stretching from the headwaters of Myrtle Grove Sound (modern Carolina Beach canal) to Sugar Loaf Hill on the east bank of the Cape Fear River, for an extensive line of fieldworks. They would play an important role in the Wilmington Campaign, 1864-1865.

When Georgia Howled: Sherman on the March

-For 37 weeks in 1864, General Sherman made Georgia his battleground. Georgia Public Broadcasting and the Atlanta History Center have partnered to produce the gripping new documentary "When Georgia Howled: Sherman on the March," It was 37 weeks that would determine the fate of a nation.

Trivia Answer

Brigadier General Stephen G. Burbridge led the Union forces to defeat at the First Battle of Saltville on October 2, 1864. It is estimated that about 50 members of his command, left behind following Burbridge's retreat, were murdered by Confederate troops in what became known as the Saltville Massacre. Federal troops commanded by George Stoneman (including Burbridge) destroyed the salt works following the Second Battle of Saltville (December 20 - 21, 1864). Saltville was in southwestern Virginia.

Confederate Railroad Tidbits

- § Port Hudson, Louisiana received an unusual bit of support from the Clinton & Port Hudson RR during the siege of that place in 1863. Union cannon fire destroyed the mill that was grinding the garrison's corn. The replacement was one of the railroad's locomotives, attached to the milling machine.
- § The Clinton & Port Hudson RR was so old and poorly maintained that it was said to run a tri-weekly schedule -- one week it would go down to Port Hudson and the next week it would try weakly to get back.
- § A Company of boys, about 40 strong, was formed at Columbus, Ga. to guard the bridge at West Point, Ga. Their Captain was Walter Gordon, a brother of Major General John B. Gordon. Not a member of the company was over 16 years old.

These are from the website Confederate Railroads by David L. Bright. The information is quite extensive. There are posted well over 19,900 transcriptions of the railroad issues-related documents and more are being added every day. Check it out!

CSS Virginia - "The Rebel Monster"

CSS Virginia was the first steam-powered ironclad warship of the Confederate States Navy, built during the first year of the Civil War; she was constructed as a casemate ironclad using the raised and cut down original lower hull and steam engines of the scuttled USS Merrimack. Virginia was one of the participants in the Battle of Hampton Roads, opposing the Union's USS Monitor in March 1862.

Development

Type and class: Casemate Ironclad Ram with Steam Powered Screw Propulsion

Misidentified As: the "Merrimack", or the "Merrimac"

Ships in Class: One

Keel laid: 1855 as USS Merrimack

Acquisition: Seized by the Confederates in April 1861 as part of the abandoned Gosport Navy Yard

Salvaged From: the sunken, burned hulk, and machinery of the USS Merrimack

Raised: May 30, 1861 and put in drydock

Authorized: June 23, 1861 by the Confederate States Secretary of the Navy, Steven R. Mallory

Designers:

Lieutenant John M. Brooke, C.S. Navy (primary designer, responsible for iron plating design and heavy ordnance)

Naval Constructor John Luke Porter (given overall responsibility for the conversion to an ironclad)

Chief Engineer William Price Williamson (responsible for the ship's machinery)

Reconstruction Cost: $172,523.00 as appropriated by the Confederate Congress

Overseeing Salvage and Reconstruction: Flag Officer French Forrest, Commander of the Gosport Naval Shipyard, C.S. Navy

Career

Commissioned: February 17, 1862 as CSS Virginia

Launched: March 8, 1862

Operator: Confederate States Navy

Roles: Blockade Breaking, Blue Water Operations, Fleet Support, Hunter, Direct-Attack, Specialized / Utility

Length of Service: 64 days

(From date of Launch, to date Scuttled. Includes 25 days of repairs and upgrades completed in dry dock, March / April 1862)

Commanding Officers:

Flag Officer: Franklin Buchanan - February 24 to March 8, 1862

He was wounded by shrapnel on first day of the Battle of Hampton Roads

The Executive Officer: Lieutenant Catesby ap Roger Jones - March 9th

A temporary command for second day of the Battle of Hampton Roads, including the duel with USS Monitor

Flag Officer: Josiah Tattnall - March 25 until May 11

He ordered the ship destroyed to keep it out of Union hands.

Complement: 320 officers and men

Victories: 2 Ships Sunk or Destroyed, 3 Ships Damaged or Run Aground, 3 Un-named Transports Destroyed

USS Cumberland - Sunk after Ramming, Shelling, March 8

Three Union Transports Destroyed, March 8

USS Congress - Run Aground, Shelled, Surrendered, Destroyed by Fire, March 8

USS Minnesota - Run Aground, Damaged by Shot, March 8 & 9

USS St. Lawrence - Damaged by Shot, March 8

USS Dragon - Severely Damaged by Shot, March 9

Sorties: 5

March 8 - Maiden Voyage. Engagement with USS Cumberland and USS Congress at Hampton Roads

March 9 - Engagement with USS Monitor at Hampton Roads

April 11 - The Virginia enters Hampton Roads. Federal transports flee the harbor to the protection of Fort Monroe. USS Monitor stays in the channel but does not accept the Virginia's challenge.

May 8 - CSS Virginia steams down the Elizabeth River from Gosport Navy Yard to contest the Navy's advance and stays out of Hampton Roads hoping to engage USS Monitor.

May 11 - Attempting to escape up the James River, after Gosport is reclaimed by the Union Army, the Virginia can't be made light enough to travel as far as planned up the shallow part of the river. Trapped, with no escape, the ship was scuttled, and fired, causing a great explosion, destroying the ship.

Fate:

Scuttled and destroyed by fire/explosion to prevent capture by Union Forces near Craney Island, Virginia on May 11, 1862.

Current Disposition:

The wreck of the Virginia was largely removed in sections between 1866 and 1876.

The anchor and propeller shaft of the Virginia can be seen at the American Civil War Museum in Richmond, Virginia.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Major General Daniel Harvey Hill

After the war, Hill founded a magazine entitled The Land We Love, which included coverage of literature, history, and agriculture. He edited the journal from 1866 to 1869. From 1877 to 1884 Hill served as the first president of the University of Arkansas. (Known as Arkansas Industrial University prior to 1899.) In 1885 he became president of the Military and Agricultural College of Milledgeville in Georgia. (Currently known as Georgia Military College.) He held the post until August 1889, when, due to failing health, he resigned and returned to Charlotte, North Carolina, where he died on September 24, 1889. Hill is buried in the Davidson College Cemetery.

"There was a nuisance in the service known as the army correspondent. "

Civil War Phrases

Buffalo: A North Carolinian who favored the Union.

Camp canard A false report widely believed among the soldiers in a camp.

Cartridge class: A group, often a ladies organization, engaged in making cartridges for soldiers.

Coal torpedo: An explosive device that was machined to look like a lump of coal, blackened, and placed into an enemy coal bin so that it would be shoveled into a furnace, where it would explode.

Comin' with a bone in her teeth: An expression often used to describe a vessel moving briskly through the water, with white foam at the prow.

Cotton clad: A vessel protected, or "armored," with cotton bales. The term was often used as an adjective, as in "cotton-clad steamboats."

Critter company: A cavalry company.

Confederate Sequestration Act - Rodney Steward

The Confederate Act of Sequestration was passed on Aug. 30, 1861. The Confederate law was inspired by the Union's First Confiscation Act of Aug. 6, 1861, which laid the legal groundwork for Northern forces to confiscate Southerners' private property being used to aid the rebellion. The Sequestration Act's silence on nearly all interpretative matters placed the awesome responsibility of defining the terms "loyal Confederate" and "alien enemy" entirely in the hands of local sequestration officials. Judges wielded unprecedented power. This led to massive corruption with no recourse for those unjustly accused of being "enemy aliens" and no restitution for them.

Rodney J. Steward is an assistant professor of History at the University of South Carolina Salkehatchie. Rodney does research in Cultural History. His current project is a book-length manuscript titled "An Illegal Violence: The Story of Confederate Sequestration," which is currently under contract for publication with Louisiana State University Press.

Victory from the Jaws of Defeat - The Battle of Cedar Creek

On December 10th, 29 members and 5 visitors attended the Zoom presentation on The Battle of Cedar Creek.

Bill Jayne, Cape Fear Civil War Round Table president, presented a captivating session revealing the various facets at play leading up to the battle.

He first set the stage with an introduction to the geography of the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia where the battle took place on October 19, 1864. The scene of humiliating Union defeats in previous campaigns, General Robert E. Lee attempted to once again affect the course of the war by sending a force into the strategic valley. The stakes had never been higher as the Army of the Potomac closed in on Petersburg and Richmond and the pending U.S. Presidential election offered the chance to oust a president determined to win a military victory over the rebellious Confederate states.

Lee sent Gen. Jubal Early to the valley with the mission of protecting the Confederate breadbasket, and threatening Maryland and Washington, DC, in order to compel Grant to weaken his force besieging the Confederate capital.

Early succeeded spectacularly and Grant reacted by sending the redoubtable VI Corps and much of his cavalry north to defend Washington. Finally, he transferred Maj. Gen. Philip Sheridan north with the mission to destroy Early's Army of the Valley and also clear the valley of anything valuable to the enemy: "If a crow flies over the valley, it will have to bring its own supplies."

Marshaling all the Union forces in the region, Sheridan turned Early back and administered stinging defeats at Third Winchester, Fisher's Hill and Tom's Brook in September and October.

Sheridan felt that Early had been defeated and traveled to Washington to plan his next steps. He even started to draw down his troops by sending the VI Corps back to Grant before changing his mind and returning them to the Army of the Shenandoah. Posted in a strong position at Cedar Creek near Middletown, the Union Army did not have an inkling of an attack coming on its left due to Early's weakness and the geographic obstacles.

Yet, outnumbered more than two to one, Early gambled on a complex surprise attack. In this plan, largely the work of Confederate General John B. Gordon, the initial attack made the most of Early's strengths by hurling his best divisions in a surprising dawn attack aimed at the Union left, the area that seemed to be most secure because of the geographic obstacles posed by Cedar Creek, the North Fork of the Shenandoah River and Massanutten Mountain.

First Kershaw's division (about 3,000) waded across the creek predawn and hit Thoburn's division (c. 1,700 men) which held an isolated position, separated from the rest of the Union VIII Corps. The one-sided attack produced about 600 casualties. A few minutes after Kershaw, three gray divisions under Gordon emerged from the fog and hit the rest of the VIII Corps in the flank and rear. They had surprise and overwhelming numbers to their advantage. They overwhelmed Hayes, and flanked Kitching and his Provisional Division (6th NY Heavy, miscellaneous troops). The entire Confederate II Corps under Gordon was assaulting, more than 6,500 troops. They were coming not from the southwest (where Kershaw vs. Thoburn occurred) but from the southeast. Hayes and Kitching were unable to hold.

Gen. Horatio G. Wright, Union VI Corps commander and acting commander of the Army in Sheridan's absence personally led a counter attack across a ravine. Wright intended to slow the Confederate advance. Confederate Brigadier General Gabriel C. Wharton's division was now advancing up the Valley Pike along with Kershaw's division and the Corps under Gordon. Brig. Gen. William Emory, CO of the Union XIX Corps, had a division (Grover's) up and ready for a planned recon on the 19th so they were better prepared to defend themselves.

A brigade under Col. Stephen Thomas of Vermont was ordered to move east of the Valley Pike to try to slow Gordon's advance. The great weight of the Confederate assault fragmented Thomas's command which held for about 30 minutes. 8th Vermont lost 106 out of 159 including 13 of 16 officers. Confederate staff officer Jed Hotchkiss: "Such a display of heroic fortitude...worthy of the highest praise." Thomas received the MOH. 75th NY and others in Grover's 2nd Division reversed their trenches to oppose the Confederates coming at them from the east. The 156th NY Mountain Legion, faced east, defended the colors in hand-to-hand fighting but by 7:30, they retreated. 156th had 92 casualties at Cedar Creek.

In spite of the desperate valor of the scattered Union commands, Early's juggernaut rolled on through the town of Middletown and finally halted around 10 a.m. Gordon urged Early to continue the attack but Early felt his own command was too disorganized to continue.

In Winchester, about 12 miles to the north, Sheridan awoke and learned of artillery fire at Cedar Creek and soon mounted up. His adjutant, Forsyth, rode ahead and learned of the

Gen Jubal Early

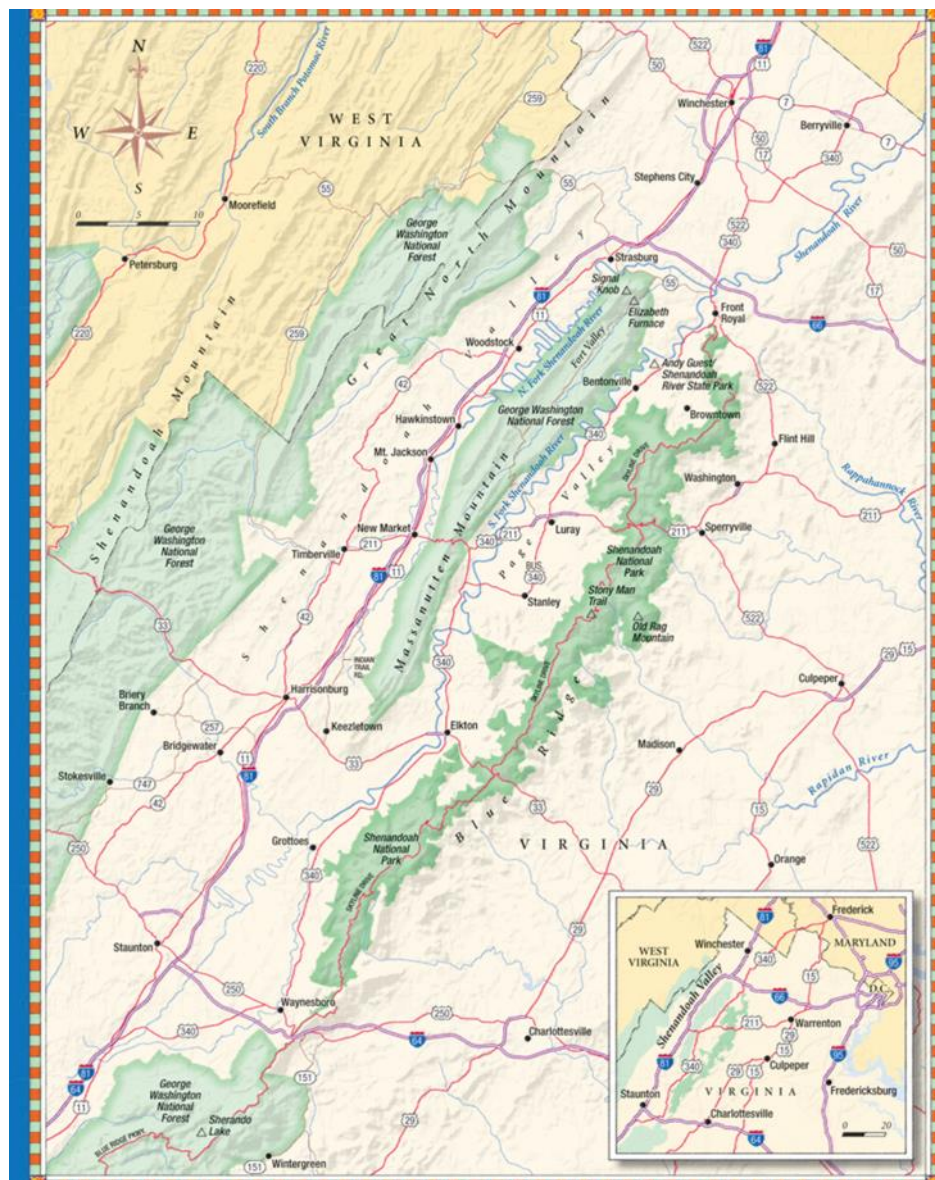

Maj Gen Phillip Sheridan

As the lull continued through mid-day, Sheridan and his commanders prepared to turn the tables on Early, rather than retreat. When it came around three in the afternoon, the counterattack was crushing. Early tried to spread his line too thin, creating a gap on his left. Fighting was hard on the right and center. On the right, North Carolina's Major General Stephen D. Ramseur was mortally wounded and Massachusetts blue blood Charles Russell Lowell, commanding a cavalry brigade was killed.

Custer was driving Rosser across the creek to his right but saw the CSA infantry line wavering to his left. He hesitated, but only for a moment; then without waiting for orders, he made the decision that any cavalry commander worth his salt should have made. Leaving Pennington with three regiments to maintain pressure on Rosser, he reeled the rest of the division into column and 'moved to the left at a gallop.'

Sheridan's victory at Cedar Creek extinguished any hope of further Confederate offensives in the Valley, and was one of the Union victories in late 1864 that helped ensure President Abraham Lincoln's reelection that November.

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table Upcoming Events

February 11th JoAnna McDonald (Author), Lee's Pyrrhic Victory at Chancellorsville

JoAnna, a member of our council, is a contributor to the Emerging Civil War blog. She will look at the casualties suffered by the Army of Northern Virginia at Chancellorsville, especially at the level of field grade and general grade officers. How did those losses affect the Army at Gettysburg? Almost all Civil War buffs know the story of Stonewall Jackson's loss at Chancellorsville and how that may have affected the performance of his vaunted II Corps at Gettysburg, but that wasn't the entire story.

JoAnna M. McDonald, Ph.D., is a historian, writer, and public speaker. Author of eleven books on the Civil War and WWII, as well as numerous journal and newsletter articles regarding U.S. Marine Corps history, JoAnna's next book is R. E. Lee's Grand Strategy & Strategic Leadership: Caught in a Paradoxical Paradigm.

March 11th Brad Gottfried (Author), Cavalry in the Gettysburg Campaign

Dr. Bradley M. Gottfried holds a Ph.D. in Zoology from Miami University. Brad, who is recently retired, worked in higher education for more than four decades. He also serves as a board member of the Central Virginia Battlefield Trust. He is hard at work on two projects: The Maps of Petersburg and Appomattox and the story of the creation and consecration of the Gettysburg National Cemetery that will be published as part of the Emerging Civil War Series. An avid Civil War historian, Dr. Gottfried is the author of eleven books, including; Brigades of Gettysburg (2002) and five previous Savas Beatie Military Atlas Titles (First Bull Run, Antietam, Gettysburg, Bristoe Station/Mine Run, and Wilderness). Brad and his wife recently published a history of the Point Lookout Civil War Prisoner of War Camp for Confederates. He is currently finalizing (with Theodore P. Savas) The Gettysburg Campaign Encyclopedia.

April 8th Bob Browning (Author), Blockading Squadrons

Dr. Browning earned his Ph.D. at the University of Alabama and embarked on his history career, working as a park superintendent at the Battleship Texas. In 1989, he began work as a historian with the U.S. Coast Guard and two years later became the Coast Guard's chief historian, retiring from government service in 2015. He is the author of six books and more than four dozen articles relating to the Coast Guard, the Civil War, and U.S. naval and maritime history.

Round Table Officer Marks Milestone by Bill Jayne

Bruce E. Patterson, the secretary-treasurer of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table recently led the way in marking a major milestone and we would be remiss if we failed to recognize him for his great leadership, support, guidance and assistance.

Born on December 13, 1930, Bruce marked his 90th birthday with a family get-together facilitated by Zoom, a technology that even Dick Tracy couldn't have imagined in 1930 (actually, the comic strip detective with his wrist radio, etc., didn't make his debut until 1931).

Bruce's work on behalf of our round table is very important and very much appreciated. In addition to his duties as secretary and treasurer, he is the key liaison with our speakers, facilitating their visits to Wilmington or, for the past several months, their remote presentations. He is also a key volunteer for several other endeavors including the Southeast North Carolina Military Officers Association, the Remembering our Military Heroes group, Wreaths Across America, the N.C. Military Historical Society and the Wilmington Philatelic Society.

Originally from New York City, Bruce grew up in a small town in Western Massachusetts and joined the U.S. Army in 1948 after graduating from high school. He graduated from Officers Candidate School in 1951 and was commissioned in the Field Artillery, which was fitting since his father was a Coast Artilleryman who served in France in World War I.

Bruce also counts Civil War veterans among his ancestors and perhaps that helps account, in part, for his interest and expertise in history.

Bruce went on to a distinguished career in the Army, retiring as a Colonel in 1979. He was inducted into the Hall of Fame of the OCS Alumni Organization. He holds an MBA from George Washington University and is a graduate of the Command and General Staff College, the Armed Forces Staff College and the Army War College.

I consider myself very lucky to count Bruce as a friend, mentor and key member of our Round Table team. Best wishes, Bruce, and many thanks.

Trivia Question

I am the wife of a Major General in the Confederate Army. I was not married to my husband at the time of the war. I was my husband's 2nd wife and so I am not buried with my husband, but I am buried in a very prominent Cemetery. Many people may not realize I am buried there as none of my children by the General are buried at this cemetery. A huge hint if you want to find my grave, I am at site 1936 in this prominent D.C. Area Cemetery. Who am I and who was my famous husband?

Answer on Page 7

Robley Dunglison (Fighting Bob) Evans

Fort Fisher kept North Carolina's port of Wilmington open to blockade-runners supplying necessary goods to Confederate armies inland. By 1865, the supply line through Wilmington was the last remaining supply route open. When Ft. Fisher fell after a massive Federal amphibious assault on January 15, 1865, its defeat helped seal the fate of the Confederacy.

This year is the 156th anniversary of that assault.

Evans made what may have been the single most incredible shot in American military history, killing a sharpshooter with a single pistol bullet after that man shot him four times with a rifle. He was the only US Naval officer invalided out of the service for supposedly incurable wounds subsequently reinstated. Evans was the only Admiral afloat in any of the world's navies who had killed buffalo from horseback, been shot through and through by an Indian arrow, and ridden a Pony Express horse through Brigham Young's flowerbed.

Born on August 18, 1846 in Floyd County, Virginia, Evans' dream was to attend the US Naval Academy in Annapolis. All spaces were filled except for the one reserved for the Utah Territory, and its candidate had to be a resident. So, in 1859, 13-year-old Evans became the youngest member of a five-man, one boy, wagon train, headed for Salt Lake City. Evans' party crossed the Great Plains, hunting buffalo and antelope as they went. He learned to ride up alongside buffalo bulls at a gallop, killing them with diagonal heart-lung shots, killing them with a Colt's repeating rifle. Northwest of Fort Laramie, the party was surrounded by hostile Indians. They made a fighting retreat to Fort Laramie. Later while trying a different route, the group was attacked again. Young Evans was wounded when an arrow passed through his left ankle but survived the attack. After many adventures out west, Evans returned to the East Coast and entered the Naval Academy.

In the Spring of 1861 came the outbreak of the Civil War. In October 1863 and barely 17 years old, he was promoted to Acting Ensign and detailed to the steamer USS Powhatan, pulling blockade duty until January 1865. In the fourth year of the Civil War during the battle to subdue Fort Fisher, Evans assembled a 62-man assault team, all Powhatan volunteers, as part of a 2,000 men Naval force. The sailors were armed with pistols (.36 caliber Navy guns) and cutlasses. The night before the attack, rifle pits had been dug for the Marines. The Leathernecks were supposed to go to ground, providing covering fire for the sailors as they charged through them towards the Rebel stronghold. Unfortunately, the Federal plan did not go as intended. The naval force slogged through the sand more than 1,200 yards over the exposed beach, suffering casualties from the very accurate rifle long before the fort's defenders came within range of their pistols.

From more than 100 yards away Evans took careful aim on Colonel Lamb, Confederate second-in-command. Just as he fired a Rebel sniper shot him sideways through the chest, spinning him around and causing him to miss his shot. Evans disregarded the pain and continued on towards the gap blasted in the wooden palisade by the naval bombardment. He now realized one particular Confederate marksman was shooting repeatedly at him. At just 100 yards distance he was hit a second time. Evans was one of only eight men out of the more than 2,000 who successfully penetrated the wooden palisade. All eight inside the palisade had been shot and any not dead yet were now in what amounted to a known distance (35 yard) shooting gallery. Evans was shot a third time, through the right knee. In the fourth shot, the Rebel completely took off Evan's right toe. Enraged by what seemed to be the personal assault, Evans aimed at his assailant. "My bullet went a little high, striking the poor chap in the throat and passing out the back of his neck. He pitched over the parapet and rolled down near me, where he lay dead."

A Marine from the Powhatan named Wasmouth rescued Robley Evans from his exposed position inside the palisade by carrying him to a pit carved out by a navy shell about fifty yards outside the fort. As Wasmouth lowered Evans into the shelter a Confederate bullet severed the good Samaritan's jugular vein, and he dropped at the ocean's edge and there bled to death. Fate smiled somewhat more favorably on Ensign Evans.

Ensign Robley D. Evans

When a signal torch signaled to the fleet that the fort had fallen to Union forces, “Ensign Robley Evans, now evacuated from the beach, was lying on the deck of the USS Nereus with other wounded seamen when the missiles began streaking through the night. Finally in a hospital before going to sleep he hid his revolver under his pillow. Drifting in and out of consciousness, he overheard the surgeon in charge tell his assistants “Take both legs in the morning.” When the doctors came the next day and he could not talk them out of their intentions, out came his pistol. His .36 Navy pistol saved his legs. After much pain and suffering he taught himself to walk again and came back into active duty. He survived the battle but his leg wounds left him with a severe limp for the rest of his life.

Over the next 30 years he sailed the seven seas and advanced in rank: 1901 Rear Admiral, 1902 Commander of the Asiatic Fleet, 1905 Command of the Atlantic Fleet, and 1907 Commander of the Great White Fleet for the first half of its round-the-world voyage. Among the junior officers serving in Evans’ Great White Fleet were the Ensigns William F. Halsey, Husband E. Kimmel, and Harold Stark, and the very young Midshipman Raymond Spruance. All four would become admirals in their own right and follow Evans’ example.

Trivia Answer

Mary Eliza Dickson Pillow, Maj Gen Gideon J. Pillow's second wife.

...Mrs. Mary E. Pillow is the daughter of Louisiana planter Michael and Hannah Palmer Dixon. Before she was out of her teens Miss Dixon became the wife of John Trigg, a wealthy young resident of Memphis, who died soon after the war.

In 1874 she married Major General Gideon J. Pillow, who had been predeceased by his first wife Mary Martin Pillow in 1869. Gideon was born in 1806 and Eliza was born in 1846. They had four children (one which died in infancy). He died of the yellow fever in 1878, leaving his widow with three children and only slender means with which to keep them.

He was a brigadier general in the Confederate army but a major general in the Tennessee militia. Pillow was a Major General of Tennessee troops in the Mexican War.

Eliza Pillow moved to Washington, D.C., to be near the federal courts to pursue claims for cotton that her first husband had lost during the Civil War. While crossing Constitution Avenue, near the Capital building in Washington, she was struck by a streetcar and died soon after. She was initially interred in a small private cemetery, but arrangements were made by her daughter Laura (daughter by her first husband), for reinterment in Arlington National Cemetery as the wife of a General.

Historian John C. Fazio tells the story of the only major battle between ocean-going vessels in the Civil War. John A. Winslow and Raphael Semmes had become best friends while serving together aboard the USS Cumberland and the USS Raritan during the Mexican War. During the Civil War, however, Semmes captained the CSS Sumter and the CSS Alabama and became the scourge of federal commercial shipping, sinking or capturing 85 merchantmen and one union warship in a three-year period. As captain of the USS Kearsarge, Winslow pursued his former friend and the Alabama for 14 months before cornering him off the coast of Cherbourg, France, where the two ships fought to the death, June 19, 1864. Winslow's and Semmes' last view of each other, and the action taken by Winslow in consequence of it, is the stuff of legend.

1/27 Judkin Browning & Timothy Silver - The Environment & the Civil War

Environmental factors such as topography and weather powerfully shaped the outcomes of battles and campaigns, and the war could not have been fought without the horses, cattle, and other animals that were essential to both armies. Judkin Browning and Timothy Silver weave a far richer story, combining military and environmental history to forge a comprehensive new narrative of the war's significance and impact. As they reveal, the conflict created a new disease environment by fostering the spread of microbes among vulnerable soldiers, civilians, and animals; led to largescale modifications of the landscape across several states; sparked new thinking about the human relationship to the natural world; and demanded a reckoning with disability and death on an ecological scale.

This mission was to test the striking power of XV-inch Dahlgren guns against earthworks, as well as to understand these new ironclads' shot-proof abilities. On February 28, 1863, Worden was able to destroy the former commerce raider CSS Nashville (Rattlesnake). However, while heading back down the Ogeechee River, Montauk struck a torpedo. Finding Missouri Governor and Union Brigadier General Thomas C. Fletcher in Hillsboro by Kristen Pawlak

For many history buffs and road trippers, rural Jefferson County, Missouri is usually not very high – or maybe not at all – on the Civil War bucket list of sites to see. Sitting due south of St. Louis is the county seat, Hillsboro, where one of Missouri's most influential Civil War and Reconstruction governors had his antebellum home.

Bvt. Brigadier General and Missouri Governor Thomas C. Fletcher was actually born in Jefferson County, specifically the town of Herculaneum. The first county seat of Jefferson County (until the 1830s), Herculaneum was known for its lead mining and production, as well as its proximity to St. Louis, which is what most likely drew Fletcher's parents to immigrate there from Maryland prior to his birth in 1827. His family was well-off financially, having owned several slaves, and allowed him to receive an education and pursue a career in law.

Fletcher was quite politically active early in his adult life and career. At the age of 22, he became Circuit Clerk in Jefferson County; and after seven years of clerk service, Fletcher was admitted to the bar. It was while he served as the Circuit Clerk in Jefferson County's seat of Hillsboro that he lived in this quaint home. Unlike his parents and upbringing in a slave-owning household, he became a Republican and abolitionist in the mid-1850s. Fletcher's loyalty to the Republican Party and county greatly shaped the rest of his career and life.

A love of Union, freedom, and equality, as well as having a distinguished political career, led Fletcher to become a delegate to the Republican National Convention in 1860. When the Civil War broke out, two of his brothers – Perry and Charles – both enlisted in the 6th Missouri Infantry. In an accident at the St. Louis Arsenal in June 1861, Sgt. Perry Fletcher died. Two years later in October 1862, Fletcher enlisted and became Colonel of the 31st Missouri Infantry. At the Battle of Chickasaw Bayou during the Vicksburg Campaign, he was captured by Confederate forces and imprisoned at the infamous Libby Prison until the spring of 1863. Though he was able to command troops in the field with the Army of the Tennessee, Fletcher was forced to return to Jefferson County in early 1864 due to lingering illness.

By the early fall of 1864, as Maj. Gen. Sterling Price's Army of Missouri advanced into Missouri, a recovered Fletcher organized the 47th Missouri Infantry. Part of the Union garrison at Fort Davidson, Fletcher and the 47th Missouri were heavily involved in the Battle of Pilot Knob on September 27, 1864. Though forced to withdraw from Fort Davidson after repeated Confederate attacks, the battle itself was a major factor into why Price did not attack the vital Union city of St. Louis. Additionally, the political aspirations of Fletcher and the garrison's overall commander Thomas Ewing contributed to the Federals' decision to stay at Fort Davidson and fight it out against Price. Fletcher's involvement in the battle, which certainly contributed to Union victory in the overall campaign, led to his promotion to brevet brigadier general.

Just two months after commanding troops in the field at Pilot Knob, Fletcher won a decisive victory over Democrat Thomas Price in the Missouri gubernatorial election of 1864. A border state, Missouri was immune to the Emancipation Proclamation, allowing slavery in her borders due to her loyalty to the Union. With his strong abolitionist beliefs, Fletcher was determined to end slavery.

On January 11, 1865, he helped lead Missouri and the General Assembly to formally abolish slavery in the state. That day at the Missouri State Capitol, Fletcher addressed the state with a public endorsement of abolition: "In the lightning's chirography the fact is written ere this over the whole land – Missouri is Free! ... Forever be this day celebrated by our people." Just twenty days later, Congress passed the Thirteenth Amendment, abolishing slavery nationwide. Fletcher holds a special legacy in Missouri as helping lead the charge to end slavery in this divided border state.

Serving from 1865 to 1869, Fletcher oversaw Missouri's tumultuous post-war era. Unlike the states in the former Confederate South, Missouri was not under Congressional Reconstruction. However, it faced fierce division between Republican wings and what a post-war Missouri would look like. Fletcher's administration addressed issues regarding state railroad debt, education reform, post-war violence, Native American rights and the Constitutionality of test oaths.

After his governorship, Fletcher returned to the practice of law, first in St. Louis then in Washington, DC. He ran for U.S. Congress in 1880, but lost. He passed away at the age of 72 in Washington, DC and was interred at St. Louis' famous Bellefontaine Cemetery.

As Missouri's first Republican and first native-born son to serve as Missouri Governor, Fletcher is a remarkable figure in Missouri, Civil War, and Reconstruction history. Leading the fight for abolition in Missouri and leading the state through some of its most chaotic years, he should be remembered more often. Next time you are in the St. Louis area, make sure a visit to Fletcher's modest, unassuming, but beautifully-preserved home in Hillsboro is on the list.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

Confederate General Pierre G. T. Beauregard

Beauregard pursued a position in the Brazilian Army in 1865, but declined the Brazilians' offer. He claimed that the positive attitude of President Johnson toward the South swayed his decision. "I prefer to live here, poor and forgotten, than to be endowed with honor and riches in a foreign country." He also declined offers to take command of the armies of Romania and Egypt.

He was active in the Reform Party, an association of conservative New Orleans businessmen, which spoke in favor of civil rights and voting for former slaves, hoping to form alliances between African-Americans and Democrats to vote out the Radical Republicans in the state legislature.

Beauregard's first employment following the war was in October 1865 as chief engineer and general superintendent of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad. In 1866 he was promoted to president, a position he retained until 1870, when he was ousted in a hostile takeover. This job overlapped with that of president of the New Orleans and Carrollton Street Railway (1866–1876), where he invented a system of cable-powered street railway cars. Once again, Beauregard made a financial success of the company, but was fired by stockholders who wished to take direct management of the company.

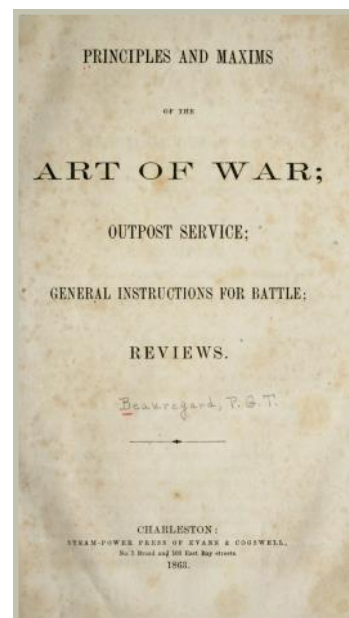

In 1869 he demonstrated a cable car and was issued U.S. Patent 97,343.

After the loss of these two railway executive positions, Beauregard spent time briefly at a variety of companies and civil engineering pursuits, but his personal wealth became assured when he was recruited as a supervisor of the Louisiana State Lottery Company in 1877. He and former Confederate general Jubal Early presided over lottery drawings and made numerous public appearances, lending the effort some respectability. For 15 years the two generals served in these positions, but the public became opposed to government-sponsored gambling and the lottery was closed down by the legislature.

Beauregard's military writings include Principles and Maxims of the Art of War (1863), Report on the Defense of Charleston, and A Commentary on the Campaign and Battle of Manassas (1891). He was the uncredited co-author of his friend Alfred Roman's The Military Operations of General Beauregard in the War Between the States (1884). He contributed the article "The Battle of Bull Run" to Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine in November 1884. During these years, Beauregard and Davis published a series of bitter accusations and counter-accusations retrospectively blaming each other for the Confederate defeat.

Beauregard served as adjutant general for the Louisiana state militia, 1879–88. In 1888, he was elected as commissioner of public works in New Orleans. When John Bell Hood and his wife died in 1879, leaving ten destitute orphans, Beauregard used his influence to get Hood's memoirs published, with all proceeds going to the children. He was appointed by the governor of Virginia to be the grand marshal of the festivities associated with the laying of the cornerstone of Robert E. Lee's statue in Richmond. But when Jefferson Davis died in 1889, Beauregard refused the honor of heading the funeral procession, saying "We have always been enemies. I cannot pretend I am sorry he is gone. I am no hypocrite."

Beauregard died in his sleep in New Orleans on February 20, 1893. He was 74.

Civil War Phrases

All in three years: A Union Soldiers' expression meaning "all the same to the average soldier," whose term of service, among users of the phrase, was scheduled for three years. Typically uttered when something went wrong.

Artificial oysters: A Southern dish consisting of grated corn mixed with eggs and butter, rolled in batter, and fried in a pan.

Barrel drill: A punishment in which a soldier had to stand on a barrel for a specified length of time, sometimes while holding a stick of wood or wearing a placard labeling the offender, such as "Thief."

B.C.: A marking on containers of hardtack, probably standing for Brigade Commissary but interpreted by soldiers, poking fun at the apparent age of the crackers, as Before Christ.

The Battle of Cedar Creek

The Battle of Cedar Creek - Hybrid Presentation by Bill Jayne

Originally scheduled as a classic round table discussion for our June meeting, then postponed to August, it's now the end of the absurd year of 2020 and we find that the COVID 19, novel coronavirus phenomenon is still with us and we haven't yet heard much about the Battle of Cedar Creek. We're still unable to hold a normal meeting in the auditorium style arrangement of the Harbor Church sanctuary because the Governor of North Carolina has limited meetings like ours to a limit of ten attendees.

Given these facts, we're going to hold a "hybrid" presentation before a small, live audience at Harbor Church AND Zoom the presentation to those who want to tune in online.

Bill Jayne, who was planning to lead the round table discussion, will instead deliver a presentation with slides, etc., and take questions after the presentation. Following is a quick reminder about the topic.

The battle took place on October 19, 1864, in the Shenandoah Valley between the powerful Federal Army of the Shenandoah led by Maj. Gen. Philip Sheridan, and the much less powerful Confederate Army of the Valley led by Lt. Gen. Jubal Early. An audacious surprise attack by the Confederates drove the Union forces back with great losses but led by Sheridan the Army of the Shenandoah recovered and delivered a counterattack that destroyed the Army of the Valley and ended Confederate presence in the valley.

The powerful and fascinating personalities who guided and moved this dramatic battle are central to analysis of the battle. Union General Philip Sheridan, was an 1853 graduate of West Point from Ohio. An Irish Catholic, he was an undersized and very aggressive leader who rose to the pinnacle of his profession as the commanding general of the U.S. Army in the 1880s. Grant sent Maj. Gen. Sheridan to the Shenandoah Valley as commander of the newly consolidated Middle Division of the Army. Known as the Army of the Shenandoah, Sheridan brought unified, focused command to a large, extremely powerful force of three infantry corps plus a provisional division and a superbly equipped cavalry corps of more than 8,000 men. He commanded a total force of about 31,600 effectives at Cedar Creek, including 1,856 artillerymen serving 90 guns.

Much older than Sheridan, Lt. Gen. Jubal Early, graduated West Point in 1837. He was a Virginia native connected to many of the most prominent FFVs (First Families of Virginia). He left the Army after brief service in the Seminole War and then studied law and rose to political prominence in Virginia. He volunteered for the state militia in the War with Mexico but his unit arrived in Mexico too late to see combat. His aggressive style of leadership brought him to the attention of Robert E. Lee and he soon rose through the command structure as attrition removed leaders such as Thomas J. Jackson and Richard S. Ewell. By 1864, Lt. Gen. Early commanded the “Army of the Valley,” composed primarily of the redoubtable II Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia. Estimates vary but his strength was approximately 21,000 at Cedar Creek including 5,300 cavalry and 1,100 artillerymen serving more than 40 guns. Some estimate Confederate strength as low as 12,780. The National Park Service estimates the size of the Army of the Valley as “14,000-15,000 men.”

Some other personalities are also of great interest and importance to the conduct of the battle. On the Confederate side, Maj. Gen. John B. Gordon of Georgia was crucial. Maj. Gen. Horatio Wright played an important role in Sheridan’s army but many other generals such as Crook, Geary, and Custer added to the complexity of the engagement. Col. Rutherford B. Hayes (yes, that Rutherford B. Hayes who later became president of the United States) commanded a brigade caught up in the initial surprise of the Confederate assault.

The weather also played a role in the battle. Typical of autumn in the Shenandoah Valley, the weather was generally dry with warm days and cool nights. However, the battlefield is enveloped by the Shenandoah River and Cedar Creek and overshadowed by the imposing land form of Masanutten Mountain. In the crucial hours around dawn on October 19, 1864, fog prevailed over much of the battlefield.

The distinctive geography of the valley was, of course, an important factor in the battle as was, as always, politics. The U.S. presidential election of 1864 was just a few weeks away and although Lincoln had pulled ahead of his rival former general George B. McClellan, a Federal defeat in the valley would have been received as terrible news in the north and might have threatened Lincoln’s reelection.

*CFCWRT News*Wreaths Across America

The Wreaths Across America wreath purchasing effort, conducted by the Round Table and joined by the Wilmington Chapter, NCMHS and the Wilmington Philatelic Society was highly successful with a total of 76 wreaths being purchased for the Wilmington National Cemetery, thus exceeding our unit goal in this very unusual year.

The wreath laying ceremony, scheduled for Saturday, 19 December is usually an open event, however this year it is by reservation only and all slots have been filled as of this writing.

The Wilmington Philatelic Society has prepared a cachet for the event with a cancellation specifically designed for Saturday, 19 December. (example to the left) Instructions for obtaining the cachet will be provided prior to the 19th and will remain in effect for the following 30 calendar days, by mail, from the main Post Office. We expect final instructions from the Wilmington Postmaster by 10 December.

Our thanks for all who took part in this years efforts.

November's Presentation: Lt. Frank Hoge by Andrew Duppstadt

November's Presentation on the Interesting Story of a Young Confederate Naval Officer

Lt. Francis Lyell Hoge

On November 12, Andrew Duppstadt, historic sites specialist for the State of NC, delivered to our round table an extremely interesting and quick-paced presentation about Confederate Navy Lt. Francis Lyell "Frank" Hoge. We're proud to note that Andrew, who is also treasurer of the North Carolina Military Historical Society, is a member of our round table.

While researching the taking of the USS Underwriter, a Union gunboat posted near the city of New Bern, N.C., Andrew learned that descendants of Lt. Hoge still held numerous letters, orders, commissions and artifacts belonging to the young officer.

Francis Lyell Hoge, known as "Frank," was born in Moundsville, Virginia, in January 1841. Moundsville is a small city on the Ohio River in what is today the state of West Virginia.

Andrew traveled to West Virginia to meet with Mr. Laurence Evans II, Frank Lyell's descendant who owned the papers and artifacts.

Appointed to the U.S. Naval Academy in 1856, Frank wrote many letters home, especially to his siblings, about day-to-day life in the new academy in Annapolis, Md. He wrote of being awakened by cannon fire and drum rolls but he quickly became accustomed to academy life and even comfortable as a young "acting midshipman" who enjoyed Sunday down time lounging in slippers while sitting in an easy chair reading letters from home.

Upon graduation he was assigned to the USS Susquehanna, a large side-wheel frigate in the Mediterranean Squadron. He received excellent reviews from his commanding officer, Captain George Nicholas Hollins, Sr., born in Baltimore, he was a citizen of Florida who considered himself a southerner. Captain Hollins resigned his U.S. Navy commission in 1861 and escaped to the south. He held many posts in the Confederate Navy, including command of the Wilmington, N.C., naval station. He died in 1878 in Baltimore.

Young Frank Lyell, although born in the most northwestern part of what is now the state of West Virginia, near Pittsburgh, PA, chose to side with the Confederacy and compiled an outstanding record in the fighting on the sounds and rivers of eastern North Carolina.

The youthful officer proved his mettle in several difficult engagements, including a cutting out expedition on the Rappahannock River in Virginia and survived a near fatal wound in August 1863. He served under the command of Colonel John Taylor Wood, the grandson of President Zachary Taylor, and was recommended for promotion.

Lt. Hoge's Sword

Recovered from his wound thanks in part to the solicitous care of a Virginia surgeon and his family (he wrote glowingly of the doctor's daughters who helped nurse him back to health), Col. Wood picked him to play a pivotal role in the famous expedition to attempt to commandeer the USS Underwriter off New Bern. The expedition comprised 33 officers and 220 men in 12 boats and two large launches, each of which carried a 12-pounder howitzer. The "joint services" expedition included men from all over the south, soldiers, sailors and Marines. Hoge, based in Wilmington, was in charge of much of the logistical preparation for the expedition. Such expeditions were exceedingly dangerous in the 19th Century and young Hoge was the first to board the enemy vessel.

Although much of the crew of the Underwriter was ashore and the raiders outnumbered the Union tars, fighting was fierce and chaotic. The Confederates prevailed but steam in the ship's boilers was low and it became clear that they would not be able to sail the boat away and outfit it for Confederate service. Under fire from Union forts on shore, it was decided to burn the ship to deny it to the Federal forces. Hoge was chosen for the extremely dangerous mission of firing the ship and boarded it twice while under fire to make sure the fires would take hold and destroy the ship. He was successful and the Confederates retreated back up the Neuse River to Kinston.

At Kinston, Hoge became the executive officer of the formidable CSS Neuse, the Confederate ironclad under construction in the river. The ship, of course, took a great deal of time to be built and properly outfitted because of shortages of iron, machinery, and other essential materials. In March of 1865 it helped cover the movements of Confederate Army divisions under Generals Robert Hoke and D.H. Hill in the battle of Wyse's Forks prior to Bentonville and then was scuttled.

At the end of the war, Hoge was paroled but fearing retribution, he travelled to Halifax, Nova Scotia, in Canada where he worked with other Confederate officers including Col. John Taylor Wood to retrieve his fortunes.

Eventually he returned home to his family in West Virginia and ultimately became the city engineer of Moundsville where his most notable achievement was the building of an important bridge that still exists in the old town on the Ohio River. He died in 1901, a bachelor, who was always known as an "able and true officer."

Andrew's presentation engendered a number of interested questions from viewers eager to learn more about this interesting story. Perhaps ZOOM has a future after all!

My father served under both Lee and Grant

In the August 1961 issue of Civil War Times, Mabel Tidball, daughter of Captain John C. Tidball, a very fine and oft-overlooked Army of the Potomac artilleryman wrote a letter to the editor.

How interesting to have the daughter of a prominent Civil war officer reading about her father in the Civil War Times a century after his exploits, Mabel was so pleased to have found her father's photo on the cover of the June 1961 issue that she decided to write in and share some details about his life.

Tidball was an 1848 graduate of West Point, making a career in the military and was seemingly at every major eastern battlefield during the Civil War. He earned five commissions, rising to the rank of Brevet Major General of Volunteers. He published a heavy artillery tactics textbook. Served as the third Commander (Governor) of the Department of Alaska. Even still Tidball is one of those unsung heroes of the Civil War.

Mabel was born in 1875 to Tidball's second wife, the daughter of Major General Napoleon J.T. Dana. That essentially makes Mabel Tidball akin to Civil War royalty in 1961. She would live to just a few days short of her 99th birthday, passing away in 1974! We aren't so far removed from the Civil War.

In her letter to the editor, Mabel identifies each soldier posed in the most recognizable of Tidball wartime photos, taken at Fair Oaks on July 1, 1862. She even points out the out-of-focus soldier in the back as her father's orderly, holding Tidball's horse, which was killed later in the war.

"My father, J.C. Tidball, was Virginia-born, same as Robt. E. Lee, and had served under both Lee and Grant."

In October 1859 Tidball was in command of Battery B, 2nd U.S. Artillery at Fort Monroe. With news of John Brown's Raid at Harpers Ferry, President Buchanan ordered a detachment of Marines under the command of Colonel Robert E. Lee to proceed to the ferry and quell the uprising. Buchanan likewise ordered three companies of artillery to the scene, among them Battery B. Tidball made it as far as Baltimore before learning that the raid had been suppressed, and was ordered back to Fort Monroe.

On arriving back at the fort, the guns were immediately turned around and again ordered to Harpers Ferry with orders to garrison there as a deterrent to any further violence. Tidball would recall...

"When we arrived, the men were quartered in vacant warehouses or any buildings where space could be found for them, while officers took up their abodes wherever they could find room, chiefly in office rooms of the shops amid the whirl of machinery and the grime and dust of work going on. The armory was in full operation, turning out muskets, rifles, pistols and swords to its utmost capacity..."

Tidball's guns would remain at Harpers Ferry until December 1859. And who was in command at the ferry during that period, you ask? Colonel Robert E. Lee. Tidball would later write of Lee during this period...

My father served under both Lee and Grant, cont.

"He was then in the prime of mature manhood, being fifty-two years of age. With a fine masculine figure, perfect in every proportion, he had a handsome, manly face. Altogether he was a perfect specimen of manhood. The dignity of his bearing, devoid as it was of all arrogance or affectation, arrested the attention of all who came within its influence. The affability of his manners made him approachable and agreeable under all conditions. He was exceedingly punctilious in points of etiquette, and I well recall that although we officers were quartered around in the buildings in the most inconvenient places, he took special pains to seek us all out and make a friendly call upon each one. His pleasing manners put everyone at ease, and his conversation was gentle and mild. Although scrupulously particular in dress and personal neatness, he had none of the airs of foppishness about him."

At Harpers Ferry Lee would institute daily dress parades on the armory grounds, instilling pride in the artillery and infantry troops there. On being ordered back to Fort Monroe that December, Tidball was seated next to Lee on the train out of Harpers Ferry. He would later recall their conversation as "most charming, and little then did I then think that within less than five years he would be marching his Rebel hosts over this region for the purpose of dismembering the union which he had for so many years honorably served."

Alfred Pleasanton said of him that Tidball was "performing the duties of (a) general officer with only the rank of captain, and I most urgently recommend that (he) be promoted to the rank of Brigadier General. The Artillery arm requires organization in the higher grades. There are no general officers who by their service are so much entitled to this distinction as Captain Tidball."

Civil War Definitions

Abatis: (pronounced ab-uh-tee, ab-uh-tis, uh-bat-ee, or uh-bat-is) A line of trees, chopped down and placed with their branches facing the enemy, used to strengthen fortifications.

Breastworks: Barriers which were about breast-high and protected soldiers from enemy fire.

Abatis

Chevaux-de-Frise: (pronounced sheh-VOH-de-freez) A defensive obstacle constructed by using a long horizontal beam pierced with diagonal rows of sharpened spikes. When several cheval-de-frise (singular, pronounced she-VAL-de-freez) were bolted together they created an effective barrier for roads and fortifications.

Copperhead: Term for a Northerner who opposed the war effort

Nom-de-guerre: (pronounced nahm-duh-gair) Literally, in French this means “war name”. A nom-de-guerre is a nickname earned in battle, such as “Stonewall” Jackson or “Fighting Joe” Hooker.

“Peculiar Institution”: Another term for slavery in the South.

“Infernal Machine”: A term of contempt for torpedoes (either the land or the water variety). This term was also used to describe the Confederate vessel H.L. Hunley- the first successful submarine.

Chevaux-de-Frise

Santa Claus by Thomas Nast

He is generally credited with creating our version of Santa as a jolly old man with white hair and beard during the Civil War.

Tough Meat

Those whose teeth are not strong enough to masticate hard beef should cut their steaks the day before using into slices about two inches thick, rub over them a small quantity of soda, wash off next morning, cut them into suitable thickness, and cook according to fancy. The same process will answer for any description of tough meat.

Blackberry Wine

Measure your berries and bruise them; to every gallon add one quart of boiling water, let the mixture stand twenty-four hours, stirring occasionally, then strain off the liquor into a cask; to every gallon add two pounds of sugar, cork tight, and let it stand till following October, and you will have wine ready for use without any further straining or boiling, that will make lips smack as they never smacked under similar influence before.

To Keep Arms and Polished Metal from Rust

Dissolve one ounce of camphor in two pounds of hog's lard, observing to take off the scum, then mix as much black lead as will give the mixture an iron color. Fire arms & polished metal rubbed over with this mixture, left twenty-four hours, and then dried with a linen cloth, will keep clean for many months.

Book Review: Patriots Twice by Tim Winstead

If you are a trivia buff, PATRIOTS TWICE is a great read and resource. I find myself jumping all over the book reading about different people. Sam (author Stephen M. "Sam" Hood) follows so many individuals who made lasting contributions to this nation before, during and after the war..... This book is a most welcome addition to my library.

Henry Thompson Douglas was my favorite newly identified Confederate. As an engineer myself, Henry's service during the war greatly interested me. The fact that a Confederate became chief engineer of the B&O Railroad, after the damage the B&O endured during the war by various Confederate units, was an outstanding achievement. To me, Henry's position signified two things: 1) He was technically competent and 2) Henry had to have had a great skill with both the written and spoken word.

As with all of Sam's books, I feel his delight with the discovery of "stories" which reflect on the personalities, great and small, who shaped the United States during this incredible period in our history.

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

He received the Medal of Honor on July 23, 1892. As Colonel of the 61st NY, Nelson Miles received the MOH for his valor in covering the Union retreat to the Chancellor House after Stonewall Jackson's famous flank attack. Miles was wounded twice in the action. By the end of the war, he was a Brigadier General commanding a division in the II Corps in the Appomattox Campaign.

Miles played a leading role in nearly all of the U.S. Army's campaigns against the American Indian tribes of the Great Plains. In the winter of 1877, he drove his troops on a forced march across eastern Montana to intercept the Nez Perce band led by Chief Joseph after the Nez Perce War. For the rest of his career, Miles would quarrel with General Oliver O. Howard over credit for Joseph's capture.

He was named Commanding General of the United States Army in 1895, a post he held during the Spanish American War. He rose to the leadership of the Army even though he wasn't a professional soldier and entered the service as a volunteer at the beginning of the Civil War.

To show that he was still physically able to command, on July 14, 1903, less than a month before his 64th birthday, General Miles rode the 90 miles from Fort Sill to Fort Reno, Oklahoma, in eight hours' riding time (10 hrs. 20 mins total), in temperatures between 90 and 100 °F (32 and 38 °C). The distance was covered on a relay of horses stationed at 10-mile intervals; the first 30 miles were covered in 2 hours, 25 minutes. This was the longest horseback ride ever made by a commanding general of the army.

Miles nevertheless retired from the army in 1903 upon reaching the mandatory retirement age of 64. Upon his retirement, the office of Commanding General of the United States Army was abolished by an Act of Congress and the Army Chief of Staff system was introduced.

Miles died in 1925 at the age of 85 from a heart attack. Nelson was one of the last surviving general officers who served during the Civil War on either side. He is buried at Arlington National Cemetery in the Miles Mausoleum. It is one of only two mausoleums within the confines of the cemetery.

Lions of the Dan: Best of Men in the Worst of Times

At our last meeting, via Zoom, J. Kenneth Brandau, author of "Lions of the Dan", presented a "brigade history" of Brigadier General Lewis Armistead's brigade made famous by its role in "Pickett's Charge" on July 3, 1863. The strength of the brigade before the charge was reported as 1,950 men. A total of 1,191 were reported as casualties, including 643 who were missing or captured.

Ken Brandau, a native of Richmond and a retired scientist, has lived almost his entire life in the state of Virginia, and he contends that a Virginia-centric narrative of the events of the climactic engagement of the Battle of Gettysburg has upstaged the efforts of North Carolina units in the charge.

Most of the five regiments in Armistead's brigade were from southside Virginia, a region that had more in common with North Carolina than it did with the more aristocratic culture of Tidewater and James River Virginia. Danville, on the Dan River, was the only town of any consequence in the region and because of the southeastward flowing rivers, commerce and cultural interaction was directed toward North Carolina.

Armistead, a former regular officer in the U.S. Army, began the war as the colonel of the 57th Virginia, a regiment raised in southside Virginia. He was born in New Bern, N.C., but raised in Upperville, Virginia, in the beautiful piedmont country of Northern Virginia, and he always considered himself a Virginian. He was a member of a distinguished military family that included the commander of Ft. McHenry at the time of the British attack that led Francis Scott Key to pen the words to the "Star Spangled Banner." He left West Point under a cloud and many authorities believe that the primary cause was his boisterous behavior including breaking a plate over Jubal Early's head in a mess hall fracas.

Nonetheless, he became an officer during the Seminole Wars and was recognized for bravery in the war with Mexico. He served on the frontier and was part of the notable cadre of officers serving in Los Angeles at the outbreak of the Civil War, a cadre that included Albert Sidney Johnston and Winfield Scott Hancock.

Armistead's 57th Infantry was sent to the Virginia-North Carolina border in 1862 when Burnside led the Union's successful invasion of North Carolina's sound country. Too late to blunt the Union campaign, the regiment was quickly sent to the Peninsula to oppose McClellan's drive on Richmond. The regiment was brigaded with two other Virginia regiments and a Georgia unit but played no significant role in the siege of Yorktown. On April 1, 1862, Armistead was promoted to Brigadier General and given command of a brigade comprising the 9th, 14th, 38th, 53rd and 57th Virginia infantry regiments.

Retreating with the rest of Joseph Johnston's command, they fought at Seven Pines and were involved in a "friendly fire" incident that contributed to heavy casualties in the 38th Virginia. With the wounding of General Johnston, General Robert E. Lee was given command of the Confederate army defending Richmond and he promptly launched the intense series of battles that became known as the “Seven Days.”

Armistead’s brigade fought at Glendale and was heavily engaged at Malvern Hill when confused communications resulted in an attack that Lee attempted to call off. The 57th Virginia broke under Union artillery fire and Armistead may have left the battlefield prematurely. The brigade was seen as somewhat unreliable after that.

As McClellan retreated and the Union brought General John Pope east to command another army to threaten Richmond, Lee boldly ignored McClellan and turned to attack Pope. This movement resulted in the huge and bloody battle of Second Manassas, or Bull Run. Outnumbered but with a combat strength of about 55,000 men, Lee kept Armistead’s brigade in reserve, the only Confederate brigade not engaged in the battle.

In one of the most incredible feats of all of military history, Lee’s recently named Army of Northern Virginia, left the killing fields of Manassas and turned north to invade Maryland. Battles ensued at South Mountain, Harper’s Ferry and, then culminated in the bloodiest day in American history at Sharpsburg, or Antietam. Imagine the Confederate legions who fought with Jackson in the Valley or Magruder and Johnston on the Peninsula, then faced McClellan in the Seven Days, tangled with Pope at Second Manassas, and, in September they face McClellan again at Antietam.

Once more, however, Armistead and his brigade are held back somewhat, acting as provost guard to help control straggling on the march into Maryland. The brigade sees action in the West Wood and around the Dunker Church but emerges from the Battle of Antietam with the smallest casualty list in the Army of Northern Virginia. Armistead is wounded in the arm but is able to rejoin his brigade relatively quickly.

In November of 1862 the brigade is placed in the division of Major General George Pickett. They defend a position in the middle of the line at Fredericksburg and are, once again, comparatively lightly engaged.

The rest of the winter was passed in foraging and containment of Union forces in southeastern Virginia and, although called back to the army for the battle of Chancellorsville in May of 1863, the brigade doesn’t arrive in time to play a role in the battle.

So, as the great dramatic point of the war approaches, this brigade has been present at most of the great battles of the Eastern Theater but with the exception of Malvern Hill, it has not been greatly tested and, still, there is some question about the soundness of the unit.

As the Battle of Gettysburg unfolds, Pickett’s division arrives late on July 2 and thus is one of the most fit for battle on July 3. Armistead’s brigade is placed behind the other two brigades in Pickett’s division—Garnett’s and Kemper’s. Trimble’s and Pettigrew’s divisions, bitterly engaged on the previous days and weakened in strength, were on the left.

The divisions on the left had less distance to cover and Pickett’s fresh division on the right needed to march further to bring its weight to bear as the Army of Northern Virginia attempted to overwhelm the Union defenders in what appeared to be a vulnerable salient on Cemetery Hill.

As the Confederates converged toward the “copse of trees,” Union artillery assailed them on both sides and the understrength 8th Ohio, orphaned from the other regiments in its

CFCWRT November Presentation: Lt. Francis Hoge

“An Able and True Officer”

Lt. Francis “Frank” Hoge

Because of ongoing COVID 19 restrictions, a change has been made for our November program. On November 12, Andrew Duppstadt, historic sites specialist for the State of NC, will tell us about Lt. Francis Lyell “Frank” Hoge, a U.S. Naval Academy graduate who chose to side with the Confederacy and compiled an outstanding record in the fighting on the sounds and rivers of eastern North Carolina.

Andrew had been scheduled to present this program in December but has agreed to make the presentation a month earlier. It will be presented via Zoom.

Francis Lyell Hoge, known as “Frank,” was born in Moundsville, Virginia, in January 1841. Moundsville is a small city on the Ohio River in what is today the state of West Virginia.

Appointed to the U.S. Naval Academy in 1856 as an “acting midshipman,” he graduated in 1860 and became a “passed midshipman” in the U.S. Navy. When war came, however, he resigned his U.S. commission and accepted a commission in the Confederate States Navy.

The youthful officer proved his mettle in several difficult engagements and survived a near fatal wound in 1863.

He took part in the famous expedition led by Col. John Taylor Wood to attempt to sink the USS Underwriter off New Bern. Such expeditions were exceedingly dangerous in the 19th Century and young Hoge was the first to board the enemy vessel. Be sure to tune in and hear the rest of this exciting story.

Andrew Duppstadt, a member of our round table, is a BA and MA graduate in history at UNCW. He is stationed at the CSS Neuse historic site in Kinston and is also an adjunct history instructor at UNC Pembroke.

brigade, held its post in front of the main Union line on the left of the attacking Confederates. They hit Brockenbrough's Brigade, the left-most brigade under Brigadier General James Pettigrew's command, in the flank and that Virginia unit broke under the combined effect of the Union artillery and the Ohio rifle fire. It was the beginning of the end for the attack.

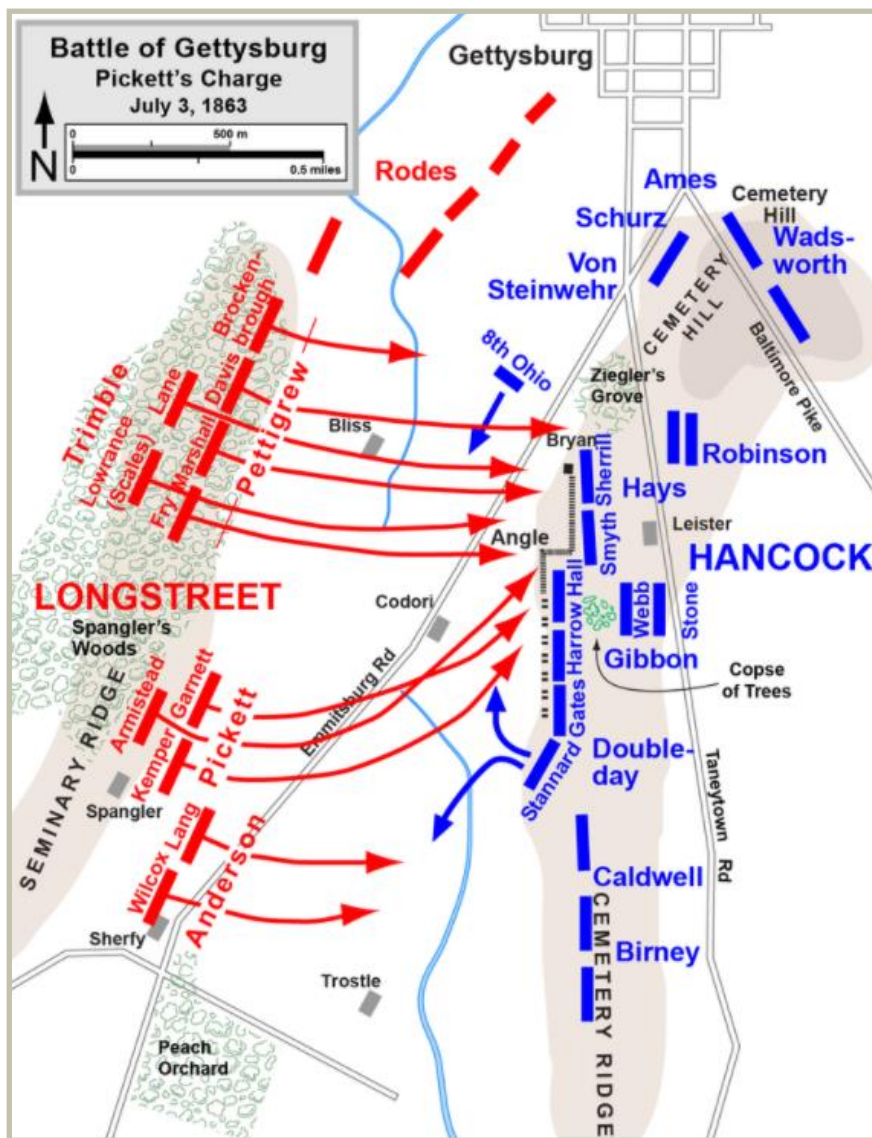

Mr. Brandau notes that as Armistead's brigade approached the objective, the troops to his left, under Pettigrew, had already been repulsed. The 26th and 55th North Carolina regiments under Pettigrew are credited with making the farthest advance of the attack but pressure from Union infantry to their front and left, as well as the powerful artillery, forced them back.

The Virginians of Armistead's brigade breached the stone wall of the Union center and as General Armistead fell with a mortal wound, the survivors surrendered or attempted to retreat. Ultimately, the flag of the 38th Virginia, Armistead's leftmost regiment, was captured by the 8th Ohio, still assailing the Confederate left, along the Emmitsburg Road.

Ken Brandau explicates the significance of these events based on letters and reports that have been overlooked. He states: "transcripts of two letters from Capt. John A. Herndon Co. D, 38th Virginia (both letters are in the Gregory A. Coco Research Collection at Gettysburg National Military Park) describe being a mere '30 paces' from the works when forced to refuse their flank. (The need for this, of course, could have only happened if Pickett had arrived after Pettigrew and Trimble had already been repulsed. It is apparent then, since Fry [Archer's Brigade in Pettigrew's Division] was the brigade of direction, it was Pickett who was late and failed to support, not the other way around.)"

The official report of Major Joseph R. Cabell of the 38th Virginia also provides similar information. Major Cabell was in command of the entire brigade in the retreat from the Union line because he was the only field grade officer who returned uninjured. Ken Brandau found his report in the American Civil War Museum (formerly the Museum of the Confederacy) in Richmond.

Major Cabell writes that Col. E.C. Edmonds, commander of the regiment was killed by fire from the left flank as the regiment advanced to about "30 paces" from the Union field works. Lt. Colonel Powhatan B. Whittle, grievously wounded at Malvern Hill, attempted to rally the regiment but was also shot down, leaving Major Cabell in command. He writes: "I attempted to change the front of my left companies" but found that such a movement was impracticable. He notes that scattered Confederates coming up from the right rear never made it and "seeing all the troops giving away on my right I supposed the order to retire had been given and re-ordered the remnant of the Regiment."

In an email message, Ken Brandau writes: "Bottom line, Virginia's 'Lost Cause' narratives have always unfairly upstaged the contributions of Pettigrew and Trimble at Gettysburg. In like fashion, Virginia 'history' does equal disservice to her many real heroes like Edmonds, Whittle, Cabell, etc. by perpetuating Gettysburg fantasies of Armistead and Pickett. Neither Pickett, nor Armistead had careers which withstand scrutiny outside the context of Gettysburg."

The southside Virginians of Armistead's brigade soldiered on in North Carolina and Tidewater Virginia before helping to stop Ben Butler's thrust into Bermuda Hundred in 1864 and then in the trenches of Petersburg.

In 1865 the brigade was once again in the midst of controversy as the division, while Pickett was absent at a shad bake, was defeated at the pivotal battle of Five Forks, forcing the evacuation of the Petersburg and Richmond defenses. Pickett was rebuked by Lee after that and never regained Lee's regard.

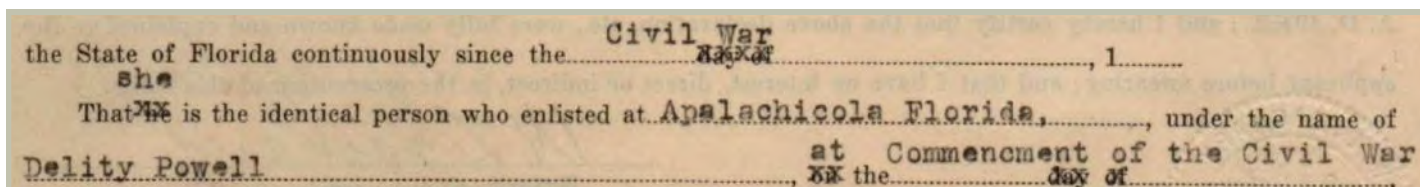

Mr. Brandau summarized his saga with the opinion that the "Lions of the Dan" were among the "best of men in the worst of times."

Delity Powell Kelly: A Child in a Confederate Camp by Sheritta Bitikofer

In January of 1930, a new soldier's pension application was submitted in the state of Florida. While at first glance, this was nothing unusual for the time. Soldiers were growing older and desired compensation for their sacrifice to the Southern cause for independence. However, this application was special and marked up in unusual places. Instances where the word "he" were typed – referring to the applicant – had been crossed out and changed to "she." The veteran, Delilah "Delity" Powell Kelly, born June 4th, 1851, was not looking for a widow's pension. She was looking for a soldier's pension for her services as a young nurse in the Confederacy.

Excerpt from Delity Powell Pension Application (Floridamemory.com)

When the Confederacy's call for troops reached Apalachicola, Florida, Delity's father, Edward Powell, answered that call. He enlisted in Milton's Light Artillery under the command of Joseph L. Dunham. He became one of the 136 privates to help man and operate six guns – three 12-pounder brass rifles and three 12-pounder howitzers. Delity's mother, Nancy Elizabeth Powell, followed the artillery regiment as a laundress and nurse for the unit, taking their only daughter along with them. According to Delity's own account, she was given a uniform trimmed in red to denote that she belonged to her father's artillery regiment

Imagine being a child at places like Camp Dunham near Jacksonville. You are miles away from your home and friends, among strangers and doing chores night and day to make sure everything within the camp ran smoothly. Instead of having tea parties with her friends, she gave water from her canteen to dying men. Instead of trotting off to the schoolhouse every morning, Delity followed the camp doctors as they made their morning rounds. We know that she was literate, and she might have practiced her reading skills by deciphering the labels on the medicine bottles. She would not be helping to make bread for her small family, but for an entire camp of hungry artillerymen. Dresses and petticoats in the laundry were replaced by filthy socks and fetid uniforms as she and her mother did the laundry for the unit. Instead of tying ribbons in her hair, she tied off bandages over bleeding or gangrenous wounds. Her formative childhood years were spent listening to the groans of the wounded, the boom of artillery cannon, and the muttered prayers lifted up by the weary souls that wanted this war to end.

Her father wasn't the only man of Delity's family to join the war. Five of her uncles also enlisted. Benjamin Powell, who was very close in age to Delity according to his records, enlisted with Milton's Light Artillery as well, and later gave a notarized testimony to her services as a nurse and laundress for the company. John, James, and William Powell also enlisted with their older brother in March of 1861 into the same regiment. Another uncle by the name of Elijah did not enlist in the artillery regiment, and instead joined the infantry in August of 1861, mustering in with the Fourth Florida Infantry. Elijah went on to serve the Confederacy far away from his home and family.

Milton's Light Artillery remained in the deep South during the war. Delity's first taste of war came at St. Johns Bluff near Jacksonville in October of 1862. But this was not the last time she witnessed how devastating the war could be.

In the spring of 1863, the Milton Light Artillery was split into two companies. Company A remained under the command of Captain Dunham, while the newly promoted Captain Henry Abell was given Company B. The Powells followed Abell into this newly formed company, which made the muster rolls a little confusing. In many instances, men were listed under both companies. Delity's own headstone indicated that she served within Company A, but under Abell's command.

In the winter of that same year, bad news filtered its way to Camp Dunham near Gainesville. Edward's brother, fighting in Tennessee, had been captured at Missionary Ridge during the battles around Chattanooga. Elijah Powell's name would show on the first prisoner roster at the newly formed Rock Island Prison. Worse than that, Elijah had been wounded in the battle in which he was captured. He was shot in the right leg just below the knee, as well as at the corner of his eye. This eventually led to total blindness in that eye. The tragedy of war had finally made its way to Delity's personal circle.

Their greatest test of valor and perseverance came in February of 1864 at the battle of Olustee, the largest battle of the Civil War to take place on Florida soil. Delity and her mother made themselves useful at Lake City Hospital, fifteen miles from the battlefield.

The hardship of war would hit home one more time for Delity when Edward became wounded in the battle. Milton's Artillery had lost five of its guns to a band of raiding Federals at Baldwin, so Company B under Captain Abell was attached to the First Georgia Regulars. A shell fragment struck Edward's leg, and though the wound wasn't serious enough to warrant an amputation, the injury would give him trouble in his later years. According to his pension application statement, the knee that was injured during the battle had caused some type of permanent swelling, making this knee noticeably larger than the other. This made it difficult to work in the labor industry after the war.

Jacksonville became occupied by the Union army in February of 1864 – prior to the battle at Olustee – and the artillery unit went on to serve in several smaller engagements, including the skirmish at Cedar Key in March of 1864, the battle at Horse Landing in May, and then the battle at Gainesville in August of that same year.

Elijah was not the only one to become imprisoned during the war. According to Delity in her pension application – backed by the testimony of Benjamin Powell – she and her mother were captured not once, but twice in the course of their service. One of these occurrences took place in Baldwin, Florida and for a month and fourteen days, Delity and her mother were kept prisoner by the Federals. It was likely that this didn't give them a break from their usual duties, as nurses and laundresses were in high demand on both sides. Delity and her mother managed a daring escape from captivity by jumping out the window of their prison – presumably a local home or hospital – and made their way back to Camp Dunham to reunite with Edward.

The Confederacy surrendered in April of 1865 and the South was thrown into the era of Reconstruction. Both companies of the Milton Light Artillery were included with the May 10th surrender between Major General Samuel Jones commanding the Department of South Carolina, Florida, and South Georgia, and Brigadier General Edward Moody McCook at Tallahassee, Florida, the same day that Jefferson Davis was captured in Irwinsville, Georgia. Veterans of the war came home to rebuild their lives – including Elijah who had survived Rock Island for two years. Delity, now almost 14 years old, moved to Pensacola, Florida with her family. Edward and Nancy had three more children and Edward supported his family as a fisherman, which was familiar work for him, since he worked as a sailor with his father in Apalachicola. Delity grew up, occasionally putting her nursing skills to good use as she helped to take care of her younger siblings. Those who knew Delity in her final years described her as a deeply religious woman. This could have been due to her experiences in the war or by her father's elevation to the position of an elder in the Church of Latter Day Saints within a decade after the war. Edward officiated the marriage between his nephew Benjamin and fiancé, Savine Milstead in 1878.

In January of 1871, Delity married James Kelly, an illiterate carpenter from Santa Rosa County. They had four children and by the 1930s, they had all started families of their own, leaving Delity and James with an empty nest. By then, both were too old to work. Whether under the encouragement of her family or her own gumption, Delity decided to do something that no other woman had succeeded in doing in the state of Florida.

In January of 1930, she first submitted her application for a soldier's pension. It seemed like a simple process. She was to give her testimony of service, backed by two or more others who could confirm her story, then sign her name at the bottom of the page.

Three other veterans who worked closely with Milton's Light Artillery gave their signed testimonies to Delity's services, saying that they indeed saw her in the red-trimmed artillery uniform and watched her give aid to the wounded. One of these witnesses was her uncle, Benjamin Powell. The other was a former cavalry private by the name of Joseph Strickland, who was living with his son's family at the time when he testified to Delity's service. Private Strickland had been with the Fifteenth Confederate Cavalry post-September 1863 and operated in Alabama for most of that time, but prior to that he had enlisted with the Third Florida Battalion, also known as the "Magnolia Dragoons", who worked closely with other Florida units like Milton's Light Artillery. Strickland also vouched for Benjamin's service when he applied for a pension some years earlier, mentioning Elijah in the same affidavit. In fact, looking into all of the pension records for Delity's uncles reveals that they all vouched for one another's service when they individually applied, or when their widows applied for compensation.

Delity Powell Kelly was awarded her pension rights, becoming the only woman in the state of Florida to receive a soldier's pension for services rendered during the Civil War. Every year until her death, she was given $480. According to the records and pension approval, she was to be issued her pension "at the same rate and in the same manner that other pensioners are paid."

October 31st, 1939, at the age of 88, Delity passed away. Initially buried in an unmarked grave, it took almost fifty years before her story would be uncovered by her descendants. She was reinterred in the 1980s in Saint Michael's Cemetery in Pensacola, Florida, and given a proper grave marker that forever proclaims her services to the Confederate cause as a nurse.

All too often, we take for granted that the Civil War didn't solely affect the adults who enlisted or volunteered their services. The lives of every American were touched by the conflict. Children, young and impressionable, became casualties of the war, either in a physical or psychological sense. Delity's story reminds us that the war was no respecter of age or gender. At the tender age of ten years old, she had to shoulder a weight that not many grownups could handle today. It's by this resilience and bravery that she deserves to be remembered and honored for sacrificing her childhood.

Check out “The First Shots of the Civil War,” which recounts the tale of Charleston and Fort Sumter in the opening days of the war.

Located in Charleston harbor, Fort Sumter was still held by Union forces in April 1861, despite South Carolina’s secession in 1860. National Park Service historian Mark Maloy described the events of April 12, 1861, when Confederate guns around the harbor opened fire on Fort Sumter. This talk was part of a symposium on “The War in the East” hosted by the “Emerging Civil War” blog.

In October 1862, Confederate cavalry under General J.E.B. Chuck Veit - On the Verge of the Great War

This talk will reveal how our war was perceived by foreign nations. Their involvement went way beyond France and England and Russia to include Belgium, Austria, Italy, Spain, Prussia and even the Vatican. Their heads of state--and most especially Pope Pius IX--were absolute death on our Republic. Pius actually went so far as to provide a letter to Jeff Davis that his officers could use to try to stem Irish enlistment in the Union Army, pronouncing republicanism anathema.

You will learn how Britain and France feared that had they intervened, and the South suddenly was again able to supply cotton, they feared Davis would demand gold at the new higher price--and drain their exchequers. So, they needed the war to continue and, best to hope for, wind down slowly, with both sides returned to a prewar balance. You’ll learn how Russia, not an ally of America, used our ports for their navy as a threat against France and Britain so as to suppress the Prussian revolution. Finally, you’ll learn that the American Civil War spawned revolutions and reform in Europe.

This talk will discuss the creation and activities of the first organized veterans’ group, the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR). Much has been said about their tireless advocacy for veteran rights and benefits, yet the history of the GAR has largely been lost. Chris Kolakowski brings that history to life as he tells how it was formed, its mission, its membership, racial integration, the many GAR posts that existed throughout America and the rich legacy inherited by the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War.

Lisa G. Samia - So Runs the World Away

This will be an in-depth look into the lives of John Wilkes Booth and his older sister Asia Booth Clarke, from the time of their teenage years and into their early adulthood. After their father's death in 1852, a bond of sympathy and mutual devotion between John and Asia grew in the years spent at Tudor Hall. Here she writes they were "lonely together." Asia's insights were gathered from her memoir written in 1874 - John Wilkes Booth "A Sister's Memoir." This is the single most important document in the complex life of John Wilkes Booth. What were the prophetic words said to Asia by John on her wedding day? What did John mean when on their last visit together he said, "God Bless you, sister mine. Take care of yourself, and try to be happy"? What happened to Asia after the assassination? "So runs the world away" are the last words in her memoir taken from Hamlet, Act 3, Scene 2, What is she saying? Mindful that it is never just words on a page.

A word about Wreaths Across America. As of this 10/30, we are half way towards meeting our goal of 60 wreaths. Recall please that you may send your check to CFCWRT, PO Box 15750, Wilmington, NC 29408 or you may go to the Wreaths Across America website and purchase a wreath, in $15 increments, by credit card. Due to Covid, the planned wreath laying ceremony will not be held but the wreaths will be delivered early for distribution to graves on 17, 18 & 19 December. Details will follow.

Civil War Medical Myth

There was no anesthesia. Amputations were always performed while men were conscious.

Case studies included in the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion indicate that 95% of all amputations executed by Union surgeons were performed under anesthesia. When chloroform or ether were not available, operations were sometimes postponed, rather than subject the wounded to inhumane amputation without the benefit of anesthesia. As for Confederate surgeons, in an address delivered before the Southern Surgical and Gynaecological Association, Nashville, Tenn., November 13, 1889, Dr. Hunter Holmes McGuire reported "...in the corps to which I was attached (2nd Corps ANV), chloroform was given over 28,000 times..." In a piece called "Confederate Medical Service" Dr. Deering J. Roberts expanded: "Many Confederate surgeons reported that at no time did they fail in having an adequate supply of the three most important drugs, quinine, morphia, and chloroform."

After the end of the Civil War whatever happened to...?

General Winfield Scott Hancock

Called the most “conspicuous” of all Union Commanders by General U. S. Grant, remained a regular army general until 1886. He was nominated for the presidency in 1880, losing to James A. Garfield by a small margin of votes. Died at Governors Island, New York February 9, 1886.

Hancock’s portrait adorns U.S. currency on the $2 Silver Certificate series of 1886. Approximately 1,500 to 2,500 of these bills survive today in numismatic collections. Hancock’s bill is ranked number 73 on a list of “100 Greatest American Currency Notes”.

Union Army was a Multicultural Force

One-third of the soldiers who fought for the Union Army were immigrants, and nearly one in 10 was African American.

The Union Army was a multicultural force—even a multinational one.

We often hear about Irish soldiers (7.5 percent of the army), but the Union's ranks included even more Germans (10 percent), who marched off in regiments such as the Steuben Volunteers. Other immigrant soldiers were French, Italian, Polish, English and Scottish. In fact, one in four regiments contained a majority of foreigners.

Blacks were permitted to join the Union Army in 1863, and some scholars believe this infusion of soldiers may have turned the tide of the war.

Edwin (Ed) Bearss, June 1923 - September 2020

We mourn the loss of Ed Bearss, who at the age of 97, passed away last month. Ed was, perhaps, the greatest Civil War historian of our age. He spent the war years with the USMC, became chief historian with the National Park Service and influenced generations of historians, many of whom are members of this and other Civil War Round Tables. His booming voice will be missed but perhaps even more significant was his boundless energy and enthusiasm for our discipline. Many of our number, especially in the Lower Cape Fear, will miss his friendship, his leadership and wise council. Rest in Peace Sir !

CFCWRT Announces Christmas Wreath Drive

As in years past, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will support the Wreaths Across America effort to cover every veteran's grave in the Wilmington National Cemetery, with a Christmas Wreath. Our effort will run from 1 October, 2020 until 15 November. Wreaths will be delivered for distribution on Saturday 19 December. We, along with other community organizations have a goal of some 5,172 wreaths, thus covering all veteran's graves.

This year, due to meeting limitations, we will be totally dependent upon our membership to remit funds by mail. The process is simple. Please submit your contribution, in $15 increments, by check, payable to CFCWRT, c/o PO Box 15750, Wilmington, NC 28408.

Should you prefer to donate by credit card, please go directly to the WAA web site and navigate to Wilmington National Cemetery and donate through our CWRT (NC0240P). Should you desire to donate to another cemetery, go to the WAA web site and select your location, donating through your favorite (listed) organization. Sponsoring organizations, such as our CFCWRT, will receive $5 for each wreath purchased.

Folks, this has been a difficult year. What better way to complete the annual cycle than by honoring the memory of those veterans who experienced difficult years, many more difficult than this one.

CFCWRT October Meeting

J. Ken Brandau

Due to the continuing situation with regard to the Covid19 "thing", we have effected a change to our scheduled speakers. Ken Rutherford who speaks on Civil War Mines & Torpedoes, will now make his presentation in February and our February speaker, J. Ken Brandau, will make a Zoom presentation of his book, Lions of the Dan on October 8th.

Lions of the Dan, is the previously untold story of Armistead's Brigade and chronicles those men of Pickett's Charge over the full course of the Civil War. Time honored celebrations of Armistead and Pickett focus narrowly on those moments at Gettysburg yet primary sources declare the untold story of the best of men caught up in the worst of times. Lions of the Dan refutes the Lost Cause myths surrounding Armistead and Pickett. J. Ken Brandau, for the first time, widens the aperture to introduce real heroes and amazing deeds.

Mr. Brandau was born in Richmond, VA and grew up on Richmond's Southside. This Son of the South, graduated from Old Dominion with a B.S in Chemistry and spent a career with the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

He has written several books and journals reflecting his love of history, especially Civil War history. His meticulous research and dramatic writing style make for an enjoyable read and in the case of a Zoom presentation, makes for dramatic viewing.

Time and place are Thursday, 8 October (our usual meeting date) beginning at 7:00 PM. Zoom Master Ed Gibson will begin receiving your calls at 6:45 (1845). President Bill Jayne will begin the broadcast with remarks and speaker introduction, promptly at 7:00 PM. Details, complete with registration numbers and link will be provided a day (or so) prior to the presentation.

Our initial experience with a Zoom presentation (September - Dwight Hughes) was superb but missed by far too many members. We will, I'm sure, do better in October.

Benjamin Huger 1805 - 1877

Benjamin Huger (November 22, 1805 - December 7, 1877) was a career U.S. Army ordnance officer and a Confederate general in the American Civil War.

Huger was born in Charleston, South Carolina. His grandfather, also named Benjamin Huger, was a patriot in the American Revolution, killed at Charleston during the British occupation. Huger graduated from the U.S. Military Academy in 1825 and was commissioned a second lieutenant in the 3rd U.S. Artillery. He served as a topographical engineer until 1828, then took a leave of absence to visit Europe. Upon his return, he became an ordnance officer and spent the majority of his career at that occupation. He commanded Fortress Monroe arsenal for twelve years, and was a member of the U.S. Army Ordnance Board for seven.

In the Mexican-American War, Huger was chief of ordnance on the staff of Winfield Scott, and received brevets to major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Vera Cruz, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec. In 1852 he was presented a sword by South Carolina in recognition of the honor his career had cast upon his native state. After this war he served on the board that prepared a system of artillery instruction for the army, and was in command of the armories at Harpers Ferry, Charleston, and Pikesville, Maryland

At the start of the Civil War, he was commissioned colonel of artillery in the Confederate States Army. On May 23, 1861, he was assigned to command the Department of Norfolk, with defensive responsibilities for North Carolina and southern Virginia. By October 7, 1861, he achieved the rank of major general. In May of 1862, when Union troops were approaching, Huger ordered the destruction of the Norfolk works and naval yard at Portsmouth. He dismantled the CSS Virginia ironclad and evacuated the area. While in command of Roanoke Island, he failed to reinforce his position, and his command had to surrender to the Union expeditionary force. Although the Confederate Congress investigated Huger's part in this defeat, Confederate President Jefferson Davis assigned him to division command under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in the Army of Northern Virginia.

Huger led his division at Seven Pines and in several of the Seven Days Battles (now under the command of Robert E. Lee). He was criticized for his lackluster leadership in battles such as White Oak Swamp and Malvern Hill. Lee relieved of him duty on July 12, 1862, part of his wider purge of generals who did not meet Lee's expectations for aggressive tendencies in battle.

Following combat service on the Virginia Peninsula, Huger was assigned to be Assistant Inspector General of artillery and ordnance for the Confederate Army, and in 1863 was appointed Chief of Ordnance for the Trans-Mississippi Department. After the war, he was a farmer in North Carolina and Virginia, finally returning in poor health to his home in South Carolina.

Huger died in Charleston in 1877 and is buried in Greenmount Cemetery, Baltimore, Maryland. He was memorialized when the U.S. Army constructed "Battery Huger" inside the historic walls of Fort Sumter for the Spanish-American War.

Did you know? Confederate Flags

P. G. T. Beauregard served as adjutant general for the Louisiana state militia, 1879–88. In 1888, he was elected as commissioner of public works in New Orleans. When John Bell Hood and his wife died in 1879, leaving ten destitute orphans, Beauregard used his influence to get Hood's memoirs published, with all proceeds going to the children.

Did you know?

Confederate Brigadier General J.E.B. Stuart was known for his larger-than-life behavior both in and out of combat.

After one raid on Union forces in northern Virginia in which he claimed over 150 horses and mules, Stuart personally sent a gloating telegraph message to the U.S. Army's quartermaster general mocking him about the lost supplies.

Confederate Flag known as Stars and Bars

Confederate Battle Flag

Confederate General P.G.T. Beauregard was instrumental in creating the battle flag that has come to be synonymous with the Confederacy. Following the First Battle of Bull Run in 1861, he approved a new flag design for the Army of Northern Virginia after recognizing that the original Confederate flag—known as the “Stars and Bars”—looked too similar to the U.S. flag when seen in the confusion of battle.

Radical Warrior: August Willich's Journey from German Revolutionary to Union General (University of Tennessee Press 2020) is the biography of a Prussian army officer who renounced his nobility and joined in the failed European revolutions of 1848. He emigrated to America, edited a daily labor newspaper in Cincinnati, and became one of the most accomplished generals in the Union Army. This story sheds new light on the contributions of 200,000 German-Americans who fought for the Union in the Civil War.

Dues Reminder

Members:

September is our normal dues renewal month and although the Steering Committee extended the Early Bird period, dues, in the amount of $25, are still due.

Realize please that the Round Table continues to have expenses (speaker honorariums, post office box, zoom and internet expenses etc.) and without raffles and silent auctions, we have no income other than dues and your generosity.

Our thanks to those of you who have renewed for this new year (Sept 2020-Aug 2021).

Please make payments to CFCWRT, c/o PO Box 15750, Wilmington, NC 29408.

Battle of Carnifex Ferry - September 10, 1861

The Battle of Carnifex Ferry took place in the opening months of the Civil War at Nicholas County, Virginia (now West Virginia). The Union Army, under the direction of Brig. Gen. William S. Rosecrans sought to stop the advancing Confederate Army, under the direction of Gen. John B. Floyd. The battle took place near Summersville at an important crossing of the Gauley River and resulted in a strategic Union victory. The battle was an impetus to the movement that helped portions of Western Virginia break away to become the 35th state of West Virginia. Two future U.S. presidents, Rutherford B. Hayes, and William McKinley were among the soldiers who fought at Carnifex Ferry.

Patterson Home

Events leading up to the Battle of Carnifex Ferry had been unfolding for weeks. Confederate troops had advanced into the Kanawha Valley and launched an attack at Kessler's Cross Lanes (just over a mile from the ferry crossing) on August 26th. Proceeding to Carnifex Ferry, they drove Henry Patterson and his family from their farmhouse which overlooked the Gauley River. Some 2000 Confederate forces then set up a defensive position on the Patterson farm and along the steep cliffs overlooking the ferry.

In order to take control of the area, Rosecrans assembled a large army of 7,000 to push the Confederates southward. As the Federals advanced, the leading brigade encountered Floyd's pickets about 3:30 p.m. on the afternoon of September 10th at the ferry.

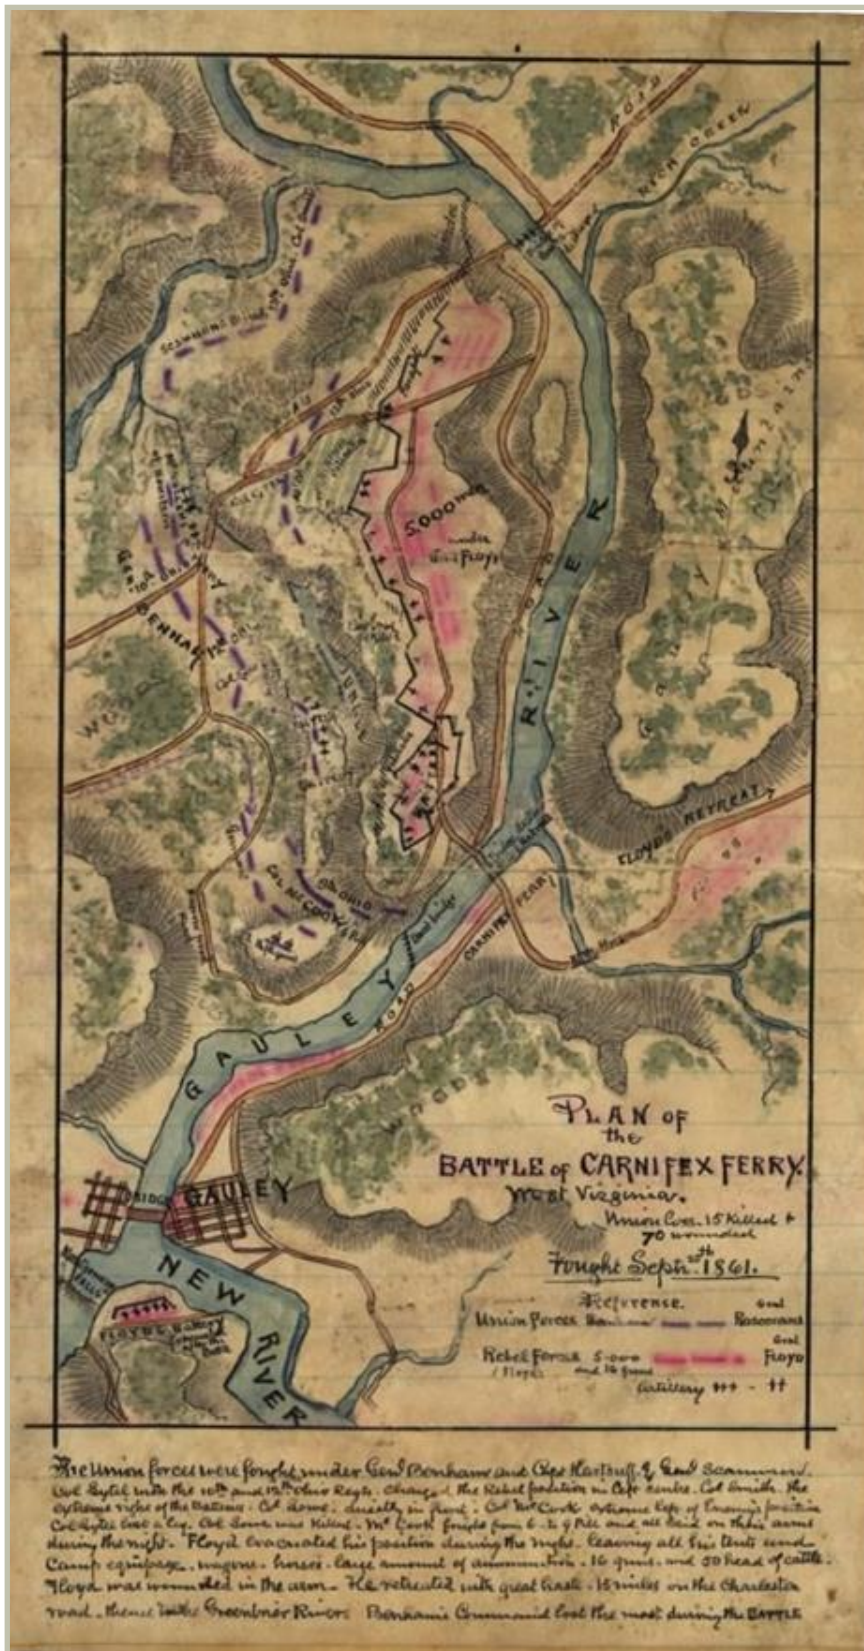

Rutherford B. Hayes, 38, and William McKinley, 18, both served in the Ohio 23rd Infantry. For many soldiers in the Ohio 23rd, this was their first battle experience (the unit mustered in just three months earlier). During the battle, the 23rd found themselves caught in a friendly fire incident while trying to flank the Confederate line. In the confusion and fleeting daylight, they started firing on their own men, killing two and wounding 30. The Patterson home was also caught in the crossfire from both armies and riddled with bullets. The structure still stands today at the Carnifex Ferry Battlefield State Park.

Fighting continued until dark, at which point the Confederates withdrew and the Union soldiers settled in for the night, prepared to resume the battle at daylight. During the night, Floyd, realizing that he was outnumbered and facing heavy Union artillery, decided to retreat his army across the ferry to the south side of the Gauley River and continue eastward to Meadow Bluff near Lewisburg. The Federals, exhausted from their march to Carnifex Ferry and the ensuing battle and facing adverse weather, decided against pursuit.

The conflict resulted in Union losses of 17 dead and 141 wounded. Confederate losses totaled 30 wounded with an unknown number of deaths. The Battle of Carnifex Ferry allowed the Federals to secure the Kanawha Valley and its tributaries which gave protection to those who favored secession from Virginia. Six weeks after the battle, residents of areas controlled by Union forces voted to form their own state, and in 1863, West Virginia joined the Union.

Embalming

As a result of these desires—to maintain familial control over the final resting place and, if possible, to have one last look before the body vanished—a new form of treating the dead appeared on the social scene, and paved the way for the birth of an entirely modern funeral industry.

Undertakers who contracted with Northern families began to experiment with innovative means to preserve bodies that had to be shipped long distances on train cars, often during the hot summer months.

The revolutionary practice that emerged in this context, embalming, provided both the military and Northern communities with a scientific, sanitary, and sensible way to move bodies across the land.

After the War

The Covid 19 pandemic has changed the fabric of this nation as well as the world. This is not the first time our nation has faced such a complete and drastic change. There have been many events that affected our nation but none as profoundly as the Civil War.

The Civil War had a greater impact on American society and the polity than any other event in the country's history. It was also the most traumatic experience endured by any generation of Americans. At least 620,000 soldiers lost their lives in the Civil War, 2 percent of the American population in 1861. More American soldiers became casualties at the Battle of Gettysburg than in the Revolutionary War and War of 1812 combined. For every three soldiers killed in battle, five more died of disease. Approximately one in four soldiers that went to war never returned home. It is estimated that one in three Southern households lost at least one family member. Thirty percent of Southern men between the ages of 24 and 35 died in the war. At the outset of the war, neither army had mechanisms in place to handle the amount of death that the nation was about to experience. There were no national cemeteries, no burial details, and no messengers of loss. The largest human catastrophe in American history, the Civil War forced the young nation to confront death and destruction in a way that has not been equaled before or since.

The long war was over, but for the victors the peace was marred by the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, the greatest figure of the war. The ex-Confederate states, after enduring the unsuccessful attempts of Reconstruction to impose a new society on the South, were readmitted to the Union, which had been saved and in which slavery was now abolished. The Civil War brought death to more Americans than did any other war, including World War II. Photographs by Mathew B. Brady and others reveal some of the horror behind the statistics. The war cost untold billions. It established many of the patterns, especially a strong central government, that are now taken for granted in American national life. Virtually every battlefield, with its graves, is either a national or a state park. Monuments commemorating Civil War figures and events are conspicuous in almost all sizable Northern towns and are even more numerous in the upper South.

Recruitment was highly localized throughout the war. Regiments of approximately one thousand men, the building block of the armies, would often be raised from the population of a few adjacent counties. Soldiers went to war with their neighbors and their kin. The nature of recruitment meant that a battlefield disaster could wreak havoc on the home community.

The 26th North Carolina, hailing from seven counties in the western part of the state, suffered 714 casualties out of 800 men during the Battle of Gettysburg. The 24th Michigan squared off against the 26th North Carolina at Gettysburg and lost 362 out of 496 men. Nearly the entire student body of Ole Miss--135 out 139--enlisted in Company A of the 11th Mississippi. Company A, also known as the "University Greys" suffered 100% casualties in Pickett's Charge. Eighteen members of the Christian family of Christiansburg, Virginia were killed during the war. One in thirteen surviving Civil War soldiers returned home missing one or more limbs. Pre-war jobs on farms or in factories became impossible or nearly so. This led to a rise in awareness of veterans' needs as well as increased responsibility and social power for women. For many, however, there was no solution. Tens of thousands of families slipped into destitution. The fabric of this nation was forever changed.

After the War was over and the Peace begun, all the major forces of the Confederate States of America had surrendered, and President Davis was in prison. The people now were asking in massive chorus-what next? There must be a blending of the way of life of 1860 and the new ways of 1865. What would the new United States be like? The headlines of battles appeared no more, the bulletin boards with their chilling casualty lists had ceased.

American Battlefield Trust: Civil War Casualties

"In every battle there comes a time when both sides consider themselves beaten. Then he who continues the attack wins."

This quote by Ulysses Grant, general-in-chief of Federal forces, signifies the grand tactic of Continuous Contact.

HR 7608 Appropriations Act, 2021

House Resolution 7608 passed in the House and was sent to the Senate on July 24, 2020. It was sent to the Appropriations Committee. Buried in this resolution is a section that authorizes the removal of Confederate commemorative works.

Title IV - General Provisions

Sec. 442. Notwithstanding any other provision of law or policy to the contrary, within 180 days of enactment of this Act, the National Park Service shall remove from display all physical Confederate commemorative works, such as statues, monuments, sculptures, memorials, and plaques, as defined by NPS, Management Policies 2006, §9.6.1.

As a member of a Civil War Round Table, who's purpose is to promote, educate, and further stimulate interest in, and discussion of all aspects of the Civil War period, it seems unfitting to remove these items from national battlefields without further discussion and input from the American people. This is our history. These battlefields are in fact cemeteries for both Federal and Confederate soldiers. Historian Bernard DeVoto has stated that the Civil War is the crux of our history.

Our CFCWRT member Dale Lear contacted Senator Tom Tillis and received a response. Mr. Tillis shared that HR 7608 was opposed by 7 Democrats, 1 Independent, and every Republican.

Additionally, on June 10, 2020, Senator Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) offered an amendment during the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) mark-up for the Fiscal Year 2021 (FY21) National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) which would direct the Department of Defense (DoD) to rename all DoD assets, including military installations, within 3 years if they were originally named after a Confederate figure.

He indicated that a thoughtful and constructive process that included input from local constituents' and consideration of historical context when it comes to replacing names, symbols or statues on public lands and in our national parks.

Of interest on this topic, June 20, 2020, President Trump signed an executive order Protecting American Monuments, Memorials, and Statues and Combating Recent Criminal Violence (EO). The EO holds any person accountable if they destroy federal property, damage monuments, memorials, or statues. Individuals that are arrested and found guilty may receive up to 10 years of prison under section 1361 Title 18, United States Code. Additionally, localities and states who fail to prevent anarchists from damaging property may have their federal grants withheld.

During Sherman's March to the Sea, the Union soldiers would heat up rail road ties and then bend them around tree trunks. They were nicknamed "Sherman's neckties".

The purpose of this was to prevent the Confederates from reusing the railroad ties to rebuild the railroad.

Ed Bearss Donations

Ted Kunstling, President of the Raleigh CWRT, hopes you will consider the opportunity for your Civil War Round Table joining the North Carolina and Raleigh CWRTs in contributing to preserve additional land at Bentonville Battlefield Historic Site in honor of a man who has been so special to us, Ed Bearss. Ed has been incredibly supportive of Civil War Round Tables in North Carolina for over a decade, visiting our groups every January, supporting our efforts. Ed recently celebrated his 97th birthday on June 26. While his health no longer allows him to conduct his annual "Carolina Campaign," his interest and enthusiasm remain unabated.

So far, over $3,700 has been raised for this purpose from the NC and Raleigh CWRTs and from individual friends of Ed Bearss. We hope that your CWRT and individual members might join us in both honoring our friend and achieving recognition for your CWRT.

The money will be used when private property in the battlefield comes up for purchase. Checks may be made out to American Battlefield Trust (designated for Ed Bearss Bentonville Recognition) and mail to:

In Missouri at the beginning of the Civil War, volunteer Unionist Home Guard regiments were formed with the blessing of Federal authorities to oppose neutralist Governor Claiborne Jackson's state militia and his intention to discourage Missouri enlistments into Federal service.

Brigadier General Nathaniel Lyon was given authority by the War Department to organize the Home Guard on June 11, 1861.

By late 1861 most of the Home Guard regiments had been disbanded. They were replaced by a smaller Six-month Militia under state rather than Federal control. This too was disbanded in January 1862, to be replaced by the Missouri State Militia (almost entirely cavalry.)

Difference between State Troops, Home Guards, Militia, and Reserves

State troops were commissioned and paid for by the state.

Home Guards were very informal groups of men who band together to fight insurgents and bandits, which were quite common in both Union border States and in Confederate States. They were either pro Confederate or Union.

Militia generally were not paid (some exceptions to the rule) and were under the control of the Governor of a state. The quality of training and equipment was quite variable.

The Missouri State Militia was the only federally funded full time Militia unit that mostly fought guerrillas but did fight as conventional Cavalry at the battles of Prairie Grove in Arkansas and during Confederate General Price's invasion of Missouri. Service in a Missouri militia was mandatory .

The United States did not have a reserve system as we know it today. The National Guard didn't evolve until decades later. King Fredrick the Great of Prussia invented the concept of modern military reserves decades before the American Civil War but the US didn't adopt reserves until well after the war.

Mourning Rituals

Wartime convention decreed that a woman mourn her child's death for one year, a brother's death for six months, and a husband's death for two and a half years. She progressed through prescribed stages of heavy, full, and half mourning, with gradually loosening requirements of dress and behavior.

Mary Todd Lincoln remained in deep mourning for more than a year after her son Willie's death, dressing in black veils, black crepe and black jewelry. Flora Stuart, the widow of Confederate General J.E.B. Stuart, remained in heavy mourning for 59 years after the 1864 death of her husband, wearing black until she died in 1923.

By contrast, a widower was expected to mourn for only three months, simply by displaying black crepe on his hat or armband.

VOLUME 2 ISSUE 8

This Day in the War - August 5, 1864 - Battle of Mobile Bay

"I'm going into Mobile Bay in the morning if 'God is my leader' as I hope he is...." wrote Admiral Farragut to his wife August 4th. In the morning his Union fleet of 18 ships including four monitors entered Mobile Bay, passing between the fearsome forts guarding the three-mile channel. Admiral Farragut had desired to launch the long-delayed attack since resuming command of his squadron in January. In addition to the staunchly armed Forts Gaines and Morgan were three small gunboats and the formidable CSS Tennessee, said to be the most powerful ironclad afloat. Furthermore, only a narrow passage in the harbor channel remained unblocked by obstructions and torpedoes or mines. Farragut had his four ironclad monitors in the starboard column led by Tecumseh and 14 wooden ships in the port column, with Brooklyn in the lead and Hartford as flag. At 5:30 am the fleet moved in, and Fort Morgan opened on Brooklyn shortly after 7 am. Action became general between the Yankee navy and Fort Morgan.

The Confederate fleet joined in. USS Tecumseh headed for CSS Tennessee. Then one or more torpedoes exploded under her. In seconds Tecumseh went down prow first, two hundred yards from the enemy. Shortly after this Admiral Farragut in the port rigging of Hartford, is said to have shouted, "Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead." Regardless of just what he said, that is what the fleet did. There were anxious moments as Hartford took the van. However, the rest of the fleet passed the forts with minor loss. Three Federals rammed the sluggish Tennessee by midmorning. The Union monitors opened and Tennessee, rather vulnerable despite her armor, went out of control. Confederate Admiral Franklin Buchanan suffered a broken leg. At 10 am, after heavy pounding, Tennessee surrendered.

Admiral Farragut had again proved that ships could handle forts. Closing Mobile as a confederate port set the stage for land operations against the city.

Civil War Cannons relocated to Fort Fisher

Two Civil War cannons that flanked a Confederate monument on the Union Square grounds in Raleigh since 1902 now have a new home at Fort Fisher.

The naval cannons were removed with the 1895 monument on the orders of Gov. Roy Cooper last week after they were vandalized.

On Sunday afternoon, they were situated next to the fort's earthen mounds in full public view. Michele Walker, spokeswoman for the N.C. Department of Natural and Cultural Resources (NCDNCR), which oversees Fort Fisher and all state historic sites, said they will remain on display because they are from the same era as those already on display at the historic site.

Fort Fisher was a Confederate fort during the Civil War. It is having a $23 million renovation of its visitors center and grounds.

Ed Bearss, A Tribute

The Blue and Gray Education Society is advocating for the Congressional Gold Medal for Ed Bearss. This award for people whose contributions to America and the world elevate them above their peers. Ed Bearss would be one of those people. He personifies all it is too be an American, Duty, Honor, and Country over 53 years of service. He has an unbroken string of more than 65 years as an educator whose students included Presidents, senior government officials and citizens from all walks of like. For more than seven decades he was the architect of our Public history, crafting the boundaries of new national parks and guiding America's historians, members of Congress and Administrations through landmark preservation studies that established national priorities for preservation of land that is the basis of the 30 year old American Battlefield Protection Program.

Ed Bearss is a soon to be 98 year old disabled combat wounded WW II veteran and Marine who is Chief Historian Emeritus of the National Park Service. He enlisted in the Marines April 28, 1942 at the age of 18. As part of the 3rd Marine Raider Battalion, he had a brief stint on Guadalcanal. Later reassigned to the 7th Regiment, First Marine Division, he was part of the landing force at Cape Gloucester on December 26, 1943. On January 2, 1944 he was hit and wounded 4 times by enemy machine gun fire while crossing Suicide Creek. After 8 months in a body cast and 18 additional months of convalescence, Corporal Bearss was discharged in March 1946.

After securing a degree from Georgetown University in 1949, Bearss went to work for the Naval Hydrographic Office and then back to school earning a masters degree at Indiana University in 1955. Ed started work on a doctorate but suffering a shortage of funds he returned to the work force in the Office of the Chief of Military History. He was subsequently granted two honorary doctorates. In September 1955 he entered the National Park Service as historian at Vicksburg, Mississippi.

Bearss quickly advanced to regional historian in 1958 and blessed with what many believed to be a photographic memory, Bearss' work and exceptional speaking abilities put him on the road traveling as many as 270 days a years. He became the point man for the Civil War Centennial (1961-1965) drawing boundaries for new parks at Wilson's Creek, Missouri and Pea Ridge, Arkansas. He found forgotten fortifications at Grand Gulf, Mississippi and located the USS Cairo, a Union ironclad that struck a min and sank in the Yazoo River in December 1962. It was raised through the singular efforts of Bearss who, when the public funding was unavailable, went on the gameshow "The $64,000 Challenge" and won $20,000 to match a donation. The gunboat, the only one of its kind from that era, was raised in October 1964, is now restored, and on display at Vicksburg, NMP.

Bearss served as the NPS Historian in charge of 19th and 20th century sites. With the expansion of the parks, Bearss' expertise became the foundation of that growth and the sites became an exhaustive "who and what?" across the country to include a dozen states, Guam, and numerous other sites were crafted through his expertise and research. His work on Presidential sites included Eisenhower Farm, Herbert Hoover, William Howard Taft, US Grant and Jimmy Carter. This work was capped by his integral role working directly with President Lyndon Johnson to establish and incorporate the LBJ Ranch into the NPS. Bearss enjoyed a lifelong friendship with LBJ and Lady Bird. He was named Chief Historian of the NPS in 1981 and held the position for more than 14 years.

It was said of Bearss that he knew not only every battle and battlefield, but every facet of it. During his 14 years at NPS he helped craft National Park Policy. He was the driving force in the battlefield preservation studies commencing with the Civil War Sites Advisory Commission Report. His encyclopedic memory ran herd on a collection of the nation's finest academic and public historians producing the national guidance on preserving battlefields and establishing priorities and core, essential areas that needed protection. The resulting American Battlefield Trust Protection Program has matched more than $300,000,000 in land acquisition and preservation. Other organizations launched from Bearss' work are Blue and Fray Education Society, American Battlefield Trust, Save Historic Antietam Foundation, and Central Virginia Battlegrounds Trust. They form the heart of tax payer supported efforts at preservation saving the national budget millions of dollars in land acquisition funds annually.

Upon retiring in 1995 he stepped up his game continuing to advocate for historic preservation and conducting thousands of tours and lecture over the next 23 years for all manner of organizations, companies, and non profits. He was the most popular historian for Smithsonian Associates, History America Tours, and National Geographic. He literally raised millions of dollars for the preservation of America's treasures.

He was the recipient of The Purple Heart, Department of Interior Distinguished Service Award 1983, American Battlefield Trust Edwin Bearss Award for Preservation Leadership, NPS Edwin Bearss Fellowship Award, and numerous other awards. Bearss received the Honorary Licensed Battlefield Guide from the Association of Licensed Battlefield Guides at Gettysburg. He was the only person ever granted a guide badge without passing the testing and examination requirements.

Dr. Bearss has published literally hundreds of articles in all manner of scholarly and public documents, essay compendiums and other public educational forums. He has published more than 20 full length books.

These are his most popular titles:

To the Members & Friends of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table:

Bill Jayne, our CWRT President, has prepared a short (4 min) video announcement related to several issues, including our scheduled 13 August meeting and the Fall schedule for your viewing edification and enjoyment.

Simply click on this YouTube link and you have Bill in your office, on your iPad or cell-phone. As always, we welcome your questions and or suggestions.

Membership News & Dues

We are approaching September and the beginning of a new Round Table season. It is also membership renewal time.

The Steering Committee has, in past years, declared the month of August as an Early Bird month, a month in which you could renew you individual or family membership for $25 as opposed to the regular rate of $30. Due to the unusual nature of this year however, the Early Bird rate of $25 (individual or family) rate will apply until the evening of our first meeting, which we hope will be 10 September.

Should we be unable to hold a September meeting, then the $25 rate will be honored until 8 October although we fully expect to be able to hold regular meetings, in the usual place, with health protocols in place as per our published schedule.

We have a full slate of speakers on tap, each coming some distance (see July edition of The Runner). The Round Table pays their travel expenses as well as their meals and lodging while in Wilmington. Your dues, plus the revenue from the raffle and/or auction are necessary in order to bring speakers to our meetings. Other expenses such as refreshments, Post Office Box rental, Internet registration, printing and sundry supplies add to our annual budget. You and your dues are critical to our program.

Please mail your check, (CFCWRT) to PO Box 15750, Wilmington, NC 29408 at your convenience. Those who joined in March or later will receive an email exempting them from this dues request.

My personal thanks to all.

The Jacob Rohrbach Inn in Sharpsburg, Maryland, hosts an annual summer lecture series, and this year has not been an exception. Just recently, they have started the option of gathering safely in person for the outdoor presentations, but for those of us who are far away or not ready to attend a gathering, there is an online option for some of the 2020 presentations via the Inn's Facebook Page.

We've been featuring some online "weekender" options during the pandemic and this one seems like a great option for learning some in-depth Antietam history (while enjoying the comfort of your air-conditioning).

Here's what's been featured so far and there are links to the videos that have been released on Facebook:

June 3 – Gordon Dammann – "The Wounding of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr"

June 10 – Brad Gottfried – "Lee Invades the North: A Comparison of 1862 & 1863"

June 17 – Darin Wipperman – "Immortal Respect: Col. Henry Post and the 2nd U.S. Sharpshooters in the Antietam Campaign"

June 24 – Alann Schimdt – "The Dunker Church"

July 1 – Jim Rosebrock – "Goodbye Captain" Artillery at the Burnside Bridge and Final Attack

July 8 – Sharon Murray – "The Long Gray Line of '54"

July 15 – Richard P. D'Ambrisi – "Baseball in the Civil War"

July 22 – Laura Marfut – "Longstreet's Attack on French's Right."

July 29 – Nigel Wainwright – "The Civil War and The World"

And here's what's coming up in the next few weeks if you want to mark your calendar to watch for online content or take a little drive to attend in-person: (Check the Inn's Facebook page since the schedule and location is subject to change)

Aug 5 – Matt Borders – "The Loudoun Valley Campaign of 1862: McClellan's Final Advance"

Aug 12 – Justin Mayhue – "Small Arms Weapons at Antietam"

Aug 19 – Alex Rossino – "A Very Personal Fight: Robert E. Lee's Role on the Field at Sharpsburg, September 17, 1862"

Aug 26 – John Schildt – "The 'What If's' of the Maryland Campaign"

Note: These outdoors programs will be held at the Jacob Rohrbach Inn on Wednesday evenings at 7:00 p.m. Even though those programs are outdoors, attending guests are to wear face coverings and to social distance as much as possible. Additional program details are available here.

“During our Giving in July Virtual Concert I talked a lot about the need to polish our patriotism. And the more I think about this, the more it resonates with me. During difficult times it can be hard to see the good, and I personally feel that it is what we are experiencing right now in this country. It’s time for people to come together to unite in their communities and find common ground. I hope Wreaths Across America’s mission to Remember the fallen, Honor those that served and their families, and Teach the next generation the value of freedom can be one of these unifiers. I can guarantee you that National Wreaths Across America Day is going to happen this December, so please join us in the mission and get involved in your community today! Let’s work together to polish our patriotism and let it shine.”

The Blockade Runner - Modern Greece by Bill Jayne

Blockade running was truly the lifeline of the Confederate States of America. When the southern states attempted to secede from the United States and establish an independent nation, they relied on the economic importance of cotton to influence the industrial countries of Europe, particularly Great Britain and France, to recognize the nascent republic and use their diplomatic power to persuade the United States to allow the southern states to exercise their independence.

In the year between September 1860 and August 1861, more than 3.3 million bales of American cotton were exported across the seas. Well more than half of that amount, about 1.8 million bales shipped from the port of New Orleans. Yet, the Confederate States of America had no navy and did not possess a plan for conveying their cotton to Europe. According to Stephen R. Wise, author of Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War, there were only 11 ocean-going steamships in the south in 1861, and four of them were either old or quite small. Obviously, those ships could not be expected to transport 3.3 million bales of cotton. And, then there was the small matter of a blockade by the U.S. Navy.

Federal authorities were well aware of southern intentions regarding the cotton trade and on April 19, 1861, four days after Fort Sumter was fired upon, President Lincoln issued a proclamation establishing a blockade of southern ports. The U.S. Navy did not have enough capable ships to enforce a blockade of southern ports but they had enough to make a credible threat and they quickly acquired more ships to make the blockade an issue for foreign powers, especially Great Britain, an island nation dependent on maritime trade for its economic well-being.

The Confederacy quickly turned to the expedient of blockade running to export cotton and, it was hoped, import ordnance, ammunition, medicine, other war materiel and consumer goods. Yet, there was little effort to regulate this vital trade. If the Confederacy were to succeed, it needed to control blockade running. At the beginning of the war, however, a patchwork quilt of private ships owned by various companies and a few state-owned ships sought to maintain this essential lifeline.

Although the government of Great Britain was loath to challenge the Union blockade, recognizing that their own viability was dependent on a consistent application of maritime law, many private parties in England and Scotland saw opportunity in running the blockade and decided to make the attempt.

One Englishman who got involved in the blockade running business was Zachariah C. Pearson of Hull, a major port in Yorkshire, northeast of London. Born in 1821, Pearson was a successful shipping owner who had become a captain at 21 and owned his first ship at the age of 25. President of the firm of Pearson, Coleman and Company, he traded extensively with Baltic ports and also with Australia and New Zealand. He was also the mayor of Hull.

In 1862 two major cotton mills closed down in Hull and Pearson, probably motivated by the wish to reopen the mills for the good of the city, as well as the potential for profit, began dealing with Captain Caleb Huse of the Confederate States Army Ordnance Bureau. Huse had been sent to England in April 1861 and began acquiring ordnance and other materiel needed by the Confederate States Army to ship to southern ports.

In the spring of 1862 six ships of Pearson's fleet headed for the south. The results were disastrous. Stephen Wise notes that almost 300 steam ships tested the blockade during the war and "out of approximately 1,300 attempts, over 1,000 were successful." However, "the average lifetime of a blockade runner was just over four runs, or two round trips. Some 136 were captured and another 85 destroyed."

The Modern Greece was built by Richardson Company at Stockton-on-Tees, England in 1859. Originally owned by Stefanos Xenos, a Greek trader and writer, the ship was 210 feet long, with a beam of 29 feet but a draft of 17 feet, relatively deep for blockade running. She was an iron-hulled screw-driven ship used primarily in the trade with Baltic ports before being acquired by Pearson.

According to Keith Palmer, author of a blog about the blockade runners built at Stockton, England, the cargo of the Modern Greece on its maiden attempt at blockade running, was one of "the most valuable cargoes ever bound for the Southern Confederacy." Onboard were rifled cannons, four brass smoothbore cannons, 7,000 Enfield rifled muskets, 1,000 tons of gunpowder and, additional military and civilian goods.

She sailed on April 28, 1862, with a registered destination of Tampico, Mexico, but U.S. officials were aware of her cargo and the likelihood it was intended for the south. The U.S. State Department alerted the Navy Department.

The U.S.S. Cambridge spotted the Modern Greece at 4:15 a.m. on June 27, near land and about three miles north of Fort Fisher. The Cambridge and the U.S.S. Stars and Stripes opened fire. Although the guns of the fort tried to protect the blockade runner, the U.S. ships hit her nine times and she ran aground. The crew abandoned the ship and finally the guns of the fort sank the ship in about 40 feet of water. According to Palmer, the Confederates salvaged six 12-pounder Whitworth rifled guns, 500 stands of arms and other supplies.

Modern Greece

In 1962, 100 years later, a storm uncovered the wreckage of the Modern Greece and divers began archaeological investigation bringing approximately 11,500 artifacts ashore for conservation and, ultimately, interpretation. The investigation of the Modern Greece and its cargo led to the establishment of the Underwater Archaeology Branch of the N.C. Department of Natural and Cultural Resources, one of the first programs of its kind in the United States.

Not only was Pearson's Modern Greece sunk on its first voyage, with its most valuable cargo, but the company lost six others that were captured on their first try. Among those lost were the Stettin and the Patras captured by the U.S.S. Bienville off the coast of South Carolina on May 4 and May 27, 1862. The Circassian was captured by the U.S.S. Somerset in the Gulf of Mexico on May 4, 1862.

Pearson's company went bankrupt and his attempt to re-open the mills of Hull left his reputation as well as his finances in ruins. Ultimately, he regained much of his wealth and his reputation was restored largely because of his philanthropy.

The saga of Mayor Pearson didn't end with the sinking of the Modern Greece and the capture of his other ships in 1862, however. Ordnance Bureau officer Captain Huse bought three ships on behalf of the Confederate States Army, the Cornubia (see Runner, February 2019), the Eugenie, and the Merrimack (not to be confused with the U.S.S. Merrimack that became the C.S.S. Virginia).

The Merrimack was owned by Pearson and Company and laden with another extremely valuable cargo, including three Blakely guns. The fast side-wheeler, well-suited to blockade running, arrived in Bermuda on September 5, 1862, but Pearson had declared bankruptcy while she was at sea. "Southern agents," according to Wise, "were unable to separate their cargo from the impounded steamer and, as a result, Huse found it necessary to purchase the vessel and her cargo for £7,000. Once in the hands of the Confederacy, the Merrimack was made ready for sea and on April 13, 1863, under the command of S.G. Porter, ran into Wilmington. The three Blakely guns, each capable of firing a 170-pound projectile, were divided up, one going to Vicksburg and the remaining two being kept for the defense of Wilmington. One was placed at Fort Fisher at New Inlet while the other was positioned at Fort Caswell at Old Inlet."

CFCWRT Upcoming Speakers

The COVID pandemic has created chaos and uncertainty for our round table and the entire country. We haven't been able to meet since March and there's no certainty we will be able to meet in August. Up until 2018, we did not normally meet during the summer months of June, July and August but in 2018 we instituted a summer program relying on members of the round table to put together interesting programs and tours.

The summer program worked very well in 2018 and 2019 but this year the summer program has been displaced by restrictions on public meetings.

The good news is that we have a great lineup of speakers scheduled for the program year beginning in September 2020 and running through May 2021. While the program has a distinct nautical flavor, in keeping with the fact that the war here in the Lower Cape Fear was largely a nautical conflict, there is a great deal of variety. Following is a quick summary of what to look forward to.

SEPTEMBER: Dwight Hughes is a graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy who served 20 years in the Navy as a surface warfare officer, including a tour with riverine forces in Vietnam, service for which he received the Purple Heart. He is an author and a public historian and speaker allied with the Emerging Civil War group, blogging often on their website about nautical subjects. He is the author of A Confederate Biography: The Cruise of the CSS Shenandoah, published by the Naval Institute Press in 2015, and he will tell us about the saga of that determined crew and their stalwart ship.

OCTOBER: Ken Rutherford is a professor of Political Science at James Madison University in Harrisonburg, Virginia. He was a Peace Corps volunteer in Africa and co-founded the Landmine Survivors Network. While working on behalf of refugees with a non-governmental organization in Somalia, his vehicle detonated a land mine resulting in the amputation of one leg. His other leg was amputated several years later. His most recent book is America's Buried History: Landmines in the Civil War, published in April 2020 by noted Civil War publisher, Savas Beattie. Ken will tell us about the development and use of land mines, or torpedoes, in the Civil War.

NOVEMBER: Betty Vaughn will present a program about the origins of mid-19th Century Christmas traditions which would have been observed during the Civil War and are still familiar to us today. She is highly recommended by the Raleigh Civil War Round Table. A native of Kinston, she is an artist and author of several historical fiction Civil War novels. She's the former department chair and art instructor at Enloe Magnet High School in Raleigh, NC, and following 32 years of teaching, launched a career as an author. She loves to travel and led study tours of Europe for many years. History, art, and books are a lifelong passion. Both as a teacher of advanced placement art history and as a writer, Mrs. Vaughn brings the story of the past alive through the people who lived it.

DECEMBER: Andrew Duppstadt, historic sites specialist for the State of NC, will tell us about Lt. Francis Lyell “Frank” Hoge, a U.S. Naval Academy graduate who chose to side with the Confederacy and compiled an outstanding record in the fighting on the sounds and rivers of eastern North Carolina. He took part in the famous expedition led by Col. John Taylor Wood to attempt to sink the USS Underwriter off New Bern. Such expeditions were exceedingly dangerous in the 19th Century and young Hoge was the first to board the enemy vessel. Andrew is a BA and MA graduate in history at UNCW. He is stationed at the CSS Neuse historic site in Kinston and is also an adjunct history instructor at UNC Pembroke.

JANUARY: Rodney Steward is an assistant professor of history at the University of South Carolina, Salkehatchie. His works have appeared in the Virginia Magazine of History and Biography, Encyclopedia of North Carolina, and North Carolina Historical Review. He’s the author of David Schenck and the Contours of Confederate Identity, based on his Ph.D. dissertation at Auburn University, the book was published by the University of Tennessee press in 2012. Schenck was a North Carolina lawyer and avid secessionist who became a “receiver” under the terms of the Act of Sequestration, a law that allowed the Confederate government to seize the property of disloyal residents of the south. Schenck’s extensive diaries have often been cited in historical works. Professor Steward will fill us in on this little known but important facet of the Confederate experience.

Edward Black, Child Soldier

Born in 1853, Edward (William) Black was the youngest known child soldier to have served during the Civil War. Joining the 21st Indiana Infantry in 1861, aged 8, Edward served as a drummer in that regiment. Sent home after a few months, Edward returned, this time with his father, and was reenlisted in the regiment as a drummer boy.

Edward travelled the continent as the 21st Indiana’s drummer. He served in the regiment as it garrisoned Baltimore, accompanied it on an expedition to the Eastern Shore, thence to Newport News, Virginia, before getting shipped to serve in the Dept. of the Gulf, where the young lad’s unit fought in Louisiana as part of the campaign that resulted in the Union’s seizure of New Orleans from the South.

In 1862, young Edward was captured by Confederates during the Battle of Baton Rouge and imprisoned in Ship Island, but regained his liberty when federal troops overtook his captors and freed the Union prisoners.

Discharged in September of 1862, Edward reenlisted in February of 1863 with his old unit, which in the interval between his discharge and reenlistment had been converted from infantry to artillery, and reconstituted as the 1st Indiana Heavy Artillery regiment. He would serve with the 1st Indiana Heavy Artillery, as that regiment was kept busy, until war’s end, seeing active duty in Berwick Bay, conducting operations in Western Louisiana, participating in the advance on and subsequent siege of Port Hudson, joining the Sabine Pass Expedition, before finally settling in for garrison duty, first at New Orleans, and then at Baton Rouge.

Captain John Robert Guynes - Confederate Officer

This is an interesting and obscure story about Confederate Captain John Robert Guynes. He was born in Copiah County, Mississippi, in 1825. In 1847 during the Mexican-American War he enlisted in Anderson's Battalion of Mississippi Rifles which spent most of the war garrisoned in Tampico, Mexico, and saw no action. In 1850 he married and apparently became a successful lawyer. By 1860, according to the census, they were living in Polk County, Texas, and in March 1862 he volunteered and was made captain of a local company of Texas infantry.

Here is a newspaper account of Guynes' execution for Court Martial in the Camden News, Camden, Arkansas on October 15, 1864:

Interesting bit of History is Uncovered

A bit of Civil War history never published is the story of the execution of Captain John Guynes, Company F 23rd Texas Infantry, recited by Captain S. B. Lide, Company B, 33rd Arkansas, one of the few surviving Confederate Veterans who witnessed his death. Guynes was sentenced to death by a court martial on the charge of inciting insurrection. His execution took place in October 1864.

A brilliant young lawyer and a leader in his section of Texas, where his family had been famous for several generations, Guynes enlisted in the Southern Army. He was engaged in a number of battles and skirmishes, all west of the Mississippi River. Early in 1864, while his regiment was stationed at a point near the Mississippi in Arkansas, an order came directing the regiment to join General Hood's forces in Tennessee. Guynes immediately objected. He declared that his company had enlisted for service in defense of the State of Texas only; that he would fight only in Texas or to protect her borders; that it was unlawful to order the Texans across the Mississippi.

Guynes was arrested while making a speech to his company, urging them to refuse to obey the order. A court martial was hastily organized. Guynes was charged with inciting to insurrection. Trying his own cause before the court. Guynes cited the Constitution of the Confederate States and the laws of Texas in support of his position. His speech is said to have been a masterpiece of logic and eloquence. The court found him guilty as charged, and sentenced him to death.

Captain Lide declared that the whole South can boast no braver officer than Guynes. Believing himself right in principle, he preferred to face death than to submit to what he considered tyranny. His execution was delayed for many months and his friends sought clemency for him; but President Davis refused the pardon after thoroughly reviewing the case.

Guynes was brought to Camden, Arkansas, for execution. Seated on a plank coffin in an open wagon, he was carried to the bank of the Ouachita River. The officer in charge offered to bind his eyes with a black handkerchief, but Guynes refused. He faced the twelve executioners holding 10 loaded guns, without a tremor. Head erect, hands clasped behind him, ten bullets pierced his heart.

The above account has a few errors. Guynes and his family were originally from Mississippi and he was in the 22nd rather than the 23rd Texas Infantry.

Guynes helped organize his own local company originally called Capt. James A Scruggs' Company of Hubbard's Regiment Texas Infantry. The company was incorporated into the 22nd Texas Infantry in late 1862.

Court Martial Verdict for Captain John Guynes

HEAD QUARTERS DIST. ARK'S.,
CAMDEN, 14th October, 1864, }

GENERAL ORDERS, {
No. 58. }

I. At a General Court Martial convened at the Division camp of Maj-General Forney, by virtue of Special Order No.—Paragraph VI. from the Head Quarters, and of which Col. T. R. Bonner is President, were arranged and tried :

Captain John Guynes, Co. "F," 22nd Regiment Texas, Vol. Infantry,
Waul's Brigade, Walker's Division, P. A. C. S.

CHARGE 1st.—Persuading soldiers to desert.
SPECIFICATION.—Omitted.

CHARGE 2d.—Advising soldiers to desert.
SPECIFICATION.—Omitted.

To which Charges and Specifications the accused pleaded as follows :

Of the Specification of 1st Charge,	Not Guilty.
Of the 1st Charge,	Not Guilty.
Of the Specification of 2d Charge,	Not Guilty.
Of the 2d Charge,	Not Guilty.

II. FINDING AND SENTENCE OF THE COURT.

The Court having maturely considered the evidence adduced, find the accused Capt. John Guynes, Co. "F," 22d Reg't Texas Infantry, Waul's Brigade, Walker's Division, P. A. C. S., as follows :

Of the Specification of 1st Charge,	Guilty.
Of the 1st Charge,	Guilty.
Of the Specification of 2d Charge,	Guilty.
Of the 2d Charge,	Guilty.

The Court do therefore sentence the said Capt. John Guynes, 22d Texas Infantry, to be shot to death with musketry, two-thirds of the Court con-curring in the sentence.

The proceedings in the foregoing case having been laid before the Maj-Gen. Commanding, for his action, the following orders are made thereon :

The findings and sentence and the proceedings of the General Court Martial of which Col. T. R. Bonner, 10th Reg't Texas Infantry, is President, in the case of Capt. John Guynes, Co. "F," 22d Reg't Texas Infantry, are approved and confirmed.

The recommendation to mercy by the members of the Court, on the ground that Capt. Guynes is over conscript age, and has before his trial borne a good character, cannot be regarded. The crime of desertion is so frequent, so heinous and so destructive to the best interest of our cause that officers who do not use their efforts to prevent it, deserve to die ignominiously. How can a private soldier be, with propriety, punished with death when convicted of a capital offence, if officers, forgetful of their high calling, when guilty of the same offence are allowed to go unpunished? This cannot be!

Captain John Guynes of Co. "F," 22nd Regiment Texas Infantry, will be executed in accordance with the sentence of the General Court Martial, of which
Col. T. R. Bonner is President, on the 15th Oct., 1864 at four o'clock P. M.

The sentence will be carried into effect under the direction of Maj. Gen'l Forney, Commanding the Division to which Captain John Guynes belongs at such place as Maj. Gen. Forney, may select, and in the presence of a many of the troops of the Army as can be conveniently assembled.

This order will be read twice at the head of every Regiment, Battalion and unattached Co., in this District, and the fact reported to these Head Quarters.

By command of
MAJ-GEN. MAGUIRE
EDKIND P. TURNER,
A. A. Gen.

Other accounts of his execution:

Joseph Palmer Blessington (1841-1898) of the 16th Texas Infantry in his 1875 book states:

"On the evening of the 16th, we witnessed the melancholy performance of shooting Captain John Guynes, Company F, 22nd Texas Infantry. He was accused of encouraging his men to desert, when we were expected to cross the Mississippi River. He was a man of about 50 years old, and very much admired by his men, and well liked by the officers of his brigade. Every effort was made to have him reprieved, but all without avail."

Silas T. Grisamore (1825-1897) of the 18th Louisiana:

"It was during our encampment here that a Texas captain was court martialed and found guilty of mutiny when an attempt had been made to cross the Mississippi River. Gen. Magruder ordered the whole of the four divisions out on the plain above the town to witness his execution."

Excerpt from the book The Tennessee Campaign of 1864 describing how many Texans including Guynes resisted crossing the Mississippi in 1864 and many did desert:

"Even before the campaign, Texans in the Trans-Mississippi, with the exception of young unmarried men, refused to serve east of the Mississippi River. Confederate president Jefferson Davis continually asked Edmund Kirby Smith, commander of the Trans-Mississippi Department, for more men to fight in the Cis-Mississippi (Cis means same side). Smith refused the request stating that it was physically impossible. He needed them to defend the territory they still held, and more importantly, that the men did not want to cross. In one instance the Confederate army ordered the execution of Captain John Guynes of the 22nd Texas Infantry for encouraging his men to desert instead of crossing the Mississippi. Saddened by the death of the officer, Simmons angrily remarked, "That is what the orders to cross the Mississippi have done." Captain Manuel Yturri of the 3rd Texas Infantry also wrote of Guynes' execution and reinforced Simmons' (John of the 22nd Texas Infantry) comments when he wrote home that "I'll be very happy if we don't go to the other side of the Mississippi River because this order has caused more than two hundred desertions in the [Walker's] division from what I have been told, but they have captured more than a hundred. . . But I do believe that if we're going to the other side [of the Mississippi] many more will desert." Though the exact number of deserted Texans is unknown, overall from September 7, 1864, to January 31, 1865, 2,207 Confederates deserted their ranks and swore an oath of allegiance to the Union in the Nashville region. Weeks later the flood of deserters continued and many were taken to Nashville as prisoners of war, bringing the final report up to 4,045."

Sires and Sons - The Story of Hubbard's Regiments by Trevor Wardlaw

From the unbridled lands of East Texas, tenacious men with diverse backgrounds came together to form the Twenty-Second Texas Infantry. Also known as Hubbard's regiment, families synonymous with the Texas Revolution joined the ranks of politicians, attorneys, farmers, and teachers. Many championed Southern values whereas some campaigned for Northern agendas. Yet, most were Texan by choice and they sought to defend their homes. The regiment's stories of triumph and sorrow intertwined with American history as the men drudged across the unforgiving lands west of the Mississippi River. They fought in the bloody encounters of Fort DeRussy, Mansfield, Pleasant Hill, and Jenkins' Ferry as life-threatening diseases complicated their service. Their ambitious marches forever tied them to the story of Texas during the Civil War.

Trevor Wardlaw created a virtual cemetery dedicated to The 22nd Texas Infantry.

During that extensive service, the young boy was wounded more than once. In one instance, when he was 12 years old, he was grievously injured when an exploding shell shattered his left hand and arm. Edward's injuries earned him the unfortunate distinction of being the youngest Civil War soldier injured on active duty.

At war's end, Edward and his unit remained in the vicinity of Baton Rouge as garrison troops, until January of 1866, when the 1st Indiana Heavy Artillery was finally mustered out, and its personnel were discharged.

Edward Black never fully recovered from injuries he received during the war, nor from the mental trauma of what he had been exposed to at such a tender age. He died in 1872, aged 17, and was buried in Indianapolis. His drum was passed on down his family over the generations, before it was finally gifted to the Children's Museum of Indianapolis. There, it remains on display to this day as one of the museum's most prized and popular exhibits.

Last Person to Receive a Civil War Pension Dies

Irene Triplett, the last person receiving a pension from the U.S. Civil War, has died at the age of 90.

Ms. Triplett's father, Mose Triplett, started fighting in the war for the Confederacy when he was just 16 years old. Pvt. Triplett enlisted in the 53rd North Carolina Infantry Regiment in May 1862, then transferred to the 26th North Carolina Infantry Regiment early the following year, according to Confederate records. He fell ill as his regiment marched north toward Gettysburg and remained behind in a Virginia military hospital.

Irene Triplett

Our June 11th round table discussion—Battle of Cedar Creek, has been canceled due to the pandemic. It is re-scheduled for August 14th, 2020.

He ran away from the hospital, records show, while his unit suffered devastating losses at Gettysburg. Of the 800 men in the 26th North Carolina, 734 were killed, wounded or captured in the battle Pvt. Triplett missed. After he recovered from his illness, he deserted the Confederate Army, made his way to Tennessee in 1864 and enlisted in a Union regiment, the 3rd North Carolina Mounted Infantry. Known as Kirk's Raiders, the 3rd North Carolina carried out a campaign of sabotage against Confederate targets in eastern Tennessee and western North Carolina. The unit was named after Tennessee-born commander Col. George Washington Kirk. It might seem bizarre, but it actually wasn't uncommon for soldiers to switch sides mid-war during the Civil War.

After Triplett's first wife, Mary, passed away he married Elida Hall in 1924. Elida was 50 years his junior. She was 34 when Irene was born in 1930; he was 83. Such an age difference wasn't rare, especially later, during the Great Depression, when Civil War veterans found themselves with both a pension and a growing need for care.

Pvt. Triplett died in 1938, days after attending a reunion of Civil War veterans, attended by President Franklin Roosevelt, on the fields of Gettysburg.

Mose Triplett put in enough time with the Union Army to earn a pension, so the government sent him a check for $73.13 every month until his death in 1938 at the age of 92. After that, the pension check went to his widow, Elida, and upon her death, to his only surviving child, Irene. Irene received a pension check from government for her father's service--- and yes, the amount of each check was still $73.13. When Irene died, the government officially stop issuing pension checks for the Civil War, which ended 154 years ago.

Both mother and daughter suffered from mental disabilities. Irene Triplett recalled a tough childhood isolated in the North Carolina mountains, beaten by teachers at school and parents at home.

"I didn't care for neither one of them, to tell you the truth about it," she told The Wall Street Journal in 2014. "I wanted to get away from both of them. I wanted to get me a house and crawl in it all by myself."

Ms. Triplett and her mother lived for years in the Wilkes County poorhouse. Irene later moved through a number of care homes, her costs covered by Medicaid and her tiny VA pension.

She saw little of her relatives. But a pair of Civil War buffs visited and sent her money to spend on Dr Pepper and chewing tobacco, a habit she picked up in the first grade.

"She's a part of history," said Dennis St. Andrew, one of Irene's supporters and a past commander of the North Carolina Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War. "You're talking to somebody whose father was in the Civil War, which is mind-bending." She was the last of what the North Carolina Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War call true sons and daughters of Civil War soldiers.

All About War Horses by Bruce Patterson

Strangely, we Civil War Historians (or Civil War Historians want-a-be's) seem to have a fascination about the horses that accompanied many of the key generals on the battlefield.

General Philip Sheridan's mount Rienzi (named after a town in Mississippi) was Sheridan's primary mount for over three years, through 45 engagements and 19 major battles. Following Sheridan's victory at Cedar Creek, Rienzi was renamed Winchester.

Rienzi was a Morgan Trotter—16 hands tall. Rienzi was presented to General Sheridan by the officers of the 2nd Michigan Calvary in 1862. Winchester was even present at Appomattox Courthouse in April 1865 for the official surrender of the Confederate Army. Despite being wounded in battle several times, Winchester lived to be almost 20 years old. He died October 1878.

General Stonewall Jackson's mount was named Little Sorrel. The horse was described as undersized and dumpy but was Jackson's favorite mount because he (Jackson) appreciated this chunky charger's toughness, smooth gait and intelligence. Little Sorrel was eleven years old when Jackson was mortally wounded at Chancellorsville.

Little Sorrel was a Morgan Trotter, known for their endurance as well as being quick and agile. He was 15 hands tall. Originally purchased for his wife, Jackson found the animal's gait so pleasing he remarked, "A seat on him is like being rocked in a cradle." He decided to keep the horse for himself.

The War Horses of both Generals Grant and Lee demand more complete descriptions. Both were magnificent animals, both survived years of combat. Both were revered by the public to the point where both appeared to have "bobbed tails" because civilians (mostly ladies) continually cut off small portions of the tails as souvenirs.

General Lee rode an American Saddlebred named Traveller. Traveller was a gray gelding that Lee purchased in 1862 for $200. Traveler stood 16 hands (64") and had been named Jeff Davis before Lee purchased him. Perfectly proportioned, it was said that he would inspire the poet and the artist. Traveller responded to every wish of his rider and seemed to understand the long night marches, the heat, hunger, thirst and danger through which he passed with Lee aboard. Traveller was to accompany Lee to Lexington and was to be Lee's favorite mount until he was put down, in 1871, after developing tetanus from stepping on a nail.

Traveller was a horse of great stamina and was usually a good horse in battle because he was difficult to frighten. Sometimes he became nervous and spirited. At the Second Battle of Bull Run, while General Lee was at the front reconnoitering, dismounted and holding Traveller by the bridle, the horse became frightened at some movement of the enemy and, plunging, pulled Lee down on a stump, breaking both of his hands. Lee went through the remainder of that campaign chiefly in an ambulance. When he rode on horseback, a courier rode in front leading his horse.

General Grant's favorite mount was named Cincinnati, aka Cincinnatus. Before the battle of Chattanooga, Grant rode several horses and seemed to not have a favorite. Following Chattanooga, he was given the gift of a Thoroughbred, a chestnut stallion that stood at 17 hands (68"). Cincinnati soon became Grant's favorite. Grant, an avid and skilled horseman, was heard to say that is he was "the finest horse he had ever seen". In quietude, this horse seemed gentle and spiritless but battle sounds stirred him with enthusiasm. Grant rode Cincinnati throughout the Overland Campaign and seldom allowed anyone else to ride him, the exception being President Lincoln, who rode Cincinnati daily during his (Lincoln's) visit to City Point. This magnificent horse was at Appomattox and finally died of old age on a farm of an old friend of Grant's in Maryland in 1878.

Many casts and statues of Grant depict him riding Cincinnati, and in fact very few others were allowed to even mount the famous horse. The only 2 people ever to ride Cincinnati other than Grant himself were a boyhood friend Admiral Daniel Ammen and President Abraham Lincoln.

Three of these four mounts were either stuffed or "re-framed" and are viewed by tourists and historians at the Smithsonian (Winchester) and Lexington, VA (Traveller & Little Sorrel). Cincinnati was buried on that farm in Maryland. War horses all.

Battle of Cedar Creek

The round table discussion on the Battle of Cedar Creek has been postponed until August 13th because of the Coronavirus pandemic. It's hoped that by August we will be able to hold the discussion in a seminar style, classroom arrangement rather than the auditorium style arrangement of the Harbor Church sanctuary.

The good news is that there's more time for you, our members, to read up on this fascinating battle in which either "victory was snatched from the jaws of defeat," or "defeat was snatched from the jaws of victory," depending on your perspective.

Here are a few books to give you some detail. The Shenandoah Valley Campaign of 1864, edited by the renowned historian Gary W. Gallagher, is an excellent thematic overview of the context of the Battle of Cedar Creek and includes two very enlightening chapters on Cedar Creek itself. A very important chapter by Joseph T. Glatthaar looks at the campaign through the lens of General U.S. Grant's strategy. From Winchester to Cedar Creek by Jeffrey D. Wert is a more straightforward, chronological battle history that provides much useful information about the three Confederate defeats that occurred before the Battle of Cedar Creek. The Guns of Cedar Creek by Thomas A. Lewis is a battle history that focuses more on Cedar Creek. The Battle of Cedar Creek by Jonathan A. Noyalas is a more recent battle history prepared for the Civil War Sesquicentennial Series. A book I have found very useful is a self-guided tour of the battlefield by Col. Joseph W. A. Whitehorne, U.S. Army (ret.).

The powerful and fascinating personalities who guided and moved this dramatic battle are worth reading about either in their own memoirs, biographies or anthologized writings in books like Battles and Leaders. Their personalities are central to analysis of the battle. Union General Philip Sheridan, was an 1853 graduate of West Point from Ohio. An Irish Catholic, he was an undersized and very aggressive leader who rose to the pinnacle of his profession as the commanding general of the U.S. Army in the 1880s. Grant sent Maj. Gen. Sheridan to the Shenandoah Valley as commander of the newly consolidated Middle Division of the Army. Known as the Army of the Shenandoah, Sheridan brought unified, focused command to a large, extremely powerful force of three infantry corps plus a provisional division and a superbly equipped cavalry corps of more than 8,000 men. He commanded a total force of about 31,600 effectives at Cedar Creek, including 1,856 artillerymen serving 90 guns, according to Col. Whitehorne.

General Gordon at Signal Knob reconnoitering the Union lines.

Much older than Sheridan, Lt. Gen. Jubal Early, graduated West Point in 1837. He was a Virginia native connected to many of the most prominent FFVs (First Families of Virginia). He left the Army after brief service in the Seminole War and then studied law and rose to political prominence in Virginia. He volunteered for the state militia in the War with Mexico but his unit arrived in Mexico too late to see combat. His aggressive style of leadership brought him to the attention of Robert E. Lee and he soon rose through the command structure as attrition removed leaders such as Thomas J. Jackson and Richard S. Ewell. By 1864, Lt. Gen. Early commanded the “Army of the Valley,” composed primarily of the redoubtable II Corps of the Army of Northern Virginia. Col. Whitehorne estimates his strength as approximately 21,000 at Cedar Creek including 5,300 cavalry and 1,100 artillerymen serving more than 40 guns. He notes, however, that some estimate Confederate strength as low as 12,780. The National Park Service estimates the size of the Army of the Valley as “14,000-15,000 men.”

Some other personalities are also of great interest and importance to the conduct of the battle. On the Confederate side, Maj. Gen. John B. Gordon of Georgia was crucial. Maj. Gen. Horatio Wright played an important role in Sheridan’s army but many other generals such as Crook, Geary, and Custer added to the complexity of the engagement. Col. Rutherford B. Hayes (yes, that Rutherford B. Hayes who later became president of the United States) commanded a brigade caught up in the initial surprise of the Confederate assault.

The weather also played a role in the battle. Typical of autumn in the Shenandoah Valley, the weather was generally dry with warm days and cool nights. However, the battlefield is enveloped by the Shenandoah River and Cedar Creek and overshadowed by the imposing land form of Masanutten Mountain. In the crucial hours around dawn on October 19, 1864, fog prevailed over much of the battlefield.

Civil War Round Table Congress:

The mission of the CWRT Congress is to provide new and existing Civil War Round Tables with time-tested tools to help them expand their membership, reduce operating costs, have effective governance structures, develop meaningful partnerships and raise sufficient funds for quality programs and historic preservation. These elements should assist CWRTs to become sustainable organizations and to avoid actions that could damage their integrity, effectiveness and efficiency.

The McLehany Brothers in the 46th Mississippi Infantry

by Sherry Hewitt

This is the story of my relatives who fought in the 46th Mississippi Infantry during the Civil War. John M. McLehany and his wife, Betsy, settled in Simpson County, Mississippi around 1825. Three of their sons were William (1827), Rowland (1838), and James (1842). They were my great-great-grandmother's brothers.

William (35), Rowland (24), and James (20) enlisted in the 46th Mississippi Infantry, Company H.

6th Mississippi Infantry (Balfour's)

Companies A-E assembled at Meridian in April, 1862, and the battalion composed of five companies was organized April 19th. J. W. Balfour, was elected commanding officer, and J. W. Jones, Company E, as Major. On May 18 the battalion was ordered to Vicksburg, where it was on duty at Smede's Point during the bombardment of May 10 to July 27, 1862, under the command of Gen. M. L. Smith, who had charge of the river defenses. The battalion suffered much from sickness and want of drinking water, and many died. The returns of July showed 17 officers and 161 men present for duty.

Rowland McLehany enlisted April 4, 1862.

46th Mississippi Infantry Regiment was organized during the fall of 1862 by adding five companies to the five-company 6th (Balfour's) Mississippi Infantry Battalion. In February, 1863, it totaled 407 effectives and served in S.D. Lee's Provisional Division and then Baldwin's Brigade in the Department of Mississippi and East Louisiana. COMPANIES OF THE 46TH MS INFANTRY:

Company A -- Gaines Invincibles (raised in Wayne County, MS)
 Company B -- Covington Rebels (raised in Covington County, MS)
 Company C -- Yazoo Pickets (raised in Yazoo County, MS)
 Company D -- Rankin Farmers (raised in Rankin County, MS)
 Company E -- Jeff Davis Rebels (raised in Warren & Yazoo Counties, MS)
 Company F -- Lauderdale Rifles (raised in Lauderdale County, MS)
 Company G -- Singleton Guards (raised in Smith County, MS)
 Company H -- Raleigh Farmers/Rangers (raised in Smith County, MS)
 Company I -- Southern Rights (raised in Newton County, MS)
 Company K -- Kemper Guards/Mississippi Rangers (raised in Kemper County, MS)

The original companies had been on duty at Vicksburg from May to December, 1862. The order designating the command as the Forty-sixth Regiment was received December 2, 1862. On December 21 the regiment was reviewed by President Davis and Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. On the 27th they were ordered to north of the city at Chickasaw Bayou, where General Sherman was attempting to gain a position. Three companies, Hart's, Sublett's and Rea's, had been on picket duty along Chickasaw Bayou three weeks before the battle. The Forty-sixth was mentioned by General Pemberton as one of the commands entitled to the highest distinction in the defeat of Sherman by Gen. S. D. Lee's command at Chickasaw Bayou, December, 26-29, 1862. At Blake's levee, on the 28th, General Lee reported the demonstration of the enemy, in force, with artillery, was handsomely held in check by Colonel Withers, with the Forty-sixth Regiment and Johnston's section of artillery. Nine companies were in this fight, under Lieutenant-Colonel Easterling, and rendered service of great value. Casualties, 1 wounded.

The one wounded was Rowland McLehany. He would succumb to his injuries on February 5, 1863. He is buried at Soldiers' Rest Cemetery in Vicksburg. Rowland left behind a wife and two children. William enlisted February 13, 1863.

Along the levee Withers reported the Federal advance was held in check all day long by the Forty-sixth Mississippi, Lieutenant Johnston's section and Bowman's Battery. Paul Hamilton, Adjutant General of the brigade, was killed on the 29th.

Col. C. W. Sears took command of the 46th on January 31. About this time the regiment was about 400 effectives. As a battalion the regiment had been a part of the command of Gen. Martin Luther Smith, commanding at Vicksburg. After the arrival of Gen. S. D. Lee, it formed part of his brigade, with three Louisiana Regiments. February 20, 1863, Brig. Gen. W. E. Baldwin was assigned to command of a brigade, including the Fourth and Forty-sixth Mississippi, Seventeenth and Thirty-first Louisiana, Wofford's and Drew's Batteries and Haynes' and Smythe's Companies. On March 25 the regiment started to the lower Deer Creek region, in Issaquena County, and after some time at or near Haynes' landing on the Yazoo, returned to Vicksburg April 16.

The regiment, with the brigade, marched over 100 miles from April 29 to May 4, Vicksburg to Port Gibson and returning, and was engaged in battle with the advance of Grant's army on the Rodney road, before Port Gibson, May 1. In this action the Forty-sixth was posted as reserve and in support of a battery, but later was put in position to make a charge. General Baldwin, however, withdrew the order due to the evident great strength of the enemy in front. Subsequently four companies reinforced the line of the Seventeenth Louisiana, the regiment of Baldwin's Brigade that was most seriously engaged. Casualties for the brigade was: 60 killed and wounded.

After the return to Vicksburg the brigade was posted at or near Hall's ferry. On May 15, they moved to Mount Alban. General Baldwin was commander of the forces on the Big Black River. On the 16th the Forty-sixth advanced to Bovina. That night news came of the disaster at Baker's Creek, after which the brigade was advanced to the Big Black bridge, to cover the crossing of troops. Baldwin's Brigade brought up the rear on the march to Vicksburg, and on the 18th, occupied the outer line of works north of the city where they sustained and repulsed an assault, and then were withdrawn to the inner line to a position where the brigade right was near the Riddle house. Colonel Sears commanded the regiment through the siege "and merited," said Baldwin, "favorable notice."

On Independence Day Vicksburg, Mississippi was surrendered formally by Confederates under Pemberton to the Federals under Grant. About 29,000 soldiers laid down their arms and marched out of the city.

Of the surrender General Baldwin wrote: "My command marched over the trenches and stacked their arms with the greatest reluctance, conscious of their ability to hold the position assigned them for an indefinite period of time. During the whole siege the entire command had exhibited the highest degree of patience, fortitude and courage, bearing deprivations of sufficient food, constant duty in the trenches under a broiling sun by day and heavy fatigue and picket duty at night, without a murmur, willing to bear any hardships, confident in sustaining the brunt of any assault, in the hope of anticipated relief and ultimate triumph. The command was daily aroused and under arms at 3:30 A.M., to guard against surprise, and nightly our pickets were in advance of our defenses and nearly contiguous to the sentinels of the enemy. The loss in killed and wounded was severe."

The order for march of the division from Vicksburg at 4 P.M., July 11, 1863, on the Baldwin's Ferry road, was as follows: 1, Baldwin's Brigade; 2, Shoup's Brigade; 3, Vaughn's Brigade; 3, Harris' State troops; the division under the command of Gen. Shoup, Gen. Smith remaining at Vicksburg to fulfill the capitulations. The regimental colors, originally the flag of the Gaines Invincibles, were brought out by Captain Sublett, wrapped around his body under his shirt. The paroled men were furloughed for sixty days, to report at Enterprise.

James and William McLehany were among the paroled Confederate soldiers. James returned to the 46th, William did not. Vicksburg was about 50 miles from their homes in Simpson County.

William McLehany, when released in the prisoner exchange at Vicksburg and returned home.

He and his family (wife and 6 children) relocated to Kentucky before 1865.

By 1872 the family (including 2 children born after the Civil War) had moved to Arkansas.

William lived to the ripe old age of 80, passing on Christmas Day in 1907.

After the prisoner exchange the 46th was assigned to General Baldwin's, Tucker's, and Sears' Brigade. Baldwin's Brigade, at Enterprise, November 20, included, exchanged, and armed, 2,279; the regiments being the Fourth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-ninth, Fortieth and Forty-sixth.

General Johnston was ordered to send the brigade to reinforce Bragg at Missionary Ridge. On November 2, but the brigade did not receive marching orders until the 21st. They arrived at Dalton, Ga., too late for the battle of November 25, and were then ordered to Resaca, and Sugar Valley. They were listed as part of W. H. T. Walker's Division, Hardee's Corps. The brigade was returned to General Polk January 15-16, and sent to General Maury at Mobile. Maury sent them to Meridian on February 7. Polk sent them to Meridian to aid S.D. Lee in meeting Sherman's raid, but Polk immediately ordered them back to Mobile. The experience was discouraging to the men. The regiment did not contain more than 146 men on its return to Maury. General Baldwin was killed by accident February 19. Colonel Sears was promoted Brigadier-General to succeed Baldwin. This resulted in a disorganization of the brigade. It was reorganized to include the Fourth, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-ninth and Forty-sixth Regiments and Seventh Battalion.

The brigade was moved to Pollard, Ala., in April to Selma, and early in May to Anniston, whence they moved to Adairsville, Ga., joining the army of General Johnston just after the battle of Resaca. With the smaller brigades of Cockrell's Missourians and Ector's Texans and North Carolinians, they were under the division command of Gen. S. G. French, a Mississippian, one of the four divisions of Lieutenant General Leonidas Polk's Army of Mississippi. After Polk's death on June 14, they were assigned to Lieutenant General A. P. Stewart's Corps, Army of Tennessee. From that time until September 6, they were every day but one under fire.

D.C. Chamberlain was Acting Adjutant. The casualties of the regiment were:

- Cassville - 4 wounded
- New Hope Church - 3 killed, 6 wounded, 1 missing
- Latimer House - 1 killed, 1 wounded, 1 missing
- Kenesaw Mountain - 9 killed, 26 wounded, 20 missing
- Smyrna - 5 wounded
- Chattahoochee - 2 killed, 4 wounded, 3 missing
- in front of Atlanta - 7 killed, 25 wounded, 7 missing
- Lovejoy's Station - 1 killed, 2 wounded

The casualties named in front of Atlanta occurred August 4, when the Forty-sixth, under Colonel Clark, constituting the main picket line of the brigade, charged the enemy and drove him back, regaining their position against heavy force, and taking 21 prisoners. "The gallantry of the Forty-sixth was highly commended in this affair," wrote General Sears. Colonel Clark occupied the ditches with his regiment and 120 of the dismounted cavalry, in all 420, the night of August 2, and his advanced videttes were driven in August 4. In his charge Clark was supported by another Mississippi regiment. On August 27 the regiment joined in the reconnaissance to the Chattahoochee River, and in the night of September 1 they marched out of Atlanta as the rear guard, the final fighting of the campaign being at Lovejoy's, September 2-6.

James McLehany was captured in Atlanta and sent to Camp Douglas. He died there January 2, 1865. He left behind a wife and child. He is buried in Oak Woods Cemetery at Confederate Mound in Chicago.

General Hood advanced the army northward of Atlanta late in September. Stewart's Corps moved to Lost Mountain, October 2, and tore up the railroad near Big Shanty, after which French's Division marched on the night of the 4th to fill the cut at Allatoona. This place was defended by three redoubts and a star fort on the ridge at opposite sides of the cut. French attacked and a bloody struggle followed for three or four hours. General French reported: "Among the killed from Sears' Brigade is Col. W. H. Clark, Forty-sixth Mississippi. He fell in the advance near the enemy's works with the battle-flag in his hands. He was an excellent and gallant officer." Three officers of the regiment were killed, 1 wounded, 4 missing. Total of the regiment, 18 killed, 26 wounded, 56 missing.

After this, Stewart's Corps destroyed the railroad between Resaca and Dalton. French's Division captured the blockhouse at Tilton, October 13, and next was in battle at Decatur, Ala., October 26-29, moving thence to Tuscumbia.

They crossed the Tennessee River, November 20, marched against Schofield's Federal command at Columbia, and on November 29 moved with Stewart's Corps toward Spring Hill, Tennessee. Following the Federal troops to Franklin, on the Harpeth River, Stewart's Corps attacked about four in the evening, November 30, on the right of the Confederate line, French's Division on the left of the corps next to Cheatham's Corps. The first line was carried, but to reach the second line of works, Sears' Brigade was exposed to a destructive crossfire of artillery. Maj. T. D. Magee, commanding the Forty-sixth, was among the wounded before the works were reached. Some were able to reach the ditch in front of the works, where they remained until next morning, when the Federal troops were withdrawn. Among these "foremost of the forlorn hope," was the remainder of the Forty-sixth: 33 men; 8 of which were wounded.

The casualties of Sears' Brigade were said to be 30 killed, 168 wounded, 35 missing. The remnant marched to Nashville. Some were detached with Bate's Division to support Forrest in the siege of Murfreesboro, and were in battle at Overall's Creek, December 4, and before Murfreesboro December 7. December 9 the brigade number of effective troops was 210 men. Marching back to Nashville over icy roads, many barefooted, they fought in Walthall's line, December 15-16. Walthall's remnants of two divisions were almost surrounded before they gave way.

"Brigadier General Sears, late in the day, lost a leg, and subsequently fell into the enemy's hands." (A. P. Stewart). "A solid shot passed through his horse and struck him just below the knee; the lower part of his leg was amputated. It was found impracticable to bring him out, so he was left near Pulaski. Captain Henderson and Lieut. Harper were both very badly wounded and left in the enemy's hands. I was slightly wounded in the foot by a shell." (E. T. Freeman, of French's staff). Walthall's command crossed the Tennessee River, December 26, and marched to Tupelo, Mississippi. Lieut. R. N. Rea writes "My shoes fell from my feet between Franklin and Columbia, and I was forced to march all the way down to Tupelo, a distance of about three hundred miles, barefooted, in a constant snowstorm and sleet the like of which I never saw before or since."

Major Freeman wrote, January 10: "The whole army cannot muster 5,000 effective men. Great numbers are going home every day, many nevermore to return, I fear. Nine-tenths of the men and line officers are barefooted." W.P. Chambers wrote, in his journal, January 15: "The regiment numbers about 150 men, about half of whom are barefooted. All are ragged and dirty and covered with vermin. There are, perhaps, twenty guns, but not a single cartridge box in the regiment. The men are jovial enough regarding their condition, but when one speaks of the prosecution of the war they are entirely despondent, being entirely convinced that the Confederacy is gone. Captain Heslip, of Company E, is in command of the regiment. Major Nelson, of the Fourth, commands the brigade, which is attached to Walthall's Division. I do not think there is a stand of colors in the brigade." January 19 Captain Hart assumed command of the regiment.

French's Division was ordered to report to General Maury at Mobile, February 1, 1865. The return of March 10 showed Sears' Brigade commanded by Col. Thomas X. Adair, the Forty-sixth Regiment commanded by Capt. J. A. Barwick. General Steele, commanding the Union expedition from Pensacola, reported that on April 1 an outpost four and a half miles in front of Blakely was carried by assault and the battle flag of the Forty-sixth Mississippi and 74 prisoners taken. This was about half the regiment. When Fort Blakely was captured, April 9, 1865, another portion of the regiment became prisoners of war. They were taken to Ship Island and paroled in May. Another portion escaped and about twenty-five represented the regiment at Cuba Station, Ala. May 4, 1865, when the Confederate Department of Alabama, Mississippi, and East Louisiana under General Richard Taylor, surrendered to Union forces.

Book Review ~ Lincoln's Spies by Bill Jayne

It's very disappointing that the pandemic has prevented us from hearing Douglas Waller's presentation on Union military intelligence operations in the Civil War. We do, however, have his book, Lincoln's Spies, available and I highly recommend it.

Waller is a former correspondent for Newsweek and Time who has specialized in the subject of military intelligence. He's the author of six books including Wild Bill Donovan, the story of the legendary chef of the WW II Office of Strategic Services, the forerunner of the CIA.

Lincoln's Spies is enlightening and highly readable. Focusing primarily on the Eastern Theater and the Army of the Potomac, Waller tells the story through the lens of the Civil War careers of four individuals.

First, of course, is Allan Pinkerton, the humorless Scottish immigrant who seems to have virtually invented the trade of private detective. And, I mean, private. Ultimately, this would prove to be his undoing. Next is Lafayette Baker, a bit of a soldier of fortune who was wildly independent and, ultimately unreliable. Elizabeth Van Lew was a Richmond "spinster," who was devoted to the Union and parlayed her great intelligence and privileged background into the creation of a spy network deeply embedded within the capital of the Confederacy. Finally, there's volunteer Union officer George Sharpe, a highly educated lawyer from Upstate New York who through hard work and insight pioneered the mechanics of "all-source" intelligence within the Army of the Potomac, but not without enduring a bit of a learning curve.

Pinkerton worked as a cooper, a deputy sheriff and, ultimately, the head of a private investigating company that specialized in protecting railroads. He helped spirit President-Elect Abraham Lincoln into Washington past hostile elements in Baltimore and provided service to Major General George B. McClellan in Ohio and West Virginia early in the war. He wildly overestimated the numbers of McClellan's Confederate adversaries and when McClellan was relieved as commander of the Army of the Potomac after Antietam, Pinkerton went back to Chicago and took his files with him, rather than allowing them to be used by McClellan's successor Ambrose Burnside.

Waller sums up: "Pinkerton and his detectives proved to be effective at the cloak-and-dagger work of catching Confederate spies and uncovering plots against the U.S. government. But neither he nor the men and women in his force had the military training or experience needed to effectively collect and evaluate intelligence on an enemy army. They were amateurs at war."

Pinkerton had no sense of the perishability of military intelligence, especially estimates of the enemy order of battle and he always seemed to see himself and his operation as being under contract to McClellan personally, rather than contributing to the mission of the Army and the preservation of the union.

Lafayette C. Baker is described as a "poorly educated and aimless drifter who had been roaming the country for nearly two decades." Baker had a slight experience in military and law enforcement affairs as a vigilante in California but it seems that his primary qualification for a high-level job in Civil War Washington was the fact that he read a biography of the French security chief Eugène François Vidocq on the long trip from California to New York just before the war broke out. Renting a room at the Willard Hotel, the fast-talking Baker met a sitting and a former congressman who agreed to introduce him to General Winfield Scott, holding court in a nearby room. In a rather offhand way, Scott hired him as a spy and then seemed to forget about him.

Allan Pinkerton

Lafayette Baker

He became something of a secret service type, who was often successful at uncovering Confederate spies, crooked contractors and those who manipulated the Union enlistment programs with bogus recruits and pocketed bonus money. The trouble was, Baker wasn't above taking a bit of graft here and there and throwing his weight around to imprison innocent people who might not play along.

George Sharpe

George Sharpe took a different route but, paradoxically perhaps, he was never as well-known as Pinkerton or Baker. Born in 1826 in the historic Hudson River town of Kingston, 91 miles north of New York City, Sharpe was a brilliant student who graduated from Rutgers University, studied law at Yale, passed the bar at 21 and spent four years in Europe, ultimately working at the U.S. legations in Vienna and Rome and becoming highly proficient in French and Italian. He married into a wealthy and influential family and became Captain of Co. B of the 20th N.Y. State Militia, the "Ulster Guard," a 90-day unit called up in April 1861.

I must admit to taking a special interest in Sharpe from the first because I grew up in Ulster County, N.Y., just a few miles south of Kingston on the majestic Hudson River. The 20th N.Y. State Militia spent time in the Washington area but the unit was disbanded in 90 days and many of its troops became the 80th N.Y., like many Civil War regiments, the original members were jealous of the earlier designation and the 80th was often referred to as the 20th.

Sharpe left the service, however, he rejoined when a new regiment was formed in the Hudson Valley, the 120th N.Y., often called the "Ulster Regiment." So, we have the 20th and the 80th, both known as the Ulster Guard, and the 120th known as the Ulster Regiment. Later in the war a third regiment of infantry, the 156th, was raised and it was known as the "Mountain Legion," because the Catskill Mountains dominated much of the area.

Sharpe was named Colonel of the 120th and took the regiment south in time to man some of the defenses of Washington as the campaigns of Second Manassas and Antietam took place. By late fall of 1862, the regiment was with the Army of the Potomac under Burnside in the Fredericksburg campaign.

When Lincoln relieved McClellan after Antietam, Pinkerton, remember, took his bat and ball and went home to Chicago, leaving Burnside clueless about the intelligence work that had been done. Pinkerton abetted McClellan's efforts to acquire more troops and Waller goes so far as to say that between them they "cooked the books," Nevertheless, Burnside was left with no intelligence apparatus for his headquarters and, unfortunately, showed little interest in the subject.

Sharpe and his 120th acquitted themselves well in the fighting around the Slaughter Pen Farm, south of the city of Fredericksburg, but it was an unusual event during the battle that brought him to the attention of the higher command. The 55th N.Y., originally commanded by Regis De Trobriand, was composed primarily of French speaking soldiers. Language difficulties threatened the Union line as the 55th's officers were unable to follow some of the commands they received. Sharpe intervened and using his superb French skills, quickly righted the situation.

When Major General Joseph Hooker took command of the Army in the early part of 1863, he brought a keen interest in military intelligence and an appreciation for the importance of the discipline. He had even ridden in one of Thaddeus Lowe's balloons to learn something about the potential of the technology. Hooker wanted a French text on espionage translated into English and called Col. Sharpe to his headquarters to see if he could do the job. Sharpe did it quickly and Hooker followed up that assignment with an order to Sharpe to provide him with a plan for an Army level "secret service." Sharpe complied and Hooker offered him a job as "spymaster," as Waller described the post. Officially, he was the deputy provost marshal general of the Army of the Potomac, serving under Marsena Patrick. He was also the head of a new Bureau of Military Information.

Sharpe was reluctant to leave his regiment but he had been suffering from lung problems, perhaps pneumonia, for some time, and ultimately accepted Hooker's offer. He learned quickly and using his own experience in the field he graded, sorted and consolidated reports from all sources—cavalry scouts, infantry pickets, Union sympathizers, deserters, intercepts of telegraph and other enemy communications—and swiftly brought the reports to the attention of higher command.

There were mistakes and failures along the way, but from early 1863 to the end of the war, the military intelligence operations of the Union armies in the Eastern Theater became more and more effective. One major failure was somewhat ironic. At the same time Grant determined to move the Army of the Potomac across James River to threaten Petersburg, Lee decided to send Early and the II Corps of the Army of the Northern Virginia west into the Shenandoah Valley and ultimately to threaten Washington. Grant's move surprised Lee and Lee's move went undetected by Sharpe. Each army stole a march on the other.

Elizabeth Van Lew operated an increasingly effective espionage network within Richmond, using her mansion on Church Hill and her privileged position within the social hierarchy of the city to escape detection and arrest. She was born in 1818 to parents who were originally from the north but had lived most of their lives in Richmond. Her father, of Dutch stock, owned several hardware stores in the city. Eliza was horrified by beatings of slaves that she observed on city streets and when she was sent to Philadelphia for school, her anti-slavery outlook was strengthened even more.

When she returned to Richmond, she was very much a part of Richmond society but never married. When her father died in 1843, the young woman used her inheritance to buy and sell properties, becoming even wealthier. In the 1840s and 50s, Eliza and her mother, Elizabeth, Waller writes, "largely lived double lives—conforming outwardly to the South's social conventions, while privately taking steps to subvert them, like secretly freeing blacks." By 1861, she was writing letters to officials in Washington about economic conditions in Richmond and the movement of militia units in the capital. When Virginia seceded, she stopped using the mails and began using a network of trusted friends to carry her notes to Washington.

Throughout the war she provided information and observations and also aided Union prisoners. By the later stages of the war, Sharpe and his Bureau of Military Information were making increased use of these reports without the long delays of information being sent clandestinely from Richmond to Washington and then back to the army at City Point.

Lincoln's Spies is an eye-opening account of a part of the war that has seldom been considered in all the voluminous literature of the conflict. Moreover, it's written in a fast-paced, clear manner enlivened by accounts of interesting, unusual personalities. Summing up, Waller writes: "What role did intelligence play in this conflict? More than was acknowledged at the time. Northern and southern civilian leaders largely neglected the gathering of political and economic intelligence because they knew the other's politics, geography, and economic wherewithal. Each side's generals had been classmates in the same military academies and had fought together. They often showed disinterest in strategic and tactical intelligence believing they could already foresee how an adversary they had known for years would react on the battlefield. But the work of Lincoln's spies—even his inept ones like Pinkerton, his corrupt ones like Baker, and particularly his best ones like Sharpe and Van Lew—made a difference."

1. Cannister - a metal can the size of the cannon-bore and filled with multiple iron balls, each 1 1/8th inch in diameter, creating a shotgun effect. Generally used to repel advancing infantry.
2. Water - In the Summer and Fall of 1862, East Kentucky was suffering from an extensive drought. Water had become a scarce resource. The area around Perryville had a number of streams and rivers of great value to the parched soldiers and horses of both North and South.

This Month in History ~ May 1865

It was over. And with the end so much had happened, armies surrendered, a President assassinated, another fleeing the conquerors. The shooting had almost ceased and there was a momentary vacuum everywhere. People began to pick up the pieces, not sure how to put them back together. Two Confederate armies remained, but negotiations were under way for surrender of the primary force left east of the Mississippi and there was confusion, along with a very slight, desperate hope, in the Trans-Mississippi Confederacy of E. Kirby Smith. But most Southern soldiers were going home, bitter, relieved, some of them glad. Many had no homes to go to and began looking westward, or even abroad. In Washington the Radicals were pressuring President Johnson to pursue a vindictive policy. Indications were that the new President would attempt to carry out, in his own way, the policies of the martyred Lincoln.

Aide-de-Camp: A soldier who was appointed by an officer to be his confidential assistant. The aide wrote and delivered orders and held a position of responsibility which required him to know troop positions and where officer quarters were located. The aide-de-camp was an officer by virtue of his position and he took orders from his commander only.

Barbette: Raised platform or mound allowing an artillery piece to be fired over a fortification's walls without exposing the gun crew to enemy fire.

Defeat in Detail: Defeating a military force unit by unit. This occurred when units were unable to support one another, often because of distance.

June Round Table Discussion - "Victory from the Jaws of Defeat"

As part of our expanded summer program, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will host a true "round table" discussion about the battle of Cedar Creek in October 1864.

The fall of 1864 was, of course, a pivotal time of political decision making. In the United States, the National Union Party of Abraham Lincoln ran against the Democratic Party standard bearer, former Union General George B. McClellan.

The summer of 1864 was a terrible time of trial for the North. Grant drove the Union armies of the east to Petersburg and Richmond, inflicting terrible losses on the Army of Northern Virginia but absorbing astronomical casualties himself.

Our April 9th meeting featuring Bill Brown on Governor Vance has been canceled due to the Coronavirus pandemic.

Sherman drove the Confederate Army of Tennessee back onto the defenses of Atlanta but the pace of advance seemed glacial and a decisive victory still much in doubt.

Close to home for Lincoln and the political leaders of the north, a small but ferocious army under Confederate Lieutenant General Jubal Early arrived at the gates of the Federal City itself like some reincarnation of the "barbarians" assaulting Rome as the empire decayed.

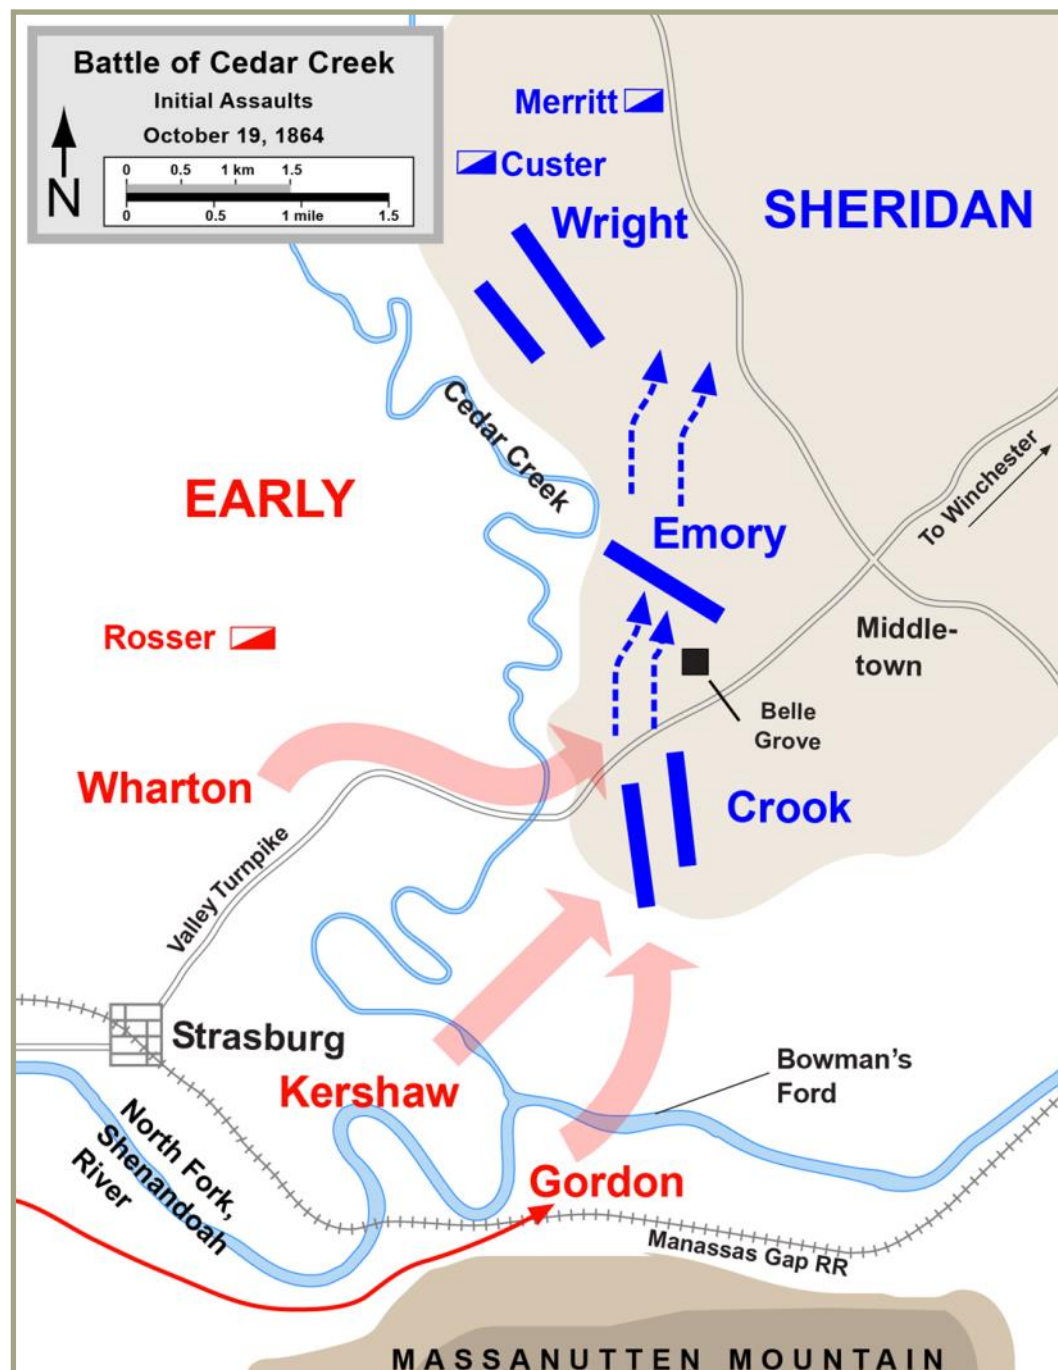

In August Lincoln received some political visitors to the White House to discuss the upcoming election and they ventured the opinion that the sitting president would lose the election. Lincoln responded, "You think I don't know I am going to be beaten, but I do and unless some great change takes place badly beaten."

Finally, the tide turned. Farragut damned the torpedoes and closed Mobile Bay, Sherman cut the Confederate supply line and drove the Army of Tennessee out of Atlanta, and Grant detailed Major General Philip Sheridan to the Shenandoah Valley to dispose of Early's Army of the Valley.

Sheridan won resounding victories at Winchester and Fisher's Hill and by October all seemed well. On October 16, Sheridan departed the valley heading for Washington City and a conference, leaving his army of about 31,000 men under the command of Maj. Gen. Horatio Wright, commander of the stalwart VI Corps. Camped on the north side of Cedar Creek, a tributary of the North Fork of the Shenandoah, the situation seemed secure.

Gen. Early's army of about 21,000 was south of the creek but connected to Richmond by good roads and rail. The Union intercepted a Confederate message suggesting that Gen. Robert E. Lee was about to send reinforcements to Early. It was a planted message and very unlikely, but, even so, Sheridan cautioned Wright to look carefully to his defenses. Sheridan also ordered the very powerful Union Cavalry Corps back to Cedar Creek.

With a deep creek to their front and an even more forbidding river gorge to their left (east), the Union put their strongest forces on the right (west) and middle, blocking the Valley Pike running north to south.

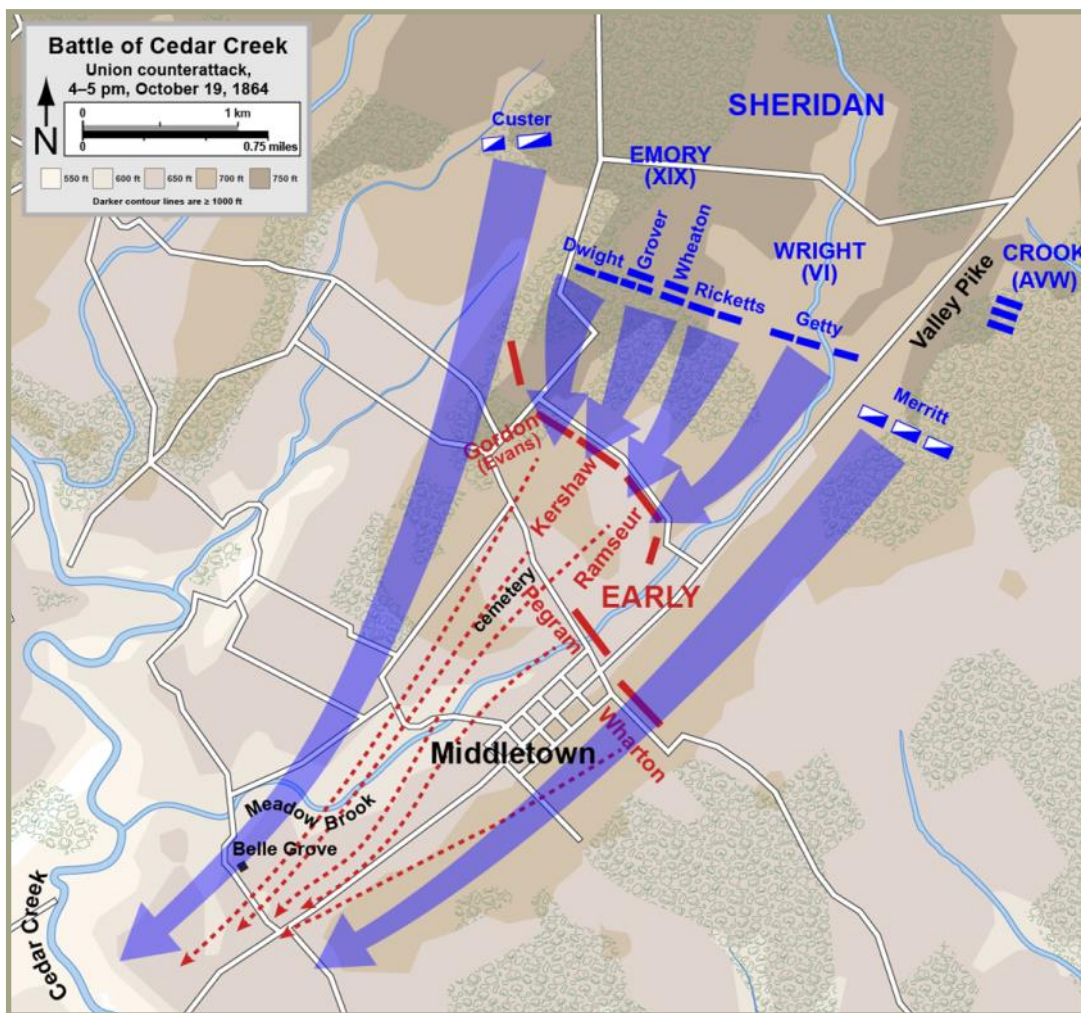

The relative weakness of the Union left, gave Early an opportunity to mount a risky surprise attack. At dawn on October 19, 1864, Kershaw's Confederate division crossed the creek at a ford to attack the Union left. Another division crossed the Valley Pike bridge and added its weight to the surprise attack and then, Maj. Gen. John B. Gordon's division, after crossing the Shenandoah at a ford, attacked the left flank and rear of the Union forces.

The initial assaults were spectacularly successful for the Confederates and although Union troops fought doggedly in spots, the army gave ground for miles, fighting at Belle Grove Plantation, around the village of Middletown and by afternoon, the Confederate attack ran out of steam.

In a famous ride on his famous horse, Rienzi, Sheridan turned back from Winchester and hurried to the battlefield. He helped rally the Union forces and then planned a counterattack that proved crushingly successful.

The discussion will focus on the Confederate pause in the afternoon. Gen. Gordon urged Early to continue the assault against the stalwart Union VI Corps, but Early seemed confident they would retire. Writing later, Early seemed to say that Confederate troops, stopping to pillage Union camps, led to disorganization and weakness that prevented further attacks.

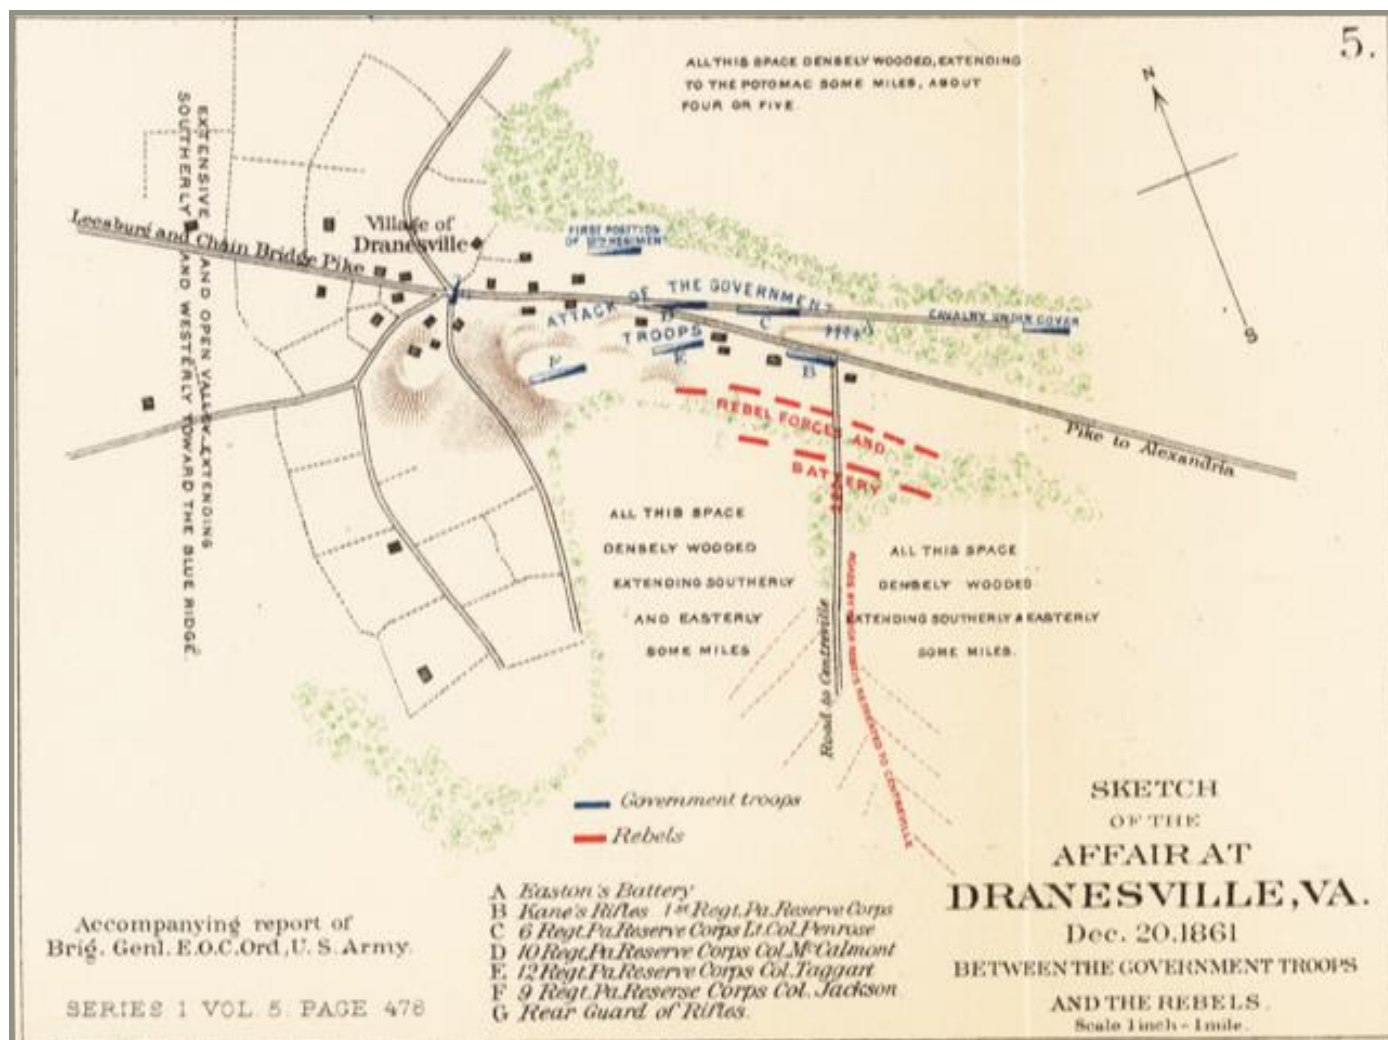

More will be forthcoming, but there is plenty of time to read about the battle and form your opinions so you can participate in the discussion on June 14.

Dranesville Battlefield Treasure Hunt

Treasure Hunter Makes Rare Finds on “Cleaned-Out” Field

Dave Mork, a loyal former member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table moved back to Northern Virginia some time ago but has continued his efforts as a “treasure hunter,” or Civil War relic hunter.

On December 20, 1861, Brigadier General E.O.C. Ord led a mixed brigade of Pennsylvania infantry, cavalry and artillery west along the Leesburg Pike (modern-day Virginia Route 7) to probe Confederate positions and to forage for supplies. At Dranesville, where Georgetown Pike met the Leesburg Pike in western Fairfax County, Ord encountered a similar Confederate force commanded by then Brigadier General J.E.B. Stuart. The engagement resulted in 71 Union casualties and 230 Confederate, with the Confederates withdrawing in the afternoon. After the Union disasters at nearby Balls Bluff and Manassas, this relatively small engagement served as a morale boost to U.S. forces.

Map of Dranesville Battle that accompanied General Ord's report

As Dave reports, "The Original Dranesville Battlefield is the entire area from Dranesville Road to the south side of Route 7, to where Reston Parkway is today. Most of the engagement was on the south side of Route 7 around the intersection of routes 193 and 7. Most of the area has been developed with housing on the actual encampment area. You used to be able to see the earthworks that were there but most had been filled in with trash over the past 100+ years. Along with four other 'treasure hunters', I spent nearly every Saturday for five or six years searching that area and the finds were everywhere! ... At the time I belonged to the Loudoun County Historical Preservation Society, but they disbanded about four years ago. Our late President Tom advised us to go on the north side of Route 7 as that is where the encampment and earthworks were and he had given the area a good going over back in the 1970s. He informed us that we would not find a lot as they had given the area a good 'clean-out'! Well all I can say is that I would love to find a few more 'cleaned out' areas like that one! Most of the bullets that we found were .54 cal Sharps, both manufactured and field cast varieties...other bullets that were recovered at the Dranesville site included .58 cal round ball, .58 cal 3 groove, .577 cal three groove, .36 and .44 cal Remington pistol bullets, .36 and .44 cal Colt bullets, as well as a few .69 cal Musketoons. The .58 cal round balls were found primarily on the south side of the road where the Confederate line was."

or shoes)

Confederate Script
"I" Button
(infantry)

One of Dave's treasure hunting partners, Wayne, is the descendant of a Union Soldier who served in the Pennsylvania Bucktails', a regiment that was at the Dranesville battle. Dave continues: "We were searching the Dranesville Battlefield, and my buddy Wayne was lucky enough to find a dropped .69 cal Musketoons bullet. The Bucktails were using .69 cal rifles so we are guessing that this was a bullet from one of the Bucktails soldiers. We do not think it was one of Wayne's GGGGrandfather's bullets but it most likely was from one of his fellow soldiers. My total take on this site was well over 600 bullets, lots of Union buttons; including General Service, General Staff Officer, and several marked with 'A', 'C', 'D', and 'I', as everyone shared this encampment. Confederate buttons were also recovered at this site as the Confederate troops oftentimes controlled the site. One of my favorites is a Confederate script "I" (for infantry) button. I found a group of three South Carolina Palmetto cuff buttons with a piece of uniform still attached. We all dug our share of coins as well. I found my first Three Cent coin here and it was an 1854. Indian Head Cents were also found but interestingly we also found Flying Eagle Cents from 1857 and 1858. We were able to locate where the Blacksmith did his work as the horseshoes were all in a large group along with cut off ends from the metal stock used to make the shoes. We also found a folding knife, spoon, and fork which was the precursor of the Swiss Army Knife! I can't even begin to tell you of all the finds that we made in this area. The sad thing is the property was developed and now has a bunch of McMansions on the site. It was good while it lasted!"

Dave also found the remnants of a water filter on the site. Dave notes: "It was dug out of the Dranesville Encampment site (now a housing development). "We dug a lot of great items out of that site before it was all dozed and built into a bunch of Mc Mansions! So much history has been lost due to development."

Civil War water filters are little known but this very informative account is from Henry Steele Commager's The Blue and the Gray. On page 286, Commager quotes from Hardtack and Coffee by John D. Billings. Billings writes: "I still have in my possession the remnants of a water filter in which I invested after enlistment. There was a metallic mouth-piece at one end of a small gutta-percha tube, which latter was about 15 inches long. At the other end of the tube was a suction-chamber, an inch long by a half-inch in diameter, with the end perforated, and containing a piece of bocking as a filterer. Midway of the tubing was an air-chamber. The tubing long since dried and crumbled away from the metal. It is possible that I used this instrument half a dozen times, though I do not recall a single instance, and on breaking camp just before the Gettysburg Campaign, I sent it with some other effects, northward."

Water Filterer

"I remember another filterer, somewhat simpler. It consisted of the same kind of mouth-piece with rubber tubing attached to a small conical piece of pumice stone, through which the water was filtered. Neither of these was ever of any practical value."

Lots still to learn about the Civil War before all the remaining sites are bulldozed flat!

*Civil War Letters of Surgeon James D. BentonDeath, Disease, and Life at War: The Civil War Letters of Surgeon James D. Benton, 111th and 98th New York Infantry Regiments, 1862-1865

Union surgeon James Dana Benton witnessed firsthand the suffering and death brought about by the ghastly wounds, infections, and diseases that wreaked havoc to both the Union and Confederate armies. A native of New York, Dr. Benton penned a series of letters throughout the war to his family relating his experiences with the 111th New York Infantry as an assistant surgeon, and later with the 98th New York as surgeon. His unique correspondence, together with insights from author Chris Loperfido, coalesce to produce Death, Disease, and Life at War: The Civil War Letters of Surgeon James D. Benton, 111th and 98th New York Infantry Regiments, 1862-1865.

Dr. Benton was present for some of the war's most gruesome and important battles, including Gettysburg, Cold Harbor, and the siege of Petersburg. He was also present at Harpers Ferry, Second Battle of Auburn, Battle of Morton's Ford, and Abraham Lincoln's second Inaugural address. His pen offers an insightful and honest look into what everyday life was like for the surgeons who tirelessly worked to save the men who risked their lives for the preservation of the nation.

Loperfido's Death, Disease, and Life at War should be read by every student of the Civil War to better understand and come to grips with what awaited the wounded and the medical teams once the generals were finished with their work.

Wilmington Yellow Fever Outbreak - 1862

Throughout the Civil War, the North Carolina Piedmont served as a haven for Confederate refugees, as thousands fled war zones to the relative safety of the Southern interior. Many came from Virginia or from northeastern North Carolina, which had been occupied by Union forces under General Ambrose Burnside in early 1862. By the summer of 1862, the influx of refugees had caused rampant overcrowding. Even Varina Davis, wife of Confederate president Jefferson Davis, had difficulty finding housing when she fled Richmond for Raleigh during the Peninsula Campaign.

In August 1862, a yellow fever outbreak in Wilmington compounded the refugee crisis in central North Carolina, as its residents fled the city for the interior. Although Wilmington's most prominent and wealthy residents had already left during Burnside's invasion, at least nine thousand residents remained when yellow fever arrived aboard the blockade runner Kate, carrying "bacon and other supplies" from Nassau. According to the Wilmington Journal, more than half of the city's population left for the North Carolina interior during the epidemic. Of the 4,000 who remained, 650 died of the disease. In his diary, Wilmington resident Nicholas Schenck described "a panic to get away – citizens and family – going in all directions ... Everybody – who could get away – left town." Another Wilmington resident noted in September 1862 that "The fever is much worse here and getting worse every hour. ... Everyone that can get off are leaving." When Schenck briefly visited at the height of the epidemic, he was shocked "to find almost a deserted town....every house on Front Street – closed and shut-up – did not meet or see a soul." William Calder, a Confederate soldier from Wilmington stationed in his hometown, wrote to his mother that "The physicians advise families to leave town, and all who can are doing so."

Many inland communities worried that refugees would bring yellow fever with them. How yellow fever spread remained a mystery, and medical authorities debated whether it could be contracted from infected patients. When Nicolas Schenck fled the city for Warsaw, NC, some sixty miles to the north, he found "every hotel quarantined against us – coming from Wilmington."

In a September 1862 meeting, Fayetteville's mayor and city council declared that "yellow fever exists in the town of Wilmington in a most malignant form, and a general apprehension having seized upon the inhabitants of this town that the disease may be communicated by continued intercourse between the two places." To prevent its spread, they ordered that "all intercourse between the town of Wilmington and Fayetteville be and is hereby suspended," requiring that refugees from Wilmington remain outside of the city limits and imposing a forty-eight-hour quarantine and medical inspection for all vessels that had passed through Wilmington. Recently elected North Carolina governor Zebulon Vance also worried that refugees would bring yellow fever to the interior. In a letter to his wife, Vance warned her that "The yellow fever is raging so at Wilmington that some fears are entertained it may spread. The fugitives have already carried it to Fayetteville & there is one case reported here [Raleigh], though it is supposed it will hardly be communicated in that way." Vance warned his wife, then in far western Buncombe County, not to come to Raleigh until later in the year, when winter cold would lessen the risk.

News of the deaths in Wilmington reached refugees who had fled the city. Along with many others fleeing, the Cronley family settled in Laurinburg, more than one hundred miles to the west. Safe from both the direct effects of the war and the disease, they nonetheless experienced the epidemic vicariously, as "Every day the train brought the small-sized bulletin containing little but the list of the sick and the dead, and always among the latter the name of some familiar face that should never be seen among us again." Eliza Hill, a refugee from Wilmington who had fled during Burnside's invasion, contrasted her new home in Chapel Hill with the news she received daily from the coast, writing in her diary that "Everything looks so bright & cheerful today that I can scarcely realize the melancholy truth, that hundreds are down in my native town with yellow fever...[By] last accounts, Wilmington was said to be one vast Hospital."

The Wilmington yellow fever epidemic proved to be only one of many ways in which disease shaped the contours of refugee life during the Civil War.

The Draft Act of 1863

In the North the Draft Act of 1863 resulted in four different enrollments: July, 1863; March, 1864; July, 1864; and December 1864. These drafts resulted in a total of 249,259 men being held to service. Of this total some 87,724 paid commutation to be relieved of service, which brought in $26,366,316.78. There were actually 162,535 men raised by the draft. Of this total only 46,347 men were held to service, 116,118 furnished substitutes. Thus the draft provided only about 6 percent of the total Federal enlistments in the Army. Nevertheless the draft's main effect seems to have been to stimulate enlistments of volunteers who made up the great bulk of the manpower.

Civil War Institute 2020 Summer Conference

The Civil War Institute is hosting a premiere annual summer conference bringing leading historians and diverse public audiences together for lectures, battlefield tours, small group discussions, and roundtable conversations about the Civil War era.

For 2020, we are excited to feature leading Civil War scholars, Harold Holzer, Catherine Clinton, Brian Wills, Jeffery Wert, Carol Reardon, and Scott Hartwig within our lineup of more than 40 distinguished speakers and tour guides. The conference will feature a wide range of topics, including POW prison escapes, soldier impressment, the Civil War in the West, the guerrilla experience, and more. The 2020 program will also debut debates between leading scholars about Civil War generalship. This year's topics include George B. McClellan at Antietam, James Longstreet, and Nathan Bedford Forrest.

From the Civil War Institute:

We are currently monitoring the current Coronavirus outbreak closely. As of this time, Gettysburg College's Camps & Conferences office and the Civil War Institute plan on holding the June 2020 CWI conference as scheduled. Should local or national conditions change dramatically, we will re-evaluate and will be in touch with all registered attendees immediately. In the event that conditions warrant a cancellation of the conference, we will be sure to update this website accordingly (link above), and all registered attendees will be granted a full refund of their registration fees.

The Greatest Battle in the Western Theater

Everard H. Smith, Ph.D., will discuss the pivotal battles of Chickamauga and Chattanooga in the fall of 1863. Dr. Earl H. Hess, author of The Civil War in the West, pronounced Chickamauga as “the greatest battle in the western theater” of the Civil War. In spite of the size of the forces involved and the great strategic value of the sites, the battles are relatively little known. Dr. Smith, a native of Washington, D.C., received his B.A. from Yale and a Ph.D. in history from UNC Chapel Hill. He has been a resident of North Carolina for more than 45 years and has lived in Wilmington since 1991 when he joined the staff of UNCW. He later became a senior networking analyst for the N.C. Department of Information Technology. A highly acclaimed local speaker, Dr. Smith specializes in the history of the Civil War and World War II. He is a former member of the Wilmington Historic Preservation Commission and past chairman of the City Advisory Board of the Hannah Block Historic USO building. He is also a specialist in Shakespeare and has been the stage manager for several productions of the Cape Fear Shakespeare, Ltd., which presents the annual summer Shakespeare festival at Greenfield Lake.

Why are the battles little known? For one thing, the topography of the battlefields is very complicated. William Glenn Robertson, retired from the staff of the US Army Command and General Staff College at Ft. Leavenworth, KS, wrote that at Chickamauga “the woods limited maximum visibility to 150 yards...and made it almost impossible to control linear battle formations. Similarly, the terrain provided few fields of fire to the armies’ artillerymen.” Additionally, both commanders were ultimately relieved and came down through history as failures.

General Braxton Bragg, who would later preside over the fall of Wilmington in 1865, commanded the Confederate Army of Tennessee. Maneuvered out of Chattanooga and into nearby northwestern Georgia, he gathered reinforcements and struck the Union Army of the Cumberland commanded by Major General William S. Rosecrans.

The Battle of Chickamauga on September 18-20, 1863, resulted in more than 34,000 casualties to the two armies and saw the Union forces nearly destroyed. Yet a little more than a month later, a reinforced Union army now led by Major General Ulysses S. Grant, routed Bragg’s forces and pushed them back into north Georgia opening the road to Atlanta.

Richmond Bread Riot - Presented by Bert Dunkerly

On the mild evening of February 13, more than 40 members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table assembled at Harbor Church in Wilmington to learn about the Richmond Bread Riot, declared the “largest antiwar demonstration in the Confederacy.”

Historian, author and National Park Service Ranger Bert Dunkerly presented a fact-filled, illuminating story of the home front in the Civil War. A ranger at Richmond National Battlefield Park, Bert mapped the route of the riot and showed “then-and-now” photographs of the important sites, such as stores looted by the rioters.

Setting the stage, we learned that Richmond’s population had ballooned from about 38,000 residents in 1861 to an estimated 100,000 in 1863. Soldiers, bureaucrats, industrial workers, refugees all poured into the Confederate capital and, yet, the police force numbered 26 officers.

Bacon rose from about 12 cents a pound to $1. Coffee skyrocketed from 12 cents a pound to $5. The Confederate government tried to control the prices charged to the government but merchants charged civilians whatever the market would bear. Bad winter weather, conscription, and unsafe working conditions all contributed to a situation in which people were unable to buy essential food, clothing, and fuel.

This powder keg erupted in the spring of 1863. Mary Jackson, a produce seller at the 1st Market had called a meeting the previous night and dissatisfied residents assembled at George Washington’s statue on April 3, 1863. Moving from the statue to the nearby Governor’s Mansion, the group sought a meeting with Governor John Letcher. He ignored them and they then headed toward the stores and markets of old Richmond.

Confederate diarist John Jones estimated the crowd at more than 1,000 and it grew during the day as they marched through downtown Richmond, breaking into stores and taking whatever they wanted. A jewelry store was looted as well as other stores selling necessary items such as shoes. Many were armed, and police and militia sent to try to restore control could only arrest those who separated themselves from the crowd.

At Cary and 14th Street, Mayor Joseph Mayo called on the rioters to disperse. He was ignored. Observers described the marchers—mostly women—as acting with “terrible earnestness.” Some called them “Amazonian.”

Confederate President Jefferson Davis, accompanied by Gov. Letcher, stopped them at around 15th and Main and gave them five minutes to disperse or be fired upon by the militia.

The crowd then dispersed and 43 women and 25 men were arrested. According to our speaker, neighbors turned in neighbors and many were sent to the penitentiary. The incident illustrated the class and ethnic divisions in the society of Richmond, as many well-to-do observers seemed to feel that the rioters were not really affected by the inflation and lack of food stuffs. Some described the rioters as “Irish and Yankee hags.”

Bert Dunkerly engaging members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table

In 1863, women took to the streets in order to protest a lack of resources - including flour and bread - in the capital of the Confederacy.

During the Civil War, Southerners were generally capable of producing enough food; however, distributing the resources could become extremely difficult.

The government tried to send as much food as possible to the soldiers. When battles raged in Virginia, local sources for grain were quickly exhausted.

Richmond Bread Riot - Presented by Bert Dunkerly, cont.

The Mobile Bread Riot was spurred by drastic food shortages during the Civil War.
Mobile, Mobile County, September 4, 1863

Similar riots occurred in other southern cities, including Salisbury, N.C. After the riots, the government took some steps to set up a system of relief for the families of soldiers and to reduce food prices.

The story was largely untold in the years after the war but the newspaper accounts, court documents and personal accounts ensured that the events would not be lost to history.

Collapse of the Southern Economy

Inflation spiraled into a situation of hyperinflation, in which the value of the Confederate dollar dropped rapidly, sometimes even from hour to hour.

Meanwhile, because of drought conditions, food became scarce in some areas. In 1863, things got so bad that a group of Virginians, many of them women, looted the Confederate capital in the Richmond Bread Riots, searching for food and taking out their frustration on their government.

September 20, 1863 - Battle of Chickamauga, Second Day

Except from The Civil War Day-by-Day, An Almanac 1861-1865 by E. B. Long

Daybreak on this fall Sunday in the Georgia woods was supposed to see the Confederate drive renewed from the right, commanded by Polk. Then other divisions were to join in. There was no attack until about 9:30am, when Breckenridge's division moved forward. The Union left under Thomas fell back, but held at the breastworks. Neither side gained or lost much from the heavy Confederate attacks until shortly before noon. Longstreet came in opposite the Federal Center, to find that by a blunder of orders Thomas J. Wood's Union division had been pulled out and left a gap in the Northern line. Longstreet hit, driving two divisions away, thus cutting the Federal line and causing a major portion of it to flee in considerable disorder. Rosecrans, McCook, and Crittenden were caught up in the retreat toward Chattanooga. Only Thomas' corps, aided by a few units, remained.

Thomas managed to form a new line on a rounded eminence know as Snodgrass Hill. Here the Federals held through the afternoon, repelling assault after assault. Thomas' men and fragments of other units joined later by Gordon Granger's reserve, fought a great defensive battle which later earned for Thomas his famous nickname "Rock of Chickamauga." For a while it seemed as if Confederates would take the hill, so furious and desperate were the charges. However, there were not enough Confederate reinforcements. They fought until night, when, obeying orders, Thomas withdrew toward Rossville and the mountain gaps that led to Chattanooga. Splendid as the Union defensive was, the battle was a great Confederate tactical victory.

The estimated figures are:

	Federal Effectives	Confederates
	58,000	66,000
Killed	1,657	2,312
Wounded	9,756	14,674
Missing	4,757	1,468
Total Casualties	16,170	18,454

The casualty rate on both sides was about 28 percent. A dispatch from General Rosecrans increased President Lincoln's anxiety for further details.

Thomas J. Wood

Thomas John Wood was a career United States Army officer. He served in the Mexican–American War and as a Union general during the American Civil War. During the Mexican–American War, Wood served on the staff of General Zachary Taylor, and later joined the 2nd Dragoons.

Trivia Answers

Thomas Morris Chester

Galusha Pennypacker

Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr.

1. Thomas Morris Chester was offered the opportunity by the Philadelphia Press in August 1864 to serve as a reporter on the frontlines, focusing especially on black troops, he took the assignment immediately. He was the first African American to serve as a war correspondent for a major daily newspaper. What was probably uppermost in his mind was the chance to tell a large white audience the truth about black men in combat. And he wasn't about to let that opportunity slip by. Assigned to the frontlines, Chester spent most of his time with the Army of the James, which had large numbers of black troops, fighting near the cities of Petersburg and the Confederate capital, Richmond. His numerous dispatches covered in detail the clashes between both armies, the extraordinary bravery of the Union soldiers, white and black, and the names of the men killed and wounded.
2. Galusha Pennypacker is to this day the youngest person to hold the rank of Brigadier General in the US Army. During the Second Battle of Fort Fisher at Wilmington, North Carolina, on January 15, 1865, Colonel Pennypacker was severely wounded while crossing enemy lines. In spite of his wounds, he continued to lead his men in a charge over a traverse, captured the fort and planted the colors of the 97th Pennsylvania Infantry Regiment in the Confederate compound. For gallantry in the face of the enemy, he was awarded the Medal of Honor. After convalescing, he was promoted to Brigadier General at age 20, making him the youngest officer to hold the rank of general in the US Army to this day. For his war service, he was brevetted Major General US Army on March 13, 1865.
3. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., a future justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, was wounded three times during the Civil War at Ball's Bluff, Antietam, and Chancellorsville. Holmes graduated from Harvard College in 1861, but the most formative influence on his life was his service in the Civil War. Serving for two years in the 20th Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, Holmes was shot just above the heart at Ball's Bluff and then in the neck at Antietam; sick with dysentery, he missed the fighting at Fredericksburg, where his unit suffered calamitous losses. At the battle known as the Second Fredericksburg, he was shot again, this time in the foot. After recuperating for eight months at home, he took a position in the Sixth Corps and witnessed the unspeakable carnage of the campaign known as the Wilderness, where the losses averaged, he calculated, about 3,000 a day. Discharged in 1864, he was forever changed. He was seriously wounded three times, experiences that led him to develop a harsh, unsentimental view of life as endless conflict, with an individual's destiny in the hands of an almost whimsical Fate.
4. Senator John J. Crittenden of Kentucky had two sons who became major generals during the Civil War—one for the North and one for the South. One of Crittenden's sons, George B. Crittenden, became a general in the Confederate Army. Another son, Thomas Leonidas Crittenden, became a general in the Union Army.
5. The Battle of Chickamauga, fought on September 18-20, 1863, was the most significant Union defeat in the Western Theater, and involved the second-highest number of casualties after the Battle of Gettysburg. In popular histories, it is often said that Chickamauga is a Cherokee word meaning "river of death".

Bert Dunkerly: The Richmond Bread Riots

Robert M. (Bert) Dunkerly will cover the 1863 Richmond Bread Riot, the largest civil disturbance to take place in the Confederacy. Bert will examine the causes of the riot, follow the route of the marchers, and discuss its long term impacts.

Bert is a historian, award-winning author, and speaker who is actively involved in historic preservation and research. A native of Central Pennsylvania, he holds a degree in History from St. Vincent College in Latrobe, PA, and a Masters in Historic Preservation from Middle Tennessee State University. He has worked at fourteen historic sites, including Moore's Creek from 2007 to 2009 and lived in downtown Wilmington during that time. He's the author of twelve books and numerous scholarly articles, including Redcoats on the River: Southeastern North Carolina in the Revolutionary War, published in 2008. His research includes archaeology, colonial life, military history, and historic commemoration.

Gaunt, hungry women—several wielding weapons—took to the streets of Richmond, Virginia, on April 2, 1863, to protest food shortages, hoarding, speculation, and spiraling inflation in the Confederate capital. When a group of Richmond women took their complaints to Virginia governor John L. Letcher that day, he refused to see them. Their anger turned into a street march and attacks on commercial establishments. Several eyewitnesses reported seeing an emaciated woman raise a skeleton of an arm and scream, "We celebrate our right to live! We are starving!" Others heard a chant of "Bread or blood!" The mob then began attacking government warehouses, grocery stores, and various mercantile establishments, seizing food, clothing, and wagons, as well as jewelry and other luxury goods. Only after troops were deployed and authorities threatened to fire on the mob did the rioters disperse. More than sixty men and women were arrested and tried for their actions during the riot.

Richmond wasn't the only southern city to see bread riots. The Salisbury, NC, "Bread Riot," and similar disturbances in Georgia, also in 1863, are dramatic evidence of the stresses on local life brought on by the Civil War. Maj Gen Joseph Hooker

Major General Joseph Hooker proudly took command of the Federal Army of the Potomac at Fredericksburg. But Lincoln, in one of his most famous letters, had advice for the new commander: "there are some things in regard to which, I am not quite satisfied with you. I believe you to be a brave and skillful soldier, which, of course, I like. I also believe you do not mix politics with your profession, in which you are right. You have confidence in yourself, which is valuable, if not an indispensable quality. You are ambitious, which, within reasonable bounds, does good rather than harm. But I think that during General Burnside's command of the Army, you have taken counsel of your ambition, and thwarted him as much as you could, in which you did a great wrong to the country, and to a most meritorious and honorable brother officer. I have heard, in such way as to believe it, of your recently saying that both the Army and the Government needed a dictator. Of course it was not for this, but in spite of it, that I have given you the command. Only those generals who gain successes, can set up dictators. What I now ask of you is military success, and I will risk the dictatorship."

155th Commemoration of the Second Battle of Fort Fisher ~ Glory Enough For All

On the weekend of January 18-19, the Fort Fisher State Historic Site hosted a very successful commemoration of the pivotal 1865 battle that saw the fall of the “Confederate Goliath” that closed the Cape Fear River and the port of Wilmington to blockade running and thus halted the flow of essential military supplies from overseas to the Army of Northern Virginia.

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table maintained a presence at the event and spoke to hundreds of people interested in Civil War history. Literally thousands of visitors came to the event in spite of the wintry weather.

Our Round Table enjoyed a prominent location on the walkway around the visitor’s center and adjacent to the North Carolina Military Historical Society (NCMHS). John Winecoff is president of the Wilmington Chapter of the NCMHS and great thanks is due to John for his work in setting up tents and table to ensure our effective participation.

The Round Table (left) set up next to the NC Military Historical Society (center) and the MG Thomas Ruger Camp #1 of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War (right). Silent Auction

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is running a silent auction with donated items such as books, prints, memorabilia, etc., to raise money specifically to help fund the travel costs of our speakers. We pay travel costs for speakers and our budget limits us, generally, to speakers from neighboring states. It's advantageous for us that so much Civil War history is centered on Virginia, Tennessee and the Carolinas, but still those costs mount up and there are times when we have the opportunity to engage a speaker from a more distant location and we strive to present the best possible program we can. Look for the table outside the meeting area to see some of the items being offered and put in your bid.

If you have anything you'd like to donate to the cause, please let us know. Contact Bill Jayne, Ed Gibson or Bruce Patterson. Thanks.

Book Summary ~Lieutenant General Jubal Anderson Early C.S.A.Autobiographical Sketch and Narrative of the War between the States

Jubal Anderson Early was born in Franklin County, Virginia in 1816. He was appointed to the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1833 and served for a short time in the Seminole War in 1837 and 1838. In 1838, he resigned from the military and became a lawyer in Virginia. After serving one term in the Virginia House beginning in 1841, Early returned to practicing law and served as a volunteer in the Mexican War from 1847 to 1848. Although he voted against secession at the Virginia state convention, Early volunteered for the Confederate army and became a colonel in the 24th Virginia Infantry when the Civil War began in 1861. He participated in such significant campaigns as The First Battle of Bull Run (First Manassas), Antietam (Sharpsburg), and Gettysburg. General Robert E. Lee promoted Early to lieutenant general in 1864, but he was later relieved of his duties after suffering defeat at the hands of George Custer at the Battle of Waynesboro on March 2, 1865. After the war, Early refused to swear his allegiance to the United States. Early moved to Canada shortly after the war and while there he began work on his autobiography. In 1869 he returned to Lynchburg, Virginia and resumed practicing law. He served as director of the Louisiana Lottery Company, and helped found and lead the Southern Historical Society beginning in 1869. He died in 1894.

Autobiographical Sketch and Narrative of the War Between the States (1912) begins with Early's account of his attempts to interrupt Virginia's efforts to secede, his failure in that endeavor, and his decision to join the Confederate army. Early then describes his military experiences, the typical lives of soldiers, his responsibilities as colonel, and several military engagements. The final chapter includes a letter from General Robert E. Lee and the editor's summary of Early's life after the war ended in 1865. Early's Autobiographical Sketch and other writings proved to play a very important historical role; in fact in American National Biography, Gary Gallagher asserts, "No person North or South did more to influence nineteenth-century historiography of the Civil War."

In H.B. McClellan's book, I Rode with Jeb Stuart: The Life and Campaigns of Major General J.E.B. Stuart, McClellan summed up the Gettysburg Campaign and Stuart's role:

"It was not the want of cavalry that General Lee bewailed, for he had enough of it had it been properly used. It was the absence of Stuart himself that he felt so keenly; for on him he had learned to rely to such extent that it seemed as if his cavalry were concentrated in his person, and from him alone could information be expected."

Shock Troops of the Confederacy: The Sharpshooter Battalions of the Army of Northern Virginia

This article, written by a previous editor - Bob Cooke, was originally in the November 2006 issue of The Runner. It is based on a previous presentation to the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table members by Fred L. Ray. I wanted to share it with the members who have joined since then. Enjoy!

Fred L. Ray, author of Shock Troops of the Confederacy: The Sharpshooter Battalions of the Army of Northern Virginia, spoke to us about his research, which culminated in the above work. "They couldn't hit an elephant at this distance", said Union Major General John Sedgwick as he observed the Confederate position some 500 yards away. Less than a moment later, a ball hit the General in the head, killing him almost instantly. He became another casualty of the Civil War "sharpshooter" (from the German Scharfschütze) who by this time (May 1864) roamed the battlefields picking off the unwary soldiers of both sides. In the Army of Northern Virginia, these men, eventually numbering nearly seven thousand, were organized into several battalions whose duties included not only harassing the enemy with their accurate long-range fire, but also as skirmishers, scouts, flank and rear guards. Their first action as a unit came in May 1863 when they guarded Stonewall Jackson's flank at Chancellorsville. Mr. Ray demonstrated the use of the men as "shock troops" who plowed through the Union picket lines and then swung around to gather up as many Federals as they could, from behind. This tactic, used by (North Carolinian) Major Thomas Wooten, became known as "seine-hauling" due to its similarity of fishing along the coast. Mr. Ray illuminated a much-neglected subject (the last work was written before the turn of the century - the 19th century, that is!) And indicated however, that sharpshooters alone, could not win a war.

Mr. Ray also described some of the weapons used by the marksmen: the Whitworth (caliber .451, weight almost 10 lbs.), Enfield (cal. .577, weight 9½ lbs.) and several target rifles (English match rifles used mainly by Union troops) weighing anywhere from 25 to 60 pounds. In an accuracy test conducted in 1971, "various rifles fired 15 shots at 400 yards at a 72" by 72" wooden target." The U.S. Springfield hit 7 times, the British Enfield 13, while the 1842 smoothbore musket missed entirely. As for the Whitworth, 15 shots scored 15 hits on the target!

Shock Troops of the Confederacy tells the story of the elite troops of the South -- on the picket line and in the thick of the battlefields of Virginia.

Whether screening Stonewall Jackson's flank march at Chancellorsville or leading the last desperate assault at Fort Stedman, the sharpshooters led the Army of Northern Virginia in the attack, protected it at rest, and covered its retreat.

At the beginning of the Civil War the Army of the Potomac had, thanks to Hiram Berdan, an advantage in sharpshooting and light infantry, which came as a rude shock to the Confederates during the 1862 Peninsular campaign. In response the Confederates organized their own corps of elite light infantry, the Sharpshooters. Building on the ideas of an obscure Alabama colonel, Bristol Gayle, General Robert Rodes organized the first battalion of sharpshooters in his brigade in early 1863, and later in each brigade of his division. In early 1864 General Lee adopted the concept for the entire Army of Northern Virginia, directing each infantry brigade to field a sharp-shooter battalion. These units found ready employment in the Overland campaign, and later in the trenches of Petersburg and in the fast-moving Shenandoah campaign of 1864. Although little has been written about them (the last book, written by a former sharpshooter, appeared in 1899), they played an important and sometimes pivotal role in many battles and campaigns in 1864 and 1865. By the end of the war the sharpshooters were experimenting with tactics that would become standard practice fifty years later. Although most people think of Berdan's Sharpshooters when the subject comes up, the Confederate sharpshooter battalions had a far greater effect on the outcome of the conflict. Later in the war, in response to the Confederate dominance of the skirmish line, the Federals began to organize their own sharpshooter units at division level, though they never adopted an army-wide system.

The book tells the story of the development of the sharpshooter battalions, their tactical use on the battlefield, and the human story of the sharpshooters themselves.

Trivia Answers

1. David Dixon Porter commanded the mortar flotilla used in the campaign against New Orleans.
2. The 43rd Battalion, Virginia Cavalry, known as Mosby's Rangers or Mosby's Raiders, was a partisan ranger unit noted for its lightning-quick raids and its ability to elude Union Army pursuers and disappear, blending in with local farmers and townsmen.
3. General Edmund Kirby Smith was appointed as commander of the Trans-Mississippi Department in January 1863. The area included most actions east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Mississippi River. In 1863, Smith dispatched troops in an unsuccessful attempt to relieve the Siege of Vicksburg. After Vicksburg was captured by the Union in July, the isolated Trans-Mississippi zone was cut off from the rest of the Confederacy, and became virtually an independent nation, nicknamed 'Kirby Smithdom'.
4. For an eight-month period in 1862 Major General Benjamin Franklin Butler, the Union military governor of New Orleans, was probably the most reviled man in the South. He quickly became known as "Beast" and "Spoons"—and undoubtedly countless other sobriquets not usually heard in genteel Southern drawing rooms. Butler was given the nickname "Spoons" for allegedly stealing silverware from homes on one of his campaign badges.

The Civil War Institute is hosting a premiere annual summer conference bringing leading historians and diverse public audiences together for lectures, battlefield tours, small group discussions, and roundtable conversations about the Civil War era. Sessions, lodging, and meals are held on the 200-acre Gettysburg College campus, and there are part-time and full-time packages available.

For 2020, we are excited to feature leading Civil War scholars, Harold Holzer, Catherine Clinton, Brian Wills, Jeffery Wert, Carol Reardon, and Scott Hartwig within our lineup of more than 40 distinguished speakers and tour guides. The conference will feature a wide range of topics, including POW prison escapes, soldier impressment, the Civil War in the West, the guerrilla experience, and more. The 2020 program will also debut debates between leading scholars about Civil War generalship. This year's topics include George B. McClellan at Antietam, James Longstreet, and Nathan Bedford Forrest.

In addition to touring the Gettysburg battlefield, participants will also be able to visit other nearby battlefields and such as First Manassas, 2nd Fredericksburg and Salem Church, Antietam, Cool Springs, Spotsylvania, and Bristoe Station. Attendees who prefer a shorter, more physically active experience can choose to sign up for our new "active track" package, which features lectures and a day and a half of walking-intensive tours of the Gettysburg battlefield with historian Timothy Orr. The 2020 conference offers something for everyone, from longtime students of the Civil War to those who are new to Civil War history.

Becky Sawyer: The Letters of Sidney Stockbridge, aboard the USS Pawtuxet, James River, April 1865

Becky Sawyer, interpreter and collections manager at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site, will speak about a trove of long lost letters written by a mariner aboard a U.S. Navy ship in the last days of the war.

A native of the St. Louis, Missouri, area, Becky earned a Masters degree in public history from UNCW. She is also a highly accomplished reenactor who researches costumes from the 18th and 19th centuries to enrich the experience of history.

Over the course of the past three years, with the assistance of Rick Morrison, Becky and other staff of the Fort Fisher State Historic Site have been transcribing letters belonging to Sidney Stockbridge who served as a clerk on the USS Pawtuxet in the second battle of Fort Fisher in January 1865. These letters are on loan from Joe Stockbridge of Surry, Maine, the great nephew of Sidney Stockbridge.

After the fall of Wilmington on 22 February 1865, the USS Pawtuxet, proceeded to Beaufort NC, the Union base for the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron. Once ready for more sea service, the Pawtuxet, transferred to the James River Squadron in Virginia.

By March 18, 1865, the James River Squadron comprised at least 42 war ships, including several monitors and other ironclads. With the Union's final push towards destruction of the Army of Northern Virginia, Stockbridge writes about daily life on the James River including seeing the hustle and bustle of City Point, the obscure spot where the Appomattox River joins with the James River about 30 miles below Richmond.

As the headquarters of the combined Union force, City Point was one of the busiest seaports in the world in 1865. Grant had somewhere in the neighborhood of 150,000 well fed and well equipped troops in the vicinity to oppose Lee's rapidly dwindling army of about 55,000 poorly equipped and under nourished soldiers.

The culminating Civil War campaigns in the Eastern Theater are seen as titanic clashes of great armies led by the preeminent generals of the war: Lieutenant General Ulysses S. Grant of the U.S. Army and the Confederate paladin, Lieutenant General Robert E. Lee. Without a doubt, land forces dominated the Overland Campaign, the Siege of Petersburg and the Appomattox Campaign, but maritime forces were crucial to victory.

U.S. Navy dominance of the sea lanes and inland waterways allowed Grant to continually move his forces around the right (eastern) flank of Lee's army.

SIDNEY STOCKBRIDGE

Vast quantities of supplies and huge numbers of reinforcements moved safely and reliably aboard ships from both northern ports and southern bases like Beaufort, NC, and Port Royal, SC. Conversely, the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia was totally dependent on land transportation for its supplies and reinforcements and those routes were subject to interdiction and damage.

Once again, Clerk Stockbridge had a front row seat for historic events. He participates in the end of the war in a very personal way. He writes about the fall of Richmond and his friendship with a southern belle, but the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln fills him with dread.

Trivia Questions

1. Trivia question related to the mid-December, 1864, Battle of Nashville: Confederate troops were being force marched north into Tennessee over frozen ground without adequate footwear or food. Rations had dwindled to a few grains of meal or kernels of corn per day.
Upon reaching the vicinity of Nashville they began to search for food. One Texas soldier related to his family, that "over in the valley we spotted a tree laden with fruit" and indeed they had. What was the fruit?
2. Who said "I will be in my coffin before I fight under your command!"

The USS Pawtuxet

USS Pawtuxet, named after a river in Rhode Island was a side wheel steamer launched by the Portsmouth Navy Yard on 19 March 1864. She was delivered to the Navy at New York City on 18 May 1864. She was commissioned on 26 August 1864, with Comdr. J. H. Spotts commanding.

Following commissioning, Pawtuxet was ordered to the Grand Banks to join the quest for the Confederate raider Tallahassee, but before she could get underway Tallahassee had returned safely to Wilmington. Pawtuxet was then ordered south to join the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron. Joining the 3rd Division in October she was ordered to cruise off the Carolina coast, primarily between Capes Lookout and Fear. At the end of December she bombarded the defenses at Wilmington in support of the first assault against Fort Fisher. Returning on 13 January 1865, she again turned her guns on that fort; sent men and boats to participate in the successful assault on the 15th; then resumed blockade duties. Shifted to the Virginia coast in April, she was decommissioned at New York on 15 June 1865, and was sold on 15 October 1867.

Bentonville Battlefield Tours

Reserve a Date

February 8, February 22, and March 6, 2020

Tours begins at 9:00 a.m..

As part of the 155th Anniversary of the 1865 Carolinas Campaign, Wade Sokolosky, noted author and historian of the campaign, will lead a special tour in commemoration of the historic "Last Grand Charge of the Army of Tennessee" at the Battle of Bentonville.

Come follow in the footsteps of the army as we explore the Bentonville battlefield examining critical aspects of the Army of Tennessee's role in the battle: its movement to the Carolinas, organization and command, the final charge, and its failure south of the Goldsboro Road. Highlighting the tour is a detailed examination of the wonderfully preserved trenches dug by the army during the battle, parts of which are normally restricted to the public.

Cost is $15 per person, a portion of which goes directly to Bentonville battlefield preservation. Tour is limited to 25 participants. To maximize time on the battlefield, participants will need to bring their lunch. A cooler will be on hand to keep drinks and food items. Please wear comfortable walking shoes and seasonal wear.

For information on how to reserve your spot contact Wade Sokolosky at (252) 646-5553 or email at sokolosky1@aol.com

Wreaths Across America placed over 2.2 million wreaths on veterans graves throughout the United States and several overseas (European) locations on Saturday, 14 December, 2019.

As each wreath was placed at the head stone, the name of the fallen was said aloud, thus assuring that the veteran so honored, will not be forgotten.

The 2020 Wreaths Across America Day is Saturday, December 19th.

Thank you for your participation!

Silent Auction

The Round Table is running a silent auction with donated items such as books, prints, memorabilia, etc., to raise money specifically to help fund the travel costs of our speakers. We pay travel costs for speakers and our budget limits us, generally, to speakers from neighboring states. It's advantageous for us that so much Civil War history is centered on Virginia, Tennessee and the Carolinas, but still those costs mount up and there are times when we have the opportunity to engage a speaker from a more distant location and we strive to present the best possible program we can. Look for the table outside the meeting area to see some of the items being offered and put in your bid.

A great example of the items being offered is a print by Jim Horton, a member of our round table. Jim is an outstanding artist who specializes in historical subjects and exhibits locally often. The item is a limited edition 24" by 10" giclée print of the Gate at Cemetery Hill in Gettysburg signed by the artist.

If you have anything you'd like to donate to the cause, please let us know. Contact Bill Jayne, Ed Gibson or Bruce Patterson. Thanks.

Lori Sanderlin - Finding Post-War Confederate Sailor, Captain H. S. Lebby, Blockade Runner and Privateer

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites you to a presentation on the mystery of Henry Sterling Lebby, a South Carolinian hailed by no less an authority than James Sprunt as one of those “celebrated men of nerve and experience” who captained blockade runners in the last year of the Civil War.

The ships they captained, like Lebby’s Little Hattie, were expressly built to run the increasingly tight Federal blockade. Little Hattie was built in Scotland and ran the blockade at least four times, once to Charleston, S.C., and three times at Wilmington. In fact, Little Hattie made her last run into Wilmington on December 23, 1864, just ahead of the USS Louisiana, the frivolous “powder ship” that was supposed to destroy Ft. Fisher by means of an off-shore explosion. The only effect of the blast was to wake the garrison of the fort in the middle of the night.

Born on James Island, Charleston, S.C., in 1829, Captain Lebby had a “celebrated” career as a Confederate sea captain but ended up at Sailors’ Snug Harbor (SSH) in Staten Island, N.Y., in his last years. The wealthy

Janet Croon: The War Outside My Window, Diary of LeRoy Wiley Gresham, 1860-1865

Jan Croon, editor of The War Outside My Window, presented a riveting account of the Civil War home front through the eyes of a unique and affecting observer. The book is subtitled “The Civil War Diary of LeRoy Wiley Gresham, 1860-65” and it’s billed as “A remarkable account of the collapse of the Old South and the final years of a privileged, but afflicted life.” It’s all that and much more.

Bruce Patterson, our Round Table’s secretary, treasurer and éminence grise, put it well. In an email to Ms. Croon, he wrote: “Meeting LeRoy last evening was an unexpected pleasure. I had expected another Civil War tale, as seen from the window of a Macon homestead. Instead, I was introduced to a young, afflicted, Southern teen-aged boy with gifts far beyond his physical limitations. In short, your presentation and the tale you wove was a testament to youthful ambition, Southern education, perseverance and the Christian faith LeRoy displayed until his passing. Your obvious love of this young man was infectious.”

New York City family of Revolutionary War patriot Captain Robert Richard Randall dedicated the proceeds of the sale of Randall Manor, several acres of land in lower Manhattan, to endow the home for “worn out and decrepit sailors” on Staten Island.

So, how did the celebrated blockade running captain end up in a home for “worn out and decrepit sailors” in New York City? His application for residence at the home described him as a widower and a merchant sailor.

Lori Sanderlin, Manager of the North Carolina Maritime Museum in Southport, will unravel this fascinating mystery for us. Ms. Sanderlin is a native of Wilmington and a graduate of UNCW. She earned a masters in Maritime Studies from State University of New York Maritime College located in Bronx, N.Y. While conducting research from the admissions logs at Sailors’ Snug Harbor, New York, she found the name of Henry Sterling Lebby. Not only was Lebby not just a “merchant sailor,” he was married to Susan Anne Witter, also of James Island, S.C.

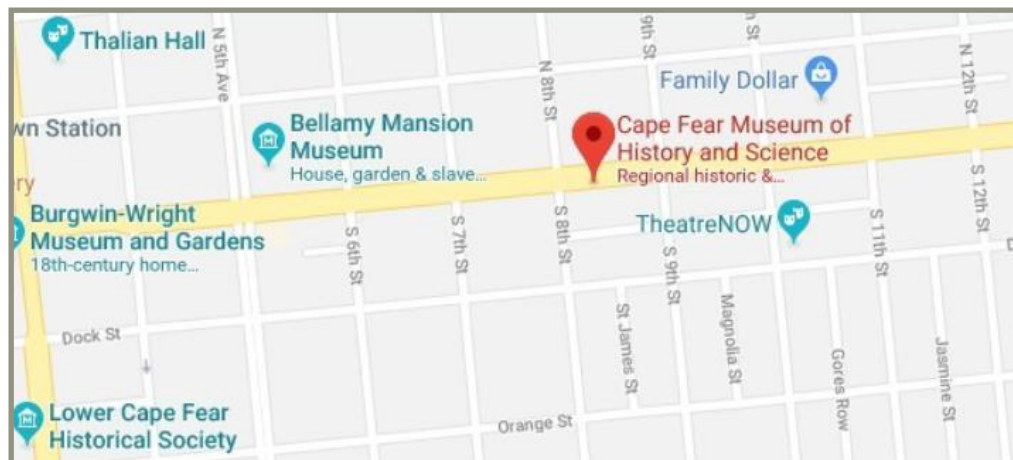

The presentation takes place at the Cape Fear Museum at 814 Market Street on Thursday evening, December 12. We begin at 6:30 p.m. with a chance to mingle and then the meeting starts at 7:00 p.m.

Aged sailors at the Sailors’ Snug Harbor on Staten Island, N.Y., late 1800s. Residents were known as “snugs.”

Aerial rendering of Sailors’ Snug Harbor on Staten Island, NY. The campus is now on the National Register of Historic Places and houses the maritime museum and other cultural venues.

We heard LeRoy's story of how a teenaged boy afflicted with a harrowing, painful and incurable illness, read and learned everything he could about the war from an imposing mansion in Macon, Georgia, where young Confederate officers, Union prisoners, notable cultural leaders young friends, aged family members and slaves come and go with news and acute observations. By January 1864 LeRoy had become such an astute observer that he noted "I think the Yankees have, in Wilmington, struck the weakest and one of the most important points in the Country and if they are as pertinacious as they were at Charleston, they will take it." The news that the Union was mounting an attack on Wilmington was false, but LeRoy's observations were very accurate.

And we also learned much about how such a book is made. LeRoy's seven diaries had been safely, but obscurely, stored at the Library of Congress (LOC). A show at the Library featured the diaries and a Washington Post story about the show lit the fuse of Jan Croon's interest.

A gifted investigator and genealogical authority, Ms. Croon convinced Civil War publisher Ted Savas that there was a great story in young LeRoy's diaries. She went to work and not only prepared the diaries for publication but filled in the gaps, made the connections, clarified the many references to family members and generally made the book a fascinating wartime artifact but also a three-dimensional portrait of a remarkable person.

Running the Blockade - Little Hattie's Last Trip to Charleston

Running the blockade. [from the Richmond times Feb. 21, 1897.] Daring Exploits at Charleston in war times. Some lucky vessels that made their way through the Federal Fleets repeatedly without Detection.

The steamer Little Hattie, Captain H. S. Lebby, was the last runner in or out of Charleston. She was a small vessel, Clyde built, furnished with powerful engines, and she made more trips than any other vessel engaged in the business.

On several occasions she brought such munitions of war which the Confederacy was in pressing need of, and at least three battles were fought with munitions for which the Confederates had waited, and which she landed safely in their hands.

Plot after plot was formed at Nassau to get hold of the Hattie, but none of them were successful. She slipped in and out like a phantom, taking the most desperate risks, and being attended by quite extraordinary good luck.

The last entrance of the Hattie into Charleston occurred one night in February, 1865. The Confederacy was then in extremis, and the Federal fleet off Charleston, numbered eighteen or twenty sail.

It was a starlight night, and at an early hour, the Hattie crept forward among the fleet. She had been freshly painted a blue-white, her fire made no smoke, and not a light was permitted to shine on board. With her engines moving slowly, she let the wind drive her forward. There were eight or ten vessels outside the bar, and as many within. Those outside were successfully passed without an alarm being raised. The Hattie ran within 300 feet of two different blockaders without her presence being detected. To the naked eye of the lookouts she must have seemed a hazy mist moving slowly along.

The little steamer was quietly approaching the inner line of blockaders, when a sudden fire was opened on her from a gunboat not 200 feet distant, and the air at the same time was filled with rockets to announce the runner's presence.

At that time the Federals had the whole of Morris Island, and Fort Sumter had been so battered to pieces that monitors took up their stations almost in pistol shot of it.

As soon as the Hattie was discovered, all steam was put on and she was headed straight for the channel. She ran a terrible gauntlet of shot and shell for ten minutes, but escaped untouched.

Then came the real peril. Just below Sumter, in the narrowest part of the channel, the Hattie encountered two barge-loads of men stationed there on picket.

Her extraordinary speed saved her from being boarded, but the volleys fired after her wounded two or three men and cut three fingers off the hand of the pilot holding the spokes of the wheel.

Two hundred yards ahead lay a monitor, and she at once opened fire and kept her guns going as long as the Hattie could be seen, but not a missile struck, and she arrived safely at her wharf.

This was marvelous, considering that the steamer ran so close that she could hear the orders given on the monitor.

Charleston was being bombarded, many of the business houses closed, and all could see that the end was drawing near. The Hattie was in as much danger lying at the wharf, as she would be outside, and a cargo was made up for her as quickly as possible, and she was made ready for her last trip.

Just before dark the sentinels on Fort Sumter counted twenty-six Federal blockaders off Charleston harbor, and yet the Hattie coolly made her preparations to run out. Just before midnight, with a starlight night and smooth sea, the lucky little craft picked her way through all that fleet without being hailed or a gun fired, and she was lying at Nassau when the news of Lee's surrender was received.

Running the Blockade - One of the Last Trips to Wilmington

"Little Hattie was built by James and George Thomson on the Clyde, she was a schooner-rigged iron paddle steamer. She was launched in March 1864, and purchased by the Importing & Exporting Company of Georgia. Little Hattie sailed under three masters, Capt. Jesse De Horsey, Capt. Collier, and Capt. H. S. Lebby, CSN. In all she ran the blockade some ten times, into Wilmington and Charleston. Consul Allen at Bermuda refers to her as being chased on one occasion. She was in Bermuda on 19th July 1864, when Consul Allen believed that she was involved in some scheme to release Confederate prisoners from captivity. This plan did not come to fruition. She was once more at Bermuda in late October, but left for Wilmington on the 25th. Mary F. Sanders, in a talk to the Ladies Memorial Association of Wilmington, spoke of watching her arrival:

I sprang to my feet, caught up the powerful field glasses...stepped out on the roof of the porch facing the ocean and looked. Sure enough it was the Little Hattie, and to my horror, I saw a figure on the paddle-box, whom I knew to be Dan [Daniel Stevenson, the signal officer] with flag in hand signaling to the Fort....Onward dashed the frail little craft with eight United States steamers following close in her wake, pouring a relentless iron hail after her. When she came near the Fort, the thirteen ships stationed off the mouth of Cape Fear joined in the fray, but He who marks the sparrow's fall, covered her with His hand, and not one of the death-bearing messengers touched the little boat.....For nearly an hour I stood on the roof watching the exciting race, and when the Little Hattie came near enough to discern features, I recognized Captain Lebby with his trumpet, Lt. Clancey with his spyglass, and Dan, still standing on the paddle box with his flag, having served its purpose, resting idly in his hand; and thus, at 10 o'clock that cloudless October morning was accomplished one of the only two successful trips of a blockade-runner made by daylight.

By early 1865, now very well known to the federal authorities, the Hattie transferred her base to Havana, where she saw out the war."

Silent Auction

The Round Table is running a silent auction with donated items such as books, prints, memorabilia, etc., to raise money specifically to help fund the travel costs of our speakers. We pay travel costs for speakers and our budget limits us, generally, to speakers from neighboring states. It's advantageous for us that so much Civil War history is centered on Virginia, Tennessee and the Carolinas, but still those costs mount up and there are times when we have the opportunity to engage a speaker from a more distant location and we strive to present the best possible program we can. Look for the table outside the meeting area to see some of the items being offered and put in your bid.

A great example of the items being offered is a print by Jim Horton, a member of our round table. Jim is an outstanding artist who specializes in historical subjects and exhibits locally often. The item is a limited edition 24" by 10" giclée print of the Gate at Cemetery Hill in Gettysburg signed by the artist.

If you have anything you'd like to donate to the cause, please let us know. Contact Bill Jayne, Ed Gibson or Bruce Patterson. Thanks.

Civil War Ironclads

Ironclads, or wooden warships protected from gunfire, were nontraditional, in that they incorporated technical advances that were not wholly acceptable to traditional naval architects, particularly when they did not accept traditional hull design and armament. Both the French and English Navy utilized an ironclad design as early as the mid-1850's but the concept was not acceptable on these shores until the Civil War.

Interestingly enough, the first Ironclads used in the Civil War were not US Naval vessels, but rather were US Army Ironclads for use in the western river campaigns. It was Army Quartermaster General Montgomery Meigs, who on 2 July 1861, first authorized their purchase while the Navy did not deploy an ironclad until March, 1862, when the first Monitor (a Swedish design concept, built in New York) engaged the CSS Virginia at Hampton Roads, VA.

Needless to say, the Ironclads quickly became acceptable, but that is another story.

USS Mound City

Sugar Loaf Line Historical Park

Our past president Chris Fonvielle has been leading the charge for the establishment of the J. Ryder Lewis Civil War Park in Carolina Beach. The site is about 3.5 acres on the east side of Route 421, Lake Park Blvd., between the highway and the harbor area, near the Publix market. The site preserves Civil War earthworks that were part of the Sugar Loaf line established around the fall of Ft. Fisher.

There was fighting along the line manned by Hoke's Confederates and the Union decided to outflank the position by advancing on the other side of the river. We have been contacted by a group called the Sugar Loaf Earthworks Preservation Group—closely allied with the Federal Point Historic Preservation Society—and asked to fund one of the interpretative panels that will be installed in the new park. We have agreed to do that.

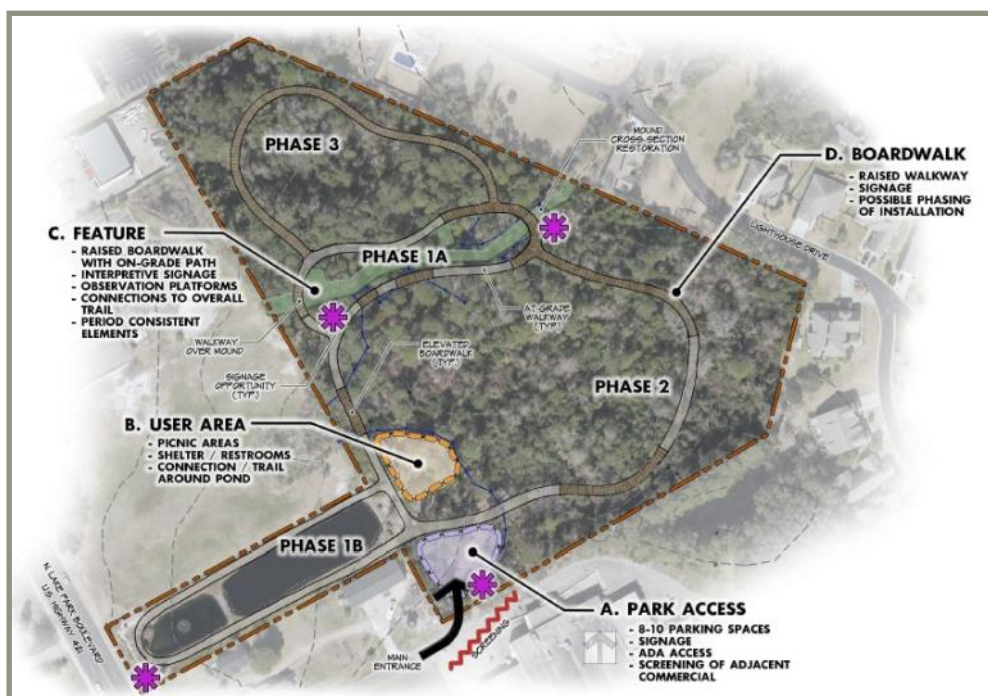

Prof. Chris Fonvielle explains the background of the “Sugar Loaf Line”: As Union forces prepared to attack Wilmington by way of Fort Fisher in the autumn of 1864, Major General W.H.C. Whiting, commander of the District of the Cape Fear, expanded existing defenses to meet the threat. He selected in part a “strong position” stretching from the sound (modern Carolina Beach canal) to Sugar Loaf hill on the Cape Fear River, for an extensive line of earthworks. Sugar Loaf itself was a natural sand dune that stood 50 feet in height on the riverbank. Whiting planned to place a battery of artillery on the summit of the hill.

Acting on General Whiting's orders, Colonel William Lamb, commandant at Fort Fisher, began constructing an “entrenched camp” at Sugar Loaf “so as to keep up communication after the arrival of the enemy, between the fort” and Sugar Loaf. The work probably commenced in early October 1864. On October 28, 1864, Whiting turned over the project to Captain Francis T. Hawks of Company A, 2nd Confederate States Engineers.

By December 1864, the earthen fieldworks of the Sugar Loaf lines ran for more than one mile from the sound to the river. Confederate forces continually strengthened them in the winter of 1864-1865.

Much of the earthworks that comprised the Sugar Loaf defenses are in a remarkable state of preservation, despite the fact that they were made almost entirely of sand. However, they are also difficult to access because of their remote location inside Carolina Beach State Park or because they are on private property. The Joseph Ryder Lewis Jr. Civil War Park will both remedy public inaccessibility to a section of the Sugar Loaf defenses and promote heritage tourism on Pleasure Island.

The interpretative panel we are funding will include our logo and give due credit to the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. These panels are to be much like those at Ft. Fisher. Please consider making a donation to the round table to help offset the cost of this project. Thanks.

Trivia Questions

1. Who was the only man who fought for the confederacy, was captured and released to join the union army, and then transferred to serve as a sailor on the USS Minnesota?
2. I was born on April 14, 1822, in Guyandotte, Virginia (now West Virginia). I graduated from the United States Military Academy in 1842. I accepted a commission as an ordnance officer. I fought in the Mexican war supporting Scott's siege train and fought with distinction in the Battle of Cerro Gordo and the siege of Puebla, Mexico. After the war, I worked at numerous sites as an ordnance officer. I was commissioned to write a new ordnance manual. It was 600 pages and it was the essential guide to ordnance officers in the Civil War. I hold eight patents including one for a rifle with an innovative rolling breech-block. I was voted into the ordnance hall of fame in 2008.

One of my more obscure accomplishments can be found today just off modern day Route 30 just west of Gettysburg. While I don't believe in lucky numbers, number 233 brought me ordnance fame at Gettysburg.

Who am I and what is my tie to an alleged Battle of Gettysburg fact?

3. The three Confederate Navy vessels Charleston, Fredericksburg and Georgia were purchased with funds raised by which organization and by what nickname were these ships often referred to?

Civil War Library Liquidation Sale - Central New Jersey CWRT

Regrettably it has become necessary to close our Civil War Library & Research Center, located at 94 Green Street, Woodbridge, New Jersey. For over 20 years it has served the Civil War community and the members of our Civil War Round Table as a wonderful source of research and reading. Unfortunately the cost of maintaining it, along with a drop in use by the membership and public, has led to the decision to close it. All of the 2000+ books in the collection are available for purchase. Hardcover books can be purchased at $3 per book, or 4 hardcover books for $10. Paperback books can be purchased for $1 per book. There is no limit to the amount of books a person can purchase.

The Library will be open on Saturdays, beginning November 9, 2019, from 10am-2pm for people to stop by and make your purchases. If Saturday does not work, arrangements can be made for the Library to be opened at a more convenient time by calling any of the following to set up a time:

Tom (908) 486-2554
Jay (732) 396-4320

NOTE: This information is being shared as a courtesy. It is unknown if they are willing to ship books. Please call any of the numbers above for further information if you are interested in purchasing.

Trivia Answers

1. Henry Morton Stanley emigrated to the United States in 1859 at age 18. Stanley reluctantly joined in the American Civil War, first enrolling in the Confederate States Army's 6th Arkansas Infantry Regiment and fighting in the Battle of Shiloh in 1862. After being taken prisoner at Shiloh, he was recruited at Camp Douglas, Illinois, by its commander Colonel James A. Mulligan as a "Galvanized Yankee." He joined the Union Army on 4 June 1862 but was discharged 18 days later because of severe illness. After recovering, he served on several merchant ships before joining the US Navy in July 1864. He became a record keeper on board the USS Minnesota, which led him into freelance journalism. Stanley and a junior colleague jumped ship on 10 February 1865 in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in search of greater adventures. Stanley was possibly the only man to serve in the Confederate Army, the Union Army, and the Union Navy. (This is the same Henry Morton Stanley of "Dr. Livingston, I presume" fame!)

3. Ladies Gunboat Association and Ladies Gunboats (aka Petticoat Gunboats).
While the Confederacy was at a distinct disadvantage when it came to producing all things military, one thing it had in abundance was enthusiasm for the new ironclad ships. Among the most zealous disciples of this mania for ironclads were the women. All across the Confederacy patriotic ladies formed associations with names like Ladies Gunboat Funds, Ladies Gunboat Associations, and Ladies Defense Associations.

Theodore T.S. Laidley

The first of these appeared in New Orleans in late 1861, then spread to Mobile, Charleston, and elsewhere. By the summer of 1862, they were scattered all across the south. On March 1, 1862, the Charleston Daily Courier printed a letter from a woman in Summerville, SC, suggesting that the paper open a list of contributions and enclosed a dollar. The paper endorsed the proposal and within a week more than a $1,000 was donated. On March 14th, the Columbus Enquirer reported, we see in the Charleston papers a young lady has started a subscription to build a gunboat at Charleston. We propose that her example should be followed in Georgia. On March 17th, the Richmond Dispatch appealed for funds to build a gunboat in Virginia and mentioned the ladies in South Carolina and Georgia who were already raising funds. Newspapers throughout the south began printing lists of contributors and the amounts various organizations had collected. Soon rivalries developed among the communities. The Sandersville Central Georgian declared in an article, "The ladies of Savannah have collected $3,600.00, what will the ladies of Washington County do?"

The ladies engaged in a variety of activities to raise money. They would solicit jewelry, china sets, silverware, watches, vases, musical boxes, and books to be raffled off. They had Gunboat Fairs to raise funds. Mrs. Mary Chestnut of Charleston wrote in her famous diary that she gave the girls a string of pearls to be raffled off at the Gunboat Fair. On April 14, 1862, she wrote, Our Fair is in full blast. We keep a restaurant. On the 15th she wrote $2,000 was made at the Fair.

The total amount raised may never be known but it had to be a considerable sum. The Charleston gunboat fund raised $30,000. The Ladies Defense Association in Richmond raised nearly that amount. Three ironclads, the Charleston, the Fredericksburg, and Georgia were called Ladies Gunboats or as one critic derisively called them “petticoat gunboats”.

This two-day, family-friendly event will commemorate the 155th anniversary of the second battle of Fort Fisher. The program will feature a tactical battle scenario (1 pm Sat and 10 am Sun) with hundreds of reenactors in period uniforms. It will also include living history demonstrations, musket demonstrations, artillery firings, period music, guided tours, and special guest speakers to educate and entertain. While the program is free and open to the public, donations are appreciated.

February 15-16, 2020 The 155th Anniversary of the Fall of Fort Anderson

Join Fort Anderson as they commemorate the 155th Anniversary of the Fall of Fort Anderson with two days of historic entertainment. Saturday and Sunday come out to watch as civil war living history actors re-live battles demonstrating the heart of both sides of the engagements. In addition, enjoy Civil War historians and browsing the pristine and normally inaccessible northern and southern batteries of the fort.

Excerpt from Lee by Clifford Downey

“He reverted to his simple jokes in camp and to his familiar turn of humor when he revealed to Senator Hill that he was not insensitive to the newspaper criticism.

“We made a great mistake in the beginning of our struggle,” Lee said in apparent seriousness to Hill, “and I fear, in spite of all we can do, it will prove to be a fatal mistake. We appointed all our worst generals to command our armies and all our best generals to edit newspapers.” Then he explained that he made campaign plans that seemed perfect, but the actual battles developed defects, and , he said “I occasionally wondered why I did not see some of the defects in advance. When it was all over I found by reading a newspaper that these best editor-generals saw all the defects plainly from the start. Unfortunately, they did not communicate their knowledge to me until it was too late.”

Janet Croon: The War Outside My Window, Diary of LeRoy Wiley Gresham, 1860-1865

Your Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has scheduled an outstanding program for Thursday, November 14. Curt Schluep, Amazon's book review editor, has named The War Outside My Window one of the three best books of 2018.

Janet Croon, Editor, brings to life the spirit and character of a young, privileged, white teenager as he is witnessing the demise of his world even as his body slowly fails him. The War Outside My Window gives readers a very detailed look at how the war impacted daily life in Macon. LeRoy Wiley Gresham was born in 1847 to an affluent family in Macon, Georgia. After a horrific leg injury left him an invalid, the educated, inquisitive, perceptive, and exceptionally witty 12-year-old began keeping a diary in 1860 – just as secession and the Civil War began to tear the country apart. He tells us how people got war news and how they made sense of it all, be it from newspapers, telegraph, official reports, letters from soldiers in the fighting, or rumor; he soon learns to be skeptical. LeRoy talks about the hardships that his wealthy family is facing, with the full realization that there are others who are not as fortunate. He worries about their welfare as well, especially when horses and crops are requisitioned. He tells us what happened during Sherman's advance, when Macon was suddenly not as safe as it once was. She annotates his biographical outline with helpful footnotes and brings his story to life.

These reenactors did a thought-provoking and informative presentation for our members.

John Winecoff	Officers
Will Murray	Regular Troops
David Jordan	Drummer Boy

John Winecoff, a member of the Round Table's steering committee, and a longtime member of the Cape Fear Living History Society, shared some of his 30+ years of experience reenacting with the audience. He advised anyone interested in starting reenacting should plan to do so slowly because of the high cost of uniforms, weapons, and accouterments. It takes study and dedication, too. When a reenactor talks about a fellow reenactor "going modern," it indicates that someone has broken character since good reenactors hew as closely as they can to period dress, mannerisms, language, and action. They are an extremely dedicated group of individuals. In the movie Gettysburg, producers heavily depended on reenactors to teach what day to day life in the war was really like. John also mentioned that there are numerous reenactors that produce various period items for use by other reenactors. This includes products from period foods (including actual Hardtack) to actually hand sewing historically accurate uniforms. When you consider that thousands participate in these endeavors, the dedication to their “hobby” is awe inspiring.

Facts:

The 26th NC infantry regiment suffered approximately 588 casualties out of 820 men engaged at Gettysburg, a casualty rate that’s often cited as the highest regimental rate suffered by a Confederate regiment in the entire war.

Rank insignia for each army was different. In the Union army, two or more stars indicated a general officer, while all Confederate generals wore an insignia of three stars enclosed within a wreath.

Groups: Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry

Numbering of NC infantry regiments: There were both state-organized regiments and volunteer regiments numbered 1st through 10th early in the war. The 1st through the 10th volunteers were later renumbered. For example, the 8th NC Volunteers from New Hanover County were re-designated the 18th NC and served in the NC brigade commanded by Col. Branch and then Col. Lane. The “NC State Troops” were organized by the state government and recruits came from throughout the state.

Uniform Identification Bars/Stripes

State sponsored – 2 bars/stripes

Volunteers – 1 bar/stripe

Cavalry: North – mounts were provided

South – provided their own mounts

Sharps Carbines were popular with cavalry troops on both sides. The Sharps company was headquartered in Hartford, Connecticut, and their weapons were used by many Union cavalry regiments. In many cases, the weapons were bought privately and issued to volunteer regiments. A factory in Richmond, Virginia, manufactured a “knock-off” Sharps Carbine for southern cavalrymen.

David Jordan explaining the Drummer uniform

David Jordan presented in uniform and gave us an exemplary session on Drummer Boys. Drummer Boys were the radio of the Army. Boys were enlisted at 8 to 12 years old. When they reached 16, they were enlisted in the infantry. There were 3 ranks in the Drum Corps: Drummer, Sergeant, and Major. The Drum Corps consisted of 12 drummers and 18 fifes. Towards the end of the war, for the Confederacy, it was more likely to be 5 drummers and 2 fifes. David played several tattoos for the presentation. Their uniform consisted of:

Jefferson Boots

Jacket, these got lighter due to weather

Haversack, for personal belongings

Wooden canteen

Drum, made of wood (any but Maple which destroyed the drum head)

Drum Sash

Hat

Musicians Swords, these generally were only carried by Federal musicians

They played reveille, breakfast call, morning colors, end of the day retreat, etc. When time to travel they played a “packing song”. Cavalry also had fifes and buglers. Each Company had a drummer and a fife. During battle drummers were at the rear and served as stretcher bearers. There are 3 books of drumming music, which is written upside down compared to today’s music. During battles they played Forward March, About Face, etc. Tunes played by Northern drummers tended to be more complicated since they had better equipment.

On the march musicians were at the head of the columns. They averaged one death per battle and, sadly, were often targeted. Fifers were generally older and their tunes more complicated.

Will Murray gave us the nitty gritty on the regular army troops. He appeared wearing a North Carolina troop uniform. NC totally outfitted its troops by order of Governor Vance. NC Shell Jackets came at the end of the war.

Clothing was made of “Slave” cloth. It was a combination of wool and denim, durable and inexpensive. It was called Slave cloth because it was generally worn by slaves. It was cotton lined, had state seal buttons, “mule ear” pockets and a button fly. Button holes in those days were handsewn as there were no machines that did button holes then. Shirts were made of pillow ticking. Soldiers also wore cotton long underwear tied at the waist and ankles. (Northern uniforms were made of wool.)

Jefferson boots (brogans had no left or right – they conformed to whichever foot you wore them on) were laced up.

Hats – Slouch hats were worn since they kept the rain and sun off the soldiers. Kepi hats did neither and were traded out early by troops.

Belts were used to carry a cap box, bayonet socket, and cartridge box which held 40 rounds)

Bayonets - were used for cooking, as a hook for dragging bodies off the battleground, candle holders, etc. [Less than 1% of the battlefield deaths were due to bayonets.]

Haversack to carry personal items such as plate, cup, papers, etc.

Wooden canteens

Blanket Roll that included a half tent (also used as a poncho), ground cloth, and a blanket with personal items tucked in it.

1853 Enfield (English made rifle)

Troops were trained to load and drilled repetitively. They were taught 9 points to load. A good shooter could load and fire 3 rounds a minute!

John Winecoff in Federal Uniform briefing the citizenry of Wilmington

Next was a period briefing of Wilmington citizens by a Confederate Officer (John Winecoff) accompanied by a Confederate Soldier (Will Murray). This was a step back in time for a glimpse of life during the Civil War. This was followed by a briefing from a Union Officer and Soldier.

A variety of uniforms, weapons, and accoutrements were available for close up inspection. Overall it was an excellent presentation!

Veterans Day

Civil War Veterans

For 90 years after the last shot of the American Civil War was fired, the men who had fought for the Union and the Confederacy, respectively, continued to meet.

For the North, the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR) brought together Union soldiers, referred to as "veterans of the late unpleasantness." Starting in 1866, only one year after the war's close, and ending with the death of 109-year-old Albert Woolson in 1956, the GAR boasted 490,000 members at its peak in 1890. With one single exception, the GAR was a male body. That exception was Sarah Emma Edmonds, who was admitted to the GAR in 1897. Sarah had fought in the 2nd Michigan Infantry disguised as a man named "Franklin Thompson," from 1861 to 1863. She died in 1898.

For the South, the United Confederate Veterans (UCV) was inaugurated in 1889. Local Confederate veteran associations proliferated after the war. At the movement's peak, more than 1,500 such groups were listed in the UCV. The UCV's stated purpose was to promote "social, literary, historical and benevolent" aims. During the 1890s, around 30,000 veterans and 50,000 further guests were present at the annual UCV reunion. But in 1950, at the final reunion, a lone UCV member was present: 98-year-old James Moore of Alabama.

Estimates range up to 700,000 deaths in the Civil War including those who died in battle, deaths due to sickness and disease and civilian losses. The number is approximately two percent of the total US population at the time. If two percent of the current US population were to die in a war, the number would be 6.5 million. (Civil War deaths far, far exceeded all the deaths in previous wars. The number of deaths from the Revolutionary War, War of 1812, early Indian wars, and the Mexican War was less than 10,000.)

Modern Day Veterans

As of 2017 there were 18.2 million veterans.

Cape Fear CWRT friend and guest speaker, Andrew Duppstadt, writes in the Fall, 2019 (Vol 7, No. 2) issue of Civil War Navy, about the officers who took part in successful Confederate action against the USS Underwriter (early 1864, before New Bern on the lower Neuse River) becoming the nucleus of the crew of the ill fated CSS Neuse. Specifically, Duppstadt writes of the heroic Lieutenant Francis Lyell Hoge in an article derived in a large part from the papers and memorabilia of Hoge, who had previously served, with distinction, aboard the CSS Patrick Henry.

Bentonville Battlefield State Historic Site is the largest state historic site in North Carolina, and they host the largest reenactment event in the state every five years. Visitors will learn that the Battle of Bentonville of March 19-21, 1865 was the last major Confederate offensive of the war as General Joseph Johnston fought the advancing troops of General Sherman's march across the south.

This Day in Civil War History - November 15, 1864

One hundred and fifty-five years ago, Major General William T. Sherman begins marching his 60,000-man army eastward towards the Atlantic coast. He instructed his soldiers to “forage liberally” on the country and to inflict maximum damage to all those resources that helped to sustain the Confederate war effort. His strategic goal was summed up to Lt. General U.S. Grant: “If we can march a well-appointed army right through his [the enemy’s] territory, it is a demonstration to the world, foreign and domestic, that we have a power which Davis can not resist...there are thousands of people abroad and in the South who will reason thus: If the North can march an army right through the South, it is proof positive that the North can prevail.”

QUOTE:

NAH, WITH ONE HUN-

-GENERAL “

Sherman believed that the Confederacy derived its strength not from its fighting forces but from the material and moral support of sympathetic Southern whites. Factories, farms and railroads provided Confederate troops with the things they needed, he reasoned; and if he could destroy those things, the Confederate war effort would collapse. Meanwhile, his troops could undermine Southern morale by making life so unpleasant for Georgia’s civilians that they would demand an end to the war.

To that end, Sherman’s troops marched south toward Savannah in two wings, about 30 miles apart. On November 22, 3,500 Confederate cavalry started a skirmish with the Union soldiers at Griswoldville, but that ended so badly—650 Confederate soldiers were killed or wounded, compared to 62 Yankee casualties—that Southern troops initiated no more battles. Instead, they fled South ahead of Sherman’s troops, wreaking their own havoc as they went: They wrecked bridges, chopped down trees and burned barns filled with provisions before the Union army could reach them.

The Union soldiers were just as unsparing. They raided farms and plantations, stealing and slaughtering cows, chickens, turkeys, sheep and hogs and taking as much other food—especially bread and potatoes—as they could carry. (These groups of foraging soldiers were nicknamed “bummers,” and they burned whatever they could not carry.)

About three weeks after they left Atlanta Sherman’s troops arrived in Savannah on December 21, 1864. The city was undefended when they got there. (The 10,000 Confederates who were supposed to be guarding it had already fled.) Sherman presented the city of Savannah and its 25,000 bales of cotton to President Lincoln as a Christmas gift. Early in February 1865, Sherman and his men left Savannah and repeated their march through Georgia as they built bridges, forded streams swollen with winter rains, “foraged liberally” and destroyed resources as they converged on Columbia. Retreating Confederates set fire to bales of cotton and Union troops destroyed military supplies but failed to control the fires, leaving South Carolina’s capital in ruins.

Note: Sherman and his army only feigned toward Charleston, they bypassed the city, continuing north toward NC.

1st Louisiana Special Battalion - Wheat's Tigers

Screaming at the tops of their lungs as they charged the hapless Yankees, they were a vision straight out of hell. Some of them wore outlandish Turkish-style Zouave uniforms which made them easy targets, but they seemed to care not at all. They descended in a fury, killing without qualm. Above them flew their battalion flag, itself a deliberate mockery of the solemnity of war. On it were embroidered the words "Gentle as a ..." and the image of a lamb. They had been largely recruited from the wharves, gutters and dives of the New Orleans waterfront, and though their official designation was the 1st Louisiana Battalion, they were known and feared by Federals and Rebels alike as the Louisiana Tigers and were as tough and resolute as their combative commander, Major Roberdeau Wheat.

Chatham Roberdeau Wheat, born on April 9, 1826, in Alexandria, Va., studied law at the University of Nashville and then served in the 1st Tennessee Cavalry as a lieutenant during the Mexican War. After the war, he moved to New Orleans, where he began his career as a filibuster—or mercenary—participating in several expeditions to Cuba, Mexico, Nicaragua and Italy, and rising to the rank of general in both the Mexican and Italian armies.

At least some of the men, especially those in Harris' Walker Guards, were also former filibusters who had served with Wheat in Nicaragua back in 1857. They mustered into service in their old filibuster uniforms—off-white cotton drill trousers, white canvas leggings, red flannel battle shirts and broad-brimmed, low-crowned straw hats. Once enlisted, the men also wrote provocative slogans—such as 'Lincoln's Life or a Tiger's Death,' 'Tiger by Nature' or 'Tiger in Search of Abe'—on their hat bands."

By the time Wheat died, his Tigers had been drastically reduced in number, from an initial enrollment of 500 to fewer than 100 men. On Aug. 9, 1862, the battalion was disbanded by special order and its remaining troops reassigned to other Louisiana regiments. They had always fought with distinction and often just for the love of fighting. Perhaps the most accurate memorial to the Louisiana Tigers, and to Wheat himself, was written by Confederate Maj. David Boyd: "Wheat's Battalion was a unique body, representing every grade of society and every kind of man, from the princely gentleman who commanded them down to the thief and cut-throat released from parish prison. ... Such a motley herd of humanity was probably never got together before, and may never be again."

Cape Fear Revolutionary War Round Table Annual Dinner

Dear Members and Guests:

Our annual dinner meeting event on Wednesday, December 4th at 6:30PM will be held at Pine Valley Country Club, 500 Pine Valley Dr. We will host keynote speaker Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. giving a PowerPoint presentation (see below). A buffet dinner will be featured, prepared by the excellent on-site chef. Menu follows at the end of this post. Please read complete post as payment and driving instructions are at the end.

“With Such Great Alacrity”: The Destruction of Fort Johnston and the Coming of the American Revolution in North Carolina

Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., professor emeritus in the Department of History at UNC Wilmington and vice president of the Cape Fear Revolutionary War Round Table, will discuss the brazen firebombing raid by Patriot forces on British Fort Johnston near the mouth of the Cape Fear River on July 19, 1775. Most historians of the American Revolution in the South recognize the Battle of Moore’s Creek Bridge in late February 1776 as the beginning of the war in North Carolina, but Dr. Fonvielle claims it started at Fort Johnston more than seven months earlier. Led by John Ashe, Cornelius Harnett, and Robert Howe, hundreds of armed Patriot militia burned the only serviceable British fort in North Carolina in an effort to deny Royal Governor Josiah Martin a base of operations from where he planned to launch a military campaign in the southern colonies in 1776. In doing so, however, they destroyed property owned by King George III. What, in the minds of the Patriots, gave them just cause to resort to such a blatant and bellicose course of action? Did they mean to burn Fort Johnston at all, or did they intend for their destructive attack to incite war in North Carolina in a powerful and public display of solidarity with other colonies already in rebellion? What kind of response did the people of the Lower Cape Fear anticipate from the British Government? How did their actions affect the coming of the American Revolution in North Carolina? “A splendid time is guaranteed for all!”

Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr.
Professor Emeritus, Department of History
University of North Carolina Wilmington

Chris E. Fonvielle Jr. is a native Wilmingtonian with a lifelong interest in American Civil War, North Carolina, and Cape Fear history. He attended public schools, including New Hanover High School, class of 1971, where he was the first soccer-style placekicker in North Carolina football history. After receiving his B.A. in anthropology at the University of North Carolina Wilmington, Chris served as the last curator of the Blockade Runners of the Confederacy Museum. He subsequently received his M.A. in American history at East Carolina University, and his Ph.D. from the University of South Carolina. That makes Chris a Wildcat, a Seahawk, a Pirate, and a Gamecock.

After a brief teaching stint at East Carolina University, Dr. Fonvielle returned to his undergraduate alma mater at UNCW in 1996, where he taught courses on the Civil War, Wilmington and the Lower Cape Fear, and Antebellum America. His in-depth research focuses on coastal operations and defenses, and blockade running in southeastern North Carolina during the Civil War. He has published books and articles including The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of

William Murdoch Parsley (F-3)

Born in Wilmington in 1840, he enlisted in April 1861 in the 3rd NC and was elected Captain of Co. F. His company was outfitted by his father, Oscar, and William, not yet 21, couldn't sign the contract for the company's equipment. Serving in Jackson's Corps, he fought in the Seven Days Battles in June of 1862 and was wounded at Malvern Hill on July 1, 1862 as Lee sought to prevent the escape of McClellan's Union army. A Minié ball entered just below Parsley's left ear and exited at the center of the back of his neck.

Sent home to recover, he married Eliza Nutt and returned to the regiment in September 1862. Upon his return he was promoted to Major, then to Lt. Colonel just before the battle of Chancellorsville. He then fought through the battles of Winchester and at Jordan Springs, was slightly wounded two times, once when a ball hit his coat button and glanced off.

Once again on furlough, he brought home the regimental flag which had been shot to pieces. Unable to repair it, a new one was made and the old one was passed down and wound up in the collections of the Cape Fear Museum!

When the 3rd's commander, Col. Thurston was wounded, Parsley assumed command until captured at Spotsylvania's "Bloody Angle". Placed in the Confederate line of fire at Hilton Head, he remained a POW until exchanged in August. Returning to his regiment, the unit remained in the trenches at Petersburg until April 1865. Colonel Parsley was killed on the retreat to Appomattox 3 days before the surrender of Lee's army.

His comrades in arms, Captain John Cowan and Captain James I. Metts, both of the Third North Carolina, would write of him:

"Who ever knew Willie Parsley, that did not love him? We write not the empty words of the mere panegyrist; we speak the words of candid soberness and truth. He so impressed all with whom he came in contact that no one who ever met him ever forgot him. He was the soul of honor. Without fear, he was without reproach."

Escape from Libby Prison: The Largest Successful Prison Break in the Civil War

On February 9, 1864, more than 100 Union prisoners tunneled their way to freedom in an audacious escape from Libby Prison in the Confederate capital of Richmond, Virginia. More than half of the prisoners made their way to Union lines while others were recaptured and returned to the confines of Libby.

Libby Prison started as an old food warehouse on Tobacco Row along the James River. Captain Luther Libby, along with his son George W. Libby, leased the three-story brick building where they operated a ship chandlery and grocery business. In 1862, the Confederacy took over the building and turned it into a prison for Union officers. Colonel Thomas E. Rose, a Union officer from the 77th Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, was captured during the Battle of Chickamauga and taken to Libby Prison. He found conditions appalling and immediately started plotting his escape. He devised an ambitious plan to dig a tunnel from the cellar of the prison to a tobacco shed that stood just outside the prison walls.

LIBBY PRISON

Rose revealed his plan to a few trusted accomplices and planning got underway. Life inside Libby Prison was miserable. Prisoners were held on the second and third floors of the building. Windows were barred but open, leaving inmates freezing in the winter and insufferably hot in summer. Overcrowding created constant stress and resulted in food shortages. The lack of sanitation led to disease and death. One father whose son was held at Libby prison desperately sought to have supplies delivered to the prison. He wrote, "He has been confined during the whole summer without a change of clothing...and is in a very destitute condition." Desperate for relief, it was not difficult for Rose to find prisoners willing to help with his plot.

Outside of Libby was a canal, and during wet weather, the prison's cellar flooded bringing hundreds of rats scurrying into the building. The putrid air in the cellar kept everyone away and helped it earn the nickname, Rat's Hell. The area was largely avoided by Confederate guards and provided Rose and his associates the perfect place to dig undetected.

Rose accessed Rat's Hell by removing bricks behind an old kitchen stove. He then shimmied down a chimney to the cellar. From there, Rose and his team scraped away at the hard dirt using crude makeshift tools. Much of the digging took place at night in the dark when the exterior was heavily guarded, but conditions inside the prison were somewhat relaxed.

Loads of earth were removed one bucket at a time, by packing an old spittoon with excavated dirt. The vermin-infested cellar, the rats, and the lack of oxygen made the work excruciating.

At one point, after digging a tunnel nearly 60 feet long, the prisoners broke through the surface to find they were off by several feet. Hearing the voices of Confederate guards, the prisoners quickly hid the tunnel and readjusted the approach to the shed.

After weeks of digging, the prisoners managed to clear a tunnel that surfaced in the tobacco shed. One prisoner described the escape, “Everyone wanted to be first. In order to get down the chimney as well as long the tunnel, it was necessary to strip naked – wrap the clothes in a bundle, and push this on before them. As soon as it was seen that only a few could possibly get out before daylight, all rushed for the mouth of the tunnel who could – each man being determined to get out first. The room was now crowded to suffocation all struggling to get in the hole. The strongest men forced their way to the front while the weak ones were more roughly brushed aside and jammed up against the walls.”

The next morning at roll call, Confederate guards were shocked to find 109 prisoners missing, their escape route concealed by the remaining inmates. Of those 109 prisoners that escaped, 59 eventually reached Union lines, 48 were recaptured and two drowned in a river crossing.

This Day in Civil War History - October 13, 1864

Following the fall of Atlanta, Hood moved the Confederate army north toward Chattanooga, threatening Sherman's supply line. On October 13, Hood seized Tunnel Hill including Dalton and Tilton, Ga. There was considerable skirmishing but Sherman's main force stayed in Atlanta preparing to abandon his supply line and move cross country to Savannah. In Virginia Early's Confederates were back on their old line at Fisher's Hill while Sheridan was at nearby Cedar Creek. A skirmish along Cedar Creek resulted from Confederate probing. In the West action near Mullahla's Stations, NE; on Elm Creek, TX; and a week of scouting in the Sacramento Mountains, NM Territory, pitted Federals against Indians. Federal troops operated until the 18th from Pine Bluff to Arkansas Post, AR.

Ranger Mosby and his men took up a section of the B & O rail tracks near Kearneysville, west of Harper's Ferry. They wrecked a passenger train, seized $173,000 - largely from two army paymasters, and then burned the train.

President Lincoln, still worried about the election despite the recent victories, made an estimate of the electoral vote, giving the "Supposed Copperhead Vote" 114 electoral votes, the "Union Vote" 120. He also was trying to see that as many soldiers as possible got home to vote, figuring he had strong support in the Army.

Civil War Reenactments Were a Thing Even During the Civil War

Thousands of people participate in Civil War reenactments each year in the United States. They're sharing a tradition of reenactment that stretches back to the years of the war itself.

To herald Christmas 1861, a year when more than 4,000 fighting men had been killed in Civil War battles and the Union was in disarray, groups of citizens got together to fight mock battles simulating the conflicts raging on battlefields elsewhere. Writes Sue Eisenfeld for The New York Times, "We tend to think of Civil War reenactment as a modern phenomenon, a way for people in the 20th and 21st centuries to experience a taste of what the conflict was like. But in fact, staged battles began while the war was still underway. Known as 'sham battles,' 'mock battles' or 'mimic battles,' these battles were enacted for a variety of reasons: entertainment, practice, and to demonstrate to civilians back home what happened during the war."

Shams were especially popular during the holidays for entertainment, and they were mostly confined to the North. On December 5, 1861, the Daily Nashville Patriot published an article noting "the Yankees are great on shams," she writes. But they were also intended to accustom new soldiers to the pace of the battlefield and help them imagine themselves as fighters, rather than farmers, she writes: "Some places, like Fort Monroe, a Union outpost in Virginia, conducted sham battles daily."

As the New Georgia Encyclopedia records, Civil War reenacting was part of a longer tradition of shams fought with blank ammunition by American militias. Before the Civil War, town festivals often featured a pageant with costumed citizens dressing as Revolutionary War figures.

Directly after the war ended, Eisenfeld writes, veterans were commissioned to serve as reenactors of a conflict they themselves had fought in. "On April 21, 1865, the town of Massillon, Ohio, was right back into the business of luring crowds with sham battles as part of a day-long 'jubilation over the recent victory of the Federal armies and the surrender of Lee.'" The pageantry and drama of mock warfare offered great entertainment, even when the consequences of the real thing were so bloody.

Later, when public interest in the war revived in the 1880s, the tradition of the sham battle was revived, and many sham battles were conducted purely as entertainment, the Encyclopedia writes. "Although these sham battles were usually not attempts to re-create specific Civil War battles, they were conducted with strong undertones of both sectional pride and national unity."

The idea of reenacting stuck around, but modern Civil War reenactment was truly born in the early 1960s around the time of the war's centennial. The first big reenactment, of the First Battle of Bull Run, also known as First Manassas, took place on July 21-22, 1961.

New York 115th Infantry Regiment - The Iron Hearted Regiment

Under the command of Colonel Simeon Sammons, and composed of tough upstaters from the Mohawk Valley and its environs, the regiment was mustered into the service of the United States for three years on August 26, 1862. However, the regiment suffered an ignominious initiation into military service. During the Antietam campaign, and barely two weeks after its August 30, 1862 departure from New York, the regiment was stationed at Harpers Ferry, Virginia. When the town was surrounded by the Confederate Army, it surrendered, along with the remainder of the 12,000 Union garrison.

In December 1863, the regiment was transferred to Barton's Brigade for General Seymour's Florida Expedition. The regiment was anxious to prove itself in battle, and erase the blemish of the Harpers Ferry debacle. The 115th performed well at Olustee, but 296 New Yorkers were killed and wounded during the battle with nearly all the color-guard being shot down.

Private Benjamin Thackrah

During the Florida campaign, Pvt. Benjamin Thackrah of Company H, originally born in Scotland, received the Medal of Honor for actions in April 1864, near Fort Gates, Florida. His citation reads:

"On the morning of April 1, 1864, Private Benjamin Thackrah volunteered to join a party of twenty-five soldiers for an expedition up the river at Fort Gates, Florida, in search of a small enemy picket guard. On reaching the shore in a boat, the party proceeded through the swamps to locate and surround a small house believed to hold the picket guard. The twenty-five volunteers entered the house, surprising the enemy and quickly capturing the entire picket with its arms, horses, and supplies, and then returned through the swamps with their prisoners and placed them on a Union tug boat. For his heroism in this dangerous expedition, Private Thackrah was awarded the Medal of Honor."

The 115th was transferred to the newly formed 24th corps, in Ames' (2nd) division, with which it was ordered to North Carolina. It participated in the capture of Fort Fisher, fighting with Bell's (3rd) brigade, and sustaining a considerable part of its loss there by the explosion of the magazine the day after the fort was taken. Ten men lost their lives in that explosion. Subsequently it was present at Cape Fear, Fort Anderson, and Wilmington, and closed its active service in the campaign of the Carolinas. It was mustered out at Raleigh, NC, under Col. Johnson, June 17, 1865. Out of a total enrollment of 1,196, it lost 7 officers and 132 men; 191 men died of disease and other causes—total deaths, 330. The gallant 115th deserves its place among the three hundred fighting regiments of the war, accorded it by Col. Fox.

John R. Scales - General Nathan Bedford Forrest

Nathan Bedford Forrest

The Tennessean was one of the most intriguing and controversial characters to emerge during the Civil War. Books and articles on the man span the gamut from hero worship to condemnation for his involvement with the slaughter at Fort Pillow and later, his association with the Ku Klux Klan. Retired Special Forces Brigadier General John R. Scales plows entirely new ground with The Battles and Campaigns of General Nathan Bedford Forrest, 1861-1865, a careful and unique examination of Forrest's wartime activities and how his actions affected the war in the Western Theater..

Scales' study is a meticulous guide to Forrest's campaigns. For example, each action is augmented with detailed driving directions to allow readers to examine his battlefields and the routes his cavalry took during its famous raids. For the first time, students of Forrest's campaigns can follow in his footsteps, experiencing the terrain much the same way he did. Each chapter concludes with a detailed review and assessment of each raid or campaign. Throughout, General Scales relies on his own extensive military background to help evaluate and explain how and why Forrest grew in command ability and potential as a result of his experiences - or didn't.

The late award-winning author Albert Castel asked two major questions about Nathan Bedford Forrest: "Exactly what impact did Forrest's dazzling raids and victories have upon the overall course of the war?" and "Had Forrest been given a higher command and/or greater opportunities, what would have been the potential outcome as regards the fate of the Confederacy?" The Battles and Campaigns of General Nathan Bedford Forrest makes it much easier to answer both.

John R. Scales is a retired Special Forces brigadier general with more than three decades of service, including combat tours in Vietnam and Afghanistan. He also has a Ph.D. in engineering and worked in that field after retiring from the military. In addition to receiving five patents for inventions, General Scales had written two previous books: Sherman Invades Georgia (Naval Institute Press, 2006) and A Reluctant Hero's Footsteps (Westbow Press, 2012). A past president of the Tennessee Valley Civil War Roundtable, he leads Civil War campaign tours in Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia.

Trivia Questions

1. Brigadier General Thomas Francis Meagher led the famed Irish Brigade in the Army of the Potomac. He died in 1867 at the age of 43 and spent most of his adult life outside his birthplace of Ireland. Nonetheless, a grand equestrian statue of him dominates a street in Waterford, Ireland. Why is he commemorated in Ireland?
2. Was the steamship Granite City a Union or a Confederate ship?
3. What was the name of Daniel Underhill's horse?

Cape Fear Civil War Roundtable Fundraiser

We're announcing a new fundraiser to help Cape Fear Civil War Round Table continue to deliver world-class speakers for our monthly meetings. Our dues remain low ($30 per year) and we offer a year-round program featuring interesting and well-received events through the summer months.

Our summer programs are "locally" produced and cost nothing but we do pay travel expenses for out-of-town speakers during our regular program year from September through May.

To continue our program at a high level, we will use the silent auction technique to generate bids for special items such as books, art work and memorabilia. Last season, the Round Table benefitted greatly from the generosity of a member who donated a Civil War chess set and another member who submitted a very generous bid for the item. This new fundraising mechanism is in addition to our monthly book raffle.

Many of you will remember that we always auctioned off items at our February dinner meeting as well. We'd like to institute an ongoing effort of this type dedicated solely and entirely to helping to fund our speaker program. Cash contributions are also welcome!

First of all, we ask you—our members—to donate such items to offer as silent auction items. Book series such as The Civil War: A Narrative by Shelby Foote, first editions, etc., are most welcome. Limited edition prints are also perfect items for the silent auction.

Currently, we have hardcover, first editions of current biographies of Grant, by Ron Chernow, and Sherman by James L. McDonough. We also have a beautiful lithograph of Confederate reenactors galloping a Napoleon into firing position from the Petersburg National Battlefield group. A nicely framed photograph of the famous North Carolina Gettysburg monument by Gutzon Borglum rounds out our list of items available for bids.

They will be on display at our September 12 meeting. Put in your bid! We will collect bids through the December meeting and announce the winners at the end of the meeting so the timing will be perfect for holiday gifts.

Summer Discussion Series: Members Forum

The Members Forum, led by Jim Gannon, was a foray into Civil War topics that CFCWRT members John Bolger, Bob Cooke, Mark Swanstrom, and John Winecoff are not only passionate about but also very knowledgeable.

John Bolger led off the round of discussions with a well received talk about General Thomas Francis Meagher, Commander of the famed Irish Brigade. John explained Meagher's background as a fighter for Irish independence, subsequent capture and escape from a penal colony, and his migration to America. As a Union officer he recruited Irish immigrants into the New York militia and rose to the rank of general in command of the Irish Brigade of the Army of the Potomac. His hometown of Waterford erected a statue in his honor.

HARRIS LIGHT CAVALRY FLAG

Bob Cooke provided a glimpse into the life of Private Daniel Underhill as he served in the 2nd NY Cavalry, known as the Harris Light Cavalry. Union Army through original letters from Daniel to his family during the Civil War. Copies of these letters were passed through the audience to provide a first hand glimpse into the life of this serving Civil War soldier.

John Winecoff took us to a very seldom discussed Battle of Sabine Pass and the part the Irish Davis Guard played in that battle. He shared the story of the incredible ability of the Guard to fire 107 shots in 35 minutes, a rate unheard of at that time with heavy artillery. Even though they were greatly outnumbered, they outfought their enemy and drove them back. He told of the valor and courage the Davis Guard displayed that led the grateful citizens of Houston to strike a medal which was presented to the Davis Guard upon their arrival in the city.

JOHN WINECOFF
DAVIS CO. & THE SABINE PASS BATTLE

Mark Swanstrom's discussion of the Battle of Chickamauga from the standpoint of Civil War battlefield command and the control difficulties. He clearly illustrated the problems with communication orders and rapidly changing situations on the battle field. He brought forth and perfectly illustrated the dilemma faced by the ground commanders even today.

Fort Fisher - American Battlefield Trust Park Day 2019

Calling all volunteers! On Saturday, October 5, 2019 (8:30am to noon), Fort Fisher State Historic Site will host Park Day, an annual hands-on event sponsored by the American Battlefield Trust, which brings history enthusiasts together with staff members to help preserve our nation's heritage sites. Fort Fisher welcomes volunteers of all ages and skill levels. This year's activities will include painting the numerous artillery guns and carriages around the site. Groups will also be needed to assist in painting and cleaning up brush, leaves, and debris from around the site. Volunteers are asked to register in advance by calling 910-251-7340 and are asked to assemble in the parking lot by 8:30 am. Tools and gloves will be provided. Volunteers will receive a free Park Day t shirt and lunch provided by the Friends of Fort Fisher, the support group that supports the site and all its programming, and Michelangelo's Pizza and Subs of Carolina Beach, NC.

This day in Civil War History - September 16, 1864

With about 4500 men, Forrest, so greatly feared by the North, began operating against Sherman's communications in northern Alabama and middle Tennessee. His expedition left from Verona, MS, and would continue until mid-October.

Grant and Sheridan conferred at Charles Town, WV. Sheridan had learned that Kershaw's division and other units of Anderson's corps had been sent to Petersburg, thus weakening Early's force. Grant approved Sheridan's proposal to cut Early's supply and retreat lines south of Winchester. Meanwhile, there was a skirmish at Snicker's Gap, Virginia, and about ten days of Union operations near Morgantown, LA.

South of the James River Hampton's Confederate cavalry and Federal soldier-herders skirmished at little-known Coggins Point, VA, and around Sycamore Church. Hampton (who started his raid on September 11th) succeeded in bagging some 2,400 cattle, plus 300 prisoners, at the cost of 61 casualties to the Confederates. More fighting ensued on the 17th, but Hampton and his "cowboys" brought the desperately needed animals back to Petersburg.

*Regimental and Other Group NicknamesThe Orphan Brigade

At the outbreak of Civil War, Kentucky declared its neutrality. Thus, Confederates couldn't enlist units within its borders. Thousands of Kentuckians went to Tennessee to enlist at Camp Boone and Camp Burnett near Clarksville. These regiments and others raised at Bowling Green, Ky. were organized into the First Kentucky Brigade. The brigade fought at many battles, including Shiloh, Stones River, and the Atlanta and Carolinas campaigns. In September 1864 the regiment of foot soldiers were organized as mounted infantry and continued as such till end of the war. The brigade surrendered at Washington, Georgia on May 6, 1865. They did receive generous parole terms. The mounted units were allowed to keep their horses or mules. Every seventh man was allowed to keep his musket.

After the war, Unit histories and other documents began referring to the unit as the "Orphan Brigade". The origin of name is uncertain but there are several theories.

One theory is the name stems from Kentucky's tenuous political situation. Men had to leave the state to enlist in the Confederacy and, also, it was very hard for soldiers to return home for visits. Being Confederate soldiers they would have been indicted by the Union for treason.

Another theory is that because the unit kept losing commanders, it was an orphan unit. The Unit was originally under Maj. Gen. John C. Breckenridge who was replaced by Brig. Gen. Roger Hanson, who was mortally wounded at the Battle of Stones River. Hanson's replacement was Brig. Gen. Benjamin Hardin Helm who was mortally wounded at the Battle of Chickamauga.

Trivia Answers

Flag of Ireland

1. Meagher was the son of wealthy, Catholic merchants in Ireland and well educated. Even so, at the height of the Potato Famine and the flight of Irish immigrants to America in the late 1840s, he joined a revolutionary movement in Ireland that advocated violent revolt against their British rulers. Sent as an envoy to France, he was unable to bring back any troops or arms but he brought back the idea for an Irish flag based on the model of the French tricolor. The flag had three vertical bands with the green symbolizing the south of Ireland, orange the north, and the white in between for peace. The rebellion was quickly and violently quashed by the British and Meagher was exiled to Van Diemen's Land, or Tasmania. He escaped and made his way to New York in time to play a prominent role in the Civil War. In 1867, he died in mysterious circumstances on the Missouri River while serving as territorial governor of Montana. Ultimately, however, his idea of a flag became the flag of the Republic of Ireland and that's why he's honored by a statue in his native city of Waterford.

The attack on Sabine Pass,
September 8, 1863

2. The USS Granite City was a Union gunboat that escaped the destruction of the small fleet at the Battle of Sabine Pass (border of Texas and Louisiana) on September 8, 1863. Although damaged, the Granite City was able to escape the battle that saw Confederate shore batteries destroy the US Ships Sachem, Clifton and Arizona. But, wait! There's more. The sidewheel steamer was built in 1862 by the Archibald Benny company of Dumbarton, Scotland, for use as a blockade runner. Originally named the City of Dundee, the sleek steamer was chased as she cleared Wilmington and captured by the US Navy in the Bahamas in March of 1863. So, the privately owned blockade runner was sold as a prize of war to the US Navy and named the Granite City after a town in southern Illinois. She was assigned to the Gulf Blockading Squadron. Avoiding disaster at Sabine Pass, she continued to work the blockade in the western Gulf of Mexico until she was captured by Confederates at Calcasieu Pass, Louisiana, a little east of Sabine Pass, in April 1864. Once again a blockade runner, she attempted to run out of Galveston and other Texas ports but was run aground and destroyed on the beach on January 20, 1865, near Calcasieu Pass. So, between 1862-65, Granite City was British, Confederate, Union and Confederate again.

Civil War Cavalry Horse Sculpture, National Sporting Library & Museum, Middleburg, VA.

3. Sergeant Daniel Isaac Underhill was a stalwart trooper of the 2nd New York Cavalry who saw much active service with the Army of the Potomac from 1862-65. His letters, owned and discussed by past president Bob Cooke, speak very intelligently of the evolution of the Union cavalry and shed interesting light on many notable events in the life of the Army. Following the "Mud March" in early 1863 (in which he sympathizes with the horses and mules but not the infantry), he tells of being on picket duty close to southern lines and how a Confederate officer admired Sgt. Underhill's horse, "Whisky." Underhill thanked him for the compliment but wryly observed that "Whisky was best admired from a distance."

The most popular theory is that John C. Breckenridge gave the unit its name. Riding with the brigade's survivors at Stone's River, Breckenridge now the division commander, lamented the bloody results of a charge he had opposed. According to legend, he said upon seeing his former troops and learning of the loss of Hanson, "My poor orphans".

However, they came by their nickname they were a very brave and proud unit of the CSA.

Do you have a favorite regimental nickname? Conversely, what was the nickname of your favorite regiment? Submit your nominations to the Runner Editor.

Civil War Battle Flags

The stories involving Civil War battle flags is what makes them so interesting. Here is a story of the brave men who carried one Union battle flag during the Battle of Gettysburg:

"...carried by Color-Bearer Abel G. Peck, a tall, straight, handsome man, and as brave a soldier as ever gave up his life for his country.

He was instantly killed almost at the beginning of the famous charge of the Iron Brigade. The flag was then seized by Private Thomas B. Ballou, who was desperately wounded immediately after, and died a few weeks later. The flag was then carried by Private August Ernst, who was instantly killed. Corporal Andrew Wagner then took the colors and carried them until shot through the breast, from the effects of which he died about a year after the close of the war.

When Corporal Wagner fell, Colonel Henry A. Morrill took the flag, and gallantly attempted to rally the few survivors of the regiment. But Private William Kelly insisted on carrying it, saying to Colonel Morrill, "You shall not carry the flag while I am alive." The gallant fellow held it aloft and almost instantly fell, shot through the heart. Private L. Spaulding then took the flag from the hands of Kelly, and carried it until he was himself badly wounded. Colonel Morrill again seized the flag, and was soon after shot in the head and carried from the field.

After the fall of Colonel Morrill, the flag was carried by a soldier whose name has never been ascertained. He was seen by Captain Edwards — who was now in command of the regiment — lying upon the ground badly wounded, grasping the flag in his hands. Captain Edwards took the flag from him and carried it himself until the few men left of the regiment fell back and reached Culp's Hill. Captain Edwards is the only man who is known to have carried the flag that day, who was not killed or wounded."

The dedication of the southern soldiers to their Confederate battle flags was no less impressive. At the Battle of Antietam, the 1st Texas Infantry followed their flag into the carnage of the Cornfield. Leading their advance was, of course, their regimental battle flag. Color-bearers fell one after the other, and by the end of the day, the 1st Texas had lost nine color-bears. Worse still, the flag was left behind in the Cornfield, but the loss of the flag was minimal compared to the fact that the regiment left more than eighty percent of the 227 men who went into the battle in the Cornfield with their flag. After the battle, a Union soldier found the lost

As of now the sandbags in place are made of nylon, which we plan to replace with proper burlap, and the forward firing trench is in great need of repair due to erosion and neglect.

We see this as a great opportunity to not only camp on the original battle ground, but to also assist the NPS, specifically one battlefield in need of volunteer assistance.

Accurate late war Federal impressions, period rations and period tools; shovels, picks, axes, mattocks and saws are a must. We want to be correct in every aspect.

We have permission to camp in the main redoubt, the forward trench, in the woods or in the structures on site.

Summer Discussion Series: Members Forum

Jim Gannon will lead a "Members Forum" presentation in August as part of our summer discussion series. This innovative program will feature short presentations by chapter members discussing topics of particular interest to them. It will take place Thursday, August 8, at 6:30 p.m. in Room 226 of Harbor Church. Enter at the door marked Lighthouse East near the rear of the building. This is the classroom where we met in June. Presenters and topics are:

Bob Cooke - A Soldier of the Harris Light Calvary

The unpublished letters of Daniel Underhill

John Bolger - Fighting for the Union and Fighting for Ireland

General Thomas Francis Meagher

John Winecoff - The Davis Company and the Battle of Sabine Pass

How a few men drove off an army

Mark Swanstrom - Chickamauga Mix-ups

What happens when a commander doesn't use his own chain of command?

John R. Scales - General Nathan Bedford Forrest

On September 12th, we will welcome John Scales, author of The Battles and Campaigns of Confederate General Nathan Bedford Forrest 1861-1865. John Scales is a retired US Army Special Forces brigadier general with more than 3 decades of service, including combat tours in Vietnam and Afghanistan. He also has a Ph.D. in engineering and worked in that field after retiring from the military.

Recently published by Savas-Beatie, the book focuses on the question, "How did Forrest the civilian come to be Forrest, one of the more feared cavalry commanders in the Confederate Army," in the words of Kevin Pawlak in his review of the book for Emerging Civil War.

Lieutenant General Nathan Bedford Forrest was born in 1821 in rural western Tennessee and ultimately became a wealthy planter and businessman in northern Mississippi. He had no formal education but learned to read and write. There have been numerous books and articles concerning General Forrest but rather than attempting to add to the list of biographies of this most intriguing character, John Scales presents a narrative of his campaigns and battles. The presentation, then, becomes a military history and critique of Forrest's leadership style and tactical expertise. Anyone interested in the history of Forrest's military career and seeking to understand how he was able to be so successful, will appreciate this presentation.

The presentation will take place in the sanctuary of Harbor Church. Enter the front building through the doors marked "Worship Center."

Tour of Oakdale Cemetery by Bob Cooke & Ed Gibson

Thanks to members Bob Cooke and Ed Gibson who once again led an interesting tour of Oakdale Cemetery with particular focus on Confederate figures buried at the historic cemetery.

Secrets of Oakdale Cemetery by Bob Cooke

Dr. Solomon Sampson Satchwell (O-41)

Solomon Sampson Satchwell, 26 October 1821 to 9 November, 1892, was born in little Washington (Beaufort County), N.C., attended Wake Forest (1839-1841) and then studied at New York University where he received his MD in 1850. He continued studying in New York for another 18 months before returning to southeastern N.C. to begin his practice. He's buried in Section O, plot 41, in Oakdale Cemetery in Wilmington, N.C.

Follow this link for a detailed map of historic Oakdale Cemetery <http://www.oakdalecemetery.org/historic-section/>

Early in his career, Dr. Satchwell investigated the diseases prevalent in SENC and pinpointed malaria as the leading cause of death. Dr. Satchwell was a strong believer in the hygienic theory- fresh air, sunshine, proper sanitation, good food and "a minimum of drugs." He also believed in the miasma theory as did most practitioners of that era, as the cause of malaria. In error, in 1852 he delivered a rebuttal against a doctor who did not think that "rotting vegetation, heat and moisture" were the causes of malaria. Of course, there was a connection because mosquitoes bred in the swampy "miasma" environment but almost no medical practitioners or scientists connected the disease to the insect.

DR. SOLOMON SAMPSON SATCHWELL

A well known and respected doctor, he was involved with many medical societies and was co-editor of the N.C. Medical Journal. In 1860, he studied in France at the Sorbonne and returned in the summer of 1861 after a convoluted journey back to N.C. He later said of this trip that he had arrived in New York but found it impossible to travel south because of the outbreak of war. Traveling via Louisville, Kentucky, he finally arrived in North Carolina. He reported that "nowhere in Europe, not even in Russia, is the espionage so annoying nor the searches of persons so officious as they are now in the North".

With North Carolina's secession from the Union, he joined the Confederate cause, and served with the 25th NC with the rank of Surgeon (Major). While with the regiment, one story told of Dr. Satchwell concerns a time when his men became "infested with malaria." Satchwell recommended a draft of whiskey for the afflicted and the malady soon became chronic. He cured this by giving the men a little something extra with the whiskey. This way he said, "They had the pleasure of tasting their whiskey twice, going and coming!"

He resigned from the regiment early in 1862 and was appointed the surgeon-in-charge of General Hospital #2 in Wilson, N.C. The hospital, formerly the "female institute" was large with many outbuildings. The hospital was said to be a model of efficiency: "a place for everything and everything in its place" according to a recovered soldier, "Cleanliness and discipline are strictly observed and enforced.... The inmates are cared for with the utmost kindness, by the generous, patriotic and skillful surgeon in charge." One medical inspector rated his hospital as the best in the Confederacy.

When war ended, he located his practice in Rocky Point and Burgaw and in the 1870s, lobbied the state legislature to create a new county from the northern portion of New Hanover County. Thus, Pender County was born in 1875. Satchwell was known as an excellent orator and was often called upon to speak to various groups.

In 1872, while serving on the Board of Examiners, he presented the credentials of Dr. Susan Dimock, the first female native of the state to receive an MD. She was born in 1847 to a distinguished New England family that had migrated to North Carolina. As a youngster, she had lived across the street from Satchwell in Washington and he took an interest in her and even brought her with him as he made house calls. She had to attend medical schools in Switzerland and Paris because no medical school in the U.S. would accept her. There was still much resistance from the medical community to admit a female and the AMA warned of the dangers of “entrusting life to the weak, unstable feminine intelligence.” She was admitted as an honorary member to the NC Medical Society, but never practiced in NC, but went to Boston and practiced there for a time. Her N.C. Medical Society admission was “honorary” because she was in Europe at the time. Tragically she was lost at sea in 1875 off the coast of England. After her death, one doctor said that he had always been opposed to women doctors, until he had met Susan Dimock. The UNC School of Medicine has named one of their Advisory Colleges after Dr. Susan Dimock.

By 1892 Dr. Satchwell was appointed superintendent of public health for Pender County but died of typhoid that November. He had been treating patients with that disease and was so sick himself, he had to be lifted in and out of his carriage when he called upon them.

His tombstone was placed at Oakdale in the 1930s and was one of the first Federal grave markers placed to recognize Confederate veterans. The Confederate markers with the pointed top were first authorized in 1906 for Confederates buried in U.S. cemeteries. In 1929 the stones were also authorized for use in private cemeteries such as Oakdale. A further change in 1930 authorized the inscription of the Confederate “cross of honor” based on a commemorative medal created by the United Daughters of the Confederacy in 1898 to honor Confederate veterans. The symbol is a “cross pattée,” or “footed” cross. In Burgaw, there is a street named for him as well as a historical marker near his home.

Trivia Questions

1. Where was John Newland Maffitt born?
2. In how many wars did John Lucas Cantwell serve?
3. Did Robert G. Rankin have a “peaceful” war?

National Wreaths Across America Day is less than 150 days away!

Join more than two million of your fellow Americans on Saturday, 14 December, 2019 and help remember the fallen, honor them and their families while teaching the next generation the value of freedom.

The Round Table Campaign, coordinated with the Wilmington Chapter, NC Military Historical Society will begin on 12 September with a goal of covering Every grave in the Wilmington National Cemetery with a balsam wreath (Christmas Wreath).

Everyone plays a part. Remember, Honor, Teach. We did it last year, even with the interference of Hurricane Florence.

Trivia Answers

1. Maffitt was a consummate sailor who served aboard the USS Constitution on several cruises, commanded the Confederate raider CSS Florida and was a successful blockade runner. The son of Irish Protestant immigrants to the United States, he was born at sea in 1819 and he styled himself “a son of old Neptune.” In retirement, he lived on his farm in Wrightsville Beach and died in 1886. He’s buried in Section N, Lot 25, Oakdale Cemetery.
2. Born in Charleston, S.C., in 1828, Cantwell served in the Palmetto Rifles in the Mexican War and was wounded three times. In the Civil War he led the 30th NC Militia in its precipitate occupation of Forts Caswell and Johnston before NC seceded from the Union. Then he was elected Colonel of the 51st NC but soon resigned and enlisted in the 3rd NC. He served as a captain in the 3rd NC and was captured at Spotsylvania Court House. Some sources say that at the age of 70 he volunteered to serve in the militia in 1898 during the war with Spain but never saw service. He died in 1909. He’s buried in Section D, Lot 95, Oakdale Cemetery.
3. Prior to the outbreak of war, Robert G. Rankin, born in 1817, was a leader in military preparedness in Wilmington. When war broke out he became a quartermaster stationed in Wilmington and later commanded Company A of the 1st Battalion, NC Heavy Artillery. The unit experienced a relatively “quiet” war, serving primarily at locations along the Cape Fear but when the Union joint Army-Navy force attacked the region in 1865, Captain Rankin and his unit saw hard service in the defense of Wilmington and then retreated to Bentonville where the remnant of the 1st Battalion suffered grievous losses. James Sprunt reports that “every officer except two was killed, wounded, or captured. Captain Rankin was among the killed stricken by eight balls.” Captain Rankin was wounded on March 20, 1865. He’s buried in Section E, Lot 9, Oakdale.

Interesting Regiment Names by Bruce Patterson

During the Civil War, regiments for both the North and South usually picked up "nicknames" by which they became known.

The 46th New York Infantry Regiment for example, became known as the Continental Guard; Perry's Saints thus reflecting the origin of the regiment when the War Department authorized Colonel James H. Perry to recruit a regiment of Infantry in Brooklyn in July 1861.

My own Great Grandfather was recruited into and served with the 6th New York Heavy Artillery Regiment, known as the Anthony Wayne Guard. The regiment was raised in New York's Westchester, Putnam, and Rockland counties. Anthony Wayne, though born in Pennsylvania, became a Revolutionary War hero in that area.

Do you have a favorite regimental nickname? Conversely, what was the nickname of your favorite regiment? Submit your nominations to the Runner Editor.

Dave Mork - Civil War Relic Hunting by Bill Jayne

Dave Mork, a stalwart member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, always eager and willing to lend a hand, has moved back to Northern Virginia to be close to family but he sends his greetings to all of his fellow Civil War history pals. We'll certainly miss Dave but we wish him the best.

Dave is a very active and very expert relic hunter, using his metal detector to find pieces of history that have held their secrets underground for more than 150 years. He notes that relic hunting in Northern Virginia is much better than it is in the Lower Cape Fear.

Dave reports that Berryville, Virginia, is one of his favorite search sites. In early September 1864, Maj. Gen. Philip Sheridan's Union Army of the Shenandoah reached Berryville, about 11 miles east of Winchester, as they marched in pursuit of Lt. Gen. Jubal Early's Confederate Army of the Valley. The armies clashed when Maj. Gen. Joseph B. Kershaw's Confederate division attacked Brig. Gen. George Crook's Union corps on September 3. General Early brought up the rest of his army planning to attack in the morning, but finding the Union position too strong, he withdrew to Winchester. Losses were roughly equal and total casualties were about 600.

Dave says the southwest corner of the map on the next page is the exact area that "my friends and I have been searching for the past seven or eight years! The lower left part of the map is where we concentrated our time and Wow, what we have found is staggering to say the least! Our group of five has pulled nine US belt buckles and a US Saddle Shield out of there...We have a lot of canon shell fragments, fuse adapters, friction primers, parts of bayonets, gun tools and parts, and a boot pistol, buttons from seven or eight different states, a West Point Cadet uniform, several different military schools, and even a few from High Schools."

He explains, "In the picture you will see part of the nose of an exploded canon shell (upper Left) to the right is a iron key hole escutcheon, a fired .577 Enfield, a .31 caliber pistol bullet, second row a small piece of canon shell frag, a small piece of camp lead, new quarter, six .31 caliber round balls, the brass frame from a belt buckle, and a piece of pottery."

DAVE'S FINDS FROM ONE DAY
MAY 27, 2019

Here's a great find. It's a saddle shield with "11½ In." and "SEAT" engraved on it. Dave says that when Confederate soldiers or southern civilians acquired Union equipment such as a saddle, they would often remove anything that identified the article as Union property.

As Dave says, "You never know what you will find until you dig it out of the ground!"

Civil War Round Table Congress

The Civil War Round Table Congress was started three years ago by leaders from the Brunswick, Philadelphia, Puget Sound, Scottsdale Round Tables, and a writer for the Civil War News. Their purpose is to share ideas about how to turn around the decline in Round Table attendance. They do this by having speakers talk about proven methods for recruitment/retention, effective governance, unique ways for fundraising and social media.

The 2019 CWRT Congress is open to all CWRT members. This year's congress will be held in St. Louis on September 20-22. Previous successful events were held in Centerville, VA and Harrisburg, PA. All CWRT members are encouraged to attend!

The 2019 program consists of speakers, breakout sessions and networking.

CFCWRT July Event - Tour of Oakdale Cemetery

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) July event focuses on Oakdale Cemetery's military history.

Most Wilmingtonians know Oakdale Cemetery as a peaceful landscape of majestic trees, quiet paths rolling over gentle slopes, flowering bushes and picturesque monuments. Chartered in 1852, it is also a treasure trove of history.

Oakdale is the first "rural cemetery" in the state of North Carolina. During the 19th Century, the Rural Cemetery Movement emerged as an alternative to crowded church graveyards. Oakdale exemplifies this movement. In the spirit of the Romantic era, the rural cemetery was meant for the living as well as departed loved ones—just like Oakdale today.

The CFCWRT will present a special military history tour of Oakdale on Sunday morning, July 14th, beginning at 9:30 am. Learn about Civil War generals buried at Oakdale, the mound memorializing more than 300 unknown soldiers, the bold female spy who perished in the surf during the Civil War and many more.

The tour will focus on Civil War era figures. You will learn about victims of the yellow fever epidemic of 1862 and Union soldiers originally buried on the grounds, as well as many others.

The Charleston Campaign of 1863

Opening the summer program of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, more than 30 members and guests attended a seminar-style discussion about the Union campaign to close Charleston harbor and take the city in 1863.

President Bill Jayne introduced the topic and led the discussion as it focused on the high-stakes ironclad attack on the harbor in April and then the grueling summer campaign on Morris Island that besieged Battery Wagner after a costly repulse in July.

Ultimately, the Union's efforts choked off blockade running but not only failed to take the city where the Civil War began, but failed to take either Fort Sumter or Fort Moultrie, the major forts guarding the entrance to the harbor. The city was, in effect, besieged for the remainder of the war but it didn't fall into Union hands until February 18, 1865, when Confederate forces abandoned the city.

Discussion focused on the ironclad attack, the technology of the monitors that spearheaded the attack, the Confederate defense and the difficulty of conducting joint Army-Navy operations in the Civil War.

Blockade Runner Chicora

One of the curious difficulties of researching Civil War maritime history is the fact that ships often changed their names. A blockade runner captured by the U.S. Navy might be refitted to become a blockader. The blockade runner Advance, partially owned by the state of North Carolina, was built in Great Britain as the Lord Clyde. She became the Advance when she arrived in Confederate waters and made 17 successful round trips through the blockade until she was captured coming out of Wilmington on September 10, 1864. She was then purchased from the prize court and taken into the U.S. Navy as the Frolic. To make matters worse, U.S. records sometimes referred to the blockade runner as the A.D. Vance and the Ad-Vance.

The case of "Chicora" may be even more confusing. Let's start with the idea that it is an American Indian name. In 1521 Spanish slavers operating along the Carolina coast captured an Indian man along the shore of Winyah Bay, around modern Georgetown, S.C. They named him Francisco de Chicora, probably getting the name from his efforts to name his tribe or the place he was from. So, the name "Chicora" passed into South Carolina history as the name for Indians that lived in that area north of Charleston.

As the war developed, blockade running became very profitable and private companies were formed. One such was the Chicora Importing and Exporting Company of South Carolina. Incorporated in December 1863, the firm actually began operations in September 1862 under the leadership of wealthy Charleston merchants and bankers, including Theodore Wagner, a partner of George Trenholm at John Fraser and Company. Trenholm was the most influential of the blockade running businessmen and later became Confederate Treasury Secretary.

Yes, the Chicora Importing and Exporting Company eventually owned a blockade runner named the Chicora, but wait a minute. There was another Chicora. The CSS (Confederate States Ship) Chicora was an ironclad ram built in Charleston to help defend the harbor. Two ships were built around the same time, the Chicora and the Palmetto State. Officially a Richmond class ram, the Chicora was built in 1862 with $300,000 in funds appropriated by the Member News - In Remembrance

Some 15 (or so) years ago, Arthur McGiverin, then the recently retired Chief Justice of the Iowa Supreme Court, visited his nephew Terry McGiverin, a member of our CFCWRT.

Judge McGiverin, a former President of the Ottumwa, Iowa CWRT was interested in visiting Fort Fisher. Several members of our group joined with Bob Cooke on that tour. Member Tim Winstead, then editor of Runner, maintained contact with Judge McGiverin resulting in Judge McGiverin becoming an associate member of the CFCWRT. Judge McGiverin always accompanied his annual dues payment with a note of greeting. He appreciated his association with fellow Civil War enthusiasts and frequently acknowledged a particular issue of Runner or Round Table activity.

Retired Iowa Supreme Court Judge Arthur McGiverin passed away on June 2nd at the age of 90 in Iowa City, Iowa. His notes of greeting and encouragement to his "adopted CWRT" will be missed.

Thousands of Soldiers held Massive Snowball Fights

One morning in 1864, the Confederate Army woke up to 13 centimeters (5 in) of snow. The men rushed out and fought what may be one of the biggest snowball fights in history.

Up to 20,000 men were involved. The Tennessee and Georgian soldiers divided themselves into two armies, built up arsenals of snowballs, and charged at each other. On Tennessee's side, Colonel Gordon even rode out on horseback, holding up a dirty handkerchief like it was a flag and pelting his men with snow.

Other fights broke out among the Confederate forces. Men lined up, using all their military training, and launched volleys of snowballs at the other side. Some who ran too close to the enemy line were dragged over to have their shirts stuffed with snow.

The boys, after all, were young—some only 17 years old. When the snow cleared, they picked up their weapons again and marched for another battle, where more than just a shirt full of snow awaited..

"FROM SMITHVILLE...BOTH BLOCKADING FLEETS COULD BE DISTINCTLY SEEN, AND THE OUTWARD BOUND BLOCKADE-RUNNERS COULD TAKE THEIR CHOICE THROUGH WHICH OF THEM TO RUN THE GAUNTLET...THE UNITED STATES FLEET WERE UNABLE WHOLLY TO STOP BLOCKADE-RUNNING. IT WAS INDEED, IMPOSSIBLE TO DO SO;"

CSS CHICORA

State of South Carolina. Palmetto State was funded largely by private donations and was called "The Ladies' Gunboat." The CSS Chicora was 150 feet long with a 35-foot beam, 14-foot draft and six guns. A single-screw propeller powered by a steam engine drove the plodding ship at about five knots top speed. One story says that a log floating in the tide of Charleston harbor could outrun the Chicora.

All the major Confederate harbors had similar ironclads to help defend them and they had little success in offensive operations. On January 31, 1863, however, the Chicora and the Palmetto State took advantage of the absence of US ironclads blockading Charleston harbor and sortied out to drive away the wooden ships on station. They severely damaged two ships, including the USS Keystone State, a side-wheel paddle steamer. With one paddle wheel disabled, the Keystone State steamed in a large circle, but even so, she was able to outrun the Chicora. Briefly, the US ships steamed away from the harbor mouth and the two Confederate ironclads returned to their berths within the harbor. Confederate officials proclaimed the blockade broken but by the time foreign consuls went out to observe, the blockading vessels were back on station. Soon, the U.S. Navy made sure that ironclad ships were always close by and the Confederate rams never ventured outside the harbor again.

Now, we get to the blockade runner Chicora. The Chicora Importing and Exporting Company contracted with William C. Miller and Sons in Liverpool, England, in 1864 to build a vessel that was originally named Let Her Be. They also contracted for another ship called Let Her Rip. The ships were fast, 211 feet long, 26 feet in the beam with a steel hull and side wheel paddles. As with most blockade runners built in the British Isles, the ships were renamed when they reached Confederate ports. The Let Her Be became the Chicora and the Let Her Rip became the Wando.

The ships were very profitable with Chicora making seven successful round trips through the blockade. She started out running from Bermuda to Wilmington and then switched to Charleston in late 1864.

She was also involved in a risky enterprise that might have done much to upset the balance of forces in the summer of 1864 as General U.S. Grant and the Union armies tightened their grip on Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia at Richmond and Petersburg.

In July 1864, the Confederacy transferred about 200 sailors and marines from the Richmond area south to Wilmington where they boarded the Let Her Be (not yet re-named Chicora) and the Florie, another fast blockade runner owned by the Importing and Exporting Company of Georgia. Mr. Gazaway Bugg Lamar was president of the Georgia company, not Rhett Butler. Sorry.

Anyway, the plan was that the two ships would steam up the coast, run into the Chesapeake Bay and raid the Union prison camp at Point Lookout, Maryland. At Point Lookout they would free the Confederate prisoners held there and bring them back to Wilmington where they could be rehabilitated and outfitted to reinforce Lee's army. The numbers wouldn't have been significant enough to help Lee but, no doubt, a successful raid of that sort would have caused the Union to reallocate ships and other resources to prevent such a thing from occurring again. Unfortunately for the Confederacy, with the two steamers anchored off of Smithville (modern Southport), President Jefferson Davis himself ordered the operation to be halted because it was believed that the Union had learned of the plan.

The blockade runner Chicora was never captured or sunk by the Union and her owners, the Chicora Importing and Exporting Company of South Carolina, had her brought to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and sold near the end of the war. It helped the southern company pay its bills and end the war on a profitable note. The ship was actually cut in half and bulkheaded so the two halves could float and taken into Lake Ontario where she served as an excursion boat until 1919.

If you're interested in learning more about blockade running, look into Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War by Stephen R. Wise. It's probably the best single source of information about blockade running because most Confederate records were destroyed around the end of the war and Dr. Wise, director of the US Marine Corps museum at Parris Island, exhaustively studied newspaper archives and other private sources to create an objective history of blockade running.

*Medical Innovations of the Civil WarLife-Saving Amputation

Surgeons frequently treated arm and leg wounds by amputating. The grisly wounds caused by bullets and shrapnel were often contaminated by clothing and other debris. Cleaning such a wound was time-consuming and often ineffective. However, amputation made a complex wound simple. Surgical manuals taught that an amputation should be performed within the first two days following injury. The death rate from these so-called primary amputations was lower than the rate for amputations performed after the wound became infected. Union surgeons performed nearly 30,000 amputations.

Patients undergoing amputation were first anesthetized. A tourniquet was applied above the site of the proposed amputation. The skin and muscle were then cut with amputation knives several inches above the fracture site. The muscles were pulled up to expose the bone. An amputation saw was used to cut through the bone. Once the cut was completed, large arteries were pulled out from the stump tissue with a tenaculum and tied off to prevent bleeding. The skin muscle was then released and the tissue sutured. Two types of amputation were commonly used. A circular amputation involved cutting straight through the skin to the bone and resulted in a stump that was circular in appearance. A flap amputation required the tissue to be cut leaving two flaps of skin that were used to create a stump. Fingers and other small bones were amputated using the smaller metacarpal saw.

Among those saved by the saw was Daniel E. Sickles, the eccentric commander of the 3rd Army Corps. In 1863, at the Battle of Gettysburg, the major general's right leg was shattered by a Confederate shell. Within the hour, the leg was amputated just above the knee. His procedure, publicized in the military press, paved the way for many more. Since the new Army Medical Museum in Washington, D.C., had requested battle-field donations, Sickles sent the limb to them in a box labeled "With the compliments of Major General D.E.S." Sickles visited his leg yearly on the anniversary of its emancipation.

Amputation saved more lives than any other wartime medical procedure by instantly turning complex injuries into simple ones. Battlefield surgeons eventually took no more than six minutes to get each moaning man on the table, apply a handkerchief soaked in chloroform or ether, and make the deep cut. Union surgeons became the most skilled limb hackers in history. Even in deplorable conditions, they lost only about 25 percent of their patients—compared to a 75 percent mortality rate among similarly injured civilians at the time. The techniques invented by wartime surgeons—including cutting as far from the heart as possible and never slicing through joints—became the standard.

Trivia Answers

1. Some authorities say that the siege began on December 7, 1861, when Union forces seized Port Royal harbor near Beaufort, just south of Charleston. The harbor became the home port of the Union Navy's South Atlantic Blockading Squadron and the base of the Department of the South for the Army. Most authorities, however, think the siege of Charleston began on July 10, 1863, when Union forces landed on Morris Island and began the drive that resulted in closing off the main channel into Charleston Harbor.
2. The pilot was Robert Smalls, the courageous slave who commandeered the CSS Planter in Charleston Harbor on May 13, 1862, and boldly steamed out of the Charleston harbor with his family and friends aboard. Smalls warned the captain of the Keokuk that the currents would make it difficult to steer the ship as it approached Ft. Sumter and the ship was caught close to the fort for about 30 minutes receiving terrible punishment that resulted in its sinking the following day.
3. General Quincy Gillmore employed six batteries of Requa guns in the siege of Battery Wagner. They were, in essence, prototype machine guns. Twenty-five rifle barrels were laid next to each other on a table of sorts and loaded with 25 rounds of ammunition from a clip. Fired simultaneously, the 25 rounds were effective in providing cover for Union soldiers digging trenches closer to Battery Wagner. The gun was the invention of Dr. Josephus Requa, a dentist in Rochester, NY, and William Billinghamurst, a gunsmith. It was rejected by General James W. Ripley, Union chief of ordnance, because he thought it would waste ammunition and cause logistical problems.

Union Army was a Multicultural / Multinational Force

One-third of the soldiers who fought for the Union Army were immigrants, and nearly one in 10 was African American.

The Union Army was a multicultural force—even a multinational one. We often hear about Irish soldiers (7.5 percent of the army), but the Union's ranks included even more Germans (10 percent), who marched off in regiments such as the Steuben Volunteers. Other immigrant soldiers were French, Italian, Polish, English and Scottish. In fact, one in four regiments contained a majority of foreigners. African Americans were permitted to join the Union Army in 1863, and some scholars believe this infusion of soldiers may have turned the tide of the war.

"...THE XI CORPS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC WAS KNOWN AS "THE DUTCHMAN'S CORPS" BECAUSE IT INCLUDED SO MANY GERMAN IMMIGRANTS, BUT IT BECAME SOMETHING OF A CATCH-ALL CORPS FOR FOREIGN-BORN RECRUITS FROM THROUGHOUT EUROPE AND EVEN THE MIDEAST."

June Round Table Discussion A Nearly Forgotten Campaign of 1863

As part of our expanded summer program, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will host a true “round table” discussion about the Charleston campaign of 1863.

Charleston, of course, was the “seat of rebellion.” It was the place where Southern radicals initiated the secession movement and South Carolina militia fired the first shots of the conflict.

By 1863, Charleston remained a potent symbol and was also the most important blockade running port in the Confederacy. Its railroads connected the port to the primary Confederate armies in both Virginia and Tennessee.

CFCWRT July Event - Tour of Oakdale Cemetery

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table (CFCWRT) July event focuses on Oakdale Cemetery’s military history.

Most Wilmingtonians know Oakdale Cemetery as a peaceful landscape of majestic trees, quiet paths rolling over gentle slopes, flowering bushes and picturesque monuments. Chartered in 1852, it is also a treasure trove of history.

Oakdale is the first “rural cemetery” in the state of North Carolina. During the 19th Century, the Rural Cemetery Movement emerged as an alternative to crowded church graveyards. Oakdale exemplifies this movement. In the spirit of the Romantic era, the rural cemetery was meant for the living as well as departed loved ones—just like Oakdale today.

The CFCWRT will present a special military history tour of Oakdale on Sunday morning, July 14th, beginning at 9:30 am. Learn about Civil War generals buried at Oakdale, the mound memorializing more than 300 unknown soldiers, the bold female spy who perished in the surf during the Civil War and many more.

The tour will focus on Civil War era figures. You will learn about victims of the yellow fever epidemic of 1862 and Union soldiers originally buried on the grounds, as well as many others.

The tour will last for up to two hours, so dress appropriately for the weather and make sure to bring water.

Your experienced guides are members of the CFCWRT steering committee: Past President Bob Cooke, author of Wild, Wicked Wartime Wilmington,

The summer of 1863 seemed, even at the time, the most fateful of the war. Vicksburg fell and “the father of waters once again goes unvexed to the sea,” and the Army of Northern Virginia reached its “high water mark” at Gettysburg, and then receded. What would have happened if Charleston had fallen in that summer?

The distance from Ft. Moultrie to Ft. Sumter is only 1800 yards. On April 7, 1863, Admiral Samuel F. DuPont took a fleet of nine U.S. Navy ironclads, including seven monitors, into that narrow space and attempted to reduce the forts or run through the gauntlet into the harbor. An effective barrier in the channel and the overwhelming volume of accurate fire from the forts stopped the attempt, although more effective planning and joint Army-Navy operations might have led to success.

South of the harbor entrance, lay a thin barrier island called Morris Island. Much of the island has eroded into the ocean since the Civil War but in 1863 it was the scene of fierce fighting in which the Union army eventually occupied Battery Wagner and other Confederate positions, allowing them to virtually close off the main shipping channel, which ran parallel to the island. Firing from Morris Island, the Union battered Ft. Sumter into a pile of rubble. The famous fort was no longer effective as an artillery platform but, as a lightly manned infantry post, it anchored the obstructions that prevented Union warships from steaming into the harbor. Although the Confederates didn’t abandon the fort until 1865, Charleston was no longer the premier blockade running port in the south. That distinction fell to Wilmington.

The monitor attack in April illustrated the limitations of those revolutionary little ships and led to the relief of Admiral DuPont. His replacement was Admiral John Dahlgren of gun invention fame. He was somewhat more cooperative with General Quincy Gillmore, commander of Union ground forces. The grinding summer campaign on Morris Island—with Battery Wagner at its heart—led to more than 2,318 Union casualties and over 1,000 Confederate losses. Those numbers don’t include substantial losses to illness and disease.

on the firing line because duty was so dangerous and trying. Technology came into play, too, as the Union developed a "sap roller" used to protect Union soldiers as they dug trenches perpendicular to the Confederate position. Several Requa Batteries, an early version of the machine gun, also made their appearance along with numerous "torpedoes" or mines.

The discussion will focus on the reasons for the Union failure to achieve total victory. Was it political meddling? Was it an overconfident reliance on new technology? Was it the personal-ity conflicts and poor doctrine that made effective Union joint operations impossible? Was it the skill and tenacity of the Confederate defense, led by General P.G.T. Beauregard?

There is a great deal of good information available online and the books Success Is All That Was Expected by Robert M. Browning, Jr., and Gate of Hell by Stephen R. Wise are excellent volumes.

Who Will Lift This Flag

Carrying on Dr. Richard J. Sommers's Legacy

Civil War and Military Historian, Richard J. Sommers, peacefully passed away Tuesday, May 14, 2019. I knew him for 38 years; he was a neighbor, a mentor, and a friend. His love of history influenced countless students of history. He was indirectly or directly involved in much of the Civil War-Military History literature published in the last four decades. While it is true that "America has lost a great historian," as Ted Alexander noted, we recognize that Dick prepared us for this moment.

Much of Dr. Sommers' life was about keeping the memories of our Civil War forefathers and military studies, in general, relevant in our society. It was an up-hill struggle. Many Americans have little interest in, or knowledge of, history. Less and less civilian universities offer Civil War courses, and even less offer military studies (military history, strategy, and strategic leadership). Dick, however, refused to give up. His passion for learning and sharing that knowledge kept him moving forward. Even when he fell ill, he continued to visit battlefields, lecture, publish articles and books, and encourage others to publish their historical works.

As I reminisced about Dick's legacy, I began to think about the scene in the movie Glory. Before the final battle, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw stands before the 54th Massachusetts, points to his color-bearer and asks his color-guard, "if this man should fall who will lift the flag and carry on?" I can think of numerous students of history—professional historians and the general public—who will lift the flag and carry on. We will take what he has taught us: emulate his tenacity, his intellectual warrior-ethos, work ethic, and love of history and of Country. We will dedicate ourselves to the unfinished work remaining before us and pass that knowledge on to future generations.

Civil War from Artist's Point of View

By Jim Horton

VETERAN

My first encounter with the Civil War was from a book called Great Battles of The Civil War from Life magazine. It was produced in conjunction with the 100th Anniversary of the war. I was probably 7 or 8 years old and had never seen anything like this before. It had paintings of battles and pictures of soldiers in blue or grey uniforms with all of their weapons and accoutrements. These paintings created my interest in the Civil War, an interest that has lasted a lifetime.

Civil War art began during the war with the battlefield drawings from the publications of Frank Leslie. Artists such as Alfred Waud and Edwin Forbes were eyewitnesses to the carnage and their drawings were published in Leslie's newspapers as well as Harper's Weekly and others. Also, famous artists such as Winslow Homer created detailed oil paintings of the Union army in camp and in drill.

Artists of today are continuing this tradition with very detailed paintings of all aspects of the Civil War and have taken it to a new level. Don Troiani's paintings are meticulously researched and beautifully rendered. His details are accurate to the number of buttons on a jacket. His battlefield scenes make one feel that they are standing in the center of the action. Most of his paintings feature a particular event during a battle and one can learn quite a bit about it by studying the painting. They are also outstanding works of art in color and design.

Mort Kunstler paintings are also historically accurate and extremely detailed. Kunstler, as well, paints battle scenes but also makes many of his paintings of non-battle subjects such as parades, weddings, Confederate balls and the like. They are all quite beautiful as works of art as well as educational in their content. I read that Kunstler was a child prodigy and was a skilled artist by the time he was twelve. Civil War enthusiasts are fortunate that he used his great talent to commemorate The Civil War.

Troiani and Kunstler are both tremendous artists. Their prints alone sell for many hundreds of dollars.

Other outstanding Civil War artists include Keith Rocco and Dale Gallon, Gallon is a Gettysburg resident and sticks mostly with Gettysburg scenes. One can learn a lot about various battles and regiments from studying their paintings. And just as those paintings that I saw as a child, they bring all of the events from almost 160 years ago to life.

Jim was born and raised in Pittsburgh, Pa., and graduated with an Associates Degree from Ivy School of Professional Art. He majored in Illustration and Fine Art. He worked in various fields in graphic arts and technical illustration, which, he says, shaped his "technically oriented style."

*Medical Innovations of the Civil WarThe Anesthesia Inhaler

In 1863, Stonewall Jackson's surgeon recommended the removal of his left arm, which had been badly damaged by friendly fire. When a chloroform-soaked cloth was placed over his nose, the Confederate general, in great pain, muttered, "What an infinite blessing," before going limp.

But such blessings were in short supply. The Confederate Army had a tough time securing enough anesthesia because of the Northern blockade. The standard method of soaking a handkerchief with chloroform wasted the liquid as it evaporated. Dr. Julian John Chisolm solved the dilemma by inventing a 2.5-inch inhaler, the first of its type. Chloroform was dripped through a perforated circle on the side onto a sponge in the interior; as the patient inhaled through tubes, the vapors mixed with air. This new method required only one-eighth of an ounce of chloroform, compared to the old 2-ounce dose. So while Union surgeons knocked out their patients 80,000 times during the war, rebels treated nearly as many with a fraction of the supplies.

Trivia Answers

1. Union General Burnside embarked his 11,000 troops around the mouth of Slocum Creek, 12 miles south of New Bern. Today, the area is part of Havelock. The railroad between Morehead City and New Bern needed a stop about half way so the engine could be resupplied with water and fuel, so in 1858 a stop was created and a town grew up around it. The town was named “Havelock” in honor of Sir Henry Havelock-Allan, who received the Victoria Cross for valor during the Indian Mutiny. According to Wikipedia, there are six places named Havelock in the U.S., several in Canada and elsewhere, and an island in the Indian Ocean that looks like a great place to SCUBA dive.
2. Named for the Indian Tribe that lived along the Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds (or the Croatan Sound between Roanoke Island and the mainland), it was a strong defensive line about ten miles below New Bern. The problem was that they didn’t have enough troops to man the line so the defense was moved closer to the city to a line anchored by Ft. Thompson on the Neuse River. Lt. Col. Henry K. Burgwyn of the 26th NC walked the line and determined that they actually needed about 2,000 more men to defend that line.
3. Less than a week after New Bern, the Confederate War Department created the 2nd NC Brigade under command of BG Lawrence O’Bryan Branch. Branch, the general who had exercised command at New Bern. Four of the regiments at New Bern—the 25th, 28th, 33rd and the 37th—became initial members of the brigade. The 18th NC was in Kinston at the time of the New Bern battle and also became a part of the brigade. The 25th NC was soon transferred to another brigade and the 7th NC, another New Bern unit, was added. So, four of the five regiments in the brigade had fought and been defeated at New Bern while the fifth regiment was nearby in Kinston. In the next six months the brigade became part of Gen. Robert E. Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia and fought in several bloody and significant battles—Hanover Court House, Cedar Mountain, 2nd Manassas, Chantilly and Harper’s Ferry. By September 1862, the brigade was a veteran unit that had proven itself on the battlefield.

The Other Jefferson Davis

Union General Jefferson Davis shared a name with the Confederate president, a circumstance that didn’t cause as much confusion as might be expected—with one notable exception. During the 1863 Battle of Chickamauga, as darkness fell on Horseshoe Ridge, members of the 21st Ohio saw a swarm of men approaching but couldn’t tell if they were friend or foe. Most assumed they were Union reinforcements, but a few feared they were Confederates. As the troops grew closer, one Union soldier called out, “What troops are you?” The collective reply was “Jeff Davis’s troops.” The Ohio soldiers relaxed, believing they meant the Union general. A few moments later, they were staring down the muzzles and bayonets of the 7th Florida. The Ohioans surrendered. The Confederates won the battle.

Brian Kraus - Retribution: Six Months Later

On May 9th, we will welcome Brian Kraus, an expert on the Civil War, especially in Coastal Carolina. A resident of Morehead City, he's also a reenactor and artist. Brian has regaled our Round Table several times in the past and this time he returns to Wilmington to talk about the Battle of New Bern on March 14, 1862, and the Battle of Sharpsburg (Antietam) on September 17, 1862. Many of the same units and soldiers improbably faced off at both battles, with wildly different results. The events of the six months between these two battles were momentous ones for the nation and for the soldiers on both sides. Don't miss this presentation, which will be held at Harbor Church on Masonboro Loop.

Chris Fonvielle - The Wilmington Campaign

With incomparable command of the subject, Chris Fonvielle, professor emeritus of history from UNCW gave our audience at the Cape Fear Museum an enlightening view of the Wilmington Campaign. Moving from the 30,000-foot strategic and political view to the ground level view of the soldiers and sailors at the guns, he kept the audience asking for more.

While Wilmington with its railroad connections and two channels connecting the Cape Fear with the ocean, was by far the most important blockade running port in the south, Charleston, S.C., gathered much more attention from the Federal commanders in Washington. In fact, Charleston, we learned, endured a 587-day siege, the longest in American history. While Charleston was also an important port with excellent rail connections, its political value served to focus the attention of President Lincoln and his military commanders on the "birthplace of the rebellion," while Wilmington continued to ship more cotton and offload more military materiel until the final stages of the war.

A Wilmington native, life-long student of the Civil War, and, in fact, the first speaker in the history of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Professor Fonvielle, told the story of the failure of the December 1864 attack on Fort Fisher, including personal details. When the fort's commander, Col. William Lamb, saw that the Federal ships seemed to be concentrating their fire at the flags of the fort, he had flags placed at locations where incoming fire would do the least harm. Young Private Kit Bland courageously shinnied up a flagpole without halyards to place a flag at the top of the Mound Battery at the southern end of the sea face. Bland, we learned, took on the dangerous job because fellow Private Noah Bennett, at 198 pounds, was too heavy to climb the flagpole. Another flag near the river drew Union fire that most often overshot the fort and landed harmlessly in the river west of the fort.

The failure of December, however, led to the determination of U.S. Grant to immediately mount a renewed and improved effort that led to complete success in January 1865. The Union fleet learned its lesson and concentrated the fire of 627 guns on the fort's guns. With the fort taken, the port of Wilmington lost its value but continued to tie down a large number of Federal troops as they moved north up both sides of the river. Confederates were still capable of a counter attack that might succeed in retaking the fort and once again opening the port. In fact, Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis both argued the importance of a counterattack but General Braxton Bragg simply fell back on Wilmington and, in fact, at a crucial time after the fall of the fort, travelled back to Richmond for more than a week in order to reorganize his staff in the Confederate capital, a staff that was no longer needed because Bragg was no longer the chief military advisor to President Davis.

June Round Table Discussion A Nearly Forgotten Campaign of 1863

As part of our expanded summer program, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will host a true “round table” discussion about the Charleston campaign of 1863.

Charleston, of course, was the “seat of rebellion.” It was the most important city in South Carolina, the state that led the way in secession and the place where the most destructive war in the nation’s history erupted when southern forces fired on Fort Sumter dominating the entrance to the harbor.

By 1863, Charleston remained a potent symbol and was also the most important blockade running port in the Confederacy. Its railroads connected the port to the primary Confederate armies in both Virginia and Tennessee.

The summer of 1863 seemed, even at the time, the most fateful of the war. Vicksburg fell and “the father of waters once again goes unvexed to the sea,” and the Army of Northern Virginia reached its “high water mark” at Gettysburg, and then receded. What would have happened if Charleston had fallen in that summer?

The pictures below were taken from Ft. Moultrie on Sullivan’s Island. The distance to Ft. Sumter is only 1800 yards. (See map on page 4.) On April 7, 1863, Admiral Samuel F. DuPont took a fleet of nine U.S. Navy ironclads, including seven monitors, into that narrow space and attempted to reduce the forts or run through the gauntlet into the harbor. An effective barrier in the channel and the overwhelming volume of accurate fire from the forts stopped the attempt, although more effective planning and joint Army-Navy operations might have led to success.

VIEW OF FT. SUMTER
FROM FT. MOULTRIE

Another picture shows the lighthouse at the southern end of what was then Morris Island. The island has since washed into the ocean but in 1863 it was the scene of fierce fighting in which the Union army eventually reduced Battery Wagner and other Confederate positions, allowing them to virtually close off the main shipping channel, which ran parallel to the island. Firing from Morris Island, the Union battered Ft. Sumter into a pile of rubble. The famous fort was no longer effective as an artillery platform but, as a lightly manned infantry post, it anchored the obstructions that prevented Union warships from steaming into the harbor. Although the Confederates didn’t abandon the fort until 1865, Charleston was no longer the premier blockade running port in the south. That distinction fell to Wilmington.

The monitor attack in April illustrated the limitations of those revolutionary little ships and led to the relief of Admiral DuPont. His replacement was Admiral John Dahlgren of gun invention fame. He was somewhat more cooperative with General Quincy Gillmore, commander of Union ground forces. The grinding summer campaign on Morris Island—with Battery Wagner at its heart—led to more than 2,318 Union casualties and over 1,000 Confederate losses. Those numbers don't include substantial losses to illness and disease.

The land campaign evolved into something that presaged the trench warfare of World War I. It featured extensive trenches, and regular relief of both Union and Confederate forces on the firing line because duty was so dangerous and trying. Technology came into play, too, as the Union developed a “sap roller” used to protect Union soldiers as they dug trenches perpendicular to the Confederate position. Several Requa Batteries, an early version of the machine gun, also made their appearance along with numerous “torpedoes” or mines.

The discussion will focus on the reasons for the Union failure to achieve total victory. Was it political meddling? Was it an overconfident reliance on new technology? Was it the personality conflicts and poor doctrine that made effective Union joint operations impossible? Was it the skill and tenacity of the Confederate defense, led by General P.G.T. Beauregard?

More will be forthcoming about the round table but there is a great deal of good information available online and the books Success Is All That Was Expected by Robert M. Browning, Jr., and Gate of Hell by Stephen R. Wise are excellent volumes.

SUMMER SERIES

June Round Table Discussion: Discussion to be led by Bill Jayne on closing Charleston Harbor, including the Confederate defenses, the failures of Union joint operations and the defeats of the monitor attack on April 7, 1863 and the repulses of the Union army at Battery Wagner in July of 1863.

July tour: A weekend tour is being planned of Oakdale Cemetery. Details upcoming.

August Member Forum: Our August meeting will be an opportunity for 3 to 4 of our own Round Table members to share a short (5 to 15 minute) presentation on some aspect of the Civil War that they personally find interesting and that they feel would be of interest to the Round Table. This could be the story of an ancestor, something about a particular soldier or sailor, an event, an incident or anecdote, a little-known fact, or something about uniforms, equipment or technology. It could also be something involving local civil war sites or people.

The presentations should be factual, accurate, and, of general interest. If you elect to use a visual presentation, the usual computer and A/V equipment will be available.

Please contact Jim Gannon at 910-270 5534 if you would like to make a presentation.

Trivia Answers

1. New Inlet was the northern channel into the Cape Fear River, just below Fort Fisher, that gave blockade runners a second entrance into the river and greatly complicated the Union Navy's mission to stop the runners. It was created in 1761 by a "severe equinoctial storm" that battered the region for four days. It was closed off in the late 19th Century in an effort to keep the river from filling up with silt from the ocean.
2. Admiral Samuel Phillips Lee was named commander of the U.S. North Atlantic Blockading Squadron in September 1862, at the age of 50. He was appointed a midshipman in 1825 and held many important posts in the Navy, yet he was known for his often distracting attention to detail. He was born at Sully Plantation in Fairfax County, Virginia, and he was the grandson of Richard Henry Lee, which made him a distant cousin of Robert E. Lee. He married the daughter of Francis P. Blair, Sr. His brother-in-law, Montgomery Blair, served as Postmaster General in Lincoln's cabinet. When Admiral Lee was asked about his loyalty to the U.S. Navy, he said "When I find the word Virginia in my commission, I will join the Confederacy."
3. Born in Greenwood, S.C., the role of "Father Neptune" was played by actor and polo player Grainger Hines.
4. In late January 1865, after Ft. Fisher had fallen, the Confederate government finally moved to install General Robert E. Lee as general in chief of all Confederate forces. This deprived Bragg of his position as military advisor to President Jefferson Davis, leaving Bragg's staff in Richmond in the precarious position of being without authorized billets. In typically officious and bureaucratic fashion, Bragg and his military secretary, John B. Sale, engineered an order from President Davis to Bragg telling him to come to Richmond. So, on February 10, with the fort fallen, Union ships in the Cape Fear River and Union divisions pressing Confederate defenders on both sides of the river, Bragg left for Richmond to reorganize his staff. He returned on February 21 but by that time the city had fallen. When he returned to the region, he wrote: "I find on arrival, that our forces are driven from the west bank of Cape Fear."

The Wilmington Campaign

Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., Ph.D. Chris is professor emeritus of history at UNCW, a founding member and former president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. He is a Wilmington native and the premier historian of the Lower Cape Fear. He'll be speaking about "The Wilmington Campaign."

Ft. Fisher fell on January 15, 1865 but Union troops didn't enter the City of Wilmington until February 22, 1865. The Wilmington Campaign didn't end with the fall of the fort; it took five more weeks of fighting and maneuvering. This presentation will take place at the Cape Fear Museum at 814 Market St. See the map on page 2.

Second Guessing Ewell

With great energy and interactive audience participation, Chris Mackowski entertained and enlightened the Round Table about Lt. Gen. Richard Ewell, CSA, and his dilemma at the end of the first day of the Battle of Gettysburg.

"Back row stand up! You're Ewell and the II Corps coming in from the north, from Oak Hill. Front row stand up, you're the Union XI Corps north of Gettysburg on Barlow's Knob," Mackowski used the audience as props to explain the terrain and simulate the flanking movement aimed at the XI Corps. Standing at the end of the line, Gary Henderson recognized the flanking movement right away and noted "I don't like it!"

As two divisions of Ewell's veterans swept through the town and toward the hills to the south, it gave rise to one of the great "controversial 'ifs' of Gettysburg that have echoed down the years," in the words of James M. McPherson. Professor Mackowski opined that Ewell made a sound military judgment at the end of the day, July 1, 1863, and that "if" Stonewall Jackson had been there, he might very well have made the same decision.

Called "the most eccentric genius" in the Confederate Army, Ewell has been, however, second-guessed almost every day since that fateful summer evening. As Mackowski explained, the second-guessing took off during the "Battle of the Books" of the last half of the 19th Century as long-lived participants such as Lt. Gen. Jubal Early criticized Ewell for failing to push his disorganized corps up on to Cemetery Hill to withhold that commanding ground from the fast arriving Union army.

Recent commentary in the form of The Killer Angels, the 1974 Gettysburg novel by Michael Shaara, and “Gettysburg,” the 1993 movie, have reinforced the idea that Ewell lacked aggressiveness and missed a golden opportunity to win a great victory at Gettysburg, as his predecessor Lt. Gen. Thomas “Stonewall” Jackson had done at Chancellorsville two months earlier.

Professor Mackowski’s presentation helped us recall Ewell’s dilemma and its effect on the momentous battle.

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table Spring Trip by Bruce Patterson

A van full of history buffs from the Wilmington Chapter, N C Military Historical Society and the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table departed Wilmington on a cold, wet, March Saturday morning headed west to the Alamance Battleground, the site of the Battle of Alamance, the battle that ended the War of the Regulation on 16 May 1771, some five years prior to the beginning of the Revolutionary War.

This was a pitched battle between British subjects: the Regulators who were farmers and tradesmen from Alamance Country who were protesting excessive taxes and corruption and the Militia of Governor Tryon also composed of North Carolinians from the eastern reaches of North Carolina. Rather than a revolution, this was something of an armed civil disturbance.

The battle over, the Regulators were beaten on the field and leaders were taken to Hillsborough to meet the hangman's noose.

For the majority of our group, this was a new and a most interesting aspect of North Carolina history but the day was far from over as we backtracked from Alamance to Durham Station, where we visited the Bennett Place State Historic Site.

BENNETT PLACE

The Bennett Farm just west of Durham, happens to be midway between the respective lines of Generals William Sherman and Joseph Johnston. They chose to meet there to “hammer out” the surrender terms that effectively ended the Civil War on 26 April, 1865. The site has been preserved as a monument to the formal ending of that great conflict.

The Visitors Center at Bennett Place also houses a very impressive gun collection, including a private collection of Spencer carbines that are worth the historian's attention.

The enthusiastic group returned to Wilmington where sunny skies and warmer temperatures prevailed, satisfied that we had spent a very interesting and delightful day of historical significance in our Great North State.

Trivia Answers

1. Then Brigadier General John B. Gordon who served as commander of a brigade of Georgia troops in Early's Division, said that Ewell "had in many respects the most unique personality I have ever known. He was comprised of anomalies, the oddest, most eccentric genius in the Confederate Army." As an example of Ewell's eccentricities, his aide and stepson, Campbell Brown, told a story about Ewell stopping at a farmhouse for some buttermilk, when the lady of the house went to get the buttermilk, he picked up her scissors and began to cut his own hair. Only half-done when she returned, Ewell laid down the scissors, drank the milk, then rode off with the hair short on one side of his very bald head and untouched on the other.
2. Ewell was wounded at Second Manassas on August 28, 1862, a wound that resulted in the amputation of his right leg. He was nursed back to health by his cousin, Lizinka Campbell Brown, a widow. The two married on May 25, 1863, and Ewell often introduced her as "my wife Mrs. Brown." She was the daughter of a prominent Tennessean who served as a minister to Russia in the administration of President John Monroe. She was born in St. Petersburg, Russia.
3. English actor W. Morgan Sheppard (who died January 6, 2019) played General Trimble. Trimble, like Ewell, suffered a severe leg wound at Second Manassas in August 1862. Although he avoided amputation, his wound continued to limit him and on July 1, 1863, he was in a supernumerary role, meaning he had no command. In the Southern Historical Society Papers years after the battle, Trimble wrote about the end of the first day of battle at Gettysburg:

The battle was over and we had won it handsomely. General Ewell moved about uneasily, a good deal excited, and seemed to me to be undecided what to do next. I approached him and said: "Well, General, we have had a grand success; are you not going to follow it up and push our advantage?"

He replied that General Lee had instructed him not to bring on a general engagement without orders, and that he would wait for them.

I said, "That hardly applies to the present state of things, as we have fought a hard battle already, and should secure the advantage gained". He made no rejoinder, but was far from composure. I was deeply impressed with the conviction that it was a critical moment for us and made a remark to that effect.

As no movement seemed immediate, I rode off to our left, north of the town, to reconnoiter, and noticed conspicuously the wooded hill northeast of Gettysburg (Culp's), and a half mile distant, and of an elevation to command the country for miles each way, and overlooking Cemetery Hill above the town. Returning to see General Ewell, who was still under much embarrassment, I said, "General, There," pointing to Culp's Hill is an eminence of commanding position, and not now occu-

I advise you to send a brigade and hold it if we are to remain here.” He said: “Are you sure it commands the town?” [I replied,] “Certainly it does, as you can see, and it ought to be held by us at once.” General Ewell made some impatient reply, and the conversation dropped.

Observers have reported that the “impatient reply” was, “When I need advice from a junior officer I generally ask for it.” They also stated that Trimble threw down his sword in disgust and stormed off. A more colorful version of this account has been immortalized in Michael Shaara’s novel, The Killer Angels. The version in the movie Gettysburg was perhaps even more colorful, as the fictional General Trimble beat his chest vociferously.

The actor who portrayed General Trimble was also known for playing Dr. Ira Graves in the “Schizoid Man” episode of the TV series Star Trek: The Next Generation.

Second Guessing Richard Ewell

Wilmington's Cape Fear Civil War Round Table invites you to hear Professor Chris Mackowski speak on the topic of "Second-Guessing Richard Ewell."

One of the main reasons the Civil War is so fascinating is that there were dozens of episodes that could have changed the course of history. One such event was the end of the first day of the Battle of Gettysburg on July 1, 1863.

General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia had won a demoralizing victory over the Union Army at Chancellorsville, Virginia, in early May and promptly went on the offensive. It was a desperate gamble made even more perilous because Thomas J. "Stonewall" Jackson had been killed at Chancellorsville.

Blockade Runner Hansa—by Bill Jayne

The Hansa was a sidewheel steamer built in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1858 for the London firm of Alexander Collie and Company. The ship was 177 feet long and a little over 22 feet wide, according to Lifeline of the Confederacy by Stephen R. Wise. Not a great deal is known about her but she was featured in a wartime action drawing by Italo-English newspaper artist Frank Vizitely, and was at the center of a dispute between Confederate officers that illustrates a common problem with blockade running.

Collie was very active in the blockade running trade and devoted most of its capital to the enterprise, including building new ships during the war that were specifically designed to run into Confederate ports past the gauntlet of Union Navy war ships. The Hansa was quite successful, making about 20 trips before she was retired, likely because her boilers had become fouled. The business of blockade running was complicated and in 1864 the State of North Carolina invested in the Hansa so the government owned a portion of the ship. After the war, Collie and Company went into bankruptcy.

The port of Wilmington was controlled by Gen. William H. Chase Whiting of the Confederate army. He was in command of the forts and other defenses and in 1864, as the Confederacy sought to exercise greater control over exporting and importing vitally needed military supplies, Whiting instituted regulations that required all vessels heading out of the Cape Fear River to report to either Fort Fisher or Fort Caswell for permission to sail. Whiting was "the main authority in Wilmington," according to Stephen Wise, but he had to share some responsibility with the Confederate States

GENERAL RICHARD S. EWELL

Taking Jackson's place was Richard S. Ewell, a successful commander under Jackson until he was wounded in August 1862. His wound resulted in the loss of a leg but less than a year later he was back and in command of one-third of Lee's army.

As Lee entered Pennsylvania, the Union army stayed between him and Washington, D.C. The armies clashed at Gettysburg on July 1 in a piecemeal engagement and as the day ended, Ewell's Confederates faced a line of low hills and it seemed that if they seized the commanding terrain it would result in another great victory for the south.

Yet, General Ewell's forces remained at the foot of the hills. The next two days would see fighting on a monumental scale, ending in the Confederate failure and retreat back into Virginia.

General Ewell died in 1872 and his commander, Robert E. Lee, died in 1870. After that, the "Battle of the Books" featured generals on both sides providing their versions of history. Writers often sought to scapegoat others while enhancing their own reputations.

Chris Mackowski will guide us through this turning point, looking at what happened in 1863, what happened during the "Battle of the Books" and in contemporary times.

He is the editor of the "Emerging Civil War Series" of publications from Savas Beattie and a professor at St. Bonaventure University in Allegany, NY. His Ph.D. is from Binghamton University in NY.

Mary Edwards Walker—by Sherry Hewitt

MARY EDWARDS WALKER

The Medal of Honor was created during the Civil War, and of the over 3,500 that have been awarded for gallantry to members of the American armed forces, only one has been a woman.

Mary Edwards Walker was born on November 26, 1832. Her father was a doctor and her inspiration for going into medicine. She was the only woman graduating from Syracuse Medical College in 1855.

She volunteered to serve in the Union army as a surgeon but was refused because of her gender. Instead, she volunteered as a civilian army doctor, treating wounds at battles including First Manassas, Fredericksburg, Chickamauga, Atlanta, and others. She was captured and accused of spying in April 1864 while performing her duties. She was sent to the Confederate prison camp in Castle Thunder in Richmond, where she remained until being exchanged after four months of captivity.

After the war, she badgered Generals Thomas and Sherman to recognize her work with an Officer's commission—probably for her work as a spy. She did do low grade spying as she bravely went between the lines in an ambulance while looking for casualties. She was captured while performing her duties. She was very proud of being exchanged 'man for man' with a Confederate officer. But the Army could not commission her that, so Thomas and Sherman recommended her for the Medal instead. The citation did not directly say

Navy. The Navy's commander in Wilmington was Flag Officer William F. Lynch. While the Army's forts provided the primary defense of the Cape Fear lifeline, the Navy's ironclads, such as the North Carolina, were intended to help defend the region, too.

Professor Wise writes: "When the War Department could not make up their allotted space on a blockade runner, the navy could place their cotton on board the vessel." The cotton, of course, was virtually the currency the Confederacy used to acquire war materiel in Europe.

In February 1864 the War Department didn't have enough cotton to supply the Hansa and another runner, the Alice. When naval officers attempted to place their cotton on the vessels, the captains balked and Flag Officer Lynch released the ships on the condition that they would ensure the navy cotton would make up half of their next cargo out of Wilmington. When the two ships returned to Wilmington later that month, they tried to leave without the Navy cotton, Lynch asked Whiting to detain the ships. "The Alice was stopped, but not the Hansa, so Lynch...took charge of the vessel and had the Hansa anchored next to the ironclad North Carolina," Wise writes.

Whiting considered the seizure to be an attack on his authority and sent soldiers to take over the Hansa. This went back and forth and ultimately

April Meeting: Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., Ph.D. Chris is professor emeritus of history at UNCW, a founding member and former president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. He is a Wilmington native and the premier historian of the Lower Cape Fear. He'll be speaking about "The Wilmington Campaign." Ft. Fisher fell on January 15, 1865 but Union troops didn't enter the City of Wilmington until February 22, 1865. The Wilmington Campaign didn't end with the fall of the fort; it took five more weeks of fighting and maneuvering.

NOTE: This presentation will take place at the Cape Fear Museum at 814 Market St. The auditorium is on the second floor. Parking is available in back of the museum.

June Round Table Discussion: Discussion to be led by Bill Jayne on closing Charleston Harbor, including the Confederate defenses, the failures of Union joint operations and the defeats of the monitor attack on April 7, 1863 and the repulses of the Union army at Battery Wagner in July of 1863.

July tour: A weekend tour is being planned of Oakdale Cemetery. Details upcoming.

August Member Forum: Our August meeting will be an opportunity for 3 to 4 of our own Round Table members to share a short (5 to 15 minute) presentation on some aspect of the Civil War that they personally find interesting and that they feel would be of interest to the Round Table. This could be the story of an ancestor, something about a particular soldier or sailor, an event, an incident or anecdote, a little-known fact, or something about uniforms, equipment or technology. It could also be something involving local civil war sites or people.

The presentations should be factual, accurate, and, of general interest. If you elect to use a visual presentation, the usual computer and A/V equipment will be available.

Please contact Jim Gannon at 910-270 5534 if you would like to make a presentation.

Confederate cabinet officers had to involve themselves to solve the embarrassing dispute. Stephen R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy, took responsibility for Lynch's actions, and Secretary of War James Seddon ordered the Hansa to be turned over to the Navy for that voyage.

This contretemps took place at a time when outnumbered and under supplied Confederate armies were trying to prepare to face Sherman's drive toward Atlanta and what would become Grant's Overland Campaign in Virginia. Timely delivery of military materiel was vital. For example, Wilmington blockade running enjoyed great success in September and October of 1863 as several vessels including the Hansa arrived with supplies desperately needed by the Army of Northern Virginia after the Gettysburg campaign.

Hansa figures in another piece of documented history that illustrates the hazards of the trade. The New York Times of January 23, 1864 published a report from the Hansa, then anchored at Nassau, the Bahamas.

At 3 A. M., on the 6th inst., while off Abacco, we sighted a large paddlewheel steamship about a mile ahead. We kept east for half an hour. and were then first noticed by the stranger, who steered direct for us with the intention of cutting us off, which assured us she was a cruiser. We, however, forged ahead of her and shaped our course for Egg Island. She keeping a little on our star-board quarter was gaining on us rapidly, in consequence of a calm preventing us from obtaining a sufficient draft for our fires. About 7:30 the Federal commenced to fire at us and continued to do so till 9:30. At 8:00 she was so near us that we were obliged to lighten our vessel by throwing overboard about 70 bales of cotton. On entering Six Shilling Channel, we ran inside the reef. She fired one more shot and then left us for the purpose of picking up the cotton we had thrown overboard. The Federal vessel is very fast, brig rigged, has a straight stern, and is supposed to be the Vanderbilt.

anything about spying as that could not be said about a woman in polite society, but it alluded to her “serving in a variety of ways”.

On November 11, 1865, President Andrew Johnson awarded Walker the Medal of Honor. Her citation reads:

Whereas it appears from official reports that Dr. Mary E. Walker, a graduate of medicine, “has rendered valuable service to the Government, and her efforts have been earnest and untiring in a variety of ways,” and that she was assigned to duty and served as an assistant surgeon in charge of female prisoners at Louisville, Ky., upon the recommendation of Major-Generals Sherman and Thomas, and faithfully served as contract surgeon in the service of the United States, and has devoted herself with much patriotic zeal to the sick and wounded soldiers, both in the field and hospitals, to the detriment of her own health, and has also endured hardships as a prisoner of war four months in a Southern prison while acting as contract surgeon; and Whereas by reason of her not being a commissioned officer in the military service, a brevet or honorary rank cannot, under existing laws, be conferred upon her; and Whereas in the opinion of the President an honorable recognition of her services and sufferings should be made: It is ordered, That a testimonial thereof shall be hereby made and given to the said Dr. Mary E. Walker, and that the usual medal of honor for meritorious services be given her.

WALKER REFUSED TO GIVE UP HER MEDAL OF HONOR STATING “YOU CAN HAVE IT BACK OVER MY DEAD BODY!”
AND WORE IT UNTIL HER DEATH.

Mary Edwards Walker proudly wore the Medal of Honor for the rest of her life. In 1916 the Army undertook a review of eligibility of all previous Medal of Honor recipients and determined that 911 of them—including Dr. Walker—did not meet the criteria for awarding the Medal. In Walker’s case, it was primarily because she was a civilian surgeon, not a member of the Army, during the service for which she received the Medal. Those 911 names were stricken from the record and their Medals rescinded. Walker refused to give up her Medal of Honor stating “you can have it back over my dead body!” and wore it until her death.

Mary Edwards Walker’s Medal of Honor was restored in 1977, nearly sixty years after her death. To this day, she remains the only female recipient of America’s highest military award.

The Strong Southern Woman

We know that hundreds of thousands of soldiers died on the terrible battlefields and in the unhealthy camps of the Civil War. While those at home seldom experienced the terrors of combat, their everyday challenges included shortages of food, runaway inflation, marauding soldiers, deserters and guerrillas. All these factors contributed to the impact of disease, an ever-present threat in the mid-19th Century. In 1862, approximately 650 Wilmingtonians died of yellow fever, a communicable disease brought to the city by the blockade runner Kate.

Famed Civil War historian James McPherson estimated that 50,000 civilians died during the war and that the overall mortality rate for the South exceeded that of any country in World War I. The home front was a dangerous place.

Yet, for the most part “the strong southern woman” led those at home in successfully overcoming the challenges. Living Historian Rhonda Florian will

Cornubia

The Cornubia was one of the most successful of all Confederate blockade runners. She made about 20 successful runs through the blockade before being captured by US Navy ships Nippon and James Adger on November 8, 1863. According to Lifeline of the Confederacy by Stephen R. Wise, she made 18 successful runs. The Naval History and Heritage Command credits her with 22 successful runs. According to Mr. Wise, almost 300 steamers made about 1,300 attempts to run the Union blockade and approximately 1,000 attempts were successful. The average lifetime of a blockade runner, however, was just a little over four runs, or two round trips. Of the 300 steamers engaged in the risky but profitable enterprise, 136 were captured and 85 destroyed.

The Cornubia was built in Cornwall, England, in 1858 as a ferry and packet running along the rugged southwest coast of England. “Cornubia” is a Latinized form of the name “Cornwall.” The builder and owner was Harvey and Son of Hayle, England. She was 190 feet long, a twin sidewheel steamer with a shallow draft of 12 feet, six inches. She was purchased by the Confederacy and primarily ran the blockade between Bermuda and Wilmington, a distance of about 675 miles. She was fast, making about 18 knots, and painted white to make her hard to spot. A typical cargo was 314 bales of cotton, 29 casks of tobacco and two casks of turpentine. That was the cargo reported in the New York Times when Cornubia arrived in Bermuda on March 22, 1863 out-bound from Wilmington. A “cask” was about 250 gallons and a “bale” of compressed cotton weighed 400 to 500 pounds. Other ships, typically British, transported the cargo to England where it was sold and the money, or credit, was used to acquire weapons, ammunition, medicine and other war materiel for the Confederate war effort. Some blockade runners were owned by the Confederate government, some by the states and some were privately owned. In addition to military supplies, private blockade runners typically brought luxury items and valuable foodstuffs such as coffee and wine back to the Confederacy where it was sold at a huge profit. Cornubia was owned by the Confederacy.

According to the U.S. Naval History and Heritage Command, the Cornubia's 23rd voyage was disastrous, having repercussions far beyond those stemming from the loss of a precious cargo. Blockader USS Nippon gave chase as Cornubia sought to run in to Wilmington and Lieutenant Richard H. Gayle, Confederate States Navy, beached his ship at 2:30 a.m., 8 November, 1863. She was beached 11 miles north of New Inlet and out of range of the friendly guns at Ft. Fisher. The captain, carpenter and one seaman remained on board while the officers, crew and passengers escaped to shore. By 3:00 a.m., USS James Adger had towed Cornubia free on the flood tide still intact and she and the three captives were duly sent to Boston as a prize, along with a bag of water soaked mail that one of her officers had tried to dispose of in the surf.

The Cornubia papers quickly became a Rosetta stone to unlock the management secrets of the official Confederate blockade-running program. The most immediate result was a new, tough policy toward British seamen caught challenging the blockade. U.S. District Attorney Richard Henry Dana, Jr., at Boston, was designated to receive a sealed packet of all papers taken in the prize. Transmitting them to Secretary Welles, 26 December, after study, Dana wrote: "We have found in the prize steamer Cornubia letters which prove that that steamer, the R. E. Lee, and Ella & Annie and others of their class are the property of the Confederate Government and that their commanders are in the service of the Confederate Navy Department. This raises the question whether, in like cases, the Government will detain foreign seamen found on board as prisoners of war. The letters also show that they are under orders to conceal these facts while in neutral ports, in order to escape the rules applicable to public vessels of belligerents." Welles endorsed the letter, writing: "The persons captured on the boats mentioned and others in like cases to be detained as prisoners."

Comdr. Thomas H. Patterson, USN, of James Adger noted, "Her captain remarked to my executive officer that 'though the Cornubia is a small vessel the Confederate Government could better have afforded to lose almost any other vessel.' " He was not referring merely to essential cargo. The papers the captain tried to destroy revealed the operational pattern of the Confederate Army transport service. The ship's Confederate register showed the Secretary of War, "James A. Seddon, of Richmond, Va., is her sole owner." Commanders of these transports were CSN officers who reported to Col. Josiah Gorgas, Chief of Ordnance, CSA, through special War Department Agent J. M. Sexias in Wilmington, N.C.

The Confederacy was buying other ships in addition to the Cornubia and the ships were initially commanded by British captains in order to give the appearance of British ownership and conceal their identity as Confederate ships. One British captain advised Confederate Navy Secretary Stephen Mallory: "I would suggest that as fast as the ships are paid for, [Confederate States] Navy officers be put in command as a general rule," adding that such vessels "ought to be kept registered in the names of private individuals, otherwise serious embarrassment may arise, as Lord Russell has stated in the House of Lords that if it could be shown that the steamers trading between the Confederate States and the British Islands were owned by the Confederate States Government, they would be considered as transports and would be forbidden to enter English ports, except under the restrictions imposed upon all men-of-war of the belligerent powers."

Following this pattern, orders and letters from the summer of 1863 from Col. Gorgas to Lt. Gayle, via Agent Sexias, stated: "You [that is, Lt. Gayle] will assume command of the Steamer Cornubia relieving Capt. J. M. Burroughs ... (whose contract) terminates on reaching Bermuda... Take immediate steps to change your flag and register under Confederate colors." The intent of the whole system was revealed by the following sentence: "Being in the Confederate service, they [crew members] are entitled to be exchanged as prisoners-of-war."

As the war progressed, the Confederate government realized that it needed to gain more control over blockade running in order to ensure a flow of desperately needed military supplies, including weapons. Typical of the Confederacy's reluctance to exercise centralized control, however, it wasn't until February 1864 that President Jefferson Davis was authorized to exercise control over all foreign commerce. In essence, it was too late by that time, as the Union Navy's blockade had become more and more effective as the war ground on.

After her capture, the Cornubia was adapted to US Navy use as a warship and ended the war in far-off Galveston, Texas, where she captured several Confederate ships and assisted in the sinking of the Confederate steamer Denbigh. She was sold after the war.

appear before our Round Table in authentic period attire to give a slide presentation describing how the war affected the lives of Southern women. Topics covered will be “Patriotism, Nursing the Soldiers, Food Shortages and Starvation, Physical Danger, Refugees, and Smugglers and Spies.”

The presentation features twenty-two Southern women of the period and includes photographs or portraits of thirteen of those women. Sketches from Harper’s Weekly and other photographs are also included in the presentation.

The former Managing Director of Carolinian Shakespeare Festival in New Bern, Ms. Florian will give readings of two period poems during the course of the presentation. She will also dramatize a selection from the diary of Mrs. Mary Rhodes of Alabama and a letter from a farmer’s wife in Nansemond County, Virginia.

Ms. Florian grew up near New Bern and earned a BA degree from Welch College in Nashville, TN, and a MFA in acting from Rutgers University in New Jersey. Her presentation promises to be both educational and enjoyable.

*Noteworthy—cont.The Letters of Sidney Stockbridge, aboard the USS Pawtuxet, off Fort Fisher - January 1865

Our January presentation was shared in the StarNews Community Affairs page online January 6th and the paper edition on January 7th (Thank you Bill Jayne.) Below is an excerpt from that column:

Today the seascape off Fort Fisher invokes the beauty of nature and the majesty of the Atlantic Ocean, ever changing but always the same. In January of 1865, however, something unique occurred. Fifty-eight US Navy ships mounting almost 600 guns stood in close to shore on a relatively placid sea pummeling Fort Fisher, the Confederacy's huge earthen fort that was the key to the defense of Wilmington, the last port able to provide desperately needed foreign supplies to Robert E. Lee's embattled army in Virginia. The sounds and sights of the bombardment were monumental and fearsome.

SIDNEY

STOCKBRIDGE

What was it like from the point of view of a side-wheel steamer in the first line of the task force less than a mile off shore? Becky Sawyer, interpreter and collections manager at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site, offers a glimpse of that experience. A native of the St. Louis, Missouri, area, Becky earned a Masters degree in public history from UNCW. She is also a highly accomplished reenactor who researches costumes from the 18th and 19th centuries to enrich the experience of history.

Over the course of the past two years, with the assistance of Rick Morrison, Becky and other staff of the Fort Fisher State Historic Site have been transcribing letters belonging to Sidney Stockbridge who served in the Paymaster's Office on the USS Pawtuxet in the battle of January 1865. These letters are on loan from Joe Stockbridge of Surry, Maine, the great nephew of Sidney Stockbridge.

A highlight of the collection is a letter from the battle dated January 16-18, 1865. It contained valuable information about the torpedoes (mines) at Battery Buchanan, a sketch of the fort from on deck of the USS Pawtuxet and sketches from inside the fort. It also contained gruesome post battle descriptions and the apparent capture of the dog that belonged to Colonel William Lamb, the Confederate commander of the fort. Other letters describe the US Navy's push up the Cape Fear River to capture Fort Anderson and Wilmington.

Real Horse Soldiers: Benjamin Grierson's Epic 1863 Civil War Raid through Mississippi - by Timothy B. Smith

Benjamin Grierson's Union cavalry thrust through Mississippi is one of the most well-known operations of the Civil War. The last serious study was published more than six decades ago. Since then other accounts have appeared, but none are deeply researched full-length studies of the raid and its more than substantial (and yet often overlooked) results. The publication of Timothy B. Smith's The Real Horse Soldiers: Benjamin Grierson's Epic 1863 Civil War Raid through Mississippi rectifies this oversight.

George Armstrong Custer and the Battle of Little Bighorn

Join us for what will be a most interesting talk about one of American's most well known soldiers and his epic battle at the Little Bighorn. Dr. David La Vere, UNCW Professor of History, will share facts and fiction about the events that led to the June 25, 1876 battle.

Dr. La Vere is an ethnohistorian and the author of seven books on American Indian history. Currently, he teaches and researches on Southeastern Indians, especially those of the Carolinas. In the past, he has written extensively on Southern Plains and Texas Indians.

A native of Louisiana, David received his B.A. and M.A. from Northwestern State University (LA) and his Ph.D. from Texas A&M. David served in the U.S. Marine Corps.

NOTE: Dr. La Vere has periodically taught a seminar on Custer and the Little Bighorn Campaign. I was lucky enough to attend one of his seminars when I attended UNCW in 2007-2010. Dr. La Vere researched deeply and led a seminar that caused his students to investigate who, what, when, where and why at the Little Bighorn.

3 – A change is coming to the CFCWRT this coming June. Bill Jayne explains:

June Program to Feature Round Table Discussion

The Civil War Round Table movement began in Chicago in 1941 and became very popular during the Civil War Centennial years of 1961-65. The traditional format was a “round table” discussion of a specific topic such as a battle, a book or a personality associated with the war. On June 14, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will present a traditional discussion on the Battle of Fort Fisher. Specifically, we will discuss the topic of Hoke’s failure to attack Terry’s force before it was prepared for the assault on Fort Fisher itself.

In essence, the topic would be: "Should Hoke/Bragg Have Attacked the Union Force Before They Assaulted Ft. Fisher?" We will present a PowerPoint with maps, Order of Battle, timeline, and some basic questions. The introductory presentation would be limited to no more than 10 minutes. We will provide a 3- or 4-page basic summary that can be printed out so that all participants are working from "the same sheet of music."

Following the introduction, members of the Round Table would offer comments, opinions, observations limited to about three minutes. This phase of the discussion would be moderated by the discussion leader and limited to about 30 to 40 minutes total, leaving about five minutes for a summary. The total program time would be 45-60 minutes.

If you would like to offer comments, etc., on this topic, please advise Vice President Bill Jayne at jayne.bill@gmail.com. If you'd like to volunteer to be a note taker or timekeeper, please let Bill know as well.

* Trivia Questions for April 2018 *******

1 – Who was Libby Bacon? Libby was Custer's wife, his defender and the chief proponent of the Custer myth that grew from the "Last Stand." Libby lived until 1933 and until her last days, she mostly was successful in preventing negative stories about Custer's actions in the West.

Source: Custer's Trials: A Life on the Frontier of a New America

2 – Who was Marcus Reno? Major Marcus Reno was Custer's senior subordinate on the 1876 Campaign to force Sitting Bull's warriors to return to their reservations. He commanded one of the four wings into which Custer divided his command. A deeply troubled officer with a drinking problem, Reno performed poorly at the Little Bighorn, and was accused of cowardice and drunkenness. Reno's court of inquiry was the closest the army came to an investigation of the battle.

Source: Custer's Trials: A Life on the Frontier of a New America

3 – Who was Frederick Benteen? Captain Frederick Benteen was one of Custer's subordinates who commanded one wing of Custer's split command. Benteen hated Custer and this hate may have impacted the separated commands to come to Custer's defense on Last Stand Hill.

From Fields of Fire and Glory: Letters of the Civil War

Rod Gragg entertained attendees at our Dinner Meeting with the stories penned by individual soldiers who shared their Civil War experiences. Rod covered nearly every facet of the life of the Civil War soldier. From entering the service, to enduring the training and battles, to facing wounds and/or sicknesses, to becoming a prisoner of war, to dealing with victory or defeat, and finally to reconciling with a hated foe, Rod's book traced a soldier's journey through the emotions of 1861-1865.

From Rod's book, Chapter 18 "Pa Died Very Easy."

The close association of family and friends in the ranks was unquestionably reassuring for many soldiers, but it also added a very personal element to the risks of war. When Georgia attorney John C. Mounger volunteered for Confederate service, he was followed into the army by his three sons – two of whom served most of the war in their father's regiment. Mounger rose in rank to lieutenant colonel and second-in-command of the 9TH Georgia Infantry. In May 1863, Lieutenant Colonel Mounger had the heartrending task of writing his wife to report the death of their son Terrell, a captain in the 14TH Georgia Infantry, who had been mortally wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville.

Less than two months later, Mounger's two surviving soldier sons – John Junior and Tom – had to write their mother a similar letter, reporting the death of their father in the second day's fighting at Gettysburg. A year later, both sons were killed at the battle of the Wilderness.

I think what I learned from Rod's presentation was that the average soldier, Confederate or Union, was very similar in the make-ups.

1 – Who did President Lincoln first invite to Ford's theater to see Our American Cousin? President Lincoln invited General and Mrs. Julia Grant to attend the play with him and Mrs. Lincoln. Mrs. Grant and Mrs. Lincoln had several disagreeable moments during the Lincolns visit to City Point. They declined the president's invitation. Lincoln then invited Major Henry Rathbone and his fiancée, Clara Harris, to attend the play.

Amongst Immortals Raging: Gettysburg's 3rd Day Begins

Marshall Conyers provided those in attendance at our January Meeting with a different look at the Battle of Gettysburg. In Marshall's own words:

Pickett's Charge

Marshall Conyers

Though Amongst Immortals Raging is organized almost exclusively around Pickett's attack, it is not actually a tale of war so much as it is an epic journey deep into the hearts and minds of those men who fought there on that bloody bygone day. True, the impending feel of battle does imbue nearly its every written word, yet within its pages too, are all the ordinary emotions of men caught up in that most extraordinary world which is war ... justice is there, and truth and mercy and friendship, and even the innocence of youth ... all juxtaposed upon the tools of The Reaper's grim and violent trade ... muskets peppering, cannon roaring, bayonets shimmering amidst the raging cataclysm of battle ... and yet, ever resounding over all, one senses that hallowed call to Duty, Honor, Country that set Gray against Blue in a small town in Pennsylvania, then called them forth to arms and to immortality under valor's bright and fleeting banner

Conyer's presentation of his Iliad-style work was certainly "different" than our traditional treatment of Civil War history; however, that difference was interesting.

Editor

* Grant *******

Bill Jayne has taken the task to read Ron Chernow's new book about U.S. Grant.

Below Bill shares his thoughts about the first three hundred pages:

Grant by Ron Chernow is a massive biography running to almost 1,100 pages when you count the notes, bibliography and index. Yet, it's a fairly easy read...except that it's so heavy the reader can't tackle it in a casual way. Chernow is, primarily a writer with a long career as an author of magazine articles and books. He's best known for his biography of George Washington and the book about Alexander Hamilton that formed the basis of the successful Broadway play.

I'm only about a third of the way through the book but our editor has prevailed upon me to provide a report on my impressions so far. I've just finished the Chattanooga chapters and it's early 1864 and newly minted Lieutenant General Ulysses S. Grant has just arrived in Washington. Grant hasn't yet faced off against Robert E. Lee in the Overland Campaign.

I'm really looking forward to the next sections of the book. I've long felt that Grant was clearly the greatest general of the Civil War and so far this book has only reinforced that opinion. At least since 1932 with the publication of Grant and Lee by J.F.C. Fuller, serious students of the Civil War have had to dig below the superficial assessment that Lee was a genius of the military art and Grant a mere butcher who effectively used his numerical and material advantages to vanquish his more talented foe. So, my prejudice shouldn't be viewed as iconoclastic.

Lee was often tactically brilliant and he had a great sense of the weaknesses of his various opponents like McClellan and Hooker. He exploited the defensive advantages of the Army of Northern Virginia and his knowledge of the geography of the theater to a greater degree than any other Confederate general could have, in my opinion. My meaning is illustrated by the fact that the Army of Northern Virginia maintained a working line of communication to its crucial sources of supply until the beginning of 1865 when Ft. Fisher fell and Lee was forced to leave his lines below Petersburg. Lee was always able to fall back on his lines of communication to give himself a tactical advantage or to prevent a truly decisive victory by the Army of the Potomac, and he exploited that time after time.

I don't think he had as great a sense of the political milieu in which he fought and the weakness of his army, however. In a strategic sense, Sharpsburg and Gettysburg were probably mistakes because they not only risked so much of his army's strength (superlative lieutenants, a core of hard-fighting dedicated infantry) but because they turned the tables and put the Army of the Potomac back in a strong defensive position that virtually assured that they would not suffer a decisive defeat. That is, even if defeated, they would fall back on a short line of communication to their base along the Washington-Baltimore-Philadelphia line. Lee made the Army of Northern Virginia so vulnerable that a better general than McClellan might easily have ended the war at Sharpsburg.

Anyway, Chernow's bio makes it clear that Grant combined a clearer sense than Lee of the political milieu. He knew, I think, before almost anyone else that in order to win, the Union must conquer the South. The war would not be won by one big victory. The way he maneuvered and fought his army from Ft. Donelson to Shiloh to Corinth to Vicksburg was superlative. By July of 1863 with the fall of Vicksburg, Grant had amputated a huge source of supplies, manpower and transportation from the Confederate war effort. The territory taken comprised western Kentucky, much of Tennessee, western Mississippi and much of Louisiana.

In accomplishing that end, he made mistakes but didn't lose his nerve and quickly grasped how to make the most of the situation at hand. He controlled the battlefield masterfully at Shiloh and turned defeat into victory where Lee, perhaps trying desperately to grasp the opportunity for a "Waterloo," really lost control and made bad decisions on the second and third days at Gettysburg, for example.

I think Chattanooga is another example of Grant's nimbleness. It's also an example of his professional acumen in realizing that a starving, cold, dirty army was unlikely to be a winning army. He quickly got his army back on its feet while Bragg allowed his army—fresh from a great victory at Chickamauga—to deteriorate and lose its morale even though it held the high ground and dominated the approaches to the city. Chernow often documents how Grant was able to simultaneously consider tactical, logistical and geographical factors and quickly issue clear orders to accomplish his ends.

Finally, I think Chernow's book is a great addition to the literature because it really gives a believable sense of who Grant was as a human being. We know who Lee was, a patrician knight, and there have been illuminating biographies of Jackson and most other Confederate leaders but it's always been very difficult to develop a sense of who Grant was as a general, a political leader and a human being.

One of the reasons Grant has so often been underestimated is because he clearly had problems of human weakness. He was unsuccessful in his civilian endeavors in the 1850's, his family was often an embarrassment and...he did have a drinking problem. Chernow makes a convincing case that Grant's drinking was a kind of alcoholism that made him terribly susceptible to binge drinking. He often went for long periods of time without taking a drink of any kind, not even a glass of wine with dinner or a “medicinal” dose of brandy or whiskey. Yet, there were times when he was incapacitated by drink but not when actively engaged against the enemy. I think this book will go a long way toward fleshing out Grant’s unusual and puzzling personality.

I look forward to Chernow’s handling of the Overland Campaign and Grant’s role in Reconstruction. Reconstruction is a pivotal period in US history and it’s difficult to unravel all the threads of personality and permutations of policy. The failures and lost opportunities of the period haunt us to this day. I look forward to reading that part of the biography.

Amongst Immortals Raging: Gettysburg's 3rd Day Begins

Of the more than 50,000 books written about the American Civil War, Amongst Immortals Raging: Gettysburg's Third Day Begins stands alone as the only Iliad-style work ever written in the high Victorian language of the past, and organized almost exclusively around the attack of July 3, 1863. Marshall Conyers speaks with poetic reverence of all those men in Blue and Gray who collided there on that rolling Pennsylvania countryside individuals who forged history at the point of a slashing saber, or through the barrel of a smoking musket.

Marshall Conyers is a native of Wilson, N.C. He began his working career as a Junior High School science and history teacher (and Basketball and Track coach). He is an avid kayaker and bicyclist. Marshall loves the natural world, and is at his happiest when wandering through the quiet solitude of an old-growth forest with his beloved dog Pal. Marshall is also an amateur anthropologist who possesses a fine collection on Native American artifacts.

Amongst Immortals

*All life is lived, all time is done, no memory lingers here
beneath this gentle earth
so rife with springtime sun.
We sleep forever and unknowing of this hallowed ground we made.
On battlefields of honor, our youth poured out,
played out in violent days.
One instant there amongst immortals raging,*

*something darkened out our sun.
Now all is quiet, so solemn here where weathered stones inscribe our names, where once our race was run.*

*All life is lived, all time is done.
We sleep forever now with angels who sing of glory and of sacred honor won, of life and time that's never done as long as one true heart remembers us*

..... this land's most valiant sons.

Forged in Battle: Mexican War as a Civil War Proving Ground

Jeff Bockert presented an excellent talk about the Mexican War and the impact it had on the soldiers who would face each other during the coming American Civil War.

Zachary Taylor (Old Rough and Ready) and Winfield Scott (Old Fuss and Feathers) were the generals who mentored the untested soldiers. The men who learned and remembered the strengths and weaknesses of their fellow officers would respond well during the coming struggle. R.E. Lee and U.S. Grant remembered. George McClellan did not remember.

 Trivia Questions for January 2018 *****

1 – Why was the Third Day at Gettysburg so critical to those who wore the Blue and Gray? At the end of the Day One, the Blue forces had been bloodied; however, through the “reluctance” of Dick Ewell, the Blue held the high ground. The right flank of the Union line held against the savage Confederate attacks. Day Two was as bloodied along the Union left flank, but the 20th Maine and others had stopped the attacks of Longstreet and others Confederate forces.

Day Three dawned with decisions that would forever change the history of the United States. Meade held a war counsel to decide whether to stay or flee – they chose to stay and fight. Lee took his own council to extend one more strong push to break the Union center and possibly end the war – Today.

2 – Mexican General Santa Anna built strong defensive positions to block Scott’s advance on Mexico City. What actions did the Americans use to attack the defenders? Scott used his engineers (Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and McClellan) to find paths to the rear of the Mexican positions. Once the paths were cleared for troop movements, the Americans launched “flank” attacks.

Confederate Conscription: An Introduction

William “Bill” Brown shared the history of North Carolina’s efforts to raise troop levels to resist the invasion of their state and to support the efforts of the Confederate government to effectively counter Lincoln’s strategy to maintain the Union. Among the many subjects covered, Bill discussed the Militia Code of 1861, the effect of exemptions had on troop levels, the North Carolina Line and Volunteer Corps, the Constriction Act of April 1862, Bounty Pay, Substitutes, the Militia Code of 1863, the Home Guard, the Conscription Act of 1864, Robert E. Lee’s General Order No.54 – Amnesty for deserters to return to the ranks without punishment (Governor Zebulon Vance’s proclamation on Order No.54).

Note: Thanks to Linda Lashley for her notes on Bill Brown’s presentation. As reflected in her notes: The exemptions in the Conscription Acts almost caused a class war – “A Rich Man’s War, A Poor Man’s Fight.”

 Letters from an Old Soldier *****

William H. Langley was a member of Co. E, 7th Regiment North Carolina Troops. Langley enlisted in Northampton County at age 18, June 10th, 1861. He was wounded at Ox Hill, Virginia on September 1, 1862 and at Chancellorsville May 1-4, 1863. Langley was captured at the Wilderness on May 6, 1864. He was confined at Point Lookout, Maryland until transferred to Elmira, New York, August 10, 1864. Langley was released from Elmira, NY on June 12, 1865.

The 7th Regiment served under Brigadier General James Lane and the regiment saw some hard fighting, At Chancellorsville, "It is admitted here that Lane's boys were a bad, quarrelsome set of fellows and too fond of a fight altogether."

On June 6, 1903 at a tobacco barn in W.H. Langley's grove about one mile west of Elm City, 39 Confederate veterans assembled for a reunion and barbeque. There was no regular program, but each person was called on to make a few remarks.

Langley was the man with his arms crossed: library.digitalnc.org

The following letters share Langley's thoughts on his old comrades and the fellowship they shared.

Letter from W.H. Langley to Editor (P.D.Gold) of the Wilson Daily Times March 14, 1914

Dear Mr. Gold: Will you please publish this in your paper:

I have been very sick. I have been here in my room what you may say helpless for five weeks and I am an old soldier. I have [given] several dinners to my old soldier friends, and up to this day there have [sic] not been a single old soldier to see me, but tonight I am feeling some better and if I do live to see the 8th day of August which is my 71st birthday I am going to continue to be their friend by giving them another dinner. I am here tonight almost helpless, eating out of an old tin plate and a cup which was used in the time of the war. I will be pleased if you will publish this for me and fix it right.

Yours truly,
W. H. Langley

Elm City, N.C. March 3, 1914

Mr. Gold editorialized;

We trust that not only the old soldiers who are able to do so but others will visit my good friend who is a good farmer, a good citizen, a valiant soldier and in whose heart is the milk of human kindness. We have always appreciated the friendship of Mr. Langley. He has been ever kind and true to the editor of the Times and many has been the words of encouragement said to us when he came in to pay his subscription or to make a friendly call. Whenever he has given a dinner he has sent a special invitation to the editor, but much to our regret pressure of work has kept us from attending, but now we are going to leave our business and make him a visit and we want you to do the same. —Ed. Times.

Wilson Daily Times, April 30, 1914.

We were honored today by a visit from Mr. W. H. Langley of Elm City.

Mr. Langley who has been quite ill for several months, has a host of friends in the community who will rejoice at his recovery. This venerable old man has had a very remarkable career, having been “killed” four times during the civil war and was declared dead twice during his recent illness. Mr. Langley smiled as he told us of the times during the war when, with a bullet hole through his shoulder, neck and abdomen he was carried to the “deadhouse” and prepared for interment. He is now quite lively and is today shaking hands with his many friends in this city.

Note: William H. Langley was my Great-Grandfather. He died in 1918, a victim of Spanish influenza.

If you have a Civil War ancestor that you would like to share their experiences, send to me and I will include in a future edition of The Runner. tpwinstead@gmail.com.

 “keep green the memory” *****

My Great-Grandmother, my Grandmother, and my Mother were members of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. I grew up with knowledge of the organization, its activities and many of its members. I had no knowledge of a similar organization for Union Daughters, nor had I ever thought of the possibility until yesterday (November 21st).

“The National Alliance of the Daughters of Veterans of the United States of America” was incorporated on December 12, 1885, in Massillon, Ohio.

“National Society Daughters of the Union 1861-1865” was founded October 9, 1912 in New York City, New York by Mrs. Frank Crowell.

From what I discovered on-line, these Daughters established organizations to honor Union soldiers and women who served during the war. I thought that idea sounded similar to the UDC goals. Admittedly, I knew little about the activities of these organizations; hence, I emailed both organizations to inquire about their activities after they organized and those activities today.

Hopefully, I will hear back so I can update this subject next month.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – Which side did Santa Claus favor during the Civil War? Thomas Nast, a German immigrant and illustrator for the Harper’s Weekly, drew his first Santa Claus in 1862.

His first Santa (in the postdated January 3, 1863 issue) is a small elf distributing Christmas presents to Union soldiers in camp. Santa dangles by the neck a comical jumping jack identified in accompanying text as Jefferson Davis, the Confederate president. There was no doubt in Nast’s illustration whose side Santa favors in the war. Besides the military context, the cartoon is set off from later ones in that the gift giving is for adults, not children (except for the drummer boys). The other two Christmas illustrations of Nast’s published during the Civil War emphasize family scenes, with Santa relegated to the background.

2 – Which Civil War general had a song written about his Mexican-American War deeds? None other than that famous and much loved North Carolinian – Braxton Bragg. At the Battle of Buena Vista on February 23, 1847, General Zachary Taylor supposedly told Captain Bragg to give the Mexican troops “a little more grape Captain Bragg.” William J. Lemon wrote the song, “A Little More Grape Captain Bragg: A National Song” Lemon dedicated the song to General Taylor, but it was forever linked to the deeds of the young Captain Braxton Bragg.

3 – Which general commanded both the campaigns to defeat the Mexicans in 1847 and the Confederates in 1861? General Winfield Scott, a Virginian, directed the campaign that captured Mexico City and he came up with the strategy that would strangle the Confederacy. Early in the Civil War, Scott offered command of the Union army to one of his staff officers from the Mexican-American War: Robert E. Lee, another Virginian.

4 – How did Confederate General Daniel Harvey Hill feel about substitutes and exemptions? General Hill was well known for his strong views on many issues. His views on furloughs for men serving in his command were classics of his well formed thoughts.

When members of a regimental band requested a furlough, Hill denied their application with a short remark, “Shooters before Tooters.”

Hill’s views on substitutes and exemptions were clearly declared in furlough request that had been disapproved by one of Hill’s Division commanders. “Approved for the reason that a brave soldier ought to be allowed to go home whenever practicable, else all the children born during the war or within the usual period afterwards will be the offspring of the cowards who remain at home by reason of substitutes or other exemption.”

5 – Who was J. Summerfield Staples? Staples was a 19 year old Pennsylvanian who served as a substitute for Abraham Lincoln. President Lincoln, even though he was overage and exempt, felt he needed to help the war effort; hence, he paid $300 to hire his substitute.

Confederate Conscription: An Introduction

William “Bill” Brown will discuss the three Conscription Acts and their impact in the Wilmington area. This meeting will likely result in questions about the Confederacy and its legislative agenda to provide maximum resources to achieve independence.

April 16, 1862 - The Confederate Congress passes the first Conscription Act, making all white males between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five eligible to be drafted into military service. (This is the first such draft in U.S. history.)

September 22, 1862 - President Abraham Lincoln issues the preliminary Emancipation Proclamation.

October 11, 1862 - The Confederate Congress passes the Twenty-Slave Law, creating an exemption to military conscription for the owners of twenty or more slaves.

May 1, 1863 - The Confederate Congress amends the Twenty-Slave Law to apply only to overseers on plantations belonging solely to "a minor, a person of unsound mind, a femme sole [single woman], or a person absent from home in the military or naval service of the Confederacy."

February 17, 1864 - The Confederate Congress changes the requirement of the Twenty-Slave Law to fifteen able-bodied slaves and requires planters with exempted overseers to deliver one hundred pounds of bacon or its equivalent for every slave to the government and to sell his or her surplus to the government or to soldiers' families at government price

William Harris Brown is a native of Winston-Salem, North Carolina. His education includes a Bachelor of Arts degree in History from High Point College in 1984 and a Masters Degree in History from the University of North Carolina at Greensboro in 1987. He has served in the N.C. Office of Archives and History for twenty-six years. A Monumental Mystery: Bentonville Battlefield's Lost Confederate Soldiers

The March 1865 battle of Bentonville resulted in 4,200 casualties. Hundreds were killed while others were taken to field hospitals such as the John Harper home which was commandeered by the U.S. army. Although a Union hospital, fifty-four Confederate soldiers were treated by Federal surgeons in the home. The wounded Confederates were paroled by the Federals and left in the Harper's care after the battle. Twenty-three would die before the last wounded soldier was able to leave. Three of these soldiers were sent home for burial but the graves and even the identities of the twenty remaining soldiers who died in the house had become lost over the years. Confederates that died outright on the battlefield were buried in unmarked graves but it was assumed that the remains of the ones that died in the home received better care. Their exact fates however have been lost to time.

In 1895, a local militia company placed a monument on Harper property to 360 soldiers buried “here.” This inscription on the monument has led to the assumption that there is a mass grave near the memorial. In 2007, in conjunction with the History Channel, archaeologists used ground penetrating radar to search for a mass grave. No mass grave was ever found, but approximately twenty individual graves were discovered. This number corresponds with the Harper account, and a recently discovered 1895 photograph showing individual grave markers in the area. In 2011, tombstones were erected in the area for the twenty unknown Confederate soldiers that died in the home. A mass grave has yet to be found, and in all likelihood does not exist.

Derrick Brown shared his extensive knowledge of Bentonville battlefield with our membership. Hopefully, a Derrick led tour can be arraigned in the future.

 Trivia Questions for November *****

1 – What was a substitute? The April 16, 1862 law allowed an individual subject to conscription to hire a “replacement” – someone who was not normally subject service. This practice led to charges of “a rich man’s war, a poor man’s fight.”

2 – What were valid exemptions to conscription? Controversy surrounded what were valid exemptions and what experience what required to claim one. Examples of exemptions included:

national and state government employees, druggists, teachers, ministers, mine workers, industrial workers, and communication/transportation workers.

A Monumental Mystery: Bentonville Battlefield's Lost Confederate Soldiers

The March 1865 battle of Bentonville resulted in 4,200 casualties. Hundreds were killed while others were taken to field hospitals such as the John Harper home which was commandeered by the U.S. army. Although a Union hospital, fifty-four Confederate soldiers were treated by Federal surgeons in the home. The wounded Confederates were paroled by the Federals and left in the Harper's care after the battle. Twenty-three would die before the last wounded soldier was able to leave. Three of these soldiers were sent home for burial but the graves and even the identities of the twenty remaining soldiers who died in the house had become lost over the years. Confederates that died outright on the battlefield were buried in unmarked graves but it was assumed that the remains of the ones that died in the home received better care. Their exact fates however have been lost to time.

In 1895, a local militia company placed a monument on Harper property to 360 soldiers buried “here.” This inscription on the monument has led to the assumption that there is a mass grave near the memorial. In 2007, in conjunction with the History Channel, archaeologists used ground penetrating radar to search for a mass grave. No mass grave was ever found, but approximately twenty individual graves were discovered. This number corresponds with the Harper account, and a recently discovered 1895 photograph showing individual grave markers in the area. In 2011, tombstones were erected in the area for the twenty unknown Confederate soldiers that died in the home. A mass grave has yet to be found, and in all likelihood does not exist.

A Sneads Ferry, NC native, Derrick Brown graduated with a BS in history from Western Carolina University in 2003 and earned his MA in history from the University of North Carolina at Wilmington in 2010 (studying under Chris Fonvielle). His master’s thesis, “‘Foster Must Build Forts:’ The Failure of Union Offensive Strategy in Eastern North Carolina, 1862-1863,” focused on the Union occupation of New Bern and eastern North Carolina during the first half of the Civil War.

Derrick has worked at Bentonville Battlefield State Historic Site in Johnston County since 2006, serving as the Assistant Site Manager since 2009. Before starting at Bentonville, Derrick worked part-time at Fort Fisher State Historic Site in Kure Beach. He currently resides in Teachey, in Duplin County, with his wife Erin and daughter Haleigh.

Lee's Post-War Visit with his Tar Heels

The Curious Case of Mrs. Fannie White Garlick and Robert E. Lee: The Ring of Truth

Chris Meekins spun an interesting story of Robert E. Lee's visit to North Carolina in the Spring of 1870. Using a newspaper article that appeared in a Weldon paper in the late 1800s as a starting point, Chris painstakingly researched to ascertain whether Mrs. Fannie White Garlick had received a gold ring from General Lee during his visit.

On October 20, 1862, Annie Carter Lee, daughter of Robert E. Lee, died in Warren County. She had been ill with typhoid fever while visiting the Jones Springs resort there.

Lee sent both Annie and her sister Agnes to North Carolina in June 1862 when Union troops occupied their home in Arlington, Va. When Annie died it was not possible to take her body back to Arlington, which was then behind enemy lines. The owner of Jones Springs offered to have her body buried in his family cemetery and the Lees accepted.

Zearell Crowder, a Confederate soldier, created the 11-foot tall obelisk that marks her grave to this day. It was dedicated in a ceremony in 1866. The Lee family and the citizens of Warren County paid for the monument, and Robert E. Lee visited the grave in 1870.

In 1994, descendants of the Lee family had Annie's body removed from the Warren County grave and interred with the rest of the family at Washington and Lee Chapel in Virginia.

The obelisk remains in the Jones Family Cemetery located on Annie Lee Road.

Did Chris' research confirm the claims that Fannie recalled from that 1870 Lee visit to his daughter's grave? Had Lee given the two year old Fannie a small gold ring? Not to keep you hanging, but I wish all of you could have heard Chris' story.

Ok, Chris believed that the trail he followed did indeed support Fannie's story.

 Trivia Questions for October *****

1 -When was the Battle of Bentonville fought and why was it significant? The largest Civil War engagement in North Carolina, the Battle of Bentonville took place during 19-21 Mar. 1865 in rural Johnston County. The encounter was one of the Confederacy's last attempts to defeat the Union army before the South capitulated. With reports that Maj. Gen. William T. Sherman's 60,000-man army was marching toward Goldsboro in two columns, Gen. Joseph E. Johnston concentrated about 21,000 men near the community of Bentonville. His aim was to defeat the Union left wing before it could be reinforced by the right. Johnston thus hoped to prevent or delay Sherman's junction with Maj. Gen. John M. Schofield's Federal forces at Goldsboro.

When word of the battle reached Sherman late on 19 March, he sent the Union right wing under Maj. Gen. Oliver O. Howard to Slocum's support. Johnston redeployed his lines into a V to prevent being outflanked and to guard his only route of retreat. By 4:00 p.m. on 20 March, most of the Union right wing had reached Bentonville. Johnston was forced to deploy cavalry on his flanks to give the appearance of a strong front. Uncertain of Johnston's strength, Sherman decided against a general attack and instead ordered his subordinates to probe the Confederate defensive line. The Federal commander expected Johnston to retreat under cover of darkness, but dawn the next day revealed that the Confederates still held their entrenchments.

There was more intense skirmishing on 21 March despite the onset of heavy rain. During the afternoon, a Union attack nearly cut off Johnston's line of retreat before being repulsed by a hastily mounted Confederate counterattack. The Rebels thus escaped from Bentonville mainly because Sherman did not launch a general assault. That night the Confederates withdrew, removing as many of the wounded as possible, and returned to Smithfield. Lt. Gen. Wade Hampton's cavalry was ordered to cover the retreat, engaging in lively skirmishing with the Union forces. Total casualties at Bentonville were 1,527 Federals and 2,606 Confederates. After the battle, Sherman resumed the Union march toward Goldsboro, arriving there on 23 March.

2 – When was R.E. Lee's pardon approved?

On a spring day 140 years ago, Union Gen. Ulysses S. Grant and Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee met face to face in the parlor of Wilmer McLean's house in Appomattox Court House, Virginia. On that historic occasion, April 9, 1865, the two generals formalized the surrender of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia, thus bringing an end to four years of fighting between North and South.

After agreeing upon terms of the surrender, the generals each selected three officers to oversee the surrender and parole of Lee's army. Later that day, Lee and six of his staff signed a document granting their parole.

On May 29, 1865, President Andrew Johnson issued a Proclamation of Amnesty and Pardon to persons who had participated in the rebellion against the United States. There were fourteen excepted classes, though, and members of those classes had to make special application to the President.

Lee sent an application to Grant and wrote to President Johnson on June 13, 1865:

"Being excluded from the provisions of amnesty & pardon contained in the proclamation of the 29th Ultio; I hereby apply for the benefits, & full restoration of all rights & privileges extended to those included in its terms. I graduated at the Mil. Academy at West Point in June 1829. Resigned from the U.S. Army April '61. Was a General in the Confederate Army, & included in the surrender of the Army of N. Va. 9 April '65."

On October 2, 1865, the same day that Lee was inaugurated as president of Washington College in Lexington, Virginia, he signed his Amnesty Oath, thereby complying fully with the provision of Johnson's proclamation. But Lee was not pardoned, nor was his citizenship restored. And the fact that he had submitted an amnesty oath at all was soon lost to history.

More than a hundred years later, in 1970, an archivist at the National Archives discovered Lee's Amnesty Oath among State Department records (reported in Prologue, Winter 1970). Apparently Secretary of State William H. Seward had given Lee's application to a friend as a souvenir, and the State Department had pigeonholed the oath.

In 1975, Lee's full rights of citizenship were posthumously restored by a joint congressional resolution effective June 13, 1865.

At the August 5, 1975, signing ceremony, President Gerald R. Ford acknowledged the discovery of Lee's Oath of Allegiance in the National Archives and remarked: "General Lee's character has been an example to succeeding generations, making the restoration of his citizenship an event in which every American can take pride."

Lee's Post-War Visit with his Tar Heels

Recently much has been made about Lee's post war activities and his elevation to god-like status in the South. Chris Meekins will speak to our membership and guests about a supposed event that took place during Lee's 1870 visit to North Carolina. Chris will reveal another side of Lee during his last years.

In 1911, the Semicentennial of the American Civil War brought the war and the people who fought in it to the forefront. State and national events commemorated and celebrated the battles and the soldiers. Memories of the war and connections to battles and great men of the war were told and retold - some memories and celebrations were carved in stone. Amid the return of captured flags and the erecting of monuments, newspapers also ran stories of remembrances and connections to the war and the soldiers.

In an article in The Roanoke News (published in Weldon, N.C.), Mrs. Fannie White Garlic shared her alleged connection with no less a soldier than General Robert E. Lee. Garlic relates that Lee, a purported family friend, gave her a small token of affection (a gold ring) during his stay in NC in 1870. Details in the story, however, give one pause as to whether or not the incidents recounted are true. Come and listen as Chris Meekins unravels what he calls "The Curious Case of Mrs. Fannie White Garlic and General Robert E. Lee: The Ring of Truth?." We will examine her story and review Lee's time in NC. In the end we will determine if Mrs. Garlic will be remembered for her veracity or her audacity.

Chris Meekins holds an MA in History from NCSU. He has worked with the Department of Natural and Cultural Resources for more than 17 years, 13 of those as a Reference Archivist. Chris studies North Carolina History, the Civil War and African American History. He is currently president of the North Carolina Military Historical Society.

3- Bill Jayne has taken the position as the Vice-President of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

Bill retired from the Federal government on December 31, 2010 after more than 30 years of service. He spent most of his career in the National Cemetery Administration (NCA), one of three operating elements of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs.

From 1990 to 2010, working in public affairs, state cemetery grants and NCA construction management, he had a role in the establishment of more than 50 new veterans cemeteries across the country.

He was born and raised in the Hudson Valley of New York State and graduated from Highland High School in Ulster County in 1964, earning a New York State Regents Scholarship. He enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps in 1966 and served in Vietnam with the 1st Battalion, 26th Marine Regiment, 3rd Marine Division during the Khe Sanh campaign of 1968. He received the Purple Heart and the Presidential Unit Citation and was honorably discharged from the Marine Corps in 1968.

His interest in the Civil War began with Memorial Day parades in the 1950s that stopped at two Civil War memorials in the small village of Highland for wreath-laying ceremonies and speeches. A high school trip to Gettysburg and reading Lee's Lieutenants one warm summer intensified that interest. Finally, working in the National Cemetery Administration, an arm of the government that was founded as a direct result of the Civil War, deepened that interest.

The Earth is Weeping: The Epic Story of the Indian Wars for the American West

Peter Cozzens shared the findings contained in his latest book. He described the era as “an epoch shrouded in myth.” The Regular Army and the Indian Wars were uniquely affected by mythology: Good versus Evil. From the 1850s until Wounded Knee in the 1890s, the Army was the White Knight seeking to destroy evil – the movie She Wore a Yellow Ribbon with John Wayne reflected that view. During the 1970s, the pendulum on who was good and who was evil swung: Dee Brown’s Bury my Heart at Wounded Knee and the movie, Dances with Wolves, changed the public’s perception to an Army tasked with extermination of the Indians.

Cozzens stated that three myths affected perceptions: 1) The Army was hell-bent on its mission to conquer the West; 2) The U.S. Government official policy called for the extermination of the indigenous people; 3) The Indian tribes were united in their resistance to invasion of their territories. Cozzens proceeded to de-myth these three items one by one.

General William T. Sherman remarked, “We do our duty according to our means.” The Army was tasked to protect a huge area in the West. Sherman blasted his critics for their failure to understand that there were too few troops for such a large job. Congress did not help the Army – they voted to reduce troop levels from 54,000 in 1869 to 25,000 in 1876.

General George Cook did not like his job. Crook thought that the Indians were usually in the right in disputes with the White man. Adding to the territorial tensions and the ability of the Indians to feed their families, buffalo hunters killed millions of buffalo. Crook also acknowledged that when the Indians saw their families starving, they went to war. General John Pope proposed helping the Indians exterminate the buffalo hunters. Pope realized that, “Indians, like white men, are not reconciled to starve peacefully.”

There was no official government policy to exterminate the Indian tribes. Most Army officers desired to Christianize and make farmers of the Indians. President Grant appointed Ely Parker, a Seneca Indian and former staff member, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs. (With the exception of the Lakota Indians and Black Hills gold, Grant desired peace with the Indian tribes.)

The various Indian tribes never united to systematically oppose the Army. Some tribes supported the Army; other tribes fought the Army and intrusion of white settlers until late in the 19th century.

The Army and the U.S. Government did break many promises. An elderly Lakota chief remembered the events that had transpired. “The [government] made us many promises,” he told a white friend, “more than I can remember, but they kept but one; they promise to take our land, and they took it.”

* Trivia Questions for September *******

1 – What occupation did Robert E. Lee pursue after the war? Lee became president of Washington College in Lexington, Virginia. As he had done in 1861, Lee remained in Virginia and shared its fate. He wrote to the college trustees that he believed, “it is the duty of every citizen, in the present condition of the Country, to do all in his power to aid in the restoration of peace and harmony.”

Source: vahistorical.org, accessed September 6, 2017.

2 – Which newspaper called for Lee to be trialed for treason? Who defended Lee against those charges of treason? The New York Times was a major proponent of seeking treason charges against Lee. In a NYT editorial on June 4, 1865, “He levied war against the United States more strenuously than any man in the land, and thereby has been specially guilty of the crime of treason, as defined in the Constitution of the United States.” President Andrew Johnson supported charges against the Confederate generals. On June 7, 1865, District Judge John C. Underwood in Norfolk, Virginia, issued indictments against Lee, James Longstreet, Jubal Early and others.

U.S. Grant stepped forward to defend Lee and the others. Grant had included a provision in the Appomattox terms of surrender that the conquered could return to their homes and if they abided the terms of their paroles, “not to be disturbed by United States Authority.” Grant interceded with President Johnson. Grant offered to resign his commission if the terms of surrender were not honored. In June 1865, U.S. Grant was the most popular man in the United States. Johnson bowed to Grant’s arguments//threats. Fearing public opinion, Johnson soon sent word to Judge Underwood ordering that the proceedings be dropped.

* National Cemetery Administration *******

Bill Jayne prepared the following article to explain the NCA.

FEDERAL STEWARDSHIP OF THE CONFEDERATE DEAD

The National Cemetery Administration (NCA) is one of three operating bureaus in the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA). The Veterans Health Administration manages the hospitals and clinics and other health programs, and the Veterans Benefits Administration manages programs such as disability compensation, educational benefits and the home loan program.

NCA is much the smallest of the three administrations and it also the newest to VA, having been established in 1973 when most of the national cemeteries were transferred from the Army to VA. Yet, NCA was the first of the three organizations to establish a historian's office and that office has accomplished some very important work.

One of the newest projects to be completed by the NCA History Program is an on-line publication called Federal Stewardship of Confederate Dead. The publication is 311 pages long, contains 233 photographs, maps and drawings and 12 illustrations of various Confederate flags. It's an excellent reference work and it can be easily downloaded at <https://www.cem.va.gov/cem/history/index.asp>

The work evolved out of a historic resource study that NCA initiated in 2008 as one of several activities to commemorate the Civil War sesquicentennial. The basic purpose of the project was to compile primary historic information about a significant group of NCA properties—the Confederate cemeteries and memorial sites as well as the Confederate burials within national cemeteries that were established for the burial of Union dead.

A contractor, Labat Environmental, Inc., completed the book project with most of the research accomplished by Joseph E. Brent and Maria Campbell Brent located appropriately enough in the historic border state town of Versailles, Kentucky.

The photographs, maps and diagrams are outstanding. It's easy to put a personal spin on a written statement but a period photograph provides a powerful and objective piece of evidence. The photograph below shows the prisoner of war camp at Camp Morton in Indianapolis during the winter of 1864. A Union Army surgeon wrote a scathing report of the conditions at Camp Morton in October 1863 and a new superintendent was appointed but in spite of adequate supplies of food, good water and wooden barracks, disease was rampant and approximately 1,763 prisoners died at Camp Morton.

Figure 86. Camp Morton prison camp at Indianapolis, winter 1864. The ditch (foreground) was an unnamed creek the prisoners called the "Potomac." Library of Congress.

The study focuses on 18 cemetery facilities with more than 400 burials each. Arlington National Cemetery plays an important role in the study but it's not one of the 18 covered in depth because Arlington National Cemetery was retained by the Army in 1973 when almost all of the other national cemeteries—and Confederate cemeteries—were transferred to VA.

NCA also tasked the authors of the study with providing answers to some specific questions including the use of individual headstones versus group memorials and verification of the number of Confederate dead interred in each of the sites in the study. NCA also asked the authors to address the question of commemorative activities such as Memorial Day ceremonies and the use of Confederate flags at the sites.

The study is organized into two sections: Part I addresses the “Historic Context” of the Confederate burial sites, specifically trying to answer the questions “how and why some Confederate soldiers came to be interred in national cemeteries and others in private or community cemeteries, and who authorized them.” Part II is a compilation of histories of the individual sites. These are not brief summaries, but rather essays averaging about 10 pages each that cover each site in greater depth than I have seen in any other publication.

Both sections are well footnoted, making this study an extremely valuable research tool. A detailed 25-page bibliography contributes to the research value of this work.

The Earth is Weeping: The Epic Story of the Indian Wars for the American West

To introduce Peter Cozzens and his current book, I choose to begin at the end of his story. His book spans some 467 pages of conflict between numerous characters, both native born warriors and Union officers of Civil War fame. You are familiar with some of the names and events that shaped our history: Red Cloud, Hancock, Sitting Bull, Little Big Horn, Sherman, Crazy Horse, Sheridan, Cochise, Custer, Chief Joseph, Terry, Geronimo, Crook, Wounded Knee Creek, etc. Probably what all of us know about this period involves old movies, television shows, and some early books. Cozzens changes the perception from accepted myths to established facts.

One elderly Lakota chief who had witnessed the march of events from the Treaty of Fort Laramie in 1851 to the tragedy at Wounded Knee four decades later saw nothing remarkable in what had transpired. “The [government] made us many promises,” he told a white friend, “more than I can remember, but they never kept but one; they promise to take our land, and they took it.”

We will be in for a treat. An amazing chapter in the growth of the United States will be shared with our membership.

Salisbury Prison

Baseball during the early days

Dr. Gary Freeze

Dr. Gary Freeze shared the details of the Confederate Salisbury Prison from 1861-1865. The prison was established in 1861 to house approximately 1,000 Union officers until they could be paroled. Salisbury was also used to house 30 dissent Quakers and 300 Virginian Unionist. When Grant stopped prisoner exchanges, the number of prisoners exceeded 10,000 men between August and December 1864. Many prisoners died as conditions became increasingly critical. On November 28, 1864, the prisoners attempted escape that resulted in the death of 3 guards and 16 prisoners. The prison was destroyed during Stoneman's Raid during April 1865.

 Trivia Questions for May *****

1 – Who was considered to be the U.S. Army’s greatest Indian fighter? George Crook.(1828-1890). Crook developed a respect for his Indian opponents. The Lakota chief Red Cloud praised Crook, “[He] never lied to us. His word gave the people hope.”

Source: pbs.org. accessed May 5, 2017.

2 – “The white man never lived who loved an Indian, and no true Indian ever lived that did not hate the white man.” Who is attributed with this quote? Sitting Bull, Hunkpapa Lakota chief and holy man expressed this thought.

Source: The Earth is Weeping, Cozzens.

3 – The Confederate Salisbury Prison was a “good” facility for prisoners until what event caused the number of prisoners to exceed the facilities ability to efficiently function? In 1864, U. S. Grant suspended the exchange program that allows captured soldiers to be exchanged.

4 – How many prisoners died at Salisbury? Approximately 5,000 died as a result of the conditions at Salisbury.

Salisbury Prison

Dr. Gary R. Freeze will present a look at the Confederate prisoner of war camp that was located in Salisbury, North Carolina. The Confederate government will use a former textile mill, Maxwell Chambers mill, as the prison for Union soldiers captured during the course of the war.

The prison will be designed to hold 2,500 men; however, that number will be increased as the battles of 1864 will be fought. As the number of prisoners increased, the prison conditions will deteriorate and result in the deaths of many Union soldiers.

Dr. Freeze has taught at Catawba College since 1994 where his specialties have included North Carolina history, the Civil War and the American South. Dr. Freeze received his B.A., M.A. and PH.D. at UNC - Chapel Hill. While studying at UNC, Freeze served as a Teaching Assistant (TA) for imminent state historian, William S. Powell.

* February Program *******

An Evening with Rose O'Neal Greenhow: Confederate Spy

Rose O'Neal Greenhow was born in Maryland in 1813, 1814 or 1817. As a teenager, Rose moved from rural Maryland to live in her aunt's Washington D.C. boardinghouse. Rose was thrilled with the interactions with the many notables who called the fashionable boardinghouse their home while Congress was in session.

In 1835, Rose married Dr. Robert Greenhow, a physician and academic who had served in the State Department for over 20 years. Greenhow had served through the administrations of seven presidents. Rose's marriage to Dr. Greenhow gave her the opportunity to become Washington's "hostess with the mostest." She had earlier known John C. Calhoun, former Vice President and Secretary of State, and ardent supporter of the slave-plantation system. Through Greenhow's circle of friends, Rose became acquainted with men such as Martin Van Buren, James Buchanan and Jefferson Davis.

After Dr. Greenhow's accidental death in San Francisco during February 1854, Rose sought to keep and expand her circle of friends among Washington's elite and "want-to-be-elites." These friendships became the basis for Rose's evolution into a source of Union activities after the Civil War began in early 1861. Rose's strong belief in the slave-plantation system that existed in the Southern states influenced her decisions to do all in her power to aid the Southern cause.

 Trivia Questions for February *****

- 1 – How many children did Rose have during her 19 year marriage to Dr. Greenhow?
- 2 – Who did Rose consider to be her mentor and guide to the issue of slavery during the pre-war period?
- 3 – Who did Rose send an encrypted message to that alerted the Confederates of the march of Union troops out of Washington to attack the rebel forces in Northern Virginia?
- 4 – Who was Major E.J. Allen and what was his connect to Rose O’Neal Greenhow?
- 5- Who was 3rd Lt. Joseph D. Wilson?
- 6- Where is Rose O’Neal Greenhow buried?

 The Rose – Femme Fatale ***

Rose attracted men like bees to a hive. Her admirers included Senators, soldiers – Unionists, Southern sympathizers – abolitionists, Pro-slavery proponents. Rose gathered information that she would use in future events. Abolitionist Republican Senator Henry D. Wilson, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and future Vice President, was supposedly smitten in spite of Rose’s secessionist proclivities. Union Colonel Erasmus Keyes described Rose as “one of the most persuasive women that was ever known in Washington.” Senator Stephen Mallory, future Confederate Secretary of the Navy, remarked that Rose “hunted man with that resistless zeal and unfailing instinct she had a shaft in her quiver for every defense which game might attempt.”

Too Many Contingencies: The Attack on New Bern, 1864

By early 1862, Union control of eastern North Carolina was centered in New Bern. General John G. Foster had built a system of forts and blockhouses to provide defenses for the area.

Robert E. Lee wanted to retake eastern North Carolina to protect the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad and to secure food for the Army of Northern Virginia. Lee was to release troops for the retaking of New Bern in January 1864. George Pickett, of Gettysburg fame, was to be in command of the four pronged attack. The Confederate Army forces were split into three separate columns: Robert Hoke, Seth Barton and James Dearing commanded these attacking forces. John Taylor Wood commanded naval forces that were to capture a Union gunboat to provide support for the combined attack.

Hoke was to attack from the west, Barton from the south, and Dearing was to attack Fort Anderson on the north side of the Neuse River. Barton and Dearing deemed their area of attack to be too strongly defended to be successfully attacked. Hoke attacked and had some success. Without support from Barton and Dearing, Hoke could not take the town. Wood boarded and took control of the USS Underwriter; however, the ship's boiler were out. Wood had to abandon and burn the Underwriter.

Pickett did not aggressively push Barton or Dearing to attack their objectives. Pickett saw too many contingencies for further attacks and canceled the last campaign to recapture New Bern..

* Trivia Questions for February *******

1 – How many children did Rose have during her 19 year marriage to Dr. Greenhow? Eight children came of their union. By the start of the Civil War, five of these children and their father had passed. Three daughters survived – only eight year old “Little Rose” was still living at home.

Source: Karen Abbott, Liars, Temptress, Soldiers, Spy: Four Women Undercover in the Civil War

2 – Who did Rose consider to be her mentor and guide to the issue of slavery during the pre-war period? South Carolinian John C. Calhoun. Calhoun, along with Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and Andrew Jackson, dominated the American political scene from 1815 until 1850.

Calhoun was responsible for many of the strong beliefs that Rose held dear to her core.

3 – Who did Rose send an encrypted message to that alerted the Confederates of the march of Union troops out of Washington to attack the rebel forces in Northern Virginia?

General P.G.T. Beauregard at Manassas received advance notice that Union General Irvin McDowell, with 55,000 troops, was headed toward Beauregard's positions.

Rose's message gave time for the reinforcement of Beauregard's army by Joseph E. Johnston's troops then stationed in the Shenandoah Valley. Rose's timely actions helped the Confederates turn a hard fought Battle of Manassas into a victory for the Southern cause.

4 – Who was Major E.J. Allen and what was his connect to Rose O'Neal Greenhow? E.J. Allen was the name Allan Pinkerton used as head of General George McClellan's private detective service. Famous for his investigations of railroad robberies, Allan Pinkerton, had offered his services to the Lincoln administration to secure knowledge of Confederate movements and their spy networks. Rose O'Neal Greenhow was among his first assignments. Pinkerton's efforts led to Rose's constant surveillance and finally to her imprisonment.

5- Who was 3rd Lt. Joseph D. Wilson? Joseph “Fighting Joe” Wilson served under the command of Raphael Semmes, captain of the CSS Alabama, during the famous naval engagement off Cherbourg, France. Wilson had been taken prisoner when the Alabama had been sunk during the fight with the USS Kearsarge.

James Mason, Confederate diplomat in Britain, suggested to Semmes that if anyone could secure Lt. Wilson’s release, it would be Rose Greenhow.

Rose, who had been sent to Europe at the request of Jefferson Davis, accepted Semmes’ challenge and hurried to the United States Embassy to call upon Charles Francis Adams, U.S. Minister to the Court of S. James. Rose used Semmes’ previous release of 250 Union prisoners as the basis of her request for humane treatment for the Lt. Within four days of her visit to Adams, Wilson was granted his release.

The twenty-two year old Wilson was grateful to his rescuer. Joseph and Rose became companions during Rose’s last days in Britain. Wilson was with Rose aboard the blockade runner Condor and in the row boat that tossed Rose to her death in the surf off Fort Fisher in October 1864.

6- Where is Rose O’Neal Greenhow buried? After a wake in the chapel of Hospital No.4 and a service in St. Thomas of the Apostle church, Rose was laid to rest in Wilmington’s Oakdale Cemetery.

CSS Albemarle and the Battle of Plymouth

Andrew Duppstadt provided details of the history of the Civil War as it played out in Eastern North Carolina. The April 1864 effort to recapture this resource rich area was commanded by North Carolinian, General Robert F. Hoke. Hoke's attack to recapture Plymouth was supported by approximately 10,000 Confederate soldiers and the iron clad CSS Albemarle.

Andrew Duppstadt

The Confederate actions proved to be the most successful joint army/navy expedition of the war. With the aid of the Albemarle and much hard fighting, Hoke forced the surrender of Union General Wessells' command on April 20, 1864. The Albemarle, commanded by Cmd. James W. Cooke, fought and defeated the Union ships, Southfield and Miami; hence, the Confederates gained control of the land and waters around Plymouth.

The Albemarle was to fight more of the Union fleet in Albemarle Sound on May 5th. The Confederates won a costly victory, but the Albemarle was forced to return to Plymouth for extensive repairs. With the damage to the iron clad, Hoke's attempt to retake New Bern was effectively ended.

Andrew continued his story with the final fate of the Albemarle.

 Trivia Questions for January *****

1 – Who proposed the Confederate strike against the Union forces occupying New Berne? Why was February 1864 scheduled for the attack against Union army and navy forces? Robert E. Lee. The Army of Northern Virginia was short of rations. The Union occupation of Eastern North Carolina deprived the Confederacy of a bountiful breadbasket that could provision the ANV.

The Confederacy was an agricultural nation that could not feed itself. Too many fields were uncultivated. Cotton may have been KING at the beginning of the war, but the general population and the military could not eat cotton.

2 – Who led the Confederate navy's assault on New Bern? My favorite Confederate officer, John Taylor Wood, led the navy's assault. Wood was the grandson of former President Zachary Taylor. Was John Taylor Wood the Forrest Gump of his day? Was it mere chance that Wood was at Hampton Roads on March 9, 1862 (CSS Virginia vs. USS Monitor), at Drewry's Bluff on May 15, 1862, aboard the USS Satellite in August 1863, aboard the USS Underwriter at New Berne in February 1864, aboard the CSS Tallahassee in August 1864, or with Jefferson Davis on the "unfortunate day" in Georgia on May 10, 1865?

Lieutenant George W. Gift wrote of the February 1864 New Berne expedition:

I was with Wood in his late expedition to New Berne, N.C., which resulted in the cutting-out and destruction of the U.S. gunboat Underwriter. It was a bold design and well executed, and Wood deserves much credit. All is due to him and Loyall, as the bulk of the work fell upon the two leading boats. I am all admiration for Wood. He is modesty personified, conceives boldly and executes with skill and courage.

Modesty personified was a phrase little used to refer to men who risked all in expeditions to strike at their enemies.

3 – While trying to run the blockade on October 1, 1864, Rose O'Neal Greenhow drown when the small boat carrying her and several others capsized in the rough surf off Fort Fisher. Who discovered her body? Who discovered her gold coins? Greenhow was a passenger on the blockade runner Condor as she was returning from a diplomatic mission to try to influence England and France to the Southern cause. She carried diplomatic dispatches and, importantly to her, 400 gold sovereigns, the royalties for her memoirs that she intended to donate to a Southern Relief Fund. She kept the coins in a bag secured around her neck.

Greenhow had been imprisoned twice previously by the Federal government. When the Condor ran aground trying to avoid the beached blockade runner Night Hawk, Greenhow feared capture and the return to prison or a fate much worse. Captain Hewitt twice said no to her pleas to be put ashore. After two crewmen volunteered to row ashore, Hewitt relented. Rose was accompanied by her paramour - Lt. Wilson, Judge Holcombe, the Condor's pilot with his puppy and the crewman. The boat capsized. The others and the puppy survived by swimming back to the boat and clinging to the keel.

Thomas Taylor, the cargo manager of the wrecked Night Hawk, found Greenhow's body on the beach the next morning. Taylor ordered a group of slaves to take Rose's body to Colonel William Lamb's house where Daisy Lamb prepared the body for transport to Wilmington.

J.J. Prosper For Me D. Doctor Duval Connor, a Confederate sentry on duty as dawn broke on October 2nd, found the coin bag that had been around Rose's neck. The three feet eleven inch tall sentry turned the gold in to his superior's when he discovered who had owned the gold coins.

4 – Who built the CSS Albemarle? Gilbert Elliott, a 19 year old soldier. It's a long story.

The Fall of Richmond: April 1865

Bert Dunkerly provided the events in Richmond as they occurred from April 2 - April 4 as the capital of the Confederacy fell to fires, rioters and occupying Union troops.

Grant’s breakthrough at Petersburg on April 2nd necessitated Robert E. Lee to inform Jefferson Davis that the evacuation of Richmond needed to begin. Efforts had begun; however, papers, tobacco warehouses, Confederate navy ships, and other materials that could not be moved had to be destroyed. High winds and drunken rioters did the rest.

General Godfrey Weitzel directed Union forces into the city to claim the prize so long desired by the Union government. Lincoln’s visit to the city on April 4th allowed Lincoln to witness his victory.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – Where was the CSS Albemarle built and who was its chief builder? The CSS Albemarle was built in a corn field along the Roanoke River near Scotland Neck, North Carolina. John Luke Porter, Chief Naval Constructor, C.S. Navy, designed the 152 foot vessel to have a draft of eight feet and a tonnage of 376. It was Gilbert Elliott, a 19 year old army officer, who was selected by Confederate Secretary of Navy, Stephen Mallory, to construct the ironclad in an unlikely and difficult location.

Elliot's task was made difficult by shortages of nearly all materials required to construct an ironclad. His accomplishments made fascinating reading as he scraped together workmen and materials to complete work on one of the Confederacy's most successful warships.

Source: Ironclad of the Roanoke: Gilbert Elliot's Albemarle, Robert G. Elliott, White Mane Publishing Company, Shippensburg, PA, 1994.

2 - The CSS Albemarle was instrumental in the Confederate army's recapture of what town? Who commanded the Confederate army at this victory? If you were paying attention, you know that Plymouth was the answer to the first question. North Carolinian, Robert F. Hoke, commanded the recapture of the Union-held city on April 20, 1864. The Albemarle sank one Union ship and drove off another; hence, ensuring the Confederate victory.

Source: Ironclad of the Roanoke: Gilbert Elliot's Albemarle, Robert G. Elliott, White Mane Publishing Company, Shippensburg, PA, 1994.

3 – Who was a controversial commander of the Albemarle who never got to take her against the Union fleet? John Newland Maffitt. Maffitt was controversial because of his aggressiveness in attacking the Union fleet at every opportunity. The Confederate army opposed Maffitt because they desired the Albemarle to protect eastern North Carolina against future Union naval expeditions. The army was afraid that losing the ironclad in aggressive actions would result in loss of the waters in all of eastern North Carolina that had been gained with the recapture of Plymouth.

Maffitt was relieved of command of the ram on September 9, 1864. He was ordered to Wilmington to take command of the blockade runner Owl.

Source: Ironclad of the Roanoke: Gilbert Elliot's Albemarle, Robert G. Elliott, White Mane Publishing Company, Shippensburg, PA, 1994.

4 – What was the fate of the Albemarle? Who commanded the ironclad on October 28, 1864? Who led the Union efforts to capture or destroy the ironclad? At about 3:00AM on October 28, 1864, a Union launch, commanded by Lt. William B. Cushing, successfully exploded a torpedo against the Albemarle. The ironclad sank in the shallow waters of the Roanoke River at Plymouth.

Lt. Alexander F. Warley was the third and final commander of the Albemarle.

Source: Ironclad of the Roanoke: Gilbert Elliot's Albemarle, Robert G. Elliott, White Mane Publishing Company, Shippensburg, PA, 1994.

5 – What ban was issued by the mayor of Richmond when the evacuation was ordered on April 2, 1865? Mayor Joseph C. Mayo issued an order to destroy all alcoholic stores in the capital. Mayo ordered this action to prevent potential rioters from being fueled by this stimulant. Mayo's ban was unsuccessful – potential rioters drank the alcohol as it ran to the gutters. And the city burned.

The Changing Face of the Civil War: Has the War the Keeps on Giving Given Out?

The Chicago Civil War Round Table was founded on December 3, 1940. The speaker at its first meeting was Percival G. Hart and his subject was “Stonewall Jackson’s Valley Campaign.” Founder Ralph G. Newman stated the purpose of the group was to study the Civil War and the Great Emancipator. From that small beginning with sixteen attendees, Civil War Round Table discussion groups expanded to hundreds of groups scattered throughout the United States and around the world.

Dr. Chris Fonvielle, past President of the CFCWRT, led a spirited discussion of the current status of Round Tables. Are Round Tables dying or has the general population just lost interest in military history and the leaders of that period? Are younger people just not interested in the war or are they embarrassed by aspects of slavery that defined that period? How should the discussion of our founding fathers and later leaders be judged today? Dr. Fonvielle stated that many of his students seem to define that period with, “Ya’ll lost the war; get over it.”

I was absent from the October meeting, but Linda Lashley provided me with voluminous notes on the many subjects that were discussed. Where will the current focus on race, gender and politics take Round Tables? As always, history will decide.

 Trivia Questions for November *****

1 – On April 4, 1865, Abraham Lincoln visited the city Richmond. Who accompanied Lincoln on his visit? Lincoln arrived on the USS Malvern accompanied by his son, Tad, and Admiral David Dixon Porter.

Lincoln's assassination, less than a week following Lee's surrender, ensured that the events of the previous week would forever remain mysterious. Hundreds of fanciful, romantic, and second-hand accounts gained traction in the public mind, causing even Lincoln's first historians to throw up their hands in frustration at the lack of similarity in the accounts of his Richmond visit. Over time, the event faded from public memory. Interest returned on April 5, 2003, when the National Park Service unveiled a statue at the Historic Tredegar Iron Works commemorating Lincoln's 1865 visit to Richmond. The life-sized sculpture by Louis Frech features the President and his son Tad, resting on a bench in front of the words "To Bind up the Nation's Wounds" - a phrase taken from Lincoln's second inaugural address.

2 – What happened to the Confederate treasury and its gold and silver? Who really knows? This is a question that maybe Bert can answer.

3 – Did the Confederate States of America ever receive recognition from any other country? The CSA never gained recognition as a legitimate nation from any nation.

One of the most overlooked facts of the American Civil War Era is the sympathy the South gained from Europe's most influential monarch - the pope of Rome.

Pope Pius IX never actually signed any kind of alliance or 'statement of support' with the Confederate States of America, but to those who understand the nuance of papal protocol, what he did do was quite astonishing. He acknowledged President Jefferson Davis as the "Honorable President of the Confederate States of America."

From this we can glean three things about Pope Pius IX...

1. He called Jefferson Davis by the customary title "Honorable."
2. He acknowledged him as president of a nation.
3. In doing so, he (at least on a personal level) effectively recognized the Confederate States of America as a sovereign entity, separate from the United States of America.

* Thoughts *******

Many years ago, I attended a company school in Atlanta, Georgia. Among the many attendees was a student from Wisconsin. During an after-hours bull-session, she asked why we Southerners were so preoccupied with the history of that long ago Civil War. I had a simple reply: "Because, we didn't burn your house down." I know that was just too simple an answer. Since the first two Round Tables were founded in Chicago and Milwaukee, others, in addition to us burnout Southerners, must have had an interest in the late unpleasantness also.

There are all kinds of reasons why people are and will continue to have interest in the Civil War. If you interested in history, it is important to you; if you are not interested in history, it will never be important to you.

"Those that fail to learn from history, are doomed to repeat it."

* Recommendation *******

Peter Cozzens' The Earth is Weeping: The Epic Story of the Indian Wars for the American West has recently been released. Cozzens' book covered the many episodes (1862-1891) that followed the consequence of the American expansion into this vast area.

Of special interest to Civil War enthusiasts, Cozzens follows the careers of many Union officers after the war. Sherman, Sheridan, Crook, Miles, Terry, Gibbon, Custer and many others fill the pages of this book. If you only know of Custer's Last Stand, you have much to learn about these men and their Indian adversaries.

Of special interest to CFCWRT members, Peter Cozzens will be the speaker at our May 2017 meeting.

The Changing Face of the Civil War: Has the War the Keeps on Giving Given Out?

Dr. Chris Fonvielle will host a Round Table discussion of the past history, current status, and future place for Civil War Round Tables in today's environment. This meeting will be a little different than our usual “lecture” formats – bring your questions, concerns, or a desired path of Civil War history.

With the completion of the 150th Anniversary of the American Civil War, many Round Tables have seen a drop in their memberships. Why has interest waned? Has Military History taken a back seat to social history? NOTE: The Brunswick Civil War Round Table represented one BIG exception to declining membership.

Dr. Fonvielle is past president of the CFCWRT. He teaches history at the UNCW and is the acknowledged expert on the Civil War in the Cape Fear Region.

No Such Army Since the Days of Julius Caesar: Sherman's Carolinas Campaign from Fayetteville to Averagesboro

Sherman

Hardee

Slocum

Wade Sokolsky described the march of Sherman's army into North Carolina. When Sherman cut loose from Savannah to head to Virginia, his engineers and bummers allowed his 66,000 troops to advance 10 to 13 miles per day over an extremely difficult country-side. Sherman's rapid pace presented the Confederates with a difficult situation to consolidate forces to oppose his advance. Wade described what it was like to be "in Sherman's path." Confederate General Hardee left Charleston with 12,000 men – his was a troop of garrison men who averaged 6 miles a day as he raced Sherman to Fayetteville, North Carolina. Hardee arrived first; however, he arrived first but with only 6,500 soldiers

Confederate General Joe Johnston had the difficult task of contesting Sherman's march. Johnston had limited resources and no clear idea exactly where Sherman was headed – Raleigh or Goldsboro. Since Sherman marched his army in two separate wings, Johnston believed if one wing could be delayed on their march he had a chance against his opponent. Hardee tried to slow Sherman's left wing at Averasboro. Johnston formed his plan for the battle of Bentonville only after Hardee was successful at Averasboro.

* Trivia Questions for October *******

1 – When and where was the first Civil War Round Table founded? The Chicago Civil War Round Table was founded on December 3, 1940. The speaker at its first meeting was Percival G. Hart and his subject was "Stonewall Jackson's Valley Campaign." Founder Ralph G. Newman stated the purpose of the group was to study the Civil War and the Great Emancipator. From that small beginning with sixteen attendees, Civil War Round Table discussion groups expanded to hundreds of groups scattered throughout the United States and around the world.

2 – How was Sherman's Army able to travel so quickly from Savannah to North Carolina? Sherman's engineers built bridges over flooded creeks, swamps and rivers at an amazing rate. They lived up to the "No such Army since the days of Caesar." Also of much assistance, his bummers sucked the country-side dry as the army moved north toward Grant's army in Virginia.

No Such Army Since the Days of Julius Caesar: Sherman's Carolinas Campaign from Fayetteville to Averasboro

Join us as Colonel Wade Sokolosky (U.S. Army Retired) provides a detailed examination of Union and Confederate actions that lead up to the largest Civil War battle to take place in North Carolina – the Battle of Bentonville. Wade covers these actions as Sherman's 60,000 man army moves against Confederate forces between the period from March 11-16, 1865; from the capture of Fayetteville to the Confederate delaying actions at the Battle of Averasboro.

Sherman

Hardee

Slocum

At Averasboro, Confederate General William J. Hardee's 6,500 man force was to delay the left wing of the Union General Henry W. Slocum to give the Confederates time to gather their scattered forces at Bentonville. Hardee had two objectives for his actions at Averasboro. The first objective was to determine if Sherman's left wing was moving toward Raleigh or Goldsboro – it was going toward Goldsboro by way of Bentonville. The second objective was to lengthen the distance between the two wings of Sherman's army so the concentrated Confederate forces at Bentonville could destroy Slocum's left wing before the Oliver O. Howard's right wing could come to Slocum's relief.

Wade was born and grew-up in the coastal town of Beaufort, North Carolina. His interest in the Civil War began early as his Grandmother shared stories about a family member who served at the nearby Fort Macon. Wade graduated from East Carolina University in 1986. Wade entered the U.S. Army and spent 25 years on active duty. His real serious study of Sherman and the Civil War (and especially the Carolinas Campaign) began when he was stationed at Fort Campbell, Kentucky in 1988.

Wade is co-author (with Mark A. Smith) of No Such Army Since the Days of Julius Caesar: Sherman's Carolinas Campaign from Fayetteville to Averasboro, and To Prepare for Sherman's Coming: The Battle of Wise's Forks, March 1865.

 Trivia Questions for September *****

1 – Which units initiated the battle at Averasboro? Cavalry units commanded by Hugh Judson Kilpatrick led Slocum's left wing as it advanced on the Raleigh Plank Road from Fayetteville toward Averasboro. Joseph Wheeler's Confederate cavalry resisted the Union advance. This initial fighting began the battle.

2 – Two officers – one Union and one Confederate – lost their boots during this phase of the Carolinas Campaign. Who were they? Captain William F. Duncan, Company F, 10th Illinois Cavalry was chief of scouts for Slocum's wing of Sherman's army. Duncan was an experienced soldier who had led many exciting raids during Sherman's march through Georgia, South Carolina and into North Carolina. His luck ran out when he encountered Wade Hampton's cavalry in Fayetteville. Duncan lost the skirmish, his coat, and his boots to his foe.

Colonel Alfred M. Rhett was a member of a first family of Charleston, South Carolina. A Harvard graduate who had commanded Confederate garrison troops in Charleston during the entire war. Rhett left the comfort of garrison life when he joined Hardee's force as it abandoned Charleston on Sherman's advance.

Rhett was at Averasboro when he rode his thoroughbred horse into a group he thought to be Confederates. Rhett realized his mistake when one of the group pointed his carbine at Rhett's ear and informed Rhett he was the prisoner of Captain Theo Northrup of Kilpatrick's command. Kilpatrick welcomed Rhett to his mess that evening but Rhett's arrogance made a poor impression on the Union officers. The next morning Kilpatrick received word that some of his men had been captured by the Confederates and had been mistreated. Rhett was relieved of his thoroughbred horse and his fine pair of riding boots. Rhett never got his horse back, but the boots were returned. Rhett's boots were too small for any of his captors; however, the boots caused Rhett considerable discomfort as Kilpatrick forced Rhett to walk the 45 miles to Goldsboro.

Source: Fayetteville Observer, March 4, 1999.

3 – Who introduced the first bill to create a “medals of honor?” On December 9, 1861, Iowa Senator James W. Grimes introduced a bill in the U.S. Senate to authorize a special Navy Medal of Honor to promote the efficiency of that service. On February 17, 1862, Massachusetts Senator Henry Wilson introduced a bill for an Army Medal of Honor.

An Evening with Mrs. Thomas “Stonewall” Jackson: Reflected Glory: Letters to Anna

While some people will find history as nothing more than the boring repetition of dull, cold and little cared-about facts, those members and guests who will be in attendance at our February dinner meeting will be treated to a special performance. Kelly Hinson will “share” the personal letters that Stonewall Jackson had written to his wife during the war.

Be forewarned, a tear will appear in many an eye (or at least a lump in several throats). For a while on this Thursday evening, history will become entertainment of the most special nature.

The following is Kelly's description of her one-woman play:

I researched, wrote and perform in first person & full mourning, the story of the beloved General's wife, Anna. Taken entirely from her own factual accounts, as written in her book, The Memoirs of Stonewall Jackson: by His Wife Mary Anna Jackson, I recount his views on secession, slavery and the Confederacy. I begin by telling of how they met and married, and the tragedies that shaped both their lives. I tell of their early years together in beautiful Lexington Virginia, where he finally acquired what he most desired in life: a home and family of his own. Then I read selected letters written by Gen. Jackson to his "esposita" during the War, adding Anna's own thoughts to the events he describes. I end with his tragic death, after his wounding by friendly fire, on May 10th, 1863. The play is an hour long and is performed by oil lamp light, enhancing the audience's feeling of stepping back in time to 1864. The War is still raging, the blockade still in effect, and times are hard for the Southern civilians, and even harder for the soldiers. Anna's story is a love story, but also a tragedy in that she is widowed and remains in mourning for the rest of her life. She and General Jackson both believed in "Divine Providence" and that God brought them together, that God brought him to VMI before the War, and that God protected him on the battlefield. The theme of God and his religious views is central to the play.

Kelly Atkins Hinson is a 10th generation North Carolinian, born in Pinehurst, NC, now residing on her Confederate ancestor's farm in Jackson Springs, NC. She is the proud mother of two little rebels, Tripp, 8 and Shiloh, 6 yrs old. They are often dressed in their 1860's garb and attending living history events alongside their mother. Kelly is a 1994 graduate of nursing school at Sandhills College, but currently is a stay-at-home mom.

Everything You wanted to Know about Confederacy Currency: but were Afraid to Ask*

David Meisky will present a program at our January meeting that will share his knowledge of Confederate currency and its history. Per David:

There is an old saying, "save your Confederate money boys..." and many people are aware of Confederate paper money but what is the real story behind these pieces of paper? How much was printed and by who? What was backing this currency? What do the bills look like? There are other stories as well. Did the Confederate States mint their own coins? Were Confederate coins minted in the north? Were Confederate bills printed in the north? Were US coins minted by the Confederacy? Who is Samuel Upham and Winthrop Hilton and how are they connected to Confederate currency? These and a number of other questions will be answered as I show and explain not only Confederate currency but also state, local, and private issue bills.

A history graduate of George Mason University, David Meisky retired from the Fairfax County Public Library. He has re-enacted for a number of years and started appearing as “Extra Billy” Smith in the spring of 2008, after a good deal of study. He has also performed a first person portrayal of Captain David Meade, a Confederate army paymaster, which allowed him to display and discuss his collection of period money. As an infantry private, he has served for a number of years with the Fairfax Rifles, Company D of the 17th Virginia Infantry Regiment.

I Give Them ‘til Christmas:
The Hard Luck Career of the CSS *Neuse

Andrew Duppstadt told the story of the C.S.S. Neuse from its beginning on October 17, 1862 until it was scuttled by its crew after Kinston fell to the Union army in March 1865. Between those dates, the efforts of the Confederate navy were frustrated by shortages of resources of every type. Andrew then told the story of the Neuse from its sinking in 1865 until its initial salvage efforts in 1956 and its display as a NC Historic Site in 1964. He continued the Neuse story as its outdoor displays were hit by multiple hurricanes during the 1990s. Hard Luck continued to follow the Neuse until it was moved to its current location in 2012.

Today the C.S.S. Neuse rests comfortably in the fully-enclosed Civil War Interpretive Center at 100 North Queen Street in Kinston, NC. At last, the C.S.S. Neuse is no long plagued by hard luck.

The Center is open to the public and is well worth the two hour drive up I-40.

 Trivia Questions for January *****

1 – When did the Confederate government first issue currency? Per Dr. Melton McLaurin during his November 12, 2015 presentation, the Confederate government in Montgomery, Alabama issued $1,000,000 in paper currency in March 1861. By August 1861, the government printers cranked out $100,000,000. By the war's end, the Confederacy has issued $1,700,000,000 in paper notes.

Again per Dr. McLaurin, as the Confederates suffered increasing military defeats, the government had no way to support the value of its currency. The typical Confederate citizen lost faith in its notes as inflation destroyed its buying power.

2 - Who were Samuel Upham and Winthrop Hilton and what was their connection to Confederate currency? David will tell you much more about these resourceful Yankee businessmen, but for the purpose of this question, they were counterfeiters of Confederate currency.

3 – Where was the initial construction of the C.S.S. Neuse and by whom? On October 17, 1862, a contract was signed between the Confederate Navy Department and the shipbuilding firm of Howard & Ellis to construct an ironclad gunboat. The vessel Neuse, as it would later be identified, was one of 26 ironclads constructed and commissioned by the Confederate Government. The hull of the ship was to be turned over to the Navy Department by March 1, 1863, "complete in all respects ready to receive the engine and machinery . . . and fasten iron plating on said vessel."

Work on the Neuse was begun shortly after the contract was signed. The building of the ship commenced at White Hall, North Carolina (now Seven Springs), on the banks of the Neuse River.

The Confederate Economy

Dr. Melton McLaurin shared an economics lesson about the United States in 1860 and how the Civil War exposed the inherent weaknesses in the South’s agricultural dependent system. Cotton may have been king during the 1850’s, but cotton alone was not the solution to the deficiencies in the South’s efforts to forge a separate nation.

Among the subjects discussed were: credit arrangements for planters, industrial output, food production (North and South), the place of taxes in the creation on infrastructure, specie (gold and silver), land and slavery, Confederate bonds, inflation, raw materials, taxes in kind, and Reconstruction.

“Gone with the Wind” took on a different meaning after Dr. McLaurin’s presentation. The South was poor before the war with much of its wealth concentrated in the hands of a few individuals (and their creditors). With the loss of 9% of its white population during the war, it was poorer still afterwards.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – Who was responsible for the Confederate efforts to produce ironclad warships?

Stephen R. Mallory. In April 1861, the United States became engaged in a civil war which would last for four years. As the Southern states entered the conflict, they were faced with obvious disadvantages in lack of manpower, supplies, and facilities to coordinate an extensive war effort. To offset the Union's advantages in manpower and industry, resourcefulness became a key word in the Confederacy.

When Stephen R. Mallory was appointed Secretary of the Confederate Navy in February 1861, he was convinced that his navy could equalize the superior numbers of the Union navy through the construction and employment of ironclad warships. Mallory had only two months to organize his department before war broke out, and he was faced with the task of creating a navy from virtually nothing. Moreover, the secretary had to constantly substantiate the importance of his new department. Jefferson Davis, a former army officer and President of the Confederate States, expressed little interest in the Navy Department. Mallory, nevertheless, instigated a formidable shipbuilding program, much of it centering around the construction of ironclads.

On assuming his duties, the secretary stressed the importance of these new vessels for the Confederacy. Two months after the war began, Mallory predicted that Naval engagements between wooden frigates, as they are now built and armed, will prove to be forlorn hopes of the sea, simply contests in which the question, not victory, but of who shall go to the bottom first, is to be decided.

Source: <http://www.nchistoricsites.org/neuse/background.htm> (accessed November 20, 2015).

2 – What major material limited the South’s ability to produce ironclad warships? Iron.

As a raw material, iron was not plentiful in the South after the rich ore fields in Tennessee and Kentucky fell into Union control during the early stages of the war. Iron was either not available for the ships or was delayed in transport to the various shipyards. This was because railroad lines were tied up in transporting troops and supplies for the armies. Subsequently, delays in the construction of ironclads became a way of life for individual contractors, a fact painfully demonstrated during construction efforts in North Carolina.

Source: <http://www.nchistoricsites.org/neuse/background.htm> (accessed November 20, 2015).

3 – What % of the nation’s industrial base was in the southern states in 1860? Per Dr.

McLaurin’s presentation, the southern states accounted for just 8% of the industrial capacity of the United States. The southern economy was dominated by the agricultural products that were shipped to northern and European manufacturers.

4 – Who was Thomas Prentice Kettell? A political economist, magazine editor and author who in 1856 published Southern Wealth and Northern Profits, as exhibited in Statistical Facts and Official Figures; showing the Necessity of Union to the Future Prosperity and Welfare of the Republic. Kettell tried to show the dependence of the sections upon one another – the Southern secessionists and the Northern anti-slavery people took exception with his arguments.

* Thoughts *******

Should they stay or should they go?

Should Civil War memorials be removed to only displays in museums or cemeteries? Would that case be limited to only locations in the former Confederate states or would it also apply to all states?

The Confederate Economy

Dr. Melton McLaurin will expand on the concepts he began last November when he addressed "Could the South Have Won?" He will focus on the economy that both enabled the South to survive for four years and led the South to eventually succumb to the superior resources of the North. King Cotton, slavery, blockade running, and inflation will figure into the conduct of the four year conflict.

"It's the economy, stupid!" was as important in 1861-1865 as it is today. Bill Clinton and Abe Lincoln had a better grasp of this fact than did George H. W. Bush and Jeff Davis.

Fayetteville area native Melton Alonza McLaurin received his Ph.D. in American history from the University of South Carolina in 1967 and taught at the University of South Alabama prior to joining the UNCW department of history as chairperson in 1977. From 1996 until 2003 he served as Associate Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs, retiring in 2004. He authored or co-authored nine books (Celia, A Slave; The Marines of Montford Point: America's First Black Marines) and numerous articles on various aspects of the history of the American South and race relations.

1 – Wilmer McLean was too old to fight in the Civil War. But that did not stop the 47-year-old Virginia farmer and merchant from being involved in two of the most important events of the war. What were they?

2 - Although not unique to the Civil War, what were “Quaker Guns?”

3 – This state was a significant supplier to the Confederacy, providing much needed beef, pork, fish, fruit and particularly salt (which kept meat from spoiling). In addition, while other Confederate states recruited more and/or lost more soldiers in total, this Southern state provided the largest percentage (in terms of ratio of soldiers to total residents) of any of the other southern states. Name that state.

4 – Most of us are familiar with the term 4-F used in classifications given to new military registrants who are not acceptable for service in the Armed Forces due to medical, dental, or other reasons. Most people do not know the term 4-F originated in the Civil War. What did it mean at that time?

5 – This facility had two observation towers constructed for onlookers. Citizens could pay 15 cents to take a look. Concession stands next to the towers sold peanuts, cakes, and lemonade. What was this facility?

 October Program *****

A Civil War Challenge

A great big game of Civil War Jeopardy took place at the October Meeting. Brian Kraus, A.K.A. Alex Trebek, took a wide variety of questions from those in attendance.

Among the subjects: Actions of the 26th North Carolina at Gettysburg (decimated in actions against the Iron Brigade and on the third day); Longest continuous engagement during the war (During the Battle of Spotsylvania in the Bloody Angle, the opposing forces of Lee and Grant endured approximately 24 hours of fierce hand-to-hand combat); First land battle of the war (The Battle of Philippi on June 3, 1861, in what became West Virginia, is credited as the first battle. George B. McClellan claimed the Union victory for his rising star); Animosity between George McClellan and A.P. Hill (George and Powell vied for the affections of the same woman and George won Marcy's heart and hand); Comparison of casualties between USA and CSA officers (the Southerners probably claimed this Pyrrhic victory by losing a lot of their brother officers – leading from the front); The relationship between Robert E. Lee and George E. Pickett (Their relationship was very cool following Pickett's poor showing at Five Forks during April 1865. After the war, John S. Mosby accompanied Pickett to a visit with Lee in Richmond. After Mosby and Pickett left Lee, Pickett remarked that Lee had had his division massacred at Gettysburg on July 3, 1863 – Mosby, perhaps trying to lift Pickett's spirits, remarked that Lee had made Pickett "immortal"); Lee's preference: Jackson or Longstreet (Lee never expressed his personal feelings; however, Lee most often located his HQ near Longstreet's 1st Corps camps.

Brian's format opened the floor for comments and thoughts. From the extended length of the meeting, it was apparent that those present had done more than doze through previous Round Table discussions. Lively discussions kept things moving!

Thanks to Brian for leading a spirited meeting and thanks for those present for sharing their knowledge of Civil War history.

Note: Thanks to Lance Blevins for his meeting notes and to Linda Lashley for her meeting photographs.

 Trivia Questions for November *****

1 – Wilmer McLean was too old to fight in the Civil War. But that did not stop the 47-year-old Virginia farmer and merchant from being involved in two of the most important events of the war. What were they? The first major battle of the Civil War, the First Battle of Bull Run (First Manassas) took place on McLean's farm, the Yorkshire Plantation. Union artillery fired on his house that was being used as headquarters by Confederate General P.G.T. Beauregard. In the months following the battle, McLean was nearly bankrupt so he packed up his family and moved to what he hoped would be a more peaceful corner of his home state. But the Civil War was not through with Wilmer McLean. Four years later, Grant's Union forces commandeered McLean's house in Appomattox where Lee would surrender to Grant. After the surrender ceremony, Union soldiers ransacked the house leaving little but the structure itself behind. Financially ruined once again, Wilmer was forced to sell the home and find work, as of all things, a federal tax collector. Embittered, he would later claim that the war began in my front yard and ended in my front parlor.

2 - Although not unique to the Civil War, what were "Quaker Guns?" "Quaker Guns" were used by both the North and the South. However, due to its shortage of artillery, they were often used by the Confederacy. They were typically large logs, shaped to resemble cannon, painted black and positioned behind fortifications to delay assaults by overwhelmingly superior Union troops. Occasionally, a real gun carriage was placed beneath the log. These were used during the war for deception that a position was strongly held and sometimes, the ruse worked. The name comes from the Religious Society of Friends, or Quakers, who have traditionally held a religious opposition to war and violence.

3 – This state was a significant supplier to the Confederacy, providing much needed beef, pork, fish, fruit and particularly salt (which kept meat from spoiling). In addition, while other Confederate states recruited more and/or lost more soldiers in total, this Southern state provided the largest percentage (in terms of ratio of soldiers to total residents) of any of the other southern states. Name that state. Florida. It was the third state to secede. It was the smallest of the eleven Confederate states with 140,000 residents of whom 60,000 of them were slaves. The 15,000 Floridians who fought in the war was the largest percentage (ratio of soldiers to non-slave residents) of all southern states. Of those 15,000 soldiers, almost 5,000, or one-third, died or were killed as a result of the war – a very disproportionate loss compared to Florida's sister states. Many more who survived were disabled or had their lives shortened due to health issues directly related to their military service. While very little fighting actually took place on Florida soil, many Confederate troops were deployed to the major theatres of operations in Virginia and in the West. Little press is dedicated to the few battles that occurred in Florida – (Fort Pickens, The Tampa Bay Incident, Battle of Olustee, and the Battle of Natural Bridge. By most measures, none of these battles were extremely pivotal and had little effect on the war's outcome. However, Floridians participated in many major battles with General Robert E. Lee's troops in Northern Virginia. There were nearly 500 Florida soldiers who surrendered with General Lee when he surrendered the Army of Northern Virginia at Appomattox Court House.

OK, I got caught up in Joe's Trivia questions and had to add this to his Florida information: Anyone know who this gentleman was? He became a Confederate brigadier general late in the war. Originally from Greenville, NC, he moved to Florida in 1844.

Editor

4 – Most of us are familiar with the term 4-F used in classifications given to new military registrants who are not acceptable for service in the Armed Forces due to medical, dental, or other reasons. Most people do not know the term 4-F originated in the Civil War. What did it mean at that time? It was used to disqualify army recruits who did not have four front teeth. Without four front teeth, soldiers would be unable to tear open gunpowder packages quickly; hence, making them ineffective riflemen, placing himself and his fellow soldiers at greater risk. Molars and premolars in the back of the mouth were not sufficient for the task of opening gunpowder packages. Only the incisors and canine teeth in the front could be used. So 4-F means “lacks Four Front teeth.”

5 – This facility had two observation towers constructed for onlookers. Citizens could pay 15 cents to take a look. Concession stands next to the towers sold peanuts, cakes, and lemonade. What was this facility? The Union prison camp at Elmira, NY. The towers were erected around July 1864 by Elmira citizens. It was said that while the towers might have brought profit to some prison officials, they seem to have inspired humanitarian efforts from Elmira citizens. However, such efforts were often hampered by Federal authorities.

Blandford Church and Cemetery

Martha Atkinson shared the history and purpose of Blandford Church and cemetery.

To experience the memorial and to see the beauty of the Tiffany windows, plan a visit with Martha and her staff at the Blandford Cemetery on 319 South Crater Road in Petersburg, Virginia.

 Trivia Questions for October *****

1 – When and why was the Ladies’ Memorial Association of Petersburg formed? On the 6th of May 1866, the Ladies’ Memorial Association was formed “to devise means to perpetuate their gratitude and admiration for those who died defending homes and loved ones.” One of the principal, active members of the Ladies Memorial Association was Miss Nora Fontaine Maury Davidson who had established a school for young women in Petersburg. On June 9, 1865, she took her students with her to Blandford Cemetery and decorated the graves of both Union and Confederate dead with flowers and flags.

Source: <http://www.memorialdayorigin.info/lma.html> (accessed September 30, 2015).

2 – When was the Blandford Church renovated? In 1901, the Ladies Memorial Association was authorized by the City of Petersburg which owned it to restore and transform the abandoned Episcopal Church in Blandford Cemetery into a memorial to honor the 30,000 Confederate soldiers buried in the cemetery. After raising considerable funds, the ladies had the old church, built in 1735, renovated and decorated with stained glass windows designed and manufactured by William Comfort Tiffany. Mr. Tiffany himself supervised the installation of the windows in the church and donated one window from his own funds. Each window commemorates the Confederate soldiers and sailors who died defending their homes and country. There is one window for each state of the Confederacy plus a window for each of the border states which were sympathetic to the states in secession but for various reasons stayed in the Union. The window donated by Mr. Tiffany completes the memorial. Blandford Church is now owned by the City of Petersburg; and it is open to the public who come from far and wide to see its beauty, calm dignity, and memorials to the fallen dead. Thousands of persons visit the church each year. Petersburg commemorates the National Memorial Day each May 30th and Confederate Memorial day each June 9th.

3 – Three Confederate generals final resting place is in the Blandford cemetery. Can you recall their names? Per Martha Atkinson’s presentation, William Mahone, David Weisiger and Cullen Battle were buried among 30,000 comrades.

 Memoirs *****

Memoirs often make fascinating reading because they share a story of the recollections of one individual about a series of events. Usually that individual is not a trained historian who seeks to validate those events.

General William T. Sherman wrote volume 1 of his Memoirs in 1875 – prior to the availability of the Official Records. He received many public and private criticisms; hence, in 1885, Sherman revised his work to answer criticisms and to provide additional material. In his preface to the second addition, Sherman made a statement that I thought should be applied when considering all memoirs:

In this free country every man is at perfect liberty to publish his own thoughts and impressions, and any witness who may differ from me should publish his own version of facts in the truthful narration of which he is interested. I am publishing my own memoirs, not theirs, and we all know that no three honest witnesses of a simple brawl can agree on all the details. How much more likely will be the difference in a great battle covering a vast space of broken ground, when each division, brigade, regiment, and even company, naturally and honestly believes that it was the focus of the whole affair! Each of them won the battle. None ever lost. That was the fate of the old man who unhappily commanded.

 Thoughts *****

Memorials. These seem to be a hot topic lately that are getting a lot of press time. I ran across the following while researching the Blandford Church. It is a rather long passage; however, I believe it shares a worthwhile thought about the meaning of our long standing observance practices.

During the Month of March 1868, just three years after the end of the Civil War, Mrs. Mary Simmerson Cunningham Logan, wife of General John A. Logan, Commander in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic -- the Union Army Veterans Organization -- went to Petersburg. She recounted her visit in her article published in the Los Angeles Daily Times dated May 30, 1903, titled MEMORIAL DAY: A NOTED WOMAN'S STORY OF ITS ORIGIN AND GROWTH. According to Mrs. Logan:

"...it is especially pleasant to know that the ideal of Memorial Day was unwittingly suggested by the devotion of the people of the South to their heroes. In the early spring of 1868 I was one of a party ... to make a pilgrimage to the battlefields of Virginia. Gen. Logan had long been anxious to make a personal inspection of this section of the country over which the great conflict raged in order to enlarge his knowledge of the entire course of the war Unfortunately, however, circumstances prevented him accompanying me and he did not see with his own eyes what really prompted the first Decoration Day. It is my pleasure to revert to it and to pay a just tribute to the gentle people whose acts gave me the inspiration that resulted in the Decoration Day of today." Mrs. Logan talks about the difficulties of getting a guide and transportation, then:

"But it is not of this that I would speak, but of the incident that gave me the inspiration that resulted in Decoration Day. We were in Petersburg, Virginia, and had taken advantage of the fact to inspect the oldest church there, the bricks of which had been brought from England. There was an old English air all about the venerable structure, and we passed to the building through a churchyard. The weather was balmy and spring-like, and as we passed through the rows of graves I noticed that many of them had been strewn with beautiful blossoms and decorated with small flags of the dead Confederacy. The sentimental idea so enwrapped me that I inspected them more closely and discovered that they were every one the graves of soldiers who had died for the Southern cause. The actions seemed to me to be a beautiful tribute to the soldier martyrs and grew upon me while I was returning to Washington. Gen. Logan was at that time the Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, with his headquarters in Washington, and as soon as he met me at the station I told him of the graves of the Southern soldiers in the cemetery at Petersburg. He listened with great interest and then said: 'What a splendid thought! We will have it done all over the country, and the Grand Army shall do it! I will issue the order at once for a national Memorial Day for the decoration of the graves of all those noble fellows who died for their country.' ... He immediately entered into a conference with his several aides with a view of selecting a date that should be kept from year to year. He realized that it must be a time when the whole country was blooming with flowers, and May 30th was finally selected as the best season for the annual observance of the day." Following this discussion, Mrs. Logan goes on to quote essential parts of Grand Army of the Republic General Order No. 11 which was issued on May 5, 1868, designating May 30th "... for the purpose of strewing with flowers or otherwise decorating the graves of the comrades who died in defense of their country in the late rebellion, and whose bodies now lie in almost every city, village and hamlet churchyard in the land." Mrs. Logan adds a postscript:

"Time has shown how well that order has been obeyed, and although the observance of the day has grown as the years have glided into the past and every city and hamlet in the country assists in the noble work, the eyes of the nation are every year centered upon the great national cemetery on the Heights of Arlington where, lying under the emerald lawns and shaded by the great trees, are the bodies in whose honor the day was inaugurated. Nearby the graves of the men who wore the blue are hundreds of mounds that cover all that was mortal of those who wore the gray, and it is one of the most beautiful traits of forgiving humanity that none of them are overlooked on the most sacred day in the American calendar. In Dixie they garland with one hand the mounds above the ashes of the northern soldiers while with the other they strew beautiful blossoms on the graves of their own heroes. We of the north do the same, for they were all heroes, each dying for the cause he thought was right. They gave their all to prove their sincerity, and they all died true Americans whatever their political affiliations may have been...."

Blandford Church and Cemetery

Martha Atkinson, Site Manager and Education Specialist for the Petersburg Museums, will share a presentation about the Blandford Church and Cemetery.

Erected in 1735 on the highest point in Petersburg, Blandford Church is the oldest structure in the city. Originally built as an Anglican site for worship, it became an Episcopal church after the Revolutionary War and was abandoned for 95 years.

Restoration

Restored as a Confederate Memorial Chapel by the Ladies Memorial Association of Petersburg in the early 1900s, the church has 15 priceless Louis Comfort Tiffany stained-glass windows, each dedicated to the memory of fallen southern soldiers.

Historic Blandford Cemetery

Still an active burial ground, Blandford Cemetery's oldest marked grave dates to 1702. An incredible collection of 18th, 19th, and 20th century styles of burial and funerary art, tombstones, ironwork, and landscaping are represented throughout the grounds.

Decoration Day

On June 9, 1866, the first Decoration Day service was conducted by the Ladies Memorial Association of Petersburg. This event became the inspiration for the national observance of Memorial Day.

Soldiers from every American conflict, including a British major general and three Confederate generals are buried within the confines of the cemetery..

* Trivia Questions for September *******

1 – Between 1904 and 1912, Louis Comfort Tiffany produced fifteen stained-glass windows for the restored chapel. When was the North Carolina window installed?

2 – Who chose a subject and theme for each of the states to be represented in the Tiffany windows? What was the cost of each window?

3 – On May 4, 1864 and approximately 20 miles downstream from Lee's Army of Northern Virginia, Grant's Army of the Potomac crossed the Rapidan River and entered the tangled forest known as The Wilderness. Which Union cavalry commander was assigned to protect the army's right flank against Confederate efforts to intercept its movements?

* Trivia Questions for September *******

1 – Between 1904 and 1912, Louis Comfort Tiffany produced fifteen stained-glass windows for the restored chapel. When was the North Carolina window installed? The North Carolina window was installed in 1907.

2 – Who chose a subject and theme for each of the states to be represented in the Tiffany windows? What was the cost of each window? To facilitate agreement between different states represented in the windows, Louis Comfort Tiffany coordinated the subject and theme for each state. The cost of each state's window was $385.

3 – On May 4, 1864 and approximately 20 miles downstream from Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia, Grant’s Army of the Potomac crossed the Rapidan River and entered the tangled forest known as The Wilderness. Which Union cavalry commander was assigned to protect the army’s right flank against Confederate efforts to intercept its movements? Brigadier General James H. Wilson, Phil Sheridan’s least experienced commander, was assigned to protect the Union flank. Wilson led a tentative probe toward the Confederate position but withdrew before encountering Richard Ewell and A.P. Hill’s commands moving to challenge the Union’s move south. Wilson’s failure allowed the Confederates to launch their dual advance on the Orange Turnpike and the Orange Plank Road toward the unprepared Army of the Potomac.

Command Conflicts in Grant's Overland Campaign: Ambition and Animosity in the Army of the Potomac

Ned Smith & Diane Monroe Smith

Diane Monroe Smith will speak about Lt. General U.S. Grant and his command efforts with the Army of the Potomac. Diane will explain the difference in standards that Grant may have used for officers who had served with him in the western theater and those who had served in with the army in the east.

In Leader-Member Exchange Management Theory, most managers have identified and “Out Group.” For whatever reasons, some subordinates are just not perceived as being as motivated or as energized as those closest to the boss. The theory supposedly helped the boss to modify his/her actions to treat all subordinates in the same manner.

Was Grant influenced by this management theory? Join us on May 14th. It should be an interesting presentation. Ned Smith, Diane’s husband, will also add to our meeting by discussing a couple of Maine regiments during the Civil War.

Diane Monroe Smith and Ned Smith are residents of the great State of Maine. They both have a long interest in the Maine’s involvement in the Civil War. Diane has written several books about the “hero” of Little Round Top – Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain. Ned focuses on regimental histories of the 22nd Maine Infantry Regiment and the 2nd Maine Cavalry.

The Overland Campaign: Grant and Lee

Wow!!!! The entire Overland Campaign presented in one hour. How was that even possible? Simple - Gordon C. Rhea was not only a skilled historian, but a fast-talking trial attorney. We received the benefits of years of experience in both disciplines.

Gordon traced the “cat and mouse” game that Grant and Lee played in Virginia in the spring of 1864. Rhea fairly discussed the strengths and weaknesses of both generals. Lee stopped Grant, but Grant immobilized Lee’s army. Grant won!

Editor

Gordon Rhea

 Trivia Questions for May *****

1 – Who were some of the western theater men that Grant brought east in 1864? Phillip Sheridan, William “Baldy” Smith, Horace Porter, James H. Wilson, and John A. Rawlins came east with Grant. Horatio G. Wright had served in the east and the west, but was considered a Grant man.

If you get a chance, these guys should be “Googled” before our next meeting. Their relationship with Grant will be much talked about during that meeting.

2 – What was Grant’s main objective when he became commander of all Union armies in 1864? Per Gordon Rhea, Grant wanted to defeat the Confederate armies and not conquer territory. He wanted to destroy all Confederate armies by attacking each of those armies in coordinated actions that would prevent the Confederates from shifting forces along their interior lines. George Meade, William Sherman, Franz Sigel, Benjamin Butler and Nathaniel Banks were to open campaigns in May 1864.

Grant wanted to bleed the Confederacy. He wanted to use the Union’s superior resources to affect that end.

3 – On March 9-10, Grant interviewed Major General George G. Meade, commander of the Army of the Potomac (AoP). Meade had been the victor at Gettysburg, but was unsupported by the Lincoln administration for his perceived “slows” in attacking Lee after that victory.

Why did Grant choose to retain Meade at the head of the AoP? During their interview, Meade offered to step aside for a general of Grant’s choosing. Grant knew that the men of the AoP had respect for Meade. Grant was not going to stay in Washington but travel with the army. Grant was to set the strategy and Meade was to implement that strategy.

It did not work out quite like Grant intended. As the Overland Campaign unfolded, Grant did much more than just set strategy.

4 – On June 3rd at Cold Harbor, Grant attacked entrenched Confederate forces and was repulsed with many casualties. Why did Grant decide to attack at Cold Harbor? After the battles from May 4th until June 3rd, Grant had been much reinforced and Lee but little. Grant thought the Army of Northern Virginia was weakened to the point that another overwhelming attack would finish Lee’s army.

Grant was to later state that he regretted the last assault at Cold Harbor.

5 – Re-quiz: At least twice four times during the Overland Campaign, Robert E. Lee tried to lead Confederate troops in counterattacks against Union forces. Where did Lee’s actions occur? At Tapp’s Field in the Wilderness, Texas troops refused to advance until “Lee to the Rear” was accomplished. At the site of Upton’s attack on the Muleshoe on May 10th, North Carolina Brigadier General Robert Johnston’s troops told Lee that they would retake the lost lines if Lee went to the rear. At the Mule Shoe on May 12th during the Union Corps attack at Spotsylvania Court House, Lee tried to lead Confederate troops into the counterattack. John B. Gordon’s Georgians and Virginians chanted for Lee to go to the rear. At short time later, Lee once again tried to lead Brigadier General Nathaniel Harris' Mississippians into the counterattack. Lee told the troops that he would retire only if they promised to drive "those" people from the Confederate works.

The Overland Campaign: Grant and Lee

Gordon C. Rhea will discuss the generalship of Grant and Lee during the battles of May and June 1864. Rhea will examine the battles at The Wilderness, Spotsylvania Court House, the North Anna River, and Cold Harbor. Grant and Lee will be pitted against one another for the first time during the war. Rhea will follow the generals as they match wits for forty days of combat that will result in 55,000 Union and 35,000 Confederate casualties.

Gordon Rhea is a skilled litigator who is also a noted Civil War historian. His books about the Overland Campaign are the standard for the history of those conflicts.

Gordon Rhea explains his fascination with the Civil War and his particular interest in the Overland Campaign:

I developed an interest in the Civil War when I was a child. My father was born in 1901, in a small town in southern Tennessee, and the old men sitting around the country store were Confederate veterans. He grew up listening to their stories and passed that interest along to me. When I was growing up, we used to take family trips to places like Gettysburg and Chancellorsville. My father was also an avid reader, and I can recall him reading passages from Freeman's Lee's Lieutenants to me in the evening, before putting me to bed. I majored in history as an undergraduate, and also earned a Master's Degree in history. When I was working with the United States Attorneys Office in Washington, D.C., in the mid-1970's, I would often drive down to the Wilderness to take my mind off of my cases. That is when I developed an interest in the initial battles between Grant and Lee. I discovered that very little had been written about those battles — judging from the books I could find, the civil war seemed to have culminated at Gettysburg, then ended in the spring of 1865. What happened in between those events had engaged the attention of very few writers. So that is how I got the idea of writing my first book, on the Battle of the Wilderness.

Reflected Glory: Letters to Anna

While some people find history as nothing more than the boring repetition of dull, cold and little cared-about facts, those members and guests in attendance at our March meeting were treated to a special performance. 1 – As the Battle of The Wilderness reached bloody stalemate, both Grant and Lee considered their next move. Grant was determined to get Lee out of his strong defenses. Lee, bled of his offensive power, thought Grant was going to withdraw to Fredericksburg; however, Lee hedged his bets. What action did Lee take that would prove most advantageous for his army? Lee knew that Grant’s army had been hit hard. Lee also knew that Grant was an aggressive commander and that he may continue the fight by moving south toward Spotsylvania Court House. To counter any Grant move in that direction, Lee ordered Brigadier General William Pendleton, Chief of ANV Artillery, to construct a trail south from the 1st Corps (Anderson) right flank toward Spotsylvania. This rough cut trail, through the dense forest, would shorten the route Richard H. Anderson's 1st Corps could take to reach Spotsylvania Court House.

Source: Gordon C. Rhea, The Battles for Spotsylvania Court House and the Road to Yellow Tavern: May 7-12, 1864 [Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997], 22-23.

2 – To bring Lee out of his entrenchments and force him to confront Grant's superior force in more open countryside, Grant ordered his army to begin movement south toward Spotsylvania Court House. What actions by Lee's army prevented Grant from gaining the advantage on their march? Around 7:00pm on May 7th, Lee ordered Richard Anderson to prepare to move Longstreet's 1st Corps on Pendleton's trail toward Spotsylvania. Anderson was to move his men a little distance out of their lines until he found a place to rest his weary men. The 1st Corps began the move over the rough trail around 10:00pm. Anderson made a decision to continue his march further into the night – his reason was to escape the smoke of the still burning fires in the Wilderness and to also escape the stench of death that hung over the battlefield. Anderson's decision was one of the most fateful of the campaign.

Fitzhugh Lee's cavalry also aided the Confederate cause in blocking Sheridan's efforts to clear the path for Grant's army to march to Spotsylvania Court House.

Source: Gordon C. Rhea, The Battles for Spotsylvania Court House and the Road to Yellow Tavern: May 7-12, 1864 [Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997], 28-37.

3 – As the Army of the Potomac marched away from the Wilderness Battlefield, what action did Grant take that drew cheers from his men? Grant turned south on the Brock Road. For the first time, the army did not retreat after being roughly handled by Lee's army.

4 – How long did the fighting continue at "Bloody Angle" during the struggle at Spotsylvania Court House? On May 12 – 13, hand-to-hand combat continued for nearly twenty hours as Lee's Army fought for its life in the Mule Shoe.

5 – At least twice during the Overland Campaign, Robert E. Lee tried to lead Confederate troops in counterattacks against Union forces. Where did Lee's actions occur? At Tapp's Field in the Wilderness, Texas troops refused to advance until "Lee to the Rear" was accomplished. At the Mule Shoe during the battle at Spotsylvania Court House, Lee again tried to lead Confederate troops into the counterattack. Georgians and Virginians chanted for Lee to go to the rear.

Reflected Glory: Letters to Anna

Anna & Julia

Kelly Hinson and daughter as Anna & Julia

Join the CFCWRT as Kelly Hinson takes us back into the life of Thomas “Stonewall” Jackson’s widow, Anna Morrison Jackson. The following is Kelly’s description of her one-woman play:

I researched, wrote and perform in first person & full mourning, the story of the beloved General's wife, Anna. Taken entirely from her own factual accounts, as written in her book, The Memoirs of Stonewall Jackson: by His Wife Mary Anna Jackson, I recount his views on secession, slavery and the Confederacy. I begin by telling of how they met and married, and the tragedies that shaped both their lives. I tell of their early years together in beautiful Lexington Virginia, where he finally acquired what he most desired in life: a home and family of his own. Then I read selected letters written by Gen. Jackson to his "esposita" during the War, adding Anna's own thoughts to the events he describes. I end with his tragic death, after his wounding by friendly fire, on May 10th, 1863. The play is an hour long and is performed by oil lamp light, enhancing the audience's feeling of stepping back in time to 1864. The War is still raging, the blockade still in effect, and times are hard for the Southern civilians, and even harder for the soldiers. Anna's story is a love story, but also a tragedy in that she is widowed and remains in mourning for the rest of her life. She and General Jackson both believed in "Divine Providence" and that God brought them together, that God brought him to VMI before the War, and that God protected him on the battlefield. The theme of God and his religious views is central to the play. It is only after his initiating a battle on Sunday, and he writes to Anna of his great regrets over the "fighting on Sunday", that he is wounded. And after, he says he wishes to never have to take the field again.

He [Jackson] wrote in one of his letters that he believed that "...God will, in his own good time and way, give us the victory".

Kelly Atkins Hinson is a 10th generation North Carolinian, born in Pinehurst, NC, now residing on her Confederate ancestor's farm in Jackson Springs, NC. She is the proud mother of two little rebels, Tripp, 7 and Shiloh, 5 yrs old. They are often dressed in their 1860's garb and attending living history events alongside their mother. Kelly is a 1994 graduate of nursing school at Sandhills College, but currently is a stay-at-home mom.

Kelly has been very involved in the presentation of Civil War history for quite a while. Some of her involvements are listed below:

I have been an active member of the NC Division United Daughters of the Confederacy (UDC) since 2004, and currently a member of the Capt. Samuel A. Ashe Chapter, UDC in Raleigh, NC. I often participate in three local Sons of Confederate Veteran Camp's activities; The Moore County Scotch Riflemen Camp, the Sgt. John A. Lisk Camp, and the First, Farthest and Last Camp. I am Matron of Honor of the First, Farthest and Last Camp in Randolph County, NC. I was honored to receive the Dixie Defender award at the 118th Annual SCV Reunion in Vicksburg, Miss., 2013 and as Mrs. Mary Anna Jackson, I was extremely proud to welcome the Sons to the 119th Reunion this past year in Charleston, SC, just as the real Mrs. Jackson did in 1899. I am a member of the Black River Tiger Roses #50 OCR (Order of Confederate Rose) and The Society of the Black Rose NC Division. I am proud to have been voted the Black Rose of the Year 2013, and Rose of the Year 2014, by my peers in the OCR.

I am the Vice President, Secretary and a trustee of the Southern Soldier Remembrance Foundation (SSRF), which endeavors to find descendants of Confederate soldiers and place headstones to mark their final resting places, focusing on Hollywood (8-10,000 unmarked), Oakwood (21,000) and Shockoe Hill (1000) Cemeteries in Richmond Virginia, but assisting in any way to make sure our ancestors graves are marked and their names are written in stone for future generations to never forget their sacrifices.

I am past president and continue as a trustee on the board of the Moore County Historical Association. I am also a board member at Historic Shiloh Church, in Troy NC, where many of my ancestors are buried.

The Forgotten Theater of War: The Civil War in Eastern North Carolina

Dr. Chris Fonvielle told our annual dinner meeting participants about the battles that secured early Union victories in North Carolina. He told us about the naval blockade that initially was so weak that Wilmington developed into “the” blockade running super-star that enabled the Confederacy to continue the war.

Dr. Fonvielle presented a view that the Civil War would have ended earlier if the Union Blockade Strategy Board had continued with its initial efforts that secured a large section of eastern North Carolina. If the Union had pushed to take the port of Wilmington in late 1862, The Wilmington & Weldon Rail Road would have lost its role as a purveyor of supplies to the Army of Northern Virginia – the Lifeline of the Confederacy would not have existed. Union Admiral David Dixon Porter expressed a similar view in some of his writings.

Chris also shared thoughts about the social upheaval that existed in North Carolina during this period. The Union controlled section became a haven for slaves seeking their freedom. The Union became more focused on the influx of those who sought freedom. They were pushed by the efforts of men like Abraham H. Galloway. NOTE: Galloway was born into slavery near Smithville but escaped to the north. He returned south in 1862 and he led efforts to secure freedom and individual rights for former slaves. Galloway took an active part in Republican Reconstruction in the years after the war ended. He served in the North Carolina Senate in 1868 and 1870.

While we heard about the battles, the blockade, and the fall of Fort Fisher, we also heard another part of our history. We heard about some of the people who were involved in shaping our local history.

* Trivia Questions for March *******

1 – Perceptions of Thomas J. Jackson tend to treat him as a socially awkward individual. After the death of his first wife, Eleanor Junkin, during childbirth, Jackson turned his attentions towards Mary Anna Morrison of North Carolina. What did Jackson's two wives have in common? Ellie and Anna both had fathers who were Presbyterian ministers, professors, and college presidents. How a bumpkin from the mountains of western Virginia was able to wed daughters of prominent families can only be explained by a bearing that eluded the general public. Jackson was a loving and devoted husband who found two women who shared his religious beliefs and provided Jackson with a home life that suited his unusual personality.

Source: S.C/ Gwynne, Rebel Yell: the Violence, Passion, and Redemption of Stonewall Jackson [New York: Scribner, 2014], 152.

2 – What became of Mary Anna Morrison Jackson after the death of Stonewall? After the general's death, Mrs. Jackson returned to her native North Carolina with Julia, who subsequently married William Christian and gave birth to a son and a daughter. Mrs. Jackson, who never remarried and wore widow's weeds for the remainder of her life, took on the task of raising her two grandchildren following Julia's untimely death in her late twenties.

In 1898, Mrs. Jackson organized and became the first president of Stonewall Jackson Chapter #220 of the United Daughters of the Confederacy in Charlotte. Elected president for life, Mrs. Jackson presided over the activities of the chapter until failing health forced her to relinquish her duties. A fixture at reunions of Confederate veterans throughout the South in the years following the war, she remained honorary president of the chapter and an honorary president of General until her death in 1915.

Source: <http://vaudc.org/jackson.html>

3 – The Memoirs of Stonewall Jackson by his widow, Mary Anna Jackson contained how many pages? 647 pages. There is just something about Stonewall that lends writers to share many stories about General Jackson. James I. Robertson, Jr's Stonewall Jackson:

The Man, The Soldier, The Legend weighs in at 950 pages. S.C. Gwynne's Rebel Yell: The Violence, Passion, and Redemption of Stonewall Jackson weighs in at a slender 672 pages.

4 – Who was known as the “Confederate Soldier’s Friend”? Miss Mary Ann Buie collected funds from businesses to support relief efforts for Confederate soldiers and their families. Her collection techniques were sometimes aggressive in nature. When her charitable request to a blockade runner owner was rebuffed, Mary Ann reportedly placed a “jinx” upon the man. Shortly thereafter, the ship owner lost the Hebe, Lynx, and Venus as these ships tried to run the blockade.

5 - What was Union strategy after two thirds of coastal North Carolina came under its control by May 1862? While the Union forces made excursions further into North Carolina, they never mounted an effort dedicated to capturing a larger part of the state. Per Dr. Fonvielle’s presentation, this resulted from two causes: 1) the Lincoln administration obsessive fixation on the viper-pit of secession, Charleston. That city endured a 587 day siege by Union forces. 2) The Union controlled area of North Carolina became a haven for slaves seeking their freedom. It also became a haven for many North Carolinians who sought to avoid or escape service in Confederate Army.

 Thoughts *****

A repeat of last month Thoughts..... Make sure you attend as many Civil War events as possible in the coming months, including our March meeting. So many opportunities abound to hear excellent Civil War historians in the Cape Fear region during early 2015. When does one get to listen to historians like William C. Davis, Craig Symonds, Rod Gragg, Chris Fonvielle, Wade Sokolosky, Eric Wittenberg, Mark Bradley, and others in such close locations? Only on the Civil War’s 150th anniversary –

The Forgotten Theater of War: The Civil War in Eastern North Carolina

Dr. Chris Fonvielle will share his insights into the largely ignored history of the Civil War in Eastern North Carolina. Chris will go beyond his normal explanation of the war around Wilmington and explore the impact of the war on the people caught between Union forces in the coastal plain and the Confederate forces that opposed them.

Chris Fonvielle, college professor, author, lecturer and past president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, is a Wilmington native who is the authority on the Civil War in the Cape Fear region. Dr. Fonvielle's The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope is the most complete history of war as it relates to Wilmington, Fort Fisher and collapse of Confederate resistance that precipitated the end of the war.

Join the Round Table as we enjoy a good meal and an excellent talk about an interesting period in North Carolina's Civil War history.

* First and Second Battles of Fort Fisher *******

The First Battle of Fort Fisher in December 1864 had ended in a debacle for the Union Army and Navy. General Benjamin Butler and Admiral David Dixon Porter had failed to coordinate their efforts against the last major blockade running port open to the Confederacy. The Union troops that had landed north of the fort had been rescued without serious challenges from Braxton Bragg's troops assembled at Sugar Loaf. Even as the dispirited Union forces returned to their bases, General Grant had begun to formulate a plan that would quickly return Union forces to the Cape Fear. General Bragg, unlike Chase Whiting and William Lamb who feared a quick Union return, ordered that the troops at Sugar Loaf be returned to Wilmington and other locations. Seldom had two generals reached such different conclusions about the same set of events. For Wilmington and Fort Fisher, Grant and Bragg would soon test whether the Union or Confederate conclusions were sound.

On January 6, 1865, a newly appointed Union general, Alfred Terry, and his Union Army transports sailed south from Hampton Roads toward Fort Fisher. Admiral Porter's fleet was delayed by rough seas; however, by 10:00 p.m. January 12, fifty-eight warships and twenty-two army transports began their rendezvous off New Inlet at Fort Fisher. Colonel William Lamb, at the Pulpit in Fort Fisher, saw an increasing number of twinkling lights as they appeared in the dark ocean off the coast. Lamb, having received no warning from headquarters in Wilmington, notified General Bragg of the Union fleet's presence. As Lamb had feared, the Union fleet and army were back.

General Robert Hoke had his entire 6,424 man division in route from Wilmington to Sugar Loaf by steamer and march by 1:00 a.m. on the 13th. Colonel Lamb had 800 artillerymen of the 36th North Carolina Regiment to defend the fort from the coming assault. The overall Confederate commander, General Bragg, had done little since the December attack to strengthen Fort Fisher with men or equipment.

Hoke reached Sugar Loaf just as the first Union troops came ashore. Kirkland's Brigade and Thomas Lipcomb's 2nd South Carolina Cavalry were the initial Confederates in position to oppose the landing. As the rest of Hoke's division arrived after their march from Wilmington, Hoke entrenched them on Sugar Loaf and deployed only Kirkland's Brigade as skirmishers. Hoke declined to mount an all-out assault against Terry's exposed men because of his concern for the massed guns of the Union Navy and the Myrtle Sound and swamp that intervened between his force and the landing party. Hoke also remembered his assault against Fort Harrison outside Richmond the previous September. For whatever reasons, Hoke only watched the landings proceed and positioned his force to block any Union move north toward Wilmington. Hoke's actions did nothing to relieve the anxiety that Colonel Lamb experienced in the now increasingly isolated Fort Fisher.

By 8:30 a.m. on the 13th when Lamb ordered his Cumberland Battery to fire on the New Ironside, the fate of the fort was sealed. This first projectile struck the New Ironside and fell harmlessly into the ocean. The battle that followed saw heroic struggles by the defenders and the attackers; however, the force brought to bear against Fort Fisher was simply too powerful for the defenders to repulse. By 10:00 p.m. on January 15th, General Grant's conclusions about the first Battle of Fort Fisher had proven correct. The Editor of the Richmond Examiner had also proven correct, "General Bragg to Wilmington. Goodbye Wilmington."

 Trivia Questions for February *****

1 – Among the earliest Union victories during the Civil War, the actions against Confederate positions at Fort Hatteras and Fort Clark in August 1861 committed Union forces to take North Carolina's coastal plain. Why were these earlier actions important?

2 – After Burnside's Expedition in 1862 secured much of Eastern North Carolina, why did Union forces fail to mount stronger expeditions against the Wilmington & Weldon Rail Road?

3 – John Bell Hood was seriously wounded at Gettysburg and later at Chickamauga. He surrendered to Union forces at Natchez, Mississippi on May 31, 1865. What was Hood's fate after the end of the war?
