February 1865 saw the first official political meeting between the North and the South when Lincoln met members of the Confederacy to discuss peace. Lincoln rejected what they offered. Throughout the whole of the American Civil War, Lincoln had held the simple belief that America was one nation and that it would remain so.

February 1st: Illinois became the first state to ratify the 13th Amendment.

Sherman continued his advance through South Carolina.

February 3rd: Lincoln met the three Confederate representatives (Stephens, Turner and Campbell) on the 'River Queen' in Hampton Roads. Lincoln rejected their peace plan based on an independent south. He told them bluntly that America was one nation and one nation only. Lincoln insisted that the Union had to be restored before anything else was discussed.

February 5th: Union troops made further inroads into Confederate defences around Petersburg. If Petersburg fell, Richmond would be the next target. Therefore Petersburg had major significance for both sides in the war. Desertion was a major issue in the Confederate Army and the main cause of desertion was lack of food. Lee's request for more food for the Army of Northern Virginia was met with silence in Richmond. This was more because they had no way of addressing Lee's request more than indifference to the suffering of the soldiers.

February 7th: Lee's men drove back Union troops at Boydton Plank Road but by now he only had 46,000 men to defend 37 miles of trenches – about 1200 men per mile.

February 8th: Sherman's men continued their policy of destroying empty buildings as they advanced through South Carolina. This resulted in the Confederate general, Wheeler, complaining to Sherman that accommodation was being destroyed. However, Sherman had given orders that no building that was occupied should be destroyed but unoccupied ones should be.

February 9th: Jefferson Davis offered an amnesty to anyone who deserted the Confederate Army as long as they returned to their regiment within 30 days.

February 11th: Sherman cut off Augusta from Charleston by cutting the Augusta-Georgia railway. One of the Confederates few remaining armies was based in Charleston and it was in danger of being surrounded.

February 14th: Jefferson Davis urged the defenders of Charleston to hold until the last possible moment.

February 15th: Sherman's army approached Columbia.

February 16th: Sherman's troops arrived on the south bank of Columbia and the city was evacuated. Charleston prepared to evacuate.

February 17th: Columbia was occupied by Sherman's troops. Most of the city was burned to the ground. Some said the fires were started by retreating Confederate cavalry units but most accept it was men from Sherman's army. Men from Sherman's army were actively pursued by Sherman's provost guard, which would seem to indicate their guilt. Sherman later refused to express his sorrow for the destruction of Columbia. Charleston was also evacuated.

February 18th: Charleston surrendered.

February 20th: The Confederates House of Representatives passed a bill authorising the use of slaves as soldiers.

Wilmington, the last port that the Confederates possessed, was bombarded by Union forces.

February 21st: A sign of the divided opinion within the Confederacy: the Senate postponed a debate on whether the Confederacy should use slaves as soldiers.

The defenders of Wilmington prepared to evacuate the port.

February 22nd: Union troops entered Wilmington.

Lee began to plan his last campaign.

February 27th: Union troops started a major move up the Shenandoah Valley. 10,000 Union cavalry advanced against severely depleted Confederate units.

February 28th: One of the Union cavalry divisions in the Shenandoah Valley was commanded by George Armstrong Custer.

John Bell Hood's Tennessee Campaign: In His Own Words

As he had begun at our January 2014 meeting, Stephen M. "Sam" Hood revealed additional details contained in the recently discovered papers of General John Bell Hood. His focus during this meeting was the Tennessee Campaign and General Hood's actions and reasons for making the decisions he followed during the course of that campaign. Using the words and records of the likes of Jefferson Davis, Stephen D. Lee, Alexander P. Stewart, U. S. Grant, and P.G.T. Beauregard, Sam laid out the plan and the need for the Confederate's plunge into Tennessee. Unlike what some historians have written, the need for the Confederate Army of Tennessee to take offensive action was supported by Davis and ranking officers in that army.

If you have interest in this part of Civil War history, Sam's next book, The Lost Papers of Confederate General John Bell Hood, will be released during February 2015. As Sam did in John Bell Hood: The Rise, Fall and Resurrection of a Confederate General, his new book will likely change perceptions held about General Hood and his place in Civil War history.

* Trivia Questions for February *******

1 – Among the earliest Union victories during the Civil War, the actions against Confederate positions at Fort Hatteras and Fort Clark in August 1861 committed Union forces to take North Carolina's coastal plain. Why were these earlier actions important? They helped Union morale and established bases for the Union Navy to stop privateering against Union merchant ships.

2 – After Burnside's Expedition in 1862 secured much of Eastern North Carolina, why did Union forces fail to mount stronger expeditions against the Wilmington & Weldon Rail Road? The Wilmington & Weldon became a critical link to supply the Confederate armies in Virginia. Several attempts were made to cut the rail road with quick strike raids; however, major strikes were not attempted by the Union Army.

Why? Join the CFCWRT on February 12th as Dr. Fonvielle will explain his thoughts about Eastern North Carolina and its place in Union war planning.

3 – John Bell Hood was seriously wounded at Gettysburg and later at Chickamauga. He surrendered to Union forces at Natchez, Mississippi on May 31, 1865. What was Hood's fate after the end of the war? Hood had planned to permanently reside in Texas, but economic necessity made him pursue commercial ventures in a less war-torn New Orleans. A soldier from early in his life, Hood had to seek his livelihood in the business world. After borrowing $10,000 from friends in his native Kentucky, Hood established J.B. Hood and Co., Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants with partners, John Barelli and Fred Thayer.

On April 30, 1868, Hood married Anna Marie Hennen. Anna, educated in Paris, was a member of a prominent New Orleans family. In the next ten years, John and Anna had eleven children – three sets of twins. Lydia was born in 1869. Oswald, the tenth, was born in 1879.

The cotton business initially struggled and in 1869, Hood took over James Longstreet's insurance business. From 1870 until 1878, the fortunes of both enterprises improved. Hood was successful and devoted himself to his family, to business affairs, and to gatherings for Confederate veterans. Hood, Anna, and their growing family lived in an elegant home in the Garden District and Hood traveled frequently throughout the South.

It was also during this period that Hood became embroiled in conflict with Joseph E. Johnston and other Confederate officers about the causes of Southern failures during the war. Hood's Advance and Retreat was published in 1880.

In 1878, the people of New Orleans were exposed to a yellow fever epidemic. Businesses failed as people fled the city. By early 1879, Hood was financially ruined. The yellow fever returned in 1879 and Hood was unable to take his family out of the city to safer environs. Anna Hood died on August 24, 1879, one month after the birth of Oswald. Lydia and Hood followed Anna in death on August 29th and August 30th.

The surviving ten children were adopted by families throughout the country. Organizations of Confederate veterans, especially the Texans of his old brigade, raised funds for the children's future support and education.

John Bell Hood's Tennessee Campaign: In His Own Words

Historians and other writers have spent considerable ink speculating about Hood's motives, beliefs, and objectives, and the result has not always been flattering or even fully honest. Now, long-believed "lost" firsthand accounts previously unavailable offer insights into the character, personality, and military operations of John Bell Hood the general, husband, and father.

Using these previously thought lost papers, Stephen "Sam" Hood will explain the why, when, where, and how of John Bell Hood's Tennessee Campaign.

Stephen M. "Sam" Hood is a graduate of Kentucky Military Institute, Marshall University (Bachelor of Arts, 1976), and a veteran of the United States Marine Corps. A collateral descendent of General John Bell Hood, Sam is a retired industrial construction company owner, past member of the Board of Directors of the Blue Gray Education Society of Chatham, Virginia, and is a past president of the Board of Directors of Confederate Memorial Hall Foundation in New Orleans. Sam resides in his hometown of Huntington, West Virginia and Myrtle Beach, South Carolina with his wife of thirty-five years, Martha, and is the proud father of two sons: Derek Hood of Lexington, Kentucky, and Taylor Hood of Barboursville, West Virginia.

* January 1865 *******

The First Battle of Fort Fisher in December 1864 had ended in a debacle for the Union Army and Navy. Admiral David Dixon Porter and General Benjamin Butler had failed to coordinate their efforts against the last major blockade running port open to the Confederacy. The Union troops that had landed north of the fort had been rescued without serious challenges from Braxton Bragg's troops assembled at Sugar Loaf. Even as the dispirited Union forces returned to their bases, General Grant had begun to formulate a plan that would quickly return Union forces to the Cape Fear. General Bragg, unlike Chase Whiting and William Lamb who feared a quick Union return, ordered that the troops at Sugar Loaf be returned to Wilmington and other locations. Seldom had two generals reached such different conclusions about the same set of events. For Wilmington and Fort Fisher, Grant and Bragg would soon test whether the Union or Confederate conclusions were sound.

On January 6, 1865, a newly appointed Union general, Alfred Terry, and his Union Army transports sailed south from Hampton Roads toward Fort Fisher. Admiral Porter's fleet was delayed by rough seas; however, by 10:00 p.m. January 12, fifty-eight warships and twenty-two army transports began their rendezvous off New Inlet at Fort Fisher. Colonel William Lamb, at the Pulpit in Fort Fisher, saw an increasing number of twinkling lights as they appeared in the dark ocean off the coast. Lamb, having received no warning from headquarters in Wilmington, notified General Bragg of the Union fleet's presence. As Lamb had feared, the Union fleet and army were back.

General Robert Hoke had his entire 6,424 man division in route from Wilmington to Sugar Loaf by steamer and march by 1:00 a.m. on the 13th. Colonel Lamb had 800 artillerymen of the 36th North Carolina Regiment to defend the fort from the coming assault. The overall Confederate commander, General Bragg, had done little since the December attack to strengthen Fort Fisher with men or equipment. Bragg had failed yet once again.

By January 1865 many in the South knew that the war was lost, despite the upbeat stance of Jefferson Davis. The only thing in the South's favour in January was the weather that continued to hinder the North.

January 3rd: Sherman readied his men to continue their advance north to challenge Lee.

January 4th: Union troops started their second assault on Fort Fisher; 8,000 men were involved.

January 5th: Both General Lee and Jefferson Davis continued to be upbeat about the South's military situation. Many others in the Confederacy were a lot more pessimistic about the South's chances. Lincoln gave James W Singleton a Presidential pass to get through Union lines to help facilitate a surrender.

January 6th: Davis sent a letter to the Confederacy's Vice-President, Alexander H Stephens, asking for an explanation regarding Stephens alleged association with Georgia's peace movement.

January 9th: The Constitutional Convention of Tennessee voted to abolish slavery in the state.

January 11th: The Constitutional Convention of Missouri voted to abolish slavery in the state.

A party of 300 Confederate cavalry riding in very poor weather launched a surprise attack on Union positions in Beverley, West Virginia, and captured 600 Union troops.

January 12th: Jefferson Davis wrote in a letter to Lincoln that he willing to discuss an end to hostilities but only on the proviso that the South remained independent.

January 13th: The North started a major attack on Fort Fisher. The fort was all that protected the port of Wilmington – the only port that the South still had open that could trade with Europe. Troops were landed by the fort and the Union's navy bombarded it from the sea.

January 14th: Union ships continued a non-stop bombardment of the fort, which received heavy damage. Guns in the fort had to be trained on both the approaching infantry on land and the ships out at sea. But all of the guns could not be concentrated on one target alone.

January 15th: Fort Fisher fell to Union forces. The North lost a total of 1,341 men in the attack (226 killed, 1018 wounded and 57 missing). The South lost 500 men killed and wounded with over 2,000 taken prisoner. Wilmington was no longer able to operate as an overseas port and the South was effectively cut off with regards to external trade.

January 16th: Lincoln was made aware that Davis was willing to discuss peace based around the South's independence. He immediately dismissed the idea.

The Confederate Senate appointed General Lee as commander of all the armies of the Confederacy.

January 17th: While in Savannah, Sherman issued Field Order Number 15. As his successful army advanced in the South, it attracted many former slaves who followed it in the vanguard. Sherman's order handed to them confiscated or abandoned land along the Georgia coast – a maximum of 40 acres per person. This move ensured that those former slaves who were near Sherman's army were more than willing to help and support it. As the news of what Sherman had done spread, so did the hopes of former slaves still in the South.

January 19th: General Lee reluctantly accepted the title of commander-in-chief of the South's Armies. Lee was undoubtedly a highly skilled general but he would have been aware that even a man of his abilities would not have the skill to stop the inevitable – a victory for the North. However a sense of duty compelled him to accept the promotion even if it was a poisoned chalice.

January 20th: Sherman's army headed towards South Carolina. However, its advance was severely hampered by heavy rain that made roads all but unusable.

January 21st: Sherman's army marched into South Carolina but faced no opposition from Confederate forces.

January 23rd: The South lost its ironclads 'Virginia' and 'Richmond'. 'Richmond' ran aground on the James River while 'Virginia' was badly damaged by Union artillery in Fort Parsons.

January 24th: Grant agreed to an exchange of prisoners. He did not believe that it would make any difference to the campaign as he felt that the exchanged Southern prisoners would be less than keen to fight and the South was still experiencing major problems with desertion.

January 25th: Sherman continued his advance through South Carolina. All his men faced were skirmishes with Confederate troops. There appeared to be no sustained military attempt to stop his advance – or there was a realisation that any attempt was doomed to failure.

January 27th: Lee complained to the Confederate government in Richmond that his men were surviving on pitiable rations and that the major cause of desertion was the poor rations. On the same day he sent a letter to the Governor of South Carolina that "the Confederacy was safe” as long as the civilian population continued to give its support to the troops.

January 28th: Davis appointed senior Confederate politicians to hold informal talks with the North – Vice-President Stephens, President of the Senate, R Turner and former US Supreme Court judge John Campbell.

US Park Service Ranger, Emmanuel Dabney, provided a detailed talk about the conditions the Union and Confederate soldiers faced on a daily basis during the long Petersburg campaign. Emmanuel discussed the fortifications, the artillery, the sharpshooters, the rations, medical care, relief efforts for the soldiers, religious services, and morale in the trenches. His description of the conditions that the US Colored troops faced was especially enlightening – from their actions to gain equal pay for their services to their combat at the Crater, theirs was a story of challenges from their own command as well as hostility from the Confederate troops.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – Confederate General Patrick Cleburne died from wounds received during his gallant but reckless actions at the Battle of Franklin. What led to his actions? See answer to question 2.

2 – How did Union General John M. Schofield’s escape Hood’s trap at Spring Hill, Tennessee in November 1864? Join us at the January 8th meeting where Sam Hood will provide the answers to these questions and several others.

The lost papers of John Bell Hood offer more than 200 documents. While each document is a valuable piece of history, some shed important light on some of the war’s lingering mysteries and controversies. For example, several letters from multiple Confederate officers may finally explain the Confederate failure to capture or destroy Schofield’s Union army at Spring Hill, Tennessee, on the night of November 29, 1864. Another letter by Lt. Gen. Stephen D. Lee goes a long way toward explaining Confederate Maj. Gen. Patrick Cleburne's gallant but reckless conduct that resulted in his death at Franklin. Lee also lodges serious allegations against Confederate Maj. Gen. William Bate. While these and others offer a military perspective of Hood the general, the revealing letters between he and his beloved and devoted wife, Anna, help us better understand Hood the man and husband.

3 – How many soldiers were engaged during the 292 day Petersburg Campaign? Per Emmanuel Dabney's presentation, greater than 200,000 Union and Confederate troops were engaged in this long and difficult campaign. Dabney characterized the actions at Petersburg from the words left by one of the participants, "Dig, dig, dig. Boom, boom, boom."

4 – Confederate Fort Mahone and Union Fort Sedgwick were located within a few hundred yards of each other along the Jerusalem Plank Road. What names did the soldiers give to these hotly contested fortifications? Fort Mahone was "Fort Damnation" and Fort Sedgwick was "Fort Hell." The forts were so close together that each drew heavy artillery and rifle fire from July 1864 until April 1865.

The sites, especially Fort Sedgwick, were well preserved until bulldozed to make place for a shopping center in 1967.

William H. McLaurin of the 18th North Carolina Infantry wrote years after the war, "The story of Petersburg will never be written; volumes would be required to contain it, and even those who went through the trying ordeal, can not recall a satisfactory outline of the weird and graphic occurrences of that stormy period." Yet, soldiers (including McLaurin) through letters, diaries, or memoirs attempted to make sense of the hell that was in the trenches before Petersburg.

* December 1864 *******

The Confederacy suffered during December 1864. Sherman's "March to the Sea" brought total war to Georgia - the reality of this type warfare would never be forgotten by those who were in the path of this march. The Union victory before the gates of Nashville witnessed the disintegration of the Confederate Army of Tennessee. Fort Fisher, the last major open port for blockade runners, was attacked on December 25 and would fall to a combined Union navy and army force in early January 1865.

By Christmas 1864, The Confederate States of America had a little over three months to exist. William T. Sherman's pronouncement in December 1864 had come full-circle –

You people speak so lightly of war. You don't know what you are talking about. War is a terrible thing. I know you are a brave, fighting people, but for every day of actual fighting, there are months of marching, exposure and suffering. More men die in war from sickness than are killed in battle. At best war is a frightful loss of life and property, and worst still is the demoralization of the people

You mistake, too, the people of the North, They are a peaceable people, but an earnest people and will fight too, and they are not going to let this country be destroyed without a mighty effort to save it.

Besides, where are your men and appliances of war to contend against them? The Northern people not only greatly outnumber the whites at the South, but they are a mechanical people with manufactures of every kind, while you are only agriculturists – a sparse population covering a large extent of territory, and in all history no nation of mere agriculturists ever made successful war against a nation on mechanics.....

The North can make a steam-engine, locomotive or railway car; hardly a yard of cloth or a pair of shoes can you make. You are rushing into war with one of the most powerful, ingeniously mechanical and determined people on earth – right at your doors. You are bound to fail. Only in your spirit and determination are you prepared for war. In all else you are totally unprepared, with a bad cause to start with.

At first you will make headway, but as your limited resources begin to fail, and shut out of the markets of Europe by blockade as you will be, your cause will begin to wane If your people would but stop and think, they must see that in the end you will surely fail

Sherman held the view that was voiced by Dr. Melton McLaurin during his November presentation to our Round Table, "the South's foolish decision" to leave the Union was doomed from the start of hostilities.

An example that stands out in my memory from past reading: In 1864, the Harvard-Yale Regatta became an annual event the North had been fighting the war with "one hand tied behind its back."

* December 1864 *******

In December 1864, Sherman continued with his desired plan - an advance on Savannah. He reached the city before Christmas and offered the city to Lincoln as a Christmas gift. Sherman planned to use the rest of December to allow his troops to rest before marching north to link up with Grant in preparation for an all-out attack on Richmond.

December 1st: The Union army commanded by Schofield, entrenched itself in Nashville and dominated the Cumberland River.

December 2nd: Sherman was halfway to Savannah. His subordinates in Nashville were ordered by Washington to confront and defeat Hood's Army of the Tennessee. However, very poor weather hindered both armies.

December 8th: General Grant made it clear that he supported the President's wish that Hood should be attacked immediately by Schofield's men. Either that or he wanted Schofield replaced. The Union commander in Nashville was General Thomas, a subordinate of Schofield. He telegraphed Grant that his cavalry had no horses and that any attack not supported by the cavalry was doomed to failure.

NOTE: Schofield was actually subordinate to General Thomas. General Schofield's actions during the battles around Nashville did not support claims that Schofield made after the war. General George H. Thomas, the Rock of Chickamauga, made the Union victory at Nashville possible against Hood's army.

Source: "Schofield and Thomas: Blind Ambition at Nashville"; http://generalthomas.com/Schofield_and_Thomas.htm (Accessed November 3, 2014).

Editor

December 9th: Appalling weather in Nashville made all forms of fighting near impossible. Roads had been reduced to quagmires.

December 10th: Sherman's army arrived in Savannah.

December 12th: Thomas telegraphed Grant with the information that he would attack Hood as soon as the weather improved.

December 13th: In a further blow to the defenders of Savannah, Sherman's men established a route to the sea that would allow the Union Navy to supply his army. Grant appointed Major-General John Logan to replace General Thomas in Nashville.

December 15th: Once the weather had cleared Thomas ordered an attack on Hood's army at Nashville. The only thing that saved Hood was the shortened day. Other than failing to finish off Hood's army, the attack was an overwhelming success with 1,000 men taken prisoner.

December 16th: Thomas conveys the news to Grant. He followed up the attack with a further massive attack using all the men at his command – 50,000. Hood could only muster 30,000 men. The Army of the Tennessee put up a good defence but defeat was almost inevitable. 4,500 Confederate troops surrendered, 1,500 men were either killed or wounded. 59 out of 156 artillery guns were captured. Hood could only order a retreat for those who survived – a retreat that had to be executed in the dead of winter with minimal supplies.

December 17th: Hood's men started their retreat to Columbia.

December 18th: Savannah refused to surrender to Sherman.

December 19th: Such was the confidence of Sherman – and his numerical advantage – that he could afford to send troops to Grant to assist in the attack on Richmond.

December 20th: The Confederate force in Savannah left the city. 10,000 men managed to withdraw from the city but they were still facing in the field an army six times larger than them. Savannah fell to Sherman. The Confederates left behind in the city 250 heavy artillery guns and 25,000 bales of cotton.

December 21st: Sherman entered Savannah.

December 22nd: Sherman telegraphed Lincoln the following: “I beg to present you, as a Christmas gift, the city of Savannah.”

December 24th: Union forces started an attack on Fort Fisher in North Carolina. This fort defended the only remaining port open to the Confederacy – Wilmington. The largest Union naval force of 60 warships gathered before the fort to blast it into submission. However, their task was not easy. The design of the fort and the inaccuracy of those bombarding the fort meant that many Union shells fired from the ships simply flew over the fort and into Cape Fear River.

December 25th: 6,000 Union troops landed to take Fort Fisher but the fort's guns were still intact and kept them pinned down. A rumour that Confederate reinforcements were on their way, convinced the commanders on the ground that they should withdraw.

December 26th: The Union troops at Fort Fisher were evacuated. Lincoln ordered an investigation as to what went wrong and why what should have been a relatively easy victory turned into a full-scale withdrawal.

December 30th: Lincoln proposed to remove General Ben Butler from the command of the Army of the James. It was Butler who commanded the abortive landing at Fort Fisher. Grant also had a very low opinion of Butler's ability.

December 31st: Sherman's army rested in Savannah in preparation for its advance north to support Grant.

Could the South Have Won?

Dr. Melton McLaurin presented a most thought-provoking look at the prospects of a Southern victory during its quest for independence. He systematically addressed the differences between the industrialized North and the agrarian South that existed in December 1860. Population, manufacturing capacities, railroad and other transportation systems, religious and educational institutions were among the areas of society which Dr. McLaurin covered in his spirited talk.

An outspoken Southern planter class and an equally rabid abolitionist Northern faction exerted influence beyond their actual numbers during the 1850s and early 1860s. Their influence pushed each section toward a fracture with the protections written into the Constitution that could have prevented an armed conflict.

Whether you agreed with Dr. McLaurin's views or not, his presentation laid out the depth to which slavery had embedded itself into the fabric of the United States.

* Civil War Ancestors *******

Do you know what your ancestors did during the Civil War? Previously, Bruce Patterson shared the story of two members of his family.

If you would like to share stories of your kinsman or kinswoman and their lives during or after the Civil War, forward a short article and I will gladly include in The Runner so others may learn your family's history.

 Civil War Ancestors 2 *****

Arthur MacArthur Jr. rejected an appointment to West Point and insisted that he join the Civil War effort. Judge MacArthur, a Wisconsin lawyer and jurist, arranged a commission as a first lieutenant with the 24th Wisconsin for his son. The seventeen year old Arthur saw action at Perryville, Stones River, Chickamauga, and Chattanooga. He was a brevet Colonel at war's end and decided to remain in the army. In 1890, MacArthur received a Medal of Honor for his actions at Missionary Ridge in 1863. General MacArthur fought in the Philippines during the Spanish-American War and would become its governor general during the Filipinos resurrection.

Arthur MacArthur and his now civilian boss, William Howard Taft, had differed on the conduct of the Filipinos resurrection and the creation of a civilian government in the Philippines. MacArthur was returned to the United States where he harbored resentments toward civilian politicians and those he considered as deskbound warriors of the army general staff.

MacArthur and his son, Douglas MacArthur would become the first father-son to receive the Medal of Honor.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – How long did the Petersburg Campaign last? The Petersburg Campaign began on June 15, 1864 when Confederate troops, commanded by P.G.T. Beauregard, prevented Union troops from taking this important manufacturing and transport hub. The campaign ended on April 2, 1865, when massed Union forces, commanded by U.S. Grant, breached the Confederate defensive trenches. The 292 day campaign was the longest in United States history.

(Accessed November 23, 2014).

2 – How many combatants were involved and how many casualties resulted from this extended Petersburg Campaign? The armies at Petersburg were in almost constant transition, making the determination of troop strength a moving target. In general, Union troop strength exceeded that of the Confederates by nearly two-to-one for most of the campaign. Even at the end of the campaign, on April 2, 1865, Lee evacuated more than 50,000 men out of Richmond and Petersburg, while Grant's combined armies counted at least 110,000 men by that time. Although precise figures are hard to come by, the best estimates suggest 42,000 Union casualties and 28,000 Confederate casualties, in total.

(Accessed November 23, 2014).

3 – The Battle of the Crater was one of the well known fights during the Civil War. When did this battle occur? The 48th Pennsylvania Infantry excavated a 510-foot tunnel beneath a Confederate fort southeast of Petersburg. On July 30, 1864, they packed the galleries with 8,000 pounds of powder and ignited the fuse. The blast created a huge gap in the Confederate line, sending more than 300 South Carolinians to their graves. The attacks that followed failed to match the engineering success. Poor planning, communications, and leadership robbed the Battle of the Crater of its potentially decisive results. Bold Confederate counterattacks repaired the breach, focusing particular bitterness upon the black troops who participated in the assaults. Grant pronounced it "the saddest affair I have witnessed in this war."

Source: <http://www.civilwar.org/battlefields/petersburg/10-facts-about-the-petersburg.html>

4 – Per Dr. Melton McLaurin's November 13th presentation, what was the Confederacy's "only prayer" to gain its independence? Official recognition by the major European powers – Great Britain and France – and their monetary and military support of Confederate cause was needed to secure Southern independence. Charles Francis Adams, Lincoln's foreign minister in London, was instrumental in thwarting efforts of Confederate diplomats to gain that official recognition.

5 – Was King Cotton ever a serious advantage for the cause of Southerner Independence? The initial strategy of the Confederacy was to withhold cotton from the European manufacturers. The thought that this action would create extreme chaos in the British and French economies did not materialize. At the very time the Confederacy needed every credit to purchase weapons and war materials, its own strategy began the ultimate failure of the Southern cause.

Other markets, India and Egypt, developed to replace Southern cotton.

Whether the Southern cause could ever have been successful has been debated since 1865. In a war of attrition, the South was in an extremely poor position to gain independence.

“That Wasn’t the Way it Happened”

I remember a Civil War story that I used to hear Irvin S. Cobb tell when he was a newspaper reporter and I was a struggling lawyer in Paducah. It seemed two Confederate veterans were reminiscing about the days during the war when Paducah was being fought over by Northern and Southern forces. “I remember,” one veteran said, “when we pushed those damyankees all the way across the Ohio and up into Illinois!” The other old soldier regretfully corrected him. “I was there, old Friend,” he said, “and I’m afraid that wasn’t the way it happened at all. Those Yankees drove us out of Paducah and almost to the Tennessee line.” The first veteran reflected a bit, then sourly remarked, “Another good story ruined by an eyewitness!”

Could the South Have Won?

Dr. Melton McLaurin will present his analysis of the possibilities of the South winning its independence during the American Civil War 1861-1865. * November 1864 *******

In November 1864 Lincoln won the election for President. In the South, such was the impact of Sherman that a call for the people in Georgia in rise up against him received minimal support. Towards the end of November the state capital, Milledgeville, was burned and looted by Sherman’s men.

November 1st: Promised supplies had not arrived and promised repairs to railroads were not carried out – both of which seriously hindered Hood in his attempt to defeat Sherman in the South.

November 5th: Hood met General Beauregard at Tuscumbia to discuss their strategy against Union forces. Most senior officers under Hood wanted him to actively seek out Sherman while Hood himself wanted to launch an offensive north towards the Union. This prospect greatly concerned officers under Hood who could not comprehend why Hood would let Sherman and his army roam around the South unhindered.

November 7th: The Congress of the Confederate States of America met in Richmond. Jefferson Davis spoke in an optimistic manner underplaying the loss of Atlanta. Davis also publicly urged Hood to seek out Sherman and defeat his army. Hood had other ideas. He wanted to march into Kentucky and Tennessee to launch an attack on the Union forces based there so that Union troops would be sucked away from their armies opposing Lee in the Eastern Theatre to support their comrades in Tennessee/Kentucky. In view of Hood's lack of supplies, he probably did not have a full knowledge as to his true military situation when compared to the armies that opposed him.

November 8th: Lincoln won the Presidential election. He had feared a move towards the Democrats because of his belief that the war was becoming unpopular. In fact the Republicans increased their representation within both the House and the Senate. The election results indicated to Davis and the Confederate Congress that there would be no negotiated peace settlement.

November 9th: Sherman ordered the resumption of the Union advance into Georgia. He ordered General Thomas to defeat the army of Hood while he planned to advance north to assist Grant in his defeat of Lee. Grant was fighting 1,000 miles away so Sherman marched his men to Savannah to allow for a march up the eastern coastline. Bolstered with plenty of supplies acquired from Atlanta, Sherman was confident of success. He also knew that the land his men were marching through was rich in supplies.

November 11th: Union troops in Atlanta and Rome destroyed anything that could be of use to the Confederacy before they left. In Atlanta all buildings except churches and a few houses were destroyed.

November 14th: Lincoln accepted the resignation of Major-General George McClellan – the man who had opposed him in the election. Lincoln promoted Sheridan to the rank of Major-General.

November 15th: The destruction of Atlanta was completed. The economic hub of Georgia was destroyed – this action by Sherman created much bitterness in the South.

November 16th: Sherman's army of 60,000 men left Atlanta. The twenty days rations they carried came from the city and left the people there with little to eat or drink. Facing Sherman's large army was just 20,000 Confederate troops with few supplies.

November 17th: Davis denounced any Southern state that intimated that as an individual state it might seek a peace settlement with the Union. In particular, he was concerned that Georgia might do this and contacted the state's senators accordingly.

November 19th: A call to arms in Georgia met with little response – it was as if the morale of the state had imploded after the treatment handed out to Atlanta. There was a fear that what had happened to Atlanta might happen to other areas within the state if they were seen to be still opposing Sherman.

November 20th: Confederate forces continued to harass Sherman's army as it advanced to Savannah – but with little success. Sherman's response was to order the destruction of even more property.

November 22nd: Sherman's army entered Georgia's state capital, Milledgeville. The city was burned and looted.

November 23rd: General William J Hardee was given command of the army that was meant to oppose Sherman's march to the sea.

November 29th: Hood's Army of Tennessee had the opportunity to defeat a Union army at Spring Hill, Tennessee, but failed to do so because of a collapse in the ability of senior officers to communicate with one another.

November 30th: Hood continued in his attempt to defeat the Union force at Franklin, Tennessee. Both armies numbered 23,000 men. The North lost a total of 2,326 men but the battle cost Hood's army dearly – 6,252 men were lost, including six generals. The Union army, commanded by General Schofield, moved on to Nashville while Hood's men had to remain on the land in increasingly poor weather.

Lincoln and the War's End

John C. "Jack" Waugh discussed his book which covered the last five months of the Civil War. Jack especially concentrated on the last 20 days that witnessed Lincoln's extended visit to General Grant's HQ at City Point, Virginia. Grant had invited Lincoln to come to City Point to observe what was hoped to be the final campaign of a long and bloody conflict.

As winter changed into spring, Grant worried that Lee would move out of the entrenchments around Petersburg before the Union forces could deliver a final blow. Grant worried that Lee could gain a march on Union troops and unite with Joseph E. Johnston's Confederate army in North Carolina. The possibility of Lee's escape made possible the continuation of the war. Grant and President Lincoln had seen enough of the horrors of war. Grant determined to strike Lee's emaciated army with all his available force.

Bringing Sheridan from the Shenandoah Valley, Grant wanted an attack made against Lee's extended right flank on March 29th. Lee had one more attack; he would commit half of his thinning ranks to break into the rear of the Union army and cause Grant to release his death grip. On March 25th, John Brown Gordon led the ANV against Fort Stedman. The Confederates were too weakened to sustain an attack. Within days, Sheridan destroyed a substantial Confederate force at Five Forks. On April 2nd, Grant attacked the center of the Lee's line. Grant was in the field, but shared the overwhelming successes with Lincoln.

Lincoln received captured Confederate battle flags from Grant's victories. Lincoln visited Richmond almost as soon as it fell to Union troops. Lincoln was greeted as a messiah by the black population who had remained in the devastated seat of the Jefferson Davis's Confederate government. On April 9th, Lee surrendered his shattered army to Grant at Appomattox Courthouse. Lincoln had seen his foremost hopes achieved, the Union was to be preserved and the divided nation was to be reunited.

Within days after Lee's surrender, Abraham Lincoln would be felled by an assassin's bullet. His achievements during the last five months of the war would remain important to the nation's future.

Now he belongs to the Ages

Colonel William C. Falkner was born in Tennessee but moved to Mississippi at fifteen years of age. Falkner led the 2nd Mississippi at Manassas in July 1861. When voted out of command of the 2nd, Falkner returned to Mississippi and raised several bands of partisan rangers. After the war, he was active as a railroad builder and as a writer of romantic novels (The White Rose of Memphis). His great-grandson, William C. Russell Crawford Mitchell served as a sergeant in Hood's Texas Brigade. Severely wounded at the Battle of Sharpsburg, Mitchell was demoted for inefficiency, but served as a nurse in Atlanta. After the war, Mitchell became a lumberman who profited from the rebuilding of the Atlanta destroyed by William T. Sherman. Also rising from the ashes of Atlanta, a granddaughter, Margaret Mitchell, wrote a Pulitzer Prize-winning novel Gone with the Wind.

Churchill's essay examined the Battle of Gettysburg and it outlined steps which Churchill believed would have enabled Robert E. Lee and his Army of Northern Virginia to gain a victory on that field. Who was the catalyst for a Confederate victory? Remember that Winston Churchill took part what was the "last" British cavalry charge at Omdurman in September 1898. He was a 23 year old lieutenant in the 21st Lancers. 33 years later, Churchill theorized that Jeb Stuart made a successful attack on the rear of Union lines on Cemetery Hill. Sans George Armstrong Custer's actions, Stuart's attack spread panic among the Union troops that were waiting on Cemetery Hill to repulse the Pickett-Pettigrew-Trimble attack.

3 – Jack Waugh called the April 1st Battle of Five Forks the "Waterloo of the Confederacy." Who commanded the Confederate defense at Five Forks and where was he during the critical stage of the battle? Robert E. Lee had ordered Major Gen. George Pickett and his infantry division, with the support of cavalry the under command of Thomas Munford, W.H.F. Lee and Thomas Rosser, to hold the Five Forks crossroads at all costs. If the Confederates were defeated, Lee would lose his last supply line via the South Side Railroad.

While Phil Sheridan personally supervised the Union attacks, Gen. Pickett and his commanders attended a shad bake. Pickett was unaware of the battle.

4 – What role did the River Queen play in the final days of the Civil War? The riverboat was Grant's ship while his HQ was at City Point, Virginia. The River Queen was the site of the Hampton Roads Peace Conference on February 3, 1865. The ship later brought President Lincoln, Mary Todd Lincoln, her maid, twelve year-old Tadd, and two guards to visit Grant at City Point. After Sherman's victory at Bentonville, Sherman ventured north to visit with Lincoln, Grant, and Admiral David Dixon Porter aboard the River Queen. At this famous gathering, the president and his military leaders discussed peace terms for the collapsing Confederacy.

5 – Which unit of the ANV received the attack that broke Lee's line on April 2nd? The 18th North Carolina, as always, was in the thick of the fighting at Petersburg on that April morning. Composed of units from New Hanover, Bladen, Columbus, Robeson, and Richmond counties, the 18th served in many of the ANV engagements throughout the war.

From a history of the 18th Regiment:

In late March, General Lane deployed his men in the works between Hatcher's Run and Battery Greg (the site of present-day Pamplin Park). General Lane reported a distance of eight to ten paces existed between defenders. It showed a token defense at best.

Brigadier General John Decatur Barry

Note: John Decatur Barry of the 18th NC will forever be linked to the wounding of Stonewall Jackson at Chancellorsville in May 1863. After the war, Barry returned to Wilmington as a newspaper editor. Barry is buried in Oakdale Cemetery.

On the morning of 2 April, 14,000 men in the Union Sixth Corps advanced and swept the North Carolinians from their defensive positions. According to Chaplain Alanson Haines of the Fifteenth New Jersey, "The defenders of the fort showed the greatest obstinacy... Some refusing to surrender were shot down." Private Frank Esq, of the Fortieth New Jersey, captured the colors of the Eighteenth North Carolina and received the Medal of Honor for his deed.

Though fighting desperately, the Eighteenth did not give up. Some assembled at Battery Gregg, and others made a stand at some works near a dam. The entire brigade fell back. On the night of 3 April, the Eighteenth camped at Amelia Court House. Major Wooten, of the Eighteenth, commanded the sharpshooters, and they engaged the enemy, on 5 April, near Farmville. On 9 April 1865, General Lane received orders to stack their arms. At Appomattox, the Eighteenth North Carolina Troops surrendered ninety-four officers and men. They were paroled and headed back to the Old North State.

6 – On November 30, Hood's Army of Tennessee attacked John Schofield's army at Franklin, Tennessee. The Confederates suffered a devastating defeat. How many Confederate generals died as a result of wounds received during this battle? Six Confederate generals died during the attack on Union breastworks at Franklin: Patrick Cleburne, John Carter, John Adams, States Rights Gist, Hiram Gransbury, and Otho Strahl. Only Cleburne, Strahl, Adams, and Gransbury were laid out on the back porch of the Carnton Plantation house.

The Peacemakers by George P.A. Healy

How important was the conference aboard the River Queen on March 28, 1865? As outlined in his Second Inaugural Address, Lincoln had promoted the idea of a peace “with malice toward none” I think Lincoln outlined his thoughts on the war’s end and the terms to be offered to the defeated Confederates. At Appomattox and at Bennett Place, two of the Union’s hardest commanders, Grant and Sherman, offered generous to their former foes.

Lincoln and the War's End

On October 9th, John C. Waugh will discuss Abraham Lincoln during the final five months of the Civil War. Mr. Waugh will follow President Lincoln from his re-election in November 1864 through the end of the war in April 1865.

In early December Lincoln sent his last annual message to Congress. In late January 1865 he successfully pushed through Congress the 13th Amendment ending slavery throughout the United States. On March 4 Lincoln delivered his second inaugural address, one of the great speeches in the English language. Late that same month, as the war appeared about to end, he made an extended sixteen-day visit to Grant's army before Petersburg. On April 4 he walked into a just surrendered and burning Richmond with his son Tad and sat in Jefferson Davis's chair. A week later Lee's army of Northern Virginia surrendered at Appomattox Court House and Lincoln saw his four long years of toil ended in victory.

October 1864, the Confederate General Hood believed that the only way to fight Sherman was to confront him. In this he was supported by Jefferson Davis. Hood knew that constant retreating was demoralising his men. Hood's approach won the admiration and respect of the man he was trying to defeat - Sherman.

October 1st: The body of Rose O'Neal Greenhow was found on a beach near Wilmington, North Carolina. She was one of the foremost Confederate spies in Washington DC and passed onto General Beauregard the plans of General McDowell on the eve of what became known as the Battle of Bull Run. Fearing her ship might be boarded on her return from Europe, Greenhow took to a small boat to row ashore but it must have overturned and she drowned.

Rose and "little" Rose

General Hood decided that an offensive campaign was the only way ahead for him against Sherman. Hood decided that Sherman's supply lines were too long and therefore were vulnerable to attack.

October 2nd: Confederate troops cut the Western and Atlantic Railroad – an important part of Sherman's lines of communication.

October 3rd: Jefferson Davis made a speech at Columbia, South Carolina, declaring that if everyone supported the work of Hood, he was confident that Sherman would be defeated.

Hood's men broke the track of the Chattanooga-Atlanta railroad, a further blow to Sherman.

October 4th: Hood's men destroy fifteen miles of railway near Marietta.

October 5th: Hood's men attacked Union positions that defended the railroad pass at Allatoona. The Confederate attack was defeated. Such was the importance of this victory, that Sherman sent a personal message of thanks to Major General J M Corse who commanded the Union troops at Allatoona.

October 6th: General Thomas Rosser led a Confederate cavalry force against General George Custer at Brock's Gap. It failed.

Thomas Lafayette Rosser and George Armstrong Custer – USMA Class of 1861

October 9th: Generals Custer and Lomax led a successful cavalry attack against Confederate positions in the Shenandoah Valley.

October 13th: Maryland voted to abolish slavery within the state.

A Confederate force destroyed twenty miles of railway near Resaca.

October 18th: General Early decided to attack General Sheridan's army despite being heavily outnumbered. He knew that he could not simply just move and then move on still more. Not only could he not adequately feed his army, he knew that such a tactic was demoralising his men.

October 19th: Early 10,000 men attacked Sheridan's 30,000 troops at Cedar Creek. Early's advance was disguised by fog and his attack achieved near total surprise. However, the early Confederate successes could not be sustained and by midday the exhausted Confederates withdrew. Early's army lost 3,000 men in total. The Union lost over 5,550 men in total but Sheridan's army could sustain this.

October 20th: Sheridan decided not to pursue Early as he no longer considered them to be a sustainable fighting force.

October 22nd: Hood continued with his aggressive campaign against Sherman. However, he was aware that lack of supplies was becoming a major issue.

October 23rd: The South suffered a defeat at Brush Creek in Missouri. Both sides lost about 1,500 men.

October 26th: Sherman recognised that his opponent, Hood, was a highly able commander. He said of him: "He can turn and twist like a fox and wear out my army in pursuit."

Bloody Bill Anderson was killed in an ambush at Richmond, Missouri.

The last Confederate offensive in Missouri ended.

October 27th: General Grant launched an attack against Confederate positions in Petersburg but it was beaten back.

October 31st: Hood's attempt to draw Sherman away from Atlanta failed. Hood's army was heading in one direction while Sherman's was heading further into the Confederacy.

 Lincoln's Second Inaugural Address *****

“With malice toward none, with charity for all.....” These were among the most well known words used by any president. These words were used to signify what Lincoln's second term was going to accomplish – “to bind up the nation's wounds.”

I had never read the entire address. It is a short, but powerful document that discussed a need for faith, a need for ending slavery, and a need for a lasting peace.

Fellow-Countrymen:

AT this second appearing to take the oath of the Presidential office there is less occasion for an extended address than there was at the first. Then a statement somewhat in detail of a course to be pursued seemed fitting and proper. Now, at the expiration of four years, during which public declarations have been constantly called forth on every point and phase of the great contest which still absorbs the attention and engrosses the energies of the nation, little that is new could be presented. The progress of our arms, upon which all else chiefly depends, is as well known to the public as to myself, and it is, I trust, reasonably satisfactory and encouraging to all. With high hope for the future, no prediction in regard to it is ventured.

On the occasion corresponding to this four years ago all thoughts were anxiously directed to an impending civil war. All dreaded it, all sought to avert it. While the inaugural address was being delivered from this place, devoted altogether to saving the Union without war, insurgent agents were in the city seeking to destroy it without war—seeking to dissolve the Union and divide effects by negotiation. Both parties deprecated war, but one of them would make war rather than let the nation survive, and the other would accept war rather than let it perish, and the war came.

One-eighth of the whole population were colored slaves, not distributed generally over the Union, but localized in the southern part of it. These slaves constituted a peculiar and powerful interest. All knew that this interest was somehow the cause of the war. To strengthen, perpetuate, and extend this interest was the object for which the insurgents would rend the Union even by war, while the Government claimed no right to do more than to restrict the territorial enlargement of it. Neither party expected for the war the magnitude or the duration which it has already attained. Neither anticipated that the cause of the conflict might cease with or even before the conflict itself should cease. Each looked for an easier triumph, and a result less fundamental and astounding. Both read the same Bible and pray to the same God, and each invokes His aid against the other. It may seem strange that any men should dare to ask a just God's assistance in wringing their bread from the sweat of other men's faces, but let us judge not, that we be not judged. The prayers of both could not be answered. That of neither has been answered fully. The Almighty has His own purposes. "Woe unto the world because of offenses; for it must needs be that offenses come, but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." If we shall suppose that American slavery is one of those offenses which, in the providence of God, must needs come, but which, having continued through His appointed time, He now wills to remove, and that He gives to both North and South this terrible war as the woe due to those by whom the offense came, shall we discern therein any departure from those divine attributes which the believers in a living God always ascribe to Him? Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. Yet, if God wills that it continue until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil shall be sunk, and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn with the sword, as was said three thousand years ago, so still it must be said "the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in, to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations.

 September Program *****

Richard Triebe's research into the Union Prisoner Camp at Point Lookout, Maryland provided much information about the operation of this largest camp in the North. Richard began his program with descriptions of the prisoner exchange processes that existed early in the war. Neither North nor South was prepared for the prisoners who were taken during the large battles that began in 1861. Commanders on the field arranged exchanges as quickly as could be negotiated. The Dix-Hill Cartel established more formal exchange mechanics on July 22, 1862.

In mid-1863, the Lincoln administration stopped prisoner exchanges in response to the failure of the Confederacy to include black soldiers with equal treatment in the exchange process. This action flooded both prison camps in the North and South with soldiers who endured horrid conditions in the poorly planned and equipped prisons. The Confederate government, which found it increasingly difficult to provision its own forces, found itself with thousands of Union prisoners. The results of the cessation of exchanges and the depredations endured by those unlucky enough to be taken prisoner caused further calls for retaliations against the offending governments.

Point Lookout was designed for a population of 10,000 prisoners – 22,000 would be confined there at its largest. A total of 52,000 Confederates passed through its gates. As instructed by Secretary of War Edwin Stanton, Colonel William Hoffman, commander of Point Lookout, never ordered the construction of permanent barracks – the men lived in tents. Per Richard's research, approximately 3,800 men died during their captivity.

For whatever reasons, the administration of prisons, North and South, was the most shameful failure during the American Civil War.

 Civil War Ancestors *****

Do you know what your ancestors did during the Civil War? Last month, Bruce Patterson shared the story of two members of his family.

If you would like to share stories of your kinsman or kinswoman and their lives during or after the Civil War, forward a short article and I will include in The Runner so others may learn your family's history.

 Photographs – What Story Do They Tell? *****

Sgt. Andrew Martin Chandler of the 44th Mississippi Regiment and Silas Chandler posed for this tintype in 1861. This photograph was one of the most striking and enigmatic images recorded during the war. What was the true relationship between master and slave?

An August 24, 2014 article in the Washington Post by Michael E. Ruane examined the photograph and part of its story. How the men were bound together will never be known, but Raune's article provided insight into the relationship and how it played out during and after the war.

The article also related how the picture was purchased from Andrew Chandler's great-great-grandson, Andrew Chandler Battaile, by McLean collector Tom Liljenquist. Mr. Liljenquist added the Chandler photograph to the collection of over 1,200 Civil War era photographs he had previously donated to the Library of Congress.

 Trivia Questions for October *****

1 – On March 4, 1865, Abraham Lincoln took his second oath of office. Who administered that oath of office? Chief Justice Salmon Chase. Chase had been Secretary of the Treasury until his appointment to the Supreme Court during 1864.

Source: <http://www.bartleby.com/124/pres32.html> (accessed September 19, 2014).

2 – On April 4, 1865, President Lincoln and his son Tad visited Richmond. Lincoln visited the Confederate White House. What activity did Lincoln perform during his visit? Supposedly, Lincoln entered Jefferson Davis's office and sat in the Confederate president's chair. Lincoln also visited the State Capitol and Libby Prison.

Source: <http://www.nps.gov/rich/historyculture/lincvisit.htm> (accessed September 19, 2014).

3 – Who was Gibson Jackson Butcher? Gibson arrived at the United States Military Academy on June 3, 1842 as a member of the incoming class of 1846. Recommended by Virginia Congressman Samuel L. Hays, Butcher had placed higher on an examination than three other hopefuls and he was expected to do well at the academy. Upon learning the discipline, the duties, the studying and marching that was to be his lot in the next four years, Gibson quietly and quickly departed West Point and returned to Virginia.

Gibson arrived at his home in western Virginia. He soon visited Jackson's Mill and informed one of the examination hopefuls of his decision to forego the appointment to West Point. That hopeful was Thomas J. Jackson.

Tom Jackson admitted that his lack of a formal education had left him "very ignorant." Jackson knew he would have to work extremely hard to obtain academic success. He had a strong desire to obtain the appointment and to earn an education at what former President Andrew Jackson had called "the best school in the world." Ladened with recommendations from Gibson Butcher and many others, Jackson headed to Washington, DC where he was to begin his journey into American history.

4 – The United States Military Academy Class of 1846 began with 122 cadets in late June 1842. How many of these cadets met success in the rigors that was the academy and graduated four years later? Captain Erasmus Keyes, a West Point instructor and 1832 graduate, described the academy as:

.... the only society of human beings I have known in which the standing of an individual is dependent wholly on his own merits as far as they can be ascertained without influence. The son of the poorest and most obscure man, being admitted as a cadet, has an equal chance to gain the honors of his class with the son of the most powerful and richest man in the country. All must submit to the same discipline, wear the same clothes, eat at the same table, come and go upon the same conditions. Birth, avarice, fashion and connections are without effect to determine promotion or punishment.... (a) model republic in all things saving respect to constituted authority and obedience to orders, without which an army is impossible.

Among those 122 cadets were George B. McClellan, Darius N. Couch, John Gibbon, Ambrose Powell Hill, Dabney H. Maury, George E. Pickett, Jesse L. Reno, George Stoneman, Cadmus M. Wilcox and the last to enter, Thomas J. Jackson. After physical and mental examinations, 92 remained to begin the summer encampment on the plain at West Point. Thomas J. Jackson was the last name on the list of the 92 cadets who would begin classes.

When the four years of study were completed, 59 cadets graduated with the Class of 1846. George B. McClellan graduated 2nd, Darius N. Couch 13th, John Gibbon graduated in 1847, Ambrose Powell Hill graduated in 1847, Dabney H. Maury 37th, George E. Pickett 59th, Jesse L. Reno 8th, George Stoneman 33rd, Cadmus M. Wilcox 54th, and Thomas J. Jackson 17th.

Source: John C. Waugh, The Class of 1846 – From West Point to Appomattox: Stonewall Jackson, George McClellan and their Brothers [New York: Ballentine Books, 1994], xiii –xvi.

5 – The members of the Class of 1846 graduated just as the war with Mexico began. What was the fate of this “band of brothers” in the years between 1846 and 1865? Fifty-three of the fifty-nine fought in the Mexican War. Four died during that conflict. Two more died during the Indian Wars of the 1850s. Of the fifty-three who remained at the beginning of the Civil War, twelve became Union generals and ten became Confederate generals. One Union and three Confederate generals died during the Civil War.

Source: John C. Waugh, The Class of 1846 – From West Point to Appomattox: Stonewall Jackson, George McClellan and their Brothers [New York: Ballentine Books, 1994], x.

6 – What role did Secretary of War Edwin Stanton play in the operation of the Union prisoner of war camp at Pt. Lookout Maryland? As presented in Richard’s program, Stanton was strongly opposed to secession and the Confederate government. He also favored harsh treatment of Confederate prisoners in retaliation for the conditions that Union prisons had endured in the southern prisons. To that end, Stanton forbade the construction of permanent housing structures at Point Lookout.

OFFICE COMMISSARY-GENERAL OF PRISONERS,
Washington, D.C., October 17, 1863

Brig. Gen. G. Marston
Commanding Depot of Prisoners, Point Lookout, Md.:

GENERAL: Your plans and estimates for barracks at Point Lookout have been submitted to the Secretary of War, but he declines at this time to order the barracks constructed. It will, therefore, be necessary to have on hand a supply of tents to meet any unexpected arrival of prisoners, and I have, therefore, to request you will make requisition for sufficient tents, with what you have on hand, to accommodate 10,000 prisoners.....

Very respectfully yours, your obedient servant,

W. HOFFMAN

Colonel Third Infantry and Commissary-General of Prisoners

Source: OR Series II Vol. VI, page 390.

Again per Richard’s talk, Stanton was not the only one who felt retaliation was needed for the miserable conditions in southern prisons. Senator Benjamin Wade and others pushed through Congress a resolution that called for harsh treatment of the rebels, enlisted and especially officers.

7 – What was the largest prison camp during the war? Camp Sumter at Andersonville, Georgia was designed to hold 10,000 Union prisoners – at its largest, more than 30,000 men were confined to what was best described as a “hell-on-earth.” Approximately 13,000 men died. Camp commander, Captain Henry Wirz, was hung in Washington, D.C. on November 10, 1865 for his actions against Union prisoners confined at Camp Sumter.

 Thoughts *****

On September 15, 2014, President Obama announced that Lt. Alonzo H. Cushing, 4th United States Artillery. Battery A Artillery Brigade, 2nd Army Corps was to receive the Medal of Honor for his actions on July 3, 1863 at the Battle of Gettysburg. "During the advance, he was wounded in the stomach as well as in the right shoulder. Refusing to evacuate to the rear despite his severe wounds, he directed the operation of his lone field piece, continuing to fire in the face of the enemy," the White House statement said. "With the rebels within 100 yards of his position, Cushing was shot and killed during this heroic stand." This award came 151 years after the event and after its approval in the 2014 Defense authorization bill.

Alonzo H. Cushing

Congressional approval was needed because referrals for a Medal of Honor were supposed to be made within two years of the event. Former Senator Jim Webb of Virginia had long opposed the award for actions so long past. "As a point of observation, the Confederate Army lost more than 250,000 dead — one third of its soldiers — and received no Medals of Honor," Webb wrote in a letter to other senators in 2012. "While one would never wish to demean any act of courage, I believe that the retroactive determination in one case would open up an endless series of claims. The better wisdom for this body would be to leave history alone."

Webb had retired from the Senate and the language that Wisconsin Representative Ron Kind inserted in the 2014 Defense authorization bill found no opposition.

What do you think? Should history have "been left alone" or should the brave actions of a young artillery officer have been formally recognized? Senator Webb's remarks that Confederates "received no Medals of Honor" was indeed strange, and could lead to many other comments; however, a more pertinent question, Why was Cushing not nominated by his peers during or after the war? For actions during the war, over 1500 Medals of Honor were awarded to Union men and woman..... some of these medals were afterwards revoked. Why did the War Department not honor Cushing before the passage of 151 years?

* Letters to the Editor *******

Tim, I always enjoy reading the newsletter for the Roundtable. I noticed your remark about the uniqueness of the South being permitted to form a veterans group comparable to the GAR. The most amazing event after the war for me is the fact that the US War Department returned captured Confederate flags to their respective Southern states in 1905. I can't think on any other time in history this has happened between two former enemies. Can you imagine the former Soviet Union returning flags to Germany or China returning flags to Japan? I think the return of the flags was such a unique event.

 September 1864 *****

September 1864 - Near Atlanta, the South launched an attack against Union positions at Jonesboro. It was a failure but of greater importance to the Union was that those who fought at Jonesboro for the Union noticed that the Confederate attack was nothing like previous ones in terms of “weight nor persistence”. A loss of a further 2,000 men at Jonesboro (against 200 lost by the North) showed that the South was losing far too many men to be able to sustain the campaign in Atlanta.

Atlanta fell on September 2nd and such was the importance of taking the city that Lincoln ordered a day of national rejoicing on September 5th 1864. It is what happened in Atlanta itself that remains one of the most controversial incidents of the American Civil War. Sherman ordered that any building that was of no use to the military should be destroyed and that the city was to be for the military only - not civilians. Grant encouraged Sherman to continue being aggressive.

September 1st: The whole of Sherman’s army was employed against Jonesboro. The Confederates here withdrew at night leaving behind 3,000 prisoners. There was little in the way of Sherman’s army now and the decision was taken to evacuate Atlanta. What the Confederate Army could not take with them was destroyed.

September 2nd: General Lee suggested that slaves could be used for the labouring tasks done by the Army of Virginia. This would free up non-slave labourers for combat.

The first Union troops entered Atlanta – men from the 2nd Massachusetts Infantry. Sherman sent a message to President Lincoln, “Atlanta is ours, and fairly won”.

September 3rd: Lincoln declared that September 5th would be a day of national celebration.

September 4th: the Confederate raider, John H Morgan, who had been a continual thorn to the Union, was killed at Greenville, Tennessee.

In Atlanta, Sherman ordered all civilians to leave. He wanted the city to be a purely military zone. He also ordered the destruction of any buildings other than private residences and churches.

September 5th: A national day of celebration. Louisiana, occupied by Union forces, voted to abolish slavery in the state.

September 8th: George B McClellan accepted the Democrat nomination to stand against Lincoln in the November election. However, the Republicans were reaping the rewards of the fall of Atlanta. Many also questioned why a major general would want to stand against the army's commander-in-chief.

September 10th: Sherman received a message from General Grant urging him to continue with his aggressive offensive.

September 12th: Buoyed by Sherman's success in Atlanta, Lincoln contacted Grant to urge him to be more aggressive against Lee. However, Grant was aware that Lee was facing major problems and that his army was becoming desperately short of men who were capable of fighting. His army was bolstered by men from General Early's army but this left Early short of men in the Lower Shenandoah Valley. Early had 20,000 men to face a Union force of 43,000 men.

September 16th: Lee's army ran out of corn and there was no obvious way his Army of Virginia could be supplied, especially as there were food shortages across the Confederacy. Lee was saved by a daring Confederate raid behind enemy lines that captured 2,400 head of cattle.

September 19th: General Early's men were attacked by a much larger Union force at Winchester. Early lost a total of 3,921 men out of 12,000 while Union losses numbered 4,018 men out of 40,000 men. While General Sheridan, commander of the Union force that attacked Early could afford such losses, Early could not. Only a very skilled withdrawal by Early avoided a far greater number of losses.

September 22nd: A large Union force pursued Early. They clashed on the banks of Cedar Creek. Early lost a further 1,200 men and 12 artillery guns.

September 23rd: Early weakened army embarked on a rapid withdrawal. They were not vigorously pursued.

September 24th: Crops in the Shenandoah Valley was destroyed on the orders of General Grant.

September 25th: What was left of Early's army fell back to Brown's Pass in the Blue Ridge Mountains.

Jefferson Davis met with General Hood at Palmetto, Georgia, to discuss what they both agreed was the parlous state of the Confederate Army in the Western Theatre.

September 26th: Union forces attacked Early's men in the Blue Ridge Mountains.

September 27th: Confederate guerrillas continued to unsettle Union forces in the South. Especially successful was Bloody Bill Anderson who looted the town of Centralia in Missouri.

September 29th: Grant started a major assault on Richmond.

September 30th: Union forces took three miles of land in just one day in their attack on Richmond. Lee with just 50,000 men to protect the city informed Davis in Richmond that his position was bleak. Lee survived by sending reserves to areas where a Union breakthrough looked the most likely. However, he knew that it was not the solution to the problems he was facing. Lee himself took command of several counter-attacks, which were successful. But he did believe that he was delaying the inevitable.

Do you know what your ancestors did during the Civil War? Bruce Patterson shared the following about two members of his family.

If you would like to share stories of your kinsman or kinswoman and their lives during or after the Civil War, forward a short article and I will include in The Runner so others may learn you're your family history.

Henry Stroub(e)

Company A, 15th New York Engineer Regiment

15th & 50th New York Engineers Monument at Gettysburg

Henry Stroub(e) served his Country during the Civil War with service in the 15th NY Engineers. Stroub(e) was not with the Regiment for an extended period but it was during his enlistment that the 15th was committed to one of the most significant early battles of that great conflict.

The 15th Engineer Regiment was raised in New York City in response to President Lincoln's call for troops. Henry Stroub (spelled Stroube on the Regimental roll) joined Company A, 15th New York Engineer Regiment at the age of 26 on 23 September 1862. As was the practice during the Civil War, he immediately joined the Regiment which was preparing for a campaign against the Confederate Capitol of Richmond, Virginia. In order to reach Richmond, the Union Army of the Potomac would have to cross the Rappahannock River and drive the Army of Northern Virginia from positions on the south side of the river at Fredericksburg.

Thus the 15th Engineers found themselves on the north bank of the Rappahannock River before Fredericksburg, Virginia in December, 1862 when newly appointed Union General Ambrose Burnside decided to cross the river with 120,000 men and attack General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia who were dug into prepared positions on Marye's Heights, a wooded ridge to the south of and overlooking the city. The task for Union forces would be to cross the swift running Rappahannock, traverse the city of Fredericksburg and then attack Lee who held the high ground, south of the city. The date was 10 December 1862.

During the Civil War and for every conflict since, it is the Engineers that prepare the way for the Infantry and thus it was the 15th NY Engineer Regiment, together with the 50th NY Engineers, that was called upon to build three pontoon bridges over the Rappahannock while under Artillery fire from Marye's Heights and sharpshooter sniper fire from the city.

General Burnside began the assault with an artillery bombardment of the city the afternoon of 10 December. His Engineers followed immediately in their effort to build the bridges. They completed three bridges, with appropriate approaches by the night of 12 December. The Union Army attacked the morning of the 13th with disastrous results but the Engineers had done their job well. The bridges held and in fact were used in the Union assault and their subsequent retreat from Fredericksburg. Although there is no report of Henry Strobe's specific actions, he was no doubt in the thick of the action during that cold and wet operation.

Following the Fredericksburg Campaign, the Regiment went into winter camp but was called upon to construct corduroy roads in the vicinity as the dirt roads became impassible during the balance of the Northern Virginia winter.

Stroub was to remain with the Regiment until he was taken ill with Typhoid Fever and evacuated to a military hospital in Washington. His three year enlistment was cut short when he was discharged with disability on 25 March 1863. Henry Stroub had become a casualty of war due to disease rather than enemy action. Such was the case for more than 50% of all Civil War casualties. His records show that he was discharged with the rank of Artificer signifying that he had become a specialist in one or another discipline required for duty within the Regiment.

Henry Stroub, like so many of his fellow citizens answered his Country's call to arms in the defense of Union. As members of the (New York) Militia, they were the epitome of the Citizen Soldier.

The Military History of William H. Dobbs (1829-1885)

William Dobbs was an ordinary laborer who made his living as a painter. That was before April 1861 when the Civil War began.

Dobbs was married (Sarah Newman, 23 October 1854) and living in Cold Spring, NY (Putnam County) when the New York State Militia began recruiting in order to meet the levy imposed on each state by President Lincoln. Dobbs enlisted (9 August 1862) in the newly formed 6th Heavy Artillery Regiment, raised from Putnam, Rockland and Westchester Counties. He was assigned to Company L for a contracted three year period.

The 6th Heavy Artillery (HA), following a period of training, was assigned to the defense of Washington, DC and in July of 1863, took part in the Second Battle of Manassas followed by the Mine Run campaign. The Regiment then spent the winter of 1863-64 in Winter Quarters at Brandy Station, VA (see picture) as part of the Army of the Potomac preparing for what became the most intensive and prolonged action of the war. The action of 1863 was just a foretaste of what was to follow, for in 1864, President Lincoln gave command of the Army of the Potomac to General Ulysses S. Grant with orders to defeat the Army of Northern Virginia (Robert E. Lee's battle tested troops) and ultimately capture the Confederate Capitol in Richmond.

The Regiment had taken few casualties prior to 1864 but in May they fought the Battle of the Wilderness followed by the Salient and Harris House at Spotsylvania Courthouse. It was at the Salient that the 6th HA was forced out of their traditional Artillery role and deployed as Infantry taking 161 casualties on the afternoon of May 12th. There is no record of what William Dobbs role was on those fateful days but the record of the 6th is resplendent with vignettes speaking of individual heroism. Newspaper reports, mostly written by soldiers in the field, give evidence of the terror on the battlefield as Grant continually hounded Lee and his Army of Northern Virginia as they attempted to move south and defend Richmond. It was reported in the Westchester (NY) newspapers that the Confederate forces at Spotsylvania had been told that they were facing green (untrained) troops. They were shocked to learn to the contrary as they faced the 6th Heavy Artillery fighting with rifle and bayonet.

Although the 6th sustained their highest casualties at Spotsylvania, they were quickly committed to battle at North Anna and then Cold Harbor where Grant won the day by simply committing more troops to the battle than Lee could possibly fend off. The cost to the 6th was 133 men.

Gordon Rhea at Spotsylvania Courthouse – April 2015 CFCWRT Speaker

Following Cold Harbor, Lee went into defensive positions around Richmond and Petersburg, VA. The siege had begun. It was during the early stages of what would become a nine month standoff that William Dobbs became ill, ill enough to turn himself into the medics and on 27 June 1864, he was transferred to the 5th Corps Hospital at City Point, Virginia (the major Union supply point at the confluence of the James and Appomattox Rivers, downstream from Richmond and Petersburg) Our ancestor remained at City Point for two months but was finally transferred (by ship) to the Military Hospital in West Philadelphia, PA for discharge on 6 May 1865.

Pension records reflect that a serious illness had afflicted him throughout his military service but it wasn't until the siege of Richmond and Petersburg that he sought (recorded) medical help. There is no doubt that Dobbs suffered from what is now known as celiac disease.

Dobbs returned to New York and his family. He received a small pension and supported his family as best he could by continuing work as a day laborer and painter. He continued to suffer from celiac until his death from a cerebral hemorrhage (8 January 1885). The medical examiner commented at that time that he appeared at least 10 years older than his 56 years. He is buried in Saint Michael's Cemetery (Astoria, LI, NY)

William Dobbs enlisted when his nation called and as fate would have it, took part in some of the most furious fighting of the war. Civil War veterans (from both sides) looked to the battles at Spotsylvania and Cold Harbor as perhaps the bloodiest of the conflict. Current day Civil War historians look with awe upon those battles still wondering how the combatants, national cousins for the most part, could have continued the engagement as their brothers fell on each side of them. When it was over, Dobbs went home and picked up where he left off. He was mustered out of the service as a Private First Class on 6 May 1865 and was awarded the appropriate service buttons at that time. William Dobbs military service was not unique. He answered the call, performed his duty and returned to civilian life. As a member of the New York Militia he was the epitome of the Citizen Soldier.

* Thoughts *******

I recently read several articles in the Winter 2014 issue of The Museum of the Confederacy Magazine. The articles were written by John M. Coski and they basically told of a story of Confederate veteran organizations and their importance in the resurrection of a defeated section of a reunited nation.

Coski's stories got me to thinking: Has any other nation allowed those who participated in a civil war and lost, to organize its defeated soldiers into veteran groups who honored the memory of their losing efforts? I cannot think of one other nation where this occurred whether in the ancient or modern world. Rome, England, France, Russia, Spain, China, the Balkans, and Syria? "Off with their heads" was and is more than a cliché. Most winners did not and do not embrace the losers in a civil conflict.

So what is the point?

Even though the United States was slow in seeing the North and the South to really embrace, it happened and compromise was achieved. It was a hard process and as recent events have shown, it is a continued process. That being said, the path that Abraham Lincoln, Ulysses S. Grant, Robert E. Lee, William S. Sherman, Joseph E. Johnston and others took in April 1865 was truly unique.

“The Most Famous Private in the Civil War” – Private William Scott, 3rd Vermont Infantry

A number of years ago while looking into an April, 1862 minor skirmish, Rick Eiserman came across a number of references to a Vermont soldier identified as “the most famous private in the Civil War”. Surprise and curiosity led to more research, including a “surprise family vacation”, to examine the facts and fiction behind the story of Private William Scott, 3rd Vermont Infantry. Killed in battle with less than a year of service, how did a young private end up with: an 1863 poem about him read in the White House and the U.S. Senate chamber; a 1914 movie and a 1929 radio play made about his exploits; and a Vermont highway named in his honor?

 April 1864 *****

April 1864 saw the American Civil War move into its fourth year. The improved weather meant that the month saw action on all the fronts. April 1864 witnessed another controversial incident in the war at Fort Pillow in Tennessee (April 12th).

April 2nd: The improving weather resulted in action throughout all of the theatre of war.

April 6th: The Constitutional Convention of Louisiana, meeting in New Orleans, adopted a new state constitution that abolished slavery.

April 8th: The Senate passed a joint resolution by 38 to 6 to abolish slavery. It also approved of the 13th Amendment to the Constitution.

Union forces suffered a defeat at Sabine Cross Roads. They lost 113 killed, 581 wounded and 1541 missing or captured. The South suffered total losses of 1000 men.

April 9th: Grant sent orders to Meade, commander of the Army of the Potomac. Meade's army had to follow Lee's Army of Northern Virginia wherever it went. Grant made it plain that the destruction of Lee's army was his top priority. "Wherever Lee goes, there you will head also."

In a follow-up to Sabine Cross Roads, Confederate troops attacked a Union force at Pleasant Bank. This was not a skirmish as both sides mustered 12,000 men. Both sides claimed a victory but ultimately it was the Confederates who were pushed back. The Union lost 150 dead, 844 wounded and 375 missing while the Confederates lost over 1,200 men.

April 11th: Union troops involved at Sabine Cross Roads and Pleasant Bank continue with their withdrawal from the Red River region.

April 12th: An attack by Confederate cavalry at Fort Pillow, Tennessee, became one of the most controversial incidents of the war. Fort Pillow was held by 557 Union troops, including 262 African-American troops. Confederate cavalry, commanded by Bedford Forrest, attacked and overwhelmed the fort. It was what happened next that caused controversy. Of the 557 defenders, 231 were killed and 100 wounded. A high percentage of the deaths were African-American soldiers. In the post-war Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War it was claimed by those who survived that former slaves were specifically picked out by Forrest's men after the fort had surrendered – a claim he denied. Forrest claimed that the fort's commander carried on fighting even after it was obvious that the fort would fall. However, even by the standards of the American Civil War, casualties were high.

April 16th: A report released by the Union government showed that 146,634 Confederate prisoners had been captured since the beginning of the war.

April 17th: General Grant refused anymore prisoner exchanges. From a military point of view this was an obvious move as it reduced even further potential Confederate military reserves. However, the decision also condemned many Union men held as prisoners to appalling conditions. The South could barely feed itself, let alone prisoners-of-war.

Editor Note: See the Peter Cozzens article about Camp Cahaba that follows in this newsletter.

April 20th: A sea-based attack on Fort William, near Plymouth, N.C., was a resounding success for the Confederates. Not built to withstand a sea attack, the fort quickly surrendered with the capture of 2,800 men. More important, 200 tons of anthracite coal was also taken. The victory, while of no great strategic importance, was a huge morale boost for the South. However, this also showed the plight of the South – celebrating a victory that had little importance to the overall way the war was going. Editor Note: The C.S.S. Albemarle and Robert F. Hoke secured one of the last pure victories for Southern arms.

April 22nd: Jefferson Davis sent out an order to Lieutenant General Polk that any captured African-American soldier who turned out to be an escaped slave had to be held until recovered by his owner.

April 26th: The loss of Fort William prompted Grant to pull out of Plymouth, North Carolina. In fact, Grant did not believe that the area had any strategic importance.

April 27th: Grant issued his orders for a spring offensive. The Army of the Potomac was to attack the Army of Northern Virginia head on. The Army of the James was to attack Richmond from the South. For Grant a co-ordinated and cohesive attack on the South's main fighting force was the start of the finish of the civil war. Grant believed that if his plan worked, the war would be over. He was not to know that on the same day Jefferson Davis sent Jacob Thompson to Canada to unofficially put out peace feelers for an end to the war.

April 30th: Davis sent out an order that any captured slave had to be returned to his owner.

 March Program *****

Shenandoah 1862: Stonewall Jackson's Valley Campaign

Source: Hal Jespersen, http://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Jackson_Valley_Campaign_Part2.png (accessed March 17, 2014).

Peter Cozzens presented a well reasoned study of the men and events that shaped the 1862 Shenandoah campaign.

Northern Leadership: Abraham Lincoln, Edwin Stanton, Nathaniel Banks, Irwin McDowell, John C. Fremont, and George B. McClellan.

Most of us, especially Southerners, probably believed that the campaign was a victory of a determined general and his men over numerically superior enemy armies. David slew Goliath! To many people, Stonewall Jackson became the stuff of legend and a hero throughout the South. Jackson had willed his small force to march faster, to march farther, and to fight harder than his adversaries. He had achieved his objective: Jackson had tied down large numbers of Union troops in the Valley and prevented their reinforcement of McClellan before the gates of Richmond.

Southern Leadership: Jefferson Davis, Joseph E. Johnston, R.E. Lee, Stonewall Jackson

Cozzens asked that we look closer into the Shenandoah campaign. Was it really the brilliant execution of Johnston and Lee's strategic plan and the tactical execution of that plan by Stonewall Jackson? Was it the ineptness of Banks, Fremont, and McDowell?

Cozzens proposed that this campaign was something of a different nature. To understand the 1862 campaign, Cozzens laid out the events that led to Lincoln's dismissal of George McClellan as General-in-Chief of Union armies on March 11, 1862. In short, Lincoln believed that McClellan had hoodwinked him about the strength of the Union troops left behind to protect Washington when the Army of the Potomac moved to attack Richmond via the Virginia Peninsula. Lincoln, with his Secretary of War, Edwin Stanton, not only removed McClellan from overall command of all Union armies, he and Stanton established three separate armies to operate in or near the valley. Nathaniel Banks was given command of the Department of the Shenandoah; John C. Fremont was given command of the Mountain Department in western Virginia; Irwin McDowell was given command of the Department of the Rappahannock. Each of these department commanders reported directly to Lincoln and Stanton. Per Cozzens, Lincoln's control of the strategy of Union arms led to the Union failure in the valley. Lincoln's plan involved the convergence of three armies in an attempt to trap and destroy Jackson between a pincer movement.

Lincoln and Stanton made two basic errors: 1) The Union command was fragmented by the establishment of three departments that had no coordinating communications capability. The Union commanders were unable to move their commands with the precession necessary to execute their orders from Lincoln. What looked brilliant on a rough map was not necessarily possible due to topography, weather, or condition of a command. 2) Their actions diverted troops from the prime objective: destruction of the main Confederate army defending Richmond. Had McDowell and his 40,000 men been committed to McClellan's drive on Richmond, would the reluctant McClellan have achieved success in destroying the Confederate Army?

Banks, Fremont, and McDowell may not have performed to the best of their abilities, but they were hindered by in some cases, poor supply, and in others cases, orders from Washington which made little sense for the current situation in the field and/or no knowledge to the actions of the other departmental commanders. When John Pope was given command of the three departments on June 26, 1862, Edwin Stanton informed Pope that the forces, that were to become the Army of Virginia, had been directed from Washington by the president and himself. Stanton said that the responsibility for the valley debacle rested not with the generals, but with Lincoln's and his directions.

Was Stonewall Jackson's performance in the valley the stuff of legends? He achieved his objective. Jackson's victories also came at a low-point for Confederate arms. His victories did revive the morale of the Confederate soldier and civilian population. Jackson's actions may have instilled resolve to carry on the fight for Southern independence in the hours of serious danger. Jackson's actions in the valley did reflect soon weaknesses. Jackson's preference to piecemeal commit troops to a battle and his hard handling of his men and himself would have serious consequence for Confederate arms during the coming Seven Days Battles around Richmond.

* Difference Makers *******

Editor Note: Do not be dissuaded by the length of the attached article. Cozzens shared a story about a truly remarkable man who commanded a Confederate POW camp in Cahaba, Alabama. Unlike Andersonville, Elmira, and other Confederate and Union camps, Cahaba had a prisoner mortality rate of 3% - read the entire story to learn about Howard Henderson and his most unlikely story.

Commandant Howard Henderson, C.S.A

by Peter Cozzens

On the afternoon of May 11, 1883, Hannah Simpson Grant died quietly in her home in Jersey City, N.J. Her son, Ulysses S. Grant, arrived later that day. To her pastor, the Rev. Dr. Howard A.M. Henderson, Grant entrusted arrangements for the funeral. Grant wanted no mention made of his own success. He asked Henderson simply to eulogize Hannah Grant as a "pure-minded, simple-hearted, earnest Methodist Christian."

Henderson

Camp Cahaba, Alabama

The man in whom General Grant placed so much trust had served honorably during the Civil War—but on the side of the Confederacy, and as the commandant of a prison camp. Soldiers in both armies despised Civil War prisons as places of hunger, harsh treatment and deadly diseases, and for the most part they excoriated prison commanders as cruel and cold-hearted. But Henderson was an exception. Gentle and genuinely concerned with the welfare of inmates, Henderson achieved with resources nearly as limited as those at Andersonville, Ga., something the commandant of that prison, Henry Wirz, couldn't: He kept his inmates alive. Under Wirz's regime, nearly a third of the 41,000 prisoners at Andersonville perished. At Cahaba, the mortality rate was 3 percent. According to Federal figures, only 147 of the 5,000 inmates died. The average mortality rate in Confederate prisons was 15.5 percent; in Union prisons, 12 percent.

There was little in the appearance of Cahaba, or in the conditions beyond Henderson's capacity to control—overcrowding, rats, lice and sometimes meager food—to suggest to new inmates their fate would be any different than that of their less fortunate countrymen at Andersonville.

But Henderson's humanity gave them hope.

Wisconsin cavalryman Melvin Grigsby entered Cahaba in the spring of 1864. His first stop was a room near the entrance. There Captain Henderson ordered him to surrender all his valuables, promising to keep a list and return everything "at the proper time." Grigsby was skeptical; surrendered possessions had a way of disappearing in prisons. But when Grigsby and several hundred other prisoners were transferred to Andersonville, Henderson not only returned all the prisoners' valuables, but also expressed his "sorrow and shame for the horrors of that shameful place."

The Confederates established Cahaba Federal Prison in May or June 1863 in an unfinished red-brick warehouse on the west bank of the Alabama River in Cahaba, Ala., the seat of Dallas County. The town owed its name to the Cahaba River, which looped around the northern side of the town before emptying into the Alabama. The prison's informal name was Castle Morgan, after famed Confederate cavalryman Brig. Gen. John Hunt Morgan. The brick walls of the warehouse stood 14 feet high and enclosed 15,000 square feet. An unfinished roof left 1,600 square feet in the center exposed to the elements.

Under the roofed portion of the warehouse, Confederate prison authorities built 250 bunks of rough timber, one atop the other. Around the warehouse they raised a 12-foot wooden stockade with a plank walkway at the top for the guards. At the southeast corner of the stockade they built a four-seat privy. Drinking water for the prisoners came from an artesian well emptied into an open gutter, which flowed 200 yards through town before entering the stockade.

In July 1863, Henderson became commandant of Cahaba. A month later he also was named an agent for the exchange of prisoners, a duty that often took him away from the prison. Henderson understood Northerners. He had graduated from Ohio Wesleyan University and studied law at the Cincinnati Law School. Preferring the church to law, he became a Methodist minister after graduation. Henderson was determined to run Cahaba with as much compassion as discipline and good order permitted, but the prison nonetheless had its share of problems. Quarters were cramped. In March 1864, there were 660 prisoners at Cahaba, a third of whom had to sleep on the dirt floor of the warehouse for lack of bunks. The polluted water supply posed a grave health threat. Prison surgeon R.H. Whitfield told the Confederate medical department that, in its course from the artesian well to the warehouse, the water "has been subjected to the washings of the hands, feet, faces, and heads of soldiers, citizens, and negroes, buckets, tubs, and spittoons of groceries, offices, and hospital, hogs, dogs, cows, and filth of all kinds from the streets and other sources."

In response to Whitfield's complaint, the quartermasters installed pipes to replace the open ditch, which gave the prisoners clean water to drink. But in the summer of 1864, General Grant ordered a halt in prison exchanges, and the population of Cahaba grew to 2,151 in October. Conditions deteriorated sharply. Cahaba became the most overcrowded prison, North or South. Each prisoner had only 7.5 square feet to call his own; those at incarcerated Andersonville had 35 square feet of space per man.

Rations dropped severely both in quantity and quality. The average daily issue became 12 ounces of corn meal, ground together with cobs and husks, 8 ounces of often rancid beef or bacon, and occasionally some bug-infested peas. Prisoners were not starved at Cahaba, but they were hungry enough that a gnawing desire for food permeated their dreams. "The same experience was often repeated," remembered Sergeant Jesse Hawes of the 9th Illinois Cavalry.

"Go to the bed of sand at 9:00 p.m., dream of food till 1:00 or 2:00 a.m., awake, go to the water barrel, drink, and return to sleep again if the rats would permit sleep."

The number of rats at Cahaba grew at about the same rate as the prison population until, Hawes said, they became a veritable plague. They burrowed into every corner of the warehouse and swarmed through the prison yard. "At first they made me nervous, lest they should do me serious injury before I should awake; but after several nights' experience that feeling was supplanted by one of irritation—irritation that they should keep waking me up so many times during the night, an annoyance that at length became nearly unendurable."

But rats were a minor annoyance when measured against the infestation of lice, from which no prisoner was free. Private Perry Summerfield said that after his first night at Cahaba he was so covered with lice that his clothes "looked more like pepper and salt than blue." Lice "crawled upon our clothing by day, crawled over our bodies, into the ears, even into the nostrils and mouths by night," Hawes said.

Hardest to bear were the human vermin that infested the prison. The most pernicious came from among the prisoners themselves. Called "muggers," they were a well-organized group of robbers for whom newcomers were the targets of choice. The muggers would beat a man senseless or render him defenseless with a rag of chloroform (obtained from guards in exchange for part of the muggers' profits), and then strip him bare of money, watch, jewelry and keepsakes that the prisoner had managed to secrete from prison authorities.

It took a giant of a man named Richard Pierce to bring order. Standing nearly 7 feet tall, with chest and shoulders "enormous for a man of his gigantic dimensions," the young private from the 3rd Tennessee Union Cavalry was so mild-mannered that his fellow inmates regarded him as an overgrown boy—until four muggers robbed his best friend. "Big Tennessee," as the prisoners called Pierce, tracked down the robbers and knocked all four of them senseless. Big Tennessee's two-fisted justice rallied the prisoners and cowed the muggers, the worst of whom joined the Confederates to escape retribution from their former victims.

There ironically was less human vermin among the guard force of 179 poorly trained conscripts. Most of the Confederates were humane and well-intentioned, but at least two stood out as cold-blooded murderers. One named Hawkins shot three men in one week from the walkway atop the stockade wall, recalled several former prisoners, "without the least shadow of reason or excuse for the murders."

Another assassin, a boy not more than 16 whom the prisoners dubbed "Little Charley," killed three prisoners. He shot two men at close range and bayoneted a third in the cooking yard, again for no apparent reason. One day Little Charley failed to appear on duty as expected, and among the prisoners the rumor arose that he had been granted a furlough for his "zeal as a guard." Hawes decided to find out for himself. "Was he given a furlough because he killed so many prisoners?" Hawes asked a friendly guard. "I guess so," drawled the Southerner, "that's what we 'uns allers heerd."

That murder would be condoned, much less rewarded, under Henderson's regime was unthinkable. But on July 28, 1864, a new officer had arrived to command the military post of Cahaba and the prison guards. He was Lt. Col. Samuel Jones, a cruel man who had been twice captured and paroled, and then passed over for command of his regiment. Jones came to Cahaba with the professed intention of seeing the "God-damned Yankees" suffer.

The commander of military prisons in Alabama and Georgia, Brig. Gen. John H. Winder, complained to Richmond that he had not requested, nor did he want, Jones at Cahaba. The inspector general's office opposed divided authority at prison camps and sided with Winder. They looked into Jones' records and found no orders assigning him to Cahaba, but he nonetheless remained at the prison. Henderson's duty as exchange agent took him away from Cahaba frequently. In his absence, Jones was in charge.

Jones instituted a unique form of punishment and applied it for violations of serious prison regulations. On a ladder resting against the outer wall of the stockade, Jones forced prisoners to grasp a rung just high enough so that their feet barely touched the ground, and then sustain their weight by their hands for a prescribed number of minutes. There certainly were worse forms of punishment in Civil War prisons, many of which were inflicted with less cause, but to men accustomed to Henderson's moderate discipline, Jones' methods seemed barbaric. Amanda Gardner, whose home stood just outside Cahaba Prison, also found Jones' behavior reprehensible. Gardner was a "thorough Rebel" who already had lost a son in the war and believed in the righteousness of the Southern cause, said one prisoner, but she abhorred brutality. When she demanded Jones cease punishing prisoners near her doorstep, the colonel rebuked her. "Your sympathy for the damned Yankees is odious to me," Jones told her. "Now bear yourself with the utmost care in the future or you shall be an exile." But Henderson intervened and endorsed all Gardner had done. After that, Jones left her alone.

Gardner did far more for the prisoners than protest cruel punishment. Soon after the prison opened she began sending gifts of food, which her young daughter Belle slipped through cracks in the stockade wall with the connivance of friendly guards. When winter came, she took up every carpet in her house and cut them into blankets in order to "relieve the suffering of those poor prisoners." Gardner lent the prisoners books from a large and varied collection that an uncle had left her. Prisoners had only to send a note by a guard to Amanda or Belle in order to borrow a book from the Gardner library.

The good effect Gardner's books had in alleviating tedium, which could sap a man's will to live, contributed to the low death rate at Cahaba. Relatively good sanitation also played a role. After Whitfield's report, water entered the camp in pipes rather than an open gutter. The water closet at the southeast corner of the stockade prevented human waste from contaminating the water supply.

The final factor favoring survival was the prison hospital, located in a rambling, two-story hotel called Bell Tavern that the Confederacy commandeered to serve both guards and prisoners. There were never quite enough cots to go around, but chief surgeon Louis Profilet and prison surgeon Whitfield treated Confederates and Northerners with equal consideration. Medicine was seldom in short supply. Men died in the Bell Tavern hospital, but not for want of care.

Neither did they die for want of effort by Henderson. In September 1864, Henderson, now a colonel, proposed a special exchange of 350 of Cahaba's inmates. The Union district commander, Maj. Gen. Cadwallader C. Washburn, forwarded the request to the commissary general of prisoners along with a favorable comment on Henderson's management of Cahaba. The proposal made its way to Grant, who denied it as part of his larger policy of prohibiting prisoner exchanges. As winter neared, Henderson suggested the Federals send a ship up the Alabama River under a flag of truce and deliver supplies to the prisoners. Henderson and Washburn overcame the reservations of their superior officers, and in December a Union steamboat offloaded at Cahaba 2,000 complete uniforms, 4,000 pairs of socks, 1,500 blankets, medicine, writing papers and envelopes, and a hundred mess tins.

Henderson had done his best. But the prisoners wanted food more than supplies, and most bartered their new clothing to guards for extra rations. When the food was gone, wrote Henderson sadly, the prisoners were left with the same "scanty clothing and ragged blankets in a climate particularly severe in winter."

In December, Cahaba was cursed with the arrival of a prisoner who nearly cost several dozen innocent men their lives. He was Captain Hiram S. Hanchett of the 16th Illinois Cavalry. Moments before Confederate cavalymen captured him near Nashville, Hanchett had shed his uniform and donned civilian clothing, on the mistaken assumption that the Rebels would let civilians go. Hanchett further incriminated himself by adopting an alias. As he marched into Cahaba, Hanchett knew that he had made himself subject to conviction and execution as a spy. To save himself, Hanchett concocted an absurd escape plan. He told a handful of prisoners his true identity and offered to lead them to the Confederate arsenal at Selma to steal weapons, and then another 125 miles to Federal lines at Pensacola, Fla. In the early morning hours of January 20, 1865, Hanchett and his co-conspirators overpowered the nine guards on duty and shoved them into the water closet.

Hanchett's band never made it beyond the gate. The corporal of the relief saw the scuffle and called for help. Hanchett yelled into the warehouse for 100 "men of courage" to join him in rushing the gate. No one responded. Jones entered the prison with cannons and 100 guards, threatening to blow Hanchett and his men "from hell to breakfast."

One of his coterie let slip that Hanchett was a Union officer, and Henderson wrote to the War Department for permission to court-martial him as a spy. His letter got lost in the crumbling bureaucracy of the dying Confederacy.

Henderson left Cahaba permanently in January 1865 for Union-held Vicksburg, there to dedicate himself to duties as agent for prisoner exchanges.

No sooner had Henderson left than a natural disaster of the first order confronted Jones. Late February downpours pounded the prison and surrounding country, and on March 1 the Cahaba River roared over its banks. A torrent of water swept through town and into the stockade. The water closet backed up, and by nightfall the prisoners found themselves waist-deep in fetid water.

The next morning a delegation of sergeants appealed to Jones to let the prisoners move to higher ground just outside the stockade. Jones refused for fear they might escape. As a dumbfounded Hawes recalled, "The possibility of an escape at that time was an absurdity. The whole country was flooded." Sixty Confederate guards signed a petition on behalf of the prisoners. But Jones stood fast, and the prisoners stood shivering in the water for three days before Jones relented and allowed small details to go out and gather timber to build platforms for the men to stand on. Softening a bit more, he also sent 700 prisoners to Selma to ease the overcrowding.

Nine days later, as the last of the waters drained from the stockade grounds, Jones told the incredulous prisoners that he was going to parole them all.

It was no act of charity on Jones' part; with the war winding down, Grant had relented on prisoner exchanges. For four weeks steamboats plied the Alabama River with prisoners from Cahaba. Most were taken to a neutral site outside Vicksburg called Camp Fisk to await formal exchange. On April 14, Union department commander Maj. Gen. Napoleon J.T. Dana telegraphed the War Department that 4,700 Federals were at Camp Fisk awaiting transportation home. Of that number, he said, 1,100 were sick, nearly all of whom were from Andersonville. "The rest of the prisoners," Dana reported, "are in excellent health, the Cahaba prisoners particularly."

Camp Fisk was the creation of Henderson and his Union counterpart, Colonel A.C. Fisk. When he learned exchanges were to be resumed, Henderson asked Fisk to send supplies to the prisoners at Cahaba. Fisk suggested instead that Henderson bring the men to neutral ground near Vicksburg, where they would be guaranteed ample rations and medical attention. Henderson agreed and enthusiastically hastened the transfers.

But the humane work of Henderson and Fisk ended in an unimaginable tragedy. On April 24, the paddle steamer SS Sultana left Vicksburg crammed with approximately 2,000 Union prisoners, more than half of them Cahaba men. The Sultana had bad boilers and a legal capacity of 376 passengers. Early on the morning of April 27, three of the four boilers exploded, and the Sultana sank near Memphis. Two-thirds of those on board died.

The notorious Captain Hanchett had perished several days earlier. With the war over and no one to convene a court-martial of the presumed spy, Colonel Jones took matters into his own hands and murdered Hanchett. Not long after, Jones vanished from history. Federal authorities tried for a year to find him. If they had, Jones might have been the only Confederate prison official besides Andersonville Commandant Henry Wirz executed for war crimes.

General Dana made certain no harm came to Colonel Henderson. For as long as he superintended exchanges at Camp Fisk, a battalion of Union cavalry was assigned as Henderson's personal bodyguard. But after John Wilkes Booth killed President Lincoln, no Confederate, no matter how well-meaning, was safe within Union lines. So Dana spirited him across the Mississippi River into a camp of Texas Rangers.

Henderson died in Cincinnati in 1912. Obituaries incorrectly said Henderson had been a Confederate brigadier general and omitted any mention of his duty as commandant of Cahaba prison. No matter. Few readers would have recognized the name Cahaba, and none could have found the place had they wanted. After the flood of 1865, the county seat moved to Selma. Within a decade white residents had dismantled their homes and churches and moved away. At the turn of the century a former slave bought the abandoned warehouse and demolished it for the bricks. Cahaba prison remained only in memoirs and fading memories.

 Trivia Questions for April *****

1 – How many military executions were carried out during the Civil War? More soldiers were executed during the American Civil War (1861–1865) than in all other American wars combined. Approximately 500 men, representing both North and South, were shot or hanged during the four-year conflict, two-thirds of them for desertion. The Confederate Articles of War (1861) specified that "all officers and soldiers who have received pay, or have been duly enlisted in the services of the Confederate States, and shall be convicted of having deserted the same, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as, by sentence of a court-martial, shall be inflicted." The General Orders of the War Department (1861, 1862, 1863) directed that those men convicted of desertion were "to be shot to death with musketry, at such time and place as the commanding General may direct."

Perhaps the most notorious mass execution came at the order of Major General George E. Pickett who, in February 1864, as commander of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina, authorized the hanging of twenty-two prisoners of war—men of the 2nd North Carolina Infantry (Union)—whom he deemed to have been deserters from the Army of Northern Virginia. After the war, United States authorities recommended that formal charges be filed against Pickett, and only the intervention of Ulysses S. Grant prevented his arrest and trial.

2 - What is the difference between Strategy and Tactics? You could read volumes about these subjects; however, I found the following simple definition in a business publication. I think that it applies to the use of these word definitions in business, politics, and military situations:

Strategy is done above the shoulders,
Tactics is done below the shoulders.

The Battle of South Mountain

Join us on December 12, 2013 when Rex Hovey, reenactor and Civil War sutler, will discuss the Battle at South Mountain and the North Carolina Monument erected to honor those troops who served there.

On Sunday, September 14, 1862, rear guard elements of the Army of North Virginia were involved in a desperate encounter on the crest of South Mountain, between Middletown and Boonsboro, Maryland. The battle on South Mountain began when the vanguard of General George McClellan's Army of the Potomac, emboldened with discovery of Robert E. Lee's Special Order 191, moved to strike the Confederates before their widely scattered forces could be re-concentrated. This often overlooked battle, which could have precipitated the possible destruction of Lee's Army, was the prelude to the Battle of Sharpsburg on September 17th.

The Gallant Pelham

Few men have been as noted for their courage in battle as was John Pelham of Alabama.

Pelham was at West Point when he made the difficult decision to serve his home state in the coming war. He served as commander of Jeb Stuart’s six-gun horse artillery battery in more than 60 actions before he was killed at Kelly’s Ford in March 1863. At Fredericksburg in December 1862, Pelham gained lasting fame when Robert E. Lee observed Pelham's two gun battery as it fired for over an hour from an exposed position on the Union line and noted: "It is glorious to see courage in one so young."

Upon Pelham's death, Jeb Stuart wrote:
"The noble, the chivalric, the gallant Pelham is no more How much he was beloved, appreciated and admired, let the tears of agony we have shed, and the gloom of mourning throughout my command bear witness. His loss to the country is irreparable."

Pelham observed war in a different context. He always served, even in the direst of situations, with courage and determination. After the first Battle of Manassas, Pelham wrote about his observation of warfare:

Lt. Col. John Pelham

I have seen what Romancers call glorious war. I have seen it in all its phases. I have heard the booming of cannon, and the more deadly rattle of musketry at a distance – I have heard it all nearby and have been under its destructive showers; I have seen men and horses fall thick and fast around me. I have seen our own men bloody and frightened flying before the enemy – I have seen them bravely charge the enemy's lines and heard the shout of triumph as they carried the position. I have heard the agonizing shrieks of the wounded and dying – I have passed over the battle field and seen the mangled forms of men and horses in frightful abundance – men without heads, without arms, and others without legs. All this I have witnessed and more, till my heart sickens; and war is not glorious as novelists would have us believe. It is only when we are in the heat and flush of battle that it is fascinating and interesting. It is only then that we enjoy it.

Pelham had no illusion about the gloriousness of war; however, he believed in his course of action: "I see the horrors of war, but it is necessary: We are battling for our rights and our homes. Ours is a just war, a holy cause. The invader must meet the fate he deserves and we must meet him as becomes us, as becomes men."

Agree with Pelham's reasoning or not, his actions always supported his beliefs. John Pelham was a difference maker.

* December 1863 *******

The armies on both sides of the American Civil War were effectively driven to a halt by the weather. The impact on the soldiers in the field was huge with scurvy and dysentery affecting many.

December 1st: Meade decided to withdraw the Army of the Potomac away from Richmond. In the previous few days, his army had suffered badly from the very poor weather.

George Meade

Bragg offered his resignation to Jefferson Davis after the defeat at Chattanooga. Even now, in the aftermath of a significant defeat, Bragg chose to blame others in his army, namely Major-General John Breckenridge, who he described as a drunk, and Cheatham who Bragg claimed was unfit for duty.

Braxton Bragg

December 2nd: Lieutenant-General W H Hardee was appointed on a temporary basis to succeed Bragg as commander of the Army of the Tennessee.

December 3rd: General Longstreet concluded that he did not have sufficient resources to take Knoxville, so he ordered his army to withdraw to its winter quarters at Greeneville.

December 4th: Persistent heavy rain made Longstreet's withdrawal very difficult for his troops who had to endure very harsh conditions.

December 7th: The fourth session of the Confederate Congress met in Richmond. Despite brave words from Jefferson Davis, all present knew that it had been a bad year for the Confederacy.

December 8th: President Lincoln announced the Proclamation of Amnesty and Reconstruction to Congress. He offered a full amnesty to those who fought for the Confederacy except to former Federal army officers who had resigned their commission to fight for the South. Anyone who was found guilty of mistreating Union prisoners was also exempt from any Presidential pardon as were senior government officials. Lincoln also promised that all property in the South (except former slaves) would be restored to their legal owners. He also guaranteed that any Southern state would be allowed back into the Union if just 10% of those in a state swore allegiance to the Union. Each of these states would also have to abandon slavery.

December 10th: The Army of the Potomac went into its winter quarters as no more manoeuvres were expected in view of the weather and the great difficulty this placed on movement.

December 15th: The lack of money available to the Confederacy was all too clear to Brigadier-General E P Alexander, part of Longstreet's command, when he noticed men marching in their bare feet as there were no replacements for broken shoes. Longstreet ordered his men to exchange their footwear with the boots worn by captured Union soldiers.

December 16th: General J E Johnston was appointed commander of the Army of Tennessee. General Bragg went to Richmond and became the military adviser to President Jefferson Davis.

Joseph E. Johnston

December 18th: Union troops were suffering the same hardships as those in the South. Union troops at Knoxville had no winter clothing and they slept under their ponchos as no tents had been sent there. Both North and South had more casualties as a result of ill-health and disease as opposed to actual combat. Despite their hardships, General Grant applauded the work done by the men at Knoxville and praised Burnside's leadership.

December 21st: By this day most military operations had ceased because of the weather.

December 26th: The strength of the Confederacy was put at 465,000 men but only 278,000 were actually present at their colours. The discrepancy was accounted for by those men off through illness and the many thousands who had deserted. Those that remained at their colours were experienced soldiers. The North was not in a particularly good position either as it was having major problems enforcing conscription.

December 29th: The first signs of scurvy were reported in both camps along with frequent outbreaks of dysentery.

In God We Trust

The motto IN GOD WE TRUST was placed on United States coins largely because of the increased religious sentiment existing during the Civil War. Secretary of the Treasury Salmon P. Chase received many appeals from devout persons throughout the country, urging that the United States recognize the Deity on United States coins. From Treasury Department records, it appears that the first such appeal came in a letter dated November 13, 1861. It was written to Secretary Chase by Rev. M. R. Watkinson, Minister of the Gospel from Ridleyville, Pennsylvania, and read:

Dear Sir: You are about to submit your annual report to the Congress respecting the affairs of the national finances.

One fact touching our currency has hitherto been seriously overlooked. I mean the recognition of the Almighty God in some form on our coins. You are probably a Christian. What if our Republic were not shattered beyond reconstruction? Would not the antiquaries of succeeding centuries rightly reason from our past that we were a heathen nation? What I propose is that instead of the goddess of liberty we shall have next inside the 13 stars a ring inscribed with the words PERPETUAL UNION; within the ring the allseeing eye, crowned with a halo; beneath this eye the American flag, bearing in its field stars equal to the number of the States united; in the folds of the bars the words GOD, LIBERTY, LAW.

This would make a beautiful coin, to which no possible citizen could object. This would relieve us from the ignominy of heathenism. This would place us openly under the Divine protection we have personally claimed. From my hearth I have felt our national shame in disowning God as not the least of our present national disasters.

To you first I address a subject that must be agitated.

As a result, Secretary Chase instructed James Pollock, Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, to prepare a motto, in a letter dated November 20, 1861:

Dear Sir: No nation can be strong except in the strength of God, or safe except in His defense. The trust of our people in God should be declared on our national coins.

You will cause a device to be prepared without unnecessary delay with a motto expressing in the fewest and tersest words possible this national recognition.

It was found that the Act of Congress dated January 18, 1837, prescribed the mottoes and devices that should be placed upon the coins of the United States. This meant that the mint could make no changes without the enactment of additional legislation by the Congress. In December 1863, the Director of the Mint submitted designs for new one-cent coin, two-cent coin, and three-cent coin to Secretary Chase for approval. He proposed that upon the designs either OUR COUNTRY; OUR GOD or GOD, OUR TRUST should appear as a motto on the coins. In a letter to the Mint Director on December 9, 1863, Secretary Chase stated:

I approve your mottoes, only suggesting that on that with the Washington obverse the motto should begin with the word OUR, so as to read OUR GOD AND OUR COUNTRY. And on that with the shield, it should be changed so as to read: IN GOD WE TRUST.

The Congress passed the Act of April 22, 1864. This legislation changed the composition of the one-cent coin and authorized the minting of the two-cent coin. The Mint Director was directed to develop the designs for these coins for final approval of the Secretary. IN GOD WE TRUST first appeared on the 1864 two-cent coin.

Fort Anderson's Torpedo Defenses

Jeff Bockert provided those present at his presentation with a fascinating history of the development of the torpedo in its various forms.

Secretary of the Confederate Navy, Stephen Mallory, directed the first efforts by the Confederate government to protect against the Union Navy's passage up the James River to attack Richmond. Mallory selected Matthew Fountaine Maury to command the Submarine Battery Service, (Note that the Torpedo Bureau was headed by Gabriel F. Rains). Initial experiments with galvanic torpedoes were carried out by the small group of 50 men who made up the service. The men assigned to the service were sworn to secrecy and they carried special credentials that called for exchange for general officers if they were captured by Union forces.

After Maury was sent to Europe to secure materials (copper and platinum wire, Wheatstone magnetic exploders) then in short supply in the Confederacy. Lt. Hunter Davidson assumed command of the service. Davidson and his men developed several different types of mines that were used to defend the James River. The men of the torpedo division performed their task successfully for the Union Navy was never able to breach the James River defenses.

Recognized as critical to the Confederate war effort, elements of the Torpedo Division were sent to the Cape Fear area during August 1864. R.O. Crowley and others mined New Inlet at Fort Fisher where they placed seven 2000 pound boiler torpedoes served from a battery station at Battery Buchanan. Crowley and his men also buried 100 pound copper land mines in front of the land face at Fort Fisher – these land mines were rendered useless when the heavy naval bombardment cut the detonation wires between the fort's exploder device and the mines.

Jeff Bockert

After the fall of Fort Fisher on January 15, 1865, J. Pembroke Jones and members of the service mined the river off Fort Anderson. The Confederates placed four boiler and thirty keg torpedoes in the waters near the fort. William B. Cushing attempted to entice the Confederates to prematurely explode their mines by launching a “mock” ironclad Old Bogey during the dark of night. The Confederates probably exploded few of their mines on the hardly secret “mock” ironclad scheme; however, the Union Army made the concentrated grouping of mines a moot matter when they flanked the land defenses of Fort Anderson. The Confederates evacuated Fort Anderson early on February 19th and they surrendered Wilmington within a matter of days.

The Confederate torpedo defenses caused the Union Navy many concerns for their ships being blown out of the water. The Union land campaign proved the determining factor in the fall of Wilmington. As it happened after Wilmington fell, the navy had been correctly concerned about the torpedoes: three Union naval vessels were damaged or sunk by the “infernal machines” of the Confederate Navy’s Submarine Battery Service/Torpedo Division.

 Winter Wanderings *****

It’s December. The golf course has turned brown and the garden (such as it is) is more or less dormant. What to do with all that excess time? For the next three months, this column will review Museum options for your consideration, all within a day’s drive.

We start with the Military Museum located at the west end (river side) of the Air Force Recreation Area and NC National Guard Training Site at Kure Beach. This is a no brainer being only 30 minutes from any Wilmington location. The site is not an active military reservation thus there are no access limitations. There is no admission fee.

Sponsored by the North Carolina Military Historical Society, this hidden gem contains a wealth of military memorabilia dating back to the Civil War. The collection contains a significant amount of WW II equipment as well as uniforms and small arms from both WW I and WW II. The German uniform collection is particularly impressive.

The Museum library contains extensive research material on military matters in general plus specific material on the 30th Infantry Division, NC National Guard.

Winter hours at the Museum are Friday and Saturday 12 to 4 PM however, special arrangements can be made for specific openings to accommodate your special group. Please contact our Round Table members Dan Geddie (799-5338), John Winecoff (253-0883) or the undersigned for details. Dan and his team of curators can accommodate your group but we do ask that you provide us a two week lead time.

North Carolina is a state with a rich military heritage. Much of it is on display at this convenient Kure Beach museum. Next month, Fayetteville.

 Trivia Questions for December *****

1 – Who commanded the Confederate forces at the Battle of South Mountain? Per article 7 of Lee’s Special Order 191, General Daniel Harvey Hill’s Division formed the rear guard of the army.

General Hill was the overall commander of the 5,000 soldiers who initially resisted the Union advance. Hill filled his thin line with teamsters, cooks, and staff officers. The Confederates barely held the line until additional units (included those of John Bell Hood) arrived on the scene. Hill eventually had 10,000 men to oppose a Union force of 25,000. After darkness descended on the battlefields, Lee ordered Longstreet and Hill to withdraw and move toward Sharpsburg. Lee's Army was able to begin a re-concentration only because of the tenacity of the Confederate defenders and caution by the Union commanders.

D.H. Hill

2 – Confederate and Union troops fought at three gaps that led through the South Mountain range. What were the names of these gaps? From north to south, Turner's, Fox's and Crampton's Gaps.

Source: <http://www.civilwar.org/battlefields/southmountain/maps/cramptongapmap.html> (accessed November 15, 2013).

3 – When was IN GOD WITH TRUST first shown on United States currency? Who proposed those exact words? IN GOD WITH TRUST first appeared on the 1864 two-cent piece. Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, proposed those words in a letter to James Pollock, Director of the Mint, on December 9, 1863.

4 – The Sea Mine or Torpedo had been conceived as early as the 16th century by the Dutch as a defensive weapon to be used against the ships of an opposing country's navy. American, David Bushnell, became known as the father of mine warfare during the American Revolution. Robert Fulton, another American engineer and inventor, was hired by Napoleon and then the British to design naval weapons including the submarine Nautilus and naval torpedoes. Samuel Colt, yet another American, first used an electrical current to detonate a mine in the Potomac River in 1844. During the late 1850s, British scientists, Charles Wheatstone and Frederick Abel, perfected the Wheatstone magnetic exploder and the Abel fuse as a practical way of exploding a sea mine. When the Confederate Secretary of Navy, Stephen Mallory directed that the Confederate Navy develop defensive weapons to destroy Union warships, whom did he choose as the leader of the Confederate efforts? Mallory was a good judge of talent for he selected Captain Matthew Fontaine Maury, "Pathfinder of the Sea." Maury, who was one of the leading scientists of his day, began experiments on the James River. Maury formed what would be the Submarine Battery Service/ Torpedo Service with a small group of about 50 men. When Maury was sent to Europe to gain critical supplies and materials Lt. Hunter Davidson succeeded Maury.

Davidson and his Submarine Battery Service made the James River one of the most dangerous places in the Confederacy in which the Union Navy navigated.

5 – How many Union naval vessels were sunk by Confederate torpedo mines? How many Confederate vessels were sunk by Union torpedo mines? Twenty-two Union ships were sunk and twelve were damaged by Confederate torpedoes, while six Confederate ships were destroyed by Union Navy torpedoes.

Both Confederate and Union navies further developed the torpedo as an offensive weapon. The CSS David steam torpedo boat was the first spar torpedo equipped vessel to attack a Union warship when it damaged the USS Ironsides at Charleston during August 1863. The most famous spur torpedo attack was against the CSS Albemarle by William B. Cushing during October 1864.

Schiller [Jefferson, North Carolina: McFarland & Company, 2011] 139-167.

6 –Who was R.O. Crowley? Crowley was an electrician with the Confederate Torpedo Division. He wrote an account of his service for the June 1898 issue of the Century quarterly. The article, “The Confederate Torpedo Service,” provided an interesting history of his service on the James River and in the Cape Fear region at both Fort Fisher and Fort Anderson. Crowley also provided information on the use of “mechanical torpedoes” usually placed by local army officers at Charleston, Savannah, Mobile Bay, and the Yazoo River.

Crowley concluded his article with his experience shortly after the fall of Richmond. Crowley was summoned by armed guards to General Terry’s headquarters and told that he was required at Admiral Porter’s flagship immediately. Fearing the worst about the persistent rumor that Torpedo Division personnel would be hung, Crowley was much relieved to be escorted by only a lieutenant to the Malvern. Per Crowley’s account, when he entered Porter’s cabin, he came face-to-face with Abraham Lincoln.

After introduction myself, and stated the occasion of my visit, Mr. Lincoln called for Admiral Port. When he came in, Mr. Lincoln said, “Porter, here is the young man you were expecting.” This looked ominous to me. Why had I been expected?

Porter informed Crowley that he wanted the location of all torpedo stations along the James River to be shown to Union Navy officers so that the river could be made safe for navigation. Crowley told Porter that the regular torpedo service torpedoes were harmless because the batteries and insulated wiring had been destroyed. Porter should be aware that the army had placed many “mechanical torpedoes” that were still dangerous to all shipping.

Note: Lincoln and his son Tad did tour Richmond on April 4, 1865. His arrival was far from a grand entrance, Lincoln, Porter accompanied by a small escort were rowed ashore by twelve sailors. William H. Crook, Lincoln bodyguard, reported, “On either side we passed so close to torpedoes that we could have put out our hands and touched them.” They arrived around 2:00 P.M. and departed around 6:30 P.M. Lincoln stayed on the Malvern the night of April 4th. Maybe Crowley did meet the President of the United States. Si non e vero, e ben trovato.

The Illustrated Gettysburg Reader: An Eyewitness History of the Greatest Civil War Battle

“power, intimacy and poignancy....”
Booklist Magazine

Our CFCWRT Annual Dinner Meeting will be held in the Madeline Suites on the campus of UNCW on Thursday evening, 13 February, 2014. The featured speaker is noted historian and author, Rod Gragg. He will discuss his latest work: The Illustrated Gettysburg Reader: An Eyewitness History of the Greatest Battle of the Civil War.

The confrontation at Gettysburg was the most important battle of the Civil War. For the Confederacy, success at Gettysburg would yield Southern Independence. For the Union, the battle was an opportunity to fight on Northern soil and destroy the seemingly invincible Army of Northern Virginia. For three days, the battle raged and more men died during this epic struggle than in any other battle. Rod examined the drama that was Gettysburg as it was documented by its participants – North and South.

Rod Gragg is a former television news director, anchorman and reporter who is the director of the Center for Military Veteran Studies at Coastal Carolina University in Conway, South Carolina. Rod also serves as an adjunct professor of history at that school. As a noted Civil War Historian (Confederate Goliath, Covered with Glory), Rod is author of books about the American Revolution (By the Hand of Providence, Forged in Faith), the American West (Lewis and Clark on the Trail of Discovery), and World War II (From Foxholes and Flight Decks, Lessons in Leadership from the Greatest Generation). The winner of numerous literary awards for several of his 19 history books, Rod also hosts a regional television program, “Military Memoirs,” which features interviews with American military veterans.

Marcus Joseph Wright

Marcus Joseph Wright, aged 91, who held the rank of Brigadier General in the Confederate Army, died December 26, 1922 at his home in Washington, D.C. He was the author of a number of histories and memoirs of the South. Since 1878 he had been an agent for the War Department for the collection of Confederate military papers.

"He was born at Purdy, Tennessee, and had practiced law in that State. He was one of the foremost writers on the Confederate side of the Civil War, and had contributed fifty sketches of Southern commanders to Appleton's Cyclopedia of American Biography. With General A. L. Long, he prepared "Memoirs of Robert E. Lee," and has written half a dozen other books dealing with United States Military history."

February 1864 saw the start of what was to become one of the most controversial acts of the American Civil War. General Sherman started what was to eventually be known as his 'March Through Georgia' - though in this case it was a march on a major railway but with the intention of destroying anything that could be of use to the South once his army had moved on.

February 1st: President Lincoln ordered another 500,000 men to be drafted to serve for three years or for the duration of the war.

February 3rd: Life in the Confederacy became more difficult when on this day Jefferson Davis suspended habeas corpus for those accused of spying, desertion or association with the enemy. Such a move increased Davis' unpopularity.

Sherman started his march to destroy the Mobile/Ohio railway. His army consisted of 20,000 men. Sherman had by now decided to destroy as much Southern property as he could. When the war started any deliberate attack on civilians was all but unheard of. Now it was to form a specific part of Sherman's tactics in the South. He believed that by inducing fear and terror, he could bring the war to a swift end. Confronting Sherman's army was a Confederate force that also numbered 20,000. But they were demoralised, poorly equipped and poorly fed.

February 5th: Sherman's army reached Jackson, Mississippi. His final target was Meridian.

February 6th: The South banned the import of all luxury goods.

February 9th: 109 Union officers escaped from Libby Jail in Richmond. It was the largest escape of its kind during the war. 59 made it back to Union lines, 48 were recaptured and 2 men drowned.

February 14th: Sherman's army entered Meridian and started to systematically destroy it. Hotels, hospitals and storehouses (once what was in them was removed) were set alight.

February 16th: The Confederates under General Polk made a half-hearted attempt to confront Sherman. However, Sherman was so confident of success that he left half his men – 10,000 – in Meridian to complete their destructive work.

February 17th: Conscription in the South is extended to all white 17 to 50 year olds. Opposition to this was widespread and included the Confederacy's Vice-President!

February 20th: A Union force of 5,500 men confronted a similar number of Southern troops at Olustee, Florida. The Confederates were successful as the Union troops (many of whom were 'substitutes') turned and fled. Many of the Union troops were armed with the new Spencer rifle and nearly 1,600 of these were left behind.

February 24th: Congress agreed to reinstate the rank of lieutenant general. Grant is given this rank and became the supreme military commander of the army, though still answering to the commander-in-chief – Lincoln. The president also agreed to a plan to compensate farmers to the tune of $300 for every slave they allowed to go free and who enlisted in the Union Army.

Jefferson Davis appointed his friend, General Bragg, to have full control of all the South's military operations. Many senior Confederate officers expressed their opposition to this appointment.

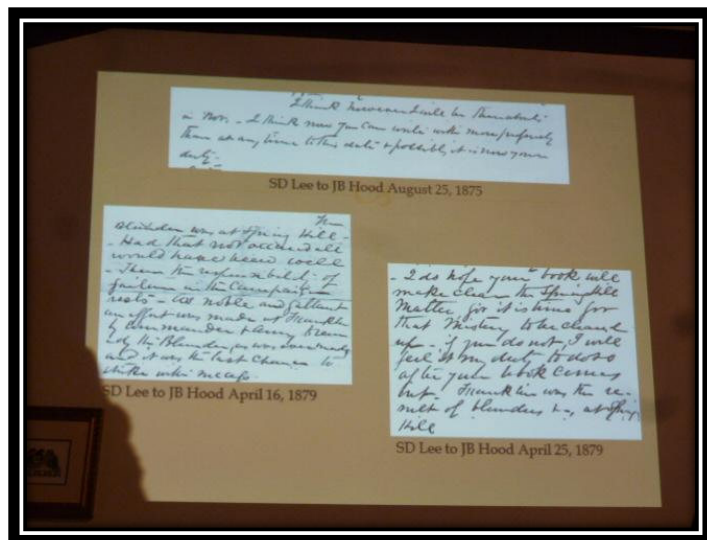

February 27th: Union prisoners started to arrive at the stockade at Andersonville, Georgia. Conditions and treatment there meant that by the end of the war, this prison was to have a notorious reputation.

February 28th: The North launched a cavalry attack against Richmond. The idea was to free Union prisoners held at Belle Isle and race back to Union lines. Lincoln considered that such a raid would have enormous propaganda value if it succeeded. It was to go wrong from the start.

John Bell Hood: The Rise, Fall, and Resurrection of a Confederate General

Stephen M. "Sam" Hood shared a most interesting presentation about the research he did in preparation for his recent book about General John Bell Hood. Part of this research involved verifying the multiple sources that had been used by several historians in their treatment of General Hood. Sam reached somewhat different conclusions than some previous writers. Up front, Sam told the audience that being a distant relative of General Hood made his research more personal and more diligent in tracking perceptions to their core sources.

Sam was most enthusiastic when he recounted the first examination of General Hood's personal papers that had been saved – and kept private - by one of Hood's children. Letters, commissions, and other artifacts revealed information that General Hood had collected during and after the war. Several of these documents shed a different light on events during the Atlanta Campaign and the invasion of Tennessee.

Sam shared many of his findings with our members; however, I hoped that his presentation whetted your appetites to learn more about a man who maybe was not “the most destructive American of all time” nor “All Lion and no Fox.” John Bell Hood: The Rise, Fall, and Resurrection of a Confederate General changed many perceptions I had held bout General Hood and his place in Civil War history.

* Winter Wanderings III *******

February and the final month of our local Winter Wanderings.

My selection this month is not all that local BUT is an absolute “must see” for any Civil War historian. The Mariners’ Museum (America’s National Maritime Museum) is home to 500 years of Seafaring Adventure but it is its Civil War exhibit AND the USS Monitor Center that makes the trip to Newport News, VA worth your time and effort.

Your trip from Wilmington to Newport News will take just under five hours (via I-40, I-795, I-95 and I-64) but please leave yourself not less than two hours to visit the museum.

The Civil War section of the museum properly devotes significant space to the Federal Blockade, to Blockade Runners and the importance of Wilmington to the Southern war effort. It is Monitor exhibit however that makes your visit memorable.

A full-scale replica of the USS Monitor is moored outside the exhibit. You are invited on board and this visitor was amazed at the size of that first iron clad. Back inside, you visit the carpentry shop of the shipwrights as they convert the USS Merrimack into the CSS Virginia. Appealing to all senses, you can hear the action, see the effort and smell the freshly hewn oak planks as they form the new hull.

Leaving the CSS Virginia you then visit several exhibits that are, in fact, full scale replicas of the Monitors interior. Amazed? You bet, particularly at the furnishing used in the officers’ quarters, at the completeness of the galley and at the raw power of the cannons on the cannon deck.

Finally, as you leave the replicas behind, you then view the remains of the recovered hull, cannon, turret and steam engines as they remain in the climate controlled salt water tanks, much the same as is the hull of the CSS Hunley (Charleston, SC).

The quick way home is to retrace your path on the Interstates but should you want to enhance your historical experience, take US 17 South as it parallels the Chesapeake-Elisabeth City Canal, though (little) Washington and New Bern and finally to Market Street in our own Port City.

 Trivia Questions for February *****

1 – A.P. Hill's Corps arrived at Cashtown, 8 miles west of Gettysburg, on June 29, 1863. On the morning of the 30th, Division commander, Henry Heth, ordered one of his subordinates to take three of his regiments and advance on Gettysburg where the Confederate forces were to collect commissary and quartermaster stores. Who was this Confederate commander? North Carolinian James Johnston Pettigrew was ordered to Gettysburg to drive away the home guard and collect the needed supplies. In the unlikely event, he encountered any organized troops or elements of the Army of the Potomac, he was to disengage and not bring on a fight.

While on the way to Gettysburg, Pettigrew met Henry Thomas Harrison (Longstreet's spy). Harrison informed Pettigrew that 3,000 Union cavalry commanded by Brigadier General John Buford was in possession of the town. Pettigrew shared this information with Heth (and Hill). Following his orders, Pettigrew led his men back toward Cashtown.

Heth reported to Lee that Pettigrew had not been willing to "hazard an attack." Heth and Hill failed to believe what Pettigrew had seen; hence, against Lee's orders to NOT bring on an engagement, the greatest battle of the Civil War began with its commanders blind to what was about to transpire.

2 – Two Confederate generals are buried at Arlington National Cemetery. Who were these men? Joseph Wheeler and Marcus Joseph Wright. Both of these men made a contribution to the United States Army after the Civil War. "Fighting Joe" Wheeler served as a Major General of Volunteers during the Spanish-American War. Supposedly during an attack on Spanish troops during that war, Wheeler uttered, "We've got the Yankees on the run." Marcus Wright was employed by the War Department for over 30 years as the collector of Confederate documents used in the Official Records.

3 – Per Sam Hood’s research, who was responsible for the failure of the Confederate troops to attack John Schofield’s retreating Union Army at Spring Hill? Frank Cheatham was given Hood’s orders to block the road at Spring Hill by members of Hood’s staff. Cheatham was opposed to a night attack and apparently Patrick Cleburne agreed with Cheatham. The failure to cut-off Schofield’s escape resulted in the Battle of Franklin.

From Sam Hood’s notes:

In my new book "John Bell Hood: The Rise, Fall, and Resurrection of a Confederate General" I release the contents of two letters among the cache of the newly discovered personal papers of Hood. One letter from Major WW Old identified Frank Cheatham as having intentionally disobeyed Hood's orders to attack at Spring Hill because he disapproved night attacks. This letter corroborates previously known similar letters from Major Joseph Cumming and Major James Ratchford. Another letter from SD Lee to Hood, also previously unknown, states that AP Stewart also identified Cheatham as disobeying Hood's orders, because he didn't approve of night attacks.

AP Stewart also stated that Patrick Cleburne concurred with Cheatham, and upon learning of Schofield's escape the next morning, felt personal remorse and responsibility, and "in that feeling" lost his life at Franklin. This explains Cleburne's purportedly anomalous behavior at Franklin.

This information is not my interpretation or opinion, but the words of Major William W Old and Gen. AP Stewart. Unless these officers (and Cumming and Ratchford) are not to be believed, this should close the book on who was responsible for the Confederate failure at Spring Hill.

In yet another letter, SD Lee wrote to Hood, explaining that when Cheatham (not Hood) ordered Ed Johnson's division's night attack at Franklin to support William Bate, they were ordered not to fire until they reached the works for fear of hitting Bate's men. Johnson's men held their fire, were decimated, but upon arrival at the front, found Bate's division was gone. Lee stated that Bate was not there, "nor were many of his dead." Lee further said that he looked for Bate's division during the evening but could not find them, nor Bate himself. Lee asked Hood how Bate's casualties compared to the other divisions. I don't know if Hood provided the information to Lee, but records indeed reveal that Bate's division suffered the lowest casualties of the six Confederate divisions involved in the initial attack, and much lower casualties than Johnson's division.

The first law of the historian is that he shall never utter an untruth.
The second is that he shall suppress nothing that is true.
Moreover, there shall be no suspicion of partiality in his writing, or of malice.
- Cicero

Join us on January 9, 2014 when Stephen M. “Sam” Hood, will discuss his research into one of the most controversial generals of the Civil War. As a distant relative of John Bell Hood, Sam will share his findings in a recently discovered cache of personal papers that had remained hidden from the general public and Civil War historians. Sam used these Hood family papers and did other meticulous research which will reveal a different view of General Hood than the portrait that had previously been accepted by historians.

“All lion, no fox.” These words have been attributed to Robert E. Lee as a description of John Bell Hood. This saying has made its way in the history books as fact. Sam Hood examined this and many other accepted facts about General Hood. As William C. Davis, Civil War scholar, teacher and author, said in a recent review of John Bell Hood, “For a century and a half since those fights (Atlanta, Franklin and Nashville), Hood has been damned as a bumbling, inept leader who senselessly threw away the lives of his men, and then blamed them for his losses.” With diligent and insightful thought, Sam documented a different basis of facts that may redefine who this man had been.

Come to our January meeting, hear Sam’s presentation, and then make up your own mind. Who was John Bell Hood?

Sam Hood graduated from Kentucky Military Institute, Marshall University (BBA, 1976) and is a veteran of the U.S. Marine Corps Reserve. A collateral descendent of General Hood, Sam is a retired industrial construction company owner, past member of the Board of Directors of the Blue Gray Education Society, and a past president of the Board of Directors of Confederate Memorial Hall Museum in New Orleans. He lives in his hometown of Huntington, West Virginia, with his wife of 35 years, Martha, and is the proud father of two sons: Derek Hood of Lexington, Kentucky, and Taylor Hood of Huntington, West Virginia.

Patrick Cleburne’s Proposal to Arm Slaves

Patrick Ronayne Cleburne was best remembered as a competent general in the Army of Tennessee who died at the Battle of Franklin on November 30, 1864. Cleburne, a native of Ireland, enlisted as a private in the Confederate army in early 1861 and rose to the rank of Major General by December 1862. Cleburne distinguished himself at the battles of Shiloh, Richmond (Kentucky), Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, Dalton, Tunnel Hill, Resaca, Pickett’s Mill, Ringgold and the battles around Atlanta.

On January 2, 1864, Cleburne led his most controversial action. He proposed that the Confederate government recruit and arm slaves to serve as soldiers in the Confederate army. For their service, these soldiers would be granted their freedom. Cleburne formally sent a written proposal to his commanding officer, Joseph E. Johnston. Cleburne asserted that slavery was the Confederacy’s “most vulnerable point, a continued embarrassment, and in some respects an insidious weakness.” Official reaction to Cleburne’s proposal was extremely negative and almost assuredly ended Cleburne’s chances for promotion to higher rank.

Not until late in the war was the proposal, which Cleburne had favored, adopted by the Confederate government. Cleburne had failed in his attempt to alter the course of the war; however, he demonstrated that he had the conviction of his ideas to risk all for what he believed.

The relationship between Lincoln and his military commanders was tested again in January 1864 when the president commuted a death sentence passed on a Union deserter. Unionist generals believed that such a move would undermine discipline in the Union armies. Later in the same month Lincoln did the same thing.

January 1st: The weather greatly hindered nearly all forms of military activity. Sub-zero temperatures occurred as far south as Memphis, Tennessee.

January 2nd: General Banks led his campaign against Galveston by moving along the Texan coast.

January 3rd: Chronic inflation hit the South especially hard. Basic foodstuff was 28 times more expensive in the South than in 1861. During the same time, wages only went up by 3 to 4 times.

January 4th: Lee was given permission by Jefferson Davis to commandeer food in Virginia. Such a measure may have helped his troops but not the people of the state.

January 5th: General Banks was encouraged by General Halleck to be more aggressive during his offensive. Halleck envisaged Union troops in Galveston by the spring.

January 7th: Lincoln commuted the death sentence imposed on a Union deserter. His move, as commander-in-chief, was not well received by the Union's military hierarchy who felt that it would undermine discipline even more. Union desertion was at an all-time high, especially in the Army of the Potomac. The problems were many but one of them was that men were paid a bounty to enlist. Many did enlist then deserted only to enlist again to collect another bounty. Also if your name came up in a draft for your town/city you could exempt yourself by paying $300. Or you could get a substitute to do your draft for you. Big cities saw a major growth area in "substitute brokers" who, for a fee, would find a substitute for someone. The whole system was open to abuse and when 57 men were recruited to the 6th New York Heavy Artillery, 17 were physically disabled.

January 8th: David O Dodd, convicted of being a Confederate spy, was hanged in Little Rock, Arkansas.

January 10th: The Confederacy responded to its economic plight by printing more money. Foreign governments were unwilling to lend money to it and only accepted gold for the payment of weapons. The North made matters worse for the South by printing counterfeit Confederate notes, which made confusion endemic.

January 11th: Senator John Henderson (Missouri) proposed within the Senate that slavery should be abolished throughout the USA.

January 18th: Protest meetings were held in North Carolina regarding the conscription policy of the Confederacy. All white males between 18 and 45 were required to enlist – shortly to increase to all males between 17 and 60.

January 19th: Pro-Union supporters met at Little Rock, Arkansas.

January 21st: Pro-Union supporters met in Nashville, Tennessee.

January 23rd: Lincoln approved a plan that allowed plantation owners to hire those who had previously worked as slaves on their plantations.

January 26th: Lincoln commuted another 9 planned executions, as he did not want to “add to the butchering business”. On the same day he approved a plan to improve trade between the Union and those parts of the Confederacy now under Union control. Lincoln was already thinking beyond the end of the war and wanted to ‘normalise’ internal trade as much as possible.

January 31st: Lincoln stated that he hoped all former slaves who wanted to fight for the Union would swear the oath but that it was not an absolute requirement. The same was true for those men who had been in Confederate ranks – swearing loyalty to the Union was preferred but was not absolute.

The 13th Amendment to the Constitution is written and introduced to the Senate by John Brooks Henderson of Missouri.

Section 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by legislation.

Henderson was born in Virginia in 1826. Henderson's parents moved to Missouri in 1832; however, both parents died before John was ten years old. John was mostly self-educated. He was first employed as a teacher, but he studied the law and gained admission to the Missouri bar in 1848. Henderson was active in Missouri politics. During 1861, John supported the Union. He was commissioned a brigadier general in the State militia. In 1862, Henderson was appointed to the United States Senate, he won election in 1863, and served until 1869. Henderson was known as a friend and confidant of Abraham Lincoln.

The Battle of South Mountain

Rex Hovey provided a spirited presentation about the little remembered battle at South Mountain, Maryland that occurred on September 14, 1862. Rex also related his involvement with the 13th North Carolina Living History Association and the placement of a North Carolina monument on the battlefield.

Rex had the storyteller's magic going strong as he lay down the details of the frantic battle that unfolded on that Sunday morning. Rex presented the actions of Confederate and Union units and commanders, many exhibited great courage while others covered themselves with anything but glory. Turner's Gap, Fox's Gap, Crampton's Gap, and Wise's Field became scenes of bitter fighting. At the end of the day, the Union army held the gaps. The Confederates abandoned the field, but they had slowed the Union advance and gained time for Lee to concentrate this battered army at Sharpsburg.

Rex Hovey

CFCWRT Member:
Bill Carshaw

The Confederates suffered 3,800 casualties and the Union 2,500. Among those killed were generals, Samuel Garland CSA and Jesse Reno USA. Also among the dead was Private Nathaniel C. Carshaw, Co. K, 84th NY (14th Brooklyn) Infantry.

* Winter Wanderings *******

Wilmington has great weather but even so, there are a few days (mostly in January) when it is nice to be inside. What then can be better than a short drive to Fayetteville, a city that can boast of not less than four museums of significance and all four are free! (Rt. 74/76, 87)

Located at 801 Arsenal Avenue and just off route 87, is the Museum of the Cape Fear with exhibits dating from the pre-historic Cape Fear through our Revolutionary and Civil wars. Co-located is the 1897 Poe House, a late-Victorian masterpiece. The Museum is adjacent to Arsenal Park, the remains of the Ordnance Factory used by both the Confederate and Union Armies during the Civil War.

Just two blocks away, and adjacent to the AMTRAK Station is the Airborne & Special Forces Museum. This is a spectacular museum that honors the service of airborne and special forces from World War Two to present conflicts. There is no Civil War related exhibit here but this museum is a must see for any military enthusiast.

The Army Airborne Museum and the 82nd Airborne Division Museum are both located on the Fort Bragg Reservation. A photo ID is required for entry to Fort Bragg but your entry efforts will be well rewarded by seeing these two significant military museums. The Civil War skirmish at Monroe's Crossing is also located on the Fort Bragg Reservation but special permission must be secured in order to visit that very interesting site.

If time permits, drive back to Wilmington via Dunn and visit the Averagesboro Civil War Battleground & Museum. This battlefield is preserved in a manner befitting that March 1865 battle that served as a prelude to Bentonville.

* Winter Wanderings – December 20, 2013 *******

I found myself in the Dunn area on the 20th. I decided to take Bruce's suggestion and visit the Averagesboro Battlefield & Museum. I had last visited this site while on a tour of Averagesboro and Bentonville on the 140th anniversary of those battles. I was most glad that I made the effort to visit the museum that was located at 3300 Hwy 82, Dunn, NC 28334. Gloria Gullledge gave several visitors an excellent tour of the museum and its considerable collection of Civil War artifacts.

* Trivia Questions for January *******

1 – John Bell Hood has been closely associated with the Texas Brigade. Where and when did Hood's Texas Brigade receive its initial reputation as being fierce fighters? What was significant about this action? Robert E. Lee had assumed command of the Confederate Army on June 1, 1862, after Joseph E. Johnston was seriously wounded during the Battle of Fair Oaks on May 31. Lee and the newly created Army of Northern Virginia were tasked with the defense of Richmond against a large Union army commanded by George B. McClellan. From June 26 – July 1, 1862, Lee and the Army of Northern Virginia attacked McClellan in a series of battles that became known as the Seven Days – Beaver Dam Creek, Gaines Mill, Savage's Station, Glendale, White Oak Swamp, and Malvern Hill.

. At the Battle of Gaines' Mill on June 27, 1862, Fitz John Porter and the Union Fifth Corps stubbornly held off multiple attacks by the numerous superior Confederates. Late in the day, Lee ordered another frontal attack on the strong Union position. John Bell Hood and his Texas Brigade were the first units to breach the Union line. Hood's brigade had attacked across a creek and up a hill. The Texas Brigade and other Confederates units sustained heavy casualties, but the Union line collapsed. Fitz John Porter was forced to pull back from his position and cross the Chickahominy River to rejoin McClellan's army.

Hood and his brigade had saved the day for the Army of Northern Virginia. They also gave Robert E. Lee his first victory as commander of that army.

2 – In the Confederate army, eight men attained the rank of “full” general. Who were these men?

Date of Rank	Notes	Age at Promotion	Birth	Death
Samuel Cooper	16 May 1861	63	June 12, 1798	December 3, 1876
Albert Sydney Johnston	30 May 1861	58	February 2, 1803	April 6, 1862
Robert E. Lee	14 June 1861	54	January 19, 1807	October 12, 1870
Joseph E. Johnston	4 July 1861	54	February 3, 1807	March 21, 1891
Pierre G. T. Beauregard	21 July 1861	43	May 28, 1818	February 20, 1893 September 27, 1876
Braxton Bragg	6 April 1862	45	March 22, 1817
Edmund Kirby Smith	19 Feb. 1864	39	May 16, 1824	March 28, 1893
John Bell Hood	18 July 1864	33	June 1 or 29, 1831	August 30, 1879

John Bell Hood was the last to receive this rank – his was a temporary rank when he was promoted to succeed Joseph E. Johnston as commander of the Army of Tennessee. Hood reverted to his old rank when he stepped down on January 23, 1865. At 33 years of age, Hood was the youngest to assume command of an army. Much has been written about Hood’s efforts to garner command of the Army of Tennessee and his subsequent actions while its commander. Hood was the center of controversy for his actions in the defense of Atlanta and his invasion of Tennessee.

Only one general on the list, Robert E. Lee, won a significant number of Confederate victories on the battlefield. Even Lee was unable to achieve victories as the war entered its last two years. Was anyone capable of success after the end of 1863? Was bold attack the only possibility for a Southern victory?

John Bell Hood had won fame and promotion for his aggressive attacks at Gaines’ Mill, Second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, and Chickamauga. Did his aggressive nature result in poor battle plans or was he let down by his subordinates? Did Hood’s inexperience as an administrator doom his command of the Army of Tennessee. These are questions that have been asked since before the end of the Civil War. Perhaps the recently discovered Hood papers can assist current and future historians in answering some of these questions.

John Bell Hood: The Rise, Fall, and Resurrection of a Confederate General may provide some different answers (or thoughts) about Hood’s role during the war.

3 – John Bell Hood was seriously wounded at Gettysburg and later at Chickamauga. He surrendered to Union forces at Natchez, Mississippi on May 31, 1865. What was Hood’s fate after the end of the war? Hood had planned to permanently reside in Texas, but economic necessity made him pursue commercial ventures in a less war-torn New Orleans. A soldier from early in his life, Hood had to seek his livelihood in the business world. After borrowing $10,000 from friends in his native Kentucky, Hood established J.B. Hood and Co., Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants with partners, John Barelli and Fred Thayer.

On April 30, 1868, Hood married Anna Marie Hennen. Anna, educated in Paris, was a member of a prominent New Orleans family. In the next ten years, John and Anna had eleven children – three sets of twins. Lydia was born in 1869. Oswald, the tenth, was born in 1879.

The cotton business initially struggled and in 1869, Hood took over James Longstreet's insurance business. From 1870 until 1878, the fortunes of both enterprises improved. Hood was successful and devoted himself to his family, to business affairs, and to gatherings for Confederate veterans. Hood, Anna, and their growing family lived in an elegant home in the Garden District and Hood traveled frequently throughout the South.

It was also during this period that Hood became embroiled in conflict with Joseph E. Johnston and other Confederate officers about the causes of Southern failures during the war. Hood's Advance and Retreat was published in 1880.

In 1878, the people of New Orleans were exposed to a yellow fever epidemic. Businesses failed as people fled the city. By early 1879, Hood was financially ruined. The yellow fever returned in 1879 and Hood was unable to take his family out of the city to safer environs. Anna Hood died on August 24, 1879, one month after the birth of Oswald. Lydia and Hood followed Anna in death on August 29th and August 30th.

The surviving ten children were adopted by families throughout the country. Organizations of Confederate veterans, especially the Texans of his old brigade, raised funds for the children's future support and education.

The 10 Hood orphans

4 - January 8th: David O Dodd, convicted of being a Confederate spy, was hanged in Little Rock, Arkansas. Who was David O. Dodd? David Owen Dodd was born in Lavaca County, Texas on November 10, 1846. The family moved to Little Rock, Arkansas for his father's business interest and educational opportunities for David and his sisters. David attended St. Johns' College until illness forced him to withdraw.

During August 1862, Andrew Dodd and David moved south to Monroe, Louisiana, leaving David's Mother and sisters with kin folks in Little Rock. During this time, David worked in the Monroe telegraph office where he learned Morse code. When Little Rock fell to Union forces in 1863, his father thought that the underage David would be safe to venture to Little Rock and bring his wife and daughters south. David's father secured a pass for his son to pass through Union lines. David made it to Little Rock during September 1863 and for a time gained employment in a mercantile business. When Andrew Dodd did not hear from David and his family, Andrew went north and sneaked through Union lines to reunite with his family. On December 1, 1863, the Dodds, under cover of darkness and with help from kin folks, made it through Union lines and reached safety a week later in Camden, Arkansas.

At this point, the story, of which there are numerous versions, took a strange twist. Andrew Dodd sent his son back to Little Rock to settle some business matters. Dodd even procured a pass from the Confederate authorities which granted the boy a pass through their lines. Mounted on a mule and in possession of his birth certificate, David headed to Little Rock on December 24th. After all went well on the journey, David even attended parties among old friends. On December 28, David visited the Provost Marshal's office and obtained a pass that would take him through the Union lines and back to his family in Camden.

Eight miles south of Little Rock, David presented his pass and was allowed to pass through Union lines. The Union sentries, supposedly, tore up the pass because it was no longer needed. David decided that he should visit his uncle and spend the night before heading to Camden. On the morning of December 30th, David unfortunately took a road that led him back into Union territory and into a confrontation with a Union cavalry detachment.

Without a pass through Union lines, the cavalymen were suspicious of the boy. David had in his possession letters to relatives and friends as well as a leather memorandum book. Nothing was worrisome until examination of the memorandum book revealed a page written entirely in Morse code. David was arrested on suspicion of espionage and sent back to Union headquarters in Little Rock.

When Union authorities had the suspicious page decoded by a telegrapher, David's book revealed a detailed description of Union strength in Little Rock. From that point forward, in spite of efforts by local attorneys and townsmen, David Owen Dodd was tried and sentenced to be hung on January 8, 1864.

The various stories provided a sad end to David. A botched hanging saw David linger more than five minutes before his death.

In time, David became known as the Boy Martyr of the Confederacy. This stained-glass window is in the MacArthur Museum of Arkansas Military History and is on indefinite loan from the MOC.

5 – Who commanded the Union forces sent to force Crampton’s Gap and relieve Harper’s Ferry? General William B. Franklin commanded the VI Corps. Franklin, convinced that the Confederates were in sufficient strength to block his 12,000-man corps, delayed his assault. Union General Henry W. Slocum, one of Franklin’s subordinates, felt that the gap was theirs for the taking. Around 4 p.m., Slocum led his division against the 1,000 Confederate defenders. Successive Union assaults pushed the defenders down the western sloop. With daylight fading, Franklin halted his corps from further exertions and made no further attempt to relieve the Harper’s Ferry garrison.

6 – What was D.H. Hill’s reaction to the Union forces that gathered on the National Pike in the Middletown Valley? From his headquarters at South Mountain House, D.H. Hill saw the mass of the Army of the Potomac that gathered to force their way through the Confederate defenses. “It was a grand and glorious spectacle, and it was impossible to look at it without admiration. I had never seen so tremendous an army before and I did not see one like it afterward.” Years later, Hill remembered the view and his reaction to the scene, “I do not remember ever to have experienced a greater feeling of loneliness.”

7 – The 23rd Ohio Infantry was engaged at Fox’s Gap during the Battle of South Mountain. Two of its members achieved lasting fame after the war. Who were these men? Rutherford B. Hayes and William McKinley would both be elected President of the United States. Hayes was wounded during the battle. McKinley escaped injury at Fox’s Gap, only to be slain by an assassin on September 14, 1901 – 39 years to the day after the battle.

During March 1864, General Sherman finalized his plan to march on Atlanta.

March 1st: The cavalry raid on Richmond started to go badly wrong. Having ridden for 36 hours, both men and horses were exhausted. The Confederate defenders had known about the raid and had prepared accordingly. An experienced cavalry unit from Lee's Army of Northern Virginia was brought in to Richmond and chased the Unionist cavalry force out of the city. By the time the raid formally ended the Unionists had lost 340 men and 500 horses. It was a propaganda coup for the South and should have been a disaster for the North but the raid was sold as a success as it concentrated on the dilapidated state of the Confederate capital – as witnessed by those on the raid.

March 2nd: Grant was formally promoted to lieutenant general and assumed the title General-in-Chief of the Army of the United States.

March 9th: Grant received his new command in a ceremony attended by the whole Cabinet. Many politicians expected him to work out of Washington. Therefore, there was much surprise when Grant announced that he was going to set up his command in the field with the Army of the Potomac. While a number of politicians in Washington had tried to get Lincoln to dismiss Meade, commander of the Army of the Potomac, Grant expressed his full confidence in his leadership.

March 17th: Grant, observing a request from Halleck, relieved the general of his command and appointed him chief-of-staff. Grant announced that the Union's military headquarters would be with the Army of the Potomac. Grant made the destruction of the Army of Northern Virginia his primary aim.

March 18th: Sherman was given formal command of the Military Division of the Mississippi.

March 27th: Sherman, in Vicksburg, was making hard and fast plans for his campaign against Atlanta. These included calling in Union troops from elsewhere such as A J Smith's corps from Alexandria, Louisiana.

“The Angle” – Bill Dowling

Rod Gragg began his discussion of Gettysburg with the actions between Union cavalry and Confederate infantry on the hills west of the town on July 1, 1863. His discussion of the battle ended with the failure of the Pickett-Pettigrew-Trimble grand assault on the center of the Union line on July 3, 1863. Between that beginning and end, Gragg shared many eyewitness accounts of the grand, but tragic, events that occurred over the three days that determined whether Southern Independence would be gained or the Union would be maintained.

Gragg took readings from his book that followed Lee, Meade, Chamberlain, Oates, and numerous other officers as well as many soldiers who lived through those days. As these eyewitnesses wrote of their experiences, it was evident that there was little romance in war. There was bravery, there were desperate moments that were altered by individual efforts, there was suffering of unimaginable extent, and there was death. These survivors, these eyewitnesses, portrayed events, in many cases years after the war, with a grudging admiration for those enemies that fought at Gettysburg in July 1863.

Rod concluded his presentation with an explanation of what made the American Civil War so very different than civil wars that had forever led to bitterness between winners and losers. His explanation can best be understood by the actions taken by Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain and acknowledged by John Brown Gordon at Appomattox on April 12, 1865. A salute of honor by the victors and a returned acknowledgement by the defeated did not complete reconciliation, but it was a start for a long process that did heal many of the wounds of that conflict.

* Trivia Questions for March *******

1 – Who was Jackson's indefatigable chief quartermaster?

Major John Alexander Harman was to gain some renown as Jackson's quartermaster. Pre-war, Harman was a jack-of-many-trades: a butcher, Texas Ranger, farmer, newspaper editor, and stage line operator. When the war began, Harman was a captain of a Virginia Militia company. He became a member of Jackson's staff at Harpers Ferry during May 1861.

Jackson was a hard taskmaster. He drove himself and his men to the limits of endurance. His traits both won victories and battlefield failings. At various times, Jackson's extreme state of exhaustion led to incidents involving many of his officers and men.

During the Valley Campaign, Jackson ordered Harman to collect arms that lay upon the field after an engagement. Harman remarked, after the collection was completed, that many of the weapons appeared to be left by Confederate troops.

..... Jackson flew into a rage and told Harman that he wanted to hear no more talk of Southerners abandoning their arms. Harman stormed from Jackson's tent and returned with a letter of resignation. "Jackson's mysterious ways are unbearable," he told his brother. "He is a hard master to serve and nothing but a mean-spirited man can remain long with him. God be with us all." The next day Jackson apologized, and Harman stayed on.

Possibly the most well known story about Harman came from the recollections of General John Imboden and concerned an incident as the Confederate army crossed the Potomac River during the Sharpsburg Campaign.

I never knew him (Jackson) to let profanity pass without a rebuke but once. The incident was reported to me by the chief actor in it, Major John A. Harman, who was Jackson's chief quartermaster, and a man of extraordinary qualifications. It happened at Edwards Ferry, on the Potomac, when our army was crossing into Maryland in the Antietam campaign. Major-General D. H. Hill's division was crossing, when Jackson rode up, and found the ford completely blocked with Hill's wagon-train. He spoke sharply to Hill (who was his brother-in-law, they having married sisters) for allowing such confusion. General Hill replied that he was not a quartermaster, or something that implied it was no part of his business to get tangled wagons out of the river. Jackson instantly put Hill in arrest, and, turning to Major Harman, ordered him to clear the ford. Harman dashed in among the wagoners, kicking mules, and (the) apparently inextricable mass of wagons, and, in the voice of a stentor, poured out a volume of oaths that would have excited the admiration of the most scientific mule-driver. The effect was electrical. The drivers were frightened and swore as best they could, but far below the Major's standard. The mules caught the inspiration from a chorus of familiar words, and all at once made a break for the Maryland shore, and in five minutes the ford was cleared. Jackson witnessed and heard it all. Harman rode back to join him, expecting a lecture, and, touching his hat, said: 'The ford is clear, General! There's only one language that will make mules understand on a hot day that they must get out of the water.' The General, smiling, said: 'Thank you, Major,' and dashed into the water at the head of his staff.

2 – What were the goals of Stonewall Jackson and his army during the Shenandoah Valley campaign? As envisioned by first Joseph Johnston and then by Robert E. Lee, Jackson was to detain Union troops in the valley, keep them occupied and unable to reinforce McClellan on the Peninsula. He was also to prevent McDowell's 40,000 troops at Fredericksburg from moving on Richmond from the north. Jackson succeeded by using his small force, never more than 16,000 men, with superior knowledge of the valley and rapid marches to frustrate Union force that numbered between 30,000 and 70,000.

3 – The 1st Minnesota gained lasting honor for their actions on Cemetery Ridge on July 2nd.

What were these actions? In a desperate attempt to stop the collapse of the Union line as Sickles's III Corps collapsed under the Confederate attack, Winfield Scott Hancock ordered Colonel William Covill Jr., with the 262 troops of the 1st Minnesota: "Advance, Colonel, and take those colors." Colonel Covill and his 1st Minnesota regiment faced brigades of veteran Confederate troops – their task, buy time until Hancock could receive additional reinforcements from his II Corps.

Hancock needed five minutes; the 1st Minnesota gave him ten. The butcher's bill: of the 262 men who advanced, all but forty-seven were killed or wounded.

The sharp fighting continued and the Confederates (Ambrose Wrights Georgians) broke through the Union line on Cemetery Ridge. Victory was within the Southerners grasp – until Hancock's reinforcements plugged the break.

4 - Who was instrumental in selecting Joshua Chamberlain to receive the Confederate surrender at Appomattox? Chamberlain had received a serious wound while leading his brigade at Petersburg. Army surgeons deemed the wound to be mortal. Gouverneur Warren, Chamberlain's Corps commander, recommended to U.S. Grant that Chamberlain be promoted to brigadier general while on his deathbed.

Chamberlain survived. His brigade was among those that drove Lee to Appomattox. For his services at Gettysburg and throughout the rest of the war, General Grant selected Chamberlain to receive the surrender of Lee's army.

Grant set the tone that was to be the pattern for this and future surrenders – respect and reconciliation while offering generous surrender terms and rations to their now former enemies. Chamberlain extended Grant's efforts to welcome the defeated Confederates back into the Union. There were to be "no jeers, no cheers, no drums, no bugles."

"With malice toward none." Those lines were from Abraham Lincoln's second inaugural address. At the surrender ceremony on April 12th, the salute that Chamberlain extended to John Brown Gordon added actions to those words.

* May 1864 *******

May 1864 saw the start of Sherman's attempt to capture the vital city of Atlanta. The Army of the Potomac was also ordered by Grant to follow and pursue the army of Robert E Lee wherever it went.

May 1st: General Sherman started his advance on the Army of the Tennessee.

May 2nd: The first skirmishes between Sherman's troops and the Army of the Tennessee occurred.

President Davis also told the Confederate government that there was no hope of any form of recognition of the Confederacy by foreign governments.

May 3rd: The Army of the Potomac was ordered to start its campaign against Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Grant claimed that the men in the Army of the Potomac were "in splendid condition and feel like whipping somebody".

May 4th: The Army of the Potomac, numbering 122,000 men, crossed the River Rapidan in pursuit of Lee's army. Lee had 66,000 men under his command. General Sherman's men prepared for their march on Atlanta. He had 98,000 men under his command.

May 5th: Grant and Lee's troops engage en masse for the first time in this campaign. Fighting in the 'Wilderness', Lee's troops had the advantage because the terrain was covered in scrub oak, stunted pines and sweet gum. All this made concealment easy and made Grant's task far more difficult despite a 2 to 1 superiority in terms of troop numbers.

May 6th: The Battle of the Wilderness continued. Neither side could claim victory at the end but in terms of casualties the Union could afford to lose more men than the South. The North lost 2236 dead, 12,037 wounded and 3383 missing. The Confederates lost 7,500 men in total.

May 7th: After a short rest the Army of the Potomac moved off again. This time Grant headed towards Richmond. This time it was Lee who had to be wary of Grant's movements. The Army of the James was already threatening Richmond to the South.

May 8th: An attempt by Grant to get his army between Lee and Richmond failed when the Union's V Corps failed to take Spotsylvania Cross Roads.

Sherman continued his march on Atlanta with little, at present, to stop him.

May 9th: Well-placed and well-dug trenches ensured that the Confederate force opposing Grant was difficult to move and there was a temporary halt to major attacks between Lee and Grant with the Union engaged in a series of reconnaissance raids as opposed to anything more.

May 11th: The Army of the Potomac spent the day manoeuvring into position for an attack primed for May 12th.

Six miles from Richmond, J E B ('Jeb') Stuart was killed in a skirmish. The South had lost one of its most talented commanders.

May 12th: The North's attack against Lee's army started at 04.30. Their initial assault was a success but a Confederate counter-attack ensured that the North was unable to capitalise on this. The fighting in an area known as 'Bloody Angle' – part of the South's entrenchments – was some of the bloodiest of the war.

Editor Note: John Wesley Bone, Company I, 30th North Carolina Infantry was at Spotsylvania on that May 12th. From his memoirs written in 1904, Bone recounted his remembrance of that day.

At dawn on the "memorial" day of Thursday May 12, the enemy launched a mass attack and drove the Confederates out of their works. Bone wrote that he heard Ramseur tell Colonel Parker that they had to charge and get those works back. Bone wrote that Parker replied, "We can do it." Bone related the events that followed Colonel Parker's reply.

We now moved forward and many, oh, many, made their last charge here. This field was the last resting place of many good soldiers, and came very near being one for the writer. We now passed the sharpshooters, and men were being wounded all along the line. We had orders to charge, and charge we did. Just before we reached the first line of works, I was mortally wounded by a ball striking me in the right breast, passing through my lungs and coming out beside my backbone, and lodging in some clothes that I had on my back. I now have the ball.

Bone survived the day and the rest of the war, but he never forgot the desperate hour and the deaths that accompanying the Confederate efforts to turn back the Union attack.

Source: Tim Winstead, “ but it was war timesThe Making of a Civil War Soldier: John Wesley Bone” [Paper, University of North Carolina at Wilmington, 2010], 15-16.

May 13th: The fighting for ‘Bloody Angle’ near Spotsylvania ended at 04.00. The North had lost 6,800 men, the South 5,000. Once again, the Army of the Potomac could afford the losses while the South could not. Grant continued his aggressive approach of looking for Lee’s army. There was little doubt that Grant’s confidence of victory rubbed off on his men.

Sherman encountered determined opposition at Resaca. Here the South had built extensive entrenchments and they proved a major obstacle for Sherman and his army.

May 14th: Heavy rain meant that all forms of movement were curtailed around Spotsylvania.

May 15th: A Union force commanded by General Sigel was defeated at New Market. Sigel had been sent to defeat Confederate forces in the Shenandoah Valley. In this he failed. On the side of the successful Confederates was Colonel George Patton, grandfather of the officer with the same name who found fame in World War Two. Sigel was relieved of his command on May 19th.

Sherman was unable to make a breakthrough at Resaca.

May 16th: The North suffered a major defeat at Drewry’s Bluff and lost 25% of their manpower during the battle – 4160 men killed and wounded out of 18,000. The blame was later directed at the lacklustre leadership of General Butler.

May 18th: When the rain stopped Grant launched another unsuccessful frontal assault on Lee’s positions. With increasing casualties, Grant called off the attack. He had clearly underestimated just how well the Confederates entrenchments had been made.

May 19th: Buoyed by his successes, Lee turned to the Confederates II Corps and ordered an attack on Union lines. This led to heavy fighting between both armies but neither one gained an advantage. By the end of the day the fighting around Spotsylvania had come to an end. The Army of the Potomac had lost 17,500 men. Combined with the loss of men at the Battle of the Wilderness, Grant had lost 33,000 men out of 122,000 in just one month – 27% of the Army of the Potomac’s total. However, Grant still had an army nearly 90,000 strong. There are no accurate figures for Lee’s losses for the same period but they were undoubtedly high. While the Union could sustain their losses, however unpalatable the figure, the South could not.

May 23rd: Grant continued in his policy of shadowing Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. He had a 2 to 1 advantage in terms of troop strength. The cause of the South was not helped when Lee was taken with a fever and had to retire to bed.

May 24th: One of the consequences of Sherman's advance was that he had extended supply lines. On this day a raid by Confederate cavalry on his lines led to the destruction of large quantities of supplies. There was not a great deal Sherman could do about this, as he wanted to continue with his advance to Atlanta and the Confederates were skilled at quick cavalry attacks.

May 28th: The Army of Northern Virginia moved towards Cold Harbor. By doing this Lee had placed his army between Grant and Richmond.

May 29th: Lee entrenched his positions around Cold Harbor.

May 30th: Rather than shy away from contact with Lee, Grant maintained his aggressive stance and faced his army at Cold Harbor.

May 31st: Sherman's advance on Atlanta was stalled by Confederate troops commanded by J E Johnston. Their tactics, while never going to defeat Sherman, were sufficient to slow down his army to, on average, just one mile a day.

<http://vermonthistory.org/research/museum-collections/faces-of-vermont/private-william-scott>

Rick Eiserman gave a fascinating presentation about a young soldier of Company K, 3rd Vermont Infantry. Scott was a farm boy who, along with four brothers, enlisted in the Union Army on July 10, 1861. Scott became involved in a series of events that involved his falling asleep at his post on August 31, 1861, a court-martial and a sentence to death involving General George McClellan, and a presidential pardon with a reported direct intervention by Abraham Lincoln. Whatever the series of events and the truthfulness of those telling, Scott was saved from his executioners on September 9, 1861.

Scott, the sleeping sentinel, returned to Company K where, if various reports can be believed, served well at his duties. Lincoln's involvement in going to the guilty soldier to ensure the pardon arrived before the firing squad carried out its sentence took on a life of its own. The Scott story resurfaced when on April 16, 1862 at Lee's Mill on the Virginia Peninsula, Private Scott gave his life in an attack upon Confederate positions. Scott, although wounded five or six times, was reported by newspapers as "a dying soldier (who) prays for the president" The story was picked up and perpetuated by Northern newspapers, poets, and dueling historians for the next hundred forty years. Numerous newspaper articles, conflicting books, a movie, a radio play, and even the iconic Carl Sandburg became involved in researching the events.

Whatever the real facts, Scott became a hero of sorts, not for his failure, but for his redemption.

THE SLEEPING SENTINEL

By Francis De Haes Janvier

'Twas in the sultry summer-time, as war's red records show,
When patriot armies rose to meet a fratricidal foe;
When from the North, and East, and West, like the upheaving sea,
Swept forth Columbia's sons, to make our country truly free.

Within a prison's dismal walls, where shadows veiled decay,
In fetters, on a heap of straw, a youthful soldier lay;
Heart-broken, hopeless, and forlorn, with short and feverish breath,
He waited but the appointed hour to die a culprit's death.

Yet, but a few brief weeks before, untroubled with a care,
He roamed at will, and freely drew his native mountain air;
Where sparkling streams leap mossy rocks, from many a woodland font,
And waving elms and grassy slopes give beauty to Vermont;

Where, dwelling in a humble cot, a tiller of the soil,
Encircled by a mother's love, he shared a father's toil.
Till, borne upon the wailing winds, his suffering country's cry
Fired his young heart with fervent zeal, for her to live or die.

Then left he all; a few fond tears, by firmness half concealed,
A blessing, and a parting prayer, and he was in the field.
The field of strife, whose dews are blood, whose breezes war's hot breath,

Whose fruits are garnered in the grave, whose husbandman is death!

Without a murmur he endured a service new and hard;
But, wearied with a toilsome march, it chanced one night, on guard,
He sank, exhausted, at his post, and the gray morning found
His prostrate form, a sentinel asleep upon the ground!

But God is love - and finite minds can faintly comprehend
How gentle Mercy, in His rule, may with stern Justice blend;
And this poor soldier, seized and bound, found none to justify,
While war's inexorable law decreed that he must die.

'Twas night. In a secluded room, with measured tread and slow,
A statesman of commanding mien paced gravely to and fro.
Oppressed, he pondered on a land by civil discord rent;
On brothers armed in deadly strife: it was the President!

The woes of thirty millions filled his burdened heart with grief;
Embattled hosts, on land and sea, acknowledged him their chief;
And yet, amid the din of war, he heard the plaintive cry
Of that poor soldier, as he lay in prison, doomed to die!

'Twas morning. On a tented field, and through the heated haze,
Flashed back, from lines of burnished arms, the sun's effulgent blaze;
While, from a somber prison house, seen slowly to emerge,
A sad procession, o'er the sward, moved to a muffled dirge.

And in the midst, with faltering step, and pale and anxious face,
In manacles, between two guards, a soldier had his place.
A youth, led out to die; and yet it was not death, but shame,
That smote his gallant heart with dread, and shook his manly frame!

Still on, before the marshalled ranks, the train pursued its way,
Up to the designated spot, whereon a coffin lay-
His coffin! And, with reeling brain, despairing, desolate-
He took his station by its side, abandoned to his fate!

Then came across his wavering sight strange pictures in the air:
He saw his distant mountain home; he saw his parents there;
He saw them bowed with hopeless grief, through fast declining years;
He saw a nameless grave; and then, the vision closed-in tears!

Yet once again. In double file, advancing, then, he saw Twelve comrades, sternly set apart to execute the law-
But saw no more; his senses swam-deep darkness settled round-
And, shuddering, he awaited now the fatal volley's sound!

Then suddenly was heard the sounds of steeds and wheels approach,
And, rolling through a cloud of dust, appeared a stately coach.
On, past the guards, and through the field, its rapid course was bent,
Till, halting, 'mid the lines was seen the nation's President!

He came to save that stricken soul, now waking from despair;
And from a thousand voices rose a shout which rent the air!
The pardoned soldier understood the tones of jubilee,
And, bounding from his fetters, blessed the hand that made him free!

'Twas spring. Within a verdant vale, where Warwick's crystal tide
Reflected, o'er its peaceful breast, fair fields on either side;
Where birds and flowers combined to cheer a sylvan solitude,
Two threatening armies, face to face, in fierce defiance stood!

Two threatening armies! One invoked by injured Liberty-
Which bore above its patriot ranks the symbol of the Free;
And one, a rebel horde, beneath a flaunting flag of bars,
A fragment, torn by traitorous hands from Freedom's Stripes and Stars!

A sudden burst of smoke and flame, from many a thundering gun,
Proclaimed, along the echoing hills, the conflict had begun;
While shot and shell athwart the stream with fiendish fury sped,
To strew among the living lines the dying and the dead!

Then, louder than the roaring storm, pealed forth the stern command,
"Charge, soldiers, charge!" and, at the word, with shouts, a fearless band,
Two hundred heroes from Vermont, rushed onward, through the flood,
And upward, o'er the rising ground, they marked their way in blood!

The smitten foe before them fled, in terror, from his post-
While, unsustained, two hundred stood, to battle with a host!
Then, turning, as the rallying ranks, with murderous fire replied,
They bore the fallen o'er the field, and through the purple tide!

The fallen! And the first who fell in that unequal strife
Was he whom Mercy sped to save when Justice claimed his life-
The pardoned soldier! And, while yet the conflict raged around-
While yet his life-blood ebbed away through every gaping wound-

While yet his voice grew tremulous, and death bedimmed his eye-
He called his comrades to attest he had not feared to die!
*And, in his last expiring breath, a prayer to heaven was sent,
That God, with his unfailing grace, would bless our President!*

* Difference Makers *******

May 1864 was a pivotal period in the Civil War. U.S. Grant was to change the way the Union was going to fight the war. Grant became the difference maker that Abraham Lincoln has sought since the opening days of the war.

* U.S. Grant Comes South *******

Ulysses S. Grant became the General-in-Chief of Union armies on March 12, 1864. Grant ordered William Sherman in Tennessee, Nathaniel Banks in Louisiana, Benjamin Butler in Southeast Virginia, Franz Sigel in the Shenandoah, and George Meade in Northern Virginia to wage hard war against the Confederacy. Grant knew the numerical superiority of Union manpower and equipment, if applied unceasingly, would overpower the Confederate armies. His campaigns for 1864 called upon each of his commanders to attack simultaneously across the South. Grant's strategy was intended to prevent the Confederates from shifting forces to meet uncoordinated thrust by ill timed Union advances.

Grant disdained the politics of Washington and actively campaigned with Meade and the Army of the Potomac. Beginning on May 4, 1864, the Army of the Potomac crossed the Rapidan River and began a move around Lee's right. Grant wanted to pull Lee out of his entrenchments where the Union superiority in men and material would be maximized. Lee moved quickly to strike Grant's forces before they were able to move into open ground beyond the Wilderness. Over the next month and a half, Grant and Lee played a deadly game of maneuver, thrust, and parry. The opposing armies locked in battles at the Wilderness, Spotsylvania, North Anna River, and Cold Harbor. The losses during this Overland Campaign were among the heaviest of the entire war. Grant was known as the butcher; however, Lee never backed away from an opportunity to attack the enemy. At the end of this campaign, the armies were locked in a stalemate at Petersburg.

 Trivia Questions for May *****

1 – Who was J.J. Prosper For Me D. Doctor DeVowell Conner? The gentleman, with the long name, was a Confederate soldier in Company E, 36th North Carolina Troops (2nd N.C. Artillery) who was stationed at Fort Fisher during the Civil War. Private Conner was supposed to have found the bag of gold coins that Rose O'Neale Greenhow had on her person when she drowned trying to reach the safety of Fort Fisher from the stranded blockade runner, Condor, during the early morning of October 1, 1864.

2 – Blockade runners and blockaders continually played a cat and mouse game at the inlets entering the Cape Fear River. Did the Confederate Navy ever attempt to raise the blockade by attacking the Union Navy ships stationed along the North Carolina coast? The CSS Raleigh made the attempt to break the Union blockade on the evening of May 6, 1864. Slipping out of New Inlet at high tide, the Raleigh encountered several Union ships and succeeded in driving those vessels away from the inlet. At dawn on May 7th, the Raleigh was five or six miles offshore. The Union fleet returned to challenge the Raleigh; however, their efforts were futile against the iron-clad. At 7:00 a.m., the Raleigh returned over the bar into New Inlet.

Unfortunately for its commanders, Flag Officer William Lynch and Lieutenant J. Pembroke Jones, and the Confederacy, the Raleigh ran hard aground on a shoal while trying to navigate into the Cape Fear River. The Raleigh sunk as its back broke under the strain. Jefferson Davis in his postwar memoirs remarked that the Raleigh's “services were valueless in consequence of her deep draft and feeble steam-power. She made one futile trip out of New Inlet, and after a few hours attempted to return, but was wrecked upon the bar.”

Source: Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., Faces of Fort Fisher 1861-1864 [Carolina Beach, N.C.: SlapDashPublishing, LLC, 2013], 116-125.

3 – Who was given command of the USS Monticello during September 1863? The Monticello, built in 1859, was a wood screw steamer of 655 tons, with a draft of almost 13 feet when fully loaded. Eventually, the Monticello mounted a 100-pounder Parrott rifle, three 30-pounder Parrott rifles, and two 9-inch Dahlgren smoothbore cannons.

The Monticello was first assigned to the James River squadron where she fought an action against Confederate shore batteries at Sewell’s Point on May 4-6, 1861. A Captain William Lamb, of the Woodis Rifles of Norfolk, commanded part of those batteries. The Monticello and Lamb would meet again at Fort Fisher later in the war.

Ok, the new commander of the Monticello in September 1863 was Chris Fonvielle’s favorite, William Barker Cushing.

Source: Chris E. Fonvielle Jr., Faces of Fort Fisher 1861-1864 [Carolina Beach, N.C.: SlapDashPublishing, LLC, 2013], 32-33.

4 – Why did the story of Private William Scott receive so much attention? The story of the Sleeping Sentinel portrayed a story of failure, redemption, and sacrifice. William Scott failed at his duty, he was forgiven his sin, and he made good his failure by making the ultimate sacrifice for his country.

Of the five Scott brothers who joined the Union cause in July 1861, three would yield their lifeblood during that conflict.

Private William Scott, Company K, 3rd Vermont Infantry, lies among the honored dead at Yorktown National Cemetery.

Brigadier General George Sears “Pop” Greene

Much has been said and written about Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain and the 20th Maine at Little Round Top on July 2, 1863. Chamberlain was the savior of the Union left flank, the hero of the Republic. Chamberlain was also an accomplished writer who added to his fame in the years that followed the end of the war. As critical as the events on Little Round Top were to the Union left flank, the events on Culp’s Hill were equally, or even more so, important to the Army of Potomac’s victory at Gettysburg.

Greene, grandson of Revolutionary War General Nathaniel Greene, was a West Point graduate who had been a prominent civil engineer in the 25 years preceding the Civil War. With the Union debacle at Manassas, Greene returned to the service of his country as colonel of the 60th New York Infantry regiment. Greene was over 60 years old, but he would show himself to be an aggressive commander.

At Gettysburg on July 2nd, Greene found himself in command of the lone brigade left on the right flank of the Union Army. George Meade had shifted most of the XII Corps to meet Longstreet’s attack on the Union left flank. Being a capable and cautious civil engineer and despite the apparent disinterest of his superiors, Henry W. Slocum and John Geary, Greene instructed his troops to build field fortifications to strengthen their position. When Confederate General Edward Johnson’s division attacked the few troops on Culp’s Hill as darkness fell on the 2nd, Greene’s entrenched troops held the line. On the extreme right, the 137th New York held their line because Brigadier General Greene had the foresight to strengthen his position against a strong Confederate attack. He had insisted on a course of action that protected his men and gave them a position from which they repeatedly frustrated the Confederate intentions.

Why was Greene not more fully acknowledged for his efforts? Soon after the Gettysburg battle, the XII Corps was transferred to the Western Theater. The record of their actions on July 2nd were not included in the Meade’s Gettysburg official report reportedly because of a disagreement between Meade and Slocum. Greene was also an introspective engineer who never sought the limelight.

Greene passed at age 98 in Morristown, New Jersey. He was buried in the Greene family cemetery in Warwick, Rhode Island. A two-ton boulder from Culp’s Hill was placed above his grave.

* November 1863 *******

November 1863 is best remembered for what was to become the most famous speech made during the American Civil War - the Gettysburg Address by Abraham Lincoln. Again, as in October 1863, the weather dictated what senior commanders could do in the field.

November 2nd: President Lincoln was invited to make a speech at the dedication of the new cemetery at Gettysburg. Jefferson Davis visited Charleston and publicly stated that he believed the city would not fall.

November 3rd: Sherman continued his march to Chattanooga. Unwilling to rely on a single rail line from Decatur to Nashville for his supplies, he ordered that it was rebuilt as double tracked.

November 4th: General Bragg, supported by Jefferson Davis, rid himself of General Longstreet and his 20,000 men who were sent to support Confederate troops at Knoxville.

November 7th: General Meade, commander of the Army of the Potomac, attacked Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Several Confederate redoubts were captured at Kelly's Ford on the Rappahannock River and 1,629 prisoners were taken. However, the North lost far more men killed – 83 to 6.

November 8th: Meade continued his assault on Confederate positions but by now they are no more than skirmishes as opposed full-scale assaults.

November 9th: Lincoln visited the theatre to see a play called "The Marble Heart" that starred John Wilkes Booth.

A. Lincoln

John Wilkes Booth

November 14th: Sherman arrived at Bridgeport at the head of 17,000 men. His men had covered 675 miles in just fourteen days. At Bridgeport, Sherman was briefed by Grant as to the state of play at Chattanooga. Sherman was told not to expect any help from the Army of the Cumberland, as it would maintain its defensive position rather than an offensive one.

In the South, the Confederate Government ordered the use of force in its efforts to collect taxes. This included the confiscation of property and was primarily directed at farmers in North Carolina who were refusing to pay their taxes.

November 15th: Sherman started his campaign against Chattanooga. Accepting Grant's advice, Sherman viewed the role of the Army of the Cumberland to be solely defensive.

November 16th: Longstreet finally reached Knoxville. However, lacking heavy artillery, Longstreet was unable to besiege the town, which was well defended by Union troops commanded by General Burnside.

November 18th: Lincoln left Washington DC en route to Gettysburg.

November 19th: The dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg took place. 15,000 people assembled there. The dedication started with a two-hour speech (greater than 10,800 words) by Edward Everett as to the course of the battle. Lincoln spoke after Everett and for only ten minutes (272 words) and received polite applause. Some in the gathering were unaware that he had even spoken. 'The Times' in London considered Everett's speech to have been very good while the President's was a disappointment. His speech was carefully prepared and not, as was once thought, put together on the train journey from Washington to Gettysburg. Lincoln himself said "the world will little note, nor long remember what we say here."

November 20th: Sherman's advance on Chattanooga was delayed by heavy rain.

November 21st: With better weather, Sherman prepared for his attack on Chattanooga.

November 23rd: Unionist troops took Orchard Knob just outside of Chattanooga. The capture of this position gave them a height advantage over Confederate positions around Chattanooga. Such was the strategic advantage of Orchard Knob, Grant made it his headquarters.

November 25th: Sherman started his main assault against Confederate positions around Chattanooga, especially the men based on Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge. By 15.00 the positions held by the Army of Tennessee had fallen. Seven Congressional Medals of Honour were awarded for the Union assault on Missionary Ridge. One went to Lieutenant Arthur MacArthur, the father of Douglas MacArthur.

November 26th: The Army of the Potomac threatened an attack on Richmond.

Bragg withdrew his forces from the Chattanooga area to Dalton, Georgia, having lost 10% of his men – 6,667 out of 64,000. Bragg was not to know that Sherman's army had suffered a similar percentage of casualties – 5,824 out of 56,000 men. By withdrawing, Bragg kept his army as an effective fighting unit. However, Sherman's army was free to advance on Atlanta.

November 27th: The Army of the Potomac meets that Army of Northern Virginia at Mine Run.

November 30th: An attack on the Army of Northern Virginia was cancelled at the last minute when Meade decided that Lee's men were too well dug in.

As mentioned in the October issue of the Runner, nine members of the CFCWRT/North Carolina Military Historical Society ventured to Kinston on September 25 to visit the newly opened CSS Neuse Civil War Interpretive Center. The center, with expected completion in mid-2014, remained a work "in progress" as many of the approximately 15,000 artifacts from the 1961 – 1963 salvage operations on the ironclad are added to the site exhibits. According to Bruce Patterson, the band of traveling historians enjoyed their visit and thought the two hour trip was well worth the time – especially if you dined at one of the famous Barbeque emporiums in that area.

Confederate Navy and Marine Corps in North Carolina: Plus Uniforms & Equipment

Andrew Duppstadt, Assistant Curator of Education and Historic Weapons Programs
Coordinator for the NC Division of State Historic Sites, provided those present at the October

Meeting with an interesting study of the Confederate Navy and Marine Corps and their efforts in North Carolina.

Confederate Secretary of the Navy, Stephen Mallory, directed the Confederacy's small navy in its efforts to challenge the larger United States Navy. Mallory believed that the Confederate Navy would have to develop technologically superior weapons and ship designs to achieve three goals to be successful in their mission: 1) Protect and defend the coast and rivers of the South. 2) Break the Union blockade. 3) Disrupt Union commerce.

While Governor Ellis pushed the state toward a war footing, North Carolina fielded what in 1861 was known as the "Mosquito fleet." The navy consisted of the Winslow, Beaufort, Raleigh, and Ellis – all river vessels that were lightly armed and manned by very inexperienced crews. Like mosquitoes, the ships, which were transferred to the Confederate Navy in July 1861, were an irritation to Union shipping along North Carolina's long coast line. The Union Navy responded to this irritant by destroying the Mosquito Fleet near Elizabeth City in February 1862.

The Confederate Navy recovered from the debacle at Elizabeth City and attempted to achieve the goals set forth by Secretary Mallory. Four ironclads were built to defend the coastal waters and break the Union blockade. The CSS Raleigh and CSS North Carolina were built in Wilmington to operate from the Cape Fear River. The CSS Neuse was constructed near Kinston. The most successful of the rebel ironclads, the CSS Albemarle, was built in a corn field at Edwards Ferry on the Roanoke River. While the Confederate Navy faced severe limitations in manufacturing capacity and resource availability, resourceful engineers and constructors used the equivalent of "duct tape and bailing wire" to defend their territory.

The Confederate Navy and Marines served at numerous locations to oppose Union efforts to remove Eastern North Carolina from the war. North Carolina native, Gabriel Rains, headed efforts to develop land mines and torpedoes to defend rebel forts and rivers. Rains's brother, George Washington Rains, built and operated a large powder mill in Augusta, Georgia that supplied quality gun powder for his brother's "infernal machines." The Marines served aboard the CSS Tallahassee, Olustee, and Chickamauga when they ventured from Wilmington into the Atlantic Ocean to destroy Union commerce. The Navy and Marines each had units who served at Fort Fisher.

While the Confederates failed, the men who served in their Navy and Marines resisted a powerful foe for almost four years. Like the wreckage of the Albemarle, their efforts sunk in the rivers and sounds of North Carolina.

CSS Albemarle was sunk by a daring torpedo boat attack commanded by William Barker Cushing USN.

 Trivia Questions for November *****

1 – Who were the Bomb Brothers? Gabriel James Rains and George Washington Rains were North Carolinians who contributed their unique talents to the Confederate cause. Gabriel and George both graduated from West Point. Both brothers exhibited great interest in chemistry and the sciences. Gabriel became interested in explosives and he produced both what became land mines and underwater torpedoes. George would direct the construction and operation of a large powder works in Augusta, Georgia.

2 – Fort Anderson's defenses made use of torpedoes to hamper the Union Navy in attempts to steam up the Cape Fear River. What Confederate Naval Officer directed the placement of these devices?

SUGAR LOAF, January 18, 1865

Colonel Anderson:

The enemy seem to fear getting on torpedoes. I wish very much we could get some in the river. The explosion of one would keep the others out.

R. F. HOKE,
Major-General

Wilmington, January 18, 1865

Major-General HOKE,
Sugar Loaf:

Lieut. Pembroke Jones, Navy, goes down to-night to Anderson on steamer Equator to place torpedoes. Caution pickets not to annoy him.

(Same to Brigadier-General Hebert, Fort Anderson)

Source: The War of Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies; Series 1 – Volume 46 (Part II), p. 1095.

3 – As the Confederates learned from their evolutionary efforts, the torpedo proved to be an effective weapon against Union ships and personnel. What was the one “fundamental” weakness of the underwater torpedo? Extended submersion corroded the torpedo and wet the powder charge. This condition was especially seen during Farragut's attack on Mobile, Alabama on August 5, 1864. While Farragut may have dammed the torpedoes, his reckless attack proved successful because only one of his ships (USS Tecumseh) was sunk by a torpedo. Farragut may not have been entirely reckless, but he did gamble that the Confederate torpedoes had been submerged too long to seriously disrupt his attack.

Source: <http://www.civilwar.org/battlefields/mobilebay/mobile-bay-history-articles/damn-the-torpedoes-the.html> (accessed October 13, 2013).

4 – Abraham Lincoln was not the feature speaker at the dedication of the Soldiers' National Cemetery at Gettysburg on November 19, 1863. Who was the keynote speaker and what was his subject? Lincoln was preceded on the podium by the famed orator Edward Everett, who spoke to the crowd for two hours with his “Gettysburg Address.” Lincoln followed with his now immortal Gettysburg Address. On November 20, Everett wrote to Lincoln: “Permit me also to express my great admiration of the thoughts expressed by you, with such eloquent simplicity & appropriateness, at the consecration of the Cemetery. I should be glad, if I could flatter myself that I came as near to the central idea of the occasion, in two hours, as you did in two minutes.”

Lincoln's reply to Everett follows:

Hon. Edward Everett.

My dear Sir:

Your kind note of to-day is received. In our respective parts yesterday, you could not have been excused to make a short address, nor I a long one. I am pleased to know that, in your judgment, the little I did say was not entirely a failure. Of course I knew Mr. Everett would not fail; and yet, while the whole discourse was eminently satisfactory, and will be of great value, there were passages in it which transcended my expectation. The point made against the theory of the general government being only an agency, whose principals are the States, was new to me, and, as I think, is one of the best arguments for the national supremacy. The tribute to our noble women for their angel-ministering to the suffering soldiers, surpasses, in its way, as do the subjects of it, whatever has gone before.

Our sick boy, for whom you kindly inquire, we hope is past the worst. Your Obt. Servt.

A. Lincoln

Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle-field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate -- we can not consecrate -- we can not hallow -- this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us -- that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion -- that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain -- that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom -- and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

5 – Who commanded the Confederate Mosquito Fleet during the naval battle at Elizabeth City (Cobb's Point)? Flag Officer William F. Lynch. On February 7, 1862, the Confederates had battled the Union Fleet during its attack on Roanoke Island. Lynch withdrew to Elizabeth City to resupply and prepare a defense for the city. On February 10th two miles below Elizabeth City, the Mosquito Fleet (6 ships mounting 11 guns) engaged Cdr. Stephen C. Rowan and his Union flotilla (14 ships mounting 40 guns). The outcome was never in doubt.

6 – Where were most of the crews for Confederate ironclads recruited? To crew the ironclads built in North Carolina, the navy relied on the local army soldiers to man the guns. The Confederate naval uniforms looked amazingly like those of the army.

 Difference Makers *****

On Sunday, September 14, 1862, rear guard elements of the Army of North Virginia were involved in a desperate encounter on the crest of South Mountain, between Middletown and Boonsboro, Maryland. The battle on South Mountain began when the vanguard of General George McClellan's Army of the Potomac, emboldened with discovery of Robert E. Lee's Special Order 191, moved to strike the Confederates before their widely scattered forces could be re-concentrated. This often overlooked battle, which could have precipitated the possible destruction of Lee's Army, was the prelude to the Battle of Sharpsburg on September 17th.

This battle developed along the ridge of the mountain at Frostown, Fox's and Turner's Gap. The Union advance also involved clashes at Crampton's Gap, 6 miles south and nearer to Harpers' Ferry. The fighting at Fox's and Turner's Gap involved the North Carolina troops of the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 20th, 23rd, and 30th Infantry; the 1st North Carolina Artillery, Manly's and Reilly's Batteries; other units of Longstreet's Corps plus those who arrived during the afternoon.

Garland

Reno

Action at Fox's Gap during the morning of September 14th involved hand-to-hand combat between the opposing troops. The intense fighting also witnessed soldiers engaged with clubbed muskets and bayonets. Confederate Brigadier General Samuel Garland of the 13th North Carolina and Union Major General Jesse Reno, Commander of the IX Corps, were among those killed during this fighting.

General Daniel Harvey Hill was the overall commander of the 5,000 soldiers who initially resisted the Union advance. Hill filled his thin line with teamsters, cooks, and staff officers. The Confederates barely held the line until additional units (included those of John Bell Hood) arrived on the scene. Hill eventually had 10,000 men to oppose a Union force of 25,000. After darkness descended on the battlefields, Lee ordered Longstreet and Hill to withdraw and move toward Sharpsburg. Lee's Army was able to begin a re-concentration only because of the tenacity of the Confederate defenders and caution by the Union commanders.

Daniel Harvey Hill and the Confederate troops at South Mountain had been difference makers; their defense had gained Lee time to prepare a defense to face the full weight of McClellan's Army of the Potomac at Sharpsburg, Maryland. Without that stalwart resistance, the battle that was fought at Antietam Creek could well have been the last battle of the American Civil War.

October 1863 saw further fighting in and around Chattanooga. During the American Civil War, both sides were hindered by something that they had no control over - poor winter weather. Manoeuvring and mobilising men and equipment became very difficult and on occasions impossible when the rain took a hold. October 1863 saw an early start to the winter.

October 1st: Rosecrans' supply route after the Battle of Chickamauga was a tortuous 28-mile mountain road that followed along the side of the Tennessee River. It would have been impossible to supply 50,000 men throughout the winter using just this route. Rosecrans ordered the building of flat-bottomed boats that would be able to navigate the Tennessee River.

October 2nd: The first reinforcements for the Army of the Cumberland arrived in Chattanooga. Their journey of over 1100 miles took just over a week, showing the importance of controlling the railways during the war.

October 4th: Union engineers completed the first of the flat-bottomed steamboats that they hoped to use to help supply the Army of the Cumberland.

October 6th: The weather in Chattanooga took a turn for the worse. Persistent heavy rain made living conditions difficult at best especially as all the wooden homes in the town had been destroyed as they were used in strengthening trenches and redoubts. The town's 2,500 citizens crammed themselves into a few stone buildings.

October 8th: The lack of food in Chattanooga started to take a hold with many Union soldiers falling ill due to malnourishment. The soldiers in the town had slaughtered most of their animals in an effort to feed themselves but by now even these had run out.

October 9th: Confederate cavalry attacked a major Union supply column bound for Chattanooga. Hundreds of supply wagons – along with their contents – were lost.

October 10th: Despite the victory at Chickamauga, senior Confederate officers under Bragg's command expressed to Jefferson Davis their discontent with regards to his leadership. They all agreed that his skills "would be better employed elsewhere". As a friend of Bragg, Davis was angered by their lack of support for him.

Braxton Bragg

Jefferson Davis

James Longstreet

October 11th: General Longstreet, who played such an important role in the victory at Chickamauga, again asked Davis to replace Bragg. Once again, Davis refused.

October 16th: The North introduced a major reorganisation of its armies. The armies of the Cumberland, Tennessee and Ohio were all combined into the Military Division of the Mississippi and put under the command of General U Grant.

October 18th: Rosecrans was relieved of his command, which was handed over to Major-General George Thomas. Rosecrans was never given another meaningful command.

W.S. Rosecrans

George Thomas

October 20th: Since their victory at Gettysburg, the Army of the Potomac had followed Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Neither was in a position to launch a major attack against the other but numerous skirmishes had occurred up to this date when Lee crossed the Rappahannock River to return to his old base. Meade had no intention of following him across the river. The skirmishes that had occurred since Gettysburg had cost Meade 2292 killed and wounded while Lee lost 1381 men.

October 23rd: General Grant arrived at Chattanooga. The plight of the Unionists in the town was aided somewhat by the continuing infighting that Bragg was still experiencing among his senior officers.

October 24th: President Lincoln expressed his disappointment that Meade had not crossed the Rappahannock River in pursuit of Lee. However, as a politician, he still failed to fully understand the impact Gettysburg had on both armies even though it was some four months after the battle. In fact, Lincoln assumed that as four months had passed the Army of the Potomac should have been in a position to pursue Lee's army.

October 25th: The first of the flat-bottomed supply ships was launched in Chattanooga.

October 26th: The Tennessee River had to be made safe for the Unionists if the supply-boat was to succeed. General Thomas ordered the capture of Brown's Ferry, across the neck of Moccasin Point, which was the old high-water route.

October 27th: At 05.00, 1,800 Unionist soldiers attacked Brown's Ferry, having been moved along the Tennessee River by pontoons. By 10.00 some 4,000 Unionist soldiers had control of both sides of the river. The supply ship could now sail from Chattanooga passed Moccasin Point in relative safety.

October 28th: The South attempted to re-capture Brown's Ferry. The night attack lasted until early October 29th. However, it was now that the infighting among the senior Confederates officers hit home. Bragg would have been aware that General Longstreet had asked Jefferson Davis to remove Bragg from his post. Bragg and Davis had known each other as good friends for over 20 years so it is inconceivable that Davis had not informed Bragg of what Longstreet had requested. The Confederate attack at Brown's Ferry was to be led by Longstreet. Without telling Longstreet, Bragg removed from the attack some of the units that Longstreet had chosen to use. Instead of having 8,000 men in the attack, Longstreet had 4,000 and they were up against the Union force that now numbered 5,000. The North lost 77 men killed while Longstreet lost over 300 men killed. The Union remained in control of Brown's Ferry. The failure of Longstreet to succeed at Brown's Ferry - information that was swiftly conveyed to Davis - was sufficient to convince Davis that his decision to keep Bragg was the correct one.

October 30th: The flat-bottomed steam ship returned to Chattanooga at night towing several barges full of 40,000 rations. It arrived just in time as the soldiers in the town only had half a breakfast ration left. The citizens in the town only had four boxes of hard bread left for all of them.

Lee's Last Casualty:
The Life and Letters of Sgt. Robert W. Parker, Second Virginia Cavalry

Cathy Wright, curator at The Museum of the Confederacy, presented an interested look at the life of a Confederate cavalryman who served with the Army of North Virginia throughout the entire war. Parker survived the many battles, skirmishes, and sicknesses of cavalry service only to meet his fate at Appomattox on April 9, 1865.

Robert William Parker's story was revealed from nearly 200 letters between Parker and his wife, Rebecca, which dated from 1861 until early 1865. These letters were discovered in the attic of an elderly kinswoman who passed away during 2004 in Roanoke, Virginia. The family shared knowledge of the existence of these long forgotten letters with historian, Dr. James I. Robertson. Robertson passed this information on to Dr. Peter S. Carmichael, who taught at UNCG. Carmichael had a graduate student, Cathy Wright, who was searching for a worthwhile topic for her graduate thesis. Cathy had found her thesis topic.

Robert Parker was born in Pittsylvania County, Virginia on August 31, 1838. His family moved to Bedford County where Robert's father, Ammon H. Parker, and mother, Frances Goggin Parker, raised their four children at their home, Lone Aspen. Robert, as his father before him, became a farmer. On December 6, 1860, Robert married Rebecca "Beck" Walker. Robert and Rebecca began their married life as a young couple who lived on the family farm where they sought a peaceful and increasing prosperous life among family and friends. Their peaceful existence was to be interrupted by the coming struggle between the differing cultures of the South and the North.

With Virginia's secession from the Union on April 17, 1861, Robert Parker, and others from Bedford County, felt the need to rush to the defense of their families and their way of life. Parker enrolled for service in Company F, the Bedford Southside Dragoons on May 28th in Davis Mills, Virginia. He was mustered into service on May 31, 1861 with Company F, 2nd Virginia Cavalry. For the next Four years, Robert shared the insights that he gained through his service with the Confederate cavalry. He described battles, military campaigns, and the daily life of the soldiers.

Cathy's transcriptions of Parker's letter revealed more than the military actions and aspects of a soldier's life. These letters revealed the thoughts of Parker as the war turned against the South and the will to wage war flagged among the army and the civilian populations. Cathy's presentation of her book shared the life story of 4th Sergeant Robert W. Parker. He avoided serious injury on the many battlefields during four years of war; however, as the book's title suggested, Parker may have become the "last" casualty in the Army of Northern Virginia.

* Trivia Questions for October *******

1 – How many ironclads were built by the Confederate government in North Carolina during the Civil War? The Confederate government attempted building ironclads in the state, and was successful in completing four ships: the CSS North Carolina and the CSS Raleigh on the Cape Fear River, the CSS Albemarle on the Roanoke River, and the CSS Neuse on the Neuse River. A fifth ironclad, the CSS Wilmington, was nearing completion in February 22, 1865 when it was destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the advancing Union forces.

There were also naval yards and stations located across the state, including a large operation at Charlotte for manufacturing marine machinery and other facilities in Wilmington, Halifax, Kinston, and for a brief time in Tarboro.

The CSS Albemarle, depicted above, saw several successes in combat late in the Civil War. Built in a corn field near Edward's Ferry (Scotland Neck) by a 19 year old Gilbert Elliot, the Albemarle was the most successful of the North Carolina ironclads. The Albemarle took part in the Battle of Plymouth, and several the naval battles near Plymouth and on the Albemarle Sound. The Albemarle met its fate when Union naval Commander William Barker Cushing led a torpedo attack against the ironclad as it lay at anchor near Plymouth on the night of October 27, 1864. 2 – What was the mission of the Confederate Navy in North Carolina? The Confederate Navy's mission was three-fold. First, it was to provide coastal defense and protection for inland waterways. Second, its ironclad construction program was designed to break the Union blockade of the southern coast. Third, it was seen as a function of the navy to raid enemy commerce.

3 – Which North Carolinians commanded Confederate commerce raiders against Union shipping during the war. John Newland Maffitt (CSS Florida) and James I. Waddell (CSS Shenandoah) commanded commerce raiders that ranged far and wide to destroy Union shipping.

John Newland Maffitt

James Iredell Waddell

Maffitt returned to the Wilmington area after the war where he lived on a 212 acre farm – “The Moorings” – off Greenville Sound until his death on May 15, 1886. NOTE: Maffitt's Great-Grandson, Robert “Bob” Maffitt, lives in the Wilmington area and is active in keeping alive the history of his kinsman and the contribution of the Confederate Navy during the war.

Waddell did not return to the United States until 1875. He served as director of the State of Maryland's Oyster Regulation Board until his death on March 15, 1886.

4 – Who commanded the Confederate Marine Corps contingent at Fort Fisher during the Battles of Fort Fisher? What was the fate of this contingent? Captain Alfred C. Van Benthuyzen was among the reinforcements who arrived at Battery Buchanan on Christmas Eve, 1864. He suffered a severe head wound during the battle on January 15, 1865. Van Benthuyzen and his Marines were with Major James Reilly near Battery Buchanan when Reilly surrendered Fort Fisher to Captain E. Lewis Moore, Adjunct of the 7th Connecticut.

5 – What was Robert E. Lee's Special Order 191? How was it relevant to the September 17, 1862 Battle of Sharpsburg? – This battle that became the single-most bloody day in American Military history. Robert E. Lee issued Special Order 191 during the Maryland campaign, before the Battle of Antietam. A copy of the order having been lost, was recovered by Union soldiers of the 27th Indiana on the Best Farm in Maryland. The order provided the Union Army with valuable information concerning the Army of Northern Virginia's movements and campaign plans. Upon receiving Lee's "Lost Order", Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan, leading the Union Army of the Potomac, would exclaim "Here is a paper with which, if I cannot whip Bobby Lee, I will be willing to go home." The practical value of this intelligence, which was quickly growing obsolescent, continues to be the subject of much debate.

1. The citizens of Fredericktown being unwilling while overrun by members of this army, to open their stores, in order to give them confidence, and to secure to officers and men purchasing supplies for benefit of this command, all officers and men of this army are strictly prohibited from visiting Fredericktown except on business, in which cases they will bear evidence of this in writing from division commanders. The provost-marshal in Fredericktown will see that his guard rigidly enforces this order.

2. Major Taylor will proceed to Leesburg, Virginia, and arrange for transportation of the sick and those unable to walk to Winchester, securing the transportation of the country for this purpose. The route between this and Culpepper Court-House east of the mountains being unsafe, will no longer be traveled. Those on the way to this army already across the river will move up promptly; all others will proceed to Winchester collectively and under command of officers, at which point, being the general depot of this army, its movements will be known and instructions given by commanding officer regulating further movements.

3. The army will resume its march tomorrow, taking the Hagerstown road. General Jackson's command will form the advance, and, after passing Middletown, with such portion as he may select, take the route toward Sharpsburg, cross the Potomac at the most convenient point, and by Friday morning take possession of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, capture such of them as may be at Martinsburg, and intercept such as may attempt to escape from Harpers Ferry.

4. General Longstreet's command will pursue the same road as far as Boonsborough, where it will halt, with reserve, supply, and baggage trains of the army.

5. General McLaws, with his own division and that of General R. H. Anderson, will follow General Longstreet. On reaching Middletown will take the route to Harpers Ferry, and by Friday morning possess himself of the Maryland Heights and endeavor to capture the enemy at Harpers Ferry and vicinity.

6. General Walker, with his division, after accomplishing the object in which he is now engaged, will cross the Potomac at Cheek's Ford, ascend its right bank to Lovettsville, take possession of Loudoun Heights, if practicable, by Friday morning, Key's Ford on his left, and the road between the end of the mountain and the Potomac on his right. He will, as far as practicable, cooperate with General McLaws and Jackson, and intercept retreat of the enemy.

7. General D. H. Hill's division will form the rear guard of the army, pursuing the road taken by the main body. The reserve artillery, ordnance, and supply trains, &c., will precede General Hill.

8. General Stuart will detach a squadron of cavalry to accompany the commands of Generals Longstreet, Jackson, and McLaws, and, with the main body of the cavalry, will cover the route of the army, bringing up all stragglers that may have been left behind.

9. The commands of Generals Jackson, McLaws, and Walker, after accomplishing the objects for which they have been detached, will join the main body of the army at Boonsborough or Hagerstown.

10. Each regiment on the march will habitually carry its axes in the regimental ordnance-wagons, for use of the men at their encampments, to procure wood &c.

6 – Sgt. Robert W. Parker joined Company F, 2nd Virginia Cavalry, Bedford Southside Dragoons on May 29, 1861. Parker and Company F faithfully served throughout the war. For what else was Bedford, Virginia remembered? As Company F served during the Civil War, Company A of the 116th Infantry Regiment faithfully served during WWII. At Omaha Beach on June 6, 1944, 19 of the 30 Bedford boys in the 116th perished from enemy action. Bedford's population in 1944 was approximately 3,200. This community proportionately suffered the severest D-Day losses of in place in the nation.

Lee's Last Casualty: The Life and Letters of Sgt. Robert W. Parker, Second Virginia Cavalry

Join us on September 12, 2013 when Catherine Wright, Curator at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond, will present the Civil War experiences of a Virginia cavalryman who served throughout the four years of this conflict.

The letters of Sgt. Robert W. Parker, 2nd Virginia Cavalry, provide a window into the daily life of an enlisted cavalryman, as well as highlight the unique story of the soldier believed to be the last man killed in action in the Army of Northern Virginia. In many ways, Parker was representative of the average Confederate soldier: a modest farmer in the antebellum years, his patriotic fervor spurred him at the beginning of the war to enlist in the Confederate cavalry. His letters reveal how home front and battlefield were closely intertwined, and the importance of correspondence in sustaining that connection and the will to fight. The role of the cavalry and Parker's tragic death are also highlighted in the program.

Catherine M. Wright was born in Kansas City, Missouri, and grew up there and in Norfolk, Virginia. She received bachelor's degrees in English and History from Truman State University (2003), and a master's degree in American History with a concentration in museum studies from the University of North Carolina at Greensboro (2006). She is the editor of Lee's Last Casualty: The Life and Letters of Sgt. Robert W. Parker, Second Virginia Cavalry

(University of Tennessee Press, 2008) and is a contributing historian to the online Encyclopedia of Virginia. Various national media outlets have interviewed her, including NPR and CNN, and she has appeared on the PBS program "History Detectives" and twice on the Travel Channel program "Mysteries at the Museum". She was formerly the curator at the Stonewall Jackson House in Lexington, VA.

 Difference Makers *****

As the war entered into its third year, many men, Confederate and Union, had been stigmatized for less than stellar achievement both on the fields of battle and in the leadership of the men under their command. These men had been removed from command, shunted to less important locations, returned to political office, or been removed from the army. A few others had begun to be perceived as men who could be counted on as battlefield commanders and leaders – these men were those who made a difference – a positive difference. One of these “difference makers” was Union Brigadier General John Buford, Jr.

John Buford, Jr. was born in Woodford County, Kentucky on March 4, 1826 to John and Anne Bannister Howe Watson Buford. His family was a large one for both parents had previously been married; hence, John had two brothers and thirteen half-brothers and half-sisters. His grandfather, Simeon Buford, had served under “Light Horse Harry” Lee during the American Revolution. Simeon Buford had also married into the Early family of Culpepper County, Virginia. John Buford and Jubal Early were fourth cousins who would fight on opposite sides during the Civil War.

In 1835 following Anne Buford’s death during a cholera epidemic, the Buford family moved to Rock Island, Illinois. John’s father became a successful businessman and politician. It was in Illinois where Buford acquired the skills that would stand him well in later years – horsemanship, marksmanship, and a calm and composed manner.

John decided on a career path taken by an older half-brother, Napoleon Bonaparte Buford, who had been an 1827 West Point graduate. John attended college in Cincinnati and Galesburg, Illinois prior to being accepted into West Point in 1844. He graduated 16th in a class of 38. John was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the First Dragoons and later joined the Second Dragoons. He remained in the army and served in Indian wars, in Bloody Kansas, and in the Mormon Expedition in 1857. Buford won praise from several of his commanding officers and made many acquaintances of officers who would have future impacts on Buford's career.

Buford was on service in Utah when the news of Fort Sumter was received. As a Kentucky native, Buford was conflicted between duty to Kentucky and the government he had served since he graduated from West Point. When a message from the Governor of Kentucky arrived in Utah, Buford was offered a post with that government. Buford related to his friend and future Union General, John Gibbon, that his reply had been, "I sent him word I was a captain in the United States Army and I intended to remain one."

Buford initially served as a major in the inspector general's office until pre-war friend, John Pope, promoted Buford to brigadier general of cavalry in Pope's Army of Virginia. Buford was one of the few Union officers who served with distinction during the Second Manassas Campaign. Buford's personal leadership at Lewis Ford gained Pope time to escape from Lee's determined efforts to destroy Pope's Army.

Wounded at Lewis Ford, Buford served in mainly administrative positions under McClellan and Burnside. It was only after Joe Hooker assumed command of the Army of Potomac that Buford again returned to field command of the Reserve Brigade, 1st Division, Cavalry Corps. Buford took part in the failed Stoneman's Raid during the Chancellorsville Campaign; however, Buford performed well in his service. Hooker relieved Stoneman and considered Buford as overall cavalry command; however, the more ongoing Alfred Pleasanton was chosen over the competent but quiet-natured Buford.

At Brady Station on June 9, 1863. Buford commanded Pleasanton's right wing during the attack on J.E.B. Stuart's Confederate forces. Buford and his men drove the Confederates until Pleasanton ordered the Union forces back into their own lines. Stuart and his Confederate cavalry were dealt a serious blow to their feelings of superiority over their foe - the Union cavalry had given as good as it had received. The action at Brandy Station was to have serious implications for the coming Confederate offensive.

John Buford gave even more reliable service and gained lasting fame for his actions at Gettysburg. It was Buford who recognized the importance of the high ground south of the town. It was Buford who dismounted his men and delayed Henry Heth's infantry until John Reynold's men arrived on the field to challenge the Confederate advance. Buford's decision to use his smaller cavalry unit to block the larger Confederate force changed the course of the Civil War.

Buford took an active part in the pursuit of Lee's army as it returned to Virginia. He remained in the field through the Bristoe and Mine Run campaigns in late summer and fall of 1863. The demands of continued campaigning weighed heavy on Buford's health. In November, Buford contracted a severe case of typhoid and he was forced to leave his command.

Buford went to Washington where he stayed at the home of his former commander, George Stoneman. As Buford's health worsened, Stoneman appealed to President Lincoln for Buford's promotion to major general. Lincoln approved this request; unfortunately, this was a deathbed promotion for John Buford died around 2:00 PM on December 16, 1863. He was 37 years old.

John Buford was not the gaudy showman as was George Armstrong Custer, nor was he like the blustery commander, Hugh Judson Kilpatrick. Buford was a quiet man, a reliable man, a man who sought neither fame nor glory – John Buford was a difference maker.

 September 1863 *****

The Battle of Chickamauga was fought in September 1863. The battle was bad for the North in terms of men lost but they could recover from this. For the South, a 25% loss of manpower at Chickamauga was a disaster. September 1863 also saw the North specifically target Chattanooga.

September 1st: Six more Union gun ships sailed into Charleston Harbour to assist with the attack on the city.

September 2nd: Union forces captured Knoxville, Tennessee. This cut in half the railroad from Chattanooga to Virginia and meant that the South would have to supply its men in Virginia via railways through Atlanta.

September 4th: General Grant was injured falling from his horse. Observers claimed that it was because he was drunk – possibly with some justification. Allegations of drunkenness were to follow Grant for many years.

September 5th: An infantry assault on Battery Wagner started after the “sub-surface torpedo mines” had been cleared. General Rosecrans started his attack on Chattanooga. The British government seized two ironclads being built for the South in Liverpool after strenuous pressure from Washington DC.

September 6th: Chattanooga was evacuated on the orders of General Bragg.

September 7th: A full-scale infantry assault on Battery Wagner was planned for 09.00. However, by this time the battery had been evacuated.

September 9th: President Davis ordered 12,000 troops to Chattanooga, as he believed that the city could not be allowed to fall. They were to come from Lee’s Army of Northern Virginia.

September 10th: The South’s commander at Chattanooga, Bragg, ordered an attack on the Union forces as they approached the city. However, he was unaware of the size of Rosecrans force or where they all were. The dense forests that surrounded the city hid many Union soldiers. Bragg chose not to use trained scouts. He used his own cavalry for reconnaissance and they failed to spot that the Union army approaching Chattanooga had split into three.

September 12th: General Polk was ordered by Bragg to attack the Union's known positions. Polk refused to do so. No one accused Polk of cowardice, as he had a reputation for enjoying battle, such was his fiery temperament. What stopped Polk was his lack of information – he did not know the size of the army he was meant to attack. Polk also knew from past experience that Bragg was rarely keen to gather as much intelligence as was possible. Even Bragg did not know the whereabouts of the main force of Union troops and his subordinate generals started to think that he was bewildered by what was going on around Chattanooga. It did not help matters that Bragg pointed the finger of blame at everyone except himself.

September 13th: Bragg was informed by officers on the ground that Rosecrans force was scattered and any one section was open to a concerted attack. Bragg refused to accept this and planned for an attack against a sizeable and concentrated enemy. If he had followed the information given to him by his subordinates, the outcome of the battle to come may have been different. As it was, Bragg's indecision allowed Rosecrans the time to move his XX Corps commanded by General McCook to the frontline. XX Corps was the furthest away of Rosecrans army. McCook's men had to march 57 miles to reach where the bulk of Rosecrans force was.

September 15th: Bragg planned for an attack on September 18th. However, chaotic communications within the Confederate camp meant that there were delays in getting this information to the generals in the field.

September 17th: Rosecrans correctly guessed what Bragg planned to do. He moved his units accordingly. The move took place at night to ensure that they were not seen.

September 18th: Bragg issued his orders to attack. With the additional men, he had an army that had numerical supremacy over Rosecrans – 75,000 troops against 57,000.

September 19th: Neither side had made any ground against the other. Just before midnight both Rosecrans and Bragg met with their junior generals to discuss the battle.

September 20th: The battle recommenced at Chickamauga. On this day Ben Hardin Helm was killed fighting for the South. He was brother-in-law to President Lincoln's wife. A major misinterpretation of orders sent by Rosecrans left the Union's middle front line exposed to attack after the men who had been there were moved to the Union's left flank – not what Rosecrans had wanted. The attack duly came when three Southern divisions attacked and inflicted major casualties on the Union forces in front of them. The senior Union commander in the field, Major-General Thomas stopped the rout from becoming a disaster by a valiant and well coordinated rear guard action that earned him the nickname "The Rock of Chickamauga". The battle cost the Union 1,656 dead, 9,749 wounded and 4774 captured – 28% of Rosecrans' total force. The South lost 2,389 killed, 13,412 wounded and 2,003 missing – 24% of the Army of Tennessee's total.

September 21st: Union forces headed for Chattanooga. Observer's for Bragg sent him word that Rosecrans Army of the Cumberland was disorganised and scattered and that a robust chase could destroy what was left. Brigadier-General Nathan Bedford Forrest wrote to Bragg "every hour (lost) is worth a thousand men". Bragg did not seem to fully comprehend the magnitude of the South's victory. Some elements of the Confederate Army did attempt a follow up but it was piecemeal and Rosecrans was let off of the hook.

September 22nd: Rosecrans informed President Lincoln about the scale of his defeat. Lincoln had put a great deal on capturing Chattanooga and viewed Rosecrans' failure as a bitter blow.

September 23rd: Rosecrans informed Lincoln that he could hold Chattanooga unless he had to face a much superior force in terms of numbers.

September 24th: Lincoln, believing that Chattanooga had to be held, ordered that 20,000 extra men should be sent there. However, supplying Rosecrans would be problematic, as Bragg had captured Lookout Valley cutting in half the Union's supply line.

September 25th: Lincoln described Rosecrans as "confused and stunned like a duck hit on the head". 20,000 Union troops started their journey to support Rosecrans.

September 28th: Rosecrans brought charges against some of his commanders - Generals McCook and Crittenden. Both were ordered to face a court of inquiry. Conditions in Chattanooga were becoming worse as food was in short supply.

September 29th: General U Grant was ordered to direct towards Chattanooga as many men as he could spare. Grant had pre-empted this command and sent a force led by Sherman.

Fort Anderson: Then and Now

On May 9th, Jim McKee, provided a description of Fort Anderson as it has evolved into a premier site to reflect the art of Civil War military engineering.

In 1862, General Samuel G. French decided a fortification at the Brunswick Town site would make a valuable addition to the defenses along the Cape Fear River. Major Thomas

Rowland was placed in charge of the construction of an earth fortification on the site of the ruins of the St. Phillips Church. Rowland began construction on March 24, 1862 and he called the fortification Fort St. Phillips. Battery

A ran parallel to the river and Battery B ran perpendicular to the river. The ordinance at the fort consisted of rifled 32 pounders, smoothbore 32 pounders, smoothbore 24 pounders, and Whitworth breech loading guns. The fort was enlarged and extended westward under the command of Major William Lamb and Major John J. Hedrick.

The preservation of the Civil War site was begun in 1958 when archeological efforts began to uncover the secrets of the Brunswick Town site. Clearing of the virtual jungle that encompassed the site revealed that the colonial site had also been occupied by a Civil War fortification. Stanley South led those early archeological efforts at the site where both colonial and Civil War era artifacts were discovered.

Ed Bearss was an early visitor to the site in 1962 – His interest in the fort and its history has led him back to this historical site on numerous occasions. Ed's most recent visit came in January 2013.

Members, Connie Hendrix and Linda Lashley, took advantage of a January tour of the site led by Jim McKee, Chris Fonvielle and Ed Bearss.

Archeological efforts continue until the present. Recent work by Jim and others reveal that powder stored in magazines built into the fort's walls may still be potent. Efforts continue to learn more about the fort, its garrison, and its part in the lore and history of the Cape Fear.

* Trivia Questions for September *******

1 – What was and is the goal of the Museum of the Confederacy? Education. The exhibits, past and present, were designed to further understanding of not only the Confederate nation but all aspects of Southern life. Students from 8 to 80, 50 states, and 73 countries have enjoyed and learned from materials at the MOC. The original museum was located in Richmond and an Appomattox location was opened in 2012.

The Museum of the Confederacy maintains the world's most comprehensive collections of artifacts, manuscripts, and photographs from the Confederate States of America. While the Museum is best known for its military collections, it also holds significant collections of domestic objects and decorative arts, personal papers and diaries, postwar memorial period materials and museum archives. The object collections total approximately 15,000 items. Among these are:

- 1,500 decorative arts objects featuring rococo revival-style furniture from the Confederate White House;
- 1,000 memorial period artifacts including badges and ribbons from postwar veterans Confederate Uniforms reunions and souvenirs of monument dedications throughout the South;
- 550 flags, including non-regulation oil-painted silk flags and government issue national colors;
- 300 edged weapons and 177 firearms representing Southern wartime manufacture and European imports;
- 215 uniforms including prewar militia uniforms, plantation-made garments, late-war issues from the CSA's Richmond depot and the uniforms of well-known officers;
- 3,000 military accoutrements and 1,000 military buttons;
- 150 paintings featuring a series of 31 oil-on-board paintings of Charleston Harbor by Conrad Wise Chapman, E.B.D. Julio's heroic painting, "The Last Meeting of Lee and Jackson," and wartime paintings by William D. Washington;
- 25 sculptures including busts of Jefferson Davis and "Stonewall" Jackson by Frederick Volck and work by Moses Ezekiel; and
- 5,000 domestic items featuring wartime "ersatz" goods such as plantation wooden shoes and homemade soap, slave-woven coverlets and baskets, and articles associated with the employment of women in government bureau.

The Museum of the Confederacy fulfills its mission by collecting, displaying and preserving historic objects associated with the Confederate States of America including military and civilian items related to the secession of Southern States and the subsequent war; post-war activities of Confederate veterans organizations; the White House of the Confederacy; the Confederate Memorial Literary Society (CMLS); other Confederate memorial and descendants organizations; and social, cultural and political history of the Confederate States of America. The Museum has continued to build its world-class collection through generous donations from people who wish to have their Confederate objects, photographs, and documents preserved and displayed for posterity.

2 - Among the 550 flags in the Museum of the Confederacy collection, which one last flew over a Confederate unit? The flag of the C.S.S. Shenandoah. James Iredell Waddell commanded the Shenandoah and turned her over to the British Navy at Liverpool in November 1865.

The C.S.S. Shenandoah being repaired at Williamstown, at the mouth of the Yarra River near Melbourne in Victoria, Australia in February 1865. Since, many fine Royal Australian Navy Warships have been built close to this site.

3 – Who was known as “Old Steadfast?” Major General John Buford, Jr.

4 – What Union officer made a visit to Fort Anderson before the fall of the fort to Union troops? Lt. Comdr. William B. Cushing came ashore on February 11, 1865 and heard speeches given by Confederate officers to boost the morale of their troops.

When you visit Fort Anderson, ask Jim McKee or other staff to show you the location of Cushing Cove.

5 – What was the U.S.S. Old Bogey and what role did it play in the battle for Fort Anderson?

William Baker Cushing suggested that a “fake” monitor be used against Fort Anderson’s torpedo defenses. Cushing hoped the Confederates would mistake the fake for the U.S.S. Montauk and detonate their torpedoes in an attempt to destroy the ironclad.

How successful was Old Bogey? According to the Union Navy, especially Admiral Porter and Cushing, the fake was a resounding success. Cushing related the story to President Lincoln when Cushing was in Washington on February 22nd.

6 - Fort Anderson’s garrison flag was at the center of a fascination series of events. What were those events? Soldiers of the 140th Indiana entered Fort Anderson as the last Confederate troops made their escape toward Wilmington. The Federals took possession of the flag as it lay on the ground having fallen off a hastily departing wagon. This flag was later presented to Indiana Governor Oliver P. Morton in a ceremony in Washington, DC on March 17, 1865.

In attendance at this flag ceremony, was President Lincoln. Lincoln had changed his plans to attend a play at a hospital located near his summer cottage. His change of plans foiled a kidnapping attempt planned by conspirators led by John Wilkes Booth.

The rest of the story is history.

Visit Fort Anderson and view the garrison flag. Through the efforts of Dr. Chris Fonvielle and the donations of many individuals, the garrison flag was returned to its rightful home.

Fort Anderson: Then and Now

Join us on May 9th when Jim McKee, Brunswick Town/ Fort Anderson Historic Interpreter, presents a program about the history and present day going-ons at the fort.

In 1862, General Samuel G. French decided a fortification at the Brunswick Town site would make a valuable addition to the defenses along the Cape Fear River. Major Thomas Rowland was placed in charge of the construction of an earth fortification on the site of the ruins of the St. Phillips Church. The fort was enlarged and extended westward under the command of Major William Lamb and Major John J. Hedrick.

On July 1, 1863 and to honor a fallen North Carolina general, George Burgwyn Anderson, the name was changed to Fort Anderson. With the fall of Fort Fisher on January 15, 1865, Fort Anderson became the most important defensive position to prevent the Federals from advancing on Wilmington from the west side of the river. On February 18th, the fort was flanked by General

Jacob Cox's Federal forces and the Confederates abandoned the works on the morning of the 19th.

Fort Anderson's isolated location will serve its preservation well for the next 150 years for much of the fort remains as it had been in February 1865. Jim McKee will be giving an update of archeological efforts that have been and will be done at this wonderful example of Civil War military engineering.

* Civil War Humor *******

In the midst of a desperate war, soldiers – Union and Confederate – could find something to relieve the stress in most situations. The following efforts were taken from The Dispatch, the newsletter of The Civil War Round Table of New York, October 1981, Vol. 31 No. 2.

At Kennesaw Mountain in 1864, General Sherman sat on a top of a high hill before ordering General Jacob Cox to threaten the enemy's left. Sherman gave his orders to Cox and then added, "And burn a few barns as you go along Cox. I can't understand those signal flags but I know what smoke means."

The 11th Mississippi Regiment was noted for being a rough, tough fighting unit that asked no quarter and gave no quarter. Being backwoodsmen, they were also famous marksmen. A farmer near where they were camped approached General Whiting and reported the loss of a hog within the 11th's lines, testifying that a shot had been heard followed by a squeal. General Whiting replied soberly, "I am satisfied you are mistaken. When an 11th Mississippian shoots a hog, it don't squeal."

May 1863 saw two major events of the American Civil War. The first of these was the death of 'Stonewall' Jackson. The South was experiencing many difficulties - be it military or economic - and the loss of a highly talented military commander who seemed to thrive on being in the field as opposed to being in a tent studying maps was a major one. The second important event of May 1863 was the North's attack on Vicksburg.

May 1st: Stonewall Jackson halted the Union advance against Lee near Chancellorsville. Hooker told his junior commanders, much to their astonishment, that the Union army would go on the defensive as a result of this setback despite having a 2 to 1 advantage in terms of men over the South (90,000 to 40,000).

Lee and Jackson at Chancellorsville

May 2nd: Jackson commanded a force of 25,000 men in an attempt to get behind Hooker's main force and to attack them in the rear. It was a very bold plan that had to work. If Jackson's army was wiped out, Lee would have been left with just 15,000 men. To convince Hooker that his men were retreating, Lee ordered numerous trains to ride up and down the Fredericksburg/Richmond railway – even if their carriages were empty. His plan worked and Hooker became convinced that Lee was pulling back his men. Lulled into a false sense of security, Hooker may well have taken his eye off of what was going on and when Jackson launched his attack behind Hooker's line, the Union army was unprepared. Many parts of the Union army were driven back. However, in an attempt to know what was going on at the front, Jackson went to the front line to assess the situation for himself. One of his own men did not recognise him and shot him. Jackson was badly wounded.

May 3rd: Hooker lost the Battle of Chancellorsville and he ordered the Army of the Potomac to prepare for a retreat. However, not knowing of this, General Sedgwick, believing that an attack on Fredericksburg would be successful, ordered such an attack. Initially he was very successful and captured 15 cannon and 1000 prisoners. However, without any support from Hooker he was totally isolated and at the mercy of Lee's army.

May 4th: Sedgwick's men held off the first assaults on their positions by Lee's army. Then in a stroke of fortune, the whole area was shrouded in fog and Sedgwick used this to get his men out of Fredericksburg without further loss. In a Council of War, Hooker announced that the Army of the Potomac was to retreat to Falmouth, Virginia.

May 5th: Very heavy rain helped Hooker's army in their retreat as it greatly hindered Lee's army in its efforts to follow up its successes in May.

May 6th: The last of the Union's army had withdrawn. The Battle of Chancellorsville was a huge success for Lee and Jackson and if the weather had been better could have been a lot worse for Hooker. Hooker lost 17,000 men despite a 2 to 1 advantage over Lee. However, while the Union could sustain such losses, the South lost 13,000 men and they could not survive such a rate of attrition. The Confederacy agreed to spend $2 million on purchasing European naval ships. The requirement for the ships was simple: they had to be able to operate in the Atlantic yet be able to sail up the River Mississippi. The leaders of the Confederacy believed that such a ship would be able to break the Union blockade of southern ports.

May 8th: Nearly a week after being accidentally shot by one of his own men, it became obvious that the wounds suffered by 'Stonewall' Jackson were life threatening. An arm had already been amputated but a chronic infection meant that he wasn't expected to live. Nearly one week after the shooting, Jackson was drifting in and out of consciousness.

May 9th: General Grant threatened to take Vicksburg, the key to the Mississippi. The Confederate leader, Davis, promised commanders in the city every means of support. The Confederate defenders of Vicksburg had a dislocated intelligence system and so had little knowledge of Grant's movements.

May 10th: 'Stonewall' Jackson died.

May 14th: Jackson fell to Generals Sherman and McPherson. The Union government continued to put pressure on Great Britain not to sell naval boats to the South.

May 15th: Sherman destroyed manufacturing centres and railroads in and around Jackson so that when Union forces moved on, they could not be reused by those who lived in Jackson – and supported the Confederacy. It was a foretaste of what he would do in future months.

May 16th: Union forces attacked Southern forces defending Vicksburg at Champion's Hill. The South had 22,000 men and faced a Union force of 27,000. Both sides suffered 2,000 casualties – though the Union army was better able to cope with such casualties. However, the South commander, John Pemberton, made one major error. Rather than keeping his men out in the field to face Union forces, Pemberton withdrew them to the poorly defended Vicksburg.

May 17th: At dawn Union forces attacked Confederate defences at Big Black Rock, just outside of Vicksburg. The attack was so swift that the defenders only had time to get off one volley of shots before being overrun. The North captured 1,700 Confederate troops and 18 cannon and lost just 39 dead and 237 wounded.

May 18th: Sherman's leading men reached the outskirts of Vicksburg.

May 19th: General Grant ordered a hasty and not well-prepared attack on Vicksburg. There were two reasons for this. The first was that he hoped to take advantage of what he hoped would be Confederate demoralisation within Vicksburg. The second was that prior to the success at Big Black Rock he had ignored and effectively disobeyed an order by his superior, General Halleck, to withdraw his men from Vicksburg and march to Port Hudson to assist General Banks in an attack there. One way of smoothing over this breach of military discipline would have been a swift, decisive and successful attack on Vicksburg. However, the attack failed and the North lost 900 men.

May 20th: Grant's men dug themselves in around Vicksburg. Union warships patrolled the River Mississippi around Vicksburg to hinder any Confederate use of the river. However, despite their military success, Union forces had not had it all their own way. They had to make do with five days rations over a three-week stretch.

May 21st: Grant's troops received their first batch of food in weeks when bread arrived along with coffee. Grant hoped that this would boost the morale of his men and ordered an attack on Vicksburg the following day.

May 22nd: The attack was a failure and the North lost 500 killed and 2,500 wounded. The ruined Grant's misguided belief that Vicksburg was not well defended. He withdrew his men and ordered Vicksburg to be besieged. Grant later described this as an attempt to "out-camp the enemy". Grant's siege line stretched for 15 miles around Vicksburg.

May 27th: Union forces attacked Port Hudson. It was a failure as Confederate troops were well dug in. The North lost 293 dead and 1545 wounded. As at Vicksburg, a decision was taken to besiege Port Hudson.

May 28th: The Union siege at Vicksburg was hampered by the fact that Grant had marched with small and manoeuvrable artillery. Therefore he did not have the necessary artillery to bombard Vicksburg. However, this problem was solved when large Union naval guns were brought up the Mississippi and installed ashore. Once operational, they were used to destroy known Confederate defences. In 1862, extensive defence lines had been built around Vicksburg. However, during the winter of 1862/63, they had fallen into disrepair and were only repaired after the clash at Big Black Rock on May 17th. 30,000 Confederate troops manned these defences commanded by General John Pemberton. They faced 41,000 Union troops commanded by Grant – though this figure was to rise to 70,000 men by the summer. Life for the besieged citizens of Vicksburg and Port Hudson was hard as food and fresh water supplies dwindled.

* July 1863 *******

As a native Tar Heel, I found Dr. Joseph Glatthaar's discussion of the losses among North Carolina troops at Gettysburg moving. I had three great-grandfathers and a great-uncle who fought there. The great-uncle was wounded, captured, and ultimately died of his wounds.

I came across General Isaac Trimble's report on the third day's fight at Gettysburg. What I found interesting about Trimble's writing was a Virginian's positive comments on the bravery of the North Carolinians who came under his command. Trimble reportedly said of these men, "If the men I had the honor to command that day could not take that position, all hell couldn't take it." Note: Trimble's comment about the profane terms credited to him by North Carolina's General James Lane.

On the morning of the third, I had been put in command, by an order of General Lee, of two of the brigades of General Pender, who had been wounded. These were both of North Carolina troops commanded by J.H. Lane and Alfred M. Scales. On taking command of the troops, entire strangers to me, and wishing as far as I could to inspire them with confidence, I addressed them briefly, ordered that no gun should be fired until the enemy's line was broken, and that I would advance with them to the farthest point.

When the charge commenced about 3:00 p.m., I followed Pettigrew about 150 yards in the rear, a sufficient distance to prevent the adverse fire raking both ranks as we marched down the slope. Notwithstanding the losses as we advanced, the men marched with the deliberation and accuracy of men on drill. I observed the same in Pettigrew's line. When the latter was within 100-150 yards of the Emmetsburg Road, they seemed to sink into the earth under the tempest of fire poured upon them. We passed over the remnant of their line and immediately after some one close on my left sang out "Three cheers for the Old North State!" Both brigades sent up a hearty shout and I said to my aide "Charley, I believe these fine fellows are going into the enemy's lines."

They did get to the road and drove the opposite line from it. They continued there some minutes, discharging their pieces at the enemy. The loss here was fearful. I knew that no troops could long endure it. I was curious to know how things went on with the troops on our right, and taking a quick but deliberate view of the field over which Pickett had advanced, I perceived that the enemy's fire seemed to slacken there and some squads were falling back on the west side of the Emmetsburg Road. By this I inferred that Pickett's division had been repelled and if so, it would be a useless exercise of life to continue the contest. I therefore did not attempt to rally the men who (moved?) back from the fence.

As I followed the retiring line on horseback at a walk to the crest of Seminary Ridge, under the unceasing discharge of grape, shell and musketry, I had cause to wonder how any one could escape wounds or death.

On reaching the summit of the ridge, I found the men had fallen into line behind some rude defenses. I said "that is right, my brave fellows, stand your ground and we will presently give these chaps as they have given us", for by all the rules of warfare, the Federal troops should, as I expected they would, march against our shattered columns and seek to cover our army with an overwhelming defeat.

In turning over the command to General Lane, I used some expressions of commendation for the gallant behavior of these men, but I am sure I did not use the profane terms which General Lane quotes my language.

Being severely weakened and unable to follow the army in retreat, I made no report of the battle in terms of killed and wounded. General Lane and General Scales have done this, which shows the fearful loss in these two brigades in the charge of July 3.

In General Lee's Army: From Victory to Collapse, Glatthaar reported that from late April to mid-October 1863 that 70% of the North Carolinians who served in the ANV were either killed, wounded, or captured. This was the highest casualty rate among troops of any state that provided troops to the ANV. These losses adversely affected the home front in North Carolina and would impact the level of desertion among North Carolina troops later in the war.

Lies, Damn Lies, and Statistics:
The Army of Northern Virginia and Some Interesting Numbers

Statistics: The classification and interpretation of such data in accordance with probability theory and the application of methods such as hypothesis testing to them.

Mind-numbingly boring? Not when they were shared by Dr. Joseph T. Glatthaar of the University of North Carolina – Chapel Hill. For those who attended the April meeting, Glatthaar made charts and numbers not only interesting, but fascinating. He probably fielded more questions from the audience than any other meeting I have attended – that in itself meant that we were not asleep but followed the data and thought about its relevance.

Joe began his presentation with an explanation of “why” he began the exhaustive study of the Army of Northern Virginia: rather than having researchers (including himself) “cherry-pick” facts and numbers to support a conclusion, Glatthaar wanted to use a statistically random sample of members of Lee’s army to mathematically determine valid facts and numbers. With the aid of a statistics talented colleague, Kent Tedin, at the University of Houston, Glatthaar determined that a sample of 600 men – 150 artillerymen, 150 cavalrymen, and 300 infantrymen – would be required to yield valid findings. He then spent months selecting the individuals who made up the 600 man sample. Once Joe had his 600, he reviewed service records (approximately 800 reels), census records, county histories, obituaries, family histories, pension files and other data bases to flesh out the 560 enlisted men and 40 officers and their individual stories. The results of his study – from 1989 to 2008 – were presented in his General Lee’s Army: From Victory to Collapse.

The most significant finding may have been that the men in Lee’s army were more closely linked to slaveholding than had been previously thought. 44.4% of the men lived in slaveholding households. Lee’s men also had a higher median wealth than the men of comparable ages in the states from which Lee drew his troops. Glatthaar’s complete findings can be found in his latest book, Soldering in the Army of Northern Virginia.

What’s next for Dr. Glatthaar? He is almost complete with a similar study of the men of the Army of the Potomac. He is also trying to get funding to develop a statistical data base that would use 4,000 randomly chosen Confederate soldiers.

* Trivia Questions for May *******

1 – How large was the normal garrison at Fort Anderson during the Civil War? The normal garrison would have been about 200 men drawn from artillery units. After January 1865, the garrison was reinforced by units withdrawn from forts Caswell, Campbell, Holmes and Johnston. Additionally, General Johnson Hagood's brigade of South Carolinians was sent as reinforcements. The garrison swelled to 2,300 men before the final battle for the fort.

2 – When the Confederates abandoned the fort early on the morning of February 19th, what actions did the Federal troops undertake? The Federals heard the withdrawal of the Confederate troops and they quickly moved into the fort and were able to capture some of the last departing rebels. Unfortunately for the Federal Army victors, the Federal Navy was not aware of the new tenants and began a bombardment of the fort. The Federal army troops waved a white canvas tent to alert their naval compatriots to their plight.

The Federal army surrendered the fort to the Federal navy.

3 – The Confederate Infantry bore the brunt of combat during the war. What were the total losses among the infantry that joined Lee's army in 1862? 83.1% of those who joined the infantry in 1862 were KIA, WIA, died of disease, discharged for disability, or POW at least once, and 74.4% of those who joined the army in 1861 were. Per Dr. Glaathaar, that was a startling number.

4 – What were the desertions by year in the Army of Northern Virginia? By early 1865, Lee's army was losing 120 men a day to desertion. During this period, the men were subsisting on a diet of approximately 900 – 1200 calories a day, a diet so deficient in vitamins and minerals that the men could not receive the full nutrition from the food they ate. By comparison, the United States Army today provides its soldiers 4,000 calories a day. Clothing was scarce for many of the soldiers and they actually favored battles with the Union forces during the winter months so that they could get items from the Union casualties. Even equipment like axes and picks were in short supply.

Desertions by Year

6.8%	15.6%	33.6%	34.5%	9.5%*
1861	1862	1863	1864	1865

* complete records were not available for the last months of the war.

In spite of the hardships of service during late 1864 and early 1865, 67,000 men were with Lee in late March 1865. Continued Federal pressure by Grant's troops at Petersburg forced Lee to abandon his line on April 2nd. After a week trying to escape the closing Federal noose, Lee surrendered at Appomattox on April 9, 1865. By the 12th of April, 26,018 men of the ANV were formally paroled by Grant's forces.

5 – What were the ages of the oldest and youngest member in Glatthaar's sample? The oldest man in Joe's sample was 62 years old. The youngest man was 14 years old. The Army of Northern Virginia was desperate for men to continue the fight. The use of old men and especially young boys was a horrible indicator of how desperate the Confederacy became in the final stages of the war.

6 – On the third day of the Battle of Gettysburg, a massive bombardment by Confederate artillery was to weaken the Federal defensive positions on Cemetery Ridge before the Pickett-Pettigrew infantry attack. By all accounts, many of the Confederate artillery shells overshot the Federal positions. Why? On March 13, 1863, an explosion at the Confederate States Laboratories on Brown's Island in Richmond killed approximately 50 workers. Many of those killed had been young women who had been engaged in the manufacture of shells, fuses, and other ordinance for the Confederate artillery services. As a result of the disaster in Richmond, General Josiah Gorgas and his ordinance officers were forced to secure supplies from other laboratories throughout the South to supply the armies of the Confederacy.

At Chancellorsville in May 1863, William Allan, an ordinance officer on Jackson's staff, noticed that shells and case shots had exploded prematurely after exiting the cannon's mouth. Several weeks after the battle, Allan submitted an official notice concerning his observations. Gorgas and the Confederate Ordinance Bureau took Allan's observation seriously and the Richmond Laboratories began monthly testing of all ammunition, primers, and fuses from the various manufactories.

Lt. James Dinwiddie, at the Richmond Laboratories, was assigned the duty to test ammunition and fuses from the Charleston and Selma arsenals. A week after the battle at Gettysburg, Dinwiddie completed his test. The Charleston fuses were well made; however, they burned slower than they had been designed. Dinwiddie found that, "A spherical case shot with a 4" fuse would burst at 5" – that is at least 200 yards beyond where it was intended to burst." The Ordinance Bureau found that fuses produced in Charleston, Augusta, and Atlanta burned slower than those that had been manufactured in Richmond. Fuses from Charleston had been sent to the ANV after the March 13th explosion.

The lack of consistency in fuse manufacture among the different arsenals caused experienced Confederate gunners to over shot their target. Porter Alexander was entrusted by Longstreet to direct the 170 cannons that were gathered to blast the Federal positions prior to the Confederate attack. Alexander ran short of ammunition and the smoke from the massed cannon obscured his view of the bombardment effectiveness. Alexander measured the return fire of the Federal gunners and when the return fire slackened, Alexander informed George Pickett that he must attack.

There were more than fuse issues on that July 3rd; however, the 15,000 or so infantrymen who charged into the Federal positions played the devil for the artillery's failure.

Soldiering in the Army of Northern Virginia: A Statistical Portrait of the Troops Who Served under Robert E. Lee

Dr. Joseph T. Glatthar (“GLAD-har”) will speak to our members on April 11th about his study of the Army of Northern Virginia. In his sophisticated quantitative study, Glatthar will provide a comprehensive narrative and statistical analysis of many key aspects of General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Serving as a companion to Glatthar's General Lee's Army: From Victory to Collapse, Glatthar's will present supporting data and major conclusions in extensive and extraordinary detail.

While gathering research materials for General Lee's Army, Glatthar compiled quantitative data on the background and service of 600 randomly selected soldiers--150 artillerists, 150 cavalymen, and 300 infantrymen--affording him fascinating insight into the prewar and wartime experience of Lee's troops. Soldiering in the Army of Northern Virginia presents the full details of this fresh, important primary research in a way that is useful to scholars and students and appeals to anyone with a serious interest in the Civil War. While confirming much of what is believed about the army, Glatthar's evidence challenges some conventional thinking in significant ways, such as showing that nearly half of all Lee's soldiers lived in slaveholding households (a number higher than previously thought), and provides a broader and fuller portrait of the men who served under General Lee.

 A Walk in the Park *****

On March 16, Dr. Chris Fonvielle, led a narrated walk to Sugarloaf, north of Ft. Fisher. This was part of the Confederacy's defense between Ft. Fisher and Wilmington. The group of roughly 30 people met at the Federal Point History Center in Carolina Beach and was given access to several parcels of private property where significant remnants of entrenchments remain, along with an original roadbed. The group continued onto Carolina Beach State Park property and eventually reached the highest point in New Hanover County. Another 250 yards further brought them to the prize: Sugarloaf! The tired trekkers trudged back to the History Center to end their 4 mile hike. It was a very worthy spring afternoon. Linda Lashley

 Bentonville Dedication *****

On March 16, 2016, The Department of North Carolina, Sons of the Union Veterans of the Civil War, dedicated a monument to the 4 army corps, 14th, 15th, 17th and 20th, which served with Major General William T. Sherman's army during the time of the Battle of Bentonville. This project has taken several years to bring it to the dedication and a number of individuals and organizations were responsible. The Department of NC, SUVCW, formed a Monument Committee which was able to develop a design, guide it through State regulations and bureaucracy, and have it placed on the battlefield.

Speakers taking place in the ceremony included Mr. Donny Taylor, Bentonville Battlefield Site Manager; Dr. Gerard Devine, Commander of the Department of North Carolina; Mr. Keith Hardison, Director of the State Historical Sites; and Mr. Mark Day, representing the National Commander of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War. Mr. Taylor remarked that while it had been 148 years since the battle, it was 118 years since the first marker was placed on the site. Dr. Devine described the events leading up to the battle, the battle itself, and the aftermath. Special mention was made of the Cape Fear Living History Society and the Bentonville Battlefield Historical Association which donated funds for the Monument. These funds had been held in trust from fundraising efforts during the 1990s for a monument to the Union troops. Mr. Hardison noted that General Joseph E. Johnston and Sherman later became friends and Johnston caught a bad cold, which caused his death, because he refused to cover his head while serving as a pallbearer at Sherman's funeral. He said that, therefore, he believed that Johnston would approve of the placing of this monument on the field. Mr. Day brought greetings from the national Commander of the Sons of Union Veterans of the Civil War, Perley Mellor. He stated that it was especially significant for him to be here as his ancestor was here with the 150th New York Infantry in the 20th Corps. The ceremony was capped with the unveiling of the Monument, the skirl of bagpipes playing Amazing Grace, and Taps played by a US Army Sergeant. Re-enactors clad in the blue and the gray rendered artillery and infantry salutes.

Dennis St. Andrew, Commander of the Major General Thomas H. Ruger Camp #1, Sons of the Union Veterans of the Civil War, located in Fayetteville stated that the placement of this Monument means that the Union soldiers at Bentonville are finally being recognized for their service. Ed Gibson

April 1863 saw the start of the third year of the American Civil War. The economic plight of the South was taking a heavy toll. Coupled with this, the Army of the Potomac started to finalise plans for an attack on Richmond, the Confederacy's capital.

April 2nd: Riots occurred in Richmond where people were becoming desperate at the economic plight of the Confederacy. Food in particular was in short supply. The riot was termed a “bread riot” by locals though it turned into a general looting session. It was only quelled when the rioters listened to Jefferson Davis who spoke to them in person and then threw the money in his pockets at them. It was a sufficient gesture to disperse the rioters.

April 3rd: Lincoln visited Hooker and pressured him into an attack on Richmond. In response Hooker put in for 1.5 million ration packs.

April 4th: Hooker prepared the Army of the Potomac for an attack on Richmond. The Army's Secret Service Department was ordered to prepare updated maps on the defences at Richmond.

April 5th: Several Confederate ships were detained in Liverpool docks, as it was believed that they were blockade-runners.

April 10th: Lincoln reviewed the Army of the Potomac at its winter quarters in Falmouth, Virginia. The troops he met expressed their full confidence in Hooker – a view not totally shared by the president. Lincoln had to dampen down Hooker's rhetoric about capturing Richmond and remind him that defeating Lee's Army of Virginia was far more important and that Richmond was the bait to lure Lee into battle.

April 13th: General Burnside issued his General Order Number 38, which threatened the death penalty for anyone found guilty of treasonable behaviour.

April 17th: This day saw the start of Colonel Ben Grierson's Union legendary raid into the Confederacy. With 1700 cavalymen, Grierson roamed 600 miles during his raid deep into the South. The raid lasted 16 days and within the Union army Grierson became a legend.

April 20th: Lincoln announced that West Virginia would join the Union on June 20th 1863.

April 21st: Hooker finalised his plan of attack. He hoped to fool the South into thinking that Fredericksburg was his main target while moving three corps of troops against Lee's left flank. 2000 mules were acquired by Hooker to speed up the movement of his army.

April 24th: The Confederate Congress passed a tax set at 8% on all agricultural produce grown in 1862 and a 10% tax on profits made from the sale of iron, clothing and cotton. There was much public hostility to these new taxes but a general acceptance that they were needed. The biggest problem facing the South's economy was the fact that much land was used for the growing of cotton and not for food.

April 26th: Hooker's offensive against Lee's Army of Virginia and Richmond started. However, torrential rain turned many of the roads/tracks he used to mud and made movement very difficult.

April 28th: The rain has made movement so difficult that engineers had to lay logs on the surface of roads/tracks to allow wagons to move.

April 29th: Lee's scouts informed him that it was their belief that the attack on Fredericksburg was a feint and that their observed movement of many men on Lee's left flank was the real target of Hooker. Lee accepted the advice of his scouts and ordered Stonewall Jackson not to attack Union troops at Fredericksburg – despite Jackson's request to do just this.

April 30th: Hooker ordered 10,000 cavalymen to raid Lee's communication bases. The raids, while impressive with regards to the number of men involved, achieved very little and if anything served to boost the confidence of Lee's Army of Virginia.

The April 2, 1863, Bread Riot in Richmond received much press coverage concerning the plight of the civilian population as the war entered its third year. Two factors contributed to this increasingly serious condition: 1) The shortage of farm labor had an adverse impact upon the food supply to feed the army and the civilian population. 2) The wearing out of the rail systems to transport food, equipment, and the army was making it difficult for the Confederacy to take advantage of its interior lines of communications.

The following letter from a soldier in the 11th Regiment (Bethel Regiment) of North Carolina Troops provides a good feel for the conditions that soldiers and their families at home were facing in April 1863. William A. Elliott enlisted on July 7, 1862. He was killed on July 1, 1863 at the Battle of Gettysburg.

 March Program *****

On March 14, Dr. James C. Burke shared with our members the research he had undertaken to write his second book, The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad in the Civil War, concerning the railroad that became the “Lifeline of the Confederacy.” Burke provided details of the railroads that served Wilmington before and after the war, the succession movement and Wilmington events during the 1860-1861 crisis, the freight hauled by those railroads, the difficulties encountered in war-time Wilmington, the Union raids and their impact on the Wilmington & Weldon’s operation during the war, the aftermath of the fall of Wilmington to Union forces, and the rebuilding of the WWRR and its economic impact on North Carolina during the Reconstruction and later years.

Burke provided details about the men who were instrumental in the operation of the railroad during the Civil war and the challenges they faced as the shortages of railroad materials made their jobs exponentially more difficult. William S. Ashe, Stephen D. Wallace, R.R. Bridgers and S.L. Freemont were men whose lives were intertwined with the railroad.

Stephen D. Wallace, president of the W&WRR, closed his 1865 report to the stockholders with the following statement concerning the future and value of the railroad to North Carolina:

One thing is certain, the work is of too much importance to the public and the stockholders to be abandoned, and as there must be a commencement, the sooner that is entered upon the sooner will the desired benefits be realized. We have never appreciated the true value of Rail Roads to the communities until now. Having enjoyed their advantage and then being deprived of their use, we forcibly realize their worth.¹

For those who want to know the “nuts and bolts” of the Wilmington & Weldon, the appendixes in James’ book should provide details of Locomotives and Company Shops inventories; Railroad Employees Living in Wilmington, 1865-1871; and Freight Shipments for the Confederate Government, 1861. The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad in the Civil War is available from www.mcfarlandpub.com or McFarland order line (800-253-2187).

 Trivia Questions for April *****

1 – How large was the Army of Northern Virginia at its largest? In June 1862, the army had slightly more than 90,000 officers and men. Nearly half of the men who served in the Army of Northern Virginia resided in either Virginia or North Carolina, and another quarter came from Georgia and South Carolina. The average year of birth for soldiers in the Army of Northern Virginia was 1835. The median birth year was 1838. More than half were farmers and nearly all of them (94 percent) came from rural areas. One in seven was a student in 1860, and nearly half resided with parents or an older sibling.

2 – What percentage of the Army of Northern Virginia were conscripts? More than five of nine (56 percent) soldiers who served in the Army of Northern Virginia enlisted in 1861, and another three in ten (30 percent) enlisted the next year. In April 1862, the Confederate Congress passed the Conscription Act, and three of four who enlisted in 1862 did so prior to its enforcement. Because of poor record keeping, no one knows how many of the army's troops were conscripted. Most likely, the percentage of conscripts ranged from 6 to 8 percent. Less than 1 percent were hired as a substitute for someone else.

3 – What percentage of the Army of Northern Virginia lived in households that were slave-owning before the beginning of the war? Soldiers tended to come from comfortable backgrounds. Their median personal and family wealth (if they still lived with parents or other immediate family members) was $1,295, placing them solidly in the middle class. Slightly more than one in eight soldiers owned slaves, but 37.2 percent either owned slaves or their parents and family with whom they resided did. Four in nine (44.4 percent) lived in slaveholding households, demonstrating a strong connection to the institution of slavery. As a result, these soldiers had an investment in slavery that influenced their decision to fight.

On average officers were a couple of years older than their enlisted men. They tended to be wealthier; their combined personal and family median wealth was $3,000, compared to $1,200 for enlisted men. Almost half of all officers or their parents with whom they resided owned slaves, a figure that contrasted with 36 percent of enlisted men. Yet these distinctions were not as one-sided as they initially appeared. One in five officers and their families had a total wealth of less than $400, and almost nine of ten (89 percent) soldiers who owned slaves or whose families owned slaves served the entire war as enlisted men.

4 – How much more likely was an officer to be killed in action than an enlisted man? After two years of fighting under Lee, the officer corps alone suffered 1,600 killed and 6,000 wounded. Officers were two-and-a-half times as likely to be killed in action as enlisted men.

Sources for 1 - 4: http://encyclopediavirginia.org/Army_of_Northern_Virginia#start_entry, (accessed March 21, 2013). Contributed by Joseph Glatthaar.

5 – Sometimes after December 20, 1860, a locomotive of the Wilmington & Manchester Rail Road were stopped at the North Carolina/South Carolina border. Who stopped this locomotive and why? South Carolina became an independent nation after it seceded from the United States on December 20, 1860. South Carolina Customs Agents were installed on the Wilmington & Manchester sometimes after this date. These agents were to charge custom duties on goods entering or leaving South Carolina.

6 – During the Civil War, the Wilmington & Weldon set up a repair yard in what location? The small town of Magnolia in Duplin County was the site of this inland repair yard. S.L. Freemont sent all the company's rolling stock to Magnolia after the fall of Wilmington on February 22, 1865.

The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad In the Civil War

The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad was the backbone of what became the “Lifeline of the Confederacy.” The importance of the port of Wilmington, the blockade runners, and the extensive defensive forts in this area would have been significantly reduced had the railroad line from Wilmington to Weldon not existed. The story of this railroad and its operation during the Civil War was a tale of the men and events that greatly influenced the course of that war. The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad may have been neither as glamorous as the blockade runners nor as glorious as the battles for the forts; the story of the W&WRR may have been even more important than either in the supply of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia.

Dr. James C. Burke will share details about the ultimate test that the Civil War and its aftermath presented to the men who maintained an operating railroad during a difficult period. His presentation will include discussions of deterioration of railroad equipment; complications of Confederate government policies; sabotage attempts; a yellow fever epidemic; Union raids; the fall of Wilmington; and the unnecessary destruction of railroad property by the retreating Confederate troops. In spite of the challenges, Burke will relate how the W&WRR survived to become a powerful regional economic force.

James C. Burke grew up in Wilmington where he developed an interest in historical clues that can be embedded in an area's geography. He has published scholarly works in "The North Carolina Geographer" and "Railroad History." His books included The Wilmington & Raleigh Rail Road Company, 1833-1854 and The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad in the Civil War. His education included: University of North Carolina at Wilmington, BA in Music - 1982; University of North Carolina at Wilmington, MA in Liberal Studies - 2001; University of North Carolina at Greensboro, Post-Baccalaureate Certificate in Historic Preservation - 2004; University of North Carolina at Greensboro, Ph.D. in Geography – 2008.

On a cold and windy Sunday afternoon, re-enactors, volunteers, period sutlers, and staff welcomed a hardy group to demonstrations that commemorated the 148th anniversary of the fall of Fort Anderson. Artillery, infantry, and navy re-enactors gave visitors a feel for the Civil War soldier and his routine at Fort Anderson during the final winter of the war.

Jim McKee, Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson Historic Interpreter, and other artillery re-enactors began a demonstration of the routine that a gun crew would have performed to service a 6 pound smooth bore cannon during a battle. The gunners efficiently went about their drill and provided the audience with a BOOM that gave good accompaniment to the event.

By March 1863 the American Civil War had been going for nearly two years and the South was experiencing major economic problems as a result of the North's blockade of its ports. However, the North was not without its own problems as Lincoln had to sign into law what was effectively a call-up of all able-bodied men between 20 and 45 - a move that was not a popular one among the North's male population.

March 1st: Lincoln met with Secretary of War Edwin Stanton to discuss future military appointments.

March 2nd: Congress approved the President's list of promotions but also dismissed 33 officers for a variety of offences.

March 3rd: Both Senate and House passed The Enrollment Act. All able-bodied men between 20 and 45 were to serve for three years. The act was unpopular with the public because of its compulsion. Congress must have sensed this as in 1863 only 21,000 men were conscripted and by the end of the war conscription only accounted for a total of 6% of the North's army. Congress also suspended habeas corpus on this day – much to the anger of the Democrats in Congress.

March 6th: One of Hooker's attempts to develop the Army of the Potomac was to ensure that it had the most modern weapons available. By this day, his men were starting to be equipped with the Sharp's breech-loading carbine. This rifle gave Hooker's army unrivalled firepower at close range.

March 10th: Such was the problem of desertion across all armies of the Union, that Lincoln pronounced an amnesty on this day for all those who were absent without leave. Any deserter who returned to duty before April 1st would not be punished.

March 13th: 62 women workers were killed in an explosion in a munitions factory near Richmond. The Confederacy was to become more and more reliant on female workers as the war progressed.

March 24th: The last Union attempt to take Vicksburg failed. The Mississippi River was very high for this time of the year and it made navigation very difficult. Grant wanted to use the many waterways that surrounded Vicksburg to his advantage – but his plan failed.

March 26th: West Virginia voted to emancipate its slaves.

March 30th: Lincoln announced that April 30th would be a day of prayer and fasting throughout the Union.

In the February issue of The Runner, Acting Master Richard Hustace of the U.S.S. Monticello reported on his unsuccessful attempt to stop a blockade runner that sped past his position at 3:30 a.m. on the morning of February 25, 1863. Hustace's report reflected his frustration at the appearance of the phantom ship and its ability to use surprise and darkness to thwart his efforts. His report was found in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies, Series 1, Volume 8, pg. 573.

The ship that slipped past Hustace was the Granite City. She was an 160' X 23' X 9'2", 400 burden ton, iron hulled sidewheeler that was launched as the City of Dundee in Dumbarton, Scotland in 1862. Bought and converted to a blockade runner by Alexander Collie and Company, the Granite City had made the voyage to Wilmington from Nassau. The Granite City cleared the port of Wilmington on the return trip to Nassau on March 12, 1863.

The U.S.S. Tioga intercepted and captured the blockade runner off Eleuthera Island, Bahamas, on March 24th. The ill fated ship was purchased by the U.S. Navy from the New York Prize Court for $55,000. Commissioned as the U.S.S. Granite City on April 16th, she joined the Western Gulf Blockading Squadron during August 1863. She took part in a Sabine Pass expedition; the blockade of the Texas coast - where she captured three ships; and the naval bombardment Pas Cavallo and Smith Landing, Texas. On a rescue mission to Calcasieu Pass, Louisiana on April 28, 1864, the U.S.S. Granite City was trapped in narrow waters and captured by Confederate troops.

The ship was sold to Thomas W. House of Galveston for $36,000 Confederate. Converted to her former use, the blockade runner Granite City was run ashore by the U.S.S. Penquin while trying to clear Calcasieu Pass, Louisiana on January 30, 1865. This versatile ship - the former British ship City of Dundee, the former war ship U.S.S. Granite City, and blockade runner Granite City - broke apart off Velasco, Texas.

 Official Records *****

Have you ever wondered who was responsible for The War of Rebellion: Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies (ORA)? Or The Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion (NOR)? Last issue, I provided some information about the Official Records that was a little short of the total information available about that massive undertaking.

Senator Henry Wilson of Massachusetts was Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs during the Civil War. In 1864, Wilson drafted a bill that proposed that military reports and correspondence be collected and published as a record of the war. The collection began almost immediately after Lee's surrender when Henry Halleck had Confederate records brought to Washington and combined with War Department records. A staff continued to collect and process documents for the next decade; however, Congress had not appropriated funds to publish the growing number of documents.

On March 4, 1873, Henry Wilson became vice president in Grant's second administration. Wilson used the influence of his office to encourage the project that he had proposed over a dozen years before. Forty-seven volumes were set in type by the end of 1877. By 1901, the U.S. Government Printing Office had published 130 volumes complete with a 1,248 page index accompanied by an official atlas. It was thought, at the time, that the 140,000 pages contained all known information available about the war.

U.S. Navy officials had complained for a decade that the undertaking had ignored huge amounts of naval reports. On July 31, 1894, Congress approved the publication of The Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion. The first NOR was published by the end of 1894 and the last volume in 1917.

Henry Wilson, who died in November 1875, should best be remembered for the ORA.

Needless to say, the Official Records are a cornucopia of information. They are not; however, the end-all for a search of Civil War reports. Dr. Wayne K. Durrill, Professor in History Department at the University of Cincinnati reminded me that the OR contained mostly senior officer reports. The National Archives, in its RG 393 Continental Commands, stored the ground level reports from captains and lieutenants. ROAD TRIP!

The Adventure of Discovery, or Why We Don't Know What We Think We Know About the Civil War

Source: <http://www.ourstate.com/civil-war/> (accessed January 18, 2013).

Phillip Gerard provided a most interesting look at the articles he had written for the Our State magazine. Unlike many Civil War historians who examined the generals, the political leaders, and the battles; Gerard examined a large number of North Carolina's men and women who lived during this war. These were people who endured unimaginable hardships and stresses. Their experiences molded them into either survivors or casualties – living or dead. Gerard used primary source letters and diaries to feel and to relate the thoughts of those who encountered the hardships on the battlefields, in the camps, on the farms, and in the towns. "When This Cruel War Is Over" was more than a song to those who experienced those years; those experiences were what Gerard sought to share as he wrote their stories.

The Civil War began long before the guns fired at Fort Sumter. The two divergent economies and societies that developed in the North and South made conflict a likelihood beginning in the early 1830s. While North Carolina was an agrarian society, it was unlike many states in the lower South. Many of its small farmers and working-class whites favored continuation of the Union. The rush to arms carried many reluctant Tar Heels to the defense of their state. After the initial 1861 blush of succession, many had second thoughts about the war and where it was leading the people of North Carolina.

Phillip also shared with us what he had thus far learned from his extensive research: Firstly, all that we may have learned about the war was not always as it has been presented. War brought out the best and the worst of man: All of war was not glorious, all slaves and poor whites were not unintelligent, all men were not brave and honorable, all men did not experience war in the same manner. Secondly, knowing events for certain was not always possible. Conjecture was always a part of the letters and diaries, the writers did not know the ending of their stories.

Gerard related how one of the most beneficial occurrences about having written these articles was the feedback he had received from readers. Some pointed out some potential errors and others provided additional details which reinforced the story. Phillip said that eventually all stories would be combined into a single volume, one that contained updated details learned since their first publication.

The Our State articles were written in the present tense. Gerard wrote about men and women such as peace advocate William H. Holden, Governor Zeb Vance, Julian Leinbach 26th NC Regiment bandsman, Dr. John D. Bellamy and slavery in North Carolina, Confederate officer William Henry Speer, Abraham Galloway - a Cape Fear slave's quest for freedom, Union POW Benjamin F. Booth, farm wife Nancy Leigh Pierson Bennett and her day in history, Wilmington Doctor Thomas Fanning Wood, George Pickett and the Kinston hangings, William Holland Thomas and the Cherokees. Their stories have been written and many others will be written before the end of the sesquicentennial.

Who was Gerard's favorite character? Of the many hundreds he had met through his research, Julian Leinbach of the 26th NC Regimental band (second from the left) was his favorite. Leinbach's diary was informative about just what Leinbach thought of the war and his life. See "Battle of the Bands" in the January 2012 issue (www.ourstate.com/archives/) to learn more about Leinbach and why he may have held such a fascination for Phillip.

* Trivia Question for March *******

1 – William S. Ashe was the president of the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad when the Civil War began in 1861. What happened to Ashe on the night of September 12, 1862? On Friday, September 12, 1862, Ashe was heading in the direction of his home, 19 miles north of Wilmington. He hoped to reach the turnout at North East before the southbound mail train passed. At 7:30 P.M., within a quarter miles of the turnout, his handcar made contact with the mail train. The others on the handcar escaped, but Ashe was mutilated. The locomotive, recently purchased from the Seaboard & Roanoke RR, had been put in front of the mail train because of mechanical problems. Neither the locomotive nor the handcar had a light.

Source: James C. Burke, The Wilmington & Weldon Railroad in the Civil War (Jefferson, North Carolina: McFarland & Company, 2013), p. 98.

2 – The W&WRR began operation in May 1840 with 160½ miles of track from Wilmington to Weldon in Halifax County. What distinction did the railroad hold when it began operation? It was the longest railroad in the world when it began operation.

Source: http://thomaslegion.net/wilmington_and_weldon_railroad_history.html (accessed February 17, 2012).

3 - During the Civil War, the W&WRR was a 160½ mile railroad that was subject to attack from Union occupied eastern North Carolina. Who was responsible for repairing any damages inflicted by Union raiding parties? Colonel Sewall L. Fremont was the chief engineer and superintendent of the Wilmington & Weldon before and during the war. Fremont was a West Point engineering graduate and a pre-war friend of William T. Sherman. Early in the war, Fremont had joined the Confederate Army and directed the construction of many fortifications in the Cape Fear region. It was Fremont who named the earthworks at Federal Point after Charles Frederick Fisher; the commander of the 6th North Carolina Infantry who had died at the Battle of Manassas on July 21, 1861. Fremont and Fisher had been pre-war friends; Fremont was chief engineer of the W&WRR and Fisher was president of the North Carolina Railroad.

Fremont's railroad experience made him more important to the Confederate cause while with the W&WRR than as an army engineer.

On July 23, 1863, Fremont corresponded with General W.H.C. Whiting about a Union raid that had been made on Rocky Mount, Tarborough and possibly Wilson. A paragraph from that letter made clear the importance of the W&WRR to the cause, "It seems to me, general, that the time has fully arrived for the Government to take some efficient steps to defend the line of this road, at all times so important to the defense of the country, and especially the Atlantic frontier, is to be maintained."

Sources: Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope (Campbell, California: Savas Publishing Company, 1997), p. 37-38; Letter to W.H.C. Whiting, July 21, 1863, United States War Department, The War of Rebellion, A Compilation of the Official Records on the Union and Confederate Armies, 128 vols. (Washington, D.C., 1880-1901), Series 1 – Vol. 27 (Part II), p. 975.

4- Who were the Heroes of America and what part did they play in North Carolina during the Civil War? In 1860-1861, North Carolina's people were in a divided state on the question of separation from the Union. The large land owners and pro-secession politicians were able to call a convention and successfully lead North Carolina from the Union; however, there remained a large number of men who opposed this action. The Heroes of America led active opposition the Confederate government and sought to disrupt their actions in North Carolina. Concentrated in the nine Piedmont counties known as the Quaker Belt, the men organized in a style of the Freemasons with rituals, signs, countersigns, special handshakes, and oaths of loyalty. They encouraged spies, guided escaped Union POWs, fellow Unionists, and run-away slaves to safety in eastern Tennessee and Kentucky. Made up of mostly working-class whites and small farmers, the Heroes resisted conscription which gave exemptions to slave owners. The Heroes spread east to Raleigh, Goldsboro, Kinston, and the coastal area.

There was evidence that the Heroes were active in the Wilmington area. The State built a saltworks on Masonboro Sound and many of the positions were filled by men from the Piedmont. General W.H.C. Whiting believed that most of these men were members of the Heroes of America and that they should be given to the army. Whiting felt that there was no trust to be given to what he saw as treasonous men.

The “peace movement” favored by the H.O.A. continued throughout the war, but the efforts of the Confederate government to end their pacifist activities never lessened. The people of North Carolina found themselves involved with a “rebellion within a rebellion.”

Source: Phillip Gerard, “A Separate Peace,” Our State, November 2011; Gordon B. McKinney, Zeb Vance: North Carolina’s Civil War Governor and Gilded Age Political Leader (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004), p. 158, 160, 224-225, 227, 232.

5 – What rolls did the North Carolina Standard and Fayetteville Observer play during the Civil War. These were newspapers that editorialized the opposing political views of their editors.

William H. Holden, editor of the North Carolina Standard, was a supporter of the peace movement. He had long been known as a strong supporter of the common folks of the state. Holden was accused of being a support of the Heroes of American; he was also the peace candidate for governor against Zeb Vance in 1864. Holden drew controversy like a lightening rod drew bolts from the sky. In September 1863, Georgia troops passing through Raleigh made Holden pay when they attacked the offices of Holden’s newspaper.

Edward J. Hale, editor of the Fayetteville Observer, was a strong pro-Confederate supporter who clashed with anyone who voiced opinions dissimilar to his views. The Fayetteville Observer had much influence within the state and the South before and during the Civil War. Per Phillip Gerard, Hale’s actions made his paper one of three targets that William T. Sherman wanted to destroy when he and his army entered North Carolina. The others were the Confederate Armory at Fayetteville and Joe Johnston’s army. Sherman destroyed the newspaper plant in March 1865. The pen may have been mightier than the sword, but Sherman burnt the pen, paper and presses.

Source: <http://www.ourstate.com/civil-war/> (accessed January 18, 2013).

The observance of 150th anniversary of the American Civil War has led to an enormous number of articles being written about a wide variety of subjects. The people of North Carolina have been particularly fortunate that a writer has skillfully undertaken the task of examining life in this state during that war. Philip Gerard, author and historian, has begun a series in Our State magazine in which he has tried to capture what was “the best and worst of the human spirit” caused by the events of those years.

Phillip Gerard is a professor and chairman of the Creative Writing department at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. A native of Newark, Delaware, Gerard holds a B.A. in English and Anthropology (Phi Beta Kappa) from the University of Delaware and a M.F.A. in Creative Writing from the University of Arizona. His work experiences include stints as a bouncer, a musician, a freelance writer, a newspaper reporter, and as a college teacher. His publications are both fiction and nonfiction and include Creative Nonfiction: Researching and Crafting Stories of Real Life, Secret Soldiers, Writing a Book That Makes a Difference, Desert Kill, Cape Fear Rising, and Hatteras Light.

“I’ll talk about the experiences of doing the Our State pieces and some of the surprises that researchers like me discover – how the war, especially in NC, turns out to be much more complicated and many-faceted than our schoolbooks told us.”

* Fort Anderson January 10, 2013 *******

It was early January in North Carolina and Ed Bearss (pron: bars) was making his annual trek to speak to many Round Tables throughout the state. He spoke to the BCWRT on January 9th – he then made his way to round tables in Pinehurst, Greensboro/Burlington, Raleigh, Tarboro, and New Bern. His schedule would have been difficult for anyone, but Ed, who was born on June 26, 1923, was just getting warmed up for a new year.

I will not tell you about Edwin Cole Bearss other than to say that he is “THE MAN” among Civil War Historians. I will refer you to an article that appeared in the Smithsonian magazine in 2005 - <http://www.smithsonianmag.com/people-places/bearss.html?c=y&page=2>.

Many of our members visited with the Brunswick Civil War Round Table to hear Ed speak on Wednesday night, January 9th. A lucky few were able to accompany Ed and a small group on a walking tour of the extended fortifications of Fort Anderson from the state site onto private lands bordering the main fort. Thanks to the generosity of David Sprunt and his family along with coordination by Dr. Chris Fonvielle and Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson Historic Interpreter Jim McKee, a hardy few accompanied Ed along the fortifications that extended from Fort Anderson to Orton Pond.

 Endor Iron Furnace *****

Restoration work on Lee County's 150 year old Endor Iron Furnace will begin sometimes during 2013. Work will probably take a decade, but an important part of Lee County's history will be preserved for future generations. The sagging industrial plant restoration will become the center piece for a 400 acre recreation area. Initial work will be to stabilize the furnace system and to provide access to the site on the Deep River.

The site was built about 1862 to supply the Confederacy with pig iron from the iron ore deposits that were available in the area. The furnace was built by Wilmington businessmen John and Donald McRae, and John W.R. Dix. Profitable until the end of the war, the furnace ceased production in the 1870s.

The economic blockade of the South during the American Civil War started to really hit home by February 1863 with the South's currency worth just 20% of its pre-war value. The weather meant that important military issues were kept to a minimum though the intelligence network of the Army of the Potomac was completely revamped.

February 1st: The dollar used in the Confederacy was worth just 20% of what it did when the war broke out. Such was the success of the Federal Navy in the rivers of the South that a decision was taken to remove any stores of cotton away from rivers. Any cotton that could not be moved was burned to save it falling into the hands of the Union.

February 2nd: Grant started his attempt to build a canal around to the rear of Vicksburg using the Yazoo River as his source of water. By doing this, Grant's men would avoid the Confederate artillery stationed in Vicksburg.

February 3rd: The French continued to offer attempts at mediation. Secretary of State Seward met the French ambassador in Washington DC to discuss such a move.

February 5th: The British government announced that any attempts at mediation would result in failure. Their lack of action was in stark contrast to the pro-active stance of the French government.

February 6th: The Federal government officially announced that it had rejected French offers of mediation.

February 9th: General Hooker started his reorganisation of the Army of the Potomac. He decided that his first task was to improve its intelligence gathering. On his arrival at his headquarters he found no document that could inform him about the strength of the Army of Virginia. General Butterfield wrote: "There was no means, no organisation, and no apparent effort to obtain such information. We were almost as ignorant of the enemy in our immediate front as if they had been in China. An efficient organisation for that purpose was instituted, by which we were so enabled to get correct and proper information of the enemy, their strengths and movements."

February 11th: Hooker then turned his attention to the conditions his men lived under, which he linked to the high levels of desertion. New huts were built that could cope with the winter weather and fresh fruit and vegetables were provided. Medical facilities were also improved. The impact on desertions was dramatic and even men who had deserted returned to their regiments.

February 12th: The Union's naval blockade had a disastrous impact on the South's economy and the river patrols of its flat-bottomed boats were equally as successful. However, the sheer size of the fleet operating meant that the Federal government faced a supply problem no one had encountered before. It was estimated that the North had to supply 70,000 bushels of coal each month to keep the fleet on the move. Food and water could be obtained locally but there was little chance of getting hold of large quantities of coal.

February 13th: General Hooker made what was to prove to be one of the most important changes to the Army of the Potomac during the war. Scattered cavalry units were amalgamated into one corps. No one was immediately appointed to command it as no army commander had ever had access to one concentrated cavalry unit. Hooker was willing to wait to appoint the most suitable candidate – he later selected General Stoneman to command it.

February 16th: The Senate passed the Conscription Act, which was passed, as volunteers for the Union army were not forthcoming.

February 22nd: Hooker believed that his changes were starting to have an impact as the levels of scurvy and intestinal diseases dropped quite markedly.

February 25th: Congress authorised a national system of banking.

 February 1863 cont'd *****

For the men of the Union blockading fleet, their job to prevent blockade runners from slipping past them was not as easy as many supposed. Imagine the frustration of Acting Master Richard Hustace as he reported the appearance of an apparition that had moved out of the darkness of a February evening.

U.S.S. Monticello,

Off Western Bar, Cape Fear River, February 25, 1863

SIR: I have to report that last night at 7 o'clock I left this ship in the first cutter with a crew of eleven men and proceeded in for the Western Bar for the purpose of performing picket duty. I arrived at the bar at 8:15 o'clock, sounded in and out over the bar and across the channel, and at 9 o'clock took my position on the north side of channel and anchored in 12 feet of water. Sea was smooth and weather cloudy. Near midnight the weather became clear and I was enabled to take the following bearings: Bald Head light-house about E.S.E. and Fort Caswell nearly E. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. after 1 o'clock the weather became misty to southward and westward and along the land, rendering it difficult to see objects at any distance. At 3:30 a.m. a steamer suddenly hove in sight between me and the land, coming out from under the cover of the woods; she passed between the boat and the shore, going at full speed. The breaking of the surf on the beach drowned the noise of her paddles. I had to get underway in order to bring the gun to bear on her, but before I could do that she was some distance up the channel. I immediately made the signal of a vessel having succeeded in passing me. I proceeded in toward the fort and got soundings at 8, 9, and 10 feet, where the steamer had passed. She was hailed from the shore, but I did not hear the answer returned. She stopped on the Rip long enough to take a pilot, as I supposed, then stood in and was soon out of sight. Tide had been running ebb three hours when steamer ran in. steamer was very long, low hull, side-wheels, short smokestack, no masts. Fort Caswell beat to quarters when I made signal to the blockaders.

Yours, respectfully,

RICHARD HUSTACE,
Acting Master, U.S. Navy

Lieutenant-Commander D.L. BRAINE,
Commanding U.S.S. Monticello

Yellow Fever: "Wagon-load of Corpses"

David Rice

In August 1862, Wilmington was the largest city in North Carolina. Blockade runners had discovered the geographic advantages – two widely separate inlets into the river - that the mouth of the Cape Fear River afforded those who sought to avoid the Union blockade. These blockade runners brought in essential military supplies necessary for the survival of the Confederacy; they also brought in luxury goods that were in high demand. Soldiers, sailors, merchants, opportunists, scoundrels and adventurers were drawn to Wilmington because of the war – and the chance for fame and fortune. More than 10,000 people lived in the increasingly busy and important port city.

David Rice, Director of the New Hanover County Health Department, shared with our members what else a runner may have brought in through the blockade. While there was speculation that there was sickness in Wilmington prior to the arrival of the blockade runner Kate, the ship's arrival on August 6, 1862 with sick crewmen among its complement boded ill for Wilmington and those who crowded its docks and dwelling. Lewis Swartzman, a wood-and-coal dealer became the first recorded case of a death from yellow fever when he died on September 9th. Within a short interval, everyone who could escape the city departed to safer climes. The population fell to 3,000. Of those who stayed, 1,500 contracted the disease; approximately 700 died before the disease played out with the first hard frost. Many of the victims were buried in Oakdale Cemetery.

David Rice told of the doctors and clergy who remained in Wilmington and their struggles to meet the needs of those who could not flee. Dr. James H. Dickson, Rev. John Lamb Prichard of First Baptist Church, and Rev. Robert Brent Drane – Rector of St. James Episcopal Church gave their lives in service to their community. There was no cure for the disease; hence, the medical personnel could only keep the victim comfortable and the clergy could only pray that the patient was strong enough to fight off the disease. A fatality rate of 40% was not uncommon during this period.

Rice finished his presentation by expanding his talk into an evolution of the Public Health Service in New Hanover County and in North Carolina. Wilmington native, Dr. Thomas Fanning Wood, led “an organized effort by society to protect, promote, and restore the people’s health.” Wood was not the only Wilmington doctor who championed a State Board of Health – Dr. Solomon Satchwell became chairman of a State Board of Health that was first organized in February 1877.

This was a most interesting talk by a speaker who understood the challenges faced by those who were in Wilmington in the fall of 1862.

NOTE: Additional information concerning the role and evolution of Public Health Services in Wilmington (and North Carolina) can be found in a paper written by Sharad J. Shah entitled “A History of Public Health in New Hanover County.” This paper can be accessed at <http://www.nhcgov.com/Health/about-us/Documents/Pub%20HI%20History.pdf>.

 Trivia Question for February *****

1 – Who founded the Our State magazine? When? In 1933 during the depth of the Great Depression, Carl Goerch founded this magazine, then known as The State. Goerch, an eastern North Carolina newspaper man, had an idea that he believed would be important to North Carolinians – he wanted to share the stories of North Carolina’s industries, tourist attractions and lifestyles. From 2,500 copies in 1933, the magazine, now known as Our State, has grown to more than 150,000 copies today.

The promoter of all “things” North Carolina was a native of New York.

2 - Who was Alexander Davis Betts? The Rev. Alexander Davis Betts grew up in Cumberland County, but was a resident of Smithville when President Lincoln called for troops to bring the seceding Southern states back into the Union. Betts left a wife and four young children at home when he went to war with Company C, 30th North Carolina Regiment. Betts became chaplain of the 30th Regiment when he received his commission on October 25, 1861. Betts was a 29 year old man who had been injured as a young boy. This injury had limited the physical labors he was able to perform.

Betts may have been physically challenged; however, he shared his men's hardships and he ministered to their needs until the end of the war. Afterwards, Betts returned home and preached to congregations for almost another half-century.

3 - When was the last case of yellow fever in the United States? According to the David Rice, a traveler from Oakridge, Tennessee contracted the disease during a visit to the Amazon in 1996. From 1970 through 2010, a total of 9 cases of yellow fever were reported in unvaccinated travelers from the United States and Europe who traveled to West Africa (5 cases) or South America (4 cases). Eight (88%) of these 9 travelers died. There has been only 1 documented case of yellow fever in a vaccinated traveler. This nonfatal case occurred in a traveler from Spain who visited several West African countries during 1988.

4 - Who discovered how yellow fever was transmitted? No one knew what caused the often-deadly yellow fever, but it occurred in epidemic proportions, with one person after another in a given area becoming sick. People feared the mysterious disease, until U.S. Army physician James Carroll endangered his own health in the name of science. On August 27, 1900, Carroll allowed an infected mosquito to feed on him. He developed a severe case of yellow fever but helped his colleague, Walter Reed, prove that mosquitoes transmitted the feared disease.

5 – Where can the inscription PRO ARIS ET FOCIS be found in Wilmington? For Alter and Home is the inscription on the Confederate monument located on South Third and Dock Street. The monument has an interesting history and its location in the median has subjected it to several altercations with motor vehicles.

The monument was designed by Henry Bacon, of Lincoln Memorial fame, and sculpted by F.H. Packer. It was donated to the City of Wilmington in 1924 by Gabriel Boney.

Yellow Fever: “Wagon-load of Corpses”

Join us on January 10th as David Rice shares the story of the yellow fever epidemic that decimated Wilmington during the fall of 1862. Rice, who leads tours at Oakdale Cemetery, relates the experiences of many of the residents of this city during the time of “yellow jack.”

His unique qualifications make his presentation a little different than just the historical facts that surround this facet of Civil War Wilmington.

Yellow Jack

Yellow Fever: “A perfect reign of terror...”

Union-occupied New Bern had its own battle with “yellow jack” during the fall of 1864. A typical summer of heavy rains and high temperatures provided the perfect conditions needed for disease to flourish in and around the town and soldier camps. General Benjamin Butler was met by ‘an awful stench’ as he approached the town.

From the Tryon Palace Summer 2011 issue:

On provost duty in town, the men of the 15th Massachusetts remained busy trying to keep streets and sewers clean. When it came to odor, New Bern was fighting a losing battle. Strong southwest winds in August drove the waters of the river out, leaving extensive and smelly mud flats baking in the hot sun; a new embankment ordered by military authorities was being dug along the Neuse River, turning up and exposing large quantities of filth-saturated soil and adding to the panoply of unpleasant odors.

For the most part, these summer days passed slowly as soldiers coped with drills, duty and camp life, and townspeople labored under the ambivalence and uncertain loyalties that accompanied “enemy” occupation. Yet soldiers and citizens all shared one sentiment: as one chronicler of the 5th Rhode Island Heavy Artillery recalled, “The one desire of all grades of soldiers, and all classes of civilians seemed to be to get away from New Berne during the heated term.”

Just a few short weeks later, the formerly bustling town would resemble a scene from a horror novel. Day and night, haze and acrid smoke from numerous tar and pitch fires enveloped its streets, sending black columns skyward. Public life ground to a halt, businesses and churches closed their doors, family and friends abruptly stopped socializing. Parents died and children were left orphaned. Residents died alone in their homes, their bodies lying unclaimed. Everyone who could leave fled, trying to stay ahead of a capricious enemy who struck with no mercy. “Yellow Jack” had arrived in New Bern and he was on a killing spree.

Nicknamed “Yellow Jack” for the yellow flag or “jack” flown by infected ships under quarantine, yellow fever is a viral illness transmitted to humans by the bite of the Aedes aegypti mosquito. To spread the disease, a mosquito has to bite a person already infected; when the mosquito bites and then infects another person, the disease is carried from human to human. As the number of bitten individuals multiplies, an epidemic is born.

January 1863 saw arguably the most important non-political act of the American Civil War. On January 1st 1863 President Lincoln signed the Emancipation Declaration that abolished slavery throughout America. To many in the Confederacy, this was seen as an open attack on the perceived way of life in the South and any chance of peacefully bringing the American Civil War to an early end based on diplomacy vanished with the Emancipation Declaration. January 1st: President Lincoln signed the Emancipation Declaration. Burnside accepted responsibility for the defeat at Fredericksburg and offered to resign. Lincoln told him to reconsider.

January 2nd: The Confederates suffered a defeat at Stone’s River, Murfreesboro. They lost a total of 14,560 killed, wounded and missing. However, the North also suffered major losses with 11,578 killed, wounded and missing. This, along with appalling weather that made the movement of troops and horses all but impossible, meant that The North could not follow up its success.

January 5th: The defeat at Murfreesboro gave the North control over much of Tennessee though Confederate raiding parties were a continual problem in the state.

January 10th: The French government made it clear that it was willing to mediate in the war should the government in Washington wish it to do so.

January 11th: A Union force commanded by General McClelland captured Fort Hindman on the Arkansas River. Nearly 4500 Confederate troops were taken prisoner.

January 13th: McClelland was ordered to blow up Fort Hindman as it had no strategic value to the Unionists.

January 16th: The Confederate commerce raider 'Florida' evaded a Union blockade and slipped out of Mobile Bay. In the next 18 months the 'Florida' sank fifteen Union ships, mostly off the waters of the West Indies.

January 19th: General Burnside made preparations to move the Army of the Potomac against Richmond.

January 20th: It soon became clear that the Army of the Potomac was in no fit state to campaign. Snow had turned to heavy rain and the barracking arrangements simply were not good enough. Many men fell ill due to the conditions they lived in; food was poor, water frequently unsanitary and the whisky that was provided of dubious quality. One senior Union officer wrote: "I have ridden through a regimental camp whose utterly filthy condition seemed enough to send malaria through a whole military department, and have been asked by one colonel, with tears in his eyes, to explain to him why his men are dying at a rate of one a day."

January 21st: A rainstorm that lasted 30 hours made a crossing of the Rappahannock River extremely hazardous. However, Burnside had to do this if he was to reach Richmond.

January 22nd: Burnside gave up on trying to cross the Rappahannock River as it had become too dangerous. Frustrated that he had not been given all the support he believed he should have got from his senior officers, Burnside decided to sack a number of them.

January 24th: Burnside met with Lincoln and gave him a list of those he wanted dismissed. Burnside told Lincoln if he did not get the support of the President, he would tender his own resignation.

January 25th: Lincoln removed Burnside from his command of the Army of the Potomac. The post was given to General Hooker. Burnside was very supportive of the President's decision as he had always felt that he was out of his depth and he offered Hooker his full support and loyalty.

January 26th: ‘Fighting Joe’ Hooker formally took charge of the Army of the Potomac. Whereas Burnside had never been confident about his ability to command a whole army of 100,000+ men, Hooker was fully confident about his own ability.

January 28th: Hooker was told that desertions in the Army of the Potomac were at 200 men a day, nearly 1500 a week or 6000 a month. Hooker had to stem this but it was a serious problem. He was also not popular with senior officers, as he had played a major part in undermining General McClelland’s position when McClelland was commander of the Army of the Potomac.

As the evening of December 30, 1862 settled onto the countryside outside of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, Union General William S. Rosecrans and Confederate General Braxton Bragg and their combined armies of 83,000 men faced each other in what would become a battle for control of central Tennessee. As a prelude to the battle that was to follow, the bands of both armies dueled as each played to drown out the other. When one band struck up “Home Sweet Home,” the mood of all present on that field changed as the other band joined in the refrain. For a short while, the men of both armies came together with thoughts of home and family.

At dawn on December 31, Braxton Bragg ordered the Confederates forward. The Battle of Stones River played out over two days. In total, more than 23,000 Union and Confederate soldiers were killed, wounded, missing or captured. After initial success, the Confederates were met with a withering artillery fire which blunted the rebel attacks. Bragg withdrew his battered army from the field after two additional days. Rosecrans had gained the victory.

A Confederate soldier wrote of the battle:

I am sick and tired of this war, and I can see no prospects of having peace for a long time to come, I don’t think it will ever be stopped by fighting, the Yankees cant whip us and we can never whip them, and I see no prospect of peace unless the Yankees themselves rebell and throw down their arms, and refuse to fight any longer.

The war would continue for more than two years before the men who survived would return to their “Home Sweet Home.”

Wilmington’s own, John Newland Maffitt, made his presence felt by Union merchant shipping after he took the Confederate commerce raider, CSS Florida, past the blockading Union navy guarding Mobile Bay. Maffitt had previously made a daylight run into Mobile in September 1862 with an undermanned crew and with himself sick with chills and fever. The Florida was badly damaged, however, Maffitt, with considerate assistance from Admiral Buchanan and Jefferson Davis, was able to refit and re-crew the Florida for its January 1863 return to the sea.

On January 11, 1863, Maffitt steamed the Florida out Mobile Bay, anchored off Fort Morgan, and waited for bad weather to cover his escape. The Federal fleet consisted of three ships in September had grown to thirteen in January. Maffitt waited for a violent storm and on the evening of January 15 the worsened conditions of a storm erupted to limit visibility. Maffitt waited until 2:00 a.m. and headed for the bar. The Florida buffed its way past several Federal ships. Only the fast U.S.S. R.R. Cuyler realized the ship among them was not another Federal warship. The Cuyler picked up the chase and closed the range on the Florida. Maffitt used the approaching darkness to elude the Cuyler and gain the open seas.

From January 15 until August 23, 1863, the Florida waged commercial war on the Union's high seas commerce. Maffitt exhibited daring and skill during the Florida's first voyage. The Florida ranged the ocean from Mobile, north to the New York coast, south to Brazil, and east to Brest, France. Maffitt and his resourceful crew captured twenty-three ships with an estimated value in excess of $3,727,000. By the time the Florida put into Brest for needed repairs, Maffitt's health was broken and he was replaced by Commander Joseph N. Barney.

Three Times a Traitor: Mayor Isaiah Respass and the Civil War Occupation of Eastern North Carolina

Eastern North Carolina residents, especially in those areas that bordered the coastal sounds, favored the Constitutional Union Party and its candidate, John Bell of Tennessee in the 1860 presidential election. Many were former Whigs who supported the ideas of the old Whig patriarch Henry Clay who had favored federally funded internal improvements that aided the growth of commerce and navigation. They believed that their rights and privileges, both commercial and property, would best be protected by the Constitution and within the Union. They adopted a "wait and see" attitude about president-elect Abraham Lincoln. Until the secession crisis culminated in the fall of Fort Sumter in Charleston, the pro-Union citizens in North Carolina had voted down the call for a secession convention. Once Lincoln called for volunteers to suppress the rebellion, there remained little hope that North Carolina residents would be able to keep tight the ties to the Union of their forefathers.

Chris Meekins

For those in attendance at our December 13th meeting, Chris Meekins laid out the remarkable story of a man who played, with cunning and resolve, the hand that he was dealt during the Civil War in Washington, North Carolina. Isaiah Respass (1805-1877), a ship-owner, a merchant, a lawyer, and mayor of Washington, was not a man adverse to the pursuit of commercial ventures. The 1862 arrival of the Union Army in Washington presented Respass with opportunities for risky ventures within the Union controlled area and also in the adjacent Confederate controlled area. Respass' pursuit of these opportunities often found him at odds with the government: Union and/or Confederate.

Isaiah Respass had been elected mayor of Washington, North Carolina during 1860. Respass found himself in an unusual position – as the winds of war quickly changed directions. After North Carolina had seceded, he had outfitted his nephews when they joined the Confederate Army. Respass allowed Confederate soldiers to be housed in buildings he owned in the town. When Union soldiers captured Washington during March 1862, Respass and several other town leaders met with the Union commander and supposedly toasted the return of Washington to the Union. What was Respass, a loyal Southerner who supported the Cause or a Unionist sympathizer?

Neither Confederate nor Union government was able to make up its mind about the true beliefs of Mayor Respass. First, the Confederates snatched Respass and sent him to Richmond where he stood trial for treason. After a short imprisonment, some cash payments and much legal wrangling between the Confederate and North Carolina state governments, Respass was freed on direction of Jefferson Davis, but he was told that he could not return to Union occupied territory. Shortly thereafter, Respass, while in residence in Confederate-held Pitt County, was grabbed by a Union raiding party – the charge: treason. Respass caught a break when Edward Stanley, a former North Carolina politician who had known Respass pre-war, returned to North Carolina as Lincoln's military governor. Not only was Respass released, he was named tax collector by Stanley. Controversy soon found Respass yet once more; he ran afoul of Union General Benjamin Franklin Butler after Respass had become involved in some questionable trading practices between the Confederate and Union lines. It appeared that a fox, Respass, had raided the hen house controlled by an even slier fox, Benjamin Butler. While charges of treason faced Repess, Butler was in a dilemma for Union officers came forward and vouched for the true Union sympathies of the mayor. Respass even signed an oath of allegiance; however, Respass signed as Josiah instead of Isaiah – a small fact that only Butler noticed. Butler was busy with the war in Virginia and he needed to rid himself of the problem represented by the mayor. Butler declared Respass as being crazy and he send the mayor home. Respass was later detained by Union General Edward Potter, but he was released – maybe he was crazy.

How did Respass emerge from the war and his many troubles with the government? He resumed his trading activities much as if nothing had interrupted his normal activities. He filed a claim with the Southern Claims Commission to recover the value of a sawmill destroyed by Union troops during the war. His neighbors elected Respass to serve as their representative in the North Carolina Senate. Isaiah continued his business activities until his death in 1877.

“Isaiah Respass saw neither blue nor gray, he saw green.” With those few words, Chris Meekins summed up the subject of his presentation.

(NOTE: Chris warned us that the people of Washington, North Carolina took offense to any reference to that town as “Little” Washington. After all, Washington, NC was the first city named after George Washington).

1 – How is yellow fever spread? The yellow fever virus is spread by the Aedes aegypti mosquito.

2 – What is the suspected way that yellow fever arrived in Wilmington during the fall of 1862? On August 6, 1862, the blockade-runner Kate docked at the port of Wilmington. The Kate brought many much needed supplies that would fetch high prices for their owners. The Kate also carried a cargo that would exact a much higher price from those who lived in Wilmington during that fall.

3 - Who was the first Wilmington victim of the yellow fever? Lewis Swartzman, a 36-year-old German-born wood-and-coal dealer, died on September 9th. Swartzman’s business was located on the wharf near where the Kate docked. His was the first recorded death in the tally that would only abate after cold weather brought Wilmington release from the fever’s grip.

5 - After the war, Respass was sued by some business partners involved in a deal gone bad. What was Respass' defense against his partner's claims? Respass was later sued by business partners in a deal gone bad – Respass' defense? Si non e vero, e ben trovato – If it isn't true, at least it's well told.

6 – The three oldest State Archives in United States are in which states? Alabama (1901), Mississippi (1902), and North Carolina (1903).

The State Archives of North Carolina collects, preserves, and makes available for public use historical and evidential materials relating to North Carolina. Its holdings consist of official records of state, county, and local governmental units, and copies of federal and foreign government materials. In addition to these official records are private collections, organization records, maps, pamphlets, sound recordings, photographs, motion picture film, and a small reference library. In all, the Archives houses over 50,000 linear feet of permanently valuable materials containing millions of individual items. Materials in the Archives collections constitute by far the most valuable assembly of manuscript records and North Caroliniana in existence. Three Times a Traitor: Mayor Isaiah Respass and the Civil War Occupation of Eastern North Carolina

The Burnside Expedition into eastern North Carolina in early 1862 secured a Union presence that posed a threat to the Confederate government for the rest of the war. Those people who lived in this Union occupied area were subjected to military and political pressures that forced many inhabitants to choose between loyalty to their state or to the Union. Isaiah Respass, mayor of Washington, North Carolina, was one of those inhabitants.

Isaiah Respass

Alex Christopher Meekins, Correspondence Archives and Records Professional at the North Carolina Division of Archives and Records, will present an interesting story about Isaiah Respass, merchant, trader and politician. Respass found himself in a delicate position between those pressures that made this area a powder keg of charged emotions.

<insert image#2>
Chris Meekins

Chris Meekins was born and raised in Elizabeth City, North Carolina. His interest in the Civil War began early – one great-great-grandfather was Unionist and another was Confederate, each died during the war as a result of their sympathies. Chris received a BA and MA in History from North Carolina State University. His Master's thesis concerned the Civil War in northeastern North Carolina and he later developed this thesis into Elizabeth City, North Carolina and the Civil War: A History of Battle and Occupation.

While researching other stories, Chris found bits and pieces about Mayor Respass that resulted in the presentation that we will hear on Thursday evening, December 13th.

 Civil War Courts-Martial of North Carolina Troops *****

Researching a Civil War ancestor is a challenging endeavor. As with all research into the past, surprises are possible with the turn of a page. One hopes that they find their ancestor with a distinguished record of service, but that is not always the case. The quest of research is to discover the facts; however, they play out in the drama of the Civil War. The quest for facts lead to many sources that aid in tracking an ancestor: Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies (and Navies), Regimental histories, memoirs, letters, websites (fold3), and countless books on the war. All sources provide facts that help determine an ancestor's path – the circumstances that lead to that path may be forever unknown – however, by studying the events surrounding the ancestor's path one may gain a better understanding of that individual and their fate.

Recently I received a book that provided much information concerning a subject that few people have researched in depth – desertions among North Carolina troops. Aldo Perry, a retired IBM Project Engineer, laboriously sifted through records at the National Archives in Washington, in the North Carolina State Archives, and in library collections throughout the nation. After twenty-five years of research, 35,000 note cards, and an initial 800 page manuscript, Civil War Courts-Martial of North Carolina Troops was published earlier this year.

Perry noted in his book's introduction, at least 160 of the trials of Tar Heel deserters ended in the sentence of death being carried out, making North Carolina the deadliest state for executions in United States wartime history. Perry asserted that discipline in the ranks was the factor that kept troops in the fight, loss of that discipline and the fabric of the army was weakened. Once that fabric had been weakened, the continued survival of the Confederate army and the Confederate States of America were in jeopardy.

Civil War Courts-Martial of North Carolina Troops provided an intimate look at the lives of hundreds of soldiers who lived, and more often died, after being court-martialed for desertion and other offenses. The 360 page book was arranged by the various regiments in which the soldiers served. Perry, with the detailed eye of an engineer, shared the stories and the emotions that controlled duty to country, to family, and to self-preservation. Concerning a mass execution of members of the 58th and 60th North Carolina regiments approved by Braxton Bragg, an attending doctor recalled:

One other dreadful tragedy I will relate, and while it may reflect on our soldiers in some respects, it shows the great hardships they were compelled to endure under the most discouraging circumstances. When we were near Dalton Ga. sixteen men were condemned to be shot by order of General Bragg. One man was pardoned the day before the execution was to take place and one died in the hospital when he learned he was to be shot. The next day these fourteen men were executed. All of the army there was ordered out; the infantry formed a hollow square with cannon in the rear, while the Cavalry just back of them made such a strong line it was impossible for any one to pass. A long ditch had been prepared, and the rude coffins placed in front of it, with a stake by it, while a guard appointed to this duty marched each man to the stake & coffin prepared for him, and each man bound to his stake. The senior officer ordered all in position and to make ready, and Lt. Robert Claytongave the order to fire. All were killed but two, as I found when I advanced to examine them. One had been shot in the side,- the other in the arm. I reported that two were alive and the guard advanced and fired killing them immediately.... Oh! what a Sunday was that!.....

While Perry provided numerous statistics in his Epilogue that supported his conclusions, the stories of the individual soldiers were what I found most compelling. I felt that this book was a reference material that was a good addition to my library.

December 1862 witnessed the Battle of Fredericksburg. It was General Burnside's first major challenge after taking over from McClellan. The battle did not go in Burnside's favour and he lost far more men killed and wounded than the Confederates. The freezing weather killed many of the wounded. It also meant that little could be done at a military level.

December 1st: Lincoln addressed the 37th Congress in the capital and once again announced his intention of abolishing slavery within the United States.

December 7th: A battle fought at Prairie Grove left 167 Union soldiers dead, 798 wounded and 183 missing. The Confederates lost 300 killed, 800 wounded and 250 missing.

December 10th: The House of Representatives passed a bill to create the state of West Virginia.

December 13th: Burnside started his attack against Fredericksburg. However, the delay in doing so allowed Lee's men time to dig themselves into well-fortified positions both in the town and in the hills that surrounded it. All attacks were repulsed. An attack on Confederate troops dug in on Marye's Heights led to many Unionist deaths. By the end of the day the Army of the Potomac had lost 1200 killed, 9000 wounded and 2145 missing. Many of these were at Marye's Heights. The Confederates had lost 570 killed, 3870 wounded and 127 missing. Many of the wounded left out on the battlefield died of the cold during the night. Lee was heard to say: "It is well that war is so terrible; we should grow too fond of it."

December 14th: Burnside wanted to repeat the assault on Fredericksburg but was persuaded otherwise by his commanders in the field. The Army of the Potomac camped out along the Rappahannock River.

December 17th: General Grant's reputation was tainted when he issued General Order Number 11, which expelled Jews from his department because "they are a class violating every regulation of trade established by the Treasury Department."

December 20th: A Confederate force attacked a major Union supply base at Holly Springs, Mississippi. Over $1 million in supplies was seized along with 1000 prisoners. Such a loss of supplies meant that Grant had to postpone his attack on Vicksburg.

December 23rd: Jefferson Davis names General Butler, formally in charge of New Orleans, an outlaw and an enemy of Mankind. Davis stated that Butler would be hanged if the Confederates captured him.

December 28th: A unit of Union troops captured a considerable amount of Confederate supplies at Van Buren, Arkansas.

Sinking of the USS Monitor

December 31st: Lincoln met Burnside to discuss what went wrong at Fredericksburg. The ironclad 'Monitor' sank in a storm (off Cape Hatteras, North Carolina).

From the Naval History Blog: "The loss of MONITOR off Cape Hatteras, 31 December 1862"

On the morning of December 29, 1862, Commander John Bankhead, recently appointed commanding officer while Monitor repaired at the Washington Navy Yard, ordered his crew to prepare to put to sea. The weather finally clear, Monitor departed Hampton Roads that afternoon in the tow of the sidewheel steamer Rhode Island to join the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron in offensive operations against Confederate ports.

After Monitor rounded Cape Hatteras at approximately 7:30 in the evening on the 30th, the starboard tow hawser gave way in reaction to the pounding waves and current rubbing the rope against the hull. At 9pm, Commander Bankhead signaled Rhode Island to halt her engines to better ride out the storm, but by this time water poured into Monitor at a pace greater than the bilge pumps could evacuate. A large steam pump arrested the rising water within the vessel, but the respite proved to be temporary. At approximately 10:30pm, the situation hopeless, Monitor asked that Rhode Island send rescue boats.

Bankhead ordered the remaining towline connecting his vessel to Rhode Island cut, but a wave swept two of the three volunteers for this duty overboard to their deaths before Master Louis Stodder hacked the hawser in two with a hatchet. Unfortunately, the severed hawser became entangled in one of Rhode Island's paddle wheels which left the large wooden ship drifting toward Monitor and threatening to crush one of the rescue boats. The rope that fouled the paddle wheel was cleared with an axe, but not before Rhode Island slammed into the first lifeboat and barely avoided a potentially calamitous collision with Monitor. The two ships got so close, that five or six sailors attempted to climb ropes to safety on Rhode Island; but only three reached their destination. Despite being damaged by Rhode Island, the first lifeboat took on survivors as the waves swept several of the ironclad's crew overboard to their death. The heavy seas had grown so violent that the second lifeboat nearly struck the first as it made the treacherous, now nearly half-mile, return passage.

Some of the sailors in Monitor heroically remained in the engine room stoking the boilers that powered the pumps as they fought a losing battle against the incoming water. At about midnight, the water extinguished the boilers and the last of the men inside scrambled to the top of the turret as a second lifeboat was taking on survivors and a third approached. Traversing the short distance to the lifeboats proved a treacherous task and several men lost their lives in the attempt. Some, perhaps unable to swim, petrified by the gruesome spectacle, or waiting for others to be saved first, continued to cling to the turret even as the third lifeboat filled to capacity. For those fortunate enough to make a lifeboat, the danger was far from over as several men lost their lives attempting to board the paddle wheel steamer. Rodney Browne, skipper of the second lifeboat, made one last gallant attempt to save those remaining on Monitor, but failed to reach the vessel before it disappeared beneath the waves around 2 o'clock on morning of the 31st. Despite the rough seas, his boat managed to survive the night and was rescued by another ship mid-morning.

In all, four officers and twelve sailors from Monitor lost their lives. The heroism of the volunteers from Rhode Island who manned the rescue boats kept the human toll from being much worse

* The Angel of Marye's Heights – Fact or Fiction *******

On December 13, 1862 at Fredericksburg, Virginia, Burnside's Army of the Potomac assaulted the well entrenched troops of the Army of Northern Virginia. Confederate General James Longstreet had supposedly remarked that the defensive position of his Corps on Marye's Heights was so strong that a chicken could not cross field with impunity. The fourteen failed assaults made by the Union troops upon Longstreet's men revealed the truth of the general's observation. As night fell, thousands of dead, wounded and stranded Union soldiers faced a cold night under the Confederate cannons and muskets.

The cries of the wounded were audible to all who were on the battlefield. There was no escape from the cries for aid, for water, for mercy. From the misery that lay upon that field, a story of the compassion of man for his fellow man unfolded. A Confederate sergeant in James Kershaw's brigade, Richard Kirkland, went among the Union wounded with water to quench their thirst and to show them compassion. Sergeant Kirkland remained among the wounded giving them comfort for an hour and a half.

The story of Kirkland's actions became widely known after James Kershaw wrote an account of the deed in 1880. A statue of Kirkland giving water to a wounded Union soldier was erected on the battlefield in 1963.

The story of the Angel of Marye's Heights may well have helped heal the wounds that remained after the war. Kershaw's article was published during a time when veteran groups and the population in general were trying to move toward reconciliation.

While researching the Battle of Fredericksburg and especially Kirkland's actions, I ran across an article that questioned whether the act had really taken place. The writer of the article used the OR to look for any reference to an act of compassion during the night of the 13th. Per that writer, Kirkland's name was not mentioned among fifteen officers and two orderlies cited for meritorious conduct in the 2nd South Carolina official reports. Douglas Southall Freeman failed to mention Kirkland in his writings, as did Shelby Foote. The entire article can be found at <http://cwmemory.com/2009/12/22/is-the-richard-kirkland-story-true/>.

Richard Kirkland died in action at the Battle of Chickamauga in the fall of 1863. He left no record of his actions on that cold night on December 13, 1862 (that I have found).

Was the Angel of Marye's Heights a myth? Read the entire article cited above and make your own decision. I have made mine. I may be a romantic, but I choose to doubt that anywhere in the OR was there an example of compassion being giving to the enemy. Giving aid to the enemy was something that was just not done in writing. The actual facts could have been much different from what was reported in those actual battle reports.

Phantom Pain: North Carolina's Artificial Limbs Program for Confederate Amputees

While working in the North Carolina Archives Research Room, Ansley Wegner began looking into record boxes labeled "Artificial Limbs." The previously little studied records contained the names and county of residence of those North Carolina Confederate amputees who had taken advantage of a state program designed to return these men to a level of mobility that would allow them the "ability to earn a subsistence." Wegner's interest in those men and their experiences, both good and bad, led her to continue her research and to write Phantom Pain.

Ansley's presentation on November 8th gave insight into a little known facet of North Carolina's Civil War history. Civil War era medicine, while fraught with dangers of severe pain and infection, saved the lives of many victims of the Minié ball and rifled musket. Returning those amputees to as normal life as possible was another matter.

Ansley Wegner with Phantom Pain

From Ansley Wegner's North Carolina Time Traveler, November 7, 2012:

About 75 percent of the operations performed by surgeons during the Civil War were amputations. For those who survived amputation and the resulting infections, the pursuit of artificial limbs was natural.

Artificial legs, and to a lesser extent, arms, also helped the amputees get back to work in order to support themselves and their families. The United States government assisted Union amputees after the Civil War, but Confederate veterans were considered the responsibilities of the states.

North Carolina responded quickly to the needs of her citizens and became the first of the former Confederate states to offer artificial limbs to amputees. The General Assembly passed a Resolution in February 1866 to provide artificial legs to amputees. (Because artificial arms were not considered to be very functional, it was another year before the state offered artificial arms.) The state contracted with Jewett's Patent Leg Company, and a temporary factory was set up in Raleigh. During the five years that the state operated the artificial limbs program, 1,550 Confederate veterans contacted the state for help. (The state of North Carolina committed $81,310.12 to this effort.)

Amputation Kit

There are two Jewett legs that are on display in North Carolina. Robert Alexander Hanna's below-the-knee prosthetic is in the visitor's center at Bentonville Battlefield in Four Oaks. Hanna's family reported that he made a variety of peg-type legs to use on the farm so that he could save the manufactured one for special occasions. Samuel Clark received a Jewett leg for his above-the-knee amputation. His later pension indicated that he was unable to use the device. Clark's prosthetic leg remained in his family and is now on loan for the new exhibit called North Carolina and the Civil War: The Raging Storm, 1863, which just opened at the North Carolina Museum of History in Raleigh.

The records of the Artificial Limbs Department are available for research in the North Carolina State Archives. And an index to all of the records, by the name of the veteran, is published in Phantom Pain.

 One Pair of Shoes *****

After Ansley's presentation, I asked her if she had ever heard the story of the two Confederate amputees who supposedly met in a general store while looking for shoes. One of them had lost his left leg, the other his right leg. As the story went, they both wore the same size shoe and they quickly realized that if they bought one pair of shoes, each would benefit from their joint purchase. For years afterwards, or as the story was related, they met at the same store on a mutually agreed upon date and made their frugal bargain.

I could not remember where I had heard this story, but I believe it was during a tour I took with Hood's Texas Brigade Association Re-activated (HTBAR) back in June. As I usually do. I did not remember the details because I had not written down the story. This was just one more incomplete story that I tucked into the recesses of my Civil War memory bank.

On November 15th, I attended presentations at Fort Fisher made by Medal of Honor recipient, Joe Marm, and Bronze Star recipient, Joe Galloway. Both men had been at LZ X-Ray in the Ia Drang Valley during November 1965 when American forces heavily engaged North Vietnam regulars in a three day battle. Their remembrances of their involvement were both riveting and extremely moving. If you saw the Mel Gibson movie We Were Soldiers Once you were exposed to the story of this action. Joe Galloway, an embedded UPI reporter, and Hal Moore, the commanding officer of the American units, had written We Were Soldiers Once ... and Young that was used as the basis for the movie.

As Joe Galloway finished up his talk, someone asked him to tell the story about his great-grandfather. Joe, a native Texan, began his story. His great-grandfather, James Isham Galloway, had been a sergeant in Company C (Robertson County Five Shooters). 4th Texas Infantry, Hood's Texas Brigade. James had lost his left leg at the Battle of Second Manassas. After the war, James returned to Texas where he later became sheriff of Robertson County. Sometimes later, James Reid, formerly of the 2nd Louisiana, bought a ranch adjacent to Galloway's spread. Reid had lost his right leg at the Battle of the Wilderness.

According to Joe Galloway's family legend: Once a year, Galloway and Reid would go to the store, buy one pair of shoes, and return to their homes laughing about how they beat the storekeeper out of an extra pair of shoes.

As Paul Harvey said, that was the "rest of the story."

* Trivia Question for December *******

1 – Observe the photograph below. What do you think this photograph represented? The image captured two Minié balls from opposite sides that collided head-on during the Battle of Fredericksburg during December 1862.

The Minié ball was designed to flatten upon contact with a target. If that target was a human, the individual was subjected to a wound that could shatter any bone it contacted as it passed within the body. The Minié ball and its ability to shatter bones made necessary the large number of amputations that took place during the Civil War.

North Carolina's Artificial Limbs Program for Confederate Amputees

McDowell at Lane Street, Raleigh

Ansley Wegner will join us on 8 November when she will present her findings about North Carolina's program to render assistance to men who had lost limbs during the Civil War. At a time when the state's economy was in shambles, North Carolina cared for its soldiers who had returned home with severe physical handicaps.

Ansley's presentation will examine the program to find amputees located throughout the state and subsequently, to supply and fit them with artificial arms and legs. She will relate amputation's place in Civil War era medical science as well as document the challenges the disabled men will face as they try to resume their post-war lives. After discussing the different type of artificial limbs available to amputees, Ansley will address the experiences of some amputees, positive and negative, and North Carolina's response to those experiences.

 Claude-Etienne Minié & James Burton *****

Nearly 75% of all surgeries performed during the Civil War were amputations. What factor had significantly resulted in this gruesome statistic?

In 1849, French army officer Claude-Etienne Minié developed an improvement that made it effective to utilize the improved range and accuracy of the rifle-musket. The Minié ball was a cylindrically shaped projectile that was of smaller diameter than the rifle-musket bore – when the weapon was fired, the hollow base expanded, gripped the spiral riflings, and the bullet spun down the length of the barrel - this spinning motion allowed the bullet to extend the killing range of an individual soldier.

In 1855, the United States military adopted an improved Minié ball developed by James Burton of the armory at Harper's Ferry. Burton's design simplified the manufacture; hence, the bullet was massed produced at a cheaper cost. The large caliber soft-lead design not only could kill at extended range, the lead projectile flattened upon hitting its intended target. If the Minié ball hit a bone in an arm or leg, the victim experienced a traumatic wound that effectively destroyed that section of bone. Civil War doctors, to save the soldier's life, were forced to amputate the limb above the impact area.

Unfortunately, technology had surpassed the tactics used in the early days of the war. At Fredericksburg, Virginia in December 1862, Burnside's massed troops made a series of frontal attacks against Lee's well entrenched army. The scene was best described as slaughter. Lee remarked that it was good that war was so horrible or man would grow fond of it. Lee, unfortunately for his soldiers, forgot the lesson of Fredericksburg and used the massed assault on July 3, 1863 to attack Meade's well entrenched troops at Gettysburg. Same tactic, same result – slaughter.

Claude-Etienne Minié and James Burton's contribution to the technology of warfare may have slipped from memory, but those who experienced amputation as a result of wounds would forever live with the consequence of Minié and Burton's developments.

* Hood's "Lost Opportunity" – 2012 Update *******

On the night of November 29, 1864, Union General John Schofield's soldiers stealthily moved past Confederate General John Bell Hood's soldiers who were trying to block their path at Spring Hill, Tennessee. What followed this escape was one of the most controversial battles of the Civil War – Franklin, Tennessee. What followed the Battle of Franklin was a long and contentious argument about what had really caused Hood's "Lost Opportunity." How had an army and its train moved by a waiting adversary without detection? Who was to blame?

On October 19, 2012, The Battle of Franklin Trust Chief Operating Officer Eric A. Jacobson announced the discovery of several hundred documents of Confederate General John Bell Hood. The announcement was made at historic Carnton Plantation.

The discovery is noted as one of the most significant Civil War discoveries in recent history. The documents range from personal letters, letters regarding the war and military records, some signed by major historical figures like signed by Jefferson Davis, James Longstreet, Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee.

Sam Hood, a collateral descendent of General Hood and a career student of the general's career, discovered the documents while conducting research for his upcoming book about his ancestor.

"I felt like the guy who found the Titanic, except for the fact everyone knew the Titanic was out there somewhere, while I had no clue that some of the stuff I found even existed," said Hood.

"General Hood is certainly no stranger to controversy," he added. "During his colorful military career and with historians ever since, he has remained a controversial and tragic figure of the Civil War."

General Hood has been long noted for the loss of Atlanta and what some consider reckless behavior at the Battle of Franklin after a lost opportunity for possible victory at Spring Hill. General Hood has often been the subject of ridicule and blame for the demise of the Confederacy in the West.

In light of this discover, new information may change the way General Hood has been portrayed Hood is set for a spring release of his detailed point-by-point defense of General Hood's career.

 November 1862 *****

President Lincoln finally lost patience with General McClellan and he was relieved of his command in November 1862 and replaced by General Burnside. Lincoln had won the November election but not in a spectacular manner and he blamed the lack of any Unionist victory for this.

November 2nd: Grant started his campaign against Vicksburg. However, he faced a major problem in that his lines of communication were too extended and he needed to 'drop off' troops along his route to defend them. This meant that his force was weakened the nearer Grant got to Vicksburg.

November 4th: There was an election for Congress in the states loyal to the Union. The lack of any major Unionist victory was reflected in the results, which showed that the opposition picked up more support than Lincoln's government. In the Senate, Lincoln's supporters, who prior to the election had a majority of 41 seats, saw this slashed to the opposition having a majority of 10 seats.

November 5th: The blame for the government's poor showing in the election was blamed on McClellan and his lack of action. A decision was made to replace him.

November 7th: McClellan had placed his army less than ten miles from Lee's army. Lee's force was split in two and McClellan was confident that he could deal a mortal blow against the Confederacy. However, at the same time as he was finalising his plan of attack, he received two messages.

The first stated: "By direction of the President of the United States, it is ordered that Major General McClellan be relieved from the command of the Army of the Potomac, and that Major General Burnside take command of the army. By order of the Secretary of War."

The second from General Halleck stated: "General; on receipt of the order of the President, sent herewith, you will immediately turn over your command to Major General Burnside, and repair to Trenton, New Jersey, reporting on your arrival in that place, by telegraph, for further orders."

November 8th: General Butler was also relieved of his command of New Orleans. General Banks replaced him. No one was quite sure why Butler was replaced but it is thought that the political hierarchy in the capital believed that he was using his command to boost his own wealth.

November 9th: General Burnside officially took control of the Army of the Potomac. McClellan left the following day.

November 11th: Burnside immediately changed McClellan's plan of attack. He believed capturing Richmond was more important than taking on Lee's army. Burnside therefore ordered the Army of the Potomac to Richmond via Fredericksburg. He probably lost the best opportunity the North had of dealing the South a knockout blow by failing to take advantage of Lee's army that was still split in two.

November 14th: Burnside announced that he had reorganised the Army of the Potomac into three “Grand Divisions”. Each Division was assigned its own commander and tasked to defend either the left or right flanks or the centre of Burnside’s force.

November 15th: The newly reorganised Army of the Potomac started its march on Fredericksburg. The army marched away from where Lee had based his army. There was logic in Burnside’s strategy. By marching on Fredericksburg, his army was still close enough to Washington DC to protect the capital. He could also use the Potomac River to bring up supplies to his men via Acquia Creek. Richmond was also only 75 miles from Fredericksburg.

November 17th: An advance force of Burnside’s men reached the outskirts of Fredericksburg but could not cross the Rappahannock River to get into the town because they had no pontoons with them. The Unionists swiftly dealt with a brief Confederate artillery bombardment, which indicated to them that the town was poorly defended. However, Burnside had ordered that no Unionist unit could enter Fredericksburg until suitable communication lines had been established. This gave Lee the opportunity and time to send two divisions to the town.

November 20th: General Lee arrived in Fredericksburg.

November 21st: Burnside called on the mayor to surrender Fredericksburg. This was refused and non-combatants were sent from the town.

November 23rd: Bridging equipment finally arrived at Fredericksburg to allow the North to cross the Rappahannock River but in the course of five days, the Confederate force in the town had done a great deal to fortify it. Any attempted crossing would be fraught with difficulties.

November 27th: President Lincoln visited Burnside at his headquarters. Whereas Lincoln had despaired at McClellan’s lack of urgency, he expressed his reservations to Burnside about his commander’s desire to launch an attack against a well dug-in enemy while having to cross a river. However, Burnside was not willing to change his plan.

November 30th: ‘Stonewall’ Jackson arrived with his men at Fredericksburg bringing the total number of Confederate soldiers in the town to 80,000.

Arms & Equipment of the North Carolina Soldier at Antietam 1862

Jeff Bockert, Associate Curator of Education for the North Carolina Division of Historic Sites, shared his recent research into the logistical system that supplied North Carolina soldiers as they marched into Maryland where they were to face the Union army in September 1862. Jeff related how his research was a “work in progress” and he was still learning from the North Carolina Quartermaster records. He explained his “Material Culture” analysis of the Army of Northern Virginia as it invaded the North – the study of supply to determine a soldier’s effectiveness in battle, its impact on this campaign, and even its role in Lee’s decision to invade Maryland. He explained how he used analysis of Civil War photographs of Tar Heel soldiers to determine how well the North Carolinians were supplied at this point in the war. By his analysis, he dispelled popular beliefs that early in the war North Carolina troops were well equipped to meet their foe in battle.

Confederate troops in column
Frederick, Maryland – September 12, 1862

The North Carolina Depot System concentrated the output of 39 cotton mills and 9 woolen mills to the manufacture of uniforms by the Raleigh government's contracted producers. The uniforms of 1861 were costly to produce due to their complex design and the amount of cloth needed in their manufacture. The North Carolina quartermasters redesigned the uniforms to require less material – they did not provide the same martial bearing as the 1861 uniforms, but they were serviceable. As the war progressed, the state government, led by the efforts of Governor Zebulon Vance, improved its ability to marshal resources.

Jeff explains "Material Culture" Analysis

North Carolina's government improved its logistics performance to the position that they were able to supply troops from other states with uniforms.

 Trivia Questions for November *****

1 – When did the state government begin the limb replacement program? The program began in January 1866 when the legislature asked Governor Jonathan Worth to make a contract with a manufacturer of artificial limbs to supply the state's needs. A factory was established in Raleigh under the direction of George B. Jewett. The factory remained in operation until June 18, 1867 when demand had mostly been met. North Carolina's program was the first in the South and it served as a model for other states.

2 – Who was George B. Jewett and what was his role in helping Civil War amputees? Amputations accounted for roughly three-quarters of all battlefield surgeries during the Civil War, which meant that artificial limbs were much in demand after the bitter conflict's end. Captain Ahab-style wooden stumps were an easy fix, but they tended to severely curtail a man's productivity. Fortunately for the shattered nation, then, a Massachusetts linguistics professor named George B. Jewett enjoyed dabbling in prosthetics whenever he had a spare moment. His great innovation, patented just months after the Confederacy's surrender at Appomattox, was a novel artificial leg that featured something truly remarkable: a self-oiling mechanism, which allowed the limb to maintain maximum flexibility despite inclement weather or owner neglect.

Jewett's company, headquartered at the corner of Park and Tremont Streets in Boston, did a brisk business with the Union's former enemies, as states below the Mason-Dixon line launched public programs to supply veterans with artificial legs. North Carolina led the way.

3 - How much did the limb replacement program cost the state? How many veterans took part in the program? The program cost the state $81,310.12. In today's dollars, that equals $1,178,405.80. Over 1500 veterans took advantage of the program

4 – This Matthew Brady photograph was taken at Gettysburg around July 15, 1863. What do you know about the photograph and the identity of these men? In one of the most famous photographs of the American Civil War (1861–1865), three captured Confederate soldiers, likely from Louisiana, pose for Mathew Brady on Seminary Ridge following the Battle of Gettysburg (July 1–3, 1863). The extraordinary clarity of the image allows viewers to study the soldiers' uniforms and accoutrements, but the historian Shelby Foote has focused more on their body language. "You see something in his attitude toward the camera that's revealing of his nature," he told the filmmaker Ken Burns, "... as if he is having his picture made but he's determined to be the individual that he is." Other scholars have challenged this romantic view. Brady, who made about thirty images at Gettysburg and arrived after the dead had been buried, likely took the photograph on or about July 15. If that's true, as Thomas A. Desjardin has argued, then these soldiers—none of whom seems to be wounded—were likely deserters captured well after the battle. (Prisoners taken in the fighting were marched off the field immediately.) Meanwhile, a closer look at their uniforms reveals the soldiers to be much better dressed than tradition would have it. According to legend, the Battle of Gettysburg began only when barefoot Confederates entered the town looking for shoes. But Richard Pougher has used this photograph as evidence that "the common Confederate soldier in the Army of Northern Virginia was well dressed in Southern military uniforms, well-shod, and well accoutered ... He was not the ragged, barefoot, poorly equipped individual in nondescript mix-and-match clothing so many have come to see him as."

Source: http://encyclopediavirginia.org/media_player?mets_filename=evm00001203mets.xml (accessed October 17, 2012).

NOTE: Jeff Bockert thinks the men in Brady's photograph were from North Carolina because of their uniforms; however, Jeff said that there is support for them being from Virginia, Mississippi, or Florida units. Whether they were deserters, unlucky stragglers or hospital stewards left behind to care for the wounded will probably never be known.

5 – The Confederate government, whether provided by state or national quartermasters, sought to provide its soldiers two uniform changes per year. How long did these uniforms stand up during hard campaigning? Typically, during the rigors of campaigning, a soldier wore out his uniform, shoes, and other clothing within three months. By the end of the Peninsular Campaign (March – May 1863), Seven Days Campaign (June – July 1862) and the Second Battle of Manassas Campaign (August 1862), the Confederate soldiers who moved with Lee into Maryland were almost a ragged mob in their appearance.

As Jeff related in his presentation, the North Carolina soldier in September 1862 was faced with an inadequate quartermaster system to supply their needs. This was the Valley Forge of these soldiers. They endured worn-out uniforms, shoes, blankets and knapsacks, fought with fewer modern rifle-muskets than their foes, and subsisted on scarce rations. Only their ability to supply many of their needs from the Union quartermaster corps allowed them to survive until Confederate efforts improved.

After late 1863, North Carolina supply efforts improved significantly. The state owned interest in blockade runners and successfully brought in English goods – weapons, munitions, shoes, medicines and clothing.

6 – Did the government of North Carolina ever provide clothing to Union prisoners held in North Carolina? Toward the end of the war and under Governor Vance's direction, North Carolina supplied clothing and blankets to Union prisoners of war incarcerated at Salisbury. This was done on the condition that equivalent supplies were given to a like number of Confederate prisoners incarcerated in the North.

Zebulon Vance took this action to assist prisoners that were living in poor conditions in the Confederate camp at Salisbury. Vance took this action for a number of reasons: 1) It was the right thing to do for humanitarian reasons. 2) This action benefitted North Carolina prisoners of war who fared badly in Union prisons, 3) His brother, General Robert Vance, was held in a Union camp. 4) The Union government was probably going to seek retribution for the treatment of captured soldiers.

North Carolina Arms & Equipment at Antietam

North Carolinians

Jeffrey L. Bockert will be our speaker at the 11 October meeting. Jeff's subject will be North Carolina Arms and Equipment at Antietam. By reviewing North Carolina Quartermaster records, photographs, and first-person accounts, Jeff gained an idea of how the average Tar Heel was equipped as he and his unit fought at the bloody Battle of Antietam (Sharpsburg) in September 1862. Jeff's research revealed that North Carolina units were faced with shortages of uniforms, shoes, and modern weapons as they marched into Maryland and took part in some of the fiercest actions during the entire campaign.

* North Carolina Troops after Antietam *******

Jeff's presentation will provide us with a better understanding of what the soldiers faced at Antietam and afterwards.

The following letter was written to North Carolina Governor Zebulon B. Vance in October 1862. It clearly and strongly detailed the condition of the 48th Regiment North Carolina Troops.

Camp Near Winchester Va. Octr 11th, 1862.

Govr. Z. B. Vance,

I lay before you for your consideration the destitute condition of our Regt. with the hope that you, who have experienced some of the severe trials of a soldiers life, may hasten up the requisite relief—

We have present Six hundred & nineteen men rank & file in the 48th Regt. N.C. Troops—There are of that number Fifty one who are completely & absolutely Barefooted—& one hundred & ninety four who are nearly as bad off, as Barefooted,

& who will be altogether so, in less than one month. There are but Two hundred & ninety seven Blankets in the Regt. among the 619 men, which is less than one Blanket to evry two men.

In truth there is one Compy (I) having 66 men & only Eleven Blankets in the whole company—The pants are generally ragged & out at the seats—& there are less than three cooking utensils to each Company—This sir is the condition of our Regt. upon the eve of winter here among the mountains of Va. cut off from all supplies from home & worn down & thinned with incessant marchings, fighting & diseases—can any one wonder that our Regt. numbering over 1250 rank & file has more than half its no. absent from camp, & not much over one third 449 of them fit for duty? The country is filled with Stragglers, deserters, & sick men & the hospitals are crowded from these exposures. A spirit of disaffection is rapidly engendering among the soldiers which threatens to show itself in general Straggling & desertion, if it does not lead to open mutiny.

Add to this that our surgeons have no medicines & don't even pretend to prescribe for the sick in camp, having no medicines & you have an outline of the sufferings & prospective trials & difficulties under which we labor....

Want we most pressinglly need just now is our full supply of Blankets, of Shoes & of pants & socks. We need very much all our other clothing too. But we are in the greatest need of these indispensable articles & Must have them, & have them Now. Otherwise how can the Government blame the soldier for failing to render service, when it fails to fulfil its stipulated & paid for contracts? A contract broken on one side is broken on all sides & void....

The soldiers of the 48th N.C. & from all the State will patriotically suffer & bear their hardships & privations as long as those from any other State, or as far as human endurance can tolerate such privations, But it would not be wise to experiment to far in such times & under such circumstances as now surround us upon the extent of their endurance. With Lincolns proclamation promising freedom to the slaves, What might the suffering, exhausted, ragged, barefooted, & dying Non slaveholders of the South, who are neglected by their government & whose suffering families at home are exposed to so many evils, begin to conclude? Would it not be dangerous to tempt them with too great trials?

Dear Sir...I feel the very earnest & solemn responsibility of my position as commander of this Regt. at this critical period & under these trying circumstances & wish to do all I can...to remove the evils by seeking a speedy supply of Blankets, Shoes & clothing. & therefore beg your earnest attention to the premises & your zealous & I hope efficient aid to supply our necessities....

October 1862 saw Robert E Lee move his army away from Washington and for the time being the capital was safe. At the end of October 1862, the armies of McClellan and Lee were only two miles apart near the Blue Ridge Mountains.

October 1st: The Confederate press portrayed Lincoln's emancipation declaration as a recipe for slave insurrection.

October 4th: The Confederates launched a major attack on Corinth. It was not a success as the Unionists were well dug in and the Confederates lost many men – 1,423 killed, 5,692 wounded and 2,248 missing. The North lost 315 dead, 1,812 wounded and 232 missing.

October 5th: As the Confederates withdrew from Corinth, their rearguard clashed with a Unionist force at Metamora by the Big Hatchie River. In this action, the Union lost over 500 men while the South lost about 400.

October 8th: A battle at Perryville in Kentucky led to heavy casualties on both sides. The North lost 916 killed, 2943 wounded and 489 missing while the South lost 500 killed, 2635 wounded and 251 missing out of their total of 16,000 men.

October 10th: Jefferson Davis requested to the Confederate Congress that 4500 African Americans be drafted in to build defences around Richmond.

October 11th: The Confederate Congress agreed with Davis but stipulated that anyone who owned twenty slaves or more was exempt from this call-up. This decision was not well received and the less well-off slave owners in the Confederacy started to comment that it was "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight".

October 13th: Lincoln wrote again to McClellan to urge him to do something. "You remember my speaking to you of what I called your over-cautiousness. Are you not over-cautious when you assume that you cannot do what the enemy is constantly doing? Should you not claim to be at least his equal in prowess, and act upon that claim? If we do not beat the enemy where he now is, we never can, he again being within the entrenchments of Richmond."

October 14th: While the Confederates had failed in Kentucky, they had taken vast amounts of booty that was vital to their supplies. While the Confederate press almost certainly exaggerated what was taken – the claim was that the wagon train was over 40 miles long – large amounts of barrelled pork and bacon were taken along with an estimated 1500 horses and 8000 cattle.

October 19th: In New Orleans, where the Unionists held power, General Butler passed two important pieces of legislation. The first was to raise three regiments of “free coloured men” and the second was to introduce the legal precedent that ‘blacks were equal to whites’ in the eyes of the law.

October 25th: Lincoln once again expressed his concern that McClellan appeared to be doing nothing.

October 26th: McClellan marched the Army of the Potomac back into Virginia. Whether this was part of a plan he already had or if it was in a direct response to Lincoln’s criticisms is not known.

October 28th: To avoid getting encircled by the Army of the Potomac, Robert E Lee moved his Army of Virginia further south and, therefore, further away from Washington DC. Lee’s army numbered 70,000 men while McClellan could call on 130,000 men – so it was a wise move. Sections of Lee’s army were ordered to maintain a close observation of McClellan’s men and for two days both sides were less than 2 miles apart but separated by the Blue Ridge Mountains.

 The Great Locomotive Chase *****

In April, 1862, James J. Andrews, a civilian spy for Union General Don Carlos Buell, led a group of twenty-four Union volunteers into Confederate territory in a daring attempt to sever the railroad that ran between Atlanta and Chattanooga. Andrew’s raid was to be made in coordination with a Union army effort to take Chattanooga and disrupt Confederate rail service between Virginia and the middle and lower South. Andrews’s plan was bold; he intended to take his raiders 100 miles into Confederate territory, overwhelm a train crew in Georgia, and take the high-jacked train on a journey of destruction north towards Chattanooga.

The General

At 5:00 a.m. in Marietta on April 12, 1862, Andrews and nineteen of his men, singly and in small groups, boarded the General for the rail journey north. The General stopped at Big Shanty for a twenty minute breakfast stop. Conductor William A. Fuller, Engineer Jeff Cain, and Fireman Andrew J. Anderson joined the other passengers for meal at the Lacy Hotel. Andrews, accompanied by three of his men who were also experienced locomotive engineers, made their way to the engine. Upon Andrews's signal, the remaining men uncoupled the passenger cars and boarded the three empty boxcars behind the General. An 87 mile scramble to the north was about to begin – it was the beginning of The Great Locomotive Chase.

Conductor Fuller and his crew began the chase for their train on foot, later found a hand cart, and finally found a small engine, the Yonah, to pursue the General. Initially, Fuller thought the train had been taken by conscripts from a local training camp. As they continued the chase and encountered track damage and cut telegraph wires, Fuller and his crew knew they were chasing Union raiders. Fuller and Andrews played a cat and mouse game as the chase moved north. The raiders had to stop several times as southbound trains were encountered; the pursuers changed pursuit trains, first the William R. Smith and finally the Texas, to avoid track damage and traffic blockages. Andrews used a cover story of that the General and its 3 boxcars contained a special munitions shipment for General Beauregard. Fuller, after abandoning the William R. Smith due to track damaged, continued the pursuit on foot for another three miles until, he stopped the southbound Texas.

After the Texas left its cars on a siding, Fuller and his increasing number of pursuers raced the Texas in reverse gear after the fleeing and increasingly alert raiders. One of those Fuller picked up on the Texas included a telegraph operator from Dalton who had come south to investigate the lost service south of his station. Andrews and his men placed obstacles, tried to burn the bridge over the Oostanaula River, released boxcars – all in an attempt to slow the Texas. The pursuers were so close at Green's Wood Station that the General was unable to take on a full load of wood and water. After the General quickly passed through Dalton, Andrews stopped again to cut the telegraph line. Fuller had put his telegrapher, Edward Henderson, off-board at Dalton and Henderson was able to get part of an alert telegram to Confederate authorities before the raiders had cut the line. The race was almost over.

The General roared through Tunnel Hill and Ringgold, but the Texas was within sound and sight. Andrews knew that with fuel and water for the General almost exhausted, he had to give up the raid. Two miles north of Ringgold, Andrews ordered his men to jump off the train and scatter to avoid capture.

Within a twelve day period, all the raiders who escaped the General were captured. On June 7, 1862, James J. Andrews was hung in Atlanta. Seven others were also hung.

On October 16, 1862, fourteen surviving raiders from James J. Andrews's unsuccessful attempt to disrupt Confederate rail communications between Chattanooga and Atlanta tried an escape from the Fulton County jail. Eight of the Union soldiers made their escape by effort of great will, courage, and physical effort. The remaining six, still confined in the Fulton County jail, were exchanged later during the war.

Secretary of War, Edwin Stanton, met the six exchanged soldiers on March 25, 1863. These men, William Bensinger, Robert Buffum, Elihu Mason, Jacob Parrott, William Pittenger, and Robert Reddick, were to be the first six recipients awarded the Medal of Honor. Seventeen year old, Jacob Parrott, received the first medal from Stanton. The other five men received their medals from President Abraham Lincoln in a meeting at the White House.

Nineteen of the original 24 volunteers were eventually awarded the Medal of Honor. James J. Andrews and William Campbell had been civilians; hence, not eligible for the medal.

 That Another May Live *****

There have been many examples of soldiers who aided their comrades during the Civil War. As the war lengthened into 1864, the cruelty of total war made itself felt.

Pvt. Albert G. Willis, Co. C, Col. John S. Mosby's Partisan Rangers (43d Battalion, Virginia Cavalry) and at least one other Ranger were captured about 13 Oct. 1864 near Gaines Crossroads by Union Brig. Gen. William H. Powell's U.S. 2nd Cavalry Division. During the Civil War, many Federals considered partisans civilian bushwhackers, not regular soldiers. Powell, in reprisal for what he called the "murder" of a U.S. soldier by alleged partisans, ordered a Ranger executed. According to some postwar sources, Willis, a ministerial student before the war, offered his life in place of a married cohort, "I have no family, I am a Christian, and I am not afraid to die." He was hanged nearby on 14 Oct. and buried at a Baptist church in Flint Hill.

Source: http://www.dhr.virginia.gov/hiway_markers/marker.cfm?mid=3799, accessed September 15, 2012.

The story of sacrificing for a friend did not end with the death of Willis. Mosby's men happened upon Willis's body almost before he was cold. After burying Willis and with vengeance in their hearts, the partisans rode forth to exact revenge upon their foes. They quickly captured Francis Marion White of the 22nd Pennsylvania Cavalry Ringgold Battalion. The partisans prepared to hang White, just as Powell had hung Willis – an eye for an eye, a hand for a hand.

White had a noose tightened around his neck when an unexpected event occurred:

.....some of [John Hanson] McNeill's men arrived on the scene, in a friendly mood, ready to join forces temporarily with Mosby. But their attitude changed when they learned the man about to be hanged was a Ringgold. For any member of this outfit they had a soft spot, so they argued long and loud that the man was entitled to go free, that members of his battalion treated Valley residents with respect and had even kept some of them from starving. Stoutly they gave voice in his defense, without indication of letup. The argument went back and forth, never waning, until finally the McNeill boys lost patience and backed up, guns drawn, to form a ring around the prisoner, announcing they were prepared to die with him. This put an entirely different slant on the matter and, after a few more futile words, the rope was removed from White's neck.

 The Rest of the Story *****

From Samuel Clark Farrar's The Twenty-Second Pennsylvania Cavalry and the Ringgold Battalion [Pittsburg: The New Werner Company, 1911], p. 405.

Francis Marion White. of Company A, 22d P.V.C. was captured by Moseby near Upperville, Va., Oct. 10, 1864, and was about to be hanged in retaliation from the execution of a Confederate by General Powell a few days before. Some of McNeill's Rangers, who were with Moseby, learned that White was a member of the Ringgold Cavalry, interceded and had him sent off a prisoner, declaring that the Ringolds against whom they had warred for three years, were honorable soldiers, who had respected and protected their homes and families, when in possession of Moorfield, and that no captive from that command would be executed in retaliation, if they could help it.

Francis Marion White survived the war; however, his was not a good ending. In a pension application by his mother on February 25, 1889, it was revealed that White died on July 5, 1865. Information found on the USGenWeb Archives, revealed that White spent time in Andersonville prison prior to his release and his return to Beallsville, Pennsylvania. White died at home; the victim of the harsh conditions encountered while he was a prisoner-of-war.

I can only speculate about the events that White confronted after McNeill's men saved him from hanging. I don't want to do that; hence, I will continue to search for more information about what happened to him after that day in October, 1864.

Men of Peace, Who went to War: The American Civil War Chaplain's Story

Chaplain Alan Farley, D.D., in the loud and booming voice of a Civil War era preacher, shared the story of the efforts made by chaplains, priests, rabbis and volunteers to bring the word of God to the soldiers, North and South, who fought in the most cataclysmic event in American history. Sharing in the horrors of the battlefields, in the unimaginable suffering in the hospitals, and in the privations of camp, these men (and woman) of the cloth brought refuge in a time of great need. That refuge was faith.

Chaplain Alan Farley

Alan began his presentation with the story of a request that Robert E. Lee made to Dr. J. William Jones after the war. Lee wanted Jones to write a book about the impact of religious revival in the Army of Northern Virginia. Lee thought it important that the record of the service and accomplishments of the Confederate chaplains be recorded. Jones, a former chaplain in the ANV, responded to Lee's request and Christ in the Camp or Religion in the Confederate Army was published in 1887 and reissued in 1904. Jones used numerous memoirs and letters of the war's survivors to witness the efforts that were made to bring comfort of the spirit to Southern soldiers.

The Chaplain Farley then related the efforts made by both the Union and Confederate governments to meet the religious habitudes of their soldiers. Both congresses passed legislation to address the need and the advisability of placing chaplains among their soldiers. As was the case in every other logistical need, the Union was better organized in implemented these laws; however, the Confederacy proved resourceful in responding to this crisis of the spirit. Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish faiths were served during the war – 2,387 men and 1 woman, Ellen Hobart, served as chaplains with the Union Army – 94 of them died; 1,303 men served in the Confederate Army and among them was slave Louis Napoleon Nelson who served as chaplain of Co. M, 7th Tennessee Cavalry – 41 died.

As the war continued into its third and fourth years, the chaplains became increasingly important in administering to the spiritual needs of the soldiers in both armies. Chaplains shared the hardship of battle campaigns by going into action with their troops – numerous examples of “fighting chaplains” were related. The chaplains were instrumental in holding regular religious services in chapels built by the soldiers while the armies were in their winter camps.

Ella Hobart - - Uncle Lewis Nelson

After the Battle of Antietam and especially during the winter of 1862-1863, a revival movement began among the soldiers of both opposing armies. The battles became bigger, the casualties became heavier. Many soldiers sought solace in the religious services and reaffirmed their faith in a higher power. During the war, Alan estimated that 250,000 to 350,000 soldiers received the message of their revival ministers.

* Trivia Questions for October *******

1 - Why were North Carolina soldiers supplied so poorly during the early stages of the war? When North Carolina seceded from the Union on May 20, 1861, Governor John Ellis attempted to bring a very ill-prepared state to a war footing. Ellis, who had been governor since 1858, was an experienced administrator and should have been able to concentrate resources to meet the crisis. Unfortunately for the state, Ellis died on July 7, 1861. Ellis’s successor, Henry Toole Clark, was a wealthy and educated man. Clark was; however, very suspicious of extensions of government authority when the government needed to fill its role as a supplier of its soldiers needs. The policies of Ellis and Clark tended to divide the state between ardent secessionists and those who had reluctantly left the Union. At a time when a common goal and direction was needed, Ellis and Clark had tried to exclude many needed allies from the war effort.

After Zeb Vance became governor in September 1862, his vigorous leadership moved North Carolina onto a much more efficient war footing. Vance began state efforts to clothe and arm its soldiers. Vance secured exemptions for men needed to run state enterprises and to staff state agencies. He bought state-owned blockade runners to bring needed supplies – medicines, clothing, and weapons – through the blockade.

2 - North Carolina brought more materials through the blockade than any other state. How many blockade-runners did the state own? The state-owned blockade runner Advance made eight successful runs between Bermuda and Wilmington between July 1863 and August 1864. The state also owned 25percent interest in four other blockade runners owned by Alexander Collie and Company of England. Through successful blockade running and skillful management of smuggled goods, North Carolina's soldiers were likely the best equipped in the army. Vance did more than any other southern governor to bring supplies into the Confederacy from Europe and later recounted that North Carolina's blockade running enterprise accounted for

3 – Who was Uncle Lewis Nelson? Jefferson Davis delegated the appointment of chaplains to Confederate States Army field commanders. The first noted African-American "honorary" chaplain of the Confederate States Army was Louis Napoleon Nelson who was appointed by the 7th Tennessee Cavalry field officers during The Battle of Shiloh (April 1862). Based on this date, Louis Napoleon Nelson was the first African-American chaplain to serve during the American Civil War. Note: The 7th Tennessee Cavalry, Company M supposedly served under the command of Nathan Bedford Forrest. Nelson had accompanied the sons of his owner, James Oldham, to war as their cook and body servant. Louis was a religious man who had memorized portions of the Bible.

The account of Louis Napoleon Nelson's appoint as chaplain is documented in the Religious Herald (September 10, 1863).

4 - How many Union chaplains were awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor during the Civil War? Chaplain John M. Whitehead of the 15th Indiana Infantry won it for carrying wounded to the rear under very heavy fire at Stone River, Tennessee, in 1862. Chaplain Francis O. Hall gained his at Salem Heights, Virginia, in 1863, while serving as regimental chaplain to the 16th New York Infantry. The third Medal of Honor was won by Chaplain Milton L. Haney of the 55th Illinois Infantry during fierce fighting near Atlanta in 1864. Unlike chaplains Whitehead and Hall, Haney, according to his citation, "voluntarily carried a musket in the ranks of his regiment and rendered heroic service in retaking Federal works which had been captured by the enemy."

5 – A Union Chaplain was executed during the war. Who was he? Chaplain U.P. Gardner of the 13th Kansas Infantry was shot down after identifying himself as a chaplain on November 22, 1864, by a member of Quantrell's guerilla raiders. The shooter was a 17-year-old boy by the name of Jesse James.

Christian Commission

On September 13th, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will begin its 2012 – 2013 program year. Chaplain Alan Farley, D.D. will present a program that focuses on the men and volunteers who served the religious needs of the soldiers who fought in the Civil War.

A native Virginian, Alan Farley developed his lifelong interest in the War Between the States during the centennial commemoration of that struggle. He began his close association with the living history of the war when he became a re-enactor in 1979. In 1984, Alan “laid down his musket and picked up God’s sword and became the first, full time, chaplain to Civil War re-enacting.” Alan, joined by his wife and two children, began full time mission work that included the Re-enactor’s Missions for Jesus Christ. Farley co-founded the National Civil War Chaplain’s Museum and Research Center in Lynchburg, Virginia – the museum, which opened in January 2010, is dedicated to the memory of the chaplains, priests, and rabbis who served in the US and CSA armies during the war. Alan received his doctorate of Divinity from Antioch Baptist Bible College (Marietta, Georgia) in 2011.

Soldiers at worship

The Farley's travel over thirty-five thousand miles a year and participate in twenty to twenty-five Civil War re-enactments. Alan speaks about the role of religion in a soldier's life to SCV camps, UDC meetings, Round Tables, and other interested groups.

Asking for God's Protection

Join us at the September meeting when re-enactor, author, producer, collector and Civil War chaplain, Alan Farley, will share his story of those who ministered to the spiritual needs of the soldiers who faced the hell that was the Civil War. This will be an opportunity to learn about a facet of the war that may have been little studied until recently.

* September 1862 *******

The Confederate army under Robert E. Lee continued to threaten Washington in September 1862. However, September saw Lee faced a set-back at Sharpsburg and at the Battle of Antietam, which Lincoln declared a victory for the North.

September 1st: The Second Battle of Bull Run ended when sections from both sides clashed at Ox Hill. They came across one another just before nightfall during a thunderstorm. In the clash, Union Generals Isaac Stevens and Philip Kearney were killed.

September 2nd: General McClellan was recalled to Washington DC by President Lincoln to take charge of the capital's defences. "If he can't fight himself, he excels in making others ready to fight."
(Lincoln)

September 5th: Robert E Lee took his army into Maryland. At the same time the Union's military hierarchy could not make its mind up as to who should lead the Union's army in the field. Maryland was a tempting target for Lee as its fields were full of crops and any move north that he made would bring fear to those who lived in the capital who would have rightly believed that the city was his priority target.

September 6th: Within just four days, McClellan managed to get together an army of 90,000 men to defend the capital. This feat confirmed to Lincoln his excellent administrative skills. However, McClellan was known to lack tactical ability and someone was needed to command these men in a decisive manner. Lee was well aware of McClellan's failings as a commander.

September 7th: Lee crossed the Potomac River at Leesburg, Virginia. His move north caused the expected panic in the capital and ships were placed on standby to take the President and his Cabinet out of the city to safety. McClellan was given command of the 90,000 men in the Army of the Potomac.

September 8th: The cause of the Union was not helped by dissension in the most senior ranks of the Union Army. General Pope openly blamed other generals for the failure at Bull Run, while they (Generals Franklin and Porter) cited his incompetent leadership during the battle. Leaving this dispute behind in the capital, McClellan marched his men out to meet Lee away from the city. His army of 90,000 was twice as large as Lee's Army of Virginia but the men in it were very demoralized after the Second Bull Run while Lee's men were full of confidence.

September 9th: The people of Maryland did not greet Lee's army with any enthusiasm despite his proclamation that his intention was to return the state to the Confederacy – which Lee assumed would sell his cause. The expected provisions were not forthcoming and Lee's army remained short of supplies.

September 10th: McClellan marched his men to where he knew Lee's army had encamped – Frederick. However, Lee's army marched off on the same day as McClellan gave his order. Lee split his men in two with Jackson ordered to capture Harper's Ferry while he would lead his men to Hagerstown.

September 13th: In an astonishing twist, two Union soldiers found some cigars where Lee had made his camp. They were wrapped in paper. On this paper was written Lee's next plans for his army – their targets, which part of his army was marching where etc. This was Lee's Special Order 191. The Confederates knew that they had lost one copy but must have assumed that it was never going to be found by the North.

September 14th: The North, with the knowledge of where Lee was and where he was heading, made a series of attacks on the Confederates at South Mountain. The speed of McClellan's chase unnerved Lee and forced him into changing his plans at the last minute. The problem Lee would face was to ensure that his change of plans got out to his commanders in the field and that they all understood them.

September 15th: Harper's Ferry fell to Jackson who captured 12,000 Union troops. Jackson left behind an occupying force and then marched at speed to rejoin Lee to consolidate the Army of Virginia once again.

September 16th: Lee's army was at Sharpsburg – as was McClellan's. Lee faced two serious problems. First, he only had 18,000 men with him against 75,000 Union troops. Second, behind where his men were gathered was the Potomac River. So if Lee needed to withdraw, he would have to cross the river. McClellan started his attack with an artillery bombardment. Lee was reinforced when Jackson's 9,000 men arrived. No decisive impact was made one way or the other on this day.

September 17th: The battle continued at 06.00 with a Union attack at Antietam Creek but in a series of skirmishes as opposed to one great battle. The reason for this is that large parts of the Army of the Potomac did nothing, as their commanders had not received orders to do anything. The reason that the commanders in the field had not received orders was that McClellan had not issued any. By the end of the day, the Confederates had held their line despite the North's overwhelming superiority in terms of manpower.

The Dunker Church at Antietam

September 18th: The two armies continued to face one another at Antietam Creek. Two fresh Union divisions arrived but they were ordered to “rest” by McClellan. Lee started to make plans to withdraw his men.

September 19th: In the early hours of the 19th, Lee withdrew his men across the Potomac River. Though McClellan believed Lee would strike across the river again, he was wrong. Lee had ordered his men to the relative safety of Winchester in the Shenandoah Valley.

September 20th: McClellan kept his men at Sharpsburg and showed no inclination to pursue Lee’s men. However, any thoughts Lee had of taking Maryland were killed off in what McClellan called “a very great battle”.

September 22nd: Lincoln expressed his belief that the Battle of Antietam was a victory for the North in the sense that it stopped any plans Lee had for capturing Washington DC. In the same speech, Lincoln declared his intention of abolishing slavery throughout the United States and that this was now a major aim of the Union’s war effort.

September 24th: Lincoln suspended habeas corpus for those who tried to evade the militia draft.

September 28th: Lee’s army of 50,000 men gathered at Winchester in the Shenandoah Valley.

 September 1862 cont’d *****

Artillery Hell at Antietam

The terrifying impact of artillery fire was deeply felt by both infantry and artillery batteries at Antietam. Confederate Colonel Stephen D. Lee later referred to this battle as being an “Artillery Hell” in which his men received severe damage from Union artillery counter-fire and infantry rifle fire. The following passage was taken from Colonel Lee’s after-action report:

The action commenced about 3 a.m. on the morning of the 17th, between the skirmishers. Woolfolk's, Parker's, and Rhett's batteries were placed in position in front of the church, on the right of the Sharpsburg and Hagerstown pike, and opened on the enemy at daylight. These batteries were compelled to fire over our infantry, but fired with effect. A continuous fire was kept up until about 8.15 a.m., when the enemy gave way and our firing ceased as our infantry followed in pursuit. The batteries above mentioned while engaged were exposed to an enfilade fire of about twenty rifled guns from across the Antietam, two batteries in their front, and the fire of the infantry of the enemy, most of the time about 500 yards distant. They suffered very heavily and had exhausted most of their ammunition.....

About this time, 9 a.m., Moody's battery, which had been engaged near the center of our line, arrived and reported, and I placed it in position on the ground previously occupied by Parker's battery. General Hood's division, which followed the enemy when he gave way, not being supported, was compelled to fall back before their overwhelming numbers. The enemy having gained his rear, and occupying a position almost between his retiring troops and Moody's battery, his troops fell back so sullenly, and were so near to the enemy, that it was impossible to use the battery. This being the case, I advanced two guns of Moody's battery some 300 yards into a plowed field, where I could use them. They remained in this position and did good service for about fifteen minutes, under Captain Moody and Lieutenant [John B.] Gorey. This section was exposed to a most galling infantry fire, and retained its position until the infantry on its right and left retired, when I ordered it to the rear. The gallant Lieutenant Gorey was killed, being shot in the head by a Minie-ball as he was sighting his piece for its last discharge. The section with which he was serving was not his own, but, seeing it was going to an exposed position, he asked permission to accompany it. A more gallant officer was not in our service.

Colonel Lee’s report on the beginning of the bloodiest day in American military history revealed that Hood and his Texas Brigade were heavily involved in that conflict.

The Rise of Hood's Texans: Recruitment through Antietam

Those members and guests who attended the June meeting of the CFCWRT were treated to a lively discussion about the men who became Hood's Texans. Dr. Susannah J. Ural enthusiastically shared her passion for the men of the Texas Brigade and she presented supporting details that shared stories about the men, their families, and the reasons for their particular views on the events of 1861 – 1862.

Dr. Susannah Ural

Why are so many people interested in the Civil War and especially the men who fought it? What made these men and their families endure severe hardships and separation from their loved ones? Who were these men?

Dr. Ural answered these questions and many others during her presentation about the Texas Brigade and its leaders and soldiers. Susannah related how Robert E. Lee came to love and count on their resolve, how North Carolina General William Dorsey Pender used them as an example to train his own troops, and how Douglas Southall Freeman referred to them as Lee's favorite shock troops. She shared examples of the Texans and how they gained their reputations as "wild and fearless fighters" who were made of "sterner stuff" than many of their contemporaries.

Men such as "Howdy" Martin, Malachiah Reeves, Val. C. Giles, J.B. Polley and other members of the 1st, 4th or 5th Texas Infantry Regiments left written records of their experiences that made fascinating reading. That the Texas Brigade and its members were far from their homes and families and that they had little opportunity for furloughs made their letters and memoirs especially informative. Further information about the Texans who served in the Army of Northern Virginia can be found on the website for Hood's Texas Brigade Association, Re-Activated (<http://www.hoodstexasbrigade.org/>)

 Why They Joined *****

Malachiah Reeves (1843-1929) was caught up the patriotic fervor of the moment. In 1860 when he was 17 years old, Malachiah attended a subscription school in the Texas community in which he then worked. This was his first formal schooling. The following June, he was again enrolled in a subscription school and was intent on furthering his education. In this classroom setting, the teacher, Mr. McHenry, shared his thoughts about the perceived rights that were being violated by the actions of the Northern states. When a parade of his peers came by the school, Malachiah excitedly answered a call to arms and joined the parade. As had Paul Bäumer in All Quiet on the Western Front, Malachiah was destined to learn harsh realities during the next four years.

Malachiah served in Company I, 1st Texas Regiment Infantry, Hood's Brigade. His daughter, Leila Reeves Eades, recorded her father's stories of his service with the Texas Brigade during the Civil War. The following passages were from "Some Memories of a Daughter of the Confederacy" provided by Malachiah's great grandson, Rick Featherston.

I was doing well in my studies. It was a summer session and there were ___ students; in this situation I was getting extra help from the teacher. Then one day in June we were out on the school ground and a group of fire-eating boys came marching across the school yard led by Dr. E. Currie of Alto. He was enlisting every boy who would join into the Confederate Army. We had been listening to our teacher tell of the troubles between the North and the South and were very much in sympathy with our own Southern States; we were ready to go and sign up with Dr. Currie for three years, or the duration.....

As I told you, I joined up in the Confederate cause at the eager, uninformed age of 18 – even as many another boy did – I wanted to follow the others and our leaders in the fight for what we thought were our rights.....

I'm not too sure I knew all the reasons, but I wanted my land free of the taint of accusations put upon it. So, I fought through the years with determination to bring honor to our Southland. With that conviction I willingly fought along with my comrades sometimes terribly disheartened, but never ready to give up.....

Reeves returned to Texas where he farmed, married twice, raised twelve children, continued to further his education, and became an ordained Baptist minister. Malachiah's value on learning was continually shared with his family.

The Civil War story is not a pretty picture story with "all lived happily ever after" – Little Women and some of your Grimm's and Anderson Fairy tales are much better for little girls to hear, perhaps – but since you need to know the history of your great country, read well the pages of your books. Real life stories make for better qualities of character for our children than does fiction. You must read our Bible and your school books with zeal to know more of our heritage and see why it is necessary for us to go as far as possible in our striving for education.

1 – What was the United States Christian Commission? Soon after the start of the Civil War, YMCA leaders became concerned with the religious and spiritual needs of the soldiers in the nearby camps. Vincent Colyer, a member of the New York City YMCA, had begun spending time visiting nearby encampments where soldiers were stationed temporarily on their way to the battle front. Colyer mingled with the soldiers, offered words of encouragement, and handed out religious tracts. Since few camps had chaplains, the chaplaincy then being in its infancy, Colyer's ministrations were welcomed by both the soldiers and their officers. As a result of these activities, and the apparent need to extend them, the New York Association established an "Army Committee" with Colyer as chairman, with its mission to provide preaching services, individual religious visitation, and publications for soldiers. In November, 1861, at the instigation of members of the board of the New York City YMCA, a special convention of fifty delegates representing fifteen YMCAs met in New York. A "Christian Commission" of twelve members was appointed to devise a plan for the Associations to act as a clearinghouse for all religious work in the armed forces. The work of the Commission was organized at the national level. Local Associations were encouraged to support the Commission while maintaining their own activities. Many Associations merged into local branches of the Christian Commission or resolved themselves into army committees in order to facilitate the work of the Commission. The national organization established an office in Philadelphia and the Associations of Baltimore, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Louisville, New York, St. Louis, and St. Paul became regional clearinghouses for the various activities channeled through the Commission. George H. Stuart, founder and first president of the Philadelphia Association, and then chairman of the YMCA's Central Committee, was designated as Chairman of the Commission, a post he held throughout the war. The method of operation was the appointment of "delegates" who served on a volunteer basis for terms averaging six weeks.

The general aim of the Commission was "to promote the spiritual and temporal welfare of the soldiers in the army and the sailors in the Navy, in cooperation with the Chaplains." Its early activities included publication of a collection of familiar hymns, bible readings and prayers, devotional meetings in the camps, the organization of a "working Christian force" in every regiment, and aiding and supporting chaplains. Though originally devised to provide spiritual sustenance, the activities of the Commission soon expanded into the physical and social realm, making the Commission a valuable agency of wartime relief. A newspaper report of its first annual meeting described the objects of the organization as, "the promotion of the intellectual, moral and religious welfare of the Army and Navy, by suggesting needful national legislation and administration, securing well-qualified chaplains, encouraging Sabbath observance, promoting temperance, multiplying libraries, reading-rooms, and gymnasiums, and endeavoring to arouse the sentiment of the nation to a sense of its obligations to this class of citizens. Delegates, serving both at the front and behind the lines, established tents as social centers with stationery and periodicals provided, distributed emergency medical supplies, food, and clothing, and operated canteens and lending libraries. A special work of compassion performed by delegates of the Commission was the assembling of records of those buried from prisons and in certain major battle areas. Prisoner-of-war work, which was to figure more prominently in YMCA war work in later conflicts, also began during the Civil War.

2 – What rank did a chaplain, priest or rabbi hold in the Union and Confederate Armies? In the Union Army after October 1864, the War Department awarded chaplains the rank of captain of cavalry. In the Confederate Army, chaplains held no rank, but they received half pay of a first lieutenant.

3 – What Northern Congressman objected that chaplains must be “regularly ordained clergyman of some Christian denomination?” Clement Vallandigham. The Ohio Democrat urged that the requirement be changed to a “regularly ordained clergyman of some religious society” and made a surprisingly impassioned plea to his colleagues: “There is a large body of men in this country, and one growing continually, of the Hebrew faith ... whose adherents are as good citizens and as true patriots as any in the country ... While we are in one sense a Christian people, and yet in another sense not the most Christian people in the world, this is not yet a ‘Christian Government,’ nor a government which has any connection with one form of religion in preference to another form.”

Vallandigham would later lead the Copperheads and became the spokesman for their anti-war sentiments.

4 – In which battle did Hood’s Texans solidify their reputations as wild and fearless fighters? On June 27, 1862, John Bell Hood led his Texas Brigade against the Union Army’s Fifth Corps of Fitz-John Porter at Gaines Mill. Porter had successfully repulsed Lee’s attacks for five hours before Hood personally led the 4th Texas, with the 18th Georgia supporting, in a bayonet attack against the entrenched Union troops. As the other regiments of Hood’s Brigade joined in the fight, Porter was forced to retreat across the Chickahominy River. Hood’s Texas Brigade gave Robert E. Lee his first victory of the war.

The renowned Stonewall Jackson, who seldom gave praise without good reason, remarked that, “The men who carried this position were soldiers indeed.”

5 - Who was “Howdy” Martin? William Harrison Martin was a lawyer, Confederate officer, and congressman who served in Company K, 4th Texas Infantry. There were several stories concerning “Howdy” Martin and the origination of his nickname. Some said that Martin, on the occasion of seeing Robert E. Lee, stood up in his stirrups and greeted Lee with a big “Howdy!” Other stories reported that Martin never got the hang of saluting but resorted to “Howdy” as his military acknowledgement.

Whatever the source of his moniker, it was Martin who made the request to Jefferson Davis, in Lee’s presence, that the depleted Texas regiments not be merged into other units and thus lose their Texas Brigade identification. Lee added that he had never given the Texans an order to hold a place, that the Texas Brigade did not hold it. Davis granted Howdy’s request.

6 – At what battle did the 1st Texas Infantry suffer the highest casualty rate for any Confederate regiment during the war? The First Texas Infantry lost 82% of their men killed, wounded and missing while fighting in the Cornfield at Antietam, the highest casualty rate for any Confederate regiment in one battle of the Civil War.

In the spring of 1861, Northerners and Southerners rushed to arms in response to the crisis at Fort Sumter and President Abraham Lincoln's call for volunteers. Some of those men organized into the Texas Brigade, which quickly rose to fame as one of the elite units of Confederate General Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. The Texas Brigade was initially comprised of the First, Fourth, and Fifth Texas Infantry Regiments. After John Bell Hood became the Texas Brigade's brigadier on March 7, 1862, Hood's Texans quickly built their fighting reputations at Eltham's Landing, the Seven Pines, Gaines's Mill, Second Manassas, and in the Cornfield at Antietam.

"The Rise of Hood's Texans: Recruitment through Antietam" discusses their early organization. Their first winter in camp, and their first campaign season in 1862 that begins so dramatically at Gaines's Mill and ends in bloody tragedy at Sharpsburg, Maryland.

 June 1862 *****

In June 1862 McClellan continued his advance on Richmond. Lincoln complained that his approach was too cautious and that McClellan was not taking advantage of the confusion and panic Unionist spies had detected in Richmond.

June 1st: Robert E Lee was given command of the Confederate troops defending Richmond following the wounding of General Johnson. A renewed Confederate assault on Fair Oaks resulted in many Confederate casualties – in total the Confederates lost 8,000 men killed, wounded or missing at Fair Oaks. The Unionists lost nearly 6,000 men in total.

June 3rd: Corinth, Mississippi fell to Unionist forces. Their next target was Memphis, Tennessee. A Unionist advance threatened Charleston, South Carolina.

June 4th: The Army of the Potomac prepared for their advance on Richmond.

June 6th: This day dealt two major blows to the Confederates. First, they lost Ashley Turner, considered to be a highly gifted cavalry commander at a time when cavalry units were coming more and more into the war. Second, in a confrontation on the Mississippi, the Confederate Navy lost seven out of eight armed riverboats to a Union fleet that lost none of its seven gunboats. The Confederates lost 80 men killed or wounded and had over 100 taken prisoner. The fleet was guarding Memphis, which fell to Union forces that day. The victory also meant that the Unionist Navy had effective control of the whole of the Mississippi River where it was navigable.

June 7th: Unionists reconnaissance units came into sight of Richmond. In New Orleans, General Butler sentenced William Mumford to death for tearing down the Union flag flying over the city's mint.

June 8th: 8,000 Confederate troops fought 18,000 Union troops at Cross Keys in the Shenandoah Valley. At the same time another battle took place at Port Republic, four miles along the Valley. Neither battle is conclusive but in total the Unionists lost 850 men killed and wounded. The Confederates lost about 600 men in both battles.

June 12th: After three days rest, Jackson's army made a move to Richmond to support Lee. Jackson's 20,000 men had effectively tied up 60,000 Unionist troops in the Shenandoah Valley. Jefferson Davis had initially feared a two-pronged Unionist attack on Richmond but the work of Lee all but ruled this out.

June 15th: Reports from scouting parties convinced Lee that McClellan's communication lines were very weak. In an attempt to outthink McClellan, Lee sent 10,000 in the direction of the Shenandoah Valley ostensibly to support Jackson– even though they would never get there as Jackson's men were marching at speed for Richmond. Lee hoped that McClellan's poor communication would convince him to keep his 60,000 men in the Valley to fight the extra 10,000 men who marched to be seen by the Unionists – but who were never intended to get to the Shenandoah Valley.

June 17th: President Lincoln was still not convinced that his generals were as offensively minded as he was. Lincoln believed that General John Pope fitted this requirement and appointed him commander of the newly created Army of Virginia.

June 18th: Lincoln wrote to McClellan urging him to attack Richmond. He wrote that with 10,000 less men – those men who had been directed to the Shenandoah Valley – the city was ripe for taking. McClellan viewed the situation differently. He believed that the Confederates had to be exceptionally well dug in and confident of victory if they could allow 10,000 men to leave the city. His response to Lincoln's exhortation to be more aggressive was to be more cautious!

June 19th: Lincoln made it known that he planned to outlaw slavery in all states in America.

June 24th: The first exchange of fire took place between troops near Richmond.

June 25th: McClellan ordered his men to advance on the left flank of Richmond. He also sent a letter to Washington DC that stated that he was facing an army of 200,000 men and that if he lost to them it would not be his fault and that he would die fighting with his men. McClellan made it clear that if he did lose the battle, there was nothing to stop the Confederates attacking the capital. To the end McClellan remained cautious. But it was a simple fact. If he did lose, what would stop Lee and then Davis entering Washington DC?

June 26th: Lee attacked Unionist forces outside Richmond at Mechanicsville. Lee had decided that attack was his best form of defence. However, an accurate and severe Unionist artillery bombardment threw back the Confederates. Lee withdrew his forces. McClellan remained very cautious and feared that a second attack would be more successful. Despite arguments to the contrary from his in-the-field commanders, McClellan ordered his forward troops to withdraw from their entrenched lines.

June 27th: Lee's men attacked as expected but the Unionists he expected to face were withdrawing across the Chickahominy River. The withdrawal was disciplined but the Confederates did capture a large amount of Union supplies. Lincoln was furious that McClellan had been overcautious.

June 28th: The Union Army continued its withdrawal and destroyed supplies at White House Landing rather than let them fall into the hands of the Confederates.

June 29th: The Army of the Potomac continued its withdrawal.

June 30th: Lee ordered an attack on McClellan's troops with all the 80,000 men at his disposal. However, it was never coordinated and by dusk it was plain that the attack had not been anywhere near decisive. If anything, the failed attack acted as a boost to the Unionists after what had happened in the previous three days.

While the blockade runner, Modern Greece, was floundering off Fort Fisher on the morning of June 27, 1862, Union General Ambrose Burnside was approving the formation of a regiment of loyal Union men in Carteret County. The First North Carolina Union Volunteers was to be commanded by a member of General John Foster's staff, Captain Edward E. Potter, and its purpose was to protect the loyal citizens in the Union occupied portion of North Carolina. The volunteers were to be a home guard as clarified by an enlistment poster distributed among the citizens.

TO THE PEOPLE OF EASTERN NORTH CAROLINA

The Government of the United States, by Major-General Burnside in command of the Department of North Carolina, has authorized the raising of a regiment in the Eastern part of this State, which regiment will be under the protection of the United States, and commanded by a United States Officer. We, the undersigned, having full authority so to do, invite the citizens of this and neighboring counties to assist us in this enterprise.

All who are willing to enlist under the “Old Flag,” will be paid, clothed, and fed by the United States.

The Line Officers will be chosen by the men of the respective companies. The Colonel, Lieutenant Colonel, Major, and Adjutant will be appointed by the United States.

It is to be understood that this regiment is intended for the protection of loyal citizens by bringing them together under military discipline and will not be called upon to leave the State. Those able to bear arms who stand aloof from this movement cannot expect that the Government will protect those who make no effort to aid themselves.

EDWARD E. POTTER, Capt. U.S.A.
Col. Commanding 1st Reg. N.C.V.

JOHN R. RESSVESS
Acting Lieut. Col. 1st Reg. N.C.V.

Washington, Beaufort Co. North Carolina

Why did some white North Carolinians take up arms against their own state? This was a complex question that involved more than anti-secession feelings or opposition to slavery. In Wayne K. Durrill’s War of Another Kind: A Southern Community in the Great Rebellion, Durill examined the stresses created between the planters, yeoman farmers, landless white laborers, free blacks and slaves in Union occupied coastal North Carolina (Washington County). For some men, the formation of Union Volunteers provided a means of “payback” against some of their neighbors and an opportunity to seize property. For others, it was a matter of economics and surviving in the turmoil that impacted their lives for the Federal Government had committed to support the volunteers and their families, if they pledged loyalty to the Union. Later in the war, the Union 2nd Regiment provided a haven for deserters and draft escapees from the Confederate Army. For whatever their reasons, more than 1,300 men chose to serve with the Union Army.

Eventually, the North Carolina Volunteers of the 1st and 2nd Regiments became involved in more than just garrison duty. Usually they became involved through Union attacks into Confederate North Carolina or Confederate attacks into the occupied areas. In early 1864, Confederate General George Pickett led an expedition against New Bern. At Beech Grove near that city, the Confederates captured 53 men in Company F, 2nd Regiment on February 1, 1864 – 27 of those men had previously deserted from the Confederate army. Pickett ordered a court martial and 22 of the men were hung at Kinston between February 5th and February 22nd. The controversy that resulted from Pickett’s actions continued long after the end of the war.

Guerrilla warfare became a way of life in the coastal regions. The true nature of a “civil war” was experienced by many of those who lived in the eastern part of North Carolina for they endured more than a Northern or Southern invader marching through their lives – they endured the loss of nearly everything to men who had been their neighbors and they endured these wretched conditions for over three years. Whether unionist, secessionist, free black, or slave, their lives were forever changed by the war and the hard peace that followed. The war had utterly destroyed any concept of what had been law or justice.

Blockade Runner Modern Greece – Archaeology Program

Dr. Mark Wilde-Ramsing provided our membership with a view of Civil War blockade running and the underwater salvage and mapping efforts that have been done since the Modern Greece was rediscovered in 1962. Fifty years of underwater archaeology efforts have added a significant number of shipwreck sites, artifacts, and archaeological preservation techniques to our knowledge of events that occurred during the heady days of blockade running on the Cape Fear.

Modern Greece – artist rendition

Mark began his presentation with a look at the Mosley 1733 and the Collet 1770 maps of the Cape Fear – the difference, and what made this region so important to the blockade running trade, was New Inlet. Opened by a 1761 storm, this inlet provided two entrances into the Cape Fear River. These two inlets and the shallow waters of Frying Pan Shoals made it difficult for the Union Blockading Fleet to easily prevent ships from entering the river. As the war continued, New Inlet and Wilmington increased in importance to the Confederate war effort. While many sleek blockade runners made successful runs into and out of the Cape Fear River, the lumbering Modern Greece failed in the attempt.

The following explains the significance of the underwater wrecks that were numerous in the Cape Fear region. This information was taken from the “National Register of Historic Places Nomination: Cape Fear Civil War Shipwreck District” that Mark and Wilson Angley submitted in September 1985.

During the Civil War at least thirty-one steam and twenty-two sail blockade-runners, as well as a wide assortment of Federal and Confederate military vessels were lost in the Cape Fear River area. With the exception of the USS Peterhoff, which was lost in a collision, all wrecks were stranded along the beach or on inlet shoals and sank in shallow waters (<30 feet). Upon wrecking, a vessel became the focus of furious attempts to save it and its cargo. The Federals had the decided advantage in efforts to recover the total vessel since they could approach from sea with tugboats. The Confederates concentrated on a wreck's cargo, which was not only more important to their specific need, but could be unloaded with ease onto the beaches which they controlled.

Mark Wilde-Ramsing – Underwater Archaeologists

Mark explained the early efforts of the first navy divers to recover artifacts from the Modern Greece. He then discussed the laws that North Carolina enacted to protect shipwrecks in the waters of this state. His presentation touched on the mapping and survey of shipwreck sites and the advances in technology that have aided in these efforts. After giving a brief history of several of the blockade runners and the CSS Raleigh, Mark ended his presentation with references to the March 2012 recovery efforts by an ECU led group to complete the discovery and cataloging of artifacts that have remained in outdoor holding tanks at the Underwater Archaeology Lab at Fort Fisher since 1962 - 1963. After 150 years, the Modern Greece continued to yield pertinent “bits of history” about the story that was blockade running in the Cape Fear during the Civil War.

 Trivia Questions for May 2012 *****

1 – Who was the first commander of the Texas Brigade after it was formed on October 22, 1861?

Louis Trezevant Wigfall. Born in South Carolina in 1816 and a transplant to Texas in 1846, Wigfall was a lawyer who was very active in Texas politics. He entered the United States Senate in 1859 as a leading fire-eater and representative of the states’ rights and slavery positions. On April 12, 1861, Wigfall was in Charleston, South Carolina urging Anderson to surrender Fort Sumter to Confederate forces. He served as an aide to Jefferson Davis and a member of the Provisional Congress. Appointed brigadier by Jefferson Davis, Wigfall was commander of the Texas Brigade until he resigned to enter the Confederate Senate.

Initially a supporter of Davis, Wigfall became a leading opponent of his former friend. After the Confederacy’s fall, Wigfall moved to England where he continued to push for the rise of the old Confederacy. He relocated to Baltimore in 1872 and died in Galveston on February 18, 1874.

2 – Where is Eltham’s Landing? During the Peninsular Campaign, McClellan dispatched William B. Franklin’s division to make a amphibious landing at Eltham’s Landing (West Point) on the York River to position his troops behind Joe Johnston’s retreating Confederates. W.H.C. Whiting’s division was sent to oppose Franklin’s force. John Bell Hood led his Texas Brigade with Wade Hampton’s Legion in attacking Franklin and driving the Union troops back and allowing Johnston’s wagon train to escape.

3 – The Texas Brigade garnered a reputation for being somewhat disrespectful of military authority. How did they react to officers they felt were less than sufficient to command them? From an article in the Civil War Times:

One of the first challenges came when the men were organized into units, and officials in Richmond appointed their regimental officers. Although the recruits knew to expect this, they insisted on having some say in the process. The 4th Texas, for example, refused to have R.T.P. Allen as their colonel – they had had enough of his martinet manners in their training camps back home. The 5th Texas took note of Frank Schaller’s pageantry, foreign accent and, perhaps, his Jewish heritage, though the men said nothing about it. But Schaller awoke on morning to find his horse’s mane and tail cropped and the girth cut from the saddle, and he promptly left camp. The 5th finally accepted as their leader, if briefly, Colonel J.J. Archer, though many remained suspicious of the “too-near-Yankeedom” Marylander. And they made such a mockery of Major J.Q. Quattlebaum’s name and habits that the man resigned, insisting “that if he had to associate with devils he would wait until he went to hell, where he could select his own company.”

Source: Susannah J. Ural and Rick Eiserman, “The Winter That Made the Texas Brigade,” Civil War Times, August 2011.

4 - What observation did General Lee share with John Bell Hood about precautions needed when Hood's Texans were in an area? "Ah, General Hood, when you Texans come about the chickens have to roost mighty high."

Source: J.B. Hood, Advance and Retreat: Personal Experiences in the United States & Confederate States Armies [1880; repr., New York: Da Capo Press, 1993], 51.

5 - How many artifacts were recovered from the Modern Greece during the 1962 - 1963 salvage effort? The Modern Greece was a virtual hardware store that brought not only weapons, powder, and military gear, but large quantities of picks, hoes, knives, etc. According to Mark Wilde-Ramsing, over 11,500 items were salvaged during the efforts in 1962 - 1963. This volume of items recovered from the Modern Greece allowed the Underwater Archaeology Lab personnel to experiment with preservation methods that would best stabilize each type of item.

6 - Who was the famous passenger on the Condor when the ship ran aground on October 1, 1864? Why was this passenger so insistent on reaching shore and avoiding Yankee capture? Rose O'Neal Greenhow. Having been imprisoned by the Federal authorities earlier in the war and having represented the Confederate government in Europe, Greenhow was adamant about getting to shore to avoid capture and further imprisonment or death by hanging. Failing to heed the warning of the Condor's British captain, Rose paid the ultimate price for attempting to escape in the raging surf. Weighted down by gold coins secured on her person, Greenhow drowned during her rowboat escape and was laid to rest in Wilmington's Oakdale Cemetery after she received full military honors from the Confederate government.

Blockade Runner Modern Greece – Archaeology Program

The Blockade Runner, Modern Greece

At 4:15 a.m. on the morning of June 27, 1862, Commander William A. Parker of the U.S.S. Cambridge spotted a large steamer about 3 miles from Fort Fisher. Parker ordered the Cambridge gunners to open fire upon the gray ship. The blockade runner hoisted an English flag and made for the protective guns of Fort Fisher. The iron steamer, the Modern Greece, failed to reach the safety of the Cape Fear River. Instead, she grounded and met her demise.

While some of the Modern Greece's large cargo was offloaded by the Confederates after she grounded, the steamer slipped under the water and sand of the Atlantic Ocean where she remained until she was uncovered by a fierce storm in the early spring of 1962. Divers from the Naval Ordnance School at Indian Head, Maryland discovered that the wreck was cleared of sand to a level below the main deck. Most importantly, much of the cargo was still there and in remarkable condition. The Office of Archives and History worked with other agencies and began the initial recovery of cargo from the Modern Greece. While generally successful, the knowledge about conservation of recovered artifacts was in its infancy and because of the large number of artifacts many were simply left in large outdoor storage tanks at the Fort Fisher site.

Through the Blockade

On March 5 - 7, eleven East Carolina University Maritime Studies graduate students and four interns from UNC Wilmington began efforts to discover what artifacts remained in those muddy outdoor storage tanks. This year marked the 150th anniversary of the sinking of the Modern Greece and the 50th anniversary of the original recovery effort. These student's efforts to clean out the tanks, catalogue the artifacts, and store them in more stable indoor wet storage was the beginning of a long conservation process that will allow these "bits of history" to be shared with the public.

Mark Wilde-Ramsing

On May 10, Mark Wilde-Ramsing will present the current status of the Modern Greece's cargo and the ongoing conservation efforts being made by the Underwater Archaeology Branch. Please join with the members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and learn about the latest discoveries from the Modern Greece.

Mark U. Wilde-Ramsing, Ph.D, became a staff archaeologist with the North Carolina Division of Archives and History – Underwater Archaeology Branch in 1978 and in October 2010 he became Deputy State Archaeologist – Underwater. Mark was appointed to develop an environmental review system for the submerged cultural resource management program. Wilde-Ramsing has surveyed many miles of North Carolina waters and supervised on underwater site investigations ranging from dugout canoes to 20th Century steamers. Throughout these investigations, Mark has sought input from marine archaeologists, historians, conservators, and physical scientists to help interpret and preserve the submerged archaeological record. Since 1997, Mark has been project director for the Queen Ann's Revenge shipwreck. Wilde-Ramsing graduated from Wake Forest University and the Catholic University of America. He received his doctorate in Coastal Resource Management from East Carolina University.

* May 1862 *******

In May 1862 Union forces moved against the Confederate capital Richmond. Jefferson Davis wrote to his wife that he was disappointed with the resolve of the people in Richmond. May 1862 also saw Unionist forces occupy Yorktown.

May 1st: General Butler occupied New Orleans. His administration of the city was to prove controversial.

May 2nd: Unionist forces were massed for an attack on Yorktown. General Johnston, the Confederate officer in charge of the city, knew he would not be able to make a stand against a mass attack and decided to evacuate the city.

May 3rd: Confederate forces started to evacuate Yorktown and withdraw to Richmond.

May 4th: The Army of the Potomac occupied Yorktown in Virginia.

May 5th: President Lincoln left Washington DC for a meeting with McClellan at Fortress Monroe. Secretary of War Stanton and Secretary of the Treasury Chase accompanied the President. A battle at Fort Magruder, Williamsburg, against a rearguard Confederate force protecting the withdrawal from Yorktown, led to a Union victory but at a cost – 456 dead, 1,400 wounded and 372 missing. Confederate losses were estimated at being between 1,000 and 1,700.

May 7th: Union forces sailed upriver to Eltham's Landing, Virginia, and landed near West Point. They came under fire from Confederate troops still withdrawing from Yorktown and lost 49 killed, 104 wounded and 41 missing.

May 9th: Lincoln met McClellan to discuss the course of the war. Confederate forces abandoned the important naval base at Norfolk. When Unionist forces arrived at the naval base, they found large amounts of stores and equipment.

May 11th: The 'CSS Virginia' (formally the 'USS Merrimac') was destroyed by the Confederates to stop it falling into the hands of the Unionists. It was too heavily armoured to be used on rivers and could not navigate the River James to help Confederate forces at Richmond.

May 12th: Lincoln announced that as ports Beaufort (North Carolina), Port Royal (South Carolina) and New Orleans were now in Federal hands, the blockade that they had been under would be lifted. Unionist forces occupied Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

May 13th: Many citizens in Richmond fled the city as Unionist forces approached.

May 15th: In New Orleans, the men of the city were kept in order by the presence of a large Unionist force. However, the women of the city made very public what they thought about the Unionist occupation of the city. Butler's response was to issue General Order Number 28. This stated "when any female shall, by word, gesture or movement insult or show contempt for any officer or soldier of the United States, she shall be regarded and held liable to be treated as a woman of the town plying her avocation."

May 18th: Suffolk, Virginia fell to Unionist forces.

May 19th: In a letter to his wife, Jefferson Davis, commented on the lack of resolve he had observed in those defending Richmond.

May 20th: Lincoln signed the Homestead Act. This act made available 160 acres of government land that would be handed over to a homesteader if he agreed to improve it for five years. Post-war America greatly benefited from this act as it encouraged many to migrate west.

May 21st: Advanced units of the Army of the Potomac were just eight miles from Richmond. However, McClellan was still cautious about attacking the Confederate capital, as he still believed that he did not have enough troops.

May 23rd: Union forces at Front Royal in the Shenandoah Valley suffered heavy casualties after being attacked by 'Stonewall' Jackson's men. Over 1,000 Union troops were killed or wounded out of a total force of 1,400 men. On the same day, the Confederates suffered a defeat at Lewisburg and lost over 200 men killed, wounded or missing.

May 24th: Lincoln ordered that 20,000 Unionist troops be sent to the Shenandoah Valley to eradicate the Confederate forces there.

May 25th: Lincoln gave McClellan an ultimatum – either attack Richmond or return with the Army of the Potomac to Washington DC to assist in the capital's defence.

May 29th: To counter Confederate success in the Shenandoah Valley, Unionist strength there was increased to 40,000 men. Ashland, a town just to the north of Richmond, was captured by the North.

May 31st: A major Confederate attack against the Army of the Potomac started at Fair Oaks. It was led by General Joseph Johnston. Towards the end of the day Johnston was seriously injured by shrapnel.

C.S.S. Virginia

The destruction of the CSS Virginia on May 11th was just one of many reverses experienced by Confederate forces in May 1862. As related in the following excerpt from a paper about John Taylor Wood, the Confederate hopes and visions of glory associated with the construction of the Virginia were short lived.

In January 1862, John Taylor Wood received orders to report to Commodore Franklin Forrest at the navy-yard in Norfolk. Wood was to be a lieutenant assigned to the C.S.S. Virginia then under construction from the remains of the frigate U.S.S. Merrimac. The Virginia was a revolutionary iron-clad vessel proposed by Lieutenant George M. Brooke and wholeheartedly backed by Stephen R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy. Mallory proposed the iron-clad as a technological leap which would allow the Confederate Navy to counter the numerical superiority of the Union Navy. Wood was aware of the limitations of the Virginia's refurbished steam engines, her deep draft, and her Noah's Ark maneuverability. He was also aware that the ten guns mounted behind the iron casemate would be nearly impervious to the heavy guns of the Union's wooden fleet. Wood wanted to be in the midst of the experiment and to witness the Virginia in action against the Union fleet at Hampton Roads. Stephen R. Mallory knew that the Virginia's potential uses as an offensive weapon were in the hands of the Franklin Buchanan and his officers. He knew that Buchanan and his officers must be bold and daring. Mallory was a visionary whose ideas were sometimes out of reach to the realities of the present day. He expected much from "an untrained and untried crew, in an untested vessel, pitted against the undoubted mettle of a Federal fleet in Hampton Roads." On March 7, 1862 on the day before the Virginia would venture forth from Gosport Navy Yard, Mallory sent a confidential letter to Flag Officer Buchanan. Mallory's ultimate objectives for the Virginia were ambitious and far beyond the confines of Hampton Roads. He wanted to know Buchanan's views on a Virginia attack against New York City. "Such an event would eclipse all the glories of the combats of the sea, would place every man in it preeminently high, and would strike a blow from which the enemy could never recover. Peace would inevitably follow." Mallory would find boldness and daring in one of the Virginia's officers, John Taylor Wood. In the South's quest for independence, Mallory and Taylor would be linked in numerous bold and daring campaigns.

Wood wrote the following about the March 8, 1862 engagements in Hampton Roads between the Virginia and the Union wooden fleet, and on March 9 between the Virginia and the Monitor. It was, "in some respects the most momentous naval conflict ever witnessed. No battle was ever more widely discussed or produced a greater sensation. It revolutionized the navies of the world." The Virginia inflicted severe damage on the wooden ships but had been fought to a draw by the Monitor. After both ships withdrew for repair and refit, Buchanan sent Wood with a dispatch that informed Mallory of the two-day conflict. Buchanan also, "directed me to proceed to Richmond with it and the flag of the Congress, and make a verbal report of the action, condition of the Virginia, etc." Wood reported to Mallory and they went to President Davis's office where Wood related the events to the gathered members of the government. "As to the future, I said that in the Monitor we had met our equal, and that the results of another engagement would be very doubtful." That Wood was sent to Richmond to report the events showed that his observations were valued by Buchanan. While Wood was excited by the historical significance of the conflict, he was able to give an even-handed appraisal of the actions. Wood's detachment from the growing excitement about the capabilities of the Virginia made his value as a reliable observer for Mallory and Jefferson Davis increasing important.

Wood returned to the Virginia and participated in her future actions against the Union fleet. As he observed, the unreliability of the Virginia's engines, the resulting slowness, and her depth of draft limited the ability to bring the Monitor into battle. The Virginia protected Norfolk but her survival was dependent upon the Confederate army's continued presence in the city. In April 1862, the threat of McClellan's Peninsula Campaign caused General Joseph E. Johnston to order the abandonment of Norfolk. The Virginia was too heavy to proceed up the James River to Richmond. Efforts to lighten her failed; hence, the navy ran the Virginia aground near Carney Island and set her ablaze on May 11, 1862. Wood and Lieutenant Catesby ap R. Jones were the last to leave the ship that had generated such enthusiasm for the Southern cause.

The weapon platform technology advanced by the Virginia was beyond the mechanical propulsion means available to the Confederate Navy. Mallory's dream of an attack on New York City never came to anything; however, John Taylor Wood did attempt to carry out an attack on that city when he took the Tallahassee and the war north in late 1864.

Genealogy 101 – Digging into the Past: Finding Your Civil War Ancestors

Becky Sawyer and the Census

To those who attended the April meeting, Becky shared the basic steps that should be taken to trace the roots of a Civil War ancestor. If you were lucky, you started with your ancestor's name, age or year of birth, and a location – state and town. If you were not lucky, you worked backwards and with names you knew and used census data to follow your ancestors back to the Civil War era. The 1850 Census was especially valuable – the 1850 Census was the first census that provided the names of the all the people who lived in a particular household.

Among other sources, Becky mentioned the following as possible information about your Union or Confederate veteran.

Do the math: During the early days of the war, men were usually found to be born between 1826 and 1842. As the war continued, older and younger men were drawn into the conflict. Especially in the South, the Senior Reserves and the Junior Reserves were prominent as the Confederacy called upon "cradle to the grave" enlistments.

1890 Veterans Census was a source (Ancestry.com) of much information about Union Veterans. This was the only portion of the 1890 Census that was not destroyed in a 1921 fire.

1910 Census was the first to have an indicator that a man was a Union or Confederate veteran.

Geography – Be aware that new counties could have been created after the war. Becky gave an example of Pender County being created from New Hanover County in 1870. She also shared a map of North Carolina as it existed between 1861 and 1865.

Regimental Histories – Both Union and Confederate veterans contributed to regimental histories in the years following the war. Official Regimental histories and individual soldier memoirs have been helpful in searches for men in a particular unit.

North Carolina Resources – The State of North Carolina began Roster of North Carolina Troops during the 100th anniversary of the war. This effort continued as new volumes are still being completed at the 150th anniversary.

Public Libraries – Many Public Libraries have genealogy rooms or access to on-line databases that can be helpful. The good thing about Public Libraries – they are usually helpful with suggestions and your tax dollars actually work for your quest.

The Internet has enhanced the ability of individuals to access huge amounts of information from their computers. The old days involved microfilm, microfiche, and paper records and these sources remain valuable tools; however, on-line databases can make your search much easier. Becky shared sites, both subscription based and free sites, that are good places to begin your search.

Subscription Based Sites:

Ancestry.com - $22.95/month, $155.40/year

Fold3.com - $11.95/month, $79.95/year

Civil War Database: www.civilwardata.com - $25.00/year

Free Sites:

Port of New York, source of immigrant records, www.castlegarden.org (1820-1913)

Immigrant Ships Transcription – <http://www.immigrantships.net/>

Soldiers and Sailors Database (NPS site) – <http://www.itd.nps.gov/cwss/>

Find A Grave.com – www.findagrave.com

Internment.net – www.internment.net

Family Search.org – Sources for various records (marriage, census, death – US & Europe) – www.familysearch.org

GenWeb projects by state & counties – <http://www.ncgenweb.us/>

State Archives or State Libraries – www.nclive.org Remote access to state library or local libraries with your library card number – Heritage Quest (census records, Rev War pensions, Freeman's Bureau) Dyer's Compendium (Union Regimental Histories) – www.civilwararchive.com/regim.htm

Other tips that Becky offered included:

Document, Document, Document – Always write down the source of information you found and where you found it. Nothing is as frustrating as have something and not having a clue as to where you got it.

Brick walls – You will encounter problems and this is where you need to get creative.

-Try variations of the spelling of a particular name. Names were Americanized: Dryer, Dreyer, Drier, etc. In my family's case, Kilit became Killet and finally Killette. (Can you imagine being called Private Kilit?)

-Think of other links – siblings, parents

-Sons of Union Veterans, Daughters of Union Veterans

-Sons of Confederate Veterans, United Daughters of the Confederacy

Smiling Becky – Good job!

Finally, the last tip for your search and potentially the most valuable is: Becky loves this genealogy stuff, she works at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site, and she enjoys helping people find their Civil War ancestors. Seriously, there are records and databases available at Fort Fisher which could help you shorten your journey.

I believe I am going to make another trip to Fort Fisher.

 Trivia Questions for May 2012 *****

1 – Who owned the Modern Greece? The Modern Greece was built by the Richardson's firm of Stockton, England during 1859. According to Lloyd's Register, she was a 753 ton ship, 210 feet in length, 29 feet in breadth, and drew 17 feet and 2 inches of water. She was not designed as a blockade runner and her deep draft made her ill-suited for running the bar into the Cape Fear River. On June 27, 1862, she paid the ultimate price for her design deficiencies.

The Modern Greece was owned by one of the first British companies that attempted to challenge the Union blockade. Zachariah C. Pearson was a ship owner, merchant, and the mayor of Hull, England. Pearson loaded his ships with supplies provided by Confederate agent, Caleb Huse. While accounts show that many blockade running enterprises reaped huge profits, Zachariah Pearson was not among their membership. Between May 4 and August 4, 1862, Pearson sent seven ships to run through the blockade – six were captured and the Modern Greece ran aground. By the end of 1862, Pearson and Company had declared bankruptcy.

The blockade of the Southern states was officially ended by President Andrew Johnson on June 23, 1865. The first successful run was by the Bermuda into Savannah on April 18, 1861, the last run was by the Lark out of Galveston on May 24, 1865. More than 300 steamers challenged the Union blockade. Of the approximate 1,300 attempts, more than 1,000 were successful. The average blockade runner made four runs (two round trips) during her lifetime. Per Stephen R. Wise, some 136 blockade runners were captured and another 85 were destroyed.

2 - What especially valuable articles were recovered from the Modern Greece and how were they used by the Confederates at Fort Fisher? According to Colonel William Lamb:

Shortly after taking command of Fort Fisher I recovered from the wreck of the blockade runner, the British Steamship MODERN GREECE, four 12 pounder Whitworth rifle guns, with a range of five miles. With these guns, we made the U.S. Blockading fleet remove their anchorage from two and a half miles to five miles from the fort. So many vessels were saved with these guns that they soon had a reputation throughout the South, and three of them were transferred to other commands, two going to Virginia.

Source: Leslie S. Bright, The Blockade Runner Modern Greece and her Cargo [Raleigh, NC: Archaeology Section, Division of Archives and History, North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources, 1977], 14.

3 – On May 6, 1864, the C.S.S. Raleigh ventured through New Inlet and for a short interval broke the Union Blockade. What was the relationship between the Modern Greece and the Raleigh? Other than the fact that both vessels ran aground, it was thought that the engines removed from the Modern Greece were used to power the Raleigh.

Source: Leslie S. Bright, The Blockade Runner Modern Greece and her Cargo [Raleigh, NC: Archaeology Section, Division of Archives and History, North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources, 1977], 18-19.

4 – In Genealogy 101, Becky Sawyer discussed the immigration records that were available for research purposes. Where were the three major ports through which many of the new Americans entered the United States? New York, Baltimore, and New Orleans were the major gateways for the immigrants to enter and begin a new life.

Genealogy 101 – Digging into the Past: Finding Your Civil War Ancestors

Veteran Reunion

Have you ever wondered whose picture that was in your great-grandma's picture album? Have you ever wondered if any of your ancestors fought in the Civil War? Many of us have probably heard some family history that provided rather sketchy details about our ancestors and their whereabouts during the war. How can these sketchy details be utilized to learn more about that mysterious relative?

The April meeting of the CFCWRT will provide those who have ever wondered about their ancestors and their involvement in the war with the opportunity to learn from an accomplished genealogical researcher. CFCWRT member, Becky Sawyer, will provide a guide on the methods required to do basis genealogical research. Her presentation will include handouts, genealogy website information, and some tricks of the trade to work your way around roadblocks encountered while performing basis research.

Becky Rolwes Sawyer was born in St. Louis, Missouri and raised in the suburbs of St. Louis County. She graduated in 1996 from Southeast Missouri State University with a BS in Historic Preservation and a minor in History. Upon graduation, Becky began work at the North Carolina Historic Site at Bentonville as a program's coordinator and historian. Becky worked closely with the North Carolina Civil War Trails program in Johnston County and at the Bentonville Battlefield site. While working at Bentonville, Becky completed her MA in Public History from UNCW in 2001. During 2006, Becky began working in her present position at the North Carolina Historic Site at Fort Fisher.

Becky's own words provide an idea of the passion for the subject that she will address at the April meeting:

My passion for genealogy began at a young age. I do profess that I was a genealogy geek and people seemed to be in disbelief that some one of my age would be interested in "dead people." I learned around the age of 8 how to load the microfilm reader in the basement of the St. Louis City Library genealogy room..... Never knew I had Civil War relatives until I started digging into the past. I had six ancestors who fought in the American Civil War, all for the Union.

NOTE: Contact the Federal Point Historic Preservation Society (910-458-0502) for the schedule of next year’s walk.

A vintage Fonvielle quote exclaimed the beauty and importance of the surviving fortifications, “It seems an oxymoron to talk about the beauty of wartime defenses, but the Confederate earthworks are absolutely magnificent.”

On March 23, 2012, several members of the CFCWRT took advantage of the free lectures and tours sponsored by the VMI Museum, the Stonewall Jackson House, Lee Chapel and the Lexington Visitor Center. John Munroe, Lance Bevins, David Cooke, Dale Lear, and Roger Lear journeyed to Lexington where they absorbed a massive dose of Lexington's Civil War. Among the lectures they were able to attend were: "Washington College in the Civil War," "Virginia Military Institute in the Civil War: The Institute Will be Heard from Today," "An Overview of Stonewall Jackson's 1862 Valley Campaign."

According to Dale, the sight of the 1500 member VMI Cadet Corps in parade formation was worth the visit. Then again, Dale said the same about the Lee Chapel, Traveler (with apple), the Stonewall Jackson house, the George C. Marshall Museum, and the entire trip.

* April 1862 *******

In April 1862 General McClellan finally made a decisive move against Richmond. April also saw the first move that would lead to the outlawing of slavery across America when Lincoln declared the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The act spurred on the Confederacy in its belief that the government in Washington was doing what it could to destroy the way of life in the South. Lincoln's action served to enflame the American Civil War even more.

April 1st: McClellan had a force of three regiments facing 12,000 Confederate soldiers at Fortress Monroe. In total McClellan had a total force of 112,000 men.

April 3rd: The Senate outlawed slavery in the District of Columbia. This was seen to set the precedent that slavery should be abolished in any area over which the Federal government had jurisdiction. There were only 63 slaves in the District but the act set the wheels in motion for the abolition of slavery in all areas controlled by the Federal government.

April 4th: Union forces started a move on Yorktown – the start of McClellan's campaign in Virginia. The Confederate general Johnston had 17,000 men under his command along an eight-mile front but faced 100,000 Union troops.

April 5th: McClellan's force continued its push down the Virginia peninsula.

April 6th: 40,000 Confederate soldiers attacked a major Union base at Shiloh. They took the Union force by surprise and used to their good the fact that the Unionist force had not built any major defensive lines around their camp as they believed it would be perceived as a sign of weakness by the South. The fighting was fierce but by nightfall the North had managed to bring up reserves so that they had 54,000 men to the Confederates 34,000.

April 7th: The North launched a counter-offensive at Shiloh. Like the previous day the fighting was fierce but gun ships on the River Tennessee supported the Unionists. "Bloody Shiloh" had no obvious winning side and historians view the battle as a 'draw'. But the losses suffered by both sides far outweighed any previous battle. The North lost 1754 killed, 8408 wounded and 2885 captured while the South lost 1728 killed, 8102 wounded and 959 men taken prisoner. Of the two sides, the North was better able to cope with such losses so their media portrayed it as a Northern victory.

April 8th: 3,000 Confederate soldiers were taken prisoner at Island Number 10 on the Mississippi River.

April 11th: The House of Representatives, in support of the Senate, passed a bill to ban slavery in the District of Columbia. The Unionists captured Fort Pulaski in the mouth of the harbour at Savannah after an eighteen-hour bombardment.

April 16th: President Lincoln signed a bill that outlawed slavery in the District of Columbia. President Davis signed a bill that made all males living in the Confederacy aged between 18 and 35 liable for military service.

April 18th: A Unionist naval fleet assembled at Ship Island in the Mississippi Delta, to begin its move against New Orleans. The route it was scheduled to take was fraught with dangers not least the forts at Jackson and St Philip, which could muster over 170 rifled 63-pounder cannon. The Unionist fleet was under the command of Commodore David Farragut and it carried 15,000 troops who were tasked with taking New Orleans.

April 21st: After three days of bombardment and being hit by over 4,000 rounds Forts Jackson and St. Philip were still functioning.

April 22nd: A Confederate deserter, however, confirmed to Farragut that the damage to both forts had been great. Farragut decided to try to 'run' the forts with his fleet. He told his subordinates that his philosophy was "conquer or be conquered".

April 24th: By dawn of this day, the Federal naval fleet had passed both forts. However, his fleet had lost 37 men killed and 171 wounded. Farragut steamed to within 18 miles (by river) to New Orleans.

April 25th: Fort Macon in North Carolina fell to Unionist troops. 450 Confederate soldiers were taken prisoner. Farragut's fleet arrived in New Orleans and claimed the city.

April 28th: Forts St. Philip and Jackson formally surrendered to Union forces.

Shiloh: The Hard Reality of War

On April 6, 1862, Confederate troops lead by Albert Sidney Johnston struck at Union forces that occupied the positions near Pittsburg Landing on the Tennessee River. The surprise attack against the unprepared Union defenders almost overpowered U.S. Grant's entire command. A determined Union defense in the "Hornet's Nest" gave the time necessary for the Union troops to hold until reinforcements arrived. General Johnston died of a wound he suffered on the battlefield and he was replaced by P.G.T. Beauregard. The fighting continued until darkness ended the vicious struggle. During the night, Grant received reinforcements and on the morning of April 7th, the Union counteroffensive reversed the Confederate advantage. Beauregard was forced to retire his smaller army from the field.

The two day battle resulted in more than 23,000 casualties and set the stage for the increasingly deadly contest.

To Strike a Blow: The Burnside Expedition of 1862

Jeff Bockert

Our March Speaker, Mr. Jeff Bockert, began his presentation about Union General Ambrose Burnside (of “Sideburns” fame) who made his debut during the Civil War as a Colonel at First Manassas, where he “creditably” led his brigade in a flank attack. Shortly after the engagement, Burnside was promoted to Brigadier General and placed in command of an expedition to coastal Carolina. Mr. Bockert indicated that there were several main objectives of this expedition: To capture Roanoke Island (which controlled Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds); close the Dismal Swamp canal, thereby cutting supplies to Norfolk; capture New Bern, Beaufort and Morehead City and to reduce Fort Macon, to destroy the railroad bridges of the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad (which was Richmond's main supply route); also, if feasible, to hold Goldsboro and then continue on to Raleigh.

Attack on Fort Macon

Mr. Bockert went on to detail some of the problems Burnside faced: not enough shipping – New York City ferry and tugboats were finally obtained. Seafaring men from the New England states were also sought after and were hard to come by as the Port Royal expedition had already been outfitted with such men.

Overcoming these obstacles, Burnside gathered 13,000 troops and after a difficult sea trip, reached his destination. Soldiers were landed out of the range of the guns on Roanoke in February 1862 and Burnside was quickly successful due to the lack of Confederate troops on the island. All eyes turned to the reduction of New Bern (which was to be used as a base of operations) and Fort Macon. In mid-March, the Union army was again on the move to New Bern and by the end of March, had taken the city, as well as Beaufort and Morehead City.

By the end of that month, Fort Macon (the last entrance to the Outer Banks still not in Federal hands), was invested and by the end of April, the fort was in Union hands as well. Jeff pointed out that General John Foster had once served at Fort Macon and knew exactly where the powder magazine was. Artillery fire was then directed against the magazine and was in danger of exploding, hence the fort's surrender! As Burnside prepared to gather his forces and continue on to Goldsboro, General Burnside was ordered to the Peninsula to aid General McClellan,

The results of the expedition were mixed (the locks were not closed, but the capture of Norfolk by the Federals relieved the pressure to close the canal) but with a firm lodgment on the coast of North Carolina, the Union army and navy would remain more than just a thorn in the side of North Carolina and the Confederacy. The U.S. Navy used the area as a coaling station and in December 1862, General

Foster, now in command, launched an attack on Goldsboro and successfully destroyed the railroad bridge at that point. He was not able to hold the city and was forced to retreat, but throughout the remainder of the war, several more raids on the road showed that an attack could be made at any point and at anytime along the vast “no man’s land” of coastal North Carolina.

* New Estimate Raises Civil War Death Toll *******

At our January 2011 Meeting, Josh Howard, Research Historian for the North Carolina Office of Archives and History, outlined the effort underway for the North Carolina Civil War Sesquicentennial to reanalyze the number of North Carolinians, Confederate and Union, who served and died during the Civil War. The study by the North Carolina researcher was not the only effort being undertaken to reexamine the significance of the Civil War deaths on the decades that followed the war.

In an article that appeared in The New York Times on April 2, 2012, Dr. J. David Hacker, a demographic historian from Binghamton University in New York, has used newly digitized census records from the 19th century to recalculate the Civil War’s death toll. Dr. Hacker raised the estimate of deaths by more than 20 percent – from 618,222 to 750,000.

Josh Howard will speak at the North Carolina Military Historical Society Symposium on May 12, 2012 in Raleigh. It will be interesting to learn the current findings of the two studies and how they may have differed.

 Trivia Questions March 2012 *****

Joe George was the winner of the February Trivia question and its dinner prize. Joe quickly and correctly identified Brig. Gen. James Dearing.

Dearing was born at Otterburn in Campbell County Virginia. James Dearing attended West Point and would likely have graduated in 1862 had the war not divided the country. Like most of the Southern Cadets he resigned from the Academy. His allegiance to his family and state he became a junior officer with the Washington Artillery along with Thomas Rosser. His leadership skills gave him notable recognition as he moved up in rank from 2nd Lieutenant, Captain and to Major. He married Roxanna Birchett, of Dinwiddie Va., they would have one daughter Mary Lucretia Dearing.

Leading the charge of the Laurel Brigade at High Bridge he is believed to have engaged in duello with Gen. Theodore Read. After Gen. Read fell wounded from his horse, Dearing was shot in the chest, the ball passing through both lungs. Gen. Dearing was taken from the battlefield to the home of James Watson, "Chatham." After the fight Col. Elijah Viers White went to see him, as White entered the room where Dearing rested, Gen. Dearing who could hardly speak, took Gen. Rosser's hand, pointing to his collar insignia to gesture that Col White be promoted in his stead.

Mortally wounded, Dearing was taken to the Ladies Aid Hospital, in Lynchburg where he passed away April 23, 1865.

At 25 years old, he was the last Confederate General to die of wounds received in battle during the war.

* March 1862 *******

March 1862 finally saw McClellan make some kind of move against Richmond - some two months after being ordered to do so by Lincoln. In March, Jefferson Davis appointed Robert E. Lee to be his military advisor.

March 1st: Richmond was put under martial law while a number of prominent citizens were arrested for proclaiming that the war should be brought to an end.

March 2nd: Confederate forces abandoned Columbus, Kentucky, seen as a major Confederate stronghold but one that was vulnerable to attack after the fall of Fort Donelson.

March 3rd: General Halleck accused General Grant of “neglect of duty, inefficiency and drunkenness”. McClellan gave Halleck permission to arrest Grant if he thought it was necessary. This argument was the result of Grant’s popularity in the North after the capture of Fort Donelson, which Halleck claimed the credit for coupled with Halleck’s lack of any real progress in Missouri.

March 4th: General Robert E Lee was appointed military advisor to Jefferson Davis. Halleck removed Grant from his command. Halleck was appointed commander of all the Union’s western armies – his reward for the victory at Fort Donelson.

March 6th: Lincoln asked Congress to approve Federal funding to assist states thinking about introducing emancipation of slave legislation. The Confederate Congress agreed that a scorched earth policy could be used in Virginia if Unionist forces broke through. The aim was to ensure that no cotton or tobacco fell into the hands of the North.

March 7th: McClellan moved the Army of the Potomac into Virginia. His target was the Confederate force based at Manassas.

March 8th: Lincoln finally agreed with McClellan's plan to invade Virginia from the sea. However, the President did insist that sufficient men had to be left behind to defend the capital. The Confederates suffered a heavy defeat at the Battle of Pea Ridge losing nearly 800 men with 1000 captured. The former 'USS Merrimac' – now the Confederate 'Virginia' – inflicted major losses on a small Union naval fleet of three ships resulting in the North losing 2 ships and 250 men at Hampton Roads. Only the night saved the third ship. The 'Virginia' was a heavily armoured ironclad that stood up to six full broadsides with little damage done to her. However on the evening of the 8th the 'USS Monitor' entered the Hampton Roads.

March 9th: The Army of the Potomac moved off in search of a Confederate force they thought was at Rappahannock – but it was not and they returned to their base at Alexandria without having made contact with the enemy. The 'USS Monitor' engaged the 'Virginia' at Hampton Roads. After a series of attacks on one another neither saw an opportunity to win and both broke off the engagement. Both ships were simply too heavily armoured to be susceptible to the firepower of the other.

March 11th: Another War Order by Lincoln stated that McClellan was now only commander of the Army of the Potomac. This was a temporary move only to ensure that McClellan could concentrate all his energy on a successful campaign in Virginia.

March 13th: Union forces captured $1 million of Confederate supplies at Point Pleasant, Missouri.

March 15th: Grant was handed a command once again – he was placed in charge of Unionist forces in Tennessee.

March 17th: McClellan started his campaign to attack Virginia from the coast by moving his troops to Fortress Monroe.

March 19th: The South puts into place a plan to stop the North taking two vital rail lines – the Chattanooga to Georgia and the Corinth to Memphis lines. If the North took either line, they would have an easier route into the South's heartland.

March 23rd: The Battle of Winchester was fought (in the South this was known as the Battle of Kernstown). The South took heavy casualties with 270 killed and as many as 1000 missing. The North suffered 103 killed with 400 wounded and missing. A large Unionist force gathered at Camp Shiloh and made ready for an attack on Corinth, Mississippi. As the Confederates expected such an attack, their forces in Corinth were being increased.

March 24th: Lincoln became convinced that the South was about to launch an attack on Washington DC and ordered troops who were to have supported McClellan's campaign in Virginia to remain in the capital.

March 29th: The Confederates continued their build-up of men at Corinth, Mississippi, and waited for the North to attack. The size of the force gathered in Corinth showed that the South was not prepared to let the town fall to the North in view of its importance with regards to the two vital rail lines identified by the South.

One of the most beautiful letters written during the Civil War was the letter that Major Sullivan Ballou, of the 2nd Rhode Island Regiment, supposedly wrote to his wife, Sarah, just prior to the July 21, 1861 battle at Manassas, Virginia. Ken Burn's Civil War documentary made Ballou's letter and the haunting musical backtrack, "Ashokan Farewell" known to many Civil War enthusiasts.

July 14, 1861

Camp Clark, Washington

My very dear Sarah:

The indications are very strong that we shall move in a few days - perhaps tomorrow. And lest I should not be able to write you again I feel impelled to write a few lines that may fall under your eye when I am no more. I have no misgivings about, or lack of confidence in the cause in which I am engaged, and my courage does not halt or falter. I know how American Civilization now leans upon the triumph of the government and how great a debt we owe to those who went before us through the blood and suffering of the Revolution. And I am willing - perfectly willing - to lay down all my joys in this life, to help maintain this government, and to pay that debt. Sarah, my love for you is deathless, it seems to bind me with mighty cables that nothing but omnipotence can break; and yet my love of Country comes over me like a strong wind and bears me irresistibly with all those chains to the battlefield. The memory of all the blissful moments I have enjoyed with you come crowding over me, and I feel most deeply grateful to God and you, that I have enjoyed them for so long. And how hard it is for me to give them up and burn to ashes the hopes and future years, when, God willing, we might still have lived and loved together, and see our boys grown up to honorable manhood around us.

If I do not return, my dear Sarah, never forget how much I loved you, nor that when my last breath escapes me on the battle field, it will whisper your name...

Forgive my many faults, and the many pains I have caused you. How thoughtless, how foolish I have sometimes been!...

But, O Sarah, if the dead can come back to this earth and flit unseen around those they love, I shall always be with you, in the brightest day and in the darkest night... always, always. And when the soft breeze fans your cheek, it shall be my breath, or the cool air your throbbing temple, it shall be my spirit passing by.

Sarah do not mourn me dead; think I am gone and wait for me, for we shall meet again...

Sullivan's premonition of his death proved correct. Ballou died of the wounds he received during the battle on July 21, 1861.

Ballou's body, along with those of other Rhode Island men, was later buried on the battlefield.

On the morning of March 19, 1862, Rhode Island Governor William B. Sprague and a party of 71 men left Washington City to recover the bodies of their Rhode Island dead. They had been spurred to undertake this journey by newspaper headlines that had appeared in the spring of 1862: Molested Graves! Burned Bodies! Beheaded Skulls! Skull-And- Bone Souvernirs!

Sprague and the party were led by Josiah W. Richardson, a private in the 2nd Rhode Island. Richardson had remained behind to help care for the wounded and he would later view the burial of Ballou and others. Richardson thought he could find the location of the graves of Colonel Slocum and Major Ballou. Once on the battlefield, soldiers dug at the spot Richardson indicated. They failed to locate a body.

A local girl saw that soldiers and asked them if they were looking for "Cunnel Slook?" Was she referring to Colonel Slocum?

"Yassuh, dat's it," she said. "Dat his name. Well, you ain't go' find him. Dem Georgia boys dug him up weeks ago. Dey cut his head off and carried it away and dey done burnt his body down in de hollow dere."

After finding the charred bones and articles of clothing that remained from the fire, a soldier who knew Slocum said that the items of clothing did not belong to the colonel. The body remains were those of Major Ballou. Sprague and the others dutifully recovered Ballou's remaining fragments and those bodies of the others from Rhode Island for return to their native state.

Subsequent investigation among the people who lived in the area confirmed the girl's story. The locals also reported that soldiers of the 21st Georgia had done the deed because of the rough handling the Georgians of the 8th Georgia had received from Slocum's command. Unfortunately for Ballou, the revengeful act had been against the wrong officer. Governor Sprague later testified about the recovery expedition and its gruesome findings before the U.S. Congress Committee on the Conduct of the War. And what became of Sarah Hart Shumway Ballou? Hopefully, Sarah and Sullivan did meet again, but without the pains inflicted by this terrible war. She was twenty-four years old mother of two young boys when Sullivan died. Sarah never remarried and lived with her son, William, in New Jersey until her 1917 death at the age of eighty years.

.....But, O Sarah, if the dead can come back to this earth and flit unseen around those they love, I shall always be with you, in the brightest day and in the darkest night... always, always.....

 February Meeting *****

Mike Priest gave the audience at our annual dinner meeting a somewhat controversial interpretation of one of the most famous battle scenes in history. With exhaustive research for Into the Fight: Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg, Mike used a careful study of the battlefield terrain, calculations of unit frontages, eyewitness accounts, and the casualty reports of the various Confederate units to form his thesis of the actions of July 3, 1863. Mike laid aside the romantic notion of the gallant charge of all the committed Confederates into the carnage of the hell that was created by the Union army's Cemetery Ridge defensive line. Plain and simple, many of the Confederate soldiers recognized the futility of the charge and they chose to not go forward.

Armistead and the Glorious Charge

Mike disputed the usually quoted 15,000 men who began the charge. His calculations put the number at approximately 11,500 available for the assault. Of this number, about 5,000 in narrowing battle line even reached the Emmitsburg Road. This number was simply too few to break and hold the Union position. The Confederates made it into the Union lines, but they could not hold or expand their momentary gains.

Mike Priest

Why did many of the veteran troops of the Army of Northern Virginia fail to attempt the charge that Robert E. Lee thought would win the battle and the war? These were men who had given Lee victories over a numerically superior opponent on many occasions. They had achieved success through hard action and they had learned from the mistakes of their enemy (Fredericksburg). They also learned from their own past assaults on massed artillery (Malvern Hill). They were veterans who made a decision to fight on another day when the odds were more in their favor.

What about the 5,000 who made the final assault on the Union line. From Mike's article that appeared in the Number 6 Issue 1998 of the North & South magazine, page 52:

The combined numbers of the wounded captured and unwounded captured (discounting Brockenborough's 3 captured) accounts for 55% of the 5,000 who attempted to carry the charge to its end.Casualties among the men who crossed the Emmitsburg Road ranged from approximately 53% for Lowrance's Brigade to 100% for Fry's and Marshall's Brigades..... Armistead lost about 98% of his stalwarts between the road and the Angle. Overall, of the 5,000 who attempted to complete the charge, no more than 20% and perhaps less, returned to their own lines. The fact that 1,527 of them (30%) surrendered indicates that they knew when not to press the odds any further. When faced with annihilation or living, they chose to live.

Mike's Into the Fight: Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg provides the specific details that he used to support his thesis.

* John Dooley Confederate Soldier *******

John Dooley was mentioned in Mike Priest's presentation for Dooley's journal entries as a member of the 1st Virginia Infantry (Kemper's Brigade) during the Battle of Gettysburg. The journal began as Dooley joined the 1st Virginia prior to Second Manassas. Dooley fought his first battle at Manassas and recorded his innermost feelings as to what he felt during combat. At South Mountain, Dooley related that only his pride kept him with his comrades. Dooley's entry about Pickett's Charge (where he was wounded and captured within thirty feet of the guns) was especially revealing:

I tell you, there is no romance in making one of these charges. You might think so from reading 'Charlie O'Malley.' That prodigy of valour, or in reading of any other gallant knight who would as little think of riding over gunners and sich like as they would of eating a dozen oysters. But when you rise to your feet as we did today, I tell you the enthusiasm of ardent breasts in many cases ain't there, and instead of burning to avenge the insults of our country, families and altars and firesides, the thought is most frequently, Oh, if I could just come out of this charge safely how thankful would I be!

Dooley recorded what many men must have felt but were reluctant to share.

 Trivia Question Answers March 2012 *****

1 - On February 7, 1862, Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside and Flag Officer Louis M. Goldsborough led a combine Union force of 15,000 men and 100 naval vessels to a landing on Roanoke Island. Who were the Confederate Army and Navy commanders who opposed this invasion? Col. Henry M. Shaw, with approximately 3,000 men, and Flag Officer William F. Lynch, with seven gunboats, opposed the Union invasion force. As had been the alarm felt by many in the North Carolina government, this small contingent of Confederates was no match for the invasion force.

2 - After the fall of Roanoke, Burnside turned his attention on New Bern and the capture of much of eastern North Carolina. Confederate Gen. Lawrence O'B. Branch and 4,500 poorly equipped and trained forces opposed Burnside and his 12,000 well equipped soldiers. The Battle of New Bern took place on March 14, 1862. After a failed defense, Branch and his force retreated to Kinston. While many North Carolina newspapers argued that many of the Confederates were guilty of cowardice, these two men would achieve further fame in the continuing conflict. Who were the men and what were their fates? Col. Zebulon B. Vance and Lt. Col. Henry King Burgwyn, Jr. Vance would achieve fame for his purported actions at New Bern and would use his notoriety to pursue a political career. As my 4th grade teacher told me years ago, Zebulon B. Vance became our beloved War Governor. Burgwyn (VMI Class of 1861) became the "Boy" Colonel of the 26th North Carolina and effectively led the 26th until his death at Gettysburg on July 1, 1863.

3 – As Burnside’s soldiers advanced inland from Roanoke Island, residents of one town decided on a course of action similar to the Russian’s actions as Napoleon advanced on Moscow. What was the town and what actions did the townspeople pursue? Elizabeth City was set on fire by some of its panicky citizens. Luckily for the town, only about two blocks actually burned.

Source: <http://www.learnnc.org/lp/editions/nchist-civilwar/4604>, accessed February 20, 2012.

4 - How long did Pickett’s Charge last? The artillery barrage began at 1:00pm and continued for about an hour. At 1:50pm, Pickett’s men began the advance. By 3:00pm, the Confederate force that had attacked the center of the Union line had reached its high tide. The Confederates had failed to achieve the victory that Lee had wanted. `

5 - Who was responsible for the Union artillery during Pickett’s charge? Brig. General Henry Hunt. Hunt made sure his artillery reserves were available and supplied to counter the Confederates barrage. As he had a Malvern Hill on July 1, 1862, Henry Hunt handled his artillery with frightful effect upon the Confederate soldiers who assaulted the Union lines.

6 – According to Arthur Fremantle, what was Lee’s reaction to the failure of Pickett’s Charge? “This has been a sad day for us, Colonel – a sad day; but we can’t expect always to gain victories.” Lt. Col. Fremantle of the Coldstream Guards recorded his observations of the Confederacy in his book, Three Months in the Southern States. His observations at Gettysburg and his feelings upon meeting many of the commanding officers of the Confederacy led him to believe that the South and its gallant people would never be conquered by the North.

 February Program *****

John Michael Priest

Mike Priest, scholar, author, teacher, and certified Civil War battlefield guide, will join us on February 9th at the Madeline Suites on the UNCW campus. Mike's presentation will be entitled Into the Fight, Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg.

Mike provided the following summary of his presentation:

I discovered while researching what I thought was an easy book, that a considerable number of the Confederates, for whatever reason, other than being wounded, decided that "discretion was the better part of valor." I also could not verify the horrendous casualties they allegedly suffered after conducting a study of the nominal list of casualties for all the regiments but those from Tennessee and Arkansas. For years, I wondered if I would have crossed that field knowing full well what lay ahead. The story of the charge has been distorted by myth. The tactical presentation you will receive will put to rest the history we have been taught.

Into the Fight

Mike was born in Georgetown, DC. He received a B.A. in History and Secondary Education from Loyola College (Baltimore) and a M.A. in Social Sciences from Hood College (Frederick, Maryland). Mike taught World History, Government, U.S. History, Civil War History, and Psychology for the Washington County Board of Education from 1980 – 2011. CFCWRT members at Pamplin Park

On January 18th, Lance Bevins, Dan Geddie, John Munroe, Dale Lear, and Tim Winstead headed north for a visit to the Petersburg and Richmond areas of Virginia. On Wednesday, they toured the Blandford Church and the Petersburg National Battlefield. The church was located at the Blandford Cemetery and each of its Tiffany windows honored the war dead of a southern state. The battlefield sites included the Crater, Fort Stedman, and other scenes of the nine month long siege that strangled the Confederacy.

Blandford Church's Tiffany Window
Honoring South Carolina's Soldiers

January 19th was the anniversary of the birth of Robert E. Lee. The group was privileged to enter the vault and research room at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond. Robert E. Lee's sword and uniform, Wade Hampton's cavalry sword, and Joe Wheeler's pistol were a few of the numerous items they were shown. The Research Librarian shared a few of the items that had been saved by the ladies who started the MOC. Lee's General Orders No. 9 was, as it had been on April 10, 1865, emotionally moving and remarkable. "After four years of arduous service, marked by unsurpassed courage and fortitude....." The MOC was remarkable, not just for the collection of artifacts of the famous, but for the artifacts and records of the lower level officers and regular soldiers.

The 20th found the group at Pamplin Park and the site of the April 2, 1865 breakthrough by Union forces that led to the Lee's surrender at Appomattox. NOTE: Wilson Greene, executive director at Pamplin Park, will speak about the breakthrough to the Brunswick Civil War Round Table on February 13, 2012 at Trinity UMC in Southport at 6:30.

* February 1862 *******

February 1862 did not witness a massed Unionist attack on Richmond despite the orders of Lincoln. However, a major Confederate fort was captured by Grant's men - a move that boosted morale in the capital.

February 1st: Confederate generals became aware that Union forces were massing along the line of the Mississippi River and planned to expect a major Union offensive with the targets thought to be either Fort Henry or Fort Donelson.

February 2nd: Confederate intelligence indicated that the Union's ability to move its men along river systems was not good. However, the Confederates were unaware of Lincoln's order – to attack regardless.

February 3rd: Lincoln again asked McClellan to make a major move for Richmond using the Army of the Potomac. McClellan again showed his usual reluctance to do anything without having it precisely mapped out first. He told Lincoln that he wanted to move troops by sea to the Virginia Peninsula and then push the 40 miles inland.

February 5th: General Grant concentrated his forces for an attack on Fort Henry. He had 15,000 men under his command while the Confederate defenders at the fort numbered 3,200.

February 6th: Union gunboats on the Tennessee River bombarded Fort Henry. The fort commander, General Tilghman withdrew as many men as he could to Fort Donelson but ensured that gunners remained in Fort Henry. By mid-afternoon the walls of Fort Henry were broken and Tilghman decided to surrender. Only 63 men were left in the fort. Over 3,000 made it to the relative safety of Fort Donelson, which prepared itself for an attack. However, the control of the Tennessee River at that point was very important to the Unionists as it allowed them to make river patrols up to northern Alabama.

February 7th: Grant prepared for an attack on Fort Donelson, which was a far tougher proposition than Fort Henry. Fort Henry was by the river's edge while Fort Donelson was 100 feet above the Cumberland River.

February 8th: Union forces took prisoner 2,527 Confederate troops at Roanoke Island, North Carolina.

February 10th: Grant told his men that they would move on Fort Donelson within 24 hours. The fort was 12 miles from Fort Henry. Grant's large land force was bolstered by a large river force as more Union gunboats joined the attack.

February 12th: 20,000 Union troops moved on Fort Donelson. By the time Grant's men arrived at the fort, it is thought that there were about 18,000 Confederate troops in it.

February 13th: The attack on Fort Donelson started though the gunboats were late in arriving. Artillery fire continued throughout the day and into the night.

February 14th: Six Union gunboats arrived at Fort Donelson. They accompanied ten transport ships that brought an extra 10,000 Union troops to the fight. The gunboats added an extra 70 guns to the Union's artillery capability. As well as being pounded from the land, the fort was attacked from the river. During the night, the fort's commander, General Floyd (John B. Floyd, Buchanan's Secretary of War), decided that the Confederate force in the fort had to fight its way out and push into open land. Floyd assumed that they had no chance of holding Fort Donelson.

February 15th: One hour before daybreak the Confederates in Fort Donelson attempted their breakout. They had surprise on their side and attacked on just one front but after initial success had to face Union troops sent to reinforce that front. By the afternoon, the Confederates had to return to Fort Donelson. By the end of the day, Fort Donelson was totally surrounded. Union troops surrounded it on three sides on land and the Union gunboats dominated the Cumberland River.

February 16th: At dawn Fort Donelson surrendered. The Confederates had hoped to negotiate terms but Grant told them that “unconditional and immediate surrender can (only) be accepted”. The loss of Fort Donelson resulted in the Confederates losing control of Tennessee and Kentucky. Over 14,000 Confederates were taken prisoner.

February 18th: There was much celebration in Washington DC when news reached the capital of the surrender of Fort Donelson. The First Congress of the Confederate States of America met in Richmond.

February 21st: The Battle of Fort Craig in New Mexico was fought. This saw a Confederate victory against a larger Union force. The Confederates captured six artillery guns from the Unionists.

February 22nd: Jefferson Davis was inaugurated as the first President of the Confederate States of America.

February 25th: General Halleck, commander of the Army of the Southwest, sent a series of telegraph messages stating how well the Unionist forces were doing in Missouri – a state seen as a thorn in the side to Federal aspirations. However, these telegraph messages were misleading in that Halleck had yet to achieve anything decisive.

February 27th: Davis was given permission by the Confederate Congress to suspend habeas corpus if he felt it was necessary to do so. Davis asked for martial law to be introduced at Norfolk and Portsmouth – both important naval bases in Virginia.

February 28th: Charleston was captured by Unionist forces. Charleston was to become the capital for the new state of West Virginia.

* Through the Blockade *******

This is the third in a series of articles that will examine the efforts of the United States and Confederate governments to arm and equip the untrained mob of volunteers who flocked to their respective banners. This article will focus on the Confederate Ordnance Department and Massachusetts born, Major Caleb Huse, C.S.A. In April 1861, Caleb Huse was ordered to proceed to Europe to undertake a mission for the Ordnance Department. He was to travel, at considerable risk, through the North to secure passage to England. The following from Huse’s book explained, in some detail, the challenges that he faced as he made his way on his mission:

It was impossible to get farther than Philadelphia that day. The next morning, on taking my seat in the train, I recognized the gentleman directly behind me as the Hon. Caleb Cushing. I did not accost him, not caring to meet acquaintances just then, and, moreover, I had no reason to think that he knew me, for although we were born in the same town,—Newburyport, Mass.,—he was a distinguished public man when I was a boy.

The route from Philadelphia to New York was by the way of Camden to South Amboy, and thence by steamboat. The latter was a ferry boat with room for teams on each side of the engine. There were no teams on board, and, as I had been sitting for some time, and now that we were nearing New York where I was likely at any moment to meet an acquaintance, I was a little nervous, I walked about the lower deck. In doing so I met Mr. Cushing face to face. He was passing the time in a similar manner. I lifted my cap, as I would to any superior officer, or public man. Immediately Mr. Cushing stopped and said:

"Good morning, Mr. Huse, you are with the South, I understand."

For the moment I was staggered, but quickly calling to mind that Mr. Cushing had been chairman of the Charleston Democratic Convention which nominated John C. Breckenridge for President, I replied:

"Yes, sir, what chance do you think the South has?"

"What chance can it have?" he said, "the money is all in the North; the manufactories are all in the North; the ships are all in the North; the arms and arsenals are all in the North; the arsenals of Europe are within ten days of New York, and they will be open to the United States Government, and closed to the South; and the Southern ports will be blockaded. What possible chance can the South have?" There was nothing for me to say in reply, and I probably did the best I could have done under the circumstances. Looking him squarely in the eye, I lifted my cap and said: "Good morning, Mr. Cushing." I never saw him afterwards.

Huse may have been staggered by his encounter with the Massachusetts politician, Caleb Cushing, but he was not deterred from his task. NOTE: Caleb Cushing was President Franklin Pierce's Attorney General. He was known as a "doughface" for his southern sympathies; however, Cushing supported the Union during the Civil War.

Upon his arrival in England, Huse quickly went to the London Armory Company to fulfill his orders to procure 12,000 rifles and a battery of field artillery. In a strange scene, Huse found an American engineer who had recently installed a plant of gun-stocking machinery from the Ames Manufacturing Company of Chicopee, Massachusetts. Huse asked the engineer if he was an agent of the United States Government whose presence was to purchase arms. Huse informed the man that his intention was to secure arms for the Confederate government and that he intended to fulfill his mission. Huse felt that the engineer was indeed an U.S. agent and that he was there to lock up the production the London Armory. Huse waited for the engineer to complete his business and depart. Afterwards, Huse approached the superintendent and the chairman of the company and asked the price of all the arms that London Armory could produce in the coming year. Unable to respond to Huse's request of a price quote on such short notice, the chairman asked Huse to return to his offices on the following day.

The chairman told Huse that the company directors felt the output of the company should go to their current customers. Without the ability to consult with the Confederate Government in Montgomery, Huse determined to offer the London Armory a substantial profit to shake their resolve to commit their production to the U.S. agent. By dangling profit and the prospect of a renewed contract, Huse convinced the chairman that a solid business arrangement was possible after the company fulfilled the relatively small order for the U.S. Government. At the time of these negotiations, Caleb Huse had no authorization for his proposal nor did he have at his disposal the funds to complete the transaction. By his rash actions, Huse proved Caleb Cushing's prophesy as false – the South had indeed the ability to secure arms for its armies regardless of the seemingly insurmountable advantages of the North.

In his book, Huse outlined the reasons for his successful efforts. Caleb Huse proved to be a resourceful and confident officer. After the passage of many years, Huse detailed the reasons he thought of himself as being able to achieve results and to compete with the U.S. Government. Huse made no mention of the mission that Edward Clifford Anderson undertook to ascertain Huse's loyalty to the Confederate cause. (The Runner December 2011 issue, "Through the Blockade.")

Baring Brothers were, at that time, the London financial agents for the United States Government, and they would unquestionably have been supported and gratefully thanked, had they assumed the responsibility of contracting for all the arms in sight in England. Any army officer, fit for such a mission as that of buying arms for a great Government at the outbreak of a war, would have acted, if necessary, without instructions, and secured everything that he could find in the line of essentials, especially arms, of which there were very few in the market. There were muskets enough to be had for almost any reasonable offer, but of modern Enfield or Springfield rifles—which were practically the same—there were only a few thousand in England, and none elsewhere except in Austria, where all were owned by the Government. And, according to Mr. Cushing, these would be available by the United States but impossible of purchase by "the South." Yet even so high an authority as Ex-Attorney General Cushing proved to be wrong in his assumption, as will be shown below.

Any young, intelligent West Point graduate holding an army commission and as fearless in assuming responsibility as the average "graduate," would not only have prevented my making this important contract, but would have blocked my efforts in every direction; for in all Europe the supply of arms ready for use or possible of manufacture was very limited. Such an officer would have secured everything worth having—in other words, all the best—and only inferior arms of antiquated model would have been left for the Confederacy. The effect would have been not only to give the United States good arms in profusion, but utterly to discourage their opponents by the inferiority of their weapons.

Mr. Davis did not make the great mistake of sending a civil agent to purchase supplies—a duty as thoroughly military as any that could be named—nor the still greater blunder of setting several men to do what one man, with uncontrolled authority, could do so much better. Doubtless he could have found men who would have performed the duty as well as did the young officer whom he selected, and some who would have done their part better; but, during the whole war, no change was made, although not to remove him often required that firmness—not to say obstinacy—which was a prominent trait of Mr. Davis's character, and which, right or wrong, but especially when he was right, he exercised to a remarkable degree.

Through the Blockade will continue in the next issue.

 January Meeting *****

Jefferson Davis
"Confederate Commander"

The members and guests who attended the January 12th meeting were fortunate to enjoy the presentation by one of Jefferson Davis's most knowledgeable scholars, Keith Hardison. Keith's experiences from 1986 - 1999 as executive director at Beauvoir, Confederate President Jefferson Davis's home and library, were evident in the depth and insight provided during his presentation. However you personally view Jefferson Davis, Hardison presented a detailed look at the man, his talents, his accomplishments, and his failings.

Keith Hardison – Director of the Division of State Historic Sites and Properties

Keith's discussion focused on Davis's qualifications to be the Confederate President and Commander-in-Chief. His brief comparison between the qualifications of Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis revealed a major difference in the experiences each man brought to their respective offices. Davis, by virtue of this training at West Point (1824 -1828), his service in the U.S. Army from 1828 – 1835, his success as the colonel of the Mississippi Rifles during the war with Mexico 1846 -1847, and his service as Secretary of War in Franklin Pierce's administration, was experienced in many matters of the military sciences. While Davis had been a reluctant West Point cadet and subject to dismissal for several infractions, his service in the US Army both in the western territories and his volunteer service during the Mexican War were more than adequate. While both Lincoln and Davis were to endure an awesome burden as Commander-in-Chiefs, Davis was the man whose résumé reflected considerable talents.

Why then, if Davis was so qualified for his position, did he fail? Keith provided a listing of factors, some controllable and others not, that weighted into Davis's shortcomings.

Situational factors (uncontrollable):

- The geographic size and character of the Confederacy was simply too large for the resources (men and materials) available to the Confederacy to effectively manage.
- Davis was faced with building a national government at the same time the Confederacy was fighting for its survival.

- The infrastructure, manufacturing capacity, and capital resources available to the south were insufficient for the needs.
- States Rights, which Davis supported on many occasions before the war, were too divisive to allow centralization of power to a national government. Keith related an example that reflected the problem of appeasing the sensitivities of each individual state. The first three Secretaries of War, each of whom served for short intervals and with mixed results, were all lawyers with little or no military experiences. Jefferson Davis's personal choice for Secretary of War had been Braxton Bragg. Davis, because of the need to placate the various states, had selected less able men – an Alabama secessionist lawyer, a Louisiana lawyer and wealthy planter, and a Virginian lawyer whose grandfather had been Thomas Jefferson. For all his shortcomings and inability to get along with almost anyone, Braxton Bragg was an effective organizer and planner with an understanding of what an army needed to give battle.
- The strategy of the Confederate government was limited to the defense of many sites within the country. The Confederate Army did launch invasions of the north; however, the need to defend so many locations prevented the commitment of sufficient forces to successfully take the war to their enemies. NOTE: Early in the conflict, Davis had said that the Confederacy just wanted to be left alone.

Personal factors (controllable):

- Davis was extremely loyal to his friends and hostile toward those he disliked.
- Davis supported Bragg when others called for Bragg's dismissal as an army commander. After Bragg had failed in many duties, Davis sent Bragg to command in Wilmington in late 1864. ("Hello Bragg, goodbye Wilmington.")
- Davis disliked Joe Johnston, P.T.A. Beauregard, D.H. Hill, and others. Sometimes his animosity clouded his judgment – Hood to replace Johnston at the gates of Atlanta,
- Davis had military experience but he had never commanded an army. He did; however, consider himself to be extremely knowledgeable about all military matters.
- Davis was a workaholic who immersed himself in minutiae that could and should have been delegated to subordinates.

Hardison's conclusion about the role Jefferson Davis played as commander-in-chief: His qualifications and skills were considerable; however, his personal failings overshadowed his talents. Considering the challenges faced by Davis, Hardison did maintain that few, if any man, could have done more to sustain the Confederacy through four years of war.

* Trivia Question Answers December 2011 *******

1 - Who was this officer? Another chance to win, but this is your last chance. The first one who tells me who this man was wins a reservation to the February Dinner Meeting. This is a $26 value for the inquisitive individual among you who can correctly answer this trivia question. If you need additional hints about this man's identity (other than he is a Confederate with a semi-Napoleonic pose and he commanded Neverson Columbus Winstead late in the war, send me an e-mail tpwinstead@gmail.com). Hint#1: This officer was a West Point cadet who resigned to serve his southern state.

2 - On July 3, 1863, a Confederate Brigadier General in Pickett's Division determined to show his courage in the face of his enemies. This general, unable to walk because of an earlier injury, mounted his horse and went forward to his death and disappearance from his comrades. Who was this officer and what prompted him to seek a "glorious" end? Richard B. Garnett, an 1841 West Point graduate, had run afoul of Stonewall Jackson for his alleged actions at the Battle of Kernstown on March 23, 1862. Jackson had Garnett arrested for an unauthorized retreat (per Garnett, only after his men ran low on ammunition while fighting a superior Union force). Jackson proposed to court-martial Garnett; however, Robert E. Lee reassigned Garnett to Pickett's former brigade. Garnett spent the next year trying to prove his bravery; on July 3rd, he paid the ultimate price. To remove the stain against his name, Garnett, having been previously kicked by his horse, rode his black charged forward into the hell that became known as "Pickett's Charge". Garnett's body was never recovered from the battlefield.

In one of those ironies that seemed to appear throughout Civil War history, Garnett served as a pallbearer at Stonewall Jackson's funeral after Jackson's death from wounds received at Chancellorsville.

Approximately thirty years after the Gettysburg battle, General George H. "Maryland" Steuart found Garnett's engraved sword in a Baltimore pawnshop. The sword was an artillery officer's pattern and had "R.B. Garnett, U.S.A." engraved on the blade. Steuart purchased it and evidentially returned the relic to Garnett's family. Today, Richard Garnett's sword is included in the collection of the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond, Virginia.

3 - Keith Hardison shared the story of Jefferson Davis's 1825 carousing incident at Benny Havens' Tavern while he attended West Point (See Trivia question #4, January issue of The Runner for additional details). According to Hardison, who may have intervened to prevent Davis's dismissal from West Point? What incident did Davis become embroiled in during the Christmas season of 1826? John C. Calhoun was Secretary of War when Jefferson Davis was appointed to West Point. Calhoun also aided the young cadet by perhaps preventing Davis's dismissal for the Benny Havens' incident. Davis was also linked to the Christmas Eve 1826 "Eggnog Riot" (See http://www.army.mil/article/49823/The_Eggnog_Riot/ for additional information.)

4 - Jefferson Davis served as Secretary of War in the administration of Franklin Pierce 1853 -1857. Keith Hardison outlined the many accomplishments that Davis oversaw while in this office. What was one of the most unusual experiments that Davis implemented? The U.S. Army Camel Corps (its 77 camels, and chief camel driver, Hadji Ali) was the subject of much interest in the barren west prior to the Civil War. The tensions of the gathering sectional discord prevented Congress from following recommendations to increase the camel corps and continue the experiment.

5 - Throughout his life, Jefferson Davis failed to embrace the art of compromise. What did Varina Davis say about her husband's stubbornness? Varina Davis supposedly remarked that her husband. "did not know the arts of the politician and would not practice them if understood."

Source: <http://www.aboutfamouspeople.com/article1031.html> accessed January 16, 2012.

6 – Jefferson Davis and Abraham Lincoln shared many experiences as commander-in-chiefs. They also shared a similarity as parents during their stay in their separate White Houses. What was that parental similarity? Both Davis and Lincoln experienced the death of a son while they served their nations.

 January 1862 *****

The weather still determined how much warfare took place in January 1862. The American Civil War was determined by a series of skirmishes in the winter months coupled with a great deal of political work. In January 1862 Lincoln issued two orders both of which required McClellan to go on the offensive as opposed to remaining, in Lincoln's mind, on the defensive.

January 1st: The Cabinet urged greater success in Missouri, which seemed to be a state out of control. Martial law was introduced to St. Louis but General Halleck was urged to do more by politicians in Washington DC.

January 3rd: Jefferson Davis expressed his concern that Union forces were stationed at Ship Island in the Mississippi Sound. This base was only 65 miles from New Orleans. General ‘Stonewall’ Jackson started his campaign to disrupt the North's movement of supplies. His targets were the Baltimore to Ohio railway and the Ohio to Chesapeake canal.

January 4th: Jackson's reputation for keeping his men on the move was cemented when Union forces could barely find his 10,000 men who were on the march.

January 6th: The Senate urged Lincoln to replace McClellan because of his seeming lack of activity. However, Lincoln supported McClellan.

January 7th: Three Union gunboats made a sortie along the Mississippi to within three miles of the important Confederate stronghold at Columbus. Their information was fed back to General U Grant.

January 9th: General Grant started his campaign against Columbus.

January 11th: Secretary of War Simon Cameron resigned over accusations of corruption and basic incompetence. 100 Union ships transported 15,000 troops to Port Royal, North Carolina, to support the men who are already there.

January 13th: Edwin Stanton became Secretary of War.

January 14th: Lincoln called for a more robust campaign in Missouri. McClelland urged caution.

January 18th: Former U.S. President and Confederate congressman-elect John Tyler dies.

January 19th: A battle at Mill Spring (sometimes called the Battle of Somerset) led to as many as 195 Confederate troops being killed with 200 taken prisoner. However, the Union's leader in the attack, General Zollicoffer, was killed.

January 25th: By this day, what was left of the Confederate force at Mill Spring had been forced 100 miles to the southwest to Gainsboro, which resulted in the Confederate line having a large gap punched through it.

January 27th: Lincoln issued General War Order Number One. This urged the Union army into action and set February 22nd as the date he expected a major surge in action.

January 30th: The 'USS Monitor' was launched – a revolutionary new vessel designed by John Ericsson. The 'Monitor' marked a new stage in the development of ironclads. Mason and Slidell finally arrived in Great Britain.

January 31st: Lincoln issued his Special War Order Number One. This ordered the army that had been protecting Washington DC to launch an attack on Manassas Junction – as long as the safety of the capital had been ensured – by February 22nd. Great Britain announced that it would remain neutral in the war.

 The Arms Race – 1861 *****

I am by no means knowledgeable about the weapons that dominated the Civil War, but I think it worthwhile to provide an overview of the transition occurring to the infantry weapons in the mid-19th century.

The arms of this period evolved into weapons that added range and accuracy to a unit's offensive firepower. Unlike the massed use of infantry during the American Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars to achieve concentrated firepower, the weapons that dominated the Civil War battlefield allowed a man to kill his opponent at greater distances. Unfortunately during the first years of the war, the commanders on the Civil War battlefield continued to march their men in close formation against their adversaries.

From Lincoln and the Tools of War:

Rifled guns had been born centuries before, when some gun-maker discovered that an elongated projectile would hold straight and true in flight if given a spin about its long axis. The spin could be imparted by spiral grooves in the bore of the gun; and these grooves, as well as the process of making them, were called "rifling." Without the all-important spin, elongated projectiles would tumble and wobble through space, unpredictably in both course and impact. For that reason, most projectiles to that time had been made spherical. But the volume, and hence the weight of the spherical projectile was limited by the diameter of the bore, whereas an elongated shot could be made much heavier, and therefore much more formidable in range, accuracy, and penetration.

Until the middle of the nineteenth century, however, rifled small arms were loaded at the muzzle. The bullets had to fit tight enough to take the grooves, and ramming them home by main force was too conspicuous and protracted an operation to be feasible in open combat. But in 1855 the Annual of Scientific Discovery printed, to the edification of Abraham Lincoln among others, excerpts from the Secretary of War [Jefferson Davis], which told of not just one but two promising answers to the problem of loading rifles. One solution had come with the development of efficient rifles which could be loaded from the breech. The other, favored by the Secretary, was a newfangled bullet with a concave base which expanded on firing, so as to take the rifles grooves. Using such bullets, especially one developed by Captain Minié of the French Army [and improved by James H. Burton, assistant master armorer at the Harpers Ferry Armory], the nations of the world began that year to adopt muzzle-loading rifles as their standard infantry arm, and one of those nations was the United States.

In 1861 smoothbore muskets, well polished, still looked smart on parade. They served as well as any other arm for practicing the drill manual. Some of them had value as historical curiosities. But when life depended on their performance, not even raw recruits would take them without protest, and soldiers' complaints were backed by the home folks. "It is the opinion of all military men here," wrote Governor Morton of Indiana, "that it would be little better than murder to send troops into battle with such arms as are a large majority of these [smoothbore] muskets altered from flint to percussion locks."

 Through the Blockade *****

This is the second in a series of articles that will examine the efforts of the United States and Confederate governments to arm and equip the untrained mob of volunteers who flocked to their respective banners. This article will focus on the United States Ordnance Department and Union agents who sought to meet weapon demand at the beginning of the war.

On November 12, 1859, Henry Knox Craig, Colonel of Ordnance, reported to John B. Floyd, Secretary of War, the inventory of muskets and rifles in the various United States armories and arsenals. Craig's report excluded 23,895 muskets and 652 rifles that had not been converted from flintlock into percussion locks. The numbers of the new rifled arms and the rifling of older smoothbore muskets are included in the totals. NOTE: the New Model Rifle .58 caliber was considered by many ordnance men as the finest infantry weapon in the world. Only 28,702 of the .58 caliber rifles and rifled muskets were available out of the 610,598 arms in the government inventory:

Smoothbore Muskets

Altered to percussion, cal. - .69	275,744
Altered to Maynard lock, cal. - .69	14,765
Made as percussion, cal. - .69	213,155

Rifled Muskets

Percussion, since rifled, cal. - .69	33,631
Rifled muskets, cal. - .58	24,105
	57,736

Rifles

Altered to percussion, cal. - .54	1,385
Made as percussion, cal. - .54	43,375
New Model rifle, cal. - .58	4,102

The officers of the Ordnance Department were guided by the Militia Act of 1808 and later Congressional acts which required the department to furnish each state with an annual quota of arms. Reacting to sectional tensions that were building in the late 1850s and 1860, several governors requested increased allotments from Colonel Craig's department. Craig, a Lieutenant in 1812, was strict in the execution of his duties; however, he was a Union man who was determined to protect the property of the United States government. His boss, Secretary of War, John B. Floyd, may have been a little less strict in attitudes toward some of his Southern colleagues. In a November 24, 1860 letter from S. Adams, Virginia State Master Armorer, Adams expressed to Floyd his displeasure with the efforts of Colonel Craig to assist Virginia in gaining an increased allotment. "I have no hopes of any favors from Colonel Craig, for in a conversation with him a few months since I found him deadly opposed to the Virginia Armory." Adams continued his request for Floyd's assistance as he expressed his feelings, 'before our much-honored and esteemed Secretary of War vacates his office, for I have no hopes of any assistance after a Black Republican takes possession of the War Department.' Colonel Henry Knox Craig used his extensive knowledge of bureaucratic maneuver to delay and forestall some requests and arms sales that would have placed more arms in Southern arsenals.

Craig's hand may have been seen in the events that transpired between North Carolina Governor John W. Ellis and Simon Cameron, Lincoln's Secretary of War, in an April 12, 1861 letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
April 12, 1861.

His Excellency JOHN W. ELLIS,
Governor of North Carolina, Raleigh :

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter addressed to this Department on the 2d instant by Graham Daves, esq., your private secretary, inquiring the cause of the delay in the issue of the arms called for by you on account of North Carolina's quota for the current year.

The rifles were ordered to be sent to you on the 4th of February last from the Harper's Ferry Armory, but their issue has probably been retarded by numerous prior engagements, the rule, unless in special cases, being to execute the orders for issues according to priority of receipt at the armory. The superintendent of the armory has been requested to make the issue to your State at the earliest moment possible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

When the war finally began, the Ordnance Bureau had approximately 40,000 of the Model 1855 rifles and rifle muskets to issue to Union troops. To supply arms to the incoming regiments, Craig and his associates were forced to issue the smoothbore arms as well. This action had tragic impact on early fighting at First Manassas and later at Ball's Bluff. Because of limited number of even the old smoothbores in Southern arsenals, the Confederates had been forced to seek weapons in Europe. Confederate agents reacted by securing and shipping large numbers of rifled weapons through the early blockade (See December issue The Runner – cargo of the blockade runner Fingal). These imported arms were effectively used by Southern forces at both First Manassas and Ball's Bluff. Only after First Manassas did Simon Cameron, Lincoln's Secretary of War, pursue seeking modern arms from European sources. Cameron had favored a "Buy American" strategy to encourage Northern arms manufactures to tool-up and supplement the weapons being produced at the government-owned Springfield Armory. The Union defeat at First Manassas shocked Cameron and others out of the belief of a short war and the expectations of unrealistic rapid deliveries from Northern suppliers. It was not until July 27, 1861 that Colonel George L. Schuyler was commissioned as an agent by the War Department. At roughly the same time, the War Department offered a contract to Boker and Company of New York for one-hundred thousand arms from Europe. Adding to the surging search for European weapons, H.S. Sanford, American Minister to Belgium, was buying weapons. Competition among Union buyers, failure of the United States Treasury to provide timely credits to Schuyler for a contract for Enfield rifles, and failure of the Ordnance Bureau to provide assistance to the purchasing process hindered the Union efforts. As the agents bid against each other, prices rose and the temptation of corruption became linked to the process. Note: The activity, or inactivity, of the Treasury Department was especially damaging. Confederate agent, Caleb Huse, was able to outbid Schuyler for a supply of Enfields.

The Union efforts to secure European weapons may have had shortcomings; however, their agents purchased about 1,165,000 rifles and muskets during the first two years of the war. After Simon Cameron resigned on January 11, 1862 amidst accusations of corruption and incompetence, new Secretary of War, Edwin Stanton, appointed the more experienced Marcellus Hartley as purchasing agent. Hartley, of the firm of Schuyler, Hartley and Graham, instilled better controls and inspections of purchased weapons. While some of the weapons purchased by initial contracts may have been of poor quality, most weapons were of quality and serviceability to the Union troops.

As William T. Sherman reminded his colleagues when he left the Louisiana Military Seminary to offer his services to the Union, "You are rushing into war with one of the most powerful, ingeniously mechanical and determined people on earth." This statement was a vision of what would be unleashed on the South during 1864 and 1865. The more industrialized North achieved arms manufacturing sufficiency by the summer of 1863; the South would never achieve this self-sufficiency. The Northern manufacturing superiority and plan old "Yankee Ingenuity" led to advances in weapon designs that would have dire impact upon Southern Armies.

 December Meeting *****

No Good Like It Is

On Thursday night, December 8th, McKendree (Mike) R. Long III shared an interesting story about his efforts to write a book about members of the Eighth Texas Cavalry (Terry's Texas Rangers) during and after the Civil War. His initial advice to any of the audience who had awakened in the middle of the night and entertained the thought to write a book, "Roll over and go back to sleep." After a chuckle, Mike began to tell his story.

After a short history of the Eighth Texas Cavalry (see <http://www.mckendreelong.com/> for details), Mike related how his initial quest to write a non-fiction book about the development of fire arms from 1850-1890 changed as he learned more about the Eighth Texas and their use of some of those weapons. He changed this direction to focus on two members of the Eighth Texas, Dobey Walls and Jimmy Melton. These fictional characters were woven into the story of No Good Like It Is.

Mike Long with Colt Revolving Rifle

Mike then shared the details of how a book is written, edited, published, distributed, and advertised, a journey almost as interesting as that of Dobey Walls and Jimmy Melton. Fraught with pitfalls for the unsuspecting, Mike provided a pathway on which he began and how he learned on his journey.

Colt Dragoon, Colt 1860, Smith & Wesson

The journey must have been interesting for Dobey and Jimmy will continue their journey in Dog Soldier Moon.

* Gone but not Forgotten *******

From an army correspondent with the Philadelphia Inquirer after the Battle of Fredericksburg in December 1862, the following appeared under the title, “Fidelity of a Dog.”

On Monday last as Hon. John Convole, in company with a number of officers, was passing over the battle field beyond Fredericksburg, their attention was called to a small dog lying by a corpse. Mr. Convole halted a few minutes to see if life was extinct. Raising the coat from the man’s face, he found him dead. The dog, looking wishfully up, ran to the dead man’s face and kissed the silent lips. Such devotion in a small dog was so singular, that Mr. Convole examined some papers on the body, and found it to be that of Sergeant W.H. Brown, Company C, Ninety-first Pennsylvania.

The dog shivering with the cold, but refused to leave his master’s body, and as the coat was thrown over his face again, he seemed uneasy, and tried to get under it to the man’s face. He had, it seemed, followed the regiment into battle, and stuck to his master, and when he fell remained with him, refusing to leave him or eat anything. As the party returned, an ambulance was carrying the corpse to a little grove of trees for interment, and the little dog following, the only mourner at that funeral, as the hero’s comrades had been called to some other point.

Bob Cooke

The Hon. John Convole represented the Twenty-First District of Pennsylvania in the Thirty-Sixth Congress from 1859 to 1861. Convole was especially interested in the welfare of Union soldiers. He sent three sons into the ranks of the army. One died in fighting outside of Richmond, the youngest endured imprisonment at Andersonville, and one returned safely to his home after his enlistment.

Sergeant William Henry Brown was twenty-five years old at his enlistment at Philadelphia on September 13, 1861. Brown had been married to Sarah Christine on September 18, 1857. They had no children. Mrs. Brown received a pension of $8 per month beginning after approval on August 17, 1863. At the time of her death on May 4, 1924, Sarah Brown received a pension of $30 per month.

There was some question about the faithful dog and Convoe incident that appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer. Regardless of the actual facts, the army correspondent made the effort to show that Sergeant Brown had not died in vain, and while he had died apart from his home and loved ones, his death had been mourned. For the greater than 600,000 who perished during the war, few had a mourner at their internment.

 Trivia Question Answers December 2011 *****

1 - Who was this officer? The first one who tells me who this man was wins a reservation to the February Dinner Meeting. This is a $26 value for the inquisitive individual among you who can correctly answer this trivia question. If you need a hint about this man's identity (other than he is a Confederate and he has an arm injury), send me an e-mail.

2 - What was the first breech-loading infantry long arm to be manufactured for use by the United States Army? Inventor John H. Hall patented the breech-loading long arm in May 1811. This flintlock weapon, later updated to percussion lock in 1833, took either cartridge or loose ammunition. A lever in front of the trigger guard was pulled to the rear; hence, a short section of the barrel was pivoted upward enough to load the weapon. The breech was then closed for firing. In 1819, Hall reached a royalty agreement with the government to produce the weapon at the Harpers Ferry Armory. The Hall breech loader was the first weapon made with interchangeable parts and was produced at Harpers Ferry until 1844. Approximately 200,000 of these weapons were manufactured over their gradual adoption period. Reluctant acceptance by many field officers in opposition to recommendations from ordnance experts, limited the effective development and utilization of this innovative weapon. By the beginning of the Civil War, many Ordnance Bureau officers (including Ordnance Chief James W. Ripley who replaced Henry Knox Craig in mid-1861) were opposed to the introduction of large numbers of breechloaders and repeating rifles into the Union Army. NOTE: Carl L. Davis provided an interesting study of the breechloader controversy in his Arming the Union: Small Arms in the Civil War.

3 - In Mike Long's presentation, he made reference to the February 17, 1865 burning of Columbia, South Carolina. Sherman blamed Wade Hampton's troops and Hampton blamed Sherman's troops.

Who was responsible? In Memoirs of General William T. Sherman Vol. 11, page 287, Sherman wrote, "In my official report of this conflagration I distinctly charged it to General Wade Hampton, and confess I did so pointedly to shake the faith of his people in him, for he was in my opinion a braggart and professed to be the special champion of South Carolina."

4 - In 1825, Jefferson Davis faced court-martial from West Point. What offense had Davis committed?

In James S. Robbins's Last in their Class: Custer, Pickett and the Goats of West Point: Jefferson Davis and four other were the first cadets to face dismissal for carousing at Benny Havens' Tavern. They were charged with "drinking spirituous and intoxicating liquor" and "going to a public house or place where spirituous liquors are sold." They were also charged with leaving post without permission. Davis defended himself with the skill of a seasoned lawyer. He pleaded guilty to the charge of leaving the post with prior permission, but claimed special circumstances. Davis sited that weak evidence had been presented to the court. The charges were "contrary to the principles of a soldier and man of honor." Davis asserted that no one had witnessed him drinking and if he had appeared intoxicated, it was from embarrassment at being found at the tavern. Davis challenged the regulations inclusion of Benny Havens' – Davis, in a Clintonian wordplay strategy, said that it depended on what the definition of "public house" was.

Guilty of all charges! Dismissal! The court showed leniency to Jefferson Davis. The court ruled "in consideration of his former good conduit [it] respectfully recommend the remission of said sentence." Davis was the only one of the Benny Havens' Five who graduated.

5 - Did Jefferson Davis have a middle name? I always thought his full name was Jefferson Finis Davis and that he was to be the last child of his parents. From the Rice University site comes a somewhat different answer:

From November 30, 1824, until mid-1833, Jefferson Davis' name on official lists and at times his signature included the middle initial "F." The name is not spelled out in full in any known document. In his story of Davis' life, Hudson Strode claimed that the final son born to Samuel and Jane Davis was given the middle name "Finis" because "it seemed unlikely that Jane Davis would ever bear another child" (Jefferson Davis: American Patriot, p. 3). The "Finis" myth has been repeated so often that it has become accepted as fact by many scholarly resources, but there is no evidence for it. All of Jefferson Davis' siblings had traditional names.

Perhaps equally curious is the sudden appearance and just as sudden disappearance of the middle initial. Davis had been at West Point for at least three months before it showed up for the first time, on a monthly conduct report. The last known "J. F. Davis" signature is on a note of October 3, 1832, notifying his commanding officer of his acceptance of a furlough. As of the publication of Davis' appointment as second lieutenant of Dragoons on May 4, 1833, the "F." had disappeared from official documents as well. At the time the initial was in use, there were no other Davis officers with the given name Jefferson (Jefferson C. Davis, a Union general in the Civil War, did not enlist until 1846), so it is unlikely the young cadet was trying to avoid mistaken identity. Only two other officers named Davis with the first initial "J." were in the army from 1824-1833, and one of them died in 1828. It should be noted that the "F." was used on Davis' first marriage license (June 17, 1835), although he signed the document without the "F." The initial was not used on his second marriage license ten years later. Jefferson Davis' signature and the listing of his name on official documents may be traced in the first volume of The Papers of Jefferson Davis, which includes all known documents from Davis' birth through 1840.

President Bob Cooke

November is almost gone and Thanksgiving is upon us. Soon after that, Christmas; how fast the year is going! One hundred fifty years ago, 1861, the first year of the war was coming to a close. On December 25th the war went on: "It was a busy Christmas Day in the White House. Mr. Lincoln and his cabinet met for lengthy discussions about the British demands for release of Confederate commissioners Mason and Slidell. A decision was to be made the next day. The Lincolns at Christmas dinner entertained many guests.

The shooting did not stop for the holiday. There was skirmishing at Cherry, western Virginia, near Fort Frederick, Md.; a Union expedition operated off Danville, Mo. Off Cape Fear, N.C., a blockade-runner was taken." (The Civil War Day by Day: An Almanac, 1861 – 1865, by E.B. Long). For many families, both North and South, empty chairs were set at the dinner table in remembrance of those who were off fighting, or who had already paid the ultimate price. This holiday season, let us remember not only those who fell in that conflict, but all the wars, conflicts, police actions and peace-keeping efforts that have taken our youths from us.

December 1861 saw a continuing fraught relationship between the president, Abraham Lincoln, and the man he appointed as overall commander of the North's army, General McClellan. Lincoln continued to question the timidity of McClellan's approach while McClellan continued with his assertion that if got it wrong, the whole of the North could suffer as a consequence.

December 1st: President Lincoln expressed his concern to General McClellan that the Unionist armies did not seem to be doing anything substantial.

December 2nd: Congress gave its permission for the suspension of habeas corpus in Missouri.

December 3rd: Lincoln gave his State of the Union address to Congress. The Union started its move against New Orleans when ‘USS Constitution’ arrived at Ship Island at the mouth of the Mississippi River carrying the 26th Massachusetts Regiment.

December 4th: Great Britain announced an embargo on all exports to the US

December 5th: The Secretary of War announced that Unionist strength stood at 660,971 men of whom 640,637 were volunteers.

December 6th: It was announced that the Treasury could cope with a war that ended by mid-1862 but if it lasted longer than this then the Treasury’s income would be far outweighed by its outgoings and taxes on most things would have to be increased to fund the war.

December 7th: In a scene that mirrored the 'Trent' incident, the 'USS Santiago de Cuba' stopped a British ship, the 'Eugenia Smith' and a Southerner called J W Zacharie was taken off. Zacharie was a purchasing agent for the Confederacy.

December 9th: The Senate approved the setting up of the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War. This recognised that previous comments made to the Confederacy, that states rights would not be interfered with once the war was over, was no longer the case and that the internal affairs of the rebel states would be reformed regardless and that the Union would be upheld.

December 10th: The Confederacy admitted Kentucky to its membership despite the overwhelming evidence that the state was about to fall to Unionist forces.

December 11th: Charleston was damaged as a result of a fire that swept through the city. Charleston was the most important port in South Carolina.

December 12th: The success of the Union's navy along the South's coastline was such that cotton farmers started to burn their crop in fear that it might fall into the hands of the Union.

December 15th: Congress expressed its view that the use of slavery in the South was becoming more and more an issue. The original cause of the war was state's rights but greater knowledge in the Union about slavery put it at the forefront of why the war was being fought. Over the next few months Congress passed a number of laws such as the military could no longer return to the South fugitive slaves; that slavery was to be outlawed in the District of Columbia; that any slave state that offered to give up slavery would be given financial assistance from the Union.

December 18th: Lord Lyons, the British ambassador in Washington DC, received a message from the British government that he was to demand the release of Mason and Slidell. If the Union failed to do this within 10 days, he had instructions to break off diplomatic relations.

December 19th: Lyons met the US Secretary of State, Seward.

December 20th: Two British warships arrived in Canada as a result of the 'Trent' affair.

December 21st: The meetings between Lyons and Seward continued. Both Seward and Lincoln recognised that there was a real risk of war with the British if their demands went unheeded.

December 23rd: The Cabinet was advised by Seward that Captain Wilkes made an error in taking off Mason and Slidell and that he should have brought in the 'Trent' and its 'contents' as the ship had violated its neutral status. Seward made it clear that the seizure of the Confederate commissioners was unlawful whereas the seizure of the 'Trent' as an entity would have been lawful.

December 24th: Congress passed a series of duties that were to be added to tea, coffee, sugar and what were classed as "luxury goods".

December 25th: Despite it being Christmas Day, the Cabinet and the President were in discussions on what to do with Mason and Slidell. Fighting was reported at Fort Frederick in Maryland and Cherry, western Virginia.

December 26th: It was announced that Mason and Slidell would be released because their arrest was illegal. It was further announced that Captain Wilkes had acted without the knowledge of the government.

December 30th: Mason and Slidell (seized on November 8, 1861) were handed over to Lord Lyons. They were immediately put on a ship to England. Lyons then released his own interpretation of the law regarding “neutral nations” and it was at odds with Seward’s and, ironically, found support among many Americans. However, with the issue resolved, relations between the North and Great Britain improved.

December 31st: President Lincoln pressed his army commanders for more action. However, McClellan did not hear his message as he was ill.

* Through the Blockade *******

The Fire-Eaters and the Abolitionist of late 1860 and early 1861 believed their causes just, their foes irrational, and their specific causes achievable only by war. Among the majority of Americans, few really expected war, but if war did come, few - including the radicals - initially expected a conflict of long duration. As the crisis escalated, resolute men in Washington and Montgomery looked beyond the rhetoric and saw the reality of a coming armed conflict that neither side was prepared to wage. These resolute men began the actions necessary to secure the materials of war that would be required.

Both the governments of the North and South engaged in a contest to equip and field armies to achieve their aims. The North had a decided advantage of having industries that could eventually equip the large armies necessary to subdue the rebellious states of the South. However; in the early days, agents from the United States and the Confederate States were dispatched to Europe to secure arms and accoutrements. Thus began a game to secure weapons of every description, but more so, it began a game to deny those weapons to the other side.

This article will be the first in a series that will examine the early efforts of several men in the United States and in the Confederate States to arm and to supply the untrained mobs who will flock to their respective banners. This article will focus on Edward Clifford Anderson, a past mayor of Savannah, planter and businessman, and a former United States Navy officer. Even before the events at Fort Sumter, Anderson will be in Richmond purchasing heavy ordinance from the Tredegar Iron Works for the State of Georgia. Secretary of War, Leroy Pope Walker, will engage Anderson to purchase similar ordinance for Confederate emplacements in Mobile, Savannah, and New Orleans. Anderson’s efforts as an arms buyer will intensify after he is summoned to Montgomery by Jefferson Davis.

President Davis personally commissioned Anderson as a major in the Corps of Artillery and ordered him proceed to Europe. Anderson’s mission was to buy war materials and to probe the conduct of Captain Caleb Huse whose recent actions had caused suspicion. Secretary Walker had instructed Anderson, “You are hereby authorized, should circumstances in your opinion demand it, to supercede Captain Caleb Huse and to take possession of any assets or credits placed to his account as [our] agent.” Anderson, accompanied by James Heyward North, sailed on the Camilla from Savannah on May 25, 1861 and arrived in England on June 22.

Within days, Anderson met with Caleb Huse and J.D. Bulloch (Confederate Navy) and met with representatives of Fraser, Trenholm & Co. For the next six months, Anderson noted in his diary the difficulties he and Huse had in buying guns, ammunition, medicines and other supplies. During this period, he found Huse to be both capable and trustworthy. Anderson and Huse, in a letter to Walker, complained of insufficient funding, Yankee spies who stalked them, suppliers who demanded large cash payments, and British government reluctance to allow them to ship arms. Anderson was highly upset by the proposed shipping cost that some companies sought. He also informed Walker that it, “may be necessary to unite with Mr. J.D. Bulloch in the purchase of a fast steamer, sending her over under his command.”

From Confederate Foreign Agent: The European Diary of Major Edward C. Anderson:

In early September Anderson and Huse, in cooperation with Bulloch, bought Fingal, an iron-framed twin-masted screw-steamer of 463 tons. Six week later, with a British captain and crew, flying a British flag, Fingal steamed from Greenock, bound according to her papers, “for British Honduras.” On board were Anderson, Bulloch, and John Low (Bulloch’s assistant), and concealed beneath her deck was a cargo of munitions and supplies valued at more than $250,000: about 15,000 Enfield rifles, 1,000,000 cartridges, 2,000,000 percussion caps, 3,000 cavalry sabers, 500 revolvers, two 2 ½ -inch and 24 ½ rifled cannons with 8,000 shells, 400 barrels of gunpowder and large quantities of medicines, blankets, clothing and other supplies. Wrote Bulloch, “No single ship ever took into the Confederacy cargo so entirely composed of military & naval supplies....”

Anderson and the Fingal arrived in the Savannah River on November 13th. Within days, Major Anderson was in Richmond and reported his activities to President Davis. Anderson also met with Secretary of Navy, Stephen Mallory, and put forth an idea that could have impacted the course of the war. Anderson proposed that the Confederacy secure fast steamers and put the ships under command of his former USS Constitution shipmate, John Newland Maffitt. As reported in his diary, “Mr. Mallory met my suggestions with evident discourtesy, intimating to me that the Navy Dept would regulate its own affairs & that there were other officers under his control just as good as Maffitt.”

Major Anderson refused offers of jobs in Richmond and returned to Savannah where he served under Robert E. Lee. He felt his talents were underutilized in building and commanding defensive works around Savannah. After the fall of Savannah, Anderson was in Charleston where he was in command until the fall of that city. He and his Georgians joined General William J. Hardee as they marched into North Carolina where they joined Joe Johnston in a last attempt to stop William T. Sherman’s army. Anderson returned to Savannah after the war ended and began again in a devastated country to make his living. He had cast his die with the South, lost his wealth, but he would again work hard to return Savannah to prosperity.

Anderson’s diary provides a great description of his duties in Europe. Intrigue and stealth are elements in his description of a foreign agent. It also shows him to be a most efficient man who performs his duties with dispatch. He is blunt and to-the-point in his dealings with superiors and subordinates.

Had Mallory implemented Anderson’s suggestion in 1861, what could have been the outcome?

 November Meeting *****

Undaunted Heart: The True Story of a Southern Belle & a Yankee General

“When I was a little girl, my granny would hold out her hands, point to her rings, and say to my sister and me, ‘Ellie, when you grow up, this ring will be yours. Suzy, when you grow up, this ring will be yours.’ We’d hug her and wonder how long it would be before we were grown up!”

Eleanor (Ella) Hope Swain

Suzy Barile

Suzy Barile presented the audience at our November meeting with the remarkable details of a love story. Barile presented the story of her great-great-grandparents and their unlikely union that took place shortly after the Civil War ended in April 1865. Her great-great-grandmother, Eleanor (Ella) Hope Swain, and her great-great-grandfather, General Smith Dykins Atkins, were from very different worlds. Ella was daughter of a former North Carolina governor and University of North Carolina president, Smith was a Yankee lawyer, newspaperman, and Union general. In a Chapel Hill that had endured hardships and losses in a long civil war, Ella and Smith’s romance and marriage was indeed hard for the locals to phantom.

“Nearly a century and half after Ella and the general met, I found a cardboard folder in my mother’s attic that contained Ella’s letters to her parents. The correspondence revealed a love that transcended the bitterness of war and scandal.”

“After reading Ella’s words, I knew I had to tell their story.”

Suzy used these old letters from Ella to her parents as the basis for Undaunted Heart. In her book, Barile shared the events of Ella’s life and the changes she experienced as a result of meeting a handsome Yankee officer who had been sent to protect the University of North Carolina. According to a neighbor, Mrs. Cornelia Phillips Spencer, Ella and Atkins “‘changed eyes’ at first sight and a wooing followed.”

Unlike that of Eric Segal's fictional Love Story of 1970, this story, which encompassed a difficult period in this country's history, was true. If you are interested in the further details, get a copy of Undaunted Heart (grab a tissue, if so inclined) and prepare to be captivated.

* Comments and Suggestions *******

Comments and suggestions to make the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and "The Runner" more relevant to your Civil War experience are welcomed. Send them to me at tpwinstead@gmail.com. Please include "CFCWRT News" in your Subject line.

Regarding a Trivia Question in last month's Runner:

RICHARD MEAD DID NOT GRADUATE 1ST IN THE CLASS OF 1857 USMA, HE WAS SECOND . JOHN C. PALFREY OF BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS WAS 1ST IN A CLASS OUT OF 38. PLEASE SEE "EDWARD PORTER ALEXANDER"
BY MAURY KLEIN 1957, PAGE 14.
HOWEVER E.P ALEXANDER WAS 3 RD

I appreciate receiving comments about The Runner because it means someone is reading it. It also means, I need to do some more research.

Richard K. Meade, Jr. was E.P. Alexander's roommate while at West Point. I found two sources that stated Meade was first in the class of 1857. I did not check further.
(<http://www.civilwarsignals.org/1st/epalexander/epalexander.html>) As the reader pointed out, other sources gave that distinction to John C. Palfrey.

When sources differ, it is best to consult an authority on the subject. I have been in touch with researchers at West Point and have requested further information about the class rankings in the class of 1857. The cadets receive scores on their actions every day they are at the academy. I hope to see exactly how overall ranking is calculated. I hope to hear from the West Point researchers in a short while, but I believe our reader is correct in his statement.

In the Official Register of Officers and Cadets of the U.S. Military Academy (First Class 1857), Meade had top ranking in 3 of the 6 disciplines (including Engineering), and 3 second rankings in the others with 16 demerits for the year. Palfrey had top ranking in 2 of 6 disciplines, 2 second rankings, and 1 fifth ranking with 6 demerits for the year. In examination of registers for the Second Class of 1856, the Third Class of 1855, and the Fourth Class of 1854, Palfrey ranked ahead of Meade each year. NOTE: Being an engineer by training, I put much stock in Meade's ranking as the #1 engineering student in his First class. The register also showed that Palfrey was age 19 years 6 months upon admission; Meade was 16 years 10 months.

* Parting Words *******

William T. Sherman became the superintendent of the Louisiana Military Seminary in Alexandria during 1859. When Louisiana left the Union on January 26, 1861, Sherman faced a decision, a decision that for him had little room but for one choice. Sherman was all in for the Union. He remained at his post for one additional month, collected his final paycheck, and left his colleagues with these words,

“You are rushing into war with one of the most powerful, ingeniously mechanical and determined people on earth.”

Source: Noah Andre Trudeau, Southern Storm: Sherman's March to the Sea [New York: HarperCollins Publishers, 2008], 25.

Edward C. Anderson also had a decision to make in 1861. In his diary, he told of his decision and his uneasiness with the state to his north.

..... I had decided that under the circumstances it would be impossible for me to stand aloof in the conflict which was pending. I decided to go up to Montgomery and have a talk with the authorities there. Meantime my heart was very heavy within me. I disapproved entirely of the rash course of the politicians of the country North and South, and believed that Georgia especially had been led by the nose by South Carolina. I had been reared under the U S flag in the Navy and was to the innermost recess of my nature, attached to its folds, yet the die was cast & my lot as a Southern man with it.

* Trivia Question Answers December 2011 *******

1 - The Eighth Texas Cavalry was mustered into Confederate service at Houston in September 1861. The Eighth was initially led by Benjamin Franklin Terry; hence, their name Terry's Texas Rangers. Where did the Texans first charge into battle? They were engaged in a small action near Woodsonville, Kentucky on December 17, 1861. Colonel Terry was killed in this engagement. Thomas Lubbock, John Austin Wharton, Thomas Harrison, J.F. Matthews, and others followed Terry as commander of the Eighth Texas. The Texans were known as a hard hitting unit who fought mounted or on foot. They fought at Shiloh, Murfreesboro, Bardstown, and a many other engagements during 1861 – 1865.
Source: <http://www.terrytexastrangers.org> , accessed November 11, 2011.

2 - On July 23, 1864, General John Bell Hood asked the commander of the Eighth Texas to provide him with a capable officer and men to reconnoiter Sherman's artillery batteries which were shelling Atlanta. Who was that officer and what became of this detached unit? Captain Alexander May Shannon became the leader of what became known as the “Shannon Raiders.” This small force, armed with repeating rifles and pistols, became a commando type unit which would strike at Union invaders with intense savagery. Yankee bummers were special targets of Shannon and his men. During Sherman's “March to the Sea,” Shannon's men were cited for actions against the invaders and the invaded civilian population.

Judson Kilpatrick reported on February 22, 1865, the Union troops who had surrendered to the Eighth Texas had been killed and their bodies mutilated. Notes had been attached to their corpses – Death to Foragers. Kilpatrick was supposed to have accused Joe Wheeler and his men, including Shannon, of fighting “under a black flag.” This controversy continued until the end of the war.

On April 15, 1865 when Joe Wheeler informed Shannon that surrender was imminent, the Texans refused to put down their arms, but decided to make their way to the Trans-Mississippi to join Kirby Smith. Supposedly, some of Shannon's men acquired new mounts from nearby Union forces and began to make their way home. After the war, the men of Shannon's command made little mention of their wartime experiences. Alexander Shannon said it best, “I have never had a desire to fly into print and get up controversies over matters that are so long past.”

3 - The Eighth Texas served mainly in the Western Theater, but their last action was with Joseph E. Johnston's army in North Carolina. What was the last major battle in which these veteran Texans were engaged? Who was their newest and youngest member when they engaged in this battle? The Battle of Bentonville was the last major battle in which the Eighth Texas was engaged, March 19 – 21, 1865. Until the end, the Eighth Texas answered the call to battle with their usual tenacity.

Willie Hardee, the only son of Lt. General William J. Hardee, begged this father to allow him to join the Texans so he could win his rank. Willie refused to join Johnston's staff as an aide and he reported said, “he would not have rank until he won it.” General Hardee finally gave his consent.

On March 21st, Hardee ordered the Fourth Tennessee and Eighth Texas forward to attack the advancing units of Mower's command.

“Forward, Rangers! Doc Matthews (Captain Doc Matthews of the Eighth Texas) hollered. “Front into line.” One of the Texans noticed that Private Hardee took his place in the front rank, the general and the son “tipped their hats to each other.” For a moment there was a terrible stillness: “Everything was so plain and clear,” recalled one Ranger, “you could see the [Yankees] handling their guns and hear their shouts of command.” Drawing his sword, General Hardee gave the order and led the charge on a borrowed horse.”

Hardee and his men met Mower's attack and drove the enemy back, but a victory was short-lived. Willie Hardee was to suffer a mortal chest wound.

4 - Who surrendered the city of Raleigh and the state of North Carolina to General William T. Sherman?

Former governors, David L. Swain and William A. Graham, took on this duty on behalf of Governor Zebulon B. Vance. Ella Swain's father, David, had been North Carolina's governor while in his early thirties and President of the University of North Carolina from 1836 until his death in 1868. About 3 o'clock in the evening, in company with Gov. Graham, who had risked life and reputation on behalf of the community to an extent, I delivered the keys of the State House to Gen. Sherman, at the gubernatorial mansion, then his headquarters, and received his assurance that the Capitol and the city should be protected, and the rights of private property duly regarded.

Source: Suzy Barile, Undaunted Heart: The True Story of a Southern Belle & a Yankee General [Hillsborough, North Carolina: Eno Publishers, 2009], 9-10.

5 - How did Ella Swain's mother react to the presence of a Yankee officer in her home? From Undaunted Heart:

Within the Swain household, however, tension was mounting. Even though Ella and Atkins were wooing, and Atkins and David Swain had become fast friends, Mrs. Swain had no interest in friendship with the general or anyone in the Union army, “so great was her hate for the Yankees,” wrote her great-great-granddaughter “Wuff” Newell years later.

‘We will never give up the strife until exterminated or freed and restored to a peaceful security and our own independence.’

Suzy recounted the family lore that Mrs. Swain never sat at the same table as her son-in-law. Even years later, the elder Mrs. Swain declined to dine with Atkins. To his credit, Smith Atkins would carry a food tray to Mrs. Swain's room and keep her company while she dined. After Ella's death on June 13, 1881, Smith granted the elder Mrs. Swain's request that the Atkins children remain with her in North Carolina throughout the fall and winter.

Source: Suzy Barile, Undaunted Heart: The True Story of a Southern Belle & a Yankee General [Hillsborough, North Carolina: Eno Publishers, 2009], 25, 143.

6 - Ella Swain and Smith Atkins were married on August 23, 1865. What was the reaction of University of North Carolina students to the ceremony that took place in the Swain home on Franklin Street? They protested! For three hours, they tolled the campus bells during the wedding ceremony. They also hung General Atkins and President Swain in effigy from the bell tower on Old South.

From Undaunted Heart:

The Swains sent few invitations for the wedding on August 23, 1865. Unlike Mrs. Spencer, many invitees sent their regrets. “Invitations were spit upon in one or two houses!” she wrote, adding that some family friends “were very hot against Ellie.”

We invite and welcome all people with an interest in Civil War history to attend a meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. The speakers for our programs are diverse in their views, interpretations, and presentations.

 President's Message *****

President Bob Cooke

Please join us on 10 November for another great presentation. The season began with a talk by Don Wilkinson about his blockade-running ancestor, Lt. John Wilkinson. It continued in October with our own (past president) Dr. Chris Fonvielle, who spoke on Timothy O'Sullivan and the photographs O'Sullivan took of Fort Fisher in 1865. In November, Suzy Barile will present a story of two very different people who fell in love in the days after the close of the Civil War.

Kudos and thanks to the new Steering Committee members – Linda Lashley (who will assist Bruce Patterson in Treasurer/Membership), Martha Watson (Publicity), and John Moore (Refreshments). Remember, when you mention the RT to friends and neighbors, invite them to attend a meeting.

Undaunted Heart: The True Story of a Southern Belle & a Yankee General

Suzy Barile will make a presentation based upon her book about the unlikely relationship that developed between Ella Swain and Union General Smith Atkins. Set in Chapel Hill and Freeport, Illinois immediately following the end of the Civil War, Barile will share the story that forever changed her family's history.

From <http://www.blairpub.com/alltitles/undauntedheart.htm>:

When a brigade of General Sherman's victorious army marched into Chapel Hill the day after Easter 1865, the Civil War had just ended and President Abraham Lincoln had been assassinated. Citizens of the picturesque North Carolina college town had endured years of hardship and sacrifice, and now the Union army was patrolling its streets. One of Sherman's young generals paid a visit to the stately home of David Swain, president of the University of North Carolina and a former governor of the state, to inform him that the town was now under Union occupation.

Against this unlikely backdrop began a passionate and controversial love story still vivid in town lore. When President Swain's daughter Ella met the Union general, life for these two young people who had spent the war on opposite sides was forever altered.

General Smith Atkins of Illinois abhorred slavery and greatly admired Abraham Lincoln. Spirited young Ella Swain had been raised in a slave-owning family and had spent the war years gathering supplies to send to Confederate soldiers.

But, as a close friend of the Swains wrote, when Atkins met Ella, the two "'changed eyes' at first sight and a wooing followed."

The reaction of the Swains and fellow North Carolinians to this North-South love affair was swift and often unforgiving.

In Undaunted Heart: The True Story of a Southern Belle & a Yankee General, author Suzy Barile, a great-great-granddaughter of Ella Swain and Smith Atkins, tells their story, separating facts from the elaborate embellishments the famous courtship and marriage have taken on over the generations. Interwoven throughout Undaunted Heart are excerpts from Ella's never-before-published letters to her parents that reveal a loving marriage that transcended differences and scandal.

* Trivia Questions November 2011 *******

- 1 – On April 15, 1861, President Abraham Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for 75,000 volunteers "to cause the laws to be duly executed." Smith D. Atkins, States' Attorney for the Fourteenth Judicial Circuit of Illinois, was in the courtroom when a telegram was received that announced Lincoln's proclamation. Atkins, an ardent supporter of Lincoln during the 1860 presidential contest, immediately took action in support of the president. What action did Atkins take?
- 2– Atkins saw early service at Fort Donelson and Pittsburg Landing where he received notice for his personal bravery and conspicuous service. After his resignation for ill health and a period of convalescence, Atkins returned to the army and progressed in rank. By the beginning of the Atlanta Campaign of 1864, Colonel Atkins was in command of a cavalry unit. Atkins was in command of Judson Kilpatrick's 2nd Brigade when Sherman began his March to the Sea. By the time Sherman took Savannah, Atkins had become a Brevet Brigadier General. At what location in North Carolina did Atkins find himself in a difficult "gap" that required his skills as a leader?
- 3 – A soldier in the 92nd Illinois remembered Atkins as having "a slick tongue and was fond of speech making." Atkins's skill with speech was evident in that he could talk the daughter of a Southern slaving owning family into marrying him and moving to Illinois. Who else in the Swain family did Atkins convince to relocate to Illinois?
- 4 – After the Lilian was captured off Wilmington on August 24, 1864, Acting Volunteer Lieutenant Thos. C. Dunn of the United States Navy questioned the captain, mate, and chief engineer of the captured ship. Dunn's examination of these officers learned what each man would be paid for successfully running through the blockade. What was each man to have been paid for their run?

5 – Fort Fisher's Battery Meade (Hospital) was named for Confederate engineer, Richard K. Meade. Captain Meade had an unusual entry on his resume. Have any idea about Meade's unusual qualification?

6 – How many pictures did Dr. Fonvielle discover during his thirty year search for additional O'Sullivan photographs?

 November 1861 *****

November 1861 saw a turn in the weather for the worse and as was to become a norm in the American Civil War, the winter months saw little military activity. However, the suffering of the soldiers in the field increased and disease was as much an enemy for the soldier as was his opponent in the field.

November 1st: General McClellan, aged 35, took up his post as overall commander of the United States Army. General Frémont agreed to an exchange of prisoners in Missouri – but such action could only be carried out with the express support of the President.

November 2nd: General Frémont was formally relieved of his command and was replaced by General David Hunter.

November 3rd: Jefferson Davis and his senior army commanders disagreed on how the Confederacy should proceed. His major opponent was General Beauregard. Jefferson tried to bring onto his side commanders he felt shared his views such as General Robert E Lee.

November 4th: A Union naval force arrived at Port Royal Bar. An anchorage here gave the Unionists dominance along the whole coast of South Carolina and allowed the blockade to be better enforced.

November 6th: Jefferson Davis was elected to a six-year term as President of the Confederacy. Alexander Stephens was appointed Vice-President.

November 7th: A battle at Belmont, Missouri, left about 100 Unionist and 261 Confederate soldiers dead. Over 1000 men were reported as missing from both sides.

November 8th: Two Confederate commissioners (John Slidell and James Mason) joined a British ship, the 'Trent', in Havana en route to the UK. In international waters, the 'USS San Jacinto', forced the 'Trent' to heave to and surrender Slidell and Mason. Once this is done, the 'Trent' was allowed to continue with both men's families on board – but not them.

November 12th: McClellan announced a major shake-up of the Union command structure. The Department of the West was split into three new departments – New Mexico, Kansas and Missouri. Previously one man had commanded all of these. Now, each new department had a new commander.

November 15th: Slidell and Mason were landed at Fortress Monroe, Virginia. Political bigwigs in Washington DC were quick to congratulate Captain Wilkes of the ‘USS San Jacinto’ with some even suggesting that the ‘Trent’ itself should have been taken in as well. However, once the celebrations died down it became apparent that Wilkes had acted as he did in international waters against a ship belonging to the world’s greatest naval power. There was a fear that the UK would be pushed into supporting the Confederacy as a result of this. Postmaster-General Blair and Senator Sumner of Massachusetts called for Slidell and Mason to be released with due speed.

November 19th: Davis called for the construction of a major rail network in the Confederacy to allow for the rapid movement of troops and supplies.

November 24th: Commissioners Slidell and Mason were moved to Massachusetts amid fears in Washington DC that the episode might lead to war between the UK and the North.

November 27th: News of what happened to the ‘Trent’ finally reached London and the outcry was immediate.

November 30th: The British Foreign Secretary, Lord John Russell, wrote to the British ambassador in Washington that he, on behalf of the British government, was to express in the strongest terms Britain’s outrage over what happened to the ‘Trent’. Lyons was to demand the immediate release of Slidell and Mason and a formal apology from the Federal government. In a private letter, Russell told Lyons to give the Federal government 10 days before closing the embassy and cutting diplomatic relations. The Royal navy was put on alert and the Guards regiments were told to prepare to sail to Canada. NOTE: The Trent Affair was about as close as Great Britain and the United States came to war with each other. Amanda’s Foreman’s A World of Fire: Britain’s Crucial Role in the American Civil War provides a detailed study of the relationships between these powers.

 Through the Blockade *****

Not every captain of a blockade runner was cast in the image of the gallant Rhett Butler of Gone with the Wind fame. Captain Daniel H. Martin of the Lilian was cast of a different metal, a metal that did not shine brightly during a dash into Wilmington on July 30, 1864.

Wilmington’s own, Captain John Newland Maffitt, was the Lilian’s first skipper to make the run into Wilmington. Daniel Martin was the skipper on the second and the third & final run.

 Recollections of a Rebel Reefer *****

In James Morris Morgan’s book, Morgan related the story of several Confederate Navy officers, Lieutenants Campbell, Ingraham, King, and Midshipman Morgan, who were returning from service in Europe where they had been attached to various Confederate commerce raiders. As crew members of commerce raiders, these officers were considered to be pirates by the Union Navy; hence, each officer was subject to be hung if they were captured while risking a run “through the blockade.”

According to Morgan's account, the Confederate naval officers made their way by private steamers from Liverpool to Halifax, Nova Scotia, and on to St. George, Bermuda. They boarded the Lilian for the final leg of their journey back into the Confederacy. It was on the Lilian where Morgan met the biggest "braggart and blowhard as ever commanded a ship."

When fifty miles from the Cape Fear, the Lilian was sighted and chased by the steam sloop-of-war, USS Shenandoah. Captain Martin, reported to be "already in his cups," squandered the Lilian's speed advantage by steering a course that allowed the pursuing Shenandoah to fully utilize her full spread of sails. Martin "went below and stored several big drinks of brandy under his vest, and then coming on deck, in a spirit of braggadocio, hoisted the Confederate flag." Lieutenant W.P.A. Campbell ordered his companions to go below and don their uniforms and side arms – if they were to be captured, they would be so as officers of the Confederate Navy.

The Shenandoah's gunners began firing on the Lilian and they soon had the range of the blockade-runner. When a shot hit the Lilian's paddlebox on which Martin was standing, Martin screamed that the flag should be lowered, "I will not have any more lives sacrificed." Lieutenant Campbell reacted to Martin's intended surrender by calmly saying: "Captain, if you want to give up this boat, turn her over to me. I will not allow you to surrender her. These officers are branded as pirates, and according to President Lincoln's proclamation may be hung if captured."

The tension among the crew and passengers on the Lilian heightened as the gunners on the Shenandoah continued to cause damage to the delicate blockade-runner. The engine room crew fled onto deck after a boiler was hit and its super hot steam escaped with a roar. Captain Martin shouted to Campbell, "If you are going to take my ship, take her!" Martin then disappeared into relative safety below deck. Campbell turned to his officers and calmly ordered them to kill any man who attempted to lower their flag.

The chief engineer informed Campbell that he would be able to maintain steam on the remaining boilers. Their speed had been reduced by a third, but they could still keep up their attempted escape. He also informed the lieutenant that he had previously been a prisoner of the Union Navy and he and his men had no desire to endure that fate once again. According to Morgan, the crew cheered when they heard their chief engineer's remarks.

Campbell ordered a course change that forced the Shenandoah to take in her sails. This maneuver allowed the Lilian to maintain their lead on their pursuer; however, they were forced to go in close to the pounding surf. As night fell, Campbell took the Lilian as close to the shore as possible and he headed her southward toward the protection of Fort Fisher's guns. They had escaped the guns of the Shenandoah; however, the Lilian was not swift enough to make the inlet that night. As the sun rose the next morning, several of the Union blockade ships spotted the Lilian and they opened fire on the already damaged runner. Campbell ordered that all available speed be gotten from the remaining boilers and that the ship be taken under the fort's guns without delay. Campbell and the Lilian were lucky for they soon dropped anchor and their pursuers heeded the menace of Fort Fisher's gunners.

Where was Captain Martin during the running fight for his ship? According to James Morris Morgan, Captain Martin was dead drunk in his bunk with an empty brandy bottle by his side. Where was Martin when officers from Fort Fisher arrived to welcome the Lilian to safety? Again according to Morgan, Martin received the visitors and when told that the Lilian's dash through the blockade had been one of the most daring they had seen, Martin modestly replied: “Oh, it was nothing; we have to take chances in our business!” Morgan also reported that Lieutenant Campbell witnessed the exchange but remained silent as to his part in the daring dash.

James Morris Morgan was not satisfied with his depiction of Captain Martin’s behavior during the Lilian’s return to Wilmington. In his memoir, Morgan included the story of Martin’s surrender of the Lilian on its first voyage after it was repaired while in port. Morgan also used reports by Captain Ridgely, commander of the Shenandoah, which detailed the chase and the 140 shots fired by the Union ship. Ridgely said, “He was a bold blockade-runner and flew the rebel flag as long as we could see him” As told by Morgan, the boldness of which Ridgely spoke was not that of Captain Martin but of the Lieutenant W.P.A. Campbell, Confederate States Navy, who had taken control in the midst of the crisis.

From Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion, Morgan included parts of an interview by a Union officer who questioned the captain of the Lilian after its capture.

My name is Daniel Martin, a native of Liverpool, England..... Was three weeks in Wilmington repairing boiler injured in chase..... The Confederate colors were hoisted by some of the passengers,,,,,,

In Stephen R. Wise’s Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War, a somewhat different story evolved from the details of the July voyage. Martin was faced with a mutiny of his crew as it departed from St. George. Martin and his officers called for help from a passing vessel; the troublesome firemen were subdued until they cooled down. Given the choice of imprisonment or returning to work, the disgruntled firemen resumed their duties and the Lilian continued with its voyage.

As the Lilian approached the Cape Fear, Martin and his “merry” men did encounter the USS Shenandoah and a chase was begun. When a boiler collapsed or was hit by shot from the Shenandoah, the fireman again refused to work. Martin met the mutinous crewmembers armed with a pistol in one hand and a bottle of brandy in the other. Martin, fortified with good brandy, forced the firemen back to work.

The story of the Lilian was the same until the battered ship entered into the Cape Fear River. Maybe Martin received welcomes and admiration from Fort Fisher’s officers, however, Martin and the Lilian did receive two warning shots from Fort Anderson’s guns when he failed to stop for inspection.

Source: Stephen R. Wise, Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War (Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina Press, 1988), 159-161.

Somehow these stories reminded me of Lloyd Bensen’s 1988 remark to Dan Quayle about a Quayle comparison to Jack Kennedy. “I knew John Maffitt. John Maffitt was a friend of mine. Captain Martin, you are no John Maffitt!”

 Concise Military Writing *****

While much writing in official Civil War reports and individual participant recollections were long on flowery and protracted language, not everyone succumbed to the tendency to over report. Member Lance Bevins provided the following exchange that showed that some soldiers knew how to state facts and let them stand on their own merits.

To Major General Early:

General: General Jackson desires to know why he saw so many of your stragglers in the rear of your division today?

Signed: A.S. Pendleton, A.A.G

Dear General Jackson:

In answer to your note I would state that I think it is probable that the reason you saw so many of my stragglers on the march today is due to the fact that you rode in the rear of my division.

Respectfully,

Jubal Early
Major General

Fort Fisher 1865: The Photographs of T.H. O'Sullivan

“Fonvielle entertaining questions!”

Dr. Chris Fonvielle provided an interesting presentation that documented the photographic history of Fort Fisher made by Timothy O’Sullivan in early February 1865. Chris told the audience how he had become interested in the 36 photographs that were displayed at the Blockade Runners of the Confederacy Museum where he was curator from 1979 until 1983. With his interest drawn to those photographs, Chris began a thirty year search for previously unidentified photographs that O’Sullivan may have made during his visit to Fort Fisher.

“Fonvielle at book signing”

At the instigation of his Chief Engineer (Colonel Cyrus Comstock), Ulysses Grant requested that a photographic record be made to reflect the strength and construction of Fort Fisher. The firm of Alexander Gardner sent one of its experienced assistants, Timothy H. O’Sullivan, to photograph this important military fortification. Fort Fisher had been taken on January 15, 1865; however, Braxton Bragg and Robert F. Hoke’s Division held the line about 4 miles north of the fort. O’Sullivan began his assignment under the threat of counterattack by the Confederate troops at Sugar Loaf. Fonvielle noted that Braxton Bragg, as usual, failed to attack and retake Fort Fisher (even though he had been ordered to do so by Jefferson Davis).

Fonvielle used newspaper reports that placed O’Sullivan at the fort on February 4, 1865. Chris systematically followed O’Sullivan as he made 39 pictures of the various land-face and sea-face batteries and 2 photographs of the Union fleet that attacked the fort. Chris shared his careful examination of each photograph that revealed much about the activities that the Union forces performed to make the fort secure against any Confederate counterattack. The Union forces rebuilt the palisades and remounted cannons that had been damaged by the heavy naval bombardment of January 13 – 15.

The Mound Battery

For more details and stories about Fort Fisher and O'Sullivan, Fonvielle's book, Fort Fisher 1865: The Photographs of T.H. O'Sullivan provides a great resource to understanding the engineering feat that was accomplished by Confederate engineers from the fort's beginning in April 1861 until its fall on January 15, 1865.

* Trivia Question Answers November 2011 *******

1 - On April 15, 1861, President Abraham Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for 75,000 volunteers "to cause the laws to be duly executed." Smith D. Atkins, States' Attorney for the Fourteenth Judicial Circuit of Illinois, was in the courtroom on April 17 when a telegram was received that announced Lincoln's proclamation. Atkins, an ardent supporter of Lincoln during the 1860 presidential contest, immediately took action in support of the president. What action did Atkins take? Smith D. Atkins prepared an enlistment roll, added his name at the top of the roll, and announced his decision to the Court and jury that he was prepared to serve in the Union Army. He then left the unresolved case in the hands of another attorney and went into the streets of Freeport to find additional volunteers. By the end of the day, Atkins had gained 100 names to his enlistment roll. These three months volunteers became Company A of the 11th Illinois Infantry. Smith Dykins Atkins was elected to be Captain of the company.

2 – Atkins saw early service at Fort Donelson and Pittsburg Landing where he received notice for his personal bravery and conspicuous service. After his resignation for ill health and a period of convalescence, Atkins returned to the army and progressed in rank. By the beginning of the Atlanta Campaign of 1864, Colonel Atkins was in command of a cavalry unit. Atkins was in command of Judson Kilpatrick's 2nd Brigade when Sherman began his March to the Sea. By the time Sherman took Savannah, Atkins had become a Brevet Brigadier General. At what location in North Carolina did Atkins find himself in a difficult "gap" that required his skills as a leader? As Sherman advanced into North Carolina, Judson Kilpatrick decided to divide his force and send them on divergent routes to interfere with William Hardee and Wade Hampton's Confederate column of march toward Fayetteville. On the night of March 9, 1865, Atkins and the 2nd Brigade found themselves between Hardee's infantry and Hampton's long cavalry column as all made their way toward Monroe's Crossroads.

"We had filled the gap in the Rebel column," recalled a member of the 92nd Illinois. One of Joe Wheeler's staff officers mistook Atkins's brigade for Rebels. Hoping to hurry the Southern column along he moved in while cursing the laggard cavalry to pick up the pace. The aggravated Federals promptly captured him. Fearful that their cover had been blown, Atkins dismounted his men, deployed a section of artillery, and waited for an attack that never materialized. His deployment in the darkness prevented him from pushing on until morning. March 10th would bring another surprise for Atkins and especially his boss, Judson Kilpatrick; however, that is another story.

3 – John M. King, soldier in the 92nd Illinois, remembered Smith Atkins as having "a slick tongue and was fond of speech making." Atkins's skill with speech was evident in that he could talk the daughter of a Southern slaving owning family into marrying him and moving to Illinois. Who else in the Swain family did Atkins likewise convince to relocate to Illinois? Richard Caswell Swain, Ella Swain's brother, had been an assistant surgeon in the 39th Regiment of N.C. Troops, but he had experienced difficulties in establishing a practice after the war. At the urging of his brother-in-law, Swain moved to Illinois during 1868 and began a medical practice in Carroll County. Swain was killed while attempting to board a train on January 29, 1872. Swain was honored by his descendants and members of the Fourth Texas Infantry at a ceremony held in the Freeport City Cemetery on July 23, 2011.

4 – After the Lilian was captured off Wilmington on August 24, 1864, Acting Volunteer Lieutenant Thos. C. Dunn of the United States Navy questioned the captain, mate, and chief engineer of the captured ship. Dunn's examination of these officers learned what each man would be paid for successfully running through the blockade. What was each man to have been paid for their run?

Captain Daniel Martin was to have received $3,000; Mate George Gowanlock was due $600, and Chief Engineer Francis Skuse $800 for the trip. It should be noted that all three men were Her Majesty's subjects. These "examinations" as Dunn called them in his report to Acting Rear-Admiral S.P. Lee can be read in full in the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies Series I, Vol. 10, pages 393-395.

What are these payments worth in today's dollars? $43,000, $8,590, and $11,500 -respectively. Note: These amounts were generated using the Consumer Price Index as the computation tool.

The rate of pay for running the blockade was a lure for the men who assumed some risk. The foreign captains and crews seldom took chances like the Confederate Navy officers who commanded many of the blockade runners. John Maffitt, John Wilkinson, and Michael Usina were examples of Confederate Navy officers who showed a strong sense of duty to bring their ships and needed supplies safely to port. If Lieutenant Campbell did indeed take control of the Lilian, the successful run into Wilmington was a matter of duty and survival rather than pay. Interestingly, Captain Martin reported in his statement to his captors, “There is talk in Wilmington of the Confederate Government taking all the vessels engaged in the blockade running business and putting them under command of Confederate officers.” The Confederate authorities recognized the propensity of civilian captains to surrender their ships and cargoes rather than risk the possibility of injury. Men like Maffitt, Wilkinson, and Usina understood the importance of the supplies they were bring into port and were much more willing to take risk to deliver their cargoes.

5 – Fort Fisher’s Battery Meade (Hospital) was named for Confederate engineer, Richard K. Meade. Captain Meade had an unusual entry on his resume. Have any idea about Meade’s unusual qualification? Richard K. Meade, Jr., a Petersburg, Virginia native, was a member of Robert Anderson’s staff on April 12, 1861 when South Carolina troops fired on Fort Sumter. He resigned his commission on May 1, 1861 and joined the Confederate Army as an engineer. Meade roomed with Edward Alexander Porter at West Point – Meade graduated 1st in his class and Alexander 3rd. Meade served at Fort Fisher and was transferred to the Army of Northern Virginia. On July 31, 1862, Meade died of typhoid fever at his parent’s home in Petersburg, Virginia.

6 - How many pictures did Dr. Fonvielle discover during his thirty year search for additional O’Sullivan photographs? Fonvielle discovered 3 photographs of the fort and 2 of the attacking Union fleet. During his presentation, Dr. Fonvielle stated that there were probably additional photographs taken by O’Sullivan, but it would take further research to find and determine that they were taken by O’Sullivan during February 1865.

Fort Fisher 1865: The Photographs of T.H. O'Sullivan

Timothy O'Sullivan 1840 – 1882 Dr. Chris Fonvielle

CFCWRT member, Dr. Chris Fonvielle, will present a program based upon his recently published book about the photographic history of Fort Fisher made by T.H. O'Sullivan during February 1865.

As reported in the New York Herald on February 8, 1865, Messrs. Gardner & Company, as requested by Lt. Gen. Grant, dispatched an experienced Civil War photographer to make a series of views of Fort Fisher for Grant's report on the Wilmington expedition. The thirty-nine photographs taken by O'Sullivan have provided a detailed record of the fortifications that protected the many blockade runners that made entrance into New Inlet during 1861 – 1865.

It has been said that a picture is worth a thousand words. Chris has used O'Sullivan's photographs to paint a picture of the fort that had become known as the Gibraltar of the South. Please join us on October 13th for a program that will add to our knowledge of the local history of the Cape Fear region during the Civil War. As is his style, Chris is sure to share anecdotes that will add human interest stories to the largest naval bombardment ever to have occurred on this continent.

Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr. is a native of Wilmington with a lifelong interest in the American Civil War, the Lower Cape Fear, and Southern history. He currently teaches courses on the Civil War, Wilmington and the Lower Cape Fear, and the Old South and Antebellum America at the University of North Carolina Wilmington. Among his many books and articles, The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, is the definitive examination of the Union effort to close the port of Wilmington.

* Trivia Questions September 2011 *******

- 1 – Who was John H. Foard? Why was he important to the Civil War history of the Cape Fear region?
- 2 – At the southern end of the Fort Fisher sea face, Battery Lamb (Mound Battery) towered some forty-three feet above the beach. This important battery provided protection for blockade runners entering or leaving the Cape Fear River through the New Inlet. It also served as the signaling station to assist the blockade runners trying to navigate into the river. During the bombardment on December 24, 1864, Colonel Lamb ordered that a Confederate flag be raised on the Mound Battery in defiance of the Union ships shelling the fort. Because the signaling flagpole was not equipped with halyards to raise a flag, someone would be required to climb the pole and manually attach the flag. Who was the “volunteer” who came forward to attach the fort’s standard to the Mound Battery flagpole?
- 3 – Mr. Wilkinson’s presentation began with a slide that showed a seal with crossed naval guns overlaid by an anchor with the inscription “C.S.N” and the phrase, “Aide toi et Dieu t’Aidera.” Know where the phrase originated? Know what Confederate leader had this phrase engraved on his sword?
- 4 – Among the officers who served in the Confederate States Navy, Commander James D. Bulloch, a Georgia native, was sent to England where he purchased, manned, and commanded the CSS Fingal in bringing a much needed cargo of military stores to Savannah, Georgia during November 1861. Because of his unique managerial talents, Bulloch was sent back to England where he achieved prominence for his actions as Chief Purchasing Officer for the CSN in Great Britain. Bulloch’s talents included establishment of contacts & methods that allowed the Confederate Navy to clandestinely contract the construction and equipage of warships in violation on Britain’s Neutrality Act. Among the ships Bulloch procured, the Laird #290 became the most effective commerce raider of the war. The Laird cruiser #290 slipped out of Liverpool as the unarmed Enrica and after a cat-and-mouse game with the USS Tuscaloosa, the Enrica proceeded to the Azores where she received guns and other equipment needed to complete a warship. Having completed his task, Bulloch turned the Enrica over to a new captain. Who was that captain who would take command and commission the ship as a Confederate warship? Why was Bulloch not given command of the #290?

5 – Lt. John Wilkinson commanded the CSS Robert E. Lee through the Union blockade 21 times. During these trips, Wilkinson delivered some 7,000 bales of cotton to European markets and he returned through the same blockade with critical stores for the Confederate government. What was the fate of the CSS Robert E. Lee?

6 – During the Civil War, Imperial Russia was the only European nation that unequivocally supported the Union and its cause. The leaders of the two nations recognized the similarity between Czar Alexander II's freeing of Russia's serfs and Lincoln's freeing of America's slaves. After the czar survived an assassination attempt on April 16, 1866, the United States Congress, remembering Abraham Lincoln's assassination, enacted a resolution of sympathy to the Russian people. Gustavus Fox was selected to personally take the message to Russia. On what iron-clad did Fox make the nearly one year tour of ports from the Mediterranean to the Baltic?

October 1st: President Lincoln met with his Cabinet and senior army figures such as McClellan to discuss a major operation against the Confederates along the east coast. Ironically, Jefferson Davis was doing the same in Richmond regarding an attack against Unionist positions in Virginia as the public in the South were also expecting a major military campaign against the enemy.

October 3rd: Governor Thomas More of Alabama banned the export of cotton to Europe. He hoped that this would pressure the governments of France and Great Britain to recognize the Confederate government. Soldiers fought at Greenbriar, western Virginia, which resulted in over 100 Confederate dead while the Unionists lost just eight killed but also captured a large number of horses and cattle.

October 4th: The Confederacy signed a number of treaties with Native American tribes that brought these tribes into the war on the side of the Confederacy.

October 5th: The Cabinet in Washington DC signed a contract for a new type of warship – the Ironclad. The first was called the ‘USS Monitor’ and had a pair of heavy guns in a revolving turret.

Note: This was one of the pivotal moments in the course of the Civil War for John Ericsson’s “Cheesebox on a Raft” would have significant impact on Great Britain’s decisions concerning recognition of the Confederacy. See  More Summer Reading  for more information. A review of Howard J. Fuller’s Clad in Iron: The American Civil War and the Challenge of British Naval Power further explained the impact of ironclads on naval policies in both the United States and Great Britain. Editor

October 6th: The Confederacy started a campaign to find crossings over the Upper Potomac that, if successful, would have allowed them to outflank the Unionist force in the capital.

October 7th: Lincoln sent the Secretary of War to Missouri to investigate what exactly was going on as more reports reached Washington DC about the incompetence of General Frémont. What Secretary of War Simon Cameron found was that it had taken Frémont seventeen days to organize troops in an effort to retake Lexington. The news was not well received by President Lincoln.

October 8th: William T Sherman was appointed commander of the Union’s Army of the Cumberland. Sherman replaced the ill General Robert Anderson.

October 10th: Jefferson Davis, while discussing the fact that the South has a smaller population when compared to the North, ruled out using slaves in the Confederate Army.

October 12th: Two commissioners from the Confederacy left the South for Europe. Their task was to increase trade between the South and the UK and France. In Missouri many people, opposed to Frémont’s harsh rule, took part in clashes against Unionist forces.

October 14th: President Lincoln suspended habeas corpus. Though he did so reluctantly, Lincoln felt that such a move was necessary to the war effort.

October 16th: Lexington in Missouri was back in the hands of the Union after Confederate forces withdrew from the town.

October 18th: Union gunboats started a move down the Mississippi River.

October 20th: McClellan believed that the Confederacy was planning a major move against Washington DC.

October 21st: A Union force suffered heavy losses at Ball’s Bluff. The Union force, commanded by Colonel Edward Baker, believed that it was attacking a small Confederate force. In fact, they advanced into four Confederate regiments. In the confusion that reigned in the Union ranks, many men tried to swim across the river at Ball’s Bluff but were drowned. 223 Unionists were killed at Ball’s Bluff, 226 wounded and 445 taken prisoner. The Confederates lost 36 men killed. There was an outcry in the North but the Confederate leader at Ball’s Bluff, Nathan Evans, was hailed as a hero by the Confederacy.

October 22nd: Lincoln’s Cabinet met to discuss the disaster at Ball’s Bluff.

October 24th: Lincoln decided to replace Frémont as Union commander in Missouri. He appointed General David Hunter as his replacement “with immediate effect”.

October 29th: A major naval force sailed from Hampton Roads – 77 ships. The ships carried 12,000 troops commanded by General T Sherman. Deliberate leaks make the Confederates believe that the naval force will target Charleston or New Orleans. In fact, it was heading for Port Royal, South Carolina.

October 31st: General Winfield Scott, head of the Union Army, retired at the age of 75. He was replaced by General George McClellan.

At our September meeting, Don Wilkinson provided a view from a Blockade Runner– tension, exhilaration, and danger were ever present to the crew of a runner. It was easy to picture John Wilkinson with his pistol threatening to shoot anyone who made a sound that would give the ship’s presence to the enemy. What was the view from an officer on a Blockader off New Inlet?

Off Wilmington, April 23, 1863

Well we poked around in the darkness for some time without hearing or seeing anything but the lights I have already mentioned when we anchored & at 1 I turned in & slept till the deafening report of the 9 in. gun directly over my head, followed in a moment or two by the rush of a rocket, slightly disturbed my quite slumbers & led me to suspect that something was in the process of “turning up.”

A dense thick fog enveloped us on every side rendering objects invisible but a few feet from the vessel. Our sides were lined with anxious faces peering into the surrounding darkness in search of the object of our alarm. This, as the officer of the deck states, was a large steamer which stole noiselessly out of the fog & glided by us as quickly & quietly as a shadow. Before he could train a gun on it, it had disappeared in the fog.

Keeler related the heightened activity when a runner was sighted, but he also wrote of the extreme boredom that accompanied the “sameness” that constituted the daily activities of the crew of a Blockader.

 More Summer Reading *****

Amanda Foreman’s book, A World on Fire: An Epic History of Two Nations Divided, whetted my appetite for additional reading on the roles of Great Britain and the United States during the Civil War.

I plunged into another work that added more to what I had learned. Howard J. Fuller wrote a technical analysis of the evolution of ironclads as they developed in France, Great Britain, and the United States. Clad in Iron: The American Civil War and the Challenge of British Naval Power concentrated on the variety of ship designs and designers, naval ordinance advances, evolution of armor plating, and strategies that were considered by each government.

The characters depicted in Fuller's book were familiar from previous readings; however, Fuller more fully presented the contributions of men like John Ericsson, Gustavus Fox, and Gideon Welles to the Union naval development. On the British side, Fuller presented the evolving British reaction to the challenge of Ericsson's Monitor. The leaders in both the Lincoln and Palmerston governments played a delicate game to develop and maintain a naval power to counter that of the other. Fortunately for the United States, Ericsson, Fox, and Welles created a naval force that gave the British pause during the period in which the British government considered actions against the United States.

I enjoyed this book; however, I needed to be in the mood to study the technical developments, personality clashes, and diplomatic dealing that contributed to the armored, steam-powered vessels that forever changed naval warfare. The March 9, 1862 Battle of Hampton Roads between the C.S.S Virginia and the U.S.S Monitor was the impetus that accelerated evolution of all ships that were to be "clad in iron."

The Most Good for the Confederacy
Captain John Wilkinson, CSN

Donald Wilkinson, great great-nephew of Captain John Wilkinson, presented a fascinating program that shared revealing information about John Wilkinson and others who served with the Confederate States Navy.

Donald Wilkinson - John Wilkinson 1821 – 1891

Mr. Wilkinson began his presentation with a discussion of the strategies developed by the Union and Confederate leaders to “rule the seas.” While the Union strategy evolved from Winfield Scott’s schema that became known as the Anaconda Plan – the Union would build a powerful navy that would blockade and strangle the rebellious and agricultural Southern states. The Confederate strategy evolved from the mind of Stephen R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy – the Confederates would use technology to overcome the numerical advantages of the Union navy, they would employ commercial raiders to destroy Yankee commerce, and they would utilize the competent naval officers who chose loyalty to the Southern cause. The availability or lack of manufacturing capability would further shape the strategies of each – The Union would produce the ships needed to accomplish their task, the Confederates would build but few ships to challenge their enemies and they would seek to purchase most of their arms and ships in Europe. Thus began the naval war of 1861 – 1865.

The Confederate Navy had an abundance of experienced and qualified officers. They had few ships available for these competent men to serve upon; hence, a Confederate naval officer was offered the opportunity for a broad variety of services untraditional to in the pre-war United States Navy. Wilkinson discussed the variety of duties that many of these men undertook; these duties included serving “aboard” either: Artillery Batteries, Gunboats, Commerce Cruisers, Blockade Runners, Administrative positions, Ironclad Rams, Covert Operations, Special Duty Abroad, or Torpedo Service. Among these officers were: Comdr. James Bullock, Lt. Hunter Davidson, Comdr. Catesby Jones, Comdr. John N. Maffitt, Lt. Charles M. Morris, Capt. Thomas J. Page, Capt. Raphael Semmes, Lt. Alex Warley, Lt. John Wilkinson, and Lt. John Taylor Wood.

In addition to the naval officers, Mr. Wilkinson provided information concerning three men who shaped the strategy that the Confederacy would employ during the war. As previously stated, Stephen

R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy, was a proponent of the South's use of advanced technology that included iron-armored ships, torpedoes, fast steam-powered commerce raiders – the inadequacy of Southern manufacturing capability limited the successful adaptation of these new technologies. Christopher Memminger, Secretary of Treasury, supported the strategy to withhold cotton from the European textile industry in an effort to force European intervention – this “Cotton is King” strategy failed miserably, for at the time when the Union blockade was weak, the South could have shipped much cotton to provide cash credits to purchase the manufactured items needed for the war effort. George A. Trenholm became the banker of the Confederacy who arranged the financial resources that James Bulloch and others would require in Europe. Trenholm's expertise made available international banking services for the Confederate cause.

With the background of the Confederate Navy established, Mr. Wilkinson began to share the story of his great-great-uncle, Lt. John Wilkinson.

John Wilkinson was born in Norfolk, Virginia on November 6, 1821. The son of Commodore Jesse Wilkinson and Frances Coleman Wilkinson, John followed his father's path when he was appointed a Midshipman in 1837. During the Mexican War, John served on the USS Saratoga which was commanded by David Farragut. John Wilkinson saw service with the Coastal Survey. By 1860, he was Chief of the Hydrographic Party and commanded the USS Corwin. John Wilkinson resigned his commission in the USN on April 6, 1861.

Wilkinson was first assigned to command of a Confederate shore battery at Ft. Powhatan on the James River. As with most of his deep water navy comrades, John longed for service abroad ship.

John was ordered to New Orleans where he saw service as executive officer on the powerful, but uncompleted and immobile, CSS Louisiana. Union commander, David Farragut, ordered David D. Porter to use his mortar boats to reduce Ft. Jackson and St. Phillip. When the bombardment and an expedition that cut a chain that blocked the river were complete, Farragut steamed passed the forts and the tethered Louisiana on the night of April 24, 1862, and captured the city. The forts surrendered and left the Louisiana to its fate - destruction by its crew and capture of the crew by Union forces. John was sent to Ft. Warren in Boston Harbor where he would remain until exchanged on August 5, 1862.

On August 6, 1862, Wilkinson reported to George W. Randolph, Confederate Secretary of War, for special duty in England. Wilkinson carried cotton bonds from Secretary Memminger to Commissioner James Mason and he was also charged to purchase a ship capable of running the Union blockade. (NOTE: Wilkinson was accompanied by an interesting group that included Major Benjamin Franklin Ficklin, Colonel William Finney, and Johnny Tabb. Theirs was another story; however, be sure to check out Ben Ficklin). Wilkinson purchased the fast packet ship Giraffe from Alexander Collie & Co. Lt. Wilkinson and the renamed CSS Robert E. Lee thus began the adventure as one of the most successful blockade runners. With John Wilkinson in command, the CSS Robert E. Lee (900 tons, 283' length, 20' beam, and 13' depth) made 21 trips through the Union blockade.

Mr. Wilkinson shared a unique example of what it was like to have been on a blockade runner trying to sneak into either the Old Inlet at Fort Caswell or the New Inlet at Fort Fisher. Imagine yourself on board the Robert E. Lee where there were no navigational instruments to guide you, there had been no dredging of the inlets, there were no lights aboard your darkened ship – only stealth, speed, and daring were your deliverer. It was easy to feel the tension on a dark night where a cough, a stumble, or escape of steam from an engine boiler could remove your shield of invisibility.

Mr. Wilkinson discussed the tactics used by Lt. Wilkinson to avoid the Union blockaders as he made his way out of or into the Cape Fear River.

- Doing the unexpected (don't wait for a moonless night to run)
- Innovation (run out during the day – break the rhythm of the blockaders)
- Misinformation (spread false rumors of destination and schedule while in St. George or Nassau)
- Imitation (Fly the Union flag and act like you are a blockader, use colored rockets like the Union ship commanders to miss-direct pursuit)
- Smokescreen (Wilkinson used North Carolina coal to create a means of escaping detection – North Carolina coal attributed to the Ad-Vance captured; hence, when and where it was used was mission critical)
- Daring (steam between blockading ships making it difficult for them to fire without risks to each other, Use cotton soaked in turpentine to extract extra speed for the engines)
- Seamanship

In October, 1863, Wilkinson was selected to lead a group of 22 Confederate Naval officers in an attempt to free prisoners held by the Union on Johnson's Island on Lake Erie. The group made their way to Halifax, Nova Scotia; hence, into Canada and to the Great Lakes where an attempt to seize the USS Michigan was to be made. While planning was underway and the attempt was to be made, a Canadian volunteer revealed the plan to the Canadian government. With the Union authorities alerted and the Canadian government anxious to see the Confederates depart their country, Wilkinson cancelled the expedition. NOTE: A complete report on the Johnson's Island expedition can be found in the ORN Series I, Vol. 2, pages 822 – 830 in a letter from expedition member, Lt. Minor, to Admiral Buchanan.

John Wilkinson was to serve in numerous positions during the war. At one point he was assigned to Wilmington to establish a system of lights, maintain a record of water depth at the inlets, and make efficient the export of cotton. Wilkinson would make several additional runs through the blockade as commander of blockade runners and of a commerce raider. Wilkinson considered the latter vessel, CSS Chickamauga, as being in conflict with what he thought was prudent action against the Union. His last command was the converted commerce raider, CSS Tallahassee, renamed the CSS Chameleon. Wilkinson took the Chameleon on a trip to Bermuda for food stuffs for Lee's army. When he returned to Wilmington and found it taken by Union forces, Wilkinson took the Chameleon first to Nassau. Wilkinson (and John N. Maffitt) consulted with the Confederate agent at Nassau and they decided the Chameleon should be taken to Liverpool. After arriving on April 9, 1865, Wilkinson turned the ship over to Commander James D. Bulloch. The war was over – Wilkinson later wrote, "... the cause for which so much blood had been shed, so many miseries bravely endured, and so many sacrifices cheerfully made, was about to perish at last."

CSS Chameleon

Because he was classified as a pirate by the United States government, Wilkinson did not return to the states immediately after the war. He and fellow Confederate naval officer, John Taylor Wood, operated a marine mercantile business in Halifax, Nova Scotia for some number of years. When a pardon was granted in 1871, Wilkinson with his wife and daughters returned to the U.S. where upon a recommendation from Union Admiral and friend, David Dixon Porter, he established a school in Annapolis, Maryland to tutor aspiring Naval Academy students. John Wilkinson died in Annapolis in 1891.

Lt. John Wilkinson was involved in every duty except that of the torpedo service. The title of Mr. Wilkinson's presentation came from a lecture given by General Perry M. DeLeon at Annapolis in 1900 and it reflected the full measure of service that John Wilkinson gave to the Confederacy:

“Raphael Semmes did the most injury to the enemy,
But John Wilkinson did the most good for the Confederacy.”

* Trivia Question Answers September 2011 *******

1 - Who was John H. Foard? Why was he important to the Civil War history of the Cape Fear region?

John H. Foard was a Wilmington native whose interest in Wilmington during the Civil War led him to collect and display his collection at the Blockade Runners of the Confederacy Museum. The privately owned and staffed museum operated in Carolina Beach from 1967 until 1983. Mr. Foard's efforts preserved and brought focus on the significance of Wilmington to the Confederate war effort. After Mr. Foard's death, the collection was purchased by New Hanover County and is now part of the Cape Fear Museum located in Wilmington.

Dr. Chris Fonvielle served as the last curator of the Blockade Runners of the Confederacy Museum from 1979 to 1983.

2 – At the southern end of the Fort Fisher sea face, Battery Lamb (Mound Battery) towered some forty-three feet above the beach. This important battery provided protection for blockade runners entering or leaving the Cape Fear River through the New Inlet. It also served as the signaling station to assist the blockade runners trying to navigate into the river. During the bombardment on December 24, 1864, Colonel Lamb ordered that a Confederate flag be raised on the Mound Battery in defiance of the Union ships shelling the fort. Because the signaling flagpole was not equipped with halyards to raise a flag, someone would be required to climb the pole and manually attach the flag.

Who was the “volunteer” who came forward to attach the fort’s standard to the Mound Battery flagpole?

As recounted in Fonvielle’s The Wilmington Campaign and Fort Fisher 1865, Lamb sent word to Captain Daniel Munn at Mound Battery to raise the flag. Munn ordered Corporal Noah B. Bennett of Company K, 36th Regiment of North Carolina Troops, to brave the fire of the Union fleet and attach the colors. The 196 pound Bennett was probably a brave man, but his size made him an unlikely climber. Private Christopher C. “Kit” Bland volunteered to shinny up the flagpole. Not only did Kit brave the fire and attach the flag, he re-climbed the flagpole and reaffixed the flag when it was partially detached. This time the volunteer received hoorays from Confederate defenders and Federal gunners. Source: Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope (Campbell, California, Savas Publishing Company, 1997), 134-136.

3 - Mr. Wilkinson’s presentation began with a slide that showed a seal with crossed naval guns overlaid by an anchor with the inscription “C.S.N” and the phrase, “Aide toi et Dieu t’Aidera.” Know where the phrase originated? Know what Confederate leader had this phrase engraved on his sword?

This phrase has been attributed to Joan of Arc during her quest to free France from English control. Most translations revealed this to mean, “Aid yourself and God will aid you.”

On April 9, 1865, General Robert E. Lee wore a presentation sword to his meeting with General U.S. Grant at Appomattox. The sword, a gift from a Maryland admirer, was engraved with this phrase. This sword was never offered to Grant as has been rumored. Today, this sword is part of the collection at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond, Virginia.

4 - Among the officers who served in the Confederate States Navy, Commander James D. Bulloch, a Georgia native, was sent to England where he purchased, manned, and commanded the CSS Fingal in bringing a much needed cargo of military stores to Savannah, Georgia during November 1861. Because of his unique managerial talents, Bulloch was sent back to England where he achieved prominence for his actions as Chief Purchasing Officer for the CSN in Great Britain. Bulloch’s talents included establishment of contacts & methods that allowed the Confederate Navy to clandestinely contract the construction and equipage of warships in violation on Britain’s Neutrality Act. Among the ships Bulloch procured, the Laird #290 became the most effective commerce raider of the war. The Laird cruiser #290 slipped out of Liverpool as the unarmed Enrica and after a cat-and-mouse game with the USS Tuscaloosa, the Enrica proceeded to the Azores where she received guns and other equipment needed to complete a warship. Having completed his task, Bulloch turned the Enrica over to a new captain. Who was that captain who would take command and commission the ship as a Confederate warship? Why was Bulloch not given command of the #290?

The captain was Raphael Semmes and the Enrica became the famous or infamous commerce raider, CSS Alabama.

Bulloch was too critical to the Confederate naval efforts to give him command of a single ship. After returning to Liverpool, Bulloch would “work his game” again and again as the Union agents tried with increasing effectiveness to stop his efforts. Bulloch remained in England after the war. In 1883, Bulloch published the record of his exploits, The Secret Service of the Confederate States in Europe. Source:

http://www.bbc.co.uk/liverpool/localhistory/journey/american_connection/alabama/building_02.shtml, accessed September 10, 2011.

NOTE: James Dunwoody Bulloch and his exploits were of great interest to his nephew. Bulloch's sister, Martha Bulloch, had married a New Yorker in 1853. Bulloch's nephew was born on October 27, 1858. This nephew became the 26th President of the United States in 1901 – Theodore Roosevelt, Jr.

5 – Lt. John Wilkinson commanded the CSS Robert E. Lee through the Union blockade 21 times.

During these trips, Wilkinson delivered some 7,000 bales of cotton to European markets and he returned through the same blockade with critical stores for the Confederate government. What was the fate of the CSS Robert E. Lee?

Wilkinson was reassigned from the Robert E. Lee to lead a Confederate expedition to free 2,000 prisoners at Johnson's Island at Sandusky, Ohio. Wilkinson and a group of Confederate Naval officers were on the Robert E. Lee on October 7, 1863 as it steamed to Halifax, Nova Scotia. Lt. Richard H. Gayle was in command of the Robert E. Lee when on November 9th the USS James Adger intercepted Gayle on the return trip from Bermuda to Wilmington. The CSS Robert E. Lee was converted from blockade runner to the blockader, USS Fort Donelson.

6 – During the Civil War, Imperial Russia was the only European nation that unequivocally supported the Union and its cause. The leaders of the two nations recognized the similarity between Czar Alexander II's freeing of Russia's serfs and Lincoln's freeing of America's slaves. After the czar survived an assassination attempt on April 16, 1866, the United States Congress, remembering Abraham Lincoln's assassination, enacted a resolution of sympathy to the Russian people. Gustavus Fox was selected to personally take the message to Russia. On what iron-clad did Fox make the nearly one year tour of ports from the Mediterranean to the Baltic?

In an expression of sympathy to Czar Alexander II (and an expression of American naval power), Fox boarded the USS Miantonomoh for an extended voyage to Europe. The visit of the twin-turreted ship warship caused considerable controversy among the naval planners in Great Britain.

John Wilkinson 1821 – 1891

Wilmington waterfront during the war

While J.E.B. Stuart and John Singleton Mosby of the Confederate Army will be well known to most students of the American Civil War, a less well known group of heroic Confederate naval officers, who with limited resources, will show every bit as much bravery, energy, dash and imagination in their valiant fight against the overwhelming strength of the U.S. Navy. The September presentation will introduce these naval officers, but the presentation will focus on the career of Captain John Wilkinson.

C.S.S. Robert E. Lee

Wilkinson was among the foremost blockade runners of the Civil War but he also engaged in commerce raiding, construction of ironclads, covert operations in Canada, and purchasing of ships and supplies in England. During a period of nine months in 1863 with his ship the C.S.S. Robert E. Lee, Wilkinson ran the Wilmington blockade 21 times. He was the only naval officer to command every type of vessel operated by the Confederacy.

Donald Wilkinson, great-great nephew of John Wilkinson, will speak about the Captain's wartime career and on the Confederate government's overall naval strategy. Captain Wilkinson's ties with the port of Wilmington, other Confederate naval officers, and blockade running will be an appropriate subject to begin our 2011 – 2012 program year. Join us on September 8th for a presentation that will add much to our knowledge of naval operations during the Civil War.

Donald Wilkinson

Donald M. Wilkinson, a Virginian, lives in New York City. He is Chairman of Wilkinson O'Grady, Inc., a global asset management firm, he founded in 1972. Growing up in the Capital of the Confederacy, Richmond, Virginia, and in the shadows of the great monuments to Lee, Jackson, Davis and Stuart, Mr. Wilkinson developed a shared interest in the Confederate Navy with his Civil War kinsman. He is a 1961 graduate of the Virginia Military Institute and a 1966 M.B.A. graduate of the University of Virginia. In his spare time, he is a naval historian and presently is working on a biography of John Wilkinson.

* Trivia Questions September 2011 *******

- 1 - In July 1864, John Taylor Wood and G.W. Custis Lee were given command of a daring expedition to free and arm thousands of Confederate prisoners held at Point Lookout, Maryland. Lee was to command the land forces who would be dispatched from Jubal Early's army that had begun to move north on July 5. Wood was sent to Wilmington to ready crews and two steamers capable of capturing Union gunboats at Point Lookout. Wood was also to secure weapons to arm the prisoners who would join Early's attack on Washington. On July 9, the Honorable John Tyler wrote to Confederate General Sterling Price in Arkansas and outlined the complete details of the secret expedition. Tyler, son of the late U.S. president, exclaimed that this was "decidedly the most brilliant idea of the war."
The expedition failed because of a complete lack of secrecy. It seemed that in addition to John Tyler and Sterling Price, most everyone in the Confederacy and the Union was aware of the daring plan. Had the plan been "decidedly the most brilliant idea of the war," or did it show another scenario as the war had progressed into late 1864?
- 2 – The Confederates developed a system of lights and signals to help blockade runners gain access to the Cape Fear River. Who reorganized this system while on shore duty at Wilmington?
- 3 – Who was the first Union general killed in combat during the Civil War?
- 4 – Who was the youngest general during the Civil War?
- 5 – Who was the famous journalist who served in both the Confederate Army and Union Navy during the war? This Welsh-born journalist would gain fame as an adventurer and explorer.

If you have member news that you think would be of interest to CFCWRT membership, let me know about it.

1 – Charlie Watson, 1937 – 2011 – Charlie will be missed as a fateful member of the CFCWRT. His contributions to various historical groups around the Cape Fear region were his passion.

2 – Bruce Patterson visited the USMC Museum at Quantico and reported that the new exhibit on the Civil War was worth the visit. The Civil War exhibit included a segment about Fort Fisher and the role the Federate Marines played in the amphibious assault on Fort Fisher. Bruce also reported that other new exhibits included the Origins of The Corps and Small Wars and Expeditions.

3 – Dale Lear was present for the St. Albans Heritage Weekend, July 29-31. Civil War re-enactment units included: 2nd Vermont Infantry, 1st Vermont Cavalry, Medical Corps, 2nd Mississippi, 61st Georgia, and 27 Virginia and 55th Virginia Middlesex Artillery.

St. Albans, Vermont was the scene of an October 19, 1864 Confederate raid that claimed possession of the city and the deposits of its banks. The twenty-one Confederate raiders, led by Lieutenant Bennett Young, escaped into Canada with $200,000. Fourteen of the raiders were captured by Canadian authorities but neutrality laws prevented any from being extradited to the United States.

 Great Civil War Quotes *****

U.S. Grant became one of the great military leaders of the Civil War because he learned from the experiences gained through many hard fought battles. Prior to his narrow victory at Shiloh, Grant had "believed that the Confederacy was a house of cards that would soon collapse." His victories at Fort Henry and Fort Donelson had reinforced his view of the weakness of the Confederacy; he confidently moved his forces south to push his advantage. On April 6 – 7, 1862, Grant absorbed a lesson: the Confederate forces displayed morale and a fighting spirit that he had not previously encountered. Grant adapted from the lesson learned at Shiloh.

Up to the battle of Shiloh I, as well as thousands of other citizens, believed that the rebellion against the Government would collapse suddenly and soon, if a decisive victory could be gained over any of its armies. Donelson and Henry were such victories. An army of more than 21,000 men was captured or destroyed. Bowling Green, Columbus and Hickman, Kentucky, fell in consequence, and Clarksville and Nashville, Tennessee, the last two with an immense amount of stores, also fell into our hands. The Tennessee and Cumberland rivers, from their mouths to the heads of navigation, were secured. But when Confederate armies were collected which not only attempted to hold a line farther south, from Memphis to Chattanooga, Knoxville and on to the Atlantic, but assumed the offensive and made a gallant effort to regain what had been lost, then indeed, I gave up all idea of saving the Union except by complete conquest.

The concept of “Total War” would become Grant’s method to end the Civil War. Beginning in 1864, Grant would find Union generals who were willing to carry out the dictates to wage war on the infrastructure of the Confederate war effort.

 Sesquicentennial Commemoration *****

William C. Davis, noted Civil War historian and prolific writer, selected the following books as his personal favorites. If the Sesquicentennial Commemoration has inspired your interest, these were Davis's list of great books:

Personal Memoirs of U.S. Grant – by Ulysses S. Grant, edited by E.B. Long. Grant's memoirs are considered as being among the best soldier's story ever written.

This Hallowed Ground – by Bruce Catton. Although this is a chronicle of the war to preserve the Union from the Northern point of view, Catton told the story of the men from both sides who endured the horrors of war.

Lee's Lieutenants: A Study in Command – by Douglas Southall Freeman. Lee and the Army of Northern Virginia are highlighted in the pages of Freeman's masterpiece.

Forged in Battle: The Civil War Alliance of Black Soldiers and White Officers – by Joseph T. Glatthaar. This book provided an in-depth study of the emergence of black soldiers and their relationship with their white officers.

Flight to Oblivion - by A.J. Hanna. The collapse of the Confederate Government and its flight from Richmond during the closing days of the war is retold in Hanna's word portrait of the main characters.

 Summer Reading *****

I followed my own recommendation for a summer of reading and research. An advanced copy of Amanda Foreman's new book, A World on Fire: An Epic History of Two Nations Divided, arrived in the CFCWRT mail box during May. The heft of a thousand page book was a little daunting; however, I decided that if they were kind enough to send an advance copy, I should at least expend the effort to read this book.

Amanda Foreman – A World on Fire

The letter that accompanied the book stated, “A World on Fire narrates the Civil War as a history-in-the-round: it includes the story of the Americans who fought the Civil War in England – from US Ambassador Charles Francis Adams to Confederate Naval Officer James Dunwoody Bulloch – as well as the British, whose support was divided between the Union and the Confederacy all the way from the men and women who pledged themselves as volunteers on the ground in the US to the men who represented Britain in Parliament.” If anything the preceding description fell short in describing the events portrayed in Foreman's book.

Amanda Foreman skillfully and painstakingly interwove the lives and actions of almost two hundred characters from the beginning to the end of the war. These characters, men and women, were diplomats, commissioners, agents, military figures, Pro-Southern supporters, Pro-Northern supporters, journalists, observers, and volunteers. These characters, the great and the not so great, pursued their beliefs with action and energy. The intrigue that involved these men and women was played out on a giant chessboard. Each move and countermove added to the mounting tension that accompanied this period.

When I finally finished A World on Fire, I was saddened to leave my newly found acquaintances. Mary Sophia Hill, Benjamin Moran, Henry Morton Stanley, Jacob Thompson, Henry Feilden, Frank Vizetelly, Francis Dawson, John Fitzroy De Courcy, Sir Percy Wyndham, and many others had given me a much different perspective than I had previously known.

Amanda Foreman spent more than ten years researching and writing this book. She has written a book that provided fascinating reading and much new knowledge about the struggles to gain or deny British recognition of the Confederacy. The battle of wits in England to sway the British government's foreign policy waged from 1861 until the very end in 1865. The British volunteers, Union or Confederate, cast their lot and fortunes with commitment to their chosen cause.

Do not be put off by the sheer size of this work. A World of Fire is a story woven so well that it will maintain your interest from the Napier Ball at Willard's Hotel in Washington, D.C. on February 17, 1859 until the Alabama tribunal in 1872. British writer William Michael Rosetti wrote in 1866 that the entirety of Great Britain had been divided over the American Civil War. Foreman sought to tell the story of this Anglo-American world about which Rosetti had referred in 1866. She did quite well in her effort.

 Trivia Question Answers September 2011 *****

1 - In July 1864, John Taylor Wood and G.W. Custis Lee were given command of a daring expedition to free and arm thousands of Confederate prisoners held at Point Lookout, Maryland. Lee was to command the land forces who would be dispatched from Jubal Early's army that had begun to move north on July 5. Wood was sent to Wilmington to ready crews and two steamers capable of capturing Union gunboats at Point Lookout. Wood was also to secure weapons to arm the prisoners who would join Early's attack on Washington. On July 9, the Honorable John Tyler wrote to Confederate General Sterling Price in Arkansas and outlined the complete details of the secret expedition. Tyler, son of the late U.S. president, exclaimed that this was "decidedly the most brilliant idea of the war."

The expedition failed because of a complete lack of secrecy. It seemed that in addition to John Tyler and Sterling Price, most everyone in the Confederacy and the Union was aware of the "daring plan." Had the plan been "decidedly the most brilliant idea of the war," or did it show another scenario as the war had progressed into late 1864? After the war, Captain John Wilkinson, of the Confederate Navy, offered a different opinion of the Point Lookout and other such expeditions. "These futile projects for the release of prisoners, serve to show the desperate straits to which the Confederacy was reduced, for want of soldiers." Wilkinson had some previous insight into plans to secure the release of Confederate prisoners for he had commanded a failed 1863 attempt to secure the freedom for those imprisoned on Johnson's Island at Sandusky, Ohio.

2 – The Confederates developed a system of lights and signals to help blockade runners gain access to the Cape Fear River. Who reorganized this system while on shore duty at Wilmington? John Wilkinson. As you will hear on 8 September, Wilkinson was a very resourceful officer who was adept at improving not only the communications system but in coming up with ingenious methods to secure more speed from blockade runners under his command. Wilkinson never lost a ship under his command.

3 - Who was the first Union general killed in combat during the Civil War? On August 10, 1861 at the Battle of Wilson's Creek, Union Brigadier General Nathaniel Lyon (1818 – 1861) met his death while rallying his troops against Confederate forces near Springfield, Missouri. Lyon defied his aides' plea to remove himself from danger; he shouted to his Kansas and Iowa troops, "Come on, my brave boys, I will lead you! Forward!" and with that said, he advanced into Confederate fire.

Lyon's actions at Wilson's Creek blunted the Confederate efforts to bring Missouri under Confederate control.

Source: Patrick, Jeff, "Missouri's Bloody Hill: Civil War Erupts at Wilson's Creek." Hallowed Ground, Summer 2011.

4 - Who was the youngest general during the Civil War? Was it Galasha Pennypacker (184(?) – 1916) of Fort Fisher fame? Or was it George Armstrong Custer (1839 – 1876) of Little Big Horn infamy? According to William Marvel in his August 2011 Civil War Times article, "The Boy General," Charles Cleveland Dodge of the 1st New York Mounted Rifles claimed that title. Dodge's commission as brigadier general dated from November 29, 1862.

Dodge 1841 - 1910

Dodge retained this distinction for a short period. His superior officer, Maj. Gen. John Peck, had little use for a 21 year old cavalry commander at Suffolk, Virginia. The departmental commander, John Dix, must have shared the same feeling. From the Official Records, Series I, Volume 16, page 561:

FORT MONROE, March 17, 1863

Major-General PECK:

I do not intend that General Dodge shall command the cavalry force at Suffolk. I shall make some other arrangement if he is put on duty in my command.

JOHN A. DIX

Major-General

The young Yale graduate, son of a New York Congressman, resigned his commission effective June 12, 1863. A star whose flame burned so bright could not sustain his brilliance. Dodge; however, rose from the ashes and became a businessman who was a partner in the Phelps Dodge Company.

5 - Who was the famous journalist who served in both the Confederate Army and Union Navy during the war? This Welsh-born journalist would gain fame as an adventurer and explorer. John Rowlands was born in Denbigh, Wales in 1841. He immigrated to New Orleans in 1859 and became associated with wealthy businessman, Henry Hope Stanley. Rowlands soon affected a southern accent and assumed a new name – Henry Morton Stanley.

Stanley fought with the Confederate Army at Shiloh where he was captured. He quickly deserted to the Union Navy. The Union cause must have also been a disappointment to Stanley for he soon deserted from this position.

As a correspondent for the New York Herald, Stanley traveled to Zanzibar in March 1871 and led a 7,000 mile expedition to find Scottish missionary, David Livingston. On November 10, 1871, Stanley was said to have uttered the famous phrase of discovery, “Doctor Livingstone, I presume?”

May 2011

Our next meeting will be Thursday, 12 May 2011 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Road).
Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30.

We invite and welcome all people with an interest in American history to attend a meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. The speakers for our programs are diverse in their views, interpretations, and presentations.

* May Program *******

The May program represents the last meeting of the 2010 – 2011 Cape Fear Civil War Round Table program year. The 2011 – 2012 program year begins in September. Consider inviting people who you think may enjoy learning about a fascinating period in our nation's history.

Major General Bryan Grimes – The Making of a Volunteer Officer

Dr. Michael Coffey will present a focused look at the sometimes painful transition from civilian to military officer of North Carolina native, Bryan Grimes.

A planter from Pitt County, Grimes was a patriotic, but hot-tempered man, who evolved from civilian status of privilege to become the last officer in the Army of Northern Virginia to become a Major General. Mike especially examined Grimes's career as colonel of the 4th North Carolina during the first years of the war. As the war continued, Grimes became an effective and dependable battlefield commander. His actions on the battlefield led to his receiving numerous wounds as he ignored personal safety to encourage his men to strike at the enemy. At the Bloody Angle at Spotsylvania on May 12, 1864, Grimes's brigade was credited with actions that saved the army from destruction.

NOTE: At our February meeting, Waite Rawls, CEO of the Museum of the Confederacy, spoke of Grimes's scabbard & belt buckle that are included in the MOC collection. During a charge led by Grimes, a ball embedded in his sword belt and scabbard. Grimes had several horses shot from under him, received many wounds throughout the war; however, he survived the war with few permanent injuries from these wounds.

Bloody Angle, May 12, 1864

His attention to duty, as he saw it, often put Grimes at odds with officers of less strong convictions. Grimes's ambition and pride often led him to challenge the correctness of the promotion of men who he saw as less courageous and deserving than himself.

Join us on May 12 and learn more about a non-professional officer who led the last Confederate offensive action at Appomattox on April 9, 1865. Think of Grimes as a "polished" version of Nathan Bedford Forrest. If you enjoy hearing about real characters, be sure to attend Mike Coffey's presentation.

* CFCWRT Spring Tour *******

Cape Fear Civil War Round Table Spring 2011 Battlefield Tour of the Guilford Courthouse National Park

On a cold and gray day, Josh Howard led a stalwart group of history buffs on a tour of the Guilford Courthouse National Battlefield. The actions taken on this battlefield did much to determine the fate of the United States. The men of the Continental Line and Militia who fought here did so to create a harmonious union. Alexander Stuart, Joseph Eggleston, and Henry Lee fought to create a nation. The sons and grandsons of those men would be faced with their own decision about whether to remain in a disharmonious union or create a new nation. J.E.B. Stuart, Joseph Eggleston Johnston, and Robert E. Lee fought to create another new nation, but only after rejecting the dreams of their forefathers.

Josh gave the details of this battle from both the British and Patriot viewpoint. The myths that have surrounded some of the actions during the battle were dispelled by the careful study of diaries, letters, pension applications, and battle reports. The actions of the North Carolina Militia on the first line; the Cornwallis order to fire artillery into his own soldiers; the Light Horse Harry Lee battle report – all were retold after the benefit of careful examination of multiple sources that sought to overlay British and Patriot actions.

Lawrence Babits and Josh's book, Long, Obstinate, and Bloody: The Battle of Guilford Courthouse, came alive through Josh's battlefield presentation.

Special thanks are due to Dale Lear for his continuous efforts to organize the Spring Tour. The Tour Guy comes through again!

As we move forward into the Sesquicentennial, we will transition from studying the causes and early history of the growing regional conflicts into the military conflict that began on April 12, 1861. Hopefully, future tours will allow us to visit additional sites where our history was shaped.

* Trivia Questions May 2011 *******

1 – Bryan Grimes was elected as a delegate to the North Carolina Secession Convention. On May 20, 1861, Grimes was one of those who signed the Ordinance of Secession that led to North Carolina's departure from the Union. Grimes resigned his political position to volunteer his services in the Confederate Army. Governor John W. Ellis offered Grimes two appointment at unit command rank. What course did Bryan Grimes follow in regards to his position?

2 – Grimes commanded and led the last attack of the Army of Northern Virginia on April 9, 1865. The attack to open a path through the closing Union ring was initially successful; however, Grimes pulled back to his original line. What action caused the cessation of Grimes' attack?

3 – Bryan Grimes survived the war and returned to his plantation, Grimesland, in Pitt County. He rebuilt his shattered finances and raised a large family. What was Major General Bryan Grimes's fate?

4 – In August 1863, John Taylor Wood led a raid that seized and then used the captured Union ships, Satellite and Reliance against their former owners. What Union cavalry commander devised a plan to capture the Confederate raiders between the Union Navy and Army? How did that work out? For what was this Union officer more widely known?

5 – The blockade running from Bermuda, Nassau, and Halifax had made many British merchants, as well as, captains and crews quite wealthy. The British officials in these ports were willing to look the other way concerning Queen Victoria's proclamation of neutrality. What event in December 1863 could have contributed to the "cool" reception Wood and the Tallahassee received from the authorities in Halifax?

6 – After the war, Wood located to Halifax and ran a maritime business (initially with Confederate Navy Captain John Wilkinson). Wood lived there until his death in 1904 having seldom returned to the United States except to attend functions given by Confederate veteran groups.

- Was Wood a Canadian citizen at the time of his death?
- Was Wood present at the reburial of Jefferson Davis in Hollywood Cemetery in Richmond on May 31, 1893? –

Unable to Take Richmond:

Abraham Lincoln once asked General (Winfield) Scott this question: "Why is it that you were once able to take Mexico City in three months with five thousand men, and we have been unable to take Richmond with one hundred thousand men?"

"I will tell you," said General Scott. "The men who took us into Mexico City are the same men who are keeping us out of Richmond."

* Sesquicentennial Commemoration *******

During the year leading up to April 12, 1861, many men in the North and South acted upon their convictions. Congressmen Charles H. Van Wyck and John A. Gilmer stood out for their courage to speak out upon their convictions.

Charles Henry Wyck

Wyck, a New York representative, spoke out and defended his views about the evils of slavery. On March 7, 1860, Wyck addressed the House and delivered a blistering attack against slavery and what Wyck saw as treasonable actions of his Southern colleagues. Violent reaction by Reuben Davis of Mississippi almost led to a challenge of a duel. Physical violence on the floor of the House came to be expected.

On the night of February 22, 1861, Wyck was attacked by three armed men who intended to kill him. The mild mannered congressman responded to his attackers by fighting back and striking one of his knife-wielding assailants. Wyck's aggressive behavior gained him his life as his confused attackers retreated.

Wyck recovered from his wounds and true to his support for the Union volunteered for service in the army. Wyck served as colonel of the 56th New York Infantry until the end of the war.

John Adams Gilmer

Gilmer, a North Carolina representative from Guilford County, served in the 36th Congress during the crisis that led up to April 12, 1861. As a Unionist, Gilmer worked during this period to find a solution to what he saw as a coming conflict. He wrote a series of four letters to the new Secretary of State, William Seward. Gilmer suggested that the only way to give Unionists in the South time to counter the fire-eaters was to avoid conflict over Forts Sumter and Pickens. He reasoned that if Lincoln gave up the "indefensible" sites, the main cause of escalating tension would be relieved.

Seward leaked word that abandoning the forts was a position Lincoln considered. Seward gambled that Gilmer's suggestion would be agreeable to Lincoln's quest for peace. Pro-Unionists in the South were encouraged; however, Lincoln failed to support action that did not "hold, occupy, and possess" these forts.

Gilmer declined an offer to become a member of Lincoln's cabinet. He wrote to Seward on April 12, 1861 and bemoaned that Lincoln's actions would drive all Southern States into secession. Gilmer resigned himself to his state's position for he became a member of the Confederate Congress.

John Taylor Wood - Bold Raider

Tim Winstead presented a life story of Confederate Navy and Cavalry officer, John Taylor Wood. As grandson of U.S. President Zachary Taylor and nephew of C.S.A. President Jefferson Davis, Wood was uniquely positioned to witness events leading up to the beginning of the war and to take part in many pivotal events during the war.

Was John Taylor Wood the Forrest Gump of his day? Was it mere chance that Wood was at Hampton Roads on March 9, 1862, at Drewry's Bluff on May 15, 1862, aboard the USS Satellite in August 1863, aboard the USS Underwriter at New Berne in February 1864, aboard the CSS Tallahassee in August 1864, or with Jefferson Davis on the "unfortunate day" in Georgia on May 10, 1865? Tim answered these questions and more about this fascinating individual.

At a meeting in Rose Hill, NC on November 16, 2009, Tim had opportunity to ask Edwin Bearss about John Taylor Wood. Bearss, preeminent Civil War authority, shared that he thought Wood was, "A good, honorable man; good 2nd tier officer didn't hurt to be Jefferson Davis's nephew....."

I think that Wood would have simply thought of himself as:

* Trivia Question Answers May 2011 *******

1 - Bryan Grimes was elected as a delegate to the North Carolina Secession Convention. On May 20, 1861, Grimes was one of those who signed the Ordinance of Secession that led to North Carolina's departure from the Union. Grimes resigned his political position to volunteer his services in the Confederate Army. Governor John W. Ellis offered Grimes two appointment at unit command rank. What course did Bryan Grimes follow in regards to his position? Although Grimes was a proud & ambitious man, he accepted the fact that he had little military training and needed to learn from an experienced officer. Grimes accepted the rank of major in the 4th Regiment of North Carolina Troops under Colonel George Burgwyn Anderson, United States Military Academy, Class of 1852.

Anderson was the experienced officer who would teach the skills Grimes needed for future advancement. Anderson became the Brigadier General of the 2nd, 4th, 14th, and 20th regiments during June 1862. NOTE: Anderson would die of wounds received at Antietam and Fort Anderson (Brunswick Town) would be named in his honor.

2 - Grimes commanded the last attack of the Army of Northern Virginia on April 9, 1865. The attack to open a path through the closing Union ring was initially successful; however, Grimes pulled back to his original line. What action caused the cessation of Grimes' attack? Commander of the 2nd Corps, John B. Gordon, informed Grimes that Lee had agreed to surrender the army. It was over.

Grimes recorded the events of that morning in letters written to his wife.

As my troops approached their position of the morning, I rode up to General Gordon and asked where I should form line of battle. He replied, "Anywhere you choose." Struck by the strangeness of the reply, I asked an explanation, whereupon he informed me that we would be surrendered. I expressed very forcibly my dissent to being surrendered, and indignantly upbraided him for not giving me notice of such intention, as I could have escaped with my Division and joined Gen. Joe Johnston, then in North Carolina. Furthermore, that I should then inform my men of the purpose to surrender, and that whomsoever desired to escape that calamity could go with me, and galloped off to carry this idea into effect. Before reaching my troops, however, General Gordon overtook me, and placing his hand on my shoulder, asked me if I were going to desert the army, and tarnish my own honor as a soldier; that it would be a reflection upon General Lee, and an indelible disgrace to me, that I, an officer of rank, should escape under a flag of truce, which was then pending. I was in a dilemma, and knew not what to do, but finally concluded to say nothing on the subject to my troops.

Upon reaching them, one of the soldiers inquired if General Lee had surrendered, and upon answering I feared it was a fact that we had been surrendered, he cast away his musket, and holding his hands aloft, cried in an agonized voice, "Blow, Gabriel, blow! My God, let him blow, I am ready to die!" We then went beyond the creek at Appomattox Court House, stacked arms amid the bitter tears of bronzed veterans regretting the necessity of capitulation.

Bryan Grimes, Extract of Letters of Major-Gen'l Bryan Grimes to his Wife. Ed. Pulaski Cowper (Raleigh, NC: Edwards, Broughton & Co, 1883), 121-122.

3 - Bryan Grimes survived the war and returned to his plantation, Grimesland, in Pitt County. He rebuilt his shattered finances and raised a large family. What was Major General Bryan Grimes's fate? Grimes lived at "Grimesland" with his second wife, Charlotte Emily Bryan, and his children until he was killed in August 1880. While returning for a political convention in neighboring Beaufort County, Grimes was murdered by a hired assassin near Bear Creek, only about five miles from Grimesland. The murder was planned to prevent him from testifying in a court case. At the time of his death, Bryan Grimes was a trustee for the University of North Carolina and was respected throughout the state. Source:

4 - In August 1863, John Taylor Wood led a raid that seized and then used the captured Union ships, Satellite and Reliance against their former owners. What Union cavalry commander devised a plan to capture the Confederate raiders between the Union Navy and Army? How did that work out? For what was this Union officer more widely known?

Judson Kilpatrick's "Gunboat Expedition" had all the plans to catch Wood between a vise of army and navy units. The plan did not work out exactly as Kilpatrick had hoped. Unlike the crews of the Union ships that Wood captured, the Confederates were attentive to the security of their mission. Wood and his men were able to strip the captured ships and transport engines, guns, etc. to Richmond ahead of the Union raid.

Judson Kilpatrick

Kilpatrick was probably best remembered for his "Shirt-tailed Skedaddle" to escape Wade Hampton and Joe Wheeler's attack at Monroe's Crossroads, NC in March 1865. Kilpatrick, as was his custom, sought the comfort of a female companion rather than ensuring that pickets were placed to avoid surprise attacks. NOTE: To be fair, Kilpatrick did rally his men and drive off his attackers – all while wearing only his nightshirt.

5 - The blockade running from Bermuda, Nassau, and Halifax had made many British merchants, as well as, captains and crews quite wealthy. The British officials in these ports were willing to look the other way concerning Queen Victoria's proclamation of neutrality. What event in December 1863 could have contributed to the "cool" reception Wood and the commerce raider Tallahassee received from the authorities in Halifax? In December 1863, "Colonel" John C. Braine and a group of Southern conspirators seized the steamer Chesapeake off Long Island. Braine and his men proceeded to destroy passenger and merchant ships along the New England coast. Braine and the Chesapeake made good their escape to Halifax, Nova Scotia. The United States put pressure on the British government to extradite the pirates back to the United States. Braine escaped but the crew was tried before a Maritime Court – they were found not guilty.

The United States Consul, Mortimer Jackson, and the United States Government kept pressure on the officials in Halifax to follow the Queen's neutrality proclamation. This continued pressure could have been the demise of the "Wink & Nod" that had been in effect before the Tallahassee arrived in August 1864. The blockade runners and their wealth creation abilities were one thing; the appearance of Confederate raiders and United States warships were something else again.

While blockade runner may have continued their economic game, Confederate raiders and United States war ships were going to follow the rules as laid down in the following order. Source: <http://ns1763.ca/hfxrm/woodtaylor.html>

It is Ordered, That if any ship of war or privateer of the United States of America, or of the States calling themselves the Confederate States of America, shall come into the port of Halifax, or within the territorial jurisdiction of Her Majesty in the vicinity of the said port, every such vessel of war or privateer aforesaid, shall immediately come to anchor off the Naval Yard, unless prevented by stress of weather; and, in the latter event, shall be required to anchor as aforesaid, as soon as weather will permit. And further, it is ordered, that no such vessel, if desirous of communicating with the shore within the said port, shall be permitted to do so from the out side by boat—but shall come up to the anchor-age aforesaid for that purpose; and in that case, if she remain under weigh, will be permitted to leave the said port at her own convenience, any time before sunset, subject nevertheless to the restrictions of the Queen's orders of the 31st January, 1862.

Pilots and all other officers of the port are commanded (on boarding or hailing any such ship or privateer) to communicate the foregoing order to the Chief-officer on duty of every ship of war or privateer aforesaid.

6 - After the war, Wood located to Halifax and ran a maritime business (initially with Confederate Navy Captain John Wilkinson). Wood lived there until his death in 1904 having seldom returned to the United States except to attend functions given by Confederate veteran groups.

John Taylor Wood

Was Wood a Canadian citizen at the time of his death? No. Even though Wood was appointed to the Halifax Pilot Commission, he remained an American citizen and an unreconstructed Confederate. Source: <http://www.biographi.ca/009004-119.01-e.php?BioId=41274> Was Wood present at the reburial of Jefferson Davis in Hollywood Cemetery in Richmond on May 31, 1893? While unlikely, John Taylor Wood was probably not at Jefferson Davis's first burial in New Orleans in 1889. He was in Richmond, Virginia on May 31, 1893 when Davis was reburied with honors in Richmond. The New York Times reported on June 1, 1893, that Colonel Wood was among the honorary pall bearers in Richmond on May 31, 1893.

Ever conscious of duty and honor, Wood would have done what he considered correct to serve Jefferson Davis.

John Taylor Wood

Tim Winstead will present a program about a fascinating man who served in both the Confederate Army and Navy. Tim will follow the career of an officer whose unique background and family connections made him privy to the inner thoughts of a President of the United States and the President of the Confederate States.

Zachary Taylor - Jefferson Davis

Using diaries, Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion, letters, and other primary and secondary source materials, Tim followed John Taylor Wood through the tension-filled antebellum period and through the war. Again and again, Wood turned up at major event after major event. Was John Taylor Wood the Forrest Gump of the Confederacy?

Wood served on the C.S.S. Virginia and took part in the epic battle with the U.S.S. Monitor on March 9, 1862. He led cutting-out expeditions against Union ships in Virginia and in North Carolina waters. Wood commanded the commerce raider, C.S.S. Tallahassee, when it steamed out of Wilmington in August 1864 to wreck havoc on Northern shipping and to attempt to influence the election of 1864. Wood accompanied Jefferson Davis when Richmond was abandoned on April 2, 1865 and was present when Davis was captured near Irwinsville, Georgia on May 10, 1865.

Which three Southerner leaders were especially distressed by the use of Wilmington as a haven for commerce raiders? And why?

On April 19, 1861, President Abraham Lincoln issued the call for a blockade of the rebelling Southern States. This action did not include North Carolina or Virginia – initially - because they had not yet left the Union. This action, under international law, extended to the Confederacy legality as a belligerent nation; hence, rights of a government in administering its own affairs to wage war and seek international support for its cause. Lincoln never accepted the legitimacy of the Confederacy and his administration waged its own campaign to "prevent" the official recognition of the Confederacy by the major European powers.

While admitting his error in point of international law, Lincoln claimed the right to act on his point of practical law. In Prize Cases, the Supreme Court recognized Lincoln's action. In an ABA Journal February 1981, Vol. 67, page 177 - 178, "The Supreme Court expressly upheld the president's authority to issue the proclamation," and "despite the fact that the proclamation itself constituted the legal beginning of the Civil War."

From Roy P. Butler, et. al., ed., The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln, vol. 4 (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1953), pp. 338-339.

Whereas an insurrection against the Government of the United States has broken out in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and the laws of the United States for the collection of the revenue cannot be effectually executed therein conformably to that provision of the Constitution which requires duties to be uniform throughout the United States:

And whereas a combination of persons engaged in such insurrection, have threatened to grant pretended letters of marque to authorize the bearers thereof to commit assaults on the lives, vessels, and property of good citizens of the country lawfully engaged in commerce on the high seas, and in waters of the United States: And whereas an Executive Proclamation has been already issued, requiring the persons engaged in these disorderly proceedings to desist therefrom, calling out a militia force for the purpose of repressing the same, and convening Congress in extraordinary session, to deliberate and determine thereon:

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, with a view to the same purposes before mentioned, and to the protection of the public peace, and the lives and property of quiet and orderly citizens pursuing their lawful occupations, until Congress shall have assembled and deliberated on the said unlawful proceedings, or until the same shall ceased, have further deemed it advisable to set on foot a blockade of the ports within the States aforesaid, in pursuance of the laws of the United States, and of the law of Nations, in such case provided. For this purpose a competent force will be posted so as to prevent entrance and exit of vessels from the ports aforesaid. If, therefore, with a view to violate such blockade, a vessel shall approach, or shall attempt to leave either of the said ports, she will be duly warned by the Commander of one of the blockading vessels, who will endorse on her register the fact and date of such warning, and if the same vessel shall again attempt to enter or leave the blockaded port, she will be captured and sent to the nearest convenient port, for such proceedings against her and her cargo as prize, as may be deemed advisable. And I hereby proclaim and declare that if any person, under the pretended authority of the said States, or under any other pretense, shall molest a vessel of the United States, or the persons or cargo on board of her, such person will be held amenable to the laws of the United States for the prevention and punishment of piracy.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-fifth.

* The Capture of Jefferson Davis *******

John Taylor Wood version

At our October 2010 meeting, Clint Johnson presented us with the material covered in his book, Pursuit: The Chase, Persecution, and Surprising Release of Confederate President Jefferson Davis. Clint's fascinating story led me to examine another view of the events that led to Davis's capture.

What follows is the Wood's diary entry from May 10, 1865:

Unfortunate day. We camped last night near a stream with a narrow thicket & swamp on either side of it, as is the case with all streams in this pine region. Capt. Campbell with some of his scouts was in advance, there was no one in rear, from which direction alone we might expect danger. The P. slept in a tent with Mrs. D., Miss Howell and the children occupied another, all others slept in the open air. I was with Col. Lubbock near our horses. At day dawn we were awakened by Jim the coachman, saying he heard firing on the road toward Abbeville. We rose & were dressing, when from the opposite direction we heard shouts & the clattering of horses feet, in a few moments over a hundred Yankee cavalry burst into the camp; taken completely by surprise, no resistance was offered, our revolvers were first seized, then horses. I held onto Tom for some time, a Yankee on one side of his head, I on the other; finally he told one of his companions to fire on me, if I did not let go. I gave him up reluctantly. I never rode as game a horse. A few minutes after our surprises, firing was heard again towards Abbeville, some of the Yankees moved across the branch in that direction, soon firing was quite brisk & kept up until good daylight, some of the balls passing thru. the camp. Then the enemy discovered their mistake, they were firing on each other; the regiment which surprised us, had by taking the Jacksonville road, come in ahead of us at Irwinville, it was a Michigan Reg. under a Col. Pritchard; the other following us was a Wisconsin Reg. They killed & wounded several of their own people. While this was going on, I went over to the P's tent, saw Mrs. D. told her that the enemy did not know that he was present & during the confusion he might escape into the swamp not more than 100 yards distant; she much alarmed said if we would engage the attention of some Yankees near the tent she would do so. Some time was lost, it was becoming more light, the enemy were posting their sentries around the camp.

When the P. came out of his tent with a gown & hood on & a bucket on his arm, with Helen the mulatto nurse. They advanced some distance toward the stream, when one of the Yankee guards directed them in another direction as the balls were flying where they wished to go. they pushed on, Mrs. D in her ever anxiety saying from the tent, "they were only going after water," they were not afraid of the balls." Another Yankee rode up, ordering them to halt, saying he knew who it was, recognizing a man, but not the P., still moving on, he ordered them to halt, pointing his Carabine at the P.'s head. Then Mrs. D. by her appeals, the children by crying, the servants by fear & howling destroyed all. Others rode up, the P. was obliged to make himself known. This attempted escape in disguise I regret exceedingly, only Mrs. D.'s distress could ever have induced him to adopt it.

After he realized Davis was captured and beyond help, Wood was able to make his escape by bribing a guard with $40 in gold. Wood made his way to Florida where he and John C. Breckinridge were to able to make their escape to Cuba. Wood remarked in his diary that Davis had met a "Sad fate."

Revolutionary War Connections to the Civil War

Bert Dunkerly

Bert Dunkerly, Lead Park Ranger at the Appomattox Court House National Historical Park, presented a study of the way Americans looked at their Revolutionary War heritage and how it affected their views during 1860 – 1865. Bert set the context of his study when he reminded the audience of the similar passage of time between the veterans of the Revolutionary War and the beginning of the Civil War with WWII veterans and today. In many cases, fathers fought in one conflict and their sons fought in the next conflict.

Robert E. Lee's father, Light Horse Harry Lee, was a cavalry leader who served with Washington and Nathanael Green. Jeb Stuart's great grandfather, Major Alexander Stuart, commanded a Virginia Militia unit during the Battle of Guilford Courthouse. Charles Francis Adams, United States minister to Great Britain during the Civil War, was the grandson and son of former presidents of this nation. Colonel Paul Revere, 20th Massachusetts, was grandson of the mid-night rider who carried the call for defense against tyranny in 1776. Many men grew up hearing about the earlier fight for liberty and freedom.

As men flocked to defend their liberties, their homes, and their freedoms, many chose, as their banners, symbols of Revolutionary War. The Kings Mountain Tigers – Co G, 49th NC Troops, used a local battle as their "rebel" inspiration. North Carolina's first state flag made reference to a Mecklenburg Resolve's call for freedom from Great Britain (May 20th 1775) and secession resolutions that called for freedom from the Union (May 20, 1861).. South Carolina used as its national flag a banner that used the Palmetto tree famous for its defense of Fort Moultrie against the British in 1776..

As often happens, the ladies were the ones who cherished the past and determined to honor the men who built this nation. Bert's story of Ann Pamela Cunningham and her secretary, Sarah Tracy, and their efforts to save Mount Vernon was a story of the strong feelings held by ladies in South and North. Ann Pamela was from South Carolina; Sarah was from New York. When you next visit Mount Vernon, think of these ladies and their efforts to preserve the home of the Father of our nation.

Both in the North and the South, people claimed that God was on their side. Deo Vindice (With an Avenging God) appeared on the Seal of the Confederacy, In God We Trust appeared on Union coinage.

Great Seal of the CSA

George Washington

Those, in the South, who remained loyal to the Union were known as Tories as were those who remained loyal to George III during the Revolution. Men, in North and South, fought for reasons that each felt sprang from the earlier conflict. As battles were fought on Revolutionary War fields, men drew inspiration from what had occurred on those sacred sites. Bert related the comments of Union and Confederates who met each other at Yorktown in 1862. Each would in turn put their own spin on the similarity that their forefathers had achieved there. Our own Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson site was significant in both periods.

Even after the war ended, references to Revolutionary War battlefields were found in accounts of defeated Confederates and victorious Unionists. Rebel soldiers making their way home from Virginia to the Deep South stopped at Guilford Courthouse, Cowpens, and Kings Mountain. Union General Jacob Cox, who fought in the Wilmington Campaign, visited the Guilford Courthouse Battlefield after the war ended. In his book Blue Tide Rising: A Memoir of the Union Army in North Carolina, Cox wrote on pages 118-119:

A summer ride which a party of us took to the battlefield of "Guilford-Old-Court-House" may be worth noting as an encouragement to believe that our descriptions of the scenes of our own engagements need not become unintelligible even in the distant future. Among the combats of our Revolutionary War, Guilford Court House ranks high in importance; for the check there given to the invading British army under Lord Cornwallis by the Continental forces under General Greene was the turning-point in a campaign. Greensborough is the present county-seat of Guilford County, and the "Old Court House," a few miles distant, has disappeared as a village, a few buildings almost unused being the only mark of the old town. Natural topography, however, does not change its material features easily, and in this case a cleared field or two where the forest had formerly extended seemed to be the only change that had occurred in the past century. With General Greene's official report of the battle in our hands, we could trace with complete accuracy every movement of the advancing enemy and his own dispositions to receive the attack. We could see the reasons for the movements on both sides, and how the undulations of surface and the cover of the woods and fences were taken advantage of by either commander. Military principles being the same in all times, we found ourselves criticizing the movements as if they occurred on one of our own recent battlefields. It brought the older and the later war into almost startling nearness

 Trivia Question Answers April 2011 *****

1 - The cruise of the C.S.S. Tallahassee from Wilmington outraged Northern merchants and political leaders. Its mission was backed by Jefferson Davis and Stephen Mallory, Confederate Secretary of the Navy, as a means to destroy Northern commerce and morale. Which three Southerner leaders were especially distressed by the use of Wilmington as a haven for commerce raiders? And why? W.H.C. Whiting, Robert E. Lee and North Carolina Governor, Zebulon B. Vance, were among those who voiced their concerns that the use of Wilmington would draw unneeded Union attention to the last major blockade running port in the Confederacy. All three feared the loss of the lifeline that brought needed supplies to Lee's army and the Southern war efforts. Vance wrote to Davis:

I beg leave to enter my most respectful and earnest remonstrance against the sailing of the two privateers (Tallahassee and Chickamauga) from the port of Wilmington. Ten or twelve valuable steamers have already been lost in consequence of the cruise of the Tallahassee, and among them the noble steamer A.D. Vance, which alone, I respectfully submit, has been of far more value to the Confederacy than all our privateers combined. For these and other obvious reasons I hope these two vessels may remain in the Cape Fear to assist in its defense.

NOTE: Vance to Davis, October 14, 1864, ORN, Series I, Volume 10, p. 783.

2 – During the Tallahassee's cruise, Wood sought a Union pilot who would take the Tallahassee into the New York City harbor where Wood could attack shipping and the naval yard. Unable to find a pilot of questionable Union loyalty, Wood abandoned his attack plan. In one of the many strange quirks of history, two of the most audacious men in the Confederacy and Union were in close proximity during August 1864. What Union naval officer was in New York on an assignment that would have dire consequences for the Confederate war effort in North Carolina? This Union officer had previously been assigned to the blockade force off the Wilmington coast. About the same time as Wood and the Tallahassee steamed north to raid commerce and attack New York City, Lt. William Baker Cushing was sent to New York to secure small steam vessels capable of attacking the C.S.S. Albemarle at its anchorage in the Roanoke River.

Lt. William B. Cushing

This bold Union raider had proposed a daring plan to use small steam launches to carry spar torpedoes and sink the ironclad that had allowed the Confederates to retake much of eastern North Carolina. Having already made raids on Confederate forces in Southport and Wilmington, Cushing achieved greater fame and reward for his successful sinking of the Albemarle.

3 – The Union Blockade was a part of General Winfield Scott's plan to isolate and starve the Confederacy. The Northern press dubbed the plan as the Anaconda Plan. What were the requirements for a successful blockade that were required by the blockading navy? Was the United States Navy successful in enforcing the blockade? With the addition of North Carolina and Virginia to the Confederacy, the Union Navy in 1861 had a handful of ships to institute a blockade of 189 bays, inlets, and rivers along the 3,549 miles of coastline.

The first military strategy offered to President Abraham Lincoln for crushing the rebellion of Southern states was devised by Union General-in-Chief Winfield Scott. From April 1 through early May 1861 Scott briefed the president daily, often in person, on the national military situation; the results of these briefings were used by Scott to work out Union military aims.

About 3 May Scott told his protégé, Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan, that he believed an effective "Blockade" of Southern ports, a strong thrust down the Mississippi Valley with a large force, and the establishment of a line of strong Federal positions there would isolate the disorganized Confederate nation "and bring it to terms." Contemporary sources said McClellan called it Scott's "boa-constrictor" plan. Scott then presented it to the president, in greater detail, proposing that 60,000 troops move down the Mississippi with gunboats until they had secured the river from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf, which, in concert with an effective blockade, would seal off the South. Then, he believed, Federal troops should stop, waiting for Southern Union sympathizers to turn on their Confederate governors and compel them to surrender. It was his belief that sympathy for secession was not as strong as it appeared and that isolation and pressure would make the "fire-eaters" back down and allow calmer heads to take control.

But the war-fevered nation wanted combat, not armed diplomacy, and the passive features of Scott's plan were ridiculed as a proposal "to squeeze the South to military death." The press, recalling McClellan's alleged "boa-constrictor" remark, named the plan after a different constricting snake, the anaconda. The plan was not adopted, but in 1864 it reappeared in aggressive form. Lt. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant's 2-front war, fought in Virginia and Tennessee, pressed the Confederates, while Maj. Gen. William T. Sherman's march through Georgia to the sea helped "squeeze the South to military death."

The United States had not signed the Declaration of Paris 1856 agreement that established the need for an enforced and effective blockade to be in place between 2 belligerent nations. In 1861, the blockade was not effective; however, on May 5, 1861, Queen Victoria recognized the legality of the blockade and the need for Britain to remain "neutral" in the conflict. The navy had 12 steamships capable of blockade duty in April 1861.

By the end of 1861, Gideon Welles, Lincoln's Secretary of the Navy, had 264 ships with which it began tightening the Lincoln blockade. The thoroughness of the blockade increased over time. By 1865, Welles had 671 ships in the USN. 2/3 of these were assigned blockade duty. The USN concentrated on the 12 major ports in the Confederacy.

Was the blockade effective? Opinions vary as to the answer because the Confederates never lost a battle because of the lack of weapons of war. The people of the South and its soldiers did suffer from shortages but they were caused mainly by the crumbling infrastructure that preventing the available resources to be allocated to where they were most needed.

Neutral ships could be boarded and searched if they appeared "suspicious." Ships stopped by the Union Navy:

- 1:10 1861
- 1:8 1862
- 1:4 1863
- 1:2 1864 -1865

Steven Wise, Lifeline of the Confederacy, estimated that 60% of the supplies used in the Confederacy came through the blockade.

NOTE: This information came from Dr. Chris Fonvielle's Civil War and Reconstruction class, Historical Times Encyclopedia of the Civil War (edited by Patricia L. Faust) and various other readings assigned by Dr. Fonvielle.

4 - Bert Dunkerly, during his March 10 address to the CFCWRT, told of the efforts during the period leading up to the Civil War to save Mount Vernon as a symbol of the Union for which George Washington had toiled so long. Who led the effort to organize the preservation of Washington's home for future generations? What was the name of the organization founded by this person? Ann Pamela Cunningham organized a nationwide effort by the ladies of the United States to preserve what she envisioned as a shrine to the ideals of union represented by the nation's first president. She took her task after receiving a letter from her mother who had passed Mount Vernon and seen its rundown condition. Ann Pamela was a semi-invalid who shouldered the responsibility to accomplish what Congress and the Virginia legislature had failed to undertake. (John Augustine Washington III had tried to sell Mount Vernon to the United States Congress and to the Virginia legislature.) In December 1853, the small and frail South Carolinian, made her first public appeal in a letter published in the Charleston Mercury. The Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union was formed to accomplish her vision.

5 – "George Washington, Builder of the Union," was a lecture first delivered on February 22, 1856. The orator allied himself with the organized effort to save Mount Vernon. Who was he and for what is he best remembered? Edward Everett of Massachusetts delivered this lecture in Boston as he attempted to rally citizens to the cause of union. Ann Pamela attended Everett's lecture in Richmond and convinced him to support The Mount Vernon Ladies' Association's efforts. Everett delivered the lecture 129 times and in all sections of the country. Edward Everett, the silver-tongued orator, raised $69,000 of the $200,000 needed to purchase Mount Vernon. NOTE: See www.mountvernon.org/visit/plan/index.cfm/pid/809/ for more details about the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association.

Does his name ring a bell? Edward Everett was the key-note speaker at the dedication of a memorial to Union soldiers who died at Gettysburg. Everett's lengthy address was overshadowed, as Everett observed, by the "eloquent simplicity & appropriateness" of Abraham Lincoln's "Gettysburg Address." NOTE: Dictionary of American Biography.

6 - Bert related the events of McClellan's army approach to Yorktown in 1862. The soldiers of both armies expressed the significance of Washington's victory at Yorktown. A soldier from Pennsylvania remarked about the significance of Cornwallis' surrender and now the descendants of both North and South were arrayed against one another on that same ground. A Texan observed that the opposing armies were upon scared ground. What Confederate general addressed his troops with reference to a "Second War of Liberty"? "Prince John" B. Magruder.

* March Program *******

Revolutionary War Connections to the Civil War

Robert M. Dunkerly, Lead Park Ranger at Appomattox Court House National Historical Park, will be the speaker at our March 10 meeting. Bert will present his examinations of the similarities between the American Revolution and the American Civil War. How will the events of 1776 and 1861 be viewed during the 150th anniversary observance of the cataclysmic civil war that tested the very existence of a nation founded upon the ideals of equality for all men?

Join us on March 10 and learn what Bert thinks of this and other questions.

Bert is a historian, award-winning author, and speaker who is actively involved in historic preservation and research. He is a graduate, with a degree in History, of St. Vincent College (Pennsylvania) and holds a Masters in Historic Preservation from Middle Tennessee State. Bert's service with the National Park Service includes assignments at nine historic sites (including Moores Creek National Battlefield). Bert is the author of six books on the American Revolution and over twenty articles. His research includes archaeology, colonial life, military history, and historic commemoration.

Bert has visited over 300 battlefields and over 700 historic sites worldwide. When not reading or writing, Bert enjoys hiking, camping, and photography.

Redcoats on the River: Southeastern North Carolina in the American Revolutionary War

From a paper entitled, "Our History's History " (The George Wright FORUM 20, no. 1 (2003), Bert explained some of his views about the way events are affected by the passage of time. The connection between the Revolution and Civil War may have been little understood, but it seemed that it may have had much more meaning to the people of 1861 than to many of us today.

My historical research with the National Park Service (NPS) has led me to some pretty interesting places, from Washington's family deeds to the work of the Civilian Conservation Corps. As I have studied various reports, historical studies, and site histories, I began to acutely perceive changes evident in historiography today. It is important to periodically stop, look around, and see where we are going. The study and application of history and its applied concepts is constantly changing as society evolves

- 1 – Ever wonder why there are 13 stars on the Confederate battle flag and the final national flag? Sure, Kentucky and Missouri were included as an inducement for the Border States to join the Confederacy, but why include what was not a reality?
- 2 – How did Southerners view the celebration of the Fourth of July 1861?
- 3 – Waite Rawls, CEO of the Museum of the Confederacy, provided a detailed story that traced the beginning and actions of the ladies of the South to honor and then remember those who had fallen during the late war. Rawls shared the stories of the ladies collecting artifacts from Confederates, great and small, to keep the spirit of these men's efforts remembered. The museum's collection was recently valued at more than $400,000,000. This collection was obtained without the benefit of trained historians or preservationists. In 1907, the ladies hired a John Hopkins PhD. graduate to catalog the vast collection. Who was the man lucky enough to see and document the content of this collection?
- 4- Among the 510 flags in the MOC collection, which one flew last over a Confederate unit?
- 5 – The majority of items in the MOC collection were received from Southerners answered the call of the Confederate Memorial Literary Society's January 1892 appeal. Waite mentioned two items that were donated by Union officers. What were these items?

The early days of the secession crisis witnessed many individuals trying to keep the Union together. George Davis from Wilmington was one of those individuals.

Davis, an attorney, was named a North Carolina delegate to the Washington Peace Conference held in February 1861. He had been a member of the Constitutional Union party and strong supporter of the Union prior to this conference. He had urges his state to resolve the secession debate "within the Union." When members to the peace conference failed to achieve a compromise, Davis reached a decision that, to guarantee its constitutional liberties, North Carolina must support the Southern states in the crisis.

Upon his return to Wilmington, Davis addressed its citizens on March 2, 1861. He noted that he had failed in every honorable fashion to secure a fair peace. As reported in the Wilmington Herald on March 4, 1861, Davis told the citizens that the only course for North Carolina was that it "must go with the South."

George Davis served his state as a senator in the Confederate Senate. He became Attorney General in late 1863 and remained in that post until the end of the war. After the war, Davis resumed his Wilmington law practice and worked to heal the wounds of the Union.

 Southern Histories *****

With Waite Rawls speaking on the collection of artifacts and the history of the Museum of the Confederacy, I think it appropriate to share some information about why the Civil War may be one of the most written about conflicts in history. Beginning in 1866, the ladies of the South, and the North, begin efforts to honor the fallen soldiers. Historians and veterans begin a prolific era to document the struggle for which each side fought. Initially, high ranking officers, in North and South, feel the need to "clarify" decisions and actions. Jubal Early leads the efforts of Southern officers to share their stories; hence, the Lost Cause is born. To the victors go the spoils; to the defeated goes the pen.

Daniel Harvey Hill, Jr. (1859 – 1924), was an educator (president of the North Carolina Agricultural and Mechanical College - NCSU), historian, and writer. As the son of a famous Confederate general, Hill felt the need to encourage Southern writers to record the events of 1861 – 1865 through the eyes of the Southern cause. Hill delivered a paper entitled "Southern Histories" at a meeting of the Southern Educational Association at Chattanooga, Tennessee in July 1891. The following excerpts came from that paper.

When I was invited to address this Association on the subject of "Southern Histories," one of Hood's pieces of merry-making suggested itself. While he was out walking, he came across a sign-board having on it this inscription, "Beware of the dog." Taking out his pencil, Hood wrote just under the inscription, "Ware be the dog?" "Southern Histories," said the programme. "Ware be the histories?"

Now, though, as Burns says, "it gars me greet" to admit it, the truth is, the South has been sadly to blame for her indisposition to write history. Glance over the list of America's most celebrated historians – Sparks, Ramsay, Bancroft, Hildreth, Lossing, Prescott, Motley, Cooper, Irving, Parkman. We can claim but one man in the list, Dr. Ramsay, and he was a Southerner only by adoption, having been born in Pennsylvania.

Southerners have always been ready to dare all for their principles; in every American war their prowess has been remarkable; in the council of nations they have been foremost, but how few of them have been willing to commemorate, with their pens, the deeds of their associates or countrymen? Had they been as ready to use their pens as their swords, how many unrecorded deeds of heroism, how many unselfish instances of patriotism would have been added to our national annals? To illustrate: In 1773, three merchant vessels, loaded with tea, entered Boston harbor. Some patriotic colonists, after disguising themselves as Indians, and waiting for "seeling night to scarf up the tender eye of pitiful day," went on those vessels and threw the tea overboard. Almost every child in the land has heard of this daring deed. Story and song and art have, very properly, embalmed it. On the other hand, how many people know that eight years before this Boston tea party, an English man-of-war – not merchant vessel – the Diligence, bearing stamped papers, entered the Cape Fear river, in North Carolina. As soon as it was known, the men of that section, without disguise and in broad daylight, boarded that man-of-war and said to its commander, "You must not land that paper here." After having so terrified the Captain that no attempt was made to land the paper, they seized the ship's boat, hoisted it on a cart, fixed a mast to it, mounted a flag and marched in triumph to Wilmington, where that night, in defiance of Governor Tryon, they had a grand illumination in honor of their victory. Suppose this had happened elsewhere than in the South. It would, as Wheeler says, "have been pealed and chimed on every tongue of fame" until it was known in the obscurest hamlet in the republic.....

Hill went on in his presentation to encourage Southerners to set the record right. He encouraged the educators to make it known to all that, "Unless we preserve the record of what has been thought, written, and done by our own people, as a matter of course, these records will perish or be imperfectly or untruthful kept." Hill urged his audience to keep "the truth of history."

From the quantity of all the diaries, letters, articles, and books written to record the history of the conflict from the Southern view, I think Hill was and is successful in his goal. Whether all the written records recorded the absolute truth may be the subject of another article in The Runner.

History of the Museum of the Confederacy
The People, The Place, The History

Waite Rawls, CEO of the Museum of the Confederacy, presented an interesting program about the history, the people, and the 21st century direction of the MOC.

After the end of the war, the men of the South were faced with rebuilding the shattered economy of a defeated nation. Their time and energies were expended in an effort to return the southern states to solvency; their wives and daughters assumed the task of honoring and reburying the Confederate soldiers fallen on battlefields throughout the North and South. These ladies established Decoration Day to memorialize those fallen soldiers who lay in makeshift graves far from their homes. The ladies of Richmond formed the Ladies Hollywood Memorial Association (LHMA) on May 3, 1866. This organization became the catalyst for the future reburials, memorial statues, and creation of a museum to collect and display artifacts of the Confederacy.

By 1890, the LHMA and other women's groups had overseen the reburial of 72,000 Confederate soldiers. On May 29, 1890, 150,000 people attended the dedication of the Robert E. Lee Monument in Richmond. On May 31, 1890, the Confederate Memorial Literary Society was chartered with the express purpose of securing the former residence of Jefferson Davis (the Confederate White House) as a museum in which to store and display the artifacts the ladies were determined to collect from throughout the South. Isobel (Belle) Lamont Stewart Bryan was the president and able leader of the CMLS.

The new Museum's first appeal for donations went out in January 1892. The language reveals the sentimental and commemorative ideas with which the Museum was founded a

(http://www.moc.org/site/PageServer?pagename=abt_ov_history, accessed February 19, 2011.) :

The clothes, the arms, the money, the belongings of the Confederate soldier, and the women whose loyal enthusiasm kept him in the field, are properly objects of historical interest. The glory, the hardships, the heroism of the war were a noble heritage for our children. To keep green such memories and to commemorate such virtues, it is our purpose to gather together and preserve in the Executive Mansion of the Confederacy the sacred relics of those glorious days. We appeal to our sisters throughout the South to help us secure these invaluable mementoes before it's too late.

Belle Bryan and the influential ladies she enlisted were successful in attainment of their goals: 1- Secure the Confederate White House and reopen it as a museum (February 22, 1896) ; 2- Rebury Jefferson Davis in Richmond's Hollywood Cemetery (May 31, 1893); 3- Organize a museum to display their collection. Note: In 1907, Douglas Southall Freeman became the first historian hired by the CMLS.

Waite recounted the number and varied contents (510 flags, uniforms, weapons, and paintings. 100,000 manuscripts, diaries, letters, maps, etc.) of the collection. He told of past exhibits, distinguished guests

(Margaret Thacker, David Lloyd George, a reenactment group from Stuttgart, Germany). Waite also told of the conservation efforts and their costs and fund-raising efforts to maintain the collection.

What was and is the goal of the museum? Education. The exhibits, past and present, were designed to further understanding of not only the Confederate nation but all aspects of Southern life. Students from 8 to 80, 50 states, and 73 countries have enjoyed and learned from the materials available at the MOC. The MOC and North Carolina Central University have collaborated on research projects. With 90% of the collection "in the vault," changing the exhibited items continued to add to the knowledge of the public and researchers.

What are the future plans for the MOC? Waite and the MOC board are working to be able to display more of the collection to the general public. They envision taking the museum to where the people are. A new museum is under construction at Appomattox Court House (150,000 visitors a years) with a 2012 opening. If plans and donations enable, another museum in the Fredericksburg area (500,000 visitors and 30% of the Civil War casualties) will add to a multi-museum vision. Plans for another museum at Fort Monroe are unclear because of ownership issues at the fort. From that point, other sites may emerge as the opportunities arise. The possibility of another museum outside of Virginia could become a reality.

With the difficulty of locating a future site at Fort Monroe, I would propose to Waite and the MOC that Wilmington be the location of a Confederate Navy Museum. Wilmington, Fort Fisher, and its port are a critical part of the history found within the MOC collection. Wouldn't it be fitting that the naval collection be in Wilmington – Lifeline of the Confederacy? But why limit its scope to just the Confederate Navy? Expand the scope to include Confederate and Union Navies, white and black servicemen. The Fort Fisher bombardment was the largest US Navy engagement until Normandy. While the daring Confederate officers, John Taylor Wood, John Newland Maffitt, and John Wilkinson, used Wilmington as a base for operations; US Navy officers, William Barker Cushing and David Dixon Porter, also shaped history here.

 Trivia Question Answers February 2011 *****

1 - Ever wonder why there are 13 stars on the Confederate battle flag and the final national flag? Sure, Kentucky and Missouri were included as an inducement for the Border States to join the Confederacy, but why include what was not a reality? Some Confederates were "taken" by the number thirteen and its association with the American Revolution. The Confederate Congress also included seats for thirteen states. Wishful thinking as it turned out; however, thirteen was a lucky number in 1776 so why not in 1861.

2 – How did Southerners view the celebration of the Fourth of July 1861? Southerners appeared to have been divided, as they had been on the question of secession. Some were for embracing the celebration. A minority were against. From an article written by Robert F. Durden , "The American Revolution as Seen by Southerners in 1861," Louisiana History: The Journal of the Louisiana Historical Association, 19, no. 1 (Winter, 1978) 33-42.

From the Raleigh Register of July 3, 1861, "no reason why the birth of Liberty should be permitted to pass unheeded wherever Liberty has votaries..... The conduct of the North in trampling the principles of 1776 under foot and throwing ashes on the memory of its forefathers is no sufficient reason for a failure by the South to recognize and celebrate the Fourth of July as the anniversary of the most glorious human event in the history of mankind....." The editor continued, "the accursed Yankees are welcome to the exclusive use of their 'Doodle'" He urged that the South "hold on tenaciously to Washington's March and Washington's Principles and on every recurring anniversary of the promulgation of the Declaration, reassert the great principles of Liberty."

The editor of the New Orleans Picayune boldly claimed the Fourth of July as the South's "own." In a July 1861 article, he wrote, "The Confederate States of 1861 are acting over again the history of the American Revolution of 1776." He continued that the Lincoln administration had applied the same measures adopted by George III and his government. "The resistance of the South has been based on the same eternal principles which justified and glorified the patriots of 1776." The Fourth of July was "the work of men who laid the cornerstone of constitutional freedom." Since the North had "thrown off the respect" and was "marching its armies openly to overthrow State authorities and State existence with fire and sword;" hence, the Confederate States had "the most sacred right of property in the memories of Independence Day, as the loyal inheritors of its principles and its glories."

A dissenting voice was heard from the editor of the Wilmington Journal. In an article dated June 27, 1861, he wrote that the Fourth of July was not relevant because it was part of a "history of a union which no longer exists." He favored stopping celebrations for the duration of the war.

3 – Waite Rawls, CEO of the Museum of the Confederacy, provided a detailed story that traced the beginning and actions of the ladies of the South to honor and then remember those who had fallen during the late war. Rawls shared the stories of the ladies collecting artifacts from Confederates, great and small, to keep the spirit of these men's efforts remembered. The museum's collection was recently valued at more than $400,000,000. This collection was obtained without the benefit of trained historians or preservationists. In 1907, the ladies hired a John Hopkins PhD. graduate to catalog the vast collection. Who was the man lucky enough to see and document the content of this collection?

Douglas Southall Freeman. He would continue his career as a journalist, historian, and author (Lee's Lieutenants).

4- Among the 510 flags in the MOC collection, which one flew last over a Confederate unit? The flag of the C.S.S. Shenandoah. James Iredell Waddell commanded the Shenandoah and turned his ship over to the British Navy in Liverpool in November 1865. NOTE: The Shenandoah made port in Melbourne, Australia in January 1865. Per Waite Rawls, the people of Melbourne still fondly remember the visit of the Confederate commerce raider. An American Civil War Round Table of Australia still promotes the study of all aspects of the American Civil War and its link to Australia.

Lt. Cdr. James Iredell Waddell of North Carolina Commander of the C.S.S. *Shenandoah

5 – The majority of items in the MOC collection were received from Southerners answered the call of the Confederate Memorial Literary Society's January 1892 appeal. Waite mentioned two items that were donated by Union officers. What were these items? Gen. Lewis Armistead's sword, which he carried at the battle of Gettysburg. Armistead commanded one of the three brigades in Pickett's division, Armistead led his troops during "Pickett's Charge" with his hat raised high on the point of this sword. Armistead was mortally wounded in the charge and died two days later. The veterans of the unit that defended Cemetery Ridge against the charge returned the sword to the Pickett Division Association during a reunion at Gettysburg in 1906, and it was donated to the museum that same year. (www.moc.org) The silver service used at the Confederate White House by Davis family. With the fall of Richmond, a New Hampshire regiment was assigned to guard the house. Years later, the silver was returned with an added engraved inscription, "war booty."

History of the Museum of the Confederacy

S. Waite Rawls III, President and CEO of The Museum and White House of the Confederacy, will be the speaker at our February 17 Dinner Meeting. Waite will present the history and the future of the Museum of the Confederacy as it transitions into the 21st century from a one-museum site to a multiple-site system of museums. What will be the place occupied by the Museum of the Confederacy and why will its collection remain relevant in a 21st century United States of America?

Join us on February 17 and learn what Waite thinks of these and other questions.

Rawls, a native of Franklin, Virginia, received a B.A. at Virginia Military Institute and was awarded an M.B.A. and J.D. by the University of Virginia. Rawls assumed his current position on Jan. 5, 2004 following a long career as an executive in the international investment and commercial banking industry. His parallel career in volunteering for historical and civic organizations included engagements as trustee of the Civil War Preservation Trust and the Jamestown-Yorktown Foundation and member of the Virginia Military Institute Board of Visitors. Among the positions he held in the banking, investment, and money markets fields were: Managing Director, Chemical Bank, New York; Vice Chairman, Continental Bank, Chicago; Executive Vice President, The Chicago Corporation; and Chief Operating Officer of Ferrell Capital Management, Greenwich, Conn.

Sesquicentennial Commemoration

The 150th anniversary of the secession of South Carolina, the firing on the Star of the West, and the Cape Fear Minutemen's seizure of Fort Johnston and Fort Caswell has come and gone.

These events were noted by Ed Bearss during his visit to the Cape Fear region during January. Dan Geddie has reported the occasion of Ed's recent visit to Fort Caswell:

On January 14, Dale Lear and I joined the Brunswick Civil War Round Table for a tour of Fort Caswell. The leader of the tour was the none other than Ed Bearss. We were also accompanied by the Director of Fort Caswell, Rick Holbrook. We met in the lobby of the hotel. Rick explained how that at the end of World War II the site was still a coastal artillery base. In 1946 the Army decided it no longer needed the base, at this point the Baptist stepped in and purchased the base for $85,000. The Baptist has been using the site to operating a very successful youth camp every summer. Ed Bearss discussed the construction of Ft. Caswell and the fact that it was a pentagonal brick fort and looked very similar to it more famous Ft. Sumter.

Our next stop was on the parapet of the old fort. What a spectacular sight it was. You could see the land and south wall of the old fort. Most of the north wall had been blown away by the retreating Confederates and the sea wall had been replaced with World War I concrete battery. It had the same look as Ft. Moultrie did last year on our tour. Next we toured the inside of the old fort, including a cavernous area that was the powder room. We also toured the other post Civil War battery, including a huge 10 inch mortar that was designed to take out battleships.

One of Ed's discussions was about the Coastal Artillery branch of the US Army. They were elite troops of the army. They had to understand trigonometry. We should remember all of these veterans who served the country well at Ft Caswell from 1848 to 1945.

The Civil War Round Tables

While doing some research on one of my favor subjects (the American Civil War), I found an article written by Stephen Ambrose in The Wisconsin Magazine of History, Vol. 42, No. 4 (Summer, 1959), pp. 257-262. Ambrose sought to explain the fascination that Americans held for a conflict fought almost a 100 years earlier. He observed that many citizens had almost forgotten WWI, WWII and Korea but they retained a keen interest in the men and women who participated in the war that almost destroyed this nation.

Ambrose explained:

Heart and soul of America's new fascination with the Civil War are the thousands of intensely dedicated members of the scores of Civil War Round Tables scattered throughout the United States, Canada, and Europe. Unlike their predecessors, the Grand Army of the Republic, and the United Confederate Veterans, and other post-war organizations, the Round Tables have no sectional bias. Their basic function is to give members a chance to refight battles. Condemn erring officials – on both sides – and praise distinguished generals in both Blur and Gray. In this objective the Round Tables have succeeded admirably.

The Round Tables are another evidence that the quiver has not yet subsided, and that a catastrophe which divided the nation 100 years ago is, today, through the Civil War Round Tables, helping to unite it.

I believe Stephen Ambrose was correct in his assessment. When members of Round Tables can come together and examine the events of 1861 – 1865, I believe a better understanding of this period can be determined. When Round Tables such as Cape Fear, Brunswick County, Raleigh, and Ottumwa (Iowa) share their findings, we are united in our search for the relevance of the Civil War.

January Meeting

"Bringing in the Dead"

Cold Harbor, Virginia, April 1865

Josh Howard presented the status of the North Carolina Civil War Death Study Project.

Background for the study can be found on www.nccivilwar150.com:

On June 10, 1861, nineteen-year-old Private Henry Lawson Wyatt of Company A, 1st North Carolina Volunteers, was killed in action at the Battle of Big Bethel, Virginia. He has been widely recognized and honored as the first Confederate killed in combat and the first of over 40,000

North Carolinians to die in the war. Both claims when properly analyzed are unsupported by the historical record, and highlight problems that complicate North Carolina's understanding of its Civil War participation. An ongoing project at the North Carolina Office of Archives and History, supported by the efforts of the Colonel Leonidas L. Polk Camp of the Sons of Confederate Veterans in Garner, is attempting to rectify such issues. The North Carolina Civil War Death Study, work intended to supplement the North Carolina Civil War Atlas currently being prepared by the Office of Archives and History, provides a reanalysis of the available archival evidence, compiling the most definitive, accurate assessment of the number of North Carolina soldiers — both Confederate and Union — who died during the conflict.

NOTE: This website offers a most detailed report of the death study.

Josh discussed some long accepted statistics and how, when, and by whom they were prepared.

The 40,275 deaths attributed to North Carolina troops came from the U.S. Army Provost Marshal, James D. Fry, and his study released in 1866. Fry used incomplete Confederate after action reports as a basis for his numbers. The men employed by Fry to complete the initial death report were required to complete the Provost Marshal report prior to their discharge.

Josh provided the criteria for the study of 116,000 service records available to the death study team. Josh estimated the total number of men who served as 125,000; however, the final total may be nearer to 135,000 – 137,000.

The Death Study: New Analysis and New Interpretations

The Civil War Death Study's mechanics are fairly straightforward. The analysis is three phase: (1) a study of what is within the published rosters as well as the actual compiled service records; (2) a study of contemporary North Carolina newspapers; and (3) a cemetery and gravestone survey. Analysis began with going line by line, soldier by soldier, within each regiment in the published seventeen Roster volumes, documenting deaths. Each individual's name and unit is recorded, as well as the year of his death and cause — be it a battle wound, disease, accident, execution, unknown or other. For many individuals, particularly those at the beginning of the war, their death was recorded but not the cause. Most often their death was due to disease, though overworked hospital stewards did not waste time recording what type. Examples in the "other" category include those who were murdered, committed suicide, or suffered calamities such as being bitten by a spider or poisoned by eating a terrapin.

For those units which have not yet been covered in the Roster series, namely the Senior Reserves, Home Guard, militia units, white and black Union units from North Carolina, as well as those companies that consisted of North Carolinians but which served in other Confederate states' regiments, analysis consists of going through their Compiled Service Records in the same fashion. Records of North Carolinians serving in the Confederate naval, engineering, and signal personnel, as well as general and staff officers, also will be analyzed along with records of Union volunteer regiments raised from Confederate prisoners-of-war.

Caution must be taken in several areas. For numerous North Carolina regiments and companies, muster rolls end in December 1864. Whether from a lack of paper or intentional destruction, the records simply no longer exist. Therefore, if an individual was present for duty in December 1864 but does not appear on any hospital documentation, casualty list, or is documented with a parole at Appomattox or Greensboro, his service record simply ends. In these instances name searches in the 1870 census or research in family histories can provide final disposition. Numerous men were captured at the end of the war, wounded and in Confederate hospitals, for which no final disposition data is available in Union provost marshal records. For others, that information does exist, so on a case-by-case basis decisions can be made as to whether that individual likely died or not. In other instances errors of spelling and pronunciation have complicated the service record. Prisoners often took assumed names, as did those enlisting for bounties, making the researcher's job that much more difficult.

At times the archival evidence is even contradictory. Men oftentimes were recorded as killed or missing when in reality they were sitting in a Union prison camp. Widow's pension records remain for men who, it was claimed, were killed in the war, when all available evidence suggests the man at the very least survived the conflict. These may be individuals who simply never returned home and were thought of as dead. In addition, just as we are identifying and crediting those North Carolinians who served in fully organized companies within other states' regiments, we are cautiously addressing those Georgians, South Carolinians, Tennesseans, and Virginians who served in organized companies within North Carolina battalions. While their information is recorded, the project must take into account their loss in a separate fashion than totaling them with our North Carolinians.

Conclusions

The North Carolina Civil War Death Study will never be fully perfect or complete. Record loss has ensured that. Nevertheless, the project attempts to provide the most accurate assessment of North Carolina's loss in the war to date. Not only can this study more accurately determine the number of young men from North Carolina who gave their lives for the Confederate cause, but we can for the first time give credit to those white and black Tar Heels who died wearing Union blue. Furthermore, the information gathered can then be used to produce graphical representations demonstrating how many men from each county or each region died in the war. For once, accurate assessments of how many men fell to disease versus combat and how many were lost by various means during each year of the war can be demonstrated, as can the number of North Carolinians who died in prisoner-of-war camps. Such information is essential to furthering our understanding of the war within the state. Similar endeavors currently are being undertaken to compile a more accurate accounting of the number of North Carolinians who participated in the war, and to study the socioeconomic backgrounds of those soldiers. The findings will be published during the Sesquicentennial as supporting material for a larger map-driven project known as the North Carolina Civil War Atlas. As North Carolinians begin our Sesquicentennial Commemoration of the conflict, it is only right and honorable that we more accurately identify those who lost their lives. The time has come to get it right.

Josh reported the current total for deaths of North Carolina troops as 31,076 men; however, the final death count may number between 32,000 – 35,000. This 31,076 number represented 25% of the 1860 white male population (age 15 -50). A comparison to the 2009 estimate of the 15 – 50 white male population yielded a staggering 488,878 dead!

The North Carolina Civil War Atlas with its county level maps is scheduled for publication in 2015.

Josh explained why this study was made and why it was deemed important as a part of the Sesquicentennial Commemoration. He further provided an answer to a question many people have probably asked themselves: Why does nearly every county square in the states involved in this war have a memorial to those who gave their all in support of a cause? These memorials were important to the people who erected them because nearly everyone in a community was impacted by the deaths of someone they loved. Whether it had been a grandfather, father, uncle, husband, brother, son, cousin, or friend, these men were honored as a remembrance from their families and friends.

North Carolina Civil War Death Study

Josh Howard will be the speaker at our January 13 meeting. Josh will present the results of an in-depth study of long accepted statistics concerning the number of North Carolina troops who served and subsequently lost their lives during the American Civil War.

Josh is a military historian and co-author of two books about the Revolutionary War as well as numerous journal articles. He is a research historian for the North Carolina Office of Archives and History and is currently assigned, as part of the State's Civil War Sesquicentennial Commemoration, the task of reanalyzing the number of North Carolinians who served and died during the Civil War.

His most recent book, Long, Obstinate, and Bloody: The Battle of Guilford Courthouse, March 15, 1781, coauthored with Dr. Lawrence E. Babits, the George Washington Professor of History at East Carolina University, and published by the University of North Carolina Press, was awarded the 2010 United States Army Historical Foundation Distinguished Writing Award.

On June 10, 1861, nineteen-year-old Private Henry Lawson Wyatt of Company A, 1st North Carolina Volunteers, was killed in action at the Battle of Big Bethel, Virginia. He has been widely recognized and honored as the first Confederate killed in combat and the first of over 40,000 North Carolinians to die in the war. Both claims when properly analyzed are unsupported by the historical record, and highlight problems that complicate North Carolina's understanding of its Civil War participation. An ongoing project at the North Carolina Office of Archives and History, supported by the efforts of the Colonel Leonidas L. Polk Camp of the Sons of Confederate Veterans in Garner, is attempting to rectify such issues. The North Carolina Civil War Death Study, work intended to supplement the North Carolina Civil War Atlas currently being prepared by the Office of Archives and History, provides a reanalysis of the available archival evidence, compiling the most definitive, accurate assessment of the number of North Carolina soldiers — both Confederate and Union — who died during the conflict.

Josh's process for the death study included comparison of military records, newspapers, and archival accounts, as well as cemetery surveys against the figures put forth by the Federal Government in 1866 in what was known as the "Fry Report."

Josh's presentation will provide a more complete description of the study and its significance to North Carolina's Sesquicentennial Commemoration.

* Sesquicentennial Commemoration****

December 20, 1860 – South Carolina secedes from the Union. This event led to the exodus of ten other states and the formation of the Confederate States of America. From December 20, 1860 until their confederacy collapsed on April 9, 1865, a state of war existed between the people of these previously United States.

To better understand the feelings of the citizens of South Carolina, it is worthwhile to review the grievances that the delegates to its secession convention felt compelled to challenge. The following document is quite long; however, it clearly shows that the delegates feel that the Northern states threaten their rights – especially their property rights. Note: The delegates make reference to "slavery" six times within this document.

Not everyone in South Carolina was swayed by the logic of the secession convention delegates. James L. Petigru, lawyer, politician, and jurist, famously remarked after the secession ordinance was passed, "South Carolina is too small for a republic and too large for an insane asylum."

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA - DECLARATION OF THE IMMEDIATE CAUSES WHICH INDUCE AND JUSTIFY THE SECESSION OF SOUTH CAROLINA FROM THE FEDERAL UNION.

The people of the State of South Carolina, in convention assembled, on the 26th day of April, A.D., 1852, declared that the frequent violations of the constitution of the United States by the federal government, and its encroachments upon the reserved rights of the states, fully justified this state in then withdrawing from the Federal Union; but in deference to the opinions and wishes of the other slaveholding states, she forbore at that time to exercise this right. Since that time, these encroachments have continued to increase, and further forbearance ceases to be a virtue.

And now the State of South Carolina having resumed her separate and equal place among nations, deems it due to herself, to the remaining United States of America, and to the nations of the world, that she should declare the immediate causes which have led to this act.

In the year 1765, that portion of the British Empire embracing Great Britain, undertook to make laws for the government of that portion composed of the thirteen American colonies. A struggle for the right of self-government ensued, which resulted, on the 4th of July, 1776, in a Declaration, by the Colonies, "that they are, and of right ought to be, FREE AND INDEPENDENT STATES: and that as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

They further solemnly declared that whenever any "form of government becomes destructive of the ends for which it was established, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government." Deeming the government of Great Britain to have become destructive of these ends, they declared that the colonies "are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be totally dissolved."

In pursuance of this Declaration of Independence, each of the thirteen States proceeded to exercise its separate sovereignty; adopted for itself a constitution, and appointed officers for the administration of government in all its departments, legislative, executive and judicial. For purposes of defense, they united their arms and their counsels; and, in 1778 they entered into a league known as the articles of confederation, whereby they agreed to entrust the administration of their external relations to a common agent, known as the Congress of the United States, expressly declaring in the first article, "that each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right which is not, by this confederation, expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

Under this confederation the war of the revolution was carried on, and on the 3d September, 1783, the contest ended, and a definite treaty was signed by Great Britain, in which she acknowledged the independence of the colonies in the following terms:

"ARTICLE I. His Britanic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz: New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, to be FREE, SOVEREIGN AND INDEPENDENT STATES; that he treats with them as such; and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the government, propriety and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof."

Thus were established the two great principles asserted by the colonies, namely: the right of a state to govern itself; and the right of a people to abolish a government when it becomes destructive of the ends for which it was instituted. And concurrent with the establishment of these principles, was the fact that each colony became and was recognized by the mother country as a FREE, SOVEREIGN AND INDEPENDENT STATE.

In 1787, deputies were appointed by the States to revise the articles of confederation, and on 17th of September, 1787, these deputies recommended for the adoption of the states, the articles of union known as the Constitution of the United States.

The parties to whom this Constitution was submitted, were the several sovereign states; they were to agree or disagree, and when nine of them agreed, the compact was to take effect among those concurring; and the general government, as the common agent, was then invested with their authority.

If only nine of the thirteen states had concurred, the other four would have remained as they then were - separate, sovereign states, independent of any of the provisions of the constitution. In fact, two of the states did not accede to the constitution until long after it had gone into operation among the other eleven; and during that interval they each exercised the functions of an independent nation.

By this constitution, certain duties were imposed upon the several states, and the exercise of certain of their powers was restrained, which necessarily implied their continued existence as sovereign states. But to remove all doubt, an amendment was added, which declared that the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states, respectively, or to the people. On 23d May, 1788, South Carolina, by a convention of her people, passed an ordinance assenting to this constitution, and afterwards altered her own constitution, to conform herself to the obligations she had undertaken.

Thus was established, by compact between the states, a government, with defined objects and powers, limited to the express words of the grant. This limitation left the whole remaining mass of power subject to the clause reserving it to the states or to the people, and rendered unnecessary any specification of reserved rights.

We hold that the government thus established is subject to the two great principles asserted in the Declaration of Independence; and we hold further, that the mode of its formation subjects it to a third fundamental principle, namely: the law of compact. We maintain that in every compact between two or more parties the obligation is mutual; that the failure of one of the contracting parties to perform a material part of the agreement, entirely releases the obligation of the other; and that where no arbiter is provided, each party is remitted to his own judgment to determine the fact of failure, with all its consequences.

In the present case, that fact is established with certainty. We assert that fourteen of the states have deliberately refused for years past, to fulfil their constitutional obligations, and we refer to their own statutes for the proof.

The constitution of the United States, in its 4th article, provides as follows:

"No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

This stipulation was so material to the compact, that without it that compact would not have been made. The greater number of the contracting parties held slaves, and they had previously evinced their estimate of the value of such a stipulation by making it a condition in the ordinance for the government of the territory ceded by Virginia, which now composes the states north of the Ohio river.

The same article of the constitution stipulates also for rendition, by the several states, of fugitives from justice from the other states.

The general government, as the common agent, passed laws to carry into effect these stipulations of the states. For many years these laws were executed. But an increasing hostility on the part of the non-slaveholding states to the institution of slavery has led to a disregard of their obligations, and the laws of the general government have ceased to effect the objects of the Constitution. The States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Iowa, have enacted laws which either nullify the acts of Congress or render useless any attempt to execute them. In many of these states the fugitive is discharged from service or labor claimed, and in none of them has the state government complied with the stipulation made in the constitution. The State of New Jersey, at an early day, passed a law in conformity with her constitutional obligation; but the current of anti-slavery feeling has led her more recently to enact laws which render inoperative the remedies provided by her own law and by the laws of Congress. In the State of New York even the right of transit for a slave has been denied by her tribunals; and the States of Ohio and Iowa have refused to surrender to justice fugitives charged with murder, and with inciting servile insurrection in the State of Virginia. Thus the constituted compact has been deliberately broken and disregarded by the non-slaveholding states, and the consequence follows that South Carolina is released from her obligation.

The ends for which this constitution was framed are declared by itself to be "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

These ends it endeavored to accomplish by a federal government, in which each state was recognized as an equal, and had separate control over its own institutions. The right of property in slaves was recognized by giving to free persons distinct political rights, by giving them the right to represent, and burthening them with direct taxes for three-fifths of their slaves; by authorizing the importation of slaves for twenty years, and by stipulating for the rendition of fugitives from labor.

We affirm that these ends, for which this Government was instituted, have been defeated, and the government itself has been made destructive of them by the action of the non-slaveholding states. Those states have assumed the right of deciding upon the propriety of our domestic institutions; and have denied the rights of property established in fifteen of the states and recognized by the constitution; they have denounced as sinful the institution of slavery; they have permitted the open establishment among them of societies, whose avowed object is to disturb the peace and to eloign the property of the citizens of other states. They have encouraged and assisted thousands of our slaves to leave their homes, and those who remain have been incited by emissaries, books and pictures to servile insurrection.

For twenty-five years this agitation has been steadily increasing, until it has now secured to its aid the power of the common government. Observing the forms of the constitution, a sectional party has found within that article establishing the executive department the means of subverting the constitution itself. A geographical line has been drawn across the Union, and all the states north of that line have united in the election of a man to the high office of President of the United States, whose opinions and purposes are hostile to slavery. He is to be entrusted with the administration of the common government, because he has declared that that "government cannot endure permanently half slave, half free," and that the public mind must rest in the belief that slavery is in the course of ultimate extinction.

This sectional combination for the subversion of the constitution, has been aided in some of the states by elevating to citizenship, persons, who, by the supreme law of the land, are incapable of becoming citizens; and their votes have been used to inaugurate a new policy, hostile to the South, and destructive of its peace and safety.

On the 4th of March next this party will take possession of the government. It has announced that the South shall be excluded from the common territory; that the judicial tribunals shall be made sectional, and that a war must be waged against slavery until it shall cease throughout the United States.

The guaranties of the constitution will then no longer exist; the equal rights of the states will be lost. The slaveholding states will no longer have the power of self-government, or self-protection, and the federal government will have become their enemy. Sectional interest and animosity will deepen the irritation, and all hope of remedy is rendered vain, by the fact that public opinion at the North has invested a great political error, with the sanctions of a more erroneous religious belief. We, therefore, the people of South Carolina, by our delegates, in convention assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, have solemnly declared that the union heretofore existing between this state and the other states of North America, is dissolved, and that the State of South Carolina has resumed her position among the nations of the world, as a separate and independent state, with full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do.

To many North Carolinians, the events of 1860 will not be the first civil war that existed in these United States. Brother against brother, neighbor against neighbor will be deeply felt during the American Revolution and the American Civil War. Taxation without representation and violations of state's rights will drive men of 1776 and 1860 to wage revolution against a perceived unjust government. During the first year of the Sesquicentennial Commemoration, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will examine some of the parallels between the first and second revolutions.

The people of the Cape Fear were quickly immersed in the coming storm.

January 1861

January 9— The Cape Fear Minute Men seized Fort Johnston (eventually renamed Pender) from Ord. Sgt. James Reilly at Smithville (present-day Southport). Governor Ellis ruled the fort's seizure illegal and that it should be returned to Reilly.

January 10 — The Cape Fear Minute Men and the Smithville Guards seized Fort Caswell on Oak Island from Ord. Sgt. Frederick Dardingkiller. Governor Ellis ordered the fort be returned to Dardingkiller.

A Trove of Lettered Memories Treasured by the Lambs:

Ray Flowers shared the story of Will and Daisy Lamb in a context similar to the sweep of history that Margaret Mitchell wrote of in Gone With the Wind. While the Lamb's were not quite the Rhett Butler and Scarlett O'Hara of the Cape Fear, their relationship grew as they faced the hardships of military and domestic travails associated with their life at Fort Fisher.

The story began with the acquisition of eleven pieces of silverware that had belonged to the Lambs. Ray began research that culminated in an exhibit currently on display at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site. He made use of diaries, letters, official records and newspapers to fashion the relationship between the highly educated William Lamb of Norfolk, Virginia and the well-born Sarah Anne Chaffee of Providence, Rhode Island. As in Gone With the Wind, theirs was a story of blockade running, military adventure, family tragedy, personal loss, and reconstruction.

Rather than repeat the story that Ray shared with the audience at the December 9 meeting, a visit to Fort Fisher, and maybe a tour by Ray, can recreate the electric atmosphere that existed between Will and Daisy Lamb during their time at the "Tara of the Cape Fear."

 Trivia Question Answers January 2011 *****

1 – Who was the first Confederate volunteer to be killed during the Civil War? Recent historians have gone so far as to focus on a Baltimore native named William P. Clark, who apparently had enlisted in the Confederate army and was awaiting transport south when he was killed in the Baltimore riots on April 19, 1861. Wyatt remains the first North Carolina soldier, if not the first Confederate, to die in combat, and deserves all of the credit and dignity due him for that claim. He was not, however, the first North Carolina soldier to lose his life in the war. That tragic distinction went to Private James Hudson of Company B, 1st North Carolina Volunteers, who died of pneumonia in Raleigh on May 11, 1861.

2 – Other than to determine force strength, why was the report of the dead important to army commanders? Numbering the dead was important to the armies in that they needed to know their force strength. Therefore casualty lists and hospital returns were not concerned with individual lives, but instead assessments of military resources. In turn, however, army commanders also hoped to hide accurate data from their enemies, leading to misinterpretations that distorted the historical record. Union Gen. George McClellan was fascinated with numbers, and consistently overestimated not only his enemy's losses, but also their strengths. His obsessions led to a failure to act when needed, and eventually led to his sacking. In May 1863, General Robert E. Lee issued an order that critiqued the standard custom of reporting losses, suggesting that inflated estimates were being made by officers who viewed their unit losses as a direct affirmation of their own performance and courage on the battlefield. Large losses in an officer's unit theoretically showed that he and his men had been in the thick of the fight, and therefore that they had fought ferociously and honorably. Thus, inflated numbers led to inflated egos. Conversely, in the latter years of the war, Lee appears to have consistently underestimated his losses in an effort to hide the war's impact on his army from the enemy, and to a certain extent from civilian authorities.

Sarah Ann Chaffee "Daisy" Lamb grew up in Providence, R.I. In 1863, she joined her husband at Confederate Point where Colonel William Lamb commanded at Fort Fisher. Lamb had his soldiers build a small cottage north of Fort Fisher. Daisy set up residence with Lamb and their two oldest children in this simple cottage.

In December 1864, a large Federal fleet appeared off Fort Fisher. Daisy and the children were sent across the Cape Fear River to the safety of Orton Plantation. On Christmas Eve, the Federals began a massive bombardment intended to destroy the guns of Fort Fisher. Daisy watched the bombardment and despaired over the safety of Lamb and his command. As the prolonged bombardment continued, young Dick Lamb approached his mother: "Mama," he said, "I want to pray to God for my papa." The child knelt down and "said his little earnest prayer," and feeling the better for it, exclaimed "Oh, sister, I'm so glad! I'm so glad! [N]ow God will keep care of my papa!" Dick's prayer was answered for Lamb and the defenders of Fort Fisher were spared when the Federals withdrew their soldiers from the beaches and the fleet disappeared.

The Confederate celebration was short-lived. A Federal fleet reappeared in mid January 1865. Daisy and the children again crossed the river to relative safety. The Federal fleet began another fierce bombardment. Lamb and his men were doomed to endure the fall of Fort Fisher. Daisy watched, waited, and prayed as the battle raged to its conclusion.

The writings of these officers led to renewed efforts to cast Jeb Stuart as the scapegoat for the loss at Gettysburg.

 November Meeting *****

Tonia "Teej" Smith shared the results of five years of research in her presentation of "Flora Cooke Stuart: Life Without Jeb." The relationship between the dashing cavalry officer and daughter of a Lieutenant Colonel Phillip St. George Cooke grew from shared interests and mutual respect. Jeb was taken with Flora when she demonstrated her abilities to master a skittish horse during a review of troops at Fort Leavenworth in 1855. Frequent evening rides led to friendship, and their friendship progressed to love. Flora rode, played guitar, shot a weapon with skill, and was well-read. Jeb had found his soul mate. In less than two months, Stuart and Flora became engaged.

Married on November 14, 1855, the Stuarts shared their lives together as the United States moved closer to a division that would split the nation and their families. Stuart was present at Harpers Ferry and viewed John Brown's actions to incite a slave uprising. John Brown's raid added to the deepening division between the sections. Flora's family would be severely impacted as her father, mother, and one sister remained loyal to the Union while Flora, a brother and another sister would cast their lot with the South.

When the Civil War started in 1861, Jeb quickly displayed the attributes that made him into an outstanding cavalry commander. Among his major accomplishments was his ride around George McClellan's army while being chased by his Union father-in-law. The spirited cavalier provided intelligence that helped Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia fend off McClellan's intended capture of Richmond. Stuart developed his role as a knight defending Southern womanhood and chivalry. He played a role that built his image and character.

While Jeb devoted his energies to the Confederacy, Flora moved from place to place to be near her husband. The couple shared tragedy when their five year old daughter, Flora Stuart, died in Lynchburg on November 3, 1862. Stuart had been in action and unable to go to his wife and child. He wired for Flora and son, Jimmy, to come to him near Culpepper so they could share their grief. Jeb also cautioned Flora to avoid wearing black so as to not depress his soldiers. Again, image was everything to Stuart.

Flora lived with Stuart's idealized views of Southern womanhood. He warned her not to embarrass him about reports of his flirtations with other women. He was a knight who defended all women's virtues and she should understand his role. Stuart reportedly told Flora that she was "never so happy as when miserable." Flora continued to relocate to be in proximity to her husband. In 1863, a daughter, Virginia Pelham Stuart, was born.

After the defeat of Lee's Army at Gettysburg in July 1863, Stuart received criticism from some Southern officers for his efforts during this campaign. Even Lee reported that Stuart's absence from his army impacted the results of the campaign. For a man who had never experienced failure, this criticism, especially from Lee, was hard to accept. Stuart had lost superiority over the more numerous and improved Federal cavalry. Stuart continued to portray a dashing spirit who would lead his forces to victories against his enemies – Union and Confederate.

With Grant's move into the Wilderness in May 1864, Lee and this army were locked in a deadly struggle to block the Federal advance. Stuart and his cavalry performed good service during initial fighting. When Sheridan's cavalry broke free from the Army of the Potomac and advanced toward Richmond, Stuart moved to counter. Stuart took time from the pursuit for a short visit to the Fontaine plantation near Beaver Dam Station. Stuart was greeted by his wife and two children. This short visit, with its rushed farewell, would be the last for Flora and Jeb. Stuart would be mortally wounded at Yellow Tavern shortly after he kissed Flora, Jimmy, and Virginia for the final time. Stuart suffered horribly and passed from this earth before Flora could reach his side.

Farewell Flora was left alone with no home, little money, and two children. Because Stuart had desired that his children be raised south of the Mason and Dixon Line, Flora refused her father's offer to pass through the Union lines and come to Baltimore. She elected to remain in Virginia to raise her children and preserve the memory of her husband.

Mrs. "General" Stuart never remarried. She settled in Saltville, Virginia where she supported her family as a teacher. In 1880, Flora became headmistress of the Virginia Female Institute in Staunton. From 1880 until 1899, she adopted curriculum changes that provided a relevant education to young women. Flora realized that the domestic and refined finishing school's education was no longer practical in a world where a woman may need to earn her own way. Shorthand, bookkeeping, and typing skills were more applicable in a world without Jeb.

Flora Stuart took an active role in countering criticism that was directed at her husband. She guarded Stuart's papers and kept private his writings that may cast dispersion on others. Flora refused to raise-up her husband by bring others down. Stuart's Aide-de-Camp, Major Henry B. McClelland and Colonel John S. Mosby also came to Flora's aide as they took on the arguments of Confederate officers who sought to cast Jeb Stuart as a scapegoat.

When Virginia Pelham Stuart Walker died in 1898, Flora moved to Norfolk and assisted her son-in-law in raising her grandchildren. Flora remained in Norfolk until her death on May 10, 1923. While on a walk, Flora tripped and severely injured her head. Mrs. "General" Stuart had for 59 years protected her family, cherished the memory of her husband, and helped to rebuild Jeb Stuart's shattered South.

Flora Cooke Stuart and James Ewell Brown Stuart were reunited at the Hollywood Cemetery in Richmond, Virginia on May 12, 1923.

In H.B. McClellan's book, I Rode with Jeb Stuart: The Life and Campaigns of Major General J.E.B. Stuart, McClellan summed up the Gettysburg Campaign and Stuart's role:

"It was not the want of cavalry that General Lee bewailed, for he had enough of it had it been properly used. It was the absence of Stuart himself that he felt so keenly; for on him he had learned to rely to such extent that it seemed as if his cavalry were concentrated in his person, and from him alone could information be expected."

Tonia "Teej" Smith, a native Tar Heel, has lived in Pinehurst for the past eighteen years. She has written articles for magazines such as North and South, America's Civil War, and Civil War Times.

In addition to her writing and research, she has presented programs on various Civil War topics to local schools and to Civil War round tables in North Carolina and Virginia. In 2009, she was one of the presenters at Longwood University's annual Civil War Seminar. She was the keynote speaker for the Stuart-Mosby Historical Society meeting in Richmond this past May where she presented a program on Flora Cooke Stuart, widow of Maj. Gen. J.E.B. Stuart Teej currently moderates an online Civil War discussion group. She is also the founder and past president of the Rufus Barringer Civil War Round Table in Pinehurst. She now serves on the round table's board of directors and is their program chairperson.

Flora Cooke Stuart: Life Without Jeb

In the spring of 1855, 19 year-old Flora Cooke, daughter of Colonel, later Union Brigadier General, Philip St. George Cooke, a Virginian, and Rachel Wilt Hertzog, a Philadelphia debutante, met a dashing young cavalry officer named James Ewell Brown at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. After a whirlwind courtship the young couple was married at Fort Riley on November 14, 1855.

Their marriage ended eight and a half years later when Major General J.E.B. Stuart, C.S.A., was mortally wounded at Yellow Tavern on May 11, 1864. Flora would remain a widow for the next fifty-nine years. The speaker briefly will cover the Stuart marriage before discussing the challenges Flora Cooke Stuart faced in her life without Jeb.

Flora Cooke Stuart ensured his legacy was remembered.

Raffle Winners

There was no raffle at the October meeting; however, the chance to add to your library returns in November.

Jack Travis, "Colonel Black Jack," has been awarded a Jefferson Davis Gold Medal by the Daughters of the Confederacy for his book, Men of God, Angels of Death. Jack received recognition for his efforts to preserve Confederate history through the research that led to the publication of his book.

Congratulations to Jack for receiving this award.

Ottumwa (Iowa) Civil War Round Table

Arthur A. McGiverin, a member of the Ottumwa Iowa round table, visited his nephew, Terry McGiverin, at Wrightsville Beach. Arthur contacted Bob Cooke and inquired if any members of the CFCWRT would be interested in meeting at Fort Fisher and talking about our round tables.

On October 20, Bruce Patterson, Dan Geddie, and Tim Winstead met Arthur and Terry at Fort Fisher. Ray Flowers gave this group of Civil War buffs an excellent tour of the fort that included many "little known" facts about the clash on the Cape Fear. Sharing information about how each round table operated was informative and hopefully we can maintain contact between groups.

During our conversations about the type of programs presented at the Ottumwa and Cape Fear round tables, Clint Johnson's October presentation was discussed. Clint had discussed some of the legalities that faced Lincoln and Jefferson Davis about the issue of secession. Arthur provided a very qualified answer to this question for he was a former Chief Justice of the Iowa Supreme Court. Let me know if you are interested in Arthur's answer.

October Meeting

Clint Johnson's program examined the closing days of the Civil War as related in his book, Pursuit: The Chase, Persecution, and Surprising Release of Confederate President Jefferson Davis. Mr. Johnson discussed the intricate ethical and legal questions faced by Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, and other high ranking Federal officials in the wake of the collapse of the Confederacy. Beginning with the only man in the Confederacy who believed the military collapse of Confederate armies began a "new phase of the struggle," Johnson revealed the strengths, weaknesses, and stubbornness that led Jefferson Davis in his odyssey that became the basis for the "Lost Cause."

While Lincoln and other Federal leaders may have preferred that Davis escaped capture to avoid future contentious trials to determine the legality of secession and the guilt of high ranking Confederate leaders, Clint laid before us the facts that accompanied the capture of Davis near Irwinville, Georgia on May 10, 1865, his two year imprisonment in Fort Monroe, the legal wrangling for Davis to stand trial, and his May 13, 1867 release on bail provided by Northern citizens. Intrigue and hidden agendas dominated this phase of the history of the Civil War and its aftermath.

In the final drama of Davis' odyssey, he never stood trial for his actions. He never had his day in court. The question of the legality of secession and the guilt of high Confederate leaders was never completely addressed.

Jefferson Davis accepted the kindness of an admirer and retired to Beauvoir in Biloxi, Mississippi. It was at Beauvoir where Davis wrote his history, The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government. In this history, Jefferson Davis defended his and the South's actions during the conflict that claimed 620,000 American lives and forever changed the United States.

Trivia Question Answers November 2010

1 – Who was the "Maid of Sargossa" and why did "Jeb" speak of her in his poem? Agostina Zaragoza. Stuart worshipped the ideal of women defending the home & hearth of the Confederacy and actively supporting the men in the field. Agostina Zaragoza man-ed (woman-ed) a cannon in defensive of Saragossa, Spain against Napoleon's invading army. Agostina's true story was so inspiring that poets like Byron, Southey, and "Jeb" Stuart praised her in their poems.

2 – Who wounded "Jeb" Stuart at Yellow Tavern? Private John A. Huff of Armada, Michigan. Huff was formerly a member of one of Colonel Hiram Berdan's sharpshooter regiments. In the spring of 1864, Huff enlisted and opted to ride to war with the 5th Michigan.

3 – Who was the admirer of Jefferson Davis who made possible his retirement to Beauvoir in Biloxi? Sarah Anne Ellis Dorsey, a novelist and believer, made Beauvoir available to the Davis family for a nominal rent. In 1879, Davis purchased the home for $5,500 to be paid in three installments. Dorsey died before Davis made the final two installments. In her will Dorsey left the estate to Davis.

Our next meeting will be Thursday, 14 October 2010 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.) Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30 p.m.

Our guest speaker for October will be Mr. Clint Johnson, author of several books on the Civil War. Mr. Johnson lives in the mountains of Ashe County looking down on the New River, oddly enough, supposedly one of the oldest rivers in the world. He has written ten books on the Civil War or the South, including: A Vast and Fiendish Plot: The Attack on New York City and Pursuit: The Chase Capture, Persecution and Surprising Release of Jefferson Davis (this is the topic of his power point presentation to our RT). Mr. Johnson has also written, The Politically Incorrect Guide to the South and coming in 2010 will be updates of his two touring books: Touring the Carolinas Civil War Sites and Touring Virginia and West Virginia's Civil War Sites.

He is a Florida native of the small farming community of Fish Branch in Hardee County. That is about 40 miles south of Fort Meade, Florida, the fort at which Lt. Thomas J. Jackson was serving when he was put under arrest for questioning the morals of his superior officer. As a child Clint day-dreamed that Jackson patrolled the dirt road in front of his house. Later research showed that Jackson never came within 40 miles of Clint's house- which still disappoints him!

Everyone knows that famous photograph of three Confederate soldiers standing atop Seminary Ridge; according to one report, they were "among 5,425 unwounded soldiers" captured by Union General Meade's army. What you may not have known is that they are North Carolinians. That was but one of the tidbits Mr. Jeff Bockert gave us at our September meeting with a talk entitled: "The Uniforms of Fort Fisher." Mr. Bockert began with the statement that, as there are no longer any veterans left, it is via the study of material culture- i.e. the material "things" we have left from that era that we may examine and learn from. Thus it is with a uniform that hangs in a museum: It was worn by a soldier and has a story to tell.

When North Carolina entered the war, she was ill-prepared to clothe and equip the many regiments that would be needed in the conflict. In May 1861, a Uniform Panel Board met to design a suitable uniform for the new Provisional Army of the Confederacy (PACS). Following an Austrian design, soldiers would wear a hip length, double breasted tunic with service facings indicating branch of service (light blue for infantry, red for artillery, yellow for cavalry). It was quickly realized that Richmond would be unable to clothe all the soldiers being enlisted, so the "Commutation System" was utilized. States would step into the gap and provide uniforms for their native sons and the Confederate government would give the state $50 for each man thus clothed. In September 1861, North Carolina began to produce uniforms for its men as state agents were sent throughout the Confederacy seeking to buy cloth and leather. They were competing against other state agents and the Confederate government as well. This competition tended to drive up prices. All material went to the newly established NC Depot and material obtained was "outsourced" to tailors and local seamstresses to produce the finished product.

North Carolina then turned to foreign markets to fill its need for uniform cloth. From 1861 through 1864, according to Jeff, 255,000 jackets and 300,000 trousers were produced from the NC Depot. Donated clothing was another "important source" for the soldiers; even carpeting, once lined, became used as coats and blankets.

Imports from England accounted for 20% of all socks, 70% of all shoes and 100% of all blankets issued by North Carolina from July 1863 to September 1864. The NC Depot clothing was somewhat different than the uniforms from other states, hence it is a little easier to pick out a North Carolina trooper. At Fort Fisher, even though the site was the "entrepot" for uniforms and cloth, the men received uniforms at different times and no two companies looked alike. Even the men of the same company many times showed up wearing a variety of uniforms. As the soldiers were artillerymen, they all wore some sort of red piping somewhere on their caps and jackets. Later in the war, some Confederates might be seen wearing a "Tait" jacket. In Ireland, Robert Tait began producing an eight-button jacket with royal blue trousers and exporting them to the Confederacy. They were based on the British Army uniform.

Viewing a Frank Vizetelly (of the London Illustrated News) print, Mr. Bockert indicated that Vizetelly literally drew what he saw and the men and uniforms he sketched were quite accurate. Finally, Mr. Bockert told of the 92,000 uniform suits left in a Raleigh warehouse after the war. There are quite a few stories of these uniforms being issued to German POWs in World War I. If true, as most believe) the uniforms would most likely not have survived, making the uniform worn by the common soldier of North Carolina a very rare piece of history.

Our next meeting will be Thursday, 9 September 2010 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.) Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30 p.m.

Please join us for our meeting at which Mr. Jeff Bockert will once again "Kick-off" our season! Mr. Bockert is no stranger to our group; he has spoken to our group before and will speak about "The Uniforms of Fort Fisher."

A native of California, Mr. Bockert currently serves as the Civil War Specialist for the North Carolina Division of Historic Sites based in Goldsboro, N.C. Jeff has worked in the historic site and museum field for over fifteen years and prior to arriving in Goldsboro, managed the President James K. Polk Birthplace near Charlotte, N.C. He has also worked for the National Archives in Washington, D.C. and as Associate Curator of the Battleship North Carolina in Wilmington. He has taught history at Brunswick Community College and Wingate University. He is also the author of several works on presidential and military history. Jeff received both his undergraduate degree in American History and his master's degree in History from UNC-Wilmington. Join us and find out just what those soldiers manning the forts at the mouth of the river were wearing and how they obtained their uniforms.

Speaking of Fort Fisher, the state recently held meetings on "The Future of fort Fisher", at both the Arboretum and at Carolina Beach. Did you know that of the 264 total acres of Fort Fisher, only 38 are owned by the state, the rest leased from the Army at Sunny Point? Looking towards the future, staff members and the public held informal talks on what was felt it was needed or desired at the site. Divided into five segments, the program covered 1- preservation; 2- Site development; 3- Operations; 4- Programming; 5- Community involvement. Public comments were sought and some of the subjects broached were: the lack of space at the Visitor's Center; the reconstruction of the fort's landface, the palisade fence and perhaps even a bombproof (such were the hopes in the 1960s also!) An outdoor presentation site was mentioned, as well as updating a database on the soldiers (both Union and Confederate) that fought there. With the realization that preservation of the site was all-important, security was a concern; outdated trail markers and historical plaques that require updating were brought up also. If you were not able to attend either of the meetings, you can still let your voice be heard by e-mailing your comments to: comments@coolspring.com, or mail them to: Cool Spring Center, 399 W. Page Hager Rd., Cleveland, N.C., 27013.

Our next meeting will be Thursday, 9 September 2010 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.) Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30 p.m.

We hope you are enjoying the warm days of summer (although it has been quite hot these last few days!) The RT is on a summer break but your committee will be meeting shortly to select our programs for the coming season.

Mr. William "Bill" Jayne spoke to our group in May on the establishment of the national cemetery system. Beginning with the burials of soldiers who died on frontier posts such as Forts Leavenworth and Gibson, he noted that there was no formalized system to deal with those killed in the service of their country. During the Mexican-American War, General Scott did attempt to take care of his dead, but still, there was no governmental policy to follow. Mr. Jayne noted that to this day, there are Americans buried in cemeteries in Mexico City.

With the onset of the Civil War and the massive casualties that followed in the wake of a battle, something had to be done. Over 620,000 soldiers lost their lives during that conflict and at one battle alone (Shiloh) there were 27,000 casualties. As he stated, "The Civil War changed the relationship between the government and the people." In July 1862, the U.S. Congress authorized the purchase of grounds for cemetery use. Fourteen cemeteries were established, including ones at Philadelphia, Keokuk (Iowa) and Springfield (Illinois).

Here in Wilmington, after the battles at Fort Fisher and the occupation of the town, there were at least 4,500 dead, scattered throughout the area. Some were interred at Fort Fisher, others at the town's Oakdale Cemetery, more found their final resting place in unmarked graves near where they fell. An effort to gather and identify the dead began in earnest in 1865 and shortly thereafter land was purchased for the new National Cemetery at Wilmington, N.C. Many of the newly established national cemeteries were located on battlefields or prison camps and by 1870, there were seventy cemeteries holding nearly 300,000 soldier's graves. Of that number, nearly half (144,000) were unknowns.

The Wilmington National Cemetery was bought early in 1867 from Isaac D. Ryttenburg for $2,000. Burials began almost immediately; graves were sodded, wooden crosses placed and a caretaker's lodge was built. Of the 2,059 soldiers buried there, 604 were known to be white, over 1,200 are unknowns, 12 sailors, seventy-one known blacks and 138 unknown black soldiers lie at rest within the five acre compound. At least 72 of those men are known to have been in the infamous Andersonville prison. There are no (known) Confederate dead in the cemetery; the national cemeteries were only to hold Union dead, not Confederates. Immediately after the war, those men would have to be cared for by their relatives; this policy has since changed.

Mr. Jayne then went on to give a history of the cemetery (in 1881, 50 bodies were removed from Fort Fisher to Wilmington, in 1882, 2 African-American soldiers came from Burgaw). In the 1930s, the national cemetery system was expanded due to the aging WWI veterans and many new cemeteries were added: Fort Snelling (Minnesota), Long Island (N.Y.), Baltimore, Fts, Bliss, Sam Houston, Rosecrans and at the Golden Gate. After WWII, another expansion was required due to the many dead returning to their native soil. Bringing us up to date, Bill told us that the largest veteran areas in the country have been identified and expansion of those cemeteries begun. In these regions- Chicago, Northern California, South Florida, Cleveland, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Dallas, Seattle, Albany (N.Y.) and Oklahoma City the Veteran's Administration will adhere to the mission of the National Cemetery Administration: "To honor veterans with final resting places in national shrines and with lasting tributes that commemorate their service to our nation."

This just in!

"Statshot: Numbers that shaped the era.

Within a year of passage of the National Cemetery Act of 1862, 14 cemeteries were established for Union soldiers. By 1870, there were 73 burial grounds. Virginia is home to the most Civil War era national cemeteries, with 14- including Arlington national Cemetery, the resting place of 16,000 Union and 482 Confederate soldiers. The smallest national cemetery established before the war's end was Ball's Bluff, in Leesburg, Va., the final resting place of 54 soldiers. Vicksburg National Cemetery is the largest established during the war; it holds 17,077 Union soldiers, 12,909 of whom are unidentified, and 2 Confederate soldiers. [Civil War Times, June 2010].

Gettysburg and "The King of Battle" !

That might have well been the title of member Jack Travis's talk on artillery at that decisive battle in July 1863. Taking us back to the "why" of Gettysburg (lack of food), Colonel "Black Jack" Travis (his rank denotes his stature among re-enactors), began his talk about the movement by Lee's army northward. With a train stretching some ten miles long, horses, mules and oxen dragged Lee's artillery towards that fateful meeting. Commanded by General William Nelson Pendelton, the artillery arm of the Army of Northern Virginia was already somewhat hamstrung by that officer. Described as "less than effective...while serving as chief artillerist" for Lee, Jack admitted that Pendelton's alter ego, U.S.A. commander, General Henry Hunt, was the better artillerist. Indeed, it has been written that "Hunt was the driving force in welding the Army of the Potomac's artillery into a superb organization.

As events unfolded on the battlefield, discrepancies in the Confederate arm began to take a toll. In addition to a lack of shot and shell, many of the Confederate guns were captured U.S cannon. These guns, as Jack told us, were a "mixed bag" of different calibers, requiring a multitude of ammunition, whereas, Hunt had only one type of gun in each section. The hot July weather began to wear down men on both sides, even as there was much work left to be done- casualties to be replaced, guns to be cleaned and ammunition to be loaded; various parts of damaged cannons had to be replaced by wagon-mounted portable forges. The U.S. forces were able to replace worn-out gun tubes; Confederates could not. Even the lack of sleep, according to Jack, played a major role in the battle.

Describing the failed attack on Cemetery Ridge, Jack noted that smoke over the battlefield, made it hard to locate targets, while Confederates, firing uphill towards the ridge, were thought to be overshooting their quarry. Jack informed the group that the powder being used was the likely culprit: when the Southerners use captured U.S. gunpowder, their fuses fail to detonate properly, causing the shells to explode beyond the hill. A further fiasco occurred when Pendelton ordered nine guns and their ammunition train moved back to safety. As he had not notified E. Porter Alexander, commanding the First Corps artillery which was supporting the attack, that general could not locate the guns when they were needed. When Pickett's Charge came, Hunt had an additional eighteen guns rolled into position to repel the attackers. At Appomattox, recognizing who was the better artillerist, General Henry Hunt would not speak to Pendleton, but rather went to talk with General Alexander.

"Seek Out Fort Fisher's Distant Answering Gleams"

(From James Sprunt's Chronicles of the Cape Fear River)

At our February dinner meeting held at UNCW's Madeline Suite, author James "Larry" Walker entertained us with stories not only of his family, but of what life was like at Fort Fisher during the war. He noted early on that his book, Rebel Gibraltar: Fort Fisher and Wilmington, C.S.A. was meant to complement other studies done on Fort Fisher and Wilmington and he emphasized the importance of Wilmington (and hence the fort) to the war effort. He peppered his talk with stories of Joe King, Daisy Lamb and "Uncle John" Beasley. Larry's ancestor, (Joe King) a teenager during the war wrote his reminiscences in 1926 and remembered passing through town during the deadly yellow fever epidemic of 1862. He vividly recalled seeing the death carts as they hauled the victims to Oakdale Cemetery for interment.

Larry spoke to us about the importance of blockade running, with a description of several of the runners: the Modern Greece, the battle over the Kate and the saga of the Fannie and Jennie- perhaps that gold sword meant for General R.E. Lee and carried by the ship is still buried in the sands along the beach!

Larry noted that he made a very fortunate purchase of a book (Thomas Taylor's *Running the Blockade) because it had belonged to Colonel William Lamb. He discovered that officer's handwriting in the flyleaf as well as a picture of Daisy Lamb. That book, donated by Mr. Walker, now graces the display cabinet at Fort Fisher. Kudos to Larry Walker for that generous gift!

He is an avid Civil War buff, reenactor and historian, who has "studied and hiked nearly all the battlegrounds of consequence in the war." Our own Dr. Chris Fonvielle will lead walking tours of the battleground, while "historians, encampments, artillery demonstrations and family activities" will abound. The Museum will play host to nearly three hundred school children from the area who will be introduced to that era of their history. The 145th anniversary of the battle is free to the public, with donation greatly appreciated. The Museum is located at the corner of S.17th St. and Independence Blvd. and their telephone number is 910 395-5999.

The Cape Fear Civil War RT has donated over $100 (and a special thank you to Col. Bruce Patterson who also provided additional support) to the event.

Fort Anderson/Brunswicktown

There will be yet another reenactment held at Fort Anderson/Brunswicktown this month. On Saturday, 20 February, the site will open at 9 a.m and later will host a talk by Mike Kochan ("Torpedoes and Other Infernal Machines"). There will be a nighttime lantern tour and the fort will close at 8:30 p.m. On Sunday (21st) it will again open its gates at 9 and at 11:45 there will be a talk ("The battles of fort Anderson and Town Creek") by Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle. The site will close at 3:30 p.m. that day. If you visited Fort Fisher during the reenactment held there, you know what else is in store to view: Confederate and Union reenactors, living history talks and walks through one of the most pristine Confederate forts still remaining.

January Meeting

We had a record turnout for Bert Dunkerly's talk on the "Road to Appomattox and Greensboro" and suffice it to say that none were disappointed. Bert, who is a National Park Ranger at that historic site took us back to the spring of '65; to when R.E. Lee struggled to hold the lines around Richmond and Petersburg. Early in April, the Union army cracked those lines and the long, hard retreat began. Lee, who was attempting to join Joe Johnston in North Carolina, was constantly forced to move westward to avoid the Federals who were always maneuvering to cut him off. There was constant fighting along the way and at Sailor's creek, Lee's army suffered a great loss with over 7,000 men and many generals captured. Virtually all of Lee's III Corps were now prisoners of the Yankees. . The morning of the 9th of April, Lee found himself nearly surrounded and attempted unsuccessfully to break through the Union cordon. Later that day, he sent a messenger through Union lines to ask for a truce. He was responding to letters that U.S. General Grant had sent earlier. Soon, resplendent in his dress uniform and mounted on his horse Traveler, he rode to the McLean home to meet with Grant. Terms were discussed between the two and soon some 27,000 soldiers stacked their arms. After surrendering, the Confederates were given rations and the all-important parole pass. These paroles allowed them passage by train or government steamer and insured that the men were not molested by Union troops as they returned home.

"In North Carolina, by contrast," General Johnston has consolidated his army, with many units now done away with and the effect on the soldier's morale is discernable. As soldiers of Lee's army pass through Smithfield, word is received of Lee's surrender and morale plummets even further (many of those first troopers were thrown in jail as deserters!) Johnston moves his army west to Raleigh and Chapel Hill and President Jefferson Davis, who has fled Richmond and is heading south calls for a cabinet meeting (the last one) in Greensboro, N.C. Johnston is invited to the meeting, along with General P.G.T. Beauregard and when Johnston inquires about negotiations, he is told to fight on. When Davis leaves Greensboro, Johnston realizes the futility of further resistance and is soon (17 April) meeting with his adversary, Union General W.T. Sherman. The meeting takes place at the Bennett House in Durham and the terms are much more lenient than those given to Lee. Sherman, it would appear, completely misjudged the mood in Washington, especially after the Lincoln assassination. When the terms given Johnston are rejected by Congress, the war is back on. Johnston's army, when informed of the decision to continue the war, goes into a state of near mutiny. "Whole regiments refused to move" reported one South Carolina soldier and many men simply began to disappear as the days wore on.

Sherman and Johnston met again and this time the terms were virtually the same as those given Lee. The major differences were that most of Johnston's men were allowed to keep their horses and wagons with the order to "stack arms" in place. Just how many actually surrendered their weapons is unknown, but 7/8's of them were allowed to keep their guns. Union General George Hartsuff is sent to Greensboro to begin the long process of issuing paroles to the men of Johnston's army. As Mr. Dunkerly pointed out, it would be interesting to learn of the general's feelings, surrounded as he was by 30,000 Confederate troops! The process went well however, and by May many of the men are headed home. With the exception of a few other surrenders, the war had finally come to an end.

Record Turnout!

We had over eighty people attend our last meeting. Committee member Bruce Patterson attributed it to a "perfect storm" of sorts. The weather cooperated and many folks came to ensure a seat at our dinner meeting next month (as well as to get one for our March trip to Charleston). There were several new members, as well as visitors and guests and whatever the reason for the great crowd, let's see if we can do it again!

Bob Cooke, gave a wonderful presentation of Civil War Wilmington at our last meeting. It was not the staid, genteel town it had once been; indeed the war altered the town so much so that former residents left for more peaceful climes. As one attendee commented, it is astounding that Wilmington and indeed the Confederacy was able to fight such a massive war and to have lasted for four long years! Bob's book, Wild, Wicked, Wartime Wilmington is available at Books-a-Million.

Our next speaker will be member (and editor!) Bob Cooke. Bob, who relocated from the northeast to southeastern N.C. in 1995, will speak about his new book, Wild, Wicked, Wartime Wilmington: Being an Account of Murder, Malice and Other Assorted Mayhem in N.C.'s Largest City During the Civil War! Bob, who has always had an interest in American History (and the Civil War in particular) has been a Tour Guide at several Cape Fear historical sites and is the current vice-president of the Cape Fear Round Table. The book is the culmination of several years of research into the subject of what life was like on the home front in Wilmington during the war and Bob will tell us about not only the problems the military and civilian authorities encountered, but what the doctors, the blockade runners and the railroads were doing to support the war effort.

Helmira on Earth

Member Richard Triebe delivered what was promised! It was a closer look at the fate of the Confederate soldiers marched off to prison camps upon the fall of Fort Fisher. While some of those men were sent to Point Lookout, Fortress Monroe, Fort Delaware or Fort Columbus, many of them (Richard pegged the number at 1,132) wound up in the infamous Elmira prison. Located by the banks of the Chemung River in south central New York state (about 15 miles from the Pennsylvania border), the camp had originally been constructed as Union training grounds to hold anywhere from 2,500 to 3,000 men.

Using a member of the 40th NCT- Thaddeus C. Davis' account of the fall of Fort Fisher and the subsequent trip to the prison, Mr. Triebe related how the prisoners overcoats and blankets, having been stored in their barracks, were burned when the Union naval bombardment set those buildings afire. Being sent northward, without suitable warm clothing, ensured that many would fall ill, even before entering the prison gates.

The Fort Fisher prisoners and indeed, virtually all captives held by the Union authorities were victims of a new policy towards them, one espoused by the U.S. Secretary of War, Edwin Stanton. This new policy, a policy of retribution, whereby food rations were deliberately reduced, compounded the distress of many of those detained in prisons throughout the north. The normal ration for a POW was that of a regular soldier, but letters to newspapers and testimony given before Congress by former Union prisoners swayed government officials (including Stanton) to strike back at the most defenseless Southern soldiers: those under their control.

Stanton's policy, although officially rejected when it was vetoed by President Lincoln, was applauded by the U.S. commissary general of prisoners, Colonel William Hoffman, himself a released POW. Hoffman's rationale was since POWs were "sedentary", they did not require as much food as a regular trooper, so their rations were cut to 2/3rds (at Elmira it was said the rations were reduced even more, to as little as 1/4 of what it had been).

In 1864, as the war progressed, the prison at Point Lookout had become overcrowded, so some men were sent off to Elmira, where those from Fort Fisher would soon arrive at. As Thad Davis recounted: "We arrived about eight o'clock in the evening, in four feet of snow, and many prisoners had neither blankets nor coats. We were kept standing in ranks ... for half an hour before starting for the prison We were ... robbed of all valuables ...; then sent to the barracks- board shanties about fifty feet long, containing one stove. Our beds were planks without blankets. There were about seven thousand prisoners confined there[.]"

At its peak, Elmira lodged around ten thousand prisoners who were not allowed to receive any packages nor were given even the most rudimentary medical attention, indeed, the surgeon at the post (Dr. Sanger) was heard to remark that he had "killed more rebels in his camp than any officer in battle" (some say he personally killed many by overdosing them with drugs as he was a drug user himself). The death rate varied from over 200 to 400 per month (February 1865). The water supply was in large measure responsible for many deaths. Foster's Pond, a small tributary of the Chemung had become diseased and spread dysentery throughout the camp. There were plans afoot to alleviate the water problem by having the prisoners dig a canal whereby the pond would drain back into the river, but Secretary Stanton's refusal to assent to the project delayed it until the winter when the ground was too hard to break.

As statistics became an important tool to measure how well (or badly) a camp was doing, the federal government took pains to show that the percentages of Union soldiers who died in southern camps (Andersonville in particular) was higher than those who perished while in Union hands. Actually, using Mr. Triebe's methodology, whereby he looked at how many POWs actually made it home (many "died en route"), the death rate at Elmira climbed to 25%. The death rate at Andersonville was somewhat higher, at nearly 29%, but it must be remembered (as Mr. Triebe pointed out) that while at Andersonville, there was nothing (no railroad to bring in supplies, no food), Elmira had everything (it was on the main line and the farmers had a bumper crop that year). You might also be surprised to learn that yet another northern prison camp had the highest death rate of all- Camp Alton, Illinois saw a 31% death rate!

[In addition to Mr. Triebe's talk, the editor also referred to member Walter M. Bullard's research on Corporal Dennis L. Carlisle, Co. D, 51st NCT, who is interred at Woodlawn National Cemetery in Elmira. It was also quite interesting to note that member Royal Palmer mentioned that an ancestor of his died at Elmira.]

The benefit is to raise monies to preserve what remains of the site of the Civil War Confederate States Armory (also known as the Sword factory). The cost of the affairs are: $40 per person for the Monday event, which includes a chicken dinner and likewise, $40 for the event on Tuesday (pork dinner). For both events, the cost will be $70. Fonvielle and Dr. Lynn Veach Sadler. There will also be a display (said to be the largest in the country) of the Sword Factory’s products: swords, bowie knives and bayonets.

Tom Belton of the North Carolina Museum of History talked to a group of about forty-five members and guests at our October meeting. Discussing the collection of Civil War flags held by the Museum, he first led us through their production, materials utilized and survival rate. Beginning with the Confederate national flags, Mr. Belton went on to cover regimental battle flags (many of which had battles or “battle honors” painted on them), the headquarters flag of General L.O’B. Branch, captured federal flags, state flags and even post-war organizational banners.

In battle, flags represented not only a company or regiment but family and country as well and were used to align troops or serve as a rallying point. The American Civil War was very likely the last war which saw flags carried into battle. Mr. Belton also mentioned the flag of the First Rhode Island Cavalry, captured by the Fifth N.C. cavalry in June 1863 and recently returned to that state. Hopes that Rhode Island would reciprocate by returning a captured North Carolina flag seemed to be in vain, however. He informed his listeners that the arrangements made early on had fallen through and it now appears that the flag will remain in Rhode Island Too bad.

Your Attention Please!

A bulletin from the North Carolina Historic Sites!

The 145th Anniversary of the American Civil War in North Carolina is fast approaching:

16-17 January 2010- the Second Battle of Fort Fisher

20-21 February 2010- the Battle of Fort Anderson

20-21 March 2010- the Battle of Bentonville

17-18 April 2010- the Surrender at Bennett Place

(Let’s not forget the First Battle of Fort Fisher- 24-27 December 2009!)

Also... Did you know that in 1859 ... “Daniel Emmett, a songwriter for a traveling show called Bryant’s Minstrels....was approached to pen a new ditty for a performance[.] He soon had the music and began the song with the line, ‘I wish I was in Dixie.’ These words did not profess a yearning for his southern home (Emmett was born in Ohio), but rather the warmer climate where the production companies would travel to escape the harsh northern winters.” [from Best Little Stories of the Blue and Gray with “General’s Wives, by C. Brian Kelly and Ingrid Smyer-Kelly; book review in Military Heritage, April 2007].

"Summer Edition"

Once again Mr. Tom Belton of the North Carolina Museum of History will address our Round Table, this time on the subject of the museum's flag collection. The N.C. Museum of History has the "second largest collection of Confederate flags in a single collection. Titled "The Civil War Flag Collection in the North Carolina Museum of History", his program will examine North Carolina state flags, Confederate first and second national pattern flags, battle flags, company flags, captured Federal flags, as well as flags of post-war organizations and recent acquisitions.

Mr. Belton is a native of Surry County who attended public schools in Raleigh and received his BA and MA from NC State, has worked at the museum for 31 years. Tom, married with a daughter who lives in Atlanta, also informs us that he had ancestors who served in Company H (the "Mountain Tigers"), 21st Regiment N.C. State Troops.

Interestingly, Mr. Belton, military curator at the museum, was in the news recently. The museum donated a captured Civil War flag of the First Rhode Island Cavalry back to the Rhode Island National Guard, "in the hopes the gesture will be reciprocated." The Fifth N.C. Cavalry had made the capture in June 1863. Rhode Island soldiers captured a North Carolina flag at the battle of New Bern in March 1862 and it is this flag it is hoped will be returned to North Carolina. Please join us as Mr. Belton discusses several of the many flags in the collection!

And the winner of our grand prize, Louis Froelich: Arms Maker to the Confederacy- Dick Covell.

Member Jack Travis has informed us that on (Saturday) 24 October, at the gravestone of Major James Reilly in Oakdale Cemetery (Section H, 10E) there will be a ceremony at the placement of a military marker to honor Major Reilly's memory. The dedication will take place at 10 A.M...

Reilly, it will be recalled, was an Ordnance Sergeant in the "Old Army" at the outbreak of war and it was he who surrendered the keys to Fort Caswell (after obtaining a receipt for the ordnance in the fort!) and who later joined the CSA and rose to the rank of Major. When Colonel Lamb was wounded at the Second Battle of Fort Fisher, Reilly assumed command "and covered himself with glory at the fall." Descendents, the UDC, SCV and Military Order of the Stars and Bars will be on hand, as well as Confederate reenactors from the 20th N.C. State Troops. Jack has told us that a "full Confederate military salute will be given by the reenactors, Adams Battery and the Fort Fisher cannon cockers. Member John Golden will provide the music.

Blockade Running- An Island Perspective.,

At our last meeting, Mr. Jeff Bockert spoke to us about an interesting aspect of blockade running- the Caribbean islands where the transshipments occurred. How those blockade running goods actually got to Wilmington was discussed. Covering Nassau in the Bahamas and St. George (Bermuda), Mr. Bockert stated that virtually all the goods that came to Wilmington came from the islands.

Nassau, which was really a "backwater" of the British Empire, was garrisoned by nearly 1,000 British troops. The islands were financially destitute with "wrecking" a major business. Many of the colonist were former Southerners who fled the U.S. after the American Revolution and were thus, very pro-Confederate.

Ships coming from England were quick to learn that by stopping first at New York, they could obtain the required customs clearance and then continue on unmolested to the islands. When the Union government found out what was happening, they then required a large bond to ensure the vessel would not divert their cargo to a Southern port.

Early in the war, ship's captains carried out the trade arrangements, by 1862, agents were sent abroad to supervise (and safeguard) government cargoes. Throughout the war, ship's captains (and many times the crew) were allowed their own space on board, giving them a larger stake in the business, in addition to their pay.

The amount of money passing through the islands transformed them. Property values went up, sailors spent freely while captains and Confederate officials "wined and dined" merchants at the Royal Victoria Hotel (which is still extant) in Nassau. One visitor reported that so many languages were heard there that it was like the "Tongues of Babel."

When Wilmington fell in February 1865, there were several vessels prepared to make the run to Wilmington. "The islands role in the struggle was invaluable and the rewards received in return were no less valuable to their welfare and no less fleeting."

The islands economy suffered greatly and they returned to the backwater they once were, although there was resurgence during the era of prohibition. The islands were once again used as a port of transshipment for contraband cargoes of alcohol.

“Summer Edition”

Summer is upon us and our RT is on recess until September, but please keep in mind that we are always looking for speakers for our meetings (we only utilize the very best) and Civil War related articles for our newsletter! Please have a wonderful, enjoyable and safe summer and we look forward to seeing you in September.

Please mark your calendar on 16 June (the third Tuesday) and be sure to attend member Richard Triebe's talk on the Confederate POWs captured at Fort Fisher. He will speak at 7 p.m. at the Southport Community Building (E. Moore St.). For more information contact the NC Maritime Museum at 457-6699 or by e-mail at info@friendsncmmsouthport.org

At our May meeting, our past president, Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., and his co-author (Louis Froelich: Arms Maker to the Confederacy) John W. McAden, Jr. held the audience captive with their dual approach to examining the war-time enterprise of Louis Froelich. As Dr. Fonvielle discussed his research, which due to a real lack of historical information, he likened to searching for a needle in a haystack, Mr. McAden held up an actual Froelich edged weapon and described it in detail. It is unknown when Froelich arrived in America, but by 1861, he was involved in the manufacture of buttons and cannonballs!

Situated in Wilmington on Surry Street, between Church and Queen Streets, his Confederate Arms Factory was soon churning out all sorts of edged weapons; from bayonets, cavalry sabers, short swords, lances and bowie knives (many of which John gladly showed to a most interested group), all were produced in Wilmington until Froelich, fearful of both the threatened Union attack as well as yellow fever which was, by the summer and fall of 1862, was washing like a tidal wave over the town, he shut down his factory. No sooner had he again begun operating his factory then a fire swept through the premises. It was at this point that Froelich moved his factory to Kenansville, where he again began producing weapons for both the state and Confederate government.

Unfortunately for Froelich, Kenansville was the target for a Union cavalry raid in July 1863. He suffered the loss of several building which were burned to the ground, but was once again turning out not only swords and bayonets but also farm tools, buttons, surgical equipment and knapsacks. Our thanks to Dr. Fonvielle and Mr. McAden for a great evening's talk!

P.S. Our RT purchased two volumes of Louis Froelich: Arms Maker to the Confederacy. One is to be raffled off at our September "kick-off" meeting while the other (leather-bound) will be raffled off at our annual dinner meeting. Be sure to be there for both and get two chances to win! Froelich was a Bavarian-born industrial engineer who immigrated to the United States in 1860. When the Civil War broke out in April 1861, Froelich was living with his wife and children in Wilmington, North Carolina. He soon established the Wilmington Sword Factory (later renamed the Confederate Arms Factory) to supply the Confederacy and the state with swords, sabers, bayonets and knives. Froelich moved his operations to Kenansville, North Carolina, after fore destroyed his Wilmington plant. Froelich was the largest supplier of edged weapons to North Carolina during the war.

Lieutenant George E. Dixon, Arnold Becker, “Seamus” Lumpkin (possibly Simpkins), Frank

Collins, J.F. Carlsen, Samuel Miller, James A. Wicks and Joseph Ridgaway, names which have only recently surfaced with the raising of the C.S.S. Hunley off Charleston, South Carolina. They have now attracted much interest because they are the last crew of that vessel and the first to successfully sink an enemy warship in an undersea attack. Just how these men came together at that time was the subject of our April speaker, Guntis Goncarovs. Convergence of Valor is the apt title of his book which investigates and gathers together what is known about these seamen. Forensic pathologists put together an impressive report on how they lived, (some had hard lives) while historians delved into the past to find bits of information that tied the men together even before serving on the Hunley. As an example of what he has discovered, Mr. Goncarovs said that Seaman Arnold Becker, a European sailor, had worked on riverboats before the war and had likely known George Dixon who also worked on the Mississippi steamers. The true convergence seems to have come aboard the C.S.S. Indian Chief, a naval receiving ship. Fully five of the men came from that vessel, not unusual at all, as Mr. Goncarovs pointed out, it was where an officer would go to fill out his crew. At least three of the crew were from Europe (Becker, Miller and Carlsen), only three of them were “true Southerners”: Ridgaway, Collins and Wicks.

Incidentally, the Hunley is still available for tours. Housed at the Warren Lasch Conservation Center in Charleston, a tour consists of being able to see the vessel in: “its 90,000 gallon conservation tank. Feel what it was like to be on the Hunley through interactive exhibits. Facial reconstructions of the Hunley crew. April 2009

Our next meeting will be 9 April 2009 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.)

Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30 p.m.

Our April speaker, Guntis Goncarvos, is a chemist by profession but a historian at heart! He has a BS in Chemistry from Charter Oak College in Connecticut and has worked in the nuclear power industry as a radio chemist and Chemistry Supervisor for over 28 years. He recently relocated from North Carolina, where he worked for Progress Energy, to New Hampshire where he now works for FPL Energy. He and his wife Joan have three daughters, one at Purdue University where she is a staff veterinarian, another is an attorney in Boston, and the youngest is attending the University of Rhode Island.

Convergence of Valor, published in late 2003 “was sparked by the recovery of the H.L. Hunley in 2000. Mr Goncarvos was particularly interested in the forensic reconstruction of the faces of the Hunley's final crew. While following developments, he learned that four of the eight sailors were recent European immigrants. Research into the men's lives revealed that two of the men, Miller and Lumpkin had mysteriously sparse backgrounds. Using known facts, he worked a story around the men and their parts in the events that led to the sinking of the Housatonic on February 17, 1864. Please join us Thursday evening for what promises to be yet another great talk!

At our March meeting, Mr. Brian Kraus did indeed set the stage for our upcoming trip to New Bern. Beginning with uniforms and accoutrements that were worn and carried by the Union and Confederate troops, he indicated that on the day of the battle in March 1862, the men of both sides looked quite similar. It had rained heavily the preceding day, so much so that many of the Northerners rifles failed to fire because they had not “kept their powder dry.” The rain also caused their wooden stocks to swell so much so that the ramrods could not be withdrawn. Many of the Union regiments went into battle knowing they could only fire one or two shots, so they were ordered to fix bayonets. With audience participation, he showed how the troops were aligned and sent forward, elbow to elbow.

Knowing that the successful attack of Union General Ambrose Burnside on the coast of North Carolina would lead to further incursions, the Confederates prepared to defend the deep-water port (and its two rail lines) of New Bern. The Confederate general in overall command was Lawrence O'Bryan Branch, a well-known pre-war politician. Branch had taken to military command and was good at it. Unfortunately, he erred in the placement of his troops (he had between 4,000 and 4,500 men) and when the battle commenced, it was found that the untried militia was holding the center of the line. The militia were flanked by the 35th NC regiment. That unit had, according to Mr. Kraus, undergone a terrific bombardment by U.S. Navy gunships the day prior when they were sent to Fisher's Landing to oppose the Union amphibious assault. As they were quite "skittish" about being shelled again, the Confederate line began to waver as the first U.S. soldiers hit them.

Burnside's men numbered around eleven thousand, along with several gunboats that could ply up the Trent River and shell the Southern defenders. The militiamen withstood but two volleys from the attackers before fleeing from their position. In General Branch's report he wrote: "The militia had now abandoned their positions, and the utmost exertions of myself and my staff could not rally them. Colonel Sinclair's regiment [the 35th] very quickly followed their example, retreating in the utmost disorder."

While the center of the line was disintegrating, the 26th NC, commanded by future Governor Zebulon B. Vance, was holding back the attackers on the Confederate right flank. Soon however, they began to realize, as they took fire from their left, that they had been flanked. A general withdrawal ensued; one that soon became a rout. The Confederates finally reformed their line at Kinston. The losses were as follows: CSA- 64 dead and 89 wounded; USA- 88 dead and 370 wounded. Although the numbers listed are not like those of later Virginia battlefields, Mr. Krause pointed out that based on the lower numbers of men engaged, the percentage of killed and wounded is notably higher than other battles.

New Bern was lost to the Confederacy and although several attempts were made to recapture it, the city would serve the Union well as a strong enclave throughout the war. It would be from New Bern that raids were dispatched to strike the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad.

Burnside Visits New Bern (and stayed a while)

(Images provided by Ann Hertzler)

Rain threatened throughout Saturday, 28 March 2009 when 25 members, friends and guests of your Cape Fear Civil War Round Table traveled by chartered bus to the New Bern Battlefield. The weather, in fact, was not unlike the conditions that existed in that strategic port city when Brigadier Ambrose E. Burnside landed his expeditionary force on the south bank of the Neuse River and approached New Bern.

Noted Civil War artist and historian Brian Kraus had set the stage for our tour with his splendid presentation to the Round Table earlier in March. At that time and again during the tour, Brian emphasized his talk by showing the weathered uniforms of the North Carolina 33rd Infantry with their signature “black tabs”, soldiers field equipment and finally a Enfield rifle and bayonet.

The battlefield today consists of some 27 acres of the original site of the assault on New Bern. The redans built by the Confederate troops have (remarkably) been undisturbed for the 147 years and except for tree growth, look exactly as they did in 1862. Likewise, Fort Thompson, an earthen fort overlooking the Neuse and anchoring the Confederate left flank remains in pristine condition.

General Burnside led some 11,000 Union troops towards New Bern. Confederate forces numbering some 4,500 inexperienced and ill-equipped troops were led by General Laurence O'Bryan Branch, a politician with little military experience. General Branch was determined to defend New Bern at a line of entrenchments that ran from Fort Thompson on the Neuse, inland to the edge of a deep swampy backwater called Bullen's Branch. This defensive line was cut (almost in the middle) by the

Fisher's Landing - image by Ann Hertzler

Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad tracks and it was in this sector that the Union troops broke through the Confederate line defended by the 33rd. The battle lasted some four hours. Casualties were high and although the 33rd Infantry Regiment was to fight many battles in the years to come, they rarely incurred losses as heavy as during this baptism of fire.

Our tour retraced Burnside's line of march. We were able to walk the defensive positions, stand at Evan's Hill Redoubt (where Branch had positioned a two-gun section of artillery anchoring his right flank) and visualize the battle that Brian had memorialized in his painting Baptism of Fire, a copy of which was provided to each member.

This was a most successful tour, thanks to the combined efforts of several members coupled with the professional expertise of our tour director. The best testimonial was from several members who want to know where we are going next year.

March 2009

Our next meeting will be 12 March 2009 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.)

Social Hour at 6:30 p.m., meeting at 7:30 p.m.

Setting the stage for our March trip to New Bern, Mr. Brian Kraus will speak about the 1862 battle. Mr. Kraus, well known to our Round Table, "lives along the coast, in the Morehead City area." Born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Mr. Kraus has also lived in Miami, Florida. Mr. Kraus is an Art teacher in neighboring Craven County, who has taught dependents of the Marine Corps and Navy personnel for many years. For many years he also owned and operated a successful landscaping business. It is in the attention to detail that shows in his art work, details of terrain and plant species, that insures a more realistic and accurate scene portrayal. He has also been a Civil War reenactor with the 1st NC Vols./ 11th N.C. Troops, again with a mind to better understand the soldier experience, not only tactics, but the sights, sounds and smells that reenacting imparts.

At our last meeting Mr. Kraus offered us a teaser: we may well be able to visit Fort Thompson, now in private ownership. Please join us for what promises to be a great (and informative) meeting. Also, see Bruce Patterson and make your reservations for our spring trip!

At our February meeting, a near-record gathering of some sixty-four members and guests of the RT were treated to a great talk, good food AND camaraderie. Our speaker, Rod Andrews, Jr., presently teaching at Clemson University, talked about the subject of his newest book, Wade Hampton. Speaking not only of Hampton during the war, Mr. Andrews continued with Hampton's post-war career, "Tragedy and Vindication." Only one of three men who rose to the rank of Lieutenant General in the Confederate army, he was the only one who had no prior military experience; he was, however, a natural-born leader who took command of the Confederate Cavalry after the death of J.E.B. Stuart in 1864. As Mr. Andrews pointed out, at that point of the war, the South was pretty well beaten, but Hampton, his men and a host of others didn't know that. They continued to fight on for nearly a year!

It was the later years that came into closer scrutiny as Mr. Andrews discussed Hampton's view on race. Some have portrayed him as a racial moderate, others as a leader of the KKK. One thing was certain: in South Carolina for many whites, he was viewed as the "symbol" of their future. Mr. Andrews also pointed out that during his tenure as Governor, one-hundred sixteen blacks were appointed to office and many black leaders praised him for his even-handedness. But make no mistake about it, Mr. Andrew cautioned: Hampton was very much a white supremacist; that is, he believed in the superiority of whites and the inferiority of blacks. Hampton's main concerns after the war were to bring social peace and stability to "his people."

Vindication of the war (and the losses suffered therein) was very much the focus of his post war labors. Having lost a son at the Boyton Plank Road in October 1864, he believed his son and the others that had fallen, died as true heroes. Thus was born the mythology and culture of the "Lost Cause" that many Southerners grasped and held onto.

Our speaker for our dinner meeting at the renowned Cape Fear Club will be Rod Andrew Jr. who will speak on Wade Hampton. Join us for “An Evening With Wade Hampton” as Mr. Andrews expounds on his latest book, Wade Hampton: Confederate Warrior to Southern Redeemer. Mr. Andrew, a native of Wilmington and graduate of Hoggard High School, went on to get his degrees from UNC-Chapel Hill, Clemson University and (his PhD) from the University of Georgia (1997). Mr. Andrew served a stint in the Marine Corps (1989-1991) and has taught at both the University of Georgia as well as the Citadel. Rod is the son of Rod Andrew, Sr. More about Wade Hampton: He was one of the richest men in the pre-war South; he had no formal military training and yet rose to the second highest rank in the army. Starting out in the infantry, he became legendary when he assumed a cavalry command. One of his most famous deeds was staged in September 1864 when he raided north and returned with 2,500 head of much-needed cattle. Please join us on the 12th for what promises to be a great evening of camaraderie, food and Civil War history!

From the Star-News (via Bruce Patterson):

Confederate Raider Cannons Preserved.

After more than eight years of work, scientists say two cannons from the Confederate raider CSS Alabama have been preserved at the same lab conserving another Civil War artifact, the Confederate submarine H.L. Hunley. [The work will be done at the Warren Lasch Conservation Center, located on Charleston's Old Naval Base.]

Lying in 200 feet of water off the coast of Cherbourg, France, the C.S.S. Alabama has given up two of the several guns she carried: six 32 pdrs. (mounted in broadside) and two pivot guns (one a 100-pdr. Blakely was lifted from the wreck in 1994, the other gun was a smooth-bore 8") constituted her armament. She was the most widely feared Confederate raider and also the most successful. After a battle with the U.S.S. Kearsarge that lasted nearly an hour and a half, the Alabama went under. She had fired 370 shots, her adversary, 173; the Union gunners proved to be better shots, although historians now seem to agree that the Alabama's gunners were hampered by the fact that they had bad gunpowder (damp powder and faulty fuses) and many shots failed to explode. One non-exploding shell hit the Kearsarge's room, another dud hit the rudder; either of these would have seriously injured the Union vessel and may have turned the tide of battle. The unexploded shell, stuck in the rudderpost, was later presented to President Lincoln as a trophy of war.

Some more interesting facts:

John Ancrum Winslow, Captain of the U.S.S. Kearsarge was a native of Wilmington, North Carolina. Captain Raphael Semmes surrendered to Union forces in Greensboro, North Carolina. Before the war, both men were friends and shared the same quarters when stationed aboard the U.S.S. Raritan. Well after the war had ended, (December 1865) Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles ordered Semmes arrest on the charge that he had "violated the 'usages of war.'" Semmes would later be pardoned and set free, much to Welles' chagrin. In the Alabama Claims, Great Britain was forced to pay for the damages wrought by the Confederate raiders. She paid out $15,500,000 in gold to the United States. Of that amount, the Alabama was responsible for $6,750,000.

At our last meeting we were treated to an excellent talk by Mr. Tom Belton who brought to light the extraordinary collection of (Orderly Sergeant) Alfred May of the 61st North Carolina. Presently residing in the Museum of History at Raleigh, it is the most complete accoutrement collection of any Confederate soldier. Born in March 1843, Alfred was listed in the 1860 census as a "student" but would shortly afterwards enlist in Co. F of the 61st Regiment. Alfred had two older brothers, one of whom, Robert, would die in a Richmond hospital in 1864. The other, Benjamin, would suffer a head wound at Petersburg, but as for Alfred, he survived and served through the entire war. May served in the eastern part of the state, as well as at Charleston's battery Wagner and Savannah. In December 1864, May's regiment was sent to the aid of beleaguered Fort Fisher and participated in the battles at Wyse Fork's and Bentonville. His regiment was surrendered at Bennett Place in late April 1865. As for Alfred, he lived until March, 1906.

After referring to the May collection as similar to the King Tut collection, Tom proved his statement by showing us slides of May's uniform, which initially suffered from insect damage. Kudos to those conservators who brought not only the uniform, but all the items in the collection (which had been stored in a trunk) back to life. He noted that there are less than 200 uniforms extant, most of those in private hands. Only 200 left from various sources: captures from the Union, through the blockade and from local manufacture.

The collection included May's rifle, indicating that May never officially surrendered. Most interesting about the various implements was a tool obviously designed for the Enfield rifle. Even the experts could not conclude exactly what it was for! May's cartridge box, although stiff from age, was X-rayed and showed it was full of cartridges. May's Colt pistol was also still loaded and required the assistance of the SBI to remove the rounds. Using compressed air, the Colt six-shooter was made safe.

A shelter half, knapsack, haversack, two canteens (one wooden, one metal) and a host of personal items were discovered in the old May trunk. The survival of the artifacts was due in large part, Mr. Belton told us, to not allowing the children to play with the items. The trunk was brought out at family reunions and the collection was shown to family members and then everything was packed away. My question, which will likely remain unanswered, is what was a sea shell doing in May's jacket pocket?

Prelude to Our Spring Trip

Several of our RT members traveled recently to New Bern where they were treated to a discourse on the battle that took place there in 1862 by the renowned historian, Mr. Ed Bearss. Meeting in the historic Masonic Temple, Ed Gibson, Dale Lear,

Harry Clements (thanks to Harry Clements for providing the images), Lance Bevins, Jack McGarrie, Bob Cooke, Tim Winstead and guest Nathan Alexander listened as Mr. Bearss set the stage with Burnside's successful attack on Roanoke Island in February 1862.

The following month the Federals moved on to the mainland with Federal gunboats shelling the landing site. As the Federals made their way towards the city, the Confederate defenders, numbering no more than four thousand, awaited the coming battle. Under the command of Lawrence O'Bryan Branch (who, as Mr. Bearss noted, had a short time to live), the men were spread from Fort Thompson across a line of entrenchments (including a brick yard) beyond the rail line. The Federals, after being stopped by a hot fire from the defenders, discovered a break in the confederate line at the brick yard. Concentrating their attack at this point, the Federals broke through and scattered most of the Confederates there. Seeing this breakthrough, the Union commander, General John Foster, ordered the entire brigade to charge. This charge carried the entire works and led to the loss of New Bern.

Mr. Bearss gave a brief biography of several of the participants in his own inimitable style and after the talk received a hearty round of applause. We were even able to snap a few photos with Mr. Bearss, who, as always, was quite genial. A reception followed Mr. Bearss' talk.

Al Denn

What an excellent choice for a "change of pace" meeting we had in December! Al Denn enlightened us to medicine, surgery and surgeons in America's "first civil war." It was quite apparent that not much had changed, at least in medical advances, between the Revolutionary War and the Civil War. General anesthesia (laudanum) had been found to be quite useful in operations during the Civil War, but before that, patients had to be restrained or plied with alcohol to ease their plight. As Al pointed out, many times during the Civil War, anesthesia was unavailable to surgeons and older methods had to be employed.

After a quick recap of medicinal advances throughout the ages, from the ancient healers who successfully performed "trepanning" (drilling a hole in the skull to relieve the pressure from head injuries) to the Greeks and Romans, Al brought us right into the world of 18th century medicine. By the 1700's practitioners used several forms of treatment including "scientific methods", folk lore, home remedies and Indian cures. One of the major problems at that time was a lack of shared knowledge between physicians, surgeons and even apothecaries. The physician, he explained, was usually of the gentlemanly class, who practiced among the gentry. The surgeon was the common folks' caregiver while the apothecary, who, of necessity had to be skilled in botany, gathered his herbs on his wanderings through the woods.

Al talked about hospitals- "Don't go there!" was the attitude of many patients. Indeed, with a 75% death rate, hospitals of the 18th century (quite basic) were to be avoided at all costs. Surgery was "very rudimentary and superficial", limited to the removal of tumors, amputations and the removal of bullets. One of the qualifications of a doctor was to be able to perform an amputation in three minutes or less. There were epidemics to fight, small pox, typhus, typhoid fever, yellow fever, diphtheria, dengue fever, malaria as well as the common cold and influenza, all plagued the colonist (as well as the Civil War soldier.)

Together with his slide presentation and his display of medical instruments, (which included very primitive dental tools) Mr. Denn's talk was most enjoyable and enlightening. Many attendees were most thankful he did not ask for volunteers to show how some of those instruments (or leeches) were used!

We Hardly Knew You, Ed.

It is with profound sadness we report the death of one of our long-time members, Mr. Edward B. Russ, Jr. Although in ill health recently, Ed attended a meeting not long ago and seemed to be on the road to full recovery. He passed away on December 19th at the age of sixty-two. A Vietnam veteran who served fourteen years in the Air Force, he had worked at Wal-Mart as a greeter (the perfect job for him, many would agree). Ed was an avid Civil War buff who went on nearly every spring trip and very rarely missed a meeting.

He will be sorely missed by our group. After a family service held at the home, at which several members of our RT were present, Ed's ashes were scattered at dawn over the grounds of Fort Fisher.

In memory of Ed Russ, an honorarium was made to the Round Table. Many thanks to the donor who wishes to remain anonymous.

We would like to also make note of the passing of yet another member, Tom Carr, who died on October 28th. Tom, another Civil War enthusiast, was also a WWII veteran and will be interred in Arlington Cemetery.

General Edward E. Potter

Potter's Raid Revisited

David Norris entertained our group with an account of General Edward E. Potter's raid into eastern North Carolina in July 1863. The raid, which was the Union cavalry's boldest foray to date, made the headlines of the New York Times, as well as several Southern papers! With about 800 men from units stationed at New Bern, including the 3rd and 12th

N.Y. cavalry (3 companies), a detachment of the 1st N.C. Colored Volunteers (that acted as pioneers), the 1st N.C. Union Volunteers and Battery H of the 3rd N.Y. Artillery, he left that city on 17 July with the aim of cutting the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad at Rocky Mount. Striking Greenville and Tarboro before he split his forces, Potter moved on to his target, the railroad bridge across the Tar River.

Catching everyone by surprise at the rail station, Union forces quickly went to work pulling up the rails. The men even captured a train coming from Tarboro in a vain attempt to save Confederate supplies. In a scene reminiscent of the old west, Private George White of the 3rd N.Y., mounted on the unit's fastest steed, pursued the backing engine and leaped from his horse onto the locomotive. When White presented his revolver to the engineer, the man quickly applied the brakes.

The conductor, Bob Watson recounted after the war, when he met two veterans of the 3rd N.Y. that he had lost $1,000 in gold during the raid, but managed to escape on Private White's horse. Neither the gold nor the horse was ever returned to their rightful owners. In addition to successfully burning the not only the railroad bridge, the men also destroyed the county bridge. Federals burned nearly everything of use, including boxcars, the largest cotton mill in the state (the six-story Battle mill), cotton and quartermaster stores, a blacksmith shop, saw mill, grist mill and also a ram being built on the Tar River.

It did not come without cost, however. Confederates rallied to the scene and pursued the raiders who were hampered with all the stolen loot they could carry. When Union soldiers had hit Greenville and Tarboro, some of the men became drunk and robbed the citizens of their money and watches. The Confederates, also slowed by stopping to pick up the items strewn along the retreat route, gave time for the raiders to get away.

An ambush was set up by the Southerners at a site called Daniel's Schoolhouse, south of Tarboro. Seeing a small number of Confederates, Lt. Col. Clarkson received permission to chase them. They proved to be the bait for the trap and Clarkson's 12th N.Y. was "shattered" by Confederate volleys.

In his handout, David mentioned several notable facts about the raid: Col. Joel R. Griffin, commander of the 62nd Georgia, became the first superintendent of the Andersonville National Cemetery after the war. Capt. George Gouraud became a business partner of Thomas Edison and his voice can be heard on many early gramophone records. Go to: http://www.nps.gov/edis/edisonia/very_early.htm to hear the voice of a veteran of Potter's Raid.

Major George W. Cole became infamous when he shot and killed N.Y. State Senator L.H. Hiscock to death. Cole believed Hiscock was having an affair with his wife and was acquitted when he used the defense of temporary insanity.

David's book, Potter's Raid: the Union Cavalry's Boldest Expedition in Eastern North Carolina will be available in November 2008 from Dram Tree Books.

This Just In!

In the February 2009 issue of Civil War Times is a "sneak preview" of our March trip. Entitled "Battlefield, Barbeque and Burnside", the article is a Field Guide to the New Bern battlefield that our RT will be visiting. Containing an excellent map of downtown, the article is a must-read for those who will be going on the trip.

Fork's Road Reenactment

Thanks to Johnny McCoy for on Saturday February 20th and on Sunday 21 February, there will be a reenactment of the Battle of Fork's Road held on the actual site of the engagement, the Cameron Art Museum (17th Street and Independence Blvd.) Those of us who have attended this event in the past know it is well worth attending. Bring the family and let yourself be transported back to February 1865!

New Members!

Committee member - Bruce Patterson

We gained two NEW members at the November meeting. Our paid membership, as of 23 November, is 55 with the addition of John Craft and John Gary Maxwell, both of whom introduced themselves at the November meeting.

Another note.....

Finding Civil War Museums

I recently traveled to Knoxville, Tennessee to attend an Army related reunion. I was pleased when our reunion organizer suggested that we visit a local Civil War Museum. I was surprised when we entered the Farragut, Tennessee City Hall and found the Farragut Folk Life Museum chuck full of Tennessee folk life memorabilia plus a room devoted to the life and exploits of Admiral David Farragut, the hero of the Battle of Mobile Bay who, lashed to the mast of the USS Hartford, uttered that famous command Damn the torpedoes . . . full speed ahead.

The Admirals naval exploits were well documented. His uniforms and related equipment were well displayed.? The exhibit included models and pictures of the USS Hartford which in turn reminded me of still another (off the beaten path) museum, The Civil War Naval Museum in Columbus, Georgia.

It was in Columbus, Georgia that I discovered a Civil War Naval Museum in a somewhat unusual place, Columbus being some 100 miles from open water. The Columbus museum displays the skeletal remains of the CSS Jackson, but also includes a full sized mid-ship replica of the USS Hartford which I never fully appreciated until I visited Farragut.

Both museums are accessible. Farragut is located just south of Knoxville on I-40. City Hall and the museum are located just two blocks east of I-40. The Civil War Naval Museum is located on the south side of Columbus, GA just north of Fort Benning. Both are well worth your time.

Our next meeting will be 13 November 2008

Our speaker for November will be our own David Norris. He will speak on his upcoming book (soon to be published by Dram Tree Books) entitled Potter's Raid: The Union Cavalry's Boldest Raid in North Carolina. David, who was born in Charlotte, graduated from ECU with a BFA in fine arts and after living in Greenville for a long time, moved with his wife Carol to our neck of the woods. David has written numerous articles for magazines and encyclopedias (mostly on Civil War or North Carolina topics) and lately spends his spare time in his art studio, playing guitar or attempting to maintain a garden.

Please join us for a pre-publication talk on Potter's Raid and learn more about not only the raid itself, but many of the participants, including Edward E. Potter (who, according to David, was enumerated in the 1860 census as a 'gentleman') and his superior, John G. Foster.

Our October speaker, Ms. Gari Carter, 'who grew up surrounded by oral stories of her family' told us about one of her ancestors, Franklin Archibald Dick. Franklin Dick graduated in 1842 from the University of Pennsylvania and following in his father and grandfather's footsteps, became a lawyer. Shortly before the war he moved to St. Louis, Missouri and began a practice with a partner by the name of Frank Blair. In a tantalizing twist of history, Ms. Carter was given Dick's remaining wartime journals. Unfortunately, only two volumes out of ten remain, those covering 1861 and a part of 1865.

As a Unionist, Dick was very concerned about the pro-Confederate leanings of his adopted state. Holding secret meetings with not only Frank, but his brother Montgomery (who would serve as Postmaster General in Lincoln's cabinet) and Nathaniel Lyon (Connecticut born- USMA class of 1841). While Dick and the Blair's mapped out the political future of the state, Lyon handled the military end of things. Knowing that Southern sympathizers, aided by the Governor Clairborne F. Jackson and his militia, were set to takeover the capital, the men acted quickly to prevent that occurrence. Gathering his forces, which included the local German organization, the Unionists surrounded the pro-Confederates in their camp (Camp Jackson, in the western part of the city). Lyon, described as 'Violent, sometimes almost wild, in his patriotism,' led seven thousand Unionists against the seven hundred sympathizers in the camp. The Southerners, commanded by General David M. Frost (a native New Yorker and also a graduate of the Military Academy, class of 1844) surrendered without firing a shot.

[The following is from The Civil War, Day by Day, by E.B. Long] : During the march back to the arsenal, the prisoners were guarded by the Germans and the regulars. Excitement had been extreme in the city for days, with cries of 'Hessians' against the Germans, and equally strong anti-Southern feelings expressed. A crowd of the curious and agitated viewed the march, including one William T. Sherman and his son, and of course it happened: someone pushed or shoved, a shot or two rang out, and then more and more, with the unionists firing on the crowd When it was over some twenty-eight or twenty-nine people were dead or mortally wounded, including, reportedly, a child in arms. Mobs stormed through the streets of St. Louis that night; all saloons were closed. A strange sort of war the 'battle of St. Louis'.

Ms. Carter's ancestor, Franklin Dick, went on to become the Provost Marshall General for the Department of the Missouri, handling the many cases of Southern sympathizers as they were sent beyond the states' borders. According to Ms. Carter, Dick's greatest fear was that the South would move north and the British would move south from Canada to crush the Union. After the war Dick relocated to Washington, D.C. and, with his former partner, Francis Blair, again practiced his profession. He later moved back to Philadelphia, where he died in 1885.

The Round Table has purchased several copies of Ms. Carter's book on Missouri and St. Louis in particular during these times. The book, aptly entitled, Troubled State, will be offered at our raffles. If you would like to purchase a copy directly from Ms. Carter, visit her website at <http://www.garicarter.com>.

August 2008

Our next meeting will be 11 September 2008 (Patriot Day)

Welcome Back! Our programs for the upcoming season are sure to please you. Beginning with Jeff Bockert, whose talk is titled “Band of Brothers, West Point Graduates in the Civil War” our season will also cover such diverse topics as Potter’s Raid in eastern North Carolina (by our own David Norris), the Battle of New Bern (which is scheduled to be our March trip next year), Civil War Surgery, and even a talk on the crew of the C.S.S. Hunley. Our next newsletter will finalize speakers and dates, so tune in then for more information.

For those that do not know him, Jeff Bockert is a native of California who currently serves as the Civil War Specialist for the North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources based in Goldsboro, N.C. He is also Chairman of the North Carolina Civil War Tourism Council and has worked in the historic site and museum field for over sixteen years. Mr. Bockert has worked in the National Archives in Washington, D.C., on the Battleship North Carolina as an Associate Curator, has taught history at the Brunswick Community College and Wingate University.

Titled, Men of God, Angels of Death, Black Jack has studied and written about Major Reilly and Captain John A. Ramsey and in his words in reading this book one would: “Follow their footsteps from the start of the war to the fall of Fort Fisher in the words of an experienced re-enactor!”

Mr. Travis will be in our area in September; his schedule is as follows: Saturday, 20 September at Fort Fisher from 9 a.m. until 5 p.m. At this time the great-grandsons of Major Reilly, Captain Ramsey and Captain Moore will be there with personal military items from their ancestors.

Saturday 20 September at the Federal Point Historical Society at 7 p.m. (The building is located on Lake Park Blvd. next to the Carolina Beach Town Hall.

In the latest issue of the Watch Fire, newsletter of the N.C. Tourism Council, a plea is made for any information on men who served in the Confederate States Navy or Marine Corps during the War Between the States. The information is being collected to be added to the Military Collection of State Archives (N.C. Cultural Resources) and will be consolidated into an alphabetical roster. June 2008

Our next meeting will be 11 September 2008 (Patriot Day)

Are you having a good summer? Your Round Table Committee would like to take this opportunity to extend their wishes for a happy and safe summer. There will be no meetings until 11 September (Patriot Day) but here is a letter to (hopefully) keep your interest going strong until then!

Dr. Everard Smith gave about 35-40 members a talk on his especial interest: letters and diary entries from the North Carolinians serving in the Army of Northern Virginia. It was an interest that began, he related, when he was an intern at UNC-Chapel Hill's Southern Historical Collection. His work, Marse Robert's Men: Voices from the Army of Northern Virginia, is based on his examination of 650 items from 240 soldiers. His soon-to-be published work is over two thousand pages long, divided into thirteen chapters. Dr. Smith has indicated that it is indeed the voices of the men, with a minimum of editorial input. He has made some interesting discoveries; certainly his relation of the wounding of "Stonewall" Jackson sheds new light on that tragedy. His theory that the men of the 18th North Carolina had no idea they had fired on their own general until well after the battle. The letters examined indicate that the men were sure they had "repulsed" a Yankee cavalry charge. If the men had known they had wounded Jackson, the letters home would have been full of references to that event.

After the battle of Gettysburg the popularity of Robert E. Lee, seemingly never questioned, comes in for a closer look as Dr. Smith has discovered that Lee's generalship was questioned by many of his own troops. Blamed in large part for the loss in Pennsylvania, his reputation after the war changed dramatically; indeed, by October of that year, at Bristoe Station, "everyone is to blame except Lee." After the war, Lee was (and is) revered with Southerners pointing their fingers at others who they felt were more suitable scapegoats.

Raffle Winners

These Honored Dead- Bruce Patterson; Vicksburg Campaign, Mike Budziszewski; Phantom Army of the Civil War - Richard Rianno; The Stonewall Brigade - Ed Gibson; Scouts and Spies of the Civil War- Dale Lear; Mr. Lincoln's Army - Dick Covell. Our Grand Prize, The Illustrated History of the Civil War was won by Gary Henderson. Thanks once again to all who have donated items for our raffle; this is how we raise some of our monies to pay for the programs we present throughout the season. Please look through your book collection, or at library or garage sales for any suitable items that you may wish to donate for the raffle.

One other thing!

If, in your summer travels, you come across a speaker, author or tour guide that you feel would deliver an interesting talk to our RT, please obtain their contact information so that we may contact them for a possible appearance at a meeting. Thanks!

In reading the recent issue of the Civil War News, there are many articles about the loss of Civil War battlefields, i.e. a cell tower to be built at Antietam; mining at Cedar Creek and a trash incinerator at Monocacy battlefield. It is important to preserve these sites for future generations, but we must also realize that rapid development is also striking a lot closer to home. Brunswick County has been among the "hottest" real estate markets in the country for some time and although it looks like the "bubble is bursting", that county shows no sign of abatement. Battlefields, of course should be preserved, but we must also be aware of the local (usually small) cemeteries and possibly historic houses that dot the county. Some builders will gladly work with those interested in keeping history alive, whether it is college students or a local history group (such as CFCWRT) but some would just rather ignore a historic site and bulldoze it out of existence. Let's keep our eyes and ears open and if you know of such a site, you may want to check on it every so often.

Our next meeting is Thursday, 8 May 2008

You may recognize our speaker for May, Dr. Everard H. Smith, a native of Washington, D.C., but for the last thirty-five years a resident of North Carolina, (the last eighteen here in Wilmington) will speak about the Tar Heels in the Army of Northern Virginia from a new perspective. Dr. Smith, a graduate (B.A.) of Yale University and UNC-Chapel Hill (Ph.D.) will tell us about the subject of his upcoming book, Marse Robert's Men: Voices from the Army of Northern Virginia. Dr. Smith began this "long-term research project" when, working his way through college, he was employed at the Southern Historical Collection and began to examine the many diaries and letters of North Carolina's soldiers in Virginia. Arranging them "more or less" chronologically, he has allowed these men to tell their stories in their own way. The book, which is soon to be published, will quickly be a necessary addition to many of our bookshelves. The members of our RT will have an opportunity to hear about it first at the May meeting!

Dr. Smith has served as senior administrative officer and adjunct professor of history at UNCW (1991-1993) and has been employed since 1994 by the N.C. Office of Information Technology Services as a senior networking analyst in voice, video and data communications. He is quite active in community affairs as well as local history activities. It is not only the Civil War that has attracted Dr. Smith's interest: it is military history in general: he was co-host of a University-sponsored trip to Normandy in 1994 to attend the 50th Anniversary Celebration of D-Day and in 1999, served on the steering committee of the Wartime Wilmington Commemoration, which honored the WW II generation with 170 events. He is a director of the Home Front Heritage Coalition (you may have seen their WW II maps around town) and has spoken to numerous organizations. He has written extensively; he has published articles in Civil War Times, Civil War Magazine, The North Carolina Historical Review, The American Historical Review and has served as a consultant to the N.C. Center for Public Television.

Raffle Winners:

Civil War Battlefields- Ed Gibson; Ironclads and Columbiads- Gary Henderson; Civil War Treasury of Tales, Legends and Folklore - Bob Cooke; Chicago's Battery Boys- Charles Watson; Shipwrecks- Mary Royal.

Thanks to all who donated items for our raffle....Take another look around your library and see if you have anything that you could contribute to our raffle. Thanks again!

Kudos to Dale Lear for arranging our spring trip to the Bentonville Battlefield; Dale gave a brief report in reference to the trip and Bruce Patterson has penned the following article about the trip itself.

Bentonville Battlefield Tour

It was cold, windy and threatening rain on Saturday 29 March 2008 when 28 members, friends and guests of your Cape Fear Civil War Round Table traveled by chartered bus to the Bentonville Battlefield. In fact, the weather was not unlike the conditions that existed in that remote location on 19 March 1865 when one of the final land battles of the Civil War was fought.

A historical marker summarized the battle as the engagement that “checked” the Union advance towards Goldsboro. In fact, Confederate General Joseph E. Johnston stopped the advance of Major general William T. Sherman, but only for a short time.

Our group of stalwart travelers had been prepared for the tour with a presentation by member John Winecoff at our regular 13 March meeting. John provided maps thus setting the stage for what we were to see on the very ground fought over and virtually unchanged some 143 years earlier.

The first stop on the tour was the Harper House, the residence of the Harper family, used first by the Union and subsequently by Confederate forces as a military hospital. The vivid exhibits at the house were reminders of the ferocity with which this war was fought.

The bus then took us to several observation points from which Assistant Park Director Fred Burgess described the first (of three) day's battle.

This observer was surprised at the complexity of this particular battle thus illustrating the value of a guided battlefield tour. Throughout, Fred provided a vivid narrative.

Our chartered bus tour had been arranged by member extraordinaire Dale Lear who not only made travel arrangements but provided custom box lunches (as well as coffee, pastries, fresh fruit and soft drinks) which we enjoyed aboard the bus and between field treks of the day two and day three battlefields.

As usual, this was a most enjoyable day of Civil War history shared by friends with like interests. As has become a tradition, the tour group enjoyed an opportunity to restock their home library with a visit to the Visitor Center Gift Shop and Book Store. Remaining on schedule throughout, the bus, filled with tired, windblown historians arrived back in Wilmington on time with thanks, particularly to Dale, but to all who made this very enjoyable day possible.

As was noted at our meeting, the North Carolina Military Historical Society will be hosting their annual symposium at the N.C. Museum of History in Raleigh on 10 May, 2008. Guntis Goncarovs will present A Brief History of the Crew of the C.S.S. Hunley. Nora Marie Brooks will give a first-person impression of Miss Mildred "Millie" Lee, daughter of General Robert E. Lee. Our own Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle will speak on The Wilmington Campaign of 1865. The meeting, which is free, is open to the public. For reservations call Si Harrington at 919.807.7314 (e-mail: ncmilhistsoc@yahoo.com). A reservation for lunch, at a cost of five dollars can also be made and there will be raffle drawings throughout the day. The meeting will end at about 1:30 p.m.

The Blockade Runner Project

At our last meeting a new member, former Piedmont Airline pilot, Gary Henderson, was introduced and mentioned that he was involved in the “Blockade Runner Project.” Their Mission Statement is:

The Blockade Runner Project is dedicated to building a fully-functional replica of a blockade runner ship that would fulfill a variety of educational purposes and serve as a “living” museum and symbol of Wilmington’s rich maritime history to visitors and local residents. When completed, the ship would serve as a unique educational tool and would support the local tourism industry.

Ship specifications: Length: 90’ Beam: 30’ Power: Two 75 h.p. steam engines driving two side-mounted paddle wheels. Electricity: Diesel powered generator. Classrooms: As needed to be designed with help from teachers. Accommodations: Full galley and sleeping quarters for 20 students, plus crew. The ship will also be equipped with sails, propane stoves for cooking, showers and bathrooms of course. The construction cost is estimated to be around four million dollars. Community participation and financial contributions are vital to make this project a success! For more information, please contact: Dick Hitchcock at 910.395.7037 or rhitchcock@ec.rr.com

The Forensic Photographer

Mr. John Kelley’s presentation, Embedded With the Troops: Photojournalism in the Civil War opened with the statement that there were at least three hundred photographers active in the Civil War. “It was a growing industry” that in 1860 saw about three thousand photographers in the United States. Mr. Kelley admitted that Ken Burns’ The Civil War sparked a great interest in that conflict, an interest that historians would be hard pressed to match. He also pointed out that Mr. Burns utilized photographs from that time period to illustrate “or engender the mood of the period.” Many of the pictures used, however, as indicated by Mr. Kelley were misidentified or misused. This, Mr. Kelley stated, has “created a distortion of our visual understanding” of that conflict. Photographs are “primary source materials” and as such should be treated just as letters, drawings and diaries are. Much can be learned from a careful examination of these wartime photos and John showed us the impact such an examination can have: the famous photo of President Abraham Lincoln and General George McClellan taken by Alexander Gardner in October, 1862, after the battle of Sharpsburg. In a blow-up of the photo, the tension between the two men is quite discernable. Mr. Kelley pointed out that many such images have now been digitized by the Library of Congress and are available on-line.

Concentrating on what he termed Chancellorsville - Fredericksburg II (April 8 to May 3, 1863, Mr. Kelley stated that between the seven months from 17 November, 1862 until 13 June 1863 there were over 48,000 casualties from those two battles. Photographers were active during this period and several in particular, Captain Andrew J. Russell (the only military photographer in the war), Timothy O’Sullivan and (lesser known) Egbert Fowx.

The Photographs of April and May, 1863

Mr. Kelley told the group that he uncovered a misdated image (plate 32) in Alexander Gardner's Photographic Sketch Book of the War and went on to inform us that it was one of the earliest images of the Gettysburg campaign. The photo was that of the Union pontoon bridges spanning the Rappahannock River, but the image immediately preceding it (plate 31), that of Battery D, 2nd U.S. Artillery was correctly dated as May, 1863. Indeed, Battery D is also in plate 32. Hidden in Plain Sight, an article written for the newsletter Battlefield Photographer was the outcome of that discovery. There were other photos shown and Mr. Kelley led an enthralled group through several other discoveries pointing out the different variations of foliage of the trees in the photos (bare trees indicated a June date, trees at full foliage showed a May date), a snow bank nestled behind a building, the hazy image of the Lacy house or the number of pontoon bridges across the Rappahannock River. He even showed an image of a "doctored" photo in which a tree mysteriously disappeared! He stressed once more that these Civil War photos should not be treated as mere "ornaments" in a book, but placed in their correct historical context and accurately described. Thanks again to Mr. Kelley for a most interesting talk!

Photojournalism in the Civil War

April's speaker, Mr. John Kelley, hails from Poughkeepsie, New York. He was born, as he says, in 1928, the “year of the last encampment at Gettysburg.” He attended Randolph-Macon College in Ashland, Virginia and graduated with a degree in History. After a short stint as a Teaching Assistant he became an Educational Sales Representative for Prentice-Hall. It was in this position that he began to develop a strong interest in photographic history “as the basis for a visual understanding of 19th Century American history, especially the Civil War.” He had a strong desire also to make sure that “these incredible photographic images...were not to be misused or mislabeled as page adornments in American history texts.” Retired since 1999, Mr. Kelley has devoted his time to the study of American photographic history as well as his own family history.

John has spoken to many Round Tables, high schools, educational organizations and the State University of New York. His topic- “Embedded With the Troops: Photojournalism in the Civil War”. This talk was the highlight of the August, 2004 Seminar, at the Center for Civil War Photography, in Fredericksburg, Va.

The Battle of Bentonville

Member John Winecoff delivered a hit with his discussion of events and characters leading us up to the Battle of Bentonville. A quick look at the characters involved - Generals W.T. Sherman, Joseph Johnston, D.H. Hill, O.O. Howard and President Jeff Davis- and you could be sure that things would not go smoothly! Davis and Johnston often quarreled; after the Battle of Atlanta, it led to Johnston's removal. But Johnston still had friends in the Confederate Congress and when it came down to it by February 1865, General Johnston was all Davis had left (except P.G.T. Beauregard, another Davis enemy). Placed in command of any and all Southern troops (from Savannah, Charleston and Wilmington, a total of about 20,000 men) he gathered his men outside Goldsboro (an important rail center). He would be facing his old nemesis, Union General W.T. Sherman, who, with over 60,000 soldiers, was cutting a swath through the South. Indeed, as John related, when asked where he was going, Sherman replied, "Anywhere I want to!"

Passing through Fayetteville, Sherman sent one of his Corps (under General Howard) towards Goldsboro, while Slocum feigned to Raleigh. Directed by General Robert E. Lee to prevent Sherman from joining forces with U.S. Grant at Petersburg, Johnston set up delaying actions at Monroes Crossroads and Averasboro. The action worked to split Sherman's columns and gave the Confederates an opportunity to strike on more even terms. That opportunity came at the little hamlet of Bentonville. From 19 March to 21 March the armies met in what would be the largest land battle in North Carolina.

Placing his troops along the Goldsboro Road and after an initial success was thwarted by stubborn resistance (and counterattacks) from the Union army. The Confederate army was forced to pull back to their original positions. For two days the armies fought over the ground; on the 21st, General Mower flanked the Confederate line and Johnston (who was nearly captured by Mowers advance) later abandoned his position and retreated to Smithfield. Sherman declined to pursue Johnston, instead moving on to Goldsboro where his army was resupplied. Only thirty-six days later, Johnston and Sherman sat down at the Bennett Place to discuss peace terms. Bentonville was important because it was the only major Confederate attempt (after Atlanta) to halt Sherman; it was the last major offensive where the Confederates chose the time and place and made the initial attack.

March 2008

Our next meeting is Thursday, March 13th, 2008

For our upcoming trip to Bentonville, member John Winecoff will present us with the basics (and more) of the battle. It was the largest land battle fought in the State and John has studied the battle (as well as participated in quite a few reenactments there.) For more information about the trip, go to the "Events" section of The Runner.

"Knocking on the Gates of Hell" was the title of Mr. Jim Jordan's talk at our February meeting.

It covered the five months after Abraham Lincoln's election and South Carolina's secession from the Union. Beginning with a short history lesson covering land acquisitions in the early part of our country's history, he showed how precarious was the "balance of power" between Slave and Free States (i.e., 1820- The Missouri Compromise, 1850- the admittance of California as a free state and the promise of the Federal Government to enforce the Fugitive Slave Act and in 1854 the Kansas-Nebraska Act.) With a split in the Democratic Party, the Republican candidate was elected President. Interestingly, Lincoln only garnered 39% of the popular vote, but with 180 electoral votes, his majority jumped to nearly 60%.

The day after Lincoln's election, a square in Savannah saw a jubilant crowd, now happy that they could secede. Counting down the months to war, Mr. Jordan pointed out that there were still more slave states in the Union than out of it! In January, the balance was 19 free, 9 slave still in the Union, while 6 states had seceded. Indeed, as of 30 April 1861, there were 19 free and 8 slave states in the Union, while only 7 slave states had left. In mid-April, the crisis came to a head at Fort Sumter in Charleston harbor. Once the cannons opened fire, there was no turning back. With Lincoln's call for 75,000 troops, N.C. would join the Confederacy, soon after Virginia and Tennessee joined her.

And now a word from our sponsors! We wish to (belatedly) thank Brian Kraus for donating his print entitled "Bold Reconnaissance" at our November meeting. Brian has been producing limited edition prints since 2000 when that print was introduced. Formally trained in the field of Art at East Carolina University, he majored in painting and minored in drawing. After receiving a Bachelor of Fine Arts degree, he earned a Bachelor of Science in Art Education degree. Devoting the next twenty-five years to the study of the Civil War, he has read numerous books pertaining to all aspects of the conflict. He has visited many sites of the battles and engagements of the war in both the eastern and western theaters. Indeed, Mr. Kraus has not produced a work unless he has "walked the ground in question" at or near the same date of the action. The battles in North Carolina are of paramount importance, along with the participation of N.C. in the campaigns in the east.

Mr. Kraus lives along the coast in the Morehead City area of Carteret County. A native of Pittsburgh, Pa., he has lived there, as well as in Miami, Florida before settling in Morehead City. Mr. Kraus teaches art in neighboring Craven County and also operates a successful landscape business (which, as an artist he says, makes sure he pays attention to details of terrain and plant species in his works!) When around Morehead City be sure to call Brian and stop in for a visit.

Member Rich Triebe has come out with yet another book (you remember his first: On a Rising Tide. This time he goes into a different genre. Port Royal, he says, is a horror story in the vein of what Stephen King might write. The story takes place in 1692, Port Royal, Jamaica and then moves to the present day. In the 17th century, Port Royal was taken over by pirates and became known as 'The Wickedest Place on Earth.' On 17 June 1692, a catastrophic earthquake caused the city to sink into the sea, killing more than three-quarters of its population. When a team of archeologists recovers a gold pocket watch from the sunken city....Enough! But check out his book to find out what happens next!

Our next meeting will be on Thursday, 21 February 2008 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.). Social hour- 6:30 p.m., meeting- 7:30 p.m.

Our speaker for February will be Jim Jordan, who hails from South Carolina; actually, Jim is a native New Yorker who, upon retirement, moved South to Callawassie Island to relax and play golf! He has instead become an author, tour guide and public speaker. His first novel, Savannah Grey, A Tale of Antebellum Georgia, has been well received and will be available for purchase at our meeting. Jim's topic is titled: "Knocking on the Gates of Hell: The South Ponders Civil War." Please join us on 21 February in welcoming Jim and his wife Kathleen to the Port City! Also please note that this meeting will be on the THIRD THURSDAY of the month.

Fittingly, at our January meeting, Andrew Duppstadt took us back to January 1864 when the C. S. Navy made plans to mount a secret mission to capture a U.S. ship, the U.S.S. Underwriter. It took time to gather men and equipment for the attack, which was to be made in conjunction with a planned attack on the Union enclave of New Bern. That town had been taken by the Federals in March 1862. The plan was to seize the vessel and utilize her to attack other Union ships around New Bern. Selected to lead the attack on the Underwriter was Lieutenant John Taylor Wood, a grandson of President Zachary Taylor and close confidant of President Jefferson Davis. While the North had William B. Cushing as its daring hero, the South had Wood! Wood, a veteran of the Mexican War was an instructor at the U.S. Naval Academy when Civil War came; he resigned his commission and served aboard the C.S.S. Virginia and later; (holding the rank of Colonel) commanded army troops in Virginia. He had already proven his ability to conduct a raid such as was planned; he had captured several Union vessels, including two men-of-war. Gathering together a mixed force of marines (from Richmond, Savannah, Charleston and Wilmington) and sailors over 250 men (thirty-three officers and 220 enlisted men) were to secretly rendezvous at Kinston. Secretly is a relative word however; the boats, with the sailors and marines seated in them, were loaded onto railroad flats and, "it was a novel sight to see a train like that- Jack sitting up on the seats of the boats and waving his hat to the astonished natives, who never saw such a circus before." (Clark, V:326) Several of the boats to be used in the attack were "impressed" (seized) from the few blockade-runners in port at the time by the military at Wilmington! It was early in February before Lieutenant Benjamin P. Loyall (second-in-command) and Captain (his naval rank) Wood started the men in two groups, on their 40-mile sojourn down the Neuse River. The surprise attack was to be at night; so all the men tacked pieces of white cotton cloth on their left arms for easier recognition. Hiding out close to the town, Wood awaited the arrival of the second group while the distinct sounds of battle could be heard. General George Pickett, in command of the attack on New Bern would fail in his attempt to retake the town, but Wood and his stalwart band would continue their water-borne attack.

Mr. Duppstatd described the target of that attack: a former New York "heavy ocean tugboat" commandeered by the U.S. Navy and armed with two 8" guns, one 3" rifle and a 12-pdr. howitzer; she was a 186' long side-wheel steamer, 325 tons with a 35' beam. Nominally manned by 12 officers and 72 sailors, her compliment that night was somewhat less; one Union report had only 40 men aboard. At 2:30 a.m. Wood's men headed for the ship. As they neared her, a voice rang out, "Boat ahoy!" Wood responded, "Give way, boys!" The battle was on. Rifle fire rained upon the men as they climbed aboard. The battle was savage and little quarter was given. Writing in 1901, Lieutenant Loyall said the "cracking of fire arms and the rattle of cutlasses made a deafening din." After a short but fierce fight, the ship was in Confederate hands. After determining that it would take too long to get the steamer's boilers up to pressure, Wood decided to set the ship afire. Another compelling reason to move quickly was that nearby Fort Stevens had opened fire upon the Underwriter. Fires were set and the raiders once again manned their launches and rowed away from the scene. Wood, not seeing the vessel on fire, sent back Lieutenant Francis L. Hoge to ensure that they were set properly. Braving the fire once more, Hoge boarded the steamer and set even more fires, this time the blaze could clearly be seen and as the Confederates oared upstream, the sounds of explosions made sure the Underwriter would no longer be of any use to the U.S. Navy. The loss to the raiders was six killed, twenty-two wounded while the Federals lost nine, with 18 wounded. U.S. Admiral D.D. Porter, when writing of the attack, said, "This was rather a mortifying affair for the navy, however fearless on the part of the Confederates. This gallant expedition was led by Commander John Taylor Wood. It was to be expected that with so many clever officers, who left the Federal navy and cast their fortunes with the Confederates, such gallant action would often be attempted."

Our next meeting will be on Thursday, 10 January 2008 at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound (Airlie Rd.). Social hour- 6:30 p.m., meeting- 7:30 p.m.

Our speaker for the New Year will be Andrew Duppstadt, who will speak to us about the expedition to capture the U.S.S. Underwriter. Mr. Duppstadt, who is well known to many of our members, is the Assistant Curator of Education as well as the Historic Weapons Program Coordinator for all North Carolina Historic Sites. He is also president of the Eastern North Carolina Civil War Round Table (Jacksonville) and secretary of the North Carolina Civil War Tourism Council. A graduate of UNCW (Andrew has a BA and an MA in history), Andrew is now based in Kinston at the C.S.S. Neuse site.

We were presented with a dual speaking arrangement at our December meeting! Kicking the meeting off, Chairman Ed Gibson showed us via his laptop and a wonderful power-point presentation on the various (upwards of several million) sites. Starting off with our own RT web site and showing how to maneuver around the links, he took us through some great web sites, including the National Park Service (for a listing of most soldiers and sailors), National Archives, Pennsylvania records- you see, Ed's interest in the Civil War began when he discovered that his great-great grandfather served in the 147th Pa. Infantry. We were taken on virtual tours of the National Civil War Naval Museum, Grant's

Tomb, the battlefields of Manassas, Gettysburg, Fort Fisher, Bentonville and Bennett Place; the SCV and SUVCW sites were not ignored either! We went traveling via the Civil War Traveler's maps and photos, to the Museum of the Confederacy and the GAR Museum (where resides the head of "Old Baldy", mascot of a Pennsylvania unit). When we returned home, (still rested!) Ed mentioned that many of the sites could be used for genealogical research as well.

Turning the program over to RT president David Norris, we were treated to a philatelic history of the Confederacy. "Every stamp tells a story", and our story began at Charleston. With the firing on Fort Sumter, the breach between the States had come. Or had it? Even after the outbreak of war, the U.S. Post Office was still sending mail South, while the Postmaster at Charleston was forced to nail the mailboxes closed because people there were still using them! After a brief history of the U.S. Mail system, it was back to 1861, May 21 to be exact. In the South, that was the date set for the last use of U.S. stamps. As early as January 1861, the Confederacy had its own Postal system, under its own Postmaster General John H. Reagan.

Throughout 1861 however, there was a dire lack of stamps throughout the country; local postmasters began to make their own stamps until October, when the first batch arrived from Richmond. During the war, the soldiers lament was often, "send stamps!"

Stamps were ordered from abroad and the first stamps brought in came via the C.S.S. Nashville to Beaufort. Many other runners were not so successful. Captured stamps became souvenirs for the offshore naval crews. Some of those that got into the country bore the likeness of President Jeff Davis and the story of Davis being approached by a soldier as he walked the streets. The soldier gazed at Davis and asked, "Are you Jeff Davis? You look like a postage stamp!" Davis was not the only figure to be immortalized in that manner. Likenesses of George Washington and Stonewall Jackson were also used.

Davis also informed us that it was during the Civil War that home delivery of mail began. Prior to that, the letters remained at the post office and people would drop in to see if they had mail. Postmasters also cancelled mail; many times by using home made hand stamps made of corks from wine or medicine bottles ("postmasters had a lot of time on their hands"). As the war dragged on and coins became scarce, stamps were often used as currency. Delving into the postal system a bit further, David told us why postal carriers, bidding on routes, often bid so low that the routes were unprofitable to them. Mail carriers were exempt from military service, so while the carries were not making money, the Post Office Department was!

Mail also increased dramatically during the war. In 1860, citizens received an average of five letters per year, but when the war started, a vast number of letters went to and from soldiers at the front. Patriotic covers appeared during the war, more so in the North; in the South, paper was folded and used as envelopes ("covers" in philatelic terms!) Mail could, of course, be sent North or South via Bermuda or the Bahamas. Inserted in an outer envelope, the smuggled letter would be addressed to a "drop" in the Islands where it would be opened and sent via a steamer to the recipient. Rounding out a wonderful presentation, David also touched upon the various express companies as well as revenue stamps (on such items as photos, checks, financial documents, patent medicines, powers of attorney and even the lowly friction match!) which were introduced in the North and garnered one million dollars per year for the government.

The Confederate Signal Service At Wilmington.

Recently (15 November 2007) there was an article about the Confederate Signal Corps in The Long Roll, the newsletter of the Piedmont Civil War Round Table (from The Confederate Soldier in the Civil War). At the close of the article, it mentioned that the Service, very active on all fronts throughout the conflict, was also quite active here in Wilmington. It is reported that the lighthouse at Price's Creek was a signal station as was Fort Fisher's Mound Battery:

An indispensable condition to the prolongation of the war was the running of the blockade...by the swift cruisers built...expressly for the purpose.... No life could be more adventurous and exciting than that of a blockade-runner. The Signal Corps played its part also. Every blockade-runner had its signal officer, furnished with signaling apparatus and the key to the secret cipher. The coast was lined with stations for thirty or forty miles up and down on either side of the blockaded port. The blockade-runners came in close to shore at nightfall and fitfully flashed a light, which was soon answered from the shore station. Advice was then given of things off the port, the station and movements of the hostile fleet, etc. If the word was "go in" the beacon lights were set and the...runner boldly steamed over the bar and into the port. A naval officer was in charge of the office of orders and details at the several ports, whence proceeded all orders and assignments in relation to pilots and signal officers.

In Wilmington, during the course of the war, there were several officers involved in securing both pilots and signal officers for the many runners reaching the port. One of the most significant soldiers to be stationed in the Cape Fear area was John Baptist Smith, who arrived at Fort Fisher in July 1862. Smith, a native of Caswell County, invented a much-improved system of signaling vessels at sea. Prior to this, signal officers relied on flags (by day) and torches (at night). Aboard ship, waving torches around in the wind and spray was difficult at best. Smith's system used a pair of old ship lanterns. He later wrote: "One day while in the Ordnance Department of the Fort, I chanced to spy a pair of shipboard starboard and port lanterns, and this thought flashed into my mind, 'Why not by the arrangement of a sliding door to each of these lanterns, one being a white, the other a red light, substitute flashes of red and white lights for the wave of torches to the right and left, to form a signal alphabet and thus use the lanterns at sea as well as upon land.' I at once communicated my plans to Col. Wm. Lamb.... They met with his approbation and I was instructed to submit them to General [W.H.C.] Whiting...who most readily [aided] in fitting up my lanterns." Smith, recognized by Richmond for his achievement, was assigned to General Whiting, who in turn allowed Smith to choose a vessel upon which he wished to serve. Smith picked the S.S. Advance and performed the duties of Signal Officer aboard the State-owned steamer until February 1864, when he was commissioned and sent back to Virginia. Smith later wrote: "[My system of] signaling by flash lights so impressed a British Ship Captain...that he urged me to go to England...and take out letters patent.... I declined his...offer...although...[it] would have been a source of great profit..., as it has formed the basis of the present [1896] system now used in the Naval service.

By 1864, Lieutenant (later Captain) George C. Bain was in command of the Signal Corps. While most of his men were quartered at Smithville (Southport) he maintained an office at Wilmington and telegraphed his orders down river. Under his command were the Lanier brothers Sidney, (well-known for his music as well as his poetry) and his brother Clifford. The men, transferred to the Signal Corps after seeing action in the Seven Days Battles, were eventually sent to Southport for blockade-runner duty. In August, 1864, Mary White, daughter of North Carolina's Commissioner in England (John White) was at Southport awaiting the next available runner. While there, she wrote:

Aug. 19, 1864 - Smithville, N.C. Last night we had a most delightful serenade. The serenaders were a Mr. Everett and his violin, and two Mr. Laniers...one with a flute and the other a guitar.... They played... very spirited waltzes. Aug. 20, 1864 Last night our serenade was repeated but one of the strings on the serenader's guitar broke and we didn't have many tunes.

The last Mary White saw of her troubadours was the following evening when "the serenader's" were on duty near her hotel. Sidney Lanier would be assigned to go out on the runner Anna in December and, captured by the U.S.S. Santiago de Cuba, wound up in Point Lookout. While in prison, Lanier continued to play the flute that he had concealed "in his coat sleeve" Lanier would later compose poems, many of which were based on his wartime experiences.

Colonel Lamb, in command at Fort Fisher, lavish in his praise for many of those in the Corps, had occasion to report an incident at Fort Anderson. In late August, 1864 the C.S.S. Tallahassee, fresh from her highly successful foray against Northern shipping (she scuttled or burned over thirty vessels) reached safety and anchored under the guns of Fort Fisher. Shortly afterwards, the vessel weighed anchor and steamed towards town. As the Tallahassee followed the channel upriver, she passed directly in front of Fort Anderson on the west bank of the Cape Fear River. Suddenly a shot rang out and an officer aboard was wounded. A few days later, an irate Colonel Lamb telegraphed headquarters about the "want of vigilance on the part of the signal corps at Ft. Anderson." His signalman had tried to contact Fort Anderson to alert that post of the arrival of the raider, "but could not for some reason call the signal station at that point. Owing to this inattention the ship was fired at ...by the sentinel.... Such neglect should not go unpunished."

Another young Signal Officer, Private J.M. Royall, of Virginia was suffered the fortunes of war. After having been through fifteen engagements in Virginia and having been wounded twice (Bull Run and Chancellorsville) he was transferred to the Signal Corps. In June 1864, as his vessel, the Old Dominion approached the safe haven of Wilmington; Royall exchanged signals with Fort Fisher's Mound Battery. Suddenly she was spotted and fired upon. Royall, "was down below, drinking a cup of tea in the steward's pantry. While there, a shell burst over him, and 'took off his head as clean as a whistle.' " Royall was only twenty-two years old and was one of the very few fatalities among the elite Signal officers aboard blockade runners.

There was also the story of the Stevenson brothers, Daniel and James. Daniel was aboard the runner Little Hattie, struggling to outrun the several U.S. Navy steamers chasing them. He mounted the paddle box and began signaling to the station at Fort Fisher. Soon, the guns of the fort began throwing missiles back at the warships, forcing them to back off from New Inlet. That presented an opportunity for the runner and she took it! Soon safe within the harbor, it was realized that Daniel had been exchanging signals with his brother James, also a signal officer!

Our November speaker, Colonel Keith Gibson, Director of VMI Museum Operations (and also Architectural Historian), presented a knowledgeable discussion on Thomas J. "Stonewall" Jackson's formative years (1851-1861) at the Virginia Military Institute. Calling those years "the most mature years" of Jackson's life, Colonel Gibson pointed out that those were the years when Jackson became a husband, father, deacon and professor. When Thomas Jackson (not yet known as "Stonewall") first reviewed the corps of cadets, he was the object of derision as he was outfitted in his finest uniform, complete with a double-breasted frock coat, white pants, white gloves and brand-new hat. One cadet who saw the gangly new officer hollered at him, “Come out of them boots. They are not allowed in this camp!” Cadet Thomas Munford, at that time the adjutant of the cadet corps, was mortified and apologized to the new instructor. In 1862, as a Colonel in the Confederate Army, Munford would command Jackson’s cavalry. As an instructor, he was not well liked by many who took his courses. As professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, his students were often beset with his explanations of the subject. He would pick up various nicknames such as “Square Box”, “Old Tom-foolery” and “Old Hickory.”

Indeed, these were the years during which Jackson matured: he met and married Elinor (“Ellie”) Junkins, but would lose both his wife and newborn son who would die during childbirth; he would again marry, (in 1857, Mary Anna Morrison) and after the loss of yet another child, would become a father. Deeply religious, he became a deacon in the Presbyterian Church but was always the soldier.

The story related by Colonel Gibson about Jackson’s final hours at VMI was compelling: the cadets, ordered to Richmond when the war began, had already formed on the parade ground, in anticipation of their march to war. Jackson appeared at noon in the very finery he had worn ten years earlier, but this time there were no remarks, only quiet. An officer requested that the cadets begin their trek to the capitol, even though it was somewhat earlier than they had been ordered to depart. Jackson refused and waited as the minutes ticked by until the appointed hour. Finally, after a wait of a half-hour, promptly at 12:30 p.m., he gave the command (his very first wartime order) and the VMI cadets and faculty marched off into history.

Our next meeting is Thursday, 8 November at the Cape Fear Club (206 Chestnut Street)

Social Half hour begins at 6:30 p.m. Dinner at 7:00 p.m..

Please join us at the Cape Fear Club for both dinner and our guest speaker. The cost is still just $26.00 and those who have dined at the Club know it is worth every penny!

Our speaker for our dinner meeting in November will be Colonel Keith Gibson, Executive Director of Museum Programs and Architectural Historian for the Virginia Military Institute. Col. Gibson will discuss Thomas Jackson's years at VMI (1851-1861) "the decade that made the man who went to war in 1861". As Director of Museum Programs, Col. Gibson is responsible for the operation and development of the VMI Museum in Lexington, Virginia and the New Market Battlefield State Historic Site in New Market, Virginia. Growing up near Richmond, "on land hotly contested during the Civil War" kindled Col. Gibson's interest at an early age. Col. Gibson received his bachelor's degree in Civil Engineering from the VMI in 1977 and after a brief tour of duty as a Naval Officer, he returned to VMI as Curator of Exhibits for the Museum. He prepared for a museum career after graduate work in Early American History at James Madison University and Museum Studies with George Washington University and an internship at the Museum at Strawberry Banke, Portsmouth, New Hampshire in 1983. Col. Gibson has worked as a consultant on several films (for both TV and feature films) and appears frequently on both radio and television as a spokesperson for historic preservation. In addition, he has written numerous book reviews, articles on the Civil War era (and VMI) and is an author in his own right. He has written The VMI Spirit: A Portrait of VMI. Col. Gibson has also contributed to several other books and is also active in several professional organizations including The Historic Lexington Foundation and The Center for the Study of the Civil War and has served two terms as president of the Rockbridge Historical Society.

Jonathan Sarris kept his rapt audience well entertained with his “comparative analysis” of two counties in northern Georgia during the war. Beginning with a “vignette” describing an officer walking through a village with his troops, confronting angry townspeople who wanted them out of their village, the soldiers left within a month in the area. “Decidedly not pacified” was the judgment of the officer as he left. It could have been, said Mr. Sarris, the Balkans in 1990 or even Vietnam in 1968. The town was located in the mountains of northern Georgia where allegiances were divided and “confused”. The people of Fannin (a portion of which borders North Carolina) and Lumpkin counties, in Appalachia, fought what Mr. Sarris termed the “inner war”; a war not visited by Ken Burns “Civil War”. Soldiers from these counties fought for hearth and home on a local level. It was a brutal guerilla war, divided along community lines, exacerbated by many deserters (and draft dodgers) who flocked to the area to “lay low” (to avoid service). Mr. Sarris cited the case of the Woody brothers, in which pro-Confederate Josiah testified against his brother John Wesley for being pro-Union. John was acquitted and later fled to East Tennessee to join the Union army. Class divisions appeared to be a contributing factor in the strife as Lumpkin County, supposedly more pro-Confederate than it’s neighbor to the northwest and thought to be more “cosmopolitan”, viewed Fannin County as full of simple “mountaineers” who were responsible for all the atrocities committed (civilians tortured, houses and barns burned) in northern Georgia. In short, Mr. Sarris brought to light the fact that the Civil War was fought not only on the Virginia fields but also in the fields along the Blue Ridge mountains.

There was an interesting article in the Star-News recently (September 27) in described The Museum of the Confederacy’s idea to expand their collection to Fort Monroe, Virginia. That army base is due to be closed and they are looking for ideas for the area. The Museum at present has only enough room to display about ten percent of its collection, so the move would not only open up more items for public viewing, but would likely increase tourism to the area. It certainly looks like a “win-win” situation for both parties! The Museum has also mentioned two other possible sites, Chancellorsville and Fredericksburg Battlefields. In any event, the Museum hopes to have an “off-campus” location up and running by 2011, the sesquicentennial of the American Civil War.

Our next meeting is Thursday, 11 October at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound
Registration desk opens at 6:30, the social (half) hour begins at 7:00 and the program starts at 7:30.

Our speaker for October will be Jonathan Sarris, who “hails from the border state of Maryland. He grew up in the suburbs of Washington D.C. and attended Washington College in Chestertown, Maryland. ‘After a blessedly short career in government’ (his words) he returned to graduate school. In 1998 he received a PhD in history from the University of Georgia, where he studied with Robert E. Lee biographer, Emory M. Thomas. He has taught at the University of Georgia and Appalachian State University. He is currently an Associate Professor of History at North Carolina Wesleyan College in Rocky Mount, N.C. In addition to his book, A Separate Civil War: Communities in Conflict, (his topic for our October meeting) he has written several articles and book reviews on Civil War topics. His book looks at two counties in northern Georgia, where a ‘local Civil War’ was taking place as mountaineers became ‘disaffected’ with Confederate policies.” The above taken from [The Knapsack newsletter of the Raleigh Round Table.]

Some forty or so attendees (which included the speaker's mother, Linda Rhodes!) at our September kick-off meeting were treated to a great presentation by Mr. Jeff Bockert who talked about: Lessons Learned in Battle: The Mexican War as a Precursor to the Civil War. Beginning with a quick summation of the events which led up to that conflict, Mr. Bockert went on to note the similarities between the two wars.

When trouble with Mexico seemed imminent, General Zachary Taylor was dispatched to the disputed region. When war began, Taylor marched into Mexico and the first battle (and American victory) soon followed. Taylor, who often dressed in common soldier's garb, used the strategy of continuing to pursue the enemy, to give him no time to rest and reorganize. On his staff was a young officer by the name of U.S. Grant. Grant, who would also dress as a common soldier, would use those same tactics against the Confederates.

Also sent to Mexico was General Winfield Scott, who mounted the largest amphibious operation at that time, to attack the coastal city of Vera Cruz. Scott, (who was a meticulous dresser) planned the landing and subsequent movement inland very carefully. On his staff was a young officer named George McClellan. "Little Mac" would also recall his Mexican War experiences and not attack until everything was in place.

Mr. Bockert also compared the role of the Presidents: James K. Polk (born in Mecklenburg County) "directly managed the day-to-day operations" of the military; he appointed Colonels and argued with the generals. Lincoln (as did Polk) expanded the role of the Presidents; they became "subservient" to their Commander-in-Chief. Both were "party" men and while Polk argued with General Scott during the Mexican War, it was Lincoln who went head-to-head with McClellan during the Civil War. Interestingly, Mr. Bockert also pointed out that Confederate President Jeff Davis was very much like Polk; both men "distrusted competitors" and were more than willing "to sacrifice military success for loyalty."

Other innovations were seen during the Mexican War. The role of the Navy changed as ships were now put on blockade duty (against Mexican ports); at Vera Cruz offshore bombardment and a beach assault were developed (which would later be used by Union forces at Fort Fisher); the role of the volunteer soldier was expanded; at the battle of Palo Alto, new artillery tactics (for example, the use of "Flying Artillery") were developed which made that arm the "King of Battle."

In short, many officers who were of junior grade during the Mexican War recalled their experiences when called upon to serve in the American War. Captain Robert E. Lee, who might have been termed General Taylor's engineering "scout" learned the value of flanking maneuvers with Scott as he battled his way to Mexico City: "Good intelligence and outwitting the enemy wins battles". He also remembered to never overestimate the strength of the enemy. Judging by the numbers of questions that were asked of Jeff, interest in this subject remains high!

Please note that the meeting date in February is the THIRD Thursday of that month. It was necessary to change the date due to a conflict. Also, a date for the March meeting has not yet been determined.

Our next meeting is Thursday, 13 September at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound
Registration desk opens at 6:30, the social (half) hour begins at 7:00 and the program starts at 7:30.

Welcome back!

We hope you had a great summer and are prepared for a great season of speakers! Kicking off our season will be Jeff Bockert. Mr. Bockert's topic will be Civil War Generals and the Mexican War. Mr. Bockert, presently a resident of Goldsboro, is a California native who currently serves as the Civil War Specialist for the North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources and as Chairman of the North Carolina Civil War Tourism Council. Mr. Bockert has worked in the historic site and museum management field for over fifteen years. Prior to arriving in Goldsboro, he was the manager of the President James K. Polk Birthplace near Charlotte, N.C. He has worked for the National Archives in Washington, D.C. and also as Associate Curator of the Battleship North Carolina in Wilmington. He has taught history at Brunswick Community College and at Wingate University. He is the author of several works on presidential and military history and has been published in works such as White House Studies. Mr. Bockert received both his undergraduate degree in American History and his master's degree from UNC-Wilmington.

His talk will center on the history of the Mexican War- "delving into aspects of that war that served as precursors to the Civil War. Included in this will be overviews of military tactics, advances and uses in weaponry, battlefield experience of future Civil War commanders, the relationship between the military and the civilian government, the integration of joint Navy-Army campaigns and cooperation, and the relationship between the volunteers and the regular army."

Please join us at our September meeting (and bring a friend) for what promises to be a great talk.

Just who was John Summerfield Staples and what was his Civil War “claim to fame”? The answer lies below, read on! (Click here for the answer)

We have compiled a great slate of speakers for this season. (Click here)!

Please note that the meeting date in February is the THIRD Thursday of that month. It was necessary to change the date due to a conflict. Also, a date for the March meeting has not yet been determined.

General Pierre G.T. Beauregard?

Beauregard was involved in many pivotal events during the war, which began at Fort Sumter. Davis blamed him for the defeat at Shiloh. He was relieved of command. He was later sent to Charleston, S.C. where he was given the responsibility of protecting the coasts. After the war he returned to New Orleans, refused high command in the Egyptian as well as the Rumanian armies and went into railroading. His reputation was tarnished when he was associated with the Louisiana Lottery and he died in 1893 in New Orleans.

Major General Daniel Harvey Hill?

He was Stonewall Jackson’s brother-in-law. He became embroiled in a controversy with Bragg claiming Bragg was incompetent. He served the rest of the war in command of Volunteers in North Carolina. In 1877, Hill became president of the University of Arkansas, later headed the Georgia Military Academy and died in 1889. (From website- <http://dburgin.tripod.com>)

Finally: Ed Bearss, the rock star of Civil War tour guides will lead the fifth annual “Best of Bearss”, expedition with a seven-day look at the 1863 East Tennessee Campaign, beginning in Chattanooga....Tour participants know they must do their to keep up with Bearss. Even in his 80's. he still can out walk just about anybody....This tour is sponsored by History America Tours and if you are interested, they can be reached at 800-628-8542 or www.historyamerica.com.

A note from your president

I've reserved our usual meeting room at St. Andrew's for next year. It's the usual "second Thursday" except for February, when we meet on the 21st so as to avoid conflicting with Valentine's Day.

One of St. Andrew's charitable programs is a monthly collection of food for their Inner City Ministries. We could just leave some cans, packages, etc. of non-perishables in a carton with a note when we meet, and they'll distribute them. I thought it would be a nice way to give the church a little extra thanks besides our usual annual check.

Sincerely,

David Norris

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table was treated to a very special evening on November 9, when we met at the Cape Fear Club for our annual dinner meeting.

The venue was elegant (we were treated to the more intimate setting of the downstairs dining room) and the food, as usual, was outstanding.

Of course, the reason for the gathering was neither the food nor the historical setting but rather to hear the presentation by Kevin P. Duffus, The Lost Light The Mystery of the Missing Cape Hatteras Fresnel Lens. For an hour, following dinner, Kevin unraveled the mystery of what happened to the first-order Fresnel lens that had been removed from the Cape Hatteras Light.

It was the summer of 1861. The Federal Navy, realizing the importance of the lighthouse system on the Carolina Coast, began military action to capture and control the all-important navigational lights as part of what was to become the Northern Squadron Blockade. The Confederates, also realizing the importance of the lights, took action to remove the light lens and thus render the lights inoperable.

Kevin Duffus began his quest as a young boy of 17. It took over 30 years for him to locate and document what happened to the first order Hatteras lens. Oh yes, the Federal Navy ultimately replaced the first order lens with the more common second order Henry-Lepaute lens (The first order Cape Lookout lens was replaced with a third order lens) all of which may well have contributed to the destruction of the Burnside fleet, off Cape Hatteras in January of 1862 which included the loss of the USS Monitor.

The lens, being a series of finely ground glass prisms, had an interesting journey. Properly wrapped, the lens would fill a boxcar, thus it became a Herculean task to conceal such a load. Indeed, the lens was split in order to more easily conceal their existence. For the next 140 years, the Federal Lighthouse Service, historians and enthusiastic lighthouse researchers sought to locate the lens. The journey included an icehouse in Tarboro, select individuals to whom individual lens had been sold for $35 and finally, and most appropriately, to the newly built Hatteras light.

It was an intriguing and most interesting journey for Kevin Duffus and for us as he told his story in a well illustrated most interesting and compelling manner. Our November meeting was most memorable and one, this reporter, is glad he did not miss.

Most of us are aware of what happened at Fort Fisher and the who, what and when related to Blockade Runners and the Northern Blockade Squadron.

How many of us know what was happening in our hometown of Wilmington from 1861 through to the fall of our fair town in the early spring of 1865?

Wilmington, once the Capitol of North Carolina was a bustling seaport before the Civil War. It became critical to the success of the Confederacy, once the blockade became effective along the Atlantic and Gulf Coasts.

Attend our 7 December Round Table and learn more about the local events of that traumatic era. Our own Bob Cooke, who is writing a book on the subject, will weave a story of intrigue, and some personalities as he describes the War in Wilmington, 1861- 1865.

The registration desk opens at 6:00 PM; refreshments (supplied by our new food guy Charles Watson) and Social Hour begin at 7:00. The program begins promptly at 7:30.

Please note that we are meeting the First Thursday in December (rather than the second) in order to avoid conflicts with Holiday parties. Please try to attend. This is one presentation you do not want to miss.

Our speaker this month will be Kevin Duffus. In less than a decade, Kevin Duffus has published two books and produced four award-winning documentary films comprising seven hours of television programming, all on Outer Banks history. Through extensive research, he solved the long-standing mystery of the missing 1854 Cape Hatteras Lighthouse Fresnel lens, discovered the lost history of the builder of the 1870 Cape Hatteras Lighthouse, preserved the amazing personal story of the WWII “baby born in a lifeboat” and oral histories of island residents, Coast Guard crews, Navy sailors and Merchant Marines, all who survived “Torpedo Junction.” Mr. Duffus will speak on the lost Fresnel lens and its “rediscovery!”

Please join us for our annual dinner meeting at the Cape Fear Club (201 Chestnut St.). The registration desk (manned by Bruce Patterson) will be open at 6 p.m., while the cost for the dinner and meeting (a package deal only, please!) is $26. Payment must be remitted to the RT at the above P.O. Box by November 3rd. The dress for this meeting is “business casual.” Remember, guests, as well as new members are welcome!

Raffle Winners: (September’s meeting) Decision At Sea, Bob Quinn; Dawn Over Baghdad, Keith Ward; Reveille, Mary Royal; The Crater, Ed Gibson; Gettysburg, Bruce Patterson.

(October’s meeting) Civil War Battlefield Guide, Ed Gibson; Ironclad of the Roanoke, John Wyncoff; Battlefield, John Moore; Co. Aytch, Ed Russ; Advance and Retreat, Bruce Patterson.

We were informed that there is still a chance to participate in the clean up at the Cameron Art Museum, site of the Fork's Road Battlefield. Bring your wheelbarrow, shovel, rake, axe & bush hog to the site (17th St. & Independence Blvd.) on Saturday, 9 December. For more information, call Johnnie McCoy at 620-5134.

Fred L. Ray, author of Shock Troops of the Confederacy: The Sharpshooter Battalions of the Army of Northern Virginia, spoke to us about his research, which culminated in the above work. "They couldn't hit an elephant at this distance", said Union Major General John Sedgwick as he observed the Confederate position some 500 yards away. Less than a moment later, a ball hit the General in the head, killing him almost instantly. He became another casualty of the Civil War "sharpshooter" (from the German Scharfschutze) who by this time (May 1864) roamed the battlefields picking off the unwary soldiers of both sides. In the Army of Northern Virginia, these men, eventually numbering nearly seven thousand, were organized into several battalions whose duties included not only harassing the enemy with their accurate long-range fire, but also acting as skirmishers, scouts, flank and rear guards. Their first action as a unit came in May 1863 when they guarded Stonewall Jackson's flank at Chancellorsville. Mr. Ray demonstrated the use of the men as "shock troops" who plowed through the Union picket lines and then swung around to gather up as many Federals as they could, from behind. This tactic, used by (North Carolinian) Major Thomas Wooten, became known as "seine-hauling" due to its similarity of fishing along the coast. Their success rate attracted the attention of R.E. Lee, who ordered the formation of a Sharpshooter Brigade in every Division of the ANV. Mr. Ray illuminated a much-neglected subject (the last work was written before the turn of the century-the 19th century, that is!) And indicated however, that sharpshooters alone, could not win a war.

Mr. Ray also described some of the weapons used by the marksmen: the Whitworth (caliber .451, weight almost 10 lbs.), Enfield (cal. .577, weight 9½ lbs.) and several target rifles (English match rifles used mainly by Union troops) weighing anywhere from 25 to 60 pounds. In an accuracy test conducted in 1971, "various rifles fired 15 shots at 400 yards at a 72" by 72" wooden target." The U.S. Springfield hit 7 times, the British Enfield 13, while the 1842 smoothbore musket missed entirely. As for the Whitworth, 15 shots scored 15 hits on the target!

At our November meeting, we will continue to sell raffle tickets for Brian Kraus' Bold Reconnaissance. When 100 are sold, we will have the raffle. Come early and buy a few tickets ($5 each).

Our next meeting is on Thursday, 12 October at St. Andrew's On-The-Sound
Social Hour 7:00 p.m. Meeting 7:30 p.m.

October's speaker comes to us from Asheville, N.C. Fred L. Ray, author of Shock Troops of the Confederacy: The Sharpshooter Battalions of the Army of Northern Virginia, will speak to us about his research into a much-neglected subject. To quote from a press release, his work "breaks new ground in military history, and in the Civil War, while reinterpreting many of its major battles. Characterized...as 'the most significant small unit tactical analysis of the Army of Northern Virginia ever written,' the book tells the story of the elite group of men who, whether screening Stonewall Jackson's flank march at Chancellorsville or leading the last desperate assault at Fort Stedman, led the Army of Northern Virginia in the advance, protected it at rest, and covered its retreat." Describing himself as a "micro-publisher" Ray became intrigued with these units while researching one of his ancestors. Mr. Ray has also written several books on another of his favorite subjects, white water rafting. He began paddling in the late 1970s and soon became a raft guide.

Also at our October meeting, we will display the work of art created by New Bern artist Brian

Kraus. The painting of General “Stonewall” Jackson astride his horse Little Sorrel, at the Battle of Second Manassas, has been donated by Mr. Kraus to benefit our Round Table. The incident depicted (where Jackson was seen by Union troops, but dismissed as an old farmer, because of his clothes and the horse he rode) was described by James I. Robertson in his work on Jackson (Stonewall Jackson: The Man, The Soldier, The Legend.) Raffle tickets will be sold for $5 at this and our November meeting (see Ed Gibson) and there will be only 100 tickets made available. When all tickets are sold, the raffle will be held. Come early and buy one or two tickets for the chance of a lifetime!

Our annual dinner meeting at the historic Cape Fear Club (201 Chestnut St.) is scheduled for Thursday, November 9th. Please bear in mind that the attire for this meeting is “business casual.” Guests, as well new members are welcome. We are trying to keep the cost down, but it is dependent on how many members attend, so please mark your calendars and let us know you are coming!

The speaker for our “kick-off” meeting was member Richard Triebe. Mr. Triebe, author of the novel, On a Rising Tide, which was set in Civil War Wilmington, described what it was like back then. Using newspaper articles (having read several of the originals, thanks to Richard for transcribing them, Ed.!) Richard showed us some of the little-known aspects of blockade running (no Seamen were allowed in town after sundown, e.g.) Soldiers, sailors, speculators, saloons and prostitutes soon flooded the little town, many of them winding up near the railroad depot, in a location which became known as “Paddy’s Hollow.” It was in this area, in September 1863 that Texan troops of General Hood’s Brigade, on their way to Chickamauga, visited the saloons and soon became drunk and disorderly. When the Town Guard attempted to arrest them, a serious altercation took place, with the Guard coming out on the losing end! Richard also delved into a bit of “what if” when, in his novel, he placed the visit of the Ladies' Aid Society to Fort Fisher closer to the time of the January (1865) attack. The slides of news articles about Fort Fisher were very interesting and informative as were Richard's artifacts from his own collection. Thanks again to Richard for a great talk!.

While on the Internet, please visit the website of the North Carolina Maritime History Council, (ncmaritimehistory.org). Their annual symposium will be held in Southport on October 26th-28th (Thursday through Saturday). Scheduled are tours of Brunswick town/Fort Anderson, Fort Fisher, the Underwater Archaeology Lab, a Cape Fear River boat tour and even a wine reception! September 2006

Our next meeting is on Thursday, 14 September at St. Andrew's On-The-Sound
Social Hour 7:00 p.m. Meeting 7:30 p.m

Our speaker for September will be our own Richard Triebe. Mr. Triebe, who moved to Wilmington from Chicago in 1987, became fascinated with the area's history. His reading and research led him to write the Civil War novel On A Rising Tide. While studying copies of the Wilmington Daily Journal from the war, he discovered many obscure articles and facts which he will share with us. Sometimes notices would appear in the paper about the fate of a soldier after the battles of Fort Fisher. These stories led him to uncover some startling information about the ultimate destiny of the soldiers at Fort Fisher. Richard will also discuss the Federal Naval blockade and how it affected Wilmington.

Please join us for our September meeting as we "kick-off" the Civil War season and also introduce our new RT President, David Norris. David, of course is well known to the RT, as he has been speaker, member and Steering Committee member for some time now!

We know you join us in wishing the best to outgoing President Chris E. Fonvielle, who will now have time to work on his many Civil War-related projects. Dr. Fonvielle has headed our RT for several years (and prior to this he was Program Director) and deserves a well-earned break. Chris has volunteered to remain "on tap" and remains a member of the Steering Committee.

Please review our schedule of speakers for the upcoming season, it promises to be a very interesting one!

Our next meeting is on Thursday, 13 April, St. Andrew's On-The-Sound
Social Hour 7:00 p.m. Meeting 7:30 p.m.

Note: There will be no meeting in March, we'll be on our spring trip!

Our speaker for April will be Richard Zawacki. Mr. Zawacki, who moved recently from Massachusetts to Southport, is "a semi-retired physical therapist." Working part-time nowadays, Richard was formerly the physical therapist for the Boston Red Sox for twenty years. His interest in Elon Farnsworth "began with a trip to Gettysburg" where he read a plaque describing Farnsworth's (last) charge. He began to delve deeper and has been researching young Farnsworth's life "on and off" for the past five years and hopes one day to write a biography based on his research.

Raffle Winners: Strange Battles of the Civil War- James MacLaren; Piedmont Soldiers and Their Families- Bob Quinn; Annie Between the States- John Gordon; Carrying the Flag- Jack Kuske; The Monitor Chronicles- Dale Lear; The South Vs. The South- Bill Hacker; Drawing of CSS (Ironclad Ram) Jackson- Ed Russ.

Speaking about our March trip, we will board our bus at 7:30 A.M. at the Pine Valley United Methodist Church, corner of Shipyard Blvd. And Stonewall Jackson Drive. We should arrive at Fort Bragg about 10 A.M. Since Monroe's Crossroads is on Fort Bragg property, please be sure to bring a photo ID. If you plan to go, please send your money ($75) in ASAP! The tour begin at about ten and go until 5 P.M. We should return to the Church parking lot at about 7 P.M.

Mark Bradley brought us up to speed on the battle that took place at a small North Carolina town named Averbosboro. He took us back to March 1865 when General William T. Sherman was advancing through the Carolinas. On 8 March, with 60,000 veteran troops, Sherman crossed into North Carolina. On the move towards Fayetteville, with the aim of moving on to Goldsboro, Sherman's men were divided into two wings, with cavalry general "Kil-Cavalry" Kilpatrick guarding the left flank. That column was commanded by General Henry Warner Slocum. They will face Confederate General Joe Johnston, who is gathering a sizable force to contest Sherman's advance. His cavalry is led by Lieutenant General Wade Hampton, who was frantically returning from Columbia, South Carolina. Kilpatrick, in an attempt to prevent Hampton from slipping by him, will divided his force of 4,300 troopers and cover the roads to Fayetteville.

General Kilpatrick, believing he has covered all bases, settled in for the night at the Monroe plantation, not knowing that the Confederates are moving on him. Lieutenant General William Hardee's ("Old Reliable") Corps prepare to attack at dawn. With no pickets out, the attack is a complete surprise and the Federals are routed. One of the cavalrymen, Captain Bostic has a special mission: to capture General Kilpatrick. Approaching the Monroe house, Bostic hails a Yankee in his nightshirt and asks him where the general is. The man points off to the distance and yells back, "There he goes!" Bostic and his men ride off after the man pointed out, but it is the wrong man! It is Kilpatrick himself who showed Bostic where to go and narrowly avoided capture due to his quick-thinking. This event will go down in history as "Kilpatrick's Shirttail Skeddadle!"

The Confederate victory is short-lived however, Union soldiers have been forced back to Nicholson's Creek, a swampy area, where they rally and throw back the attackers. "Although the battle was small and indecisive, it nevertheless had the effect of dividing or spreading out Sherman's army." Given time to concentrate, Johnston will launch another attack at Bentonville on 19 March, which was the largest battle of the war fought in North Carolina. Mr. Bradley's maps and thorough understanding of the battle helped enormously and will contribute greatly to our trip on 25 March.

We were not able to go to the Fort Anderson reenactment (18-19 February) but we understand it was a huge success and has brought needed attention to the Historic Site. If any members did attend, please feel free to pen us a note and if possible, we'll post it on the website!

The Fork's Road event is to take place this weekend (25-26 February) at the Louis Wells Cameron Art Museum at the intersection of Independence Blvd. And 17th Street. The delaying action, meant to give Braxton Bragg an opportunity to destroy government stores and get out of Wilmington, pitted nearly 1,000 Confederates against the Union juggernaut. There will be artillery and small arms demonstrations as well as several presentations on the battle (Dr. Chris Fonvielle), African-American soldiers (Dr. Edward Keith) and a "Civilian Woman's Interpretation in the museum.

Our Spring Trip!

At 7:30 sharp (or shortly after-thanks again to all for waiting for me!) the stalwart band of twenty-four members and guests left Wilmington by chartered bus for Fort Bragg. We were off to meet Mark Bradley for a tour of the Monroe's Crossroads and Averasboro Battlefields. As an added attraction, Mark invited Jeff Irwin, of Fort Bragg's Cultural Resources Program. Their function, as explained by Mr. Irwin, is to "identify, evaluate and protect historically significant properties" situated on Fort Bragg property. There are over 4,200 archaeological sites (which includes nearly 400 buildings and 27 historic cemeteries.)

Hampton, Wheeler, Butler, Kilpatrick and Sherman. These were just a few of the names that we heard at last month's meeting as Mark Bradley briefed the Round Table on the battles of mid-March 1865. We were given a battle study (Cavalry Clash in the Sandhills, by Kenneth Belew) which we used as a guide when we arrived at the Charles Monroe house site. Unfortunately, there is nothing left of the house, but it is pretty well known where it is. It was at the Monroe house that "Kilpatrick's Shirttail Skedaddle" took place and while the recounting of that was humorous, it was balanced by the Union and Confederate graves that dot the area. Before leaving the military reservation, Mr. Irwin gave us a package which contained several prints, including one of Union Lieutenant Stetson firing canister at attacking Confederate cavalry. We also swung by one of the historic cemeteries on Fort Bragg and then visited Oak Bluff Church (ca. 1850s.)

After lunch we continued on to the Avera'sboro Museum, but alas, we arrived a little late and the museum was closed. The grounds were open however and Mark led our group to all three Confederate lines. It was, as he pointed out, based on an earlier battle: the Revolutionary battle of Guilford Court House! Before long it was time to head back to Wilmington. The bus was equipped with a DVD player and before the movie Sahara ended, we were home!

Kudos again to Dale Lear and Bruce Patterson for arranging the tour- it was excellent, as was lunch, beverages, (coffee and Dunkin' doughnuts also), apples and chocolate cookies. Everything was thought of, right down to the hand wipes before and after lunch!

February 2006

Our next meeting is on Thursday, 9 February - St. Andrew's On-The-Sound

Social Hour 7:00 p.m. Meeting 7:30 p.m.

Our speaker for February will be Mark Bradley. Mark received his B.A. in History from N.C. State and his M.A. in History from UNC-Chapel Hill. He is currently writing his doctoral dissertation on civil-military relations in North Carolina during Reconstruction. Mark is the author of two books, Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville and This Astounding Close: The Road to Bennett Place. He has written numerous articles for North and South, Blue and Gray and the North Carolina Historical Review, among other publications. Mark lives in Graham, N.C.

The title of Mark's program is "Monroe's Crossroads and Aversboro: A Sneak Preview." As the title indicates, Mark will provide us with an overview of our upcoming tour in March. The Battle of Monroe's Crossroads and Aversboro occurred during William T. Sherman's Carolinas campaign of 1865 and demonstrated that the Confederate army under Joseph E. Johnston was far from defeated. This will be Mark's third appearance before the CFCWRT.

Upcoming News!

As mentioned in our last letter, there will be a reenactment at Forks Road (behind the Louise Wells Cameron Art Museum.) This will take place on Saturday 25 February (10 am until 5 pm) and again on Sunday from 10 am until 3 pm. It will mark the 141st anniversary of the battle and military and civilian reenactors will present living history exhibits which will include small arms and artillery demonstrations, artifact exhibits as well as children's activities. Our own Dr. Chris

Fonvielle will speak on the battle which opened the road to Wilmington for the Union army. Cameron Art Museum is located at the intersection of S. 17th St. and Independence Blvd. and admission to the event is free. For more information call (910) 395-5999 or online at www.cameronartmuseum.com

At our last meeting “Kim” Kimball gave us a blow-by account of the daring raid by that nemesis of the Cape Fear, Union Naval Lieutenant William Barker Cushing. Billed as “the longest unsupported Union raid” of the Civil War, it (and the sinking of the dreaded ram Albemarle) bolstered Cushing’s reputation to the point where by war’s end, he was, together with Admiral David G. Farragut, the most widely known naval figure of the war. After describing the armament as well as the U.S.S. Ellis itself, Mr. Kimball indicated by the fall of 1862, how much the North needed a victory. Cushing, it might be said, was following the guidelines of Navy Secretary Gideon Welles, who ordered that the Navy “descend vigorously” against the Confederacy, burn vessels, seize stores and in general, be aggressive. Selecting the New River as a good avenue for his venture, Cushing (who was only 20 years of age) pushed off into the river on 23 November 1862. As they made their way upriver, they were spotted by Confederate pickets, stationed nearby “to watch for Union incursions.” The alarm went out but it would take time for the Confederates to rally to the endangered point. There was no time to even warn the citizens of Jacksonville, Cushing’s likely target, of the impending attack. By 1 p.m., Cushing had made his way to the city’s wharf and landed a party of tars who immediately “captured twenty-five stand of public arms”, the Wilmington mail and 6 slaves. Also captured were two schooners and after running up the U.S. flag at the courthouse square, they decided it was time to depart! As they slowly made their way down river, they were closely hounded by cavalry; Cushing fired and drove off his pursuers, but he realized they would have to anchor at some point in the river, as the twisting river, with it’s shoals could only be navigated during the day. This delay gave the Confederates time to bring up several pieces of artillery and sight them on the gunboat, now anchored for the night. As dawn approached, the rebels opened with artillery, but were driven off by Cushing’s return fire. When the Ellis grounded, Cushing shifted his men to one of the schooners but, with 6 volunteers, remained aboard his stranded steamer. When the Confederates began peppering his vessel with the deadly accurate 12 pdr. Whitworth gun, Cushing loaded his cannon, set fires on his vessel and set off for the prize schooners. Upon his return to the fleet, he believed he would be reprimanded for having lost his ship, but was instead commended for his actions. As the “Scourge of the Carolina Coast”, his name would be used to scare Confederate children, but this bogeyman was real and would again thwart Southerners when, in October 1864, he sunk the ram Albemarle!

Events, events, events!

Fort Anderson: The reenactment of the battle for Fort Anderson will take place on the very dates the actual battle took place 141 years ago: February 18th and 19th (Saturday and Sunday). The battle will take place about 2 p.m. on both days. There will be food sutlers, a bake sale and the raffle of a reproduction of the garrison flag now on display at the site. The (facsimile) flag has been meticulously crafted by Ben Tart (a 19th century fabric and material expert). Our own Dr. Chris Fonvielle will speak on Sunday.

The Onslow County Museum will host their 9th Annual Civil War Encampment on April 1st and 2nd (10 A.M. until 5 P.M.). Activities will include Infantry, Artillery, Cavalry and Navy demonstrations; Life on the Home Front; children's activities; a fashion show; period music; special guest speakers and even a community dance! Cooke's Corner

Sometime ago, we ran an article on the execution of John Yates Beall. That research fanned a more detailed look into the Lincoln assassination. As mentioned in the article there was a mysterious visit from "two friends...from Baltimore" Beall was hung. Was one of the visitors John Wilkes Booth? It was later said that Booth and Beall had been college roommates at the University of Virginia (and were such close friends that they were known as "Damon and Pythias") and that Booth had gone to see President Abraham Lincoln to plead for Beall's life. It was further said that Lincoln agreed to commute his death sentence, but when later confronted by Secretaries Stanton and Seward, who opposed it. When Beall was executed, Booth decided to kill Lincoln (and Stanton and Seward also). This version of the assassination was put forth after the war by several people, (usually in the pages of the Confederate Veteran) including Dr. George A. Foote, who was captured at Fort Fisher and confined in a cell at Fort Columbus near Beall. (Interestingly, Major General W.H.C. Whiting, also captured at that battle, lay wounded in his prison cell in the same jail. Beall's scaffold, it was reported, was built outside his cell window.)

Anyway, a quick visit online turned up a whole lot of Lincoln Assassination theories:

- 1. Andrew Johnson was involved with Booth. Approximately 7 hours before shooting the President, Booth dropped by the Washington hotel where Vice-president Johnson was staying. When he learned that Johnson was out, he left a card and wrote on it: "Don't wish to disturb you, are you at home? J. Wilkes Booth." Mary Todd Lincoln always felt Johnson was involved in the death of her husband. She wrote "...that, that miserable inebriate Johnson, had cognizance of my husband's death- Why was that card of Booth's found in his box[?]"
- 2. Lincoln's Assassination was the result of a Confederate Plot. Coded letters found in Booth's trunk back at the National Hotel tied him to the Confederacy. Supposedly George Atzerodt (a fellow conspirator) made a statement that Booth knew "of a Confederate plot to blow up the White House. After the failed Dahlgren raid (in which C.S. President Jeff Davis was a target)

Lincoln, it was felt, was fair game for assassination. Judah P. Benjamin, Confederate Secretary of State was said to be the prime mover for an attempt on Lincoln's life. When an explosives expert was captured en route to Washington, Booth had to act.

3. Lincoln's Assassination was the result of a conspiracy of powerful international bankers. In this theory, Booth is nothing more than a hired gun. The theory is that Lincoln needed money to finance the war and was offered the capital at very high rates by the Rothschilds of Europe. Rather than accept the harsh terms, Lincoln found other funds to continue the war. It was also said that British bankers opposed Lincoln's protectionist policies.

4. The Roman Catholic Church was behind Lincoln's Assassination. In 1886, an ex-priest (Charles Chiniquy) wrote a book which maintained that Jeff Davis had offered $1,000,000 if someone would "kill the author of the bloodshed." It was written that the Jesuits were involved and "were to select the assassins, train them, and show them a crown of glory in heaven." It turns out that Chiniquy, was at one time defended in a lawsuit against the Church, by none other than Lincoln! Chiniquy's book goes on to recite a long list of reasons why the Vatican wanted Lincoln dead.

5. Secretary of War Edwin Stanton was the mastermind behind Lincoln's assassination. Stanton was against Lincoln's mild Reconstruction policies, is the main reason given in a book that was written in 1897. This theory also implicates Lafayette Baker (chief of the National Detective Police) as well as several Congressmen.

There are several other theories put forth. Is it any wonder there are so many Kennedy Assassination theories around.

After retiring, Kim settled in Onslow County where he continues to promote the history and proud heritage of that County. He is the author of three books dealing with local history and currently has two additional works in progress. He sits as a member of the N.C Civil War Tourism Council, the Onslow County Museum Foundation and vice-chairman of the Onslow County Museum Advisory Board. Kim is also the past president of the Civil War Round Table of Eastern North Carolina, the Onslow County Historical Society and vice-chairman of the Onslow County Tourism Advisory Board. Have five children. The topic of his talk will be “Cushing’s New River Raid,” (the subject of one of his books.)

We hope you all had a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year! We are looking forward to another great RT year as well!

Upcoming News!

There are several events taking place in the near and immediate future. One is the annual reenactment of the battle of Fort Fisher. This will take place on Saturday, January 14th and will begin at 10 a.m. There will be artillery and musket demonstrations (artillery will fire on the hour, muskets on the half-hour) and please remember to take a look at the Armstrong gun behind the Visitor's Center. It will soon be heading back to Trophy Point (at West Point.) The firing will be interrupted for a short time for Bobby and Marsha's wedding (about 2:45 p.m.)

In February there will likewise be a reenactment at Forks Road (behind the Louise Wells Cameron Art Museum.) This will take place on the last weekend in February. Our RT has a special interest in this as we took up the mantle of preservation and worked to clear and restore the earthworks constructed there. We will (soon) head out to further restore the site, probably sometime in March. We will be seeking volunteers for the day, stay tuned for more information.

Our speaker for December, Tonia Smith, gave an excellent presentation on her latest article, ("Gentlemen, You Have Played This Daed Well") which appeared in the August issue of North and South Magazine. What may well have been a "lark" that two Confederate officers started out on, quickly turned deadly serious when they were charged with spying for General Braxton Bragg in Tennessee. Col. Orton Williams and Lt. Walter Peters were two unlikely spies. Dressed in Union uniforms, however, they may well have been attempting to penetrate General William S. Rosecrans lines to determine what he was up to in the spring of 1863. What made matters more important to both sides was the fact both men were cousins of General Robert E. Lee. Ms. Smith pointed out that their arrival at Fort Granger aroused suspicion from everyone except the commanding officer, (Col. J.P. Baird) especially since they wore havelocks, an item of clothing long since discarded by Federal soldiers in the field. Upon being discovered, (after having secured passes to continue their journey) they were arrested and quickly court-martialed (a court was convened within an hour!) Although the two maintained their innocence, they were found guilty of spying and condemned to death. The telegraph lines heated up as messages from the fort to the headquarters at Nashville went back and forth. A Union officer who had recognized Williams as a pre-war member of his unit tried unsuccessfully to prevent the execution. Finally ordered to "hang them," Colonel Baird was also ordered not to send any more messages to Nashville. The following day, the men were brought out in front of the garrison and were hung. Williams, it was said, took more than twenty minutes to die; at one point, he lifted himself up by his hands in a vain attempt to free himself. The repercussions were not as great as many thought they should have been. Indeed, Lee, upon hearing the news, initially stated that they got what they deserved. Upon reflection, Lee became angry and assumed the hanging was a retaliatory measure because before the war, Williams had been an aide to General Winfield Scott. William's sister, however, took a different tack. Once a year (every year) she wrote Rosecrans to tell him he was a murderer!

From The Civil War News- Plans are in the works to restore "Ellwood [the] battlefield house used as a Union headquarters. Stonewall Jackson's amputated arm is buried in the family cemetery at Ellwood." the money, $165,000, will be used to restore the parlor, entry hall and the north room on the first floor. Presently, the walls are in poor condition; for more information write: FOWB, P.O. Box 756, Locust Grove, Va. 22508-0576 (or www.fowb.org)

Our speaker for December will be Tonia Smith. Ms. Smith lives in Pinehurst, North Carolina and is a native-born Tar Heel. Her first Civil War experience came at age twelve when she accompanied her father on a visit to the Stone's River National Battlefield in Murfreesboro, Tennessee. She is a free-lance researcher for various Civil War authors and has recently begun writing for herself as well. Her article, "Gentlemen, You Have Played This Ded Well" (about the execution of two Confederate spies) appeared in the August issue of North and South Magazine. Tonia is moderator of the on-line Civil War Discussion Group. She is also the founder, past president and current program chair of the Rufus Barringer CWRT in Pinehurst.

An excerpt from Ms. Smith's article:

In the late spring of 1863, while U.S. Grant was laying siege to Vicksburg and Robert E. Lee was planning his move northward, Gen. Braxton Bragg and Maj. Gen. W.S. Rosecrans were locked in a stalemate in Tennessee. Both of their respective governments were pushing them for a decisive forward movement but both generals seemed reluctant to make the first move.

Rosecrans wanted to wait until he was certain that troops from his army would not be sent to support Grant. Bragg was concerned that he had been unable to penetrate Rosecrans' cavalry screen, which denied him an accurate assessment of his adversary's strength. Repeated efforts on Bragg's part to get inside Rosecrans' defenses had failed. Not even the mighty Nathan Bedford Forrest had been able to accomplish much beyond harassing the enemy at Franklin, Tennessee.

On the evening of June 8th, 1863, two fine-looking gentlemen dressed in uniforms made their way into Fort Granger. From the moment they entered the gates of the fort that protected the town of Franklin, until some eighteen hours later, one of the more unusual spy stories of the Civil War....Enough for now- Ms. Smith will fill us in on the rest of the story at our meeting!

Dispelling some of the Myths of Cold Harbor.

At our last meeting, Mr. Gordon Rhea led us back to the summer of 1864, a time when the fate of the nation depended on the outcome of a major battle. President Abraham Lincoln was not sure of victory, indeed, he was not even sure he would be his party's nominee. With the advent of U.S. Grant, fresh from his victories in the west, the strategy changed somewhat. No longer would the Federals merely seek to occupy territory, but would now concentrate on beating the ANV. A more profound change came when it was realized that Grant intended to continue battling Lee continuously. Mr. Rhea pointed out that at this point of the war many of the early Northern volunteers had left the army, their places were filled by conscripts. Grant outmaneuvers Lee by a downstream crossing of the North Anna River, but Lee will react quickly and attack at Totopotomoy Creek. Grant now realizes that the ANV has been weakened and it is only a matter of time (and casualties.) Both sides reinforce; Lee digs in and Union troops prepare for battle.

Here the first myth of Cold Harbor was shattered: There was not a wholesale pinning of names on jackets, Horace Porter wrote this well after the war. On 3 June the assault begins, many veteran troops move out 100 yards or so and dig in. Some of the "band-box" regiments, in combat for the first time (and perhaps wishing to prove themselves) enter the killing zone "like a pencil into a sharpener" and are mowed down in droves. It was these untried soldiers, placed in front of the veteran regiments, that suffered the most casualties. Mr. Rhea has set the total casualties at fifty-five thousand Union and thirty-five thousand Confederates, but disputes the figures of seven, ten or fifteen thousand killed in the first few minutes of the engagement. Those Southerners killed or wounded were, by 1864, virtually irreplaceable. Mr. Rhea also informed us that neither general accomplished his objective: Grant did not destroy the ANV and Lee did not drive Grant back across the North Anna River, nor did the battle change the outcome of the election.

Everything You Wanted To Know About Artillery!

Civil War artillery, that is! Our own Jack Travis enthralled the audience at our last meeting with descriptions of the various types of artillery in use during the Civil War. Smoothbores, rifled guns, 20 pdr. Parrotts, 12 pdr. Napoleons, explosive shells and solid shot, tables of fire, all terms were explained and many types of ammunition were on display to further interest us. It was interesting to realize that at least 25 men were required to keep a gun in action. Carpenters and wheelwrights were among those needed, as well as the men who actually operated the gun. His explanation of the problems of Confederate artillery at the battle of Gettysburg (their guns were fired before the infantry attacked and fired much more quickly then did the Federals-two rounds per minute vs. 1 round every three minutes) went a long way to explain the decimation Pickett's Division. Even E. Porter Alexander, (Longstreet's chief of artillery) said later, that given Federal artillery and Southern infantry, he would be able to "whip the world!"

Our next meeting will be Thursday, 6 October at St. Andrew's On-the-Sound

Our own Jack Travis will be the guest speaker at our next meeting on 6 October. Jack has recently relocated his business to the Cape Fear region but has long had ties to the area. Jack is well known in the reenacting world, (since 1990) having risen to the rank of Brigadier general before hanging up his uniform. He specialized in muzzle-loading artillery and has provided his services "too numerous to mention," to many UDC and SCV grave marker memorials. He has been a member of the MOSB and SCV since 1985 and is past commander of Camp 166, Wake Forest. "Blackjack," who admits to having a special interest in General E. Porter Alexander and Major James Reilly (both artillerists, of course!) will discuss not only the different types of artillery, but their tactical use as well. Jack's subject is appropriately titled, "Civil War Artillery." Please join us for our "social hour" at 7 p.m.

!!!Attention All Members!!!

At our next meeting we will hand out a questionnaire which will help us to determine the wants of our membership. Please be on hand and give us your input. Thanks!

If you have not yet been to Fort Anderson to view the returned Garrison Flag, you should do so as soon as you can. Please note the donor's plaque, you will see the Cape Fear Civil War RT conspicuously listed among those honorees. Thanks to you, the members who made it all possible!

Mark your calendar: Oakdale Cemetery, 30 October from 2p.m. to 5 p.m., "Gossip, Graves & Grapes." Sponsored by the Friends of Oakdale, this tour will tell the stories of several lesser-known graves in the cemetery (call 762-6417 for more information and 762-5682 for reservations.)

Wild Rose

Just when you thought there was nothing else to learn about Rose O'Neale Greenhow, along comes Ms. Ann Blackman to show us just how little we really knew about that lady (we did not know she had at least 8 children!) Ms. Blackman, who addressed a meeting jointly sponsored by the Round Table and the Friends of the Library, "rediscovered" Rose's diary, only to find it was virtually unreadable (one researcher told her it was written in code!) She found Dr. Jones in Chapel Hill, who had for many years, been transcribing the document. After persuading him to "loan" her his notes, she was able to piece more of the puzzle together. The result is her new book, "Wild Rose: Rose O'Neale Greenhow, Civil War Spy, A True Story." Ms. Blackman took us through Rose's life and how the "grand dame of antebellum Washington" was able to operate an espionage ring out of her very home in that city. Her unfortunate demise came as she returned from a diplomatic mission to Europe in 1864, on the shores near Fort Fisher, when she drowned while trying to escape a federal blockader. Found by a soldier with the unwieldy name of Doctor J.J. Prosper Formayduval, she was waked in Wilmington (at the Seamen's Bethel) and buried in Oakdale Cemetery. Her grave continues to attract visitors who admire this "Heroine of the Lost Cause."

David has written numerous articles for magazines and encyclopedias on various topics, mainly on the Civil War. Most recently, David has contributed two articles to Coastal Chronicles II, ("And They All Rest Together: Beaufort's Old Burying Ground" and another entitled "Burnsides Military Trains of the Albemarle.") David will discuss the Campaigns in Virginia, as well as the implications in North Carolina!

Maffitt) adventures on the vessel of the same name. See Bob for details!

In and Out: During one of the fiercest battles of the Western Theater, a celebrated Tennessee regiment drove back the Yankee lines, when suddenly they came under fire from a half-dozen enemy batteries; at the same time, several Union regiments added their musketry to the surprise. The Confederates, as brave as they were, found it expedient to retreat to a ridge some 200 yards to their rear. At this juncture, a noted Mississippi regiment came upon the scene and the men shouted to the Tennesseans, "Make way there and let Mississippi in!" The "way" was promptly made and the newly arrived Rebels rushed at the foe. Soon, they reached the deadly point and a similar greeting was given them. They reeled back as their predecessors had done and seeing them return, the Tennesseans rose as one and yelled, "Make way here, and let Mississippi out!" [Gregory A. Coco, Rebel Humor.]

Salisbury, N.C. Watchman has the following: Three Irishman, deserters from the Federal army, entered our lines, and when asked how they avoided the pickets, replied:- "Sure and were we not the pickets themselves."

Fort Macon's history has been closely examined by Paul Branch (who, in addition to being the fort's historian, also gives tours of the site) spoke to our RT about his passion...Fort Macon! The first fort built on Bogue Banks, completed in 1809, was washed away in 1820. By 1826, a five-sided work was finished, at a cost of nearly $500,000. The fort was unique in that it was built below ground, on a slope; hence, it was nearly invisible from the sea. When war came, local militia troops seized the fort from Ordnance Sgt. William Alexander. It was more strongly fortified (eventually fielding 54 guns of varying caliber) but when the attack came, it was garrisoned by only 450 men, commanded by Colonel Moses J. White. The garrison watched and waited: Forts Hatteras and Clark, Roanoke Island, New Bern and Morehead City, all fell to the Union steamroller. With the capture of New Bern, the fort's fate was sealed. Three offers to surrender were rebuffed by White and soon the fort came under siege by a Union investment. When the attack came on 25 April 1862, Union gunboats, floating batteries and land batteries pounded the fort for more than eleven hours. The major defect, Mr. Branch pointed out, was the lack of mortars, which might have prevented the Bluecoats from digging in, closer and closer to the walls of the fort. "There was such extensive damage, Col. White was forced to surrender the following morning." One of the stories that we found interesting was that of Sgt. Alexander, who had turned the fort over to the Confederates; he waited patiently for orders in Morehead City until the town was taken by the Federals. Alexander then promptly reported for duty the following day! He helped recapture the fort and was stationed in Morehead City until the end of the war when he finally resigned.

Fort Fisher...After the Fall.

(Part III, Conclusion)

In 1940, with the threat of war looming, the U.S. Government took over most of the southern end of Federal Point, by leasing the property from the owners, T. & L. Orrell as well as another tract from Hugh McRae. The post was an adjunct of Camp Davis in Holly Ridge, some 50 miles to the north and Fisher was one of five locations selected for a firing range for anti-aircraft artillery units. At Fisher, buildings were constructed and a small airstrip built (directly through several of the land-face traverses!) Known to the army as the Fort Fisher Firing Point, locations at which gun batteries were placed for practice were south of the entrance (the two columns lining Highway 421) and east of the highway, along the ocean front; utilities and living quarters were located on the opposite side of the road.

Troops spent several weeks there, live-firing 37 mm, 155mm seacoast guns, .50 and .30 caliber weapons and it was, as one veteran recalled, "strictly a no-nonsense place designed to put grit and fire in the bowels of its trainees." Indeed, the men training there were faced with many of the same problems the fort's original garrison faced: sand and mosquitoes! Three weeks before the attack on Pearl Harbor, the fort again resounded with gunfire when the first Coast Artillery Regiment arrived to practice with their big guns! It is interesting to note that the last U.S. troops to leave the fort after the Civil War were US Colored Troops and the first troops to return when the fort was activated, were from the 54th Coast Artillery, an all-Black unit! As one newspaper reported:

Almost eight decades earlier, African American troops had served on Federal Point as part of the Union expeditionary force....With the arrival of the 54th Coast Artillery in 1941, black soldiers were once again in the area for military service.

When on the firing range, the guns were emplaced facing seaward and shot at aircraft-towed as well as floating targets. On a cold January evening in 1942, a young soldier sat down by a fire built by his mates. They had used some old Civil War shells as "props for a makeshift fireplace" when suddenly one of the shells began "spewing hot embers on the soldier," burning his face and hands. The old shell had been heated just enough to disintegrate and injure the man. Nineteen forty-three was said to be the fort's busiest year. That year a British anti-aircraft unit joined in conducting exercises with U.S. troops; it was at this point in the war that saw the Woman's Airforce Service Pilots (WASPSs) not only ferrying aircraft around the country, but also saw them at the controls of tow planes, pulling target sleeves attached to long cables along the beaches at Fort Fisher. Training was carried on at night as well. Searchlight units (given the name "Moonlight Cavalry") scanned the dark skies to pick out the target aircraft. As much of the firing was out to sea, no vessels were allowed in the danger zone, which extended some five to seven miles when firing was in progress. The area quickly saw the construction of barracks (frame buildings plus frame tent stands) several mess halls, gas station, post exchange, storage buildings and tent sites, service club (at the site of the Fort Fisher Pier Restaurant) theater and chapels were constructed; anything to help ease the boredom induced by the absence of polite society:

There was volleyball, horseshoes and golf, but boxing was by far the most popular. Throngs of spectators gathered for the matches....The fervor reached its peak in January 1944, when boxing champ Joe Louis arrived for a visit.

Also constructed were bunkers meant to thwart an enemy landing along the beaches. Three observation towers were built along the oceanfront and the concrete bases are still to be seen today (one of the towers was taken down in 1982). The chief engineer of construction was Major Charles H. Foard, who would later co-own and operate the Blockade Runner Museum in Carolina Beach. When the war came to a close, there were 1,000 buildings (including a 350-bed hospital) worth more than $2,500,000. Much like after the Civil War, an auction was held to sell the property (the Orrells failed to negotiate a purchase of the buildings on the property) and many of the 16' by 48' buildings were bought and moved to new locations. Today many of these "cottages" can still be seen throughout the beach communities. It was hoped that the new hospital, finished the very day the fort was deactivated, could be taken over and either used by the county or as a VA hospital. In the 1950s, when the Sunny Point Military Terminal became active, most of the WWII buildings that were left were knocked down. In 1982, the last of the WWII buildings (the PX) was demolished, but remnants remain. Today a diligent visitor can still discern an ammunition bunker (from WWII) north of Battery Buchanan.

An Auction was held on an all-cash basis after the war.

In 1948, the Baptist Seaside Assembly leased 24 acres from the Federal Government for a term of 6 years, but they later moved across the river and purchased Fort Caswell as their permanent assembly area. In 1954, hurricane Hazel tore into the Carolina coast, washing away much of the fort's sea face batteries, but (unlike 1865) help was on the way! As author Rod Gragg recorded (in Confederate Goliath), as the Civil War Centennial approached, North Carolina took an interest in the Fort Fisher site. "In 1958...the State did what the federal government had failed to do a half-century earlier." The State gained control of what was left of the old fort and designated it a State Historic Site. In 1965, officiated by Governor Dan Moore, a Visitor's Center and Museum was opened (at a cost of $96,000) and within the first twelve months of operation, counted more than 220,000 visitors, quickly becoming one of the State's most popular sites. Even with its increased popularity, the old fort was still in mortal danger, not only from the sea, but from developers as well. In the summer of 1968, a bulldozer suddenly began grading the area. Residential lots were being marketed directly on what remained of the fort's sea face. Four major batteries would have been destroyed, including the telegraph station and the Mound Battery.

Citing a need for the "preservation of the historical value of the area known as Fort Fisher", the State moved quickly to halt the 450-acre Ramsgate subdivision by condemnation proceedings. Unfortunately, two of the traverses had already been demolished. State archaeologist Stanley South reported that the "land seized...by the State was 'rich in artifacts.'" He continued, "There have been shells, buckles, buttons and eating utensils recovered during the past few months." South also indicated that it was relic hunters who first notified the State of their find. The case would be tied up in litigation until 1971 when the courts awarded the owners $1.3 million for the property. Ensnared on the property was another "landmark." Robert Harrill, the "Fort Fisher Hermit," took up residence in a WWII bunker around 1955 and lived in it, entertaining tourists and other visitors until his death in 1972. (Harrell's "bunker" is visited today by tourists; the trail leading to it is on the south side of the Aquarium's parking lot.) The State also expressed an interest in the blockade-running wrecks laying along the coast and in 1968 the State Supreme Court concurred by declaring that vessels laying within a three-mile limit of the coast were the property of the State. A few years earlier U.S. Navy divers had gone down on the wreck of the Modern Greece and recovered many artifacts, which were put on display at the Visitor's Center. The military still maintained a presence in the area, for in 1965, an Air Force base was constructed just north of the fort. The station, which in 1974 was home to 300 officers and men, housed the 701st Air Defense Group, a radar squadron. Interestingly, in the control area, there was a two-foot thick wall to protect the men from radiation in the event of an atomic attack. In 1988, the base was closed, but remained a training center for National Guard units, as well as providing "a place at the beach" in the form of cottages and campsites for active and retired military personnel. Yet another military connection existed when the Landing Ship Dock-40 was named the Fort Fisher by the U.S. Navy. Decommissioned in 1990s a piece of the ship's planking was fashioned into a plaque and given to the fort.

Recently placed on the North Carolina Civil War Trails, a plaque now tells the story of "Fort Fisher's Last Stand" at Battery Buchanan. By 1979, the area was listed by the State as having the "most serious erosion problems in the State." Yet, it was not until 1995 that help came in the form of a seawall, to deter yet another "Last Stand" built to protect the fort. Consisting of 68,000 tons of granite and limestone, the wall spread over 3,000 feet and in some places was 15' high. The seawall would not have put in except for the untiring efforts of Mr. Paul Laird and the Fort Fisher Restoration Committee. Even though the wall "fended off the sea," in 1996 there was some damage from hurricane Fran and in 2001 the Civil War Preservation Trust placed the fort on its top-ten most endangered list. In 1992, the site was placed on the National Register of Historic Sites; Reverend Smith, H.C. McQueen, Edgar Williams, Louis T. Moore and all others who worked for Federal recognition and preservation could now rest easier. Future plans include a handicap-accessible walkway (since completed), restoration of a Civil War bombproof as well as a WWII gun emplacement. Preservation efforts are today being carried forward by not only the State, but by the Fort Fisher Restoration Committee and the staff and volunteers who now oversee North Carolina's most-visited Historic Site! Over 140 years after its construction, the fort is again serving the community it was built to protect. [Thanks to Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Barbara Hoppe (Director of the Ft. Fisher State Historic Site), Ray Flowers and other staff members of Fort Fisher for help with this article. Much of the information came from newspaper articles in the Bill Reaves Collection; additional information about Fort Fisher in WWII came from the Island Gazette's 2004 Tour Guide; David A. Our speaker for January, Mr. Paul Branch, is a native of Carteret County and graduated from UNC-Chapel Hill with a BA in history. In 1981 he became a ranger with the NC Park Service at Fort Macon. As the fort's historian, he gives guided tours, living history presentations, does restorations, museum exhibits and handles all manner of research about the fort. In 1982, he authored The Siege of Fort Macon, an in-depth look at the 1862 battle and also Fort Macon: A History (1999) which is a general account of the fort's entire history. He is currently working on an as-yet untitled work, a history of German U-boat operations along the east coast during WWII. Mr. Branch's subject will be...Fort Macon!

Jimmy Bartley, Director at the Brunswick Town/Fort Anderson State Site gave us a short talk on his efforts to bring the Fort Anderson garrison flag (a Second National-the one with the St. Andrew's Cross in the canton) home. Mr. Bartley is convinced the flag "fell off the wagon for a purpose" and as of this month, over $18,000 (of the $40,000 needed) had been raised. We can be quite proud because, as member Richard Long has informed us that between "the group and its members, the Cape fear CWRT has given nearly $2,000 to the cause." We are nearing the halfway point, so it really looks good that the flag will indeed be placed "in a bombproof" at the fort. Reserve the weekend of January 15-16 for the reenactment of the Second Battle of Fort Fisher. Call the fort (910) 458-5538 for more details.

Knapsacks Discarded.- Knapsacks have fallen into general disuse and discredit in the Confederate armies and in derision of them soldiers call them "hand organs." Whenever a company or regiment is seen marching with knapsacks slung, the taunt is sure to follow: "I say, you've got your organs, where's your monkeys? You left them behind, expecting to find bigger and better monkeys down here," etc.

Wilmington Daily Journal 4 June 1864

At our December meeting we were treated to a taste-fest of Civil War era deserts prepared by Ms. Ann Hertzler and friends! Admittedly, we were drawn to the R.E. Lee sponge cake, as we had written about it in the last letter! Following desert, Ms. Hertzler gave a talk on the Wilmington Ladies Aid Society during the war. That group, an outgrowth of the pre-war "Ladies Benevolent Society", fed and cared for the sick and wounded soldiers that passed through the town; benefits were given to also raise funds. "Delicacies and stimulants" (wines, ales, whiskey) seemed to be the items most requested and these ladies "filled a needed gap" to sustain the troops. According to Ms. Hertzler, they also supported the war effort by sewing haversacks, socks, shirts, bedding and virtually every type of clothing the troops found necessary! Please see the insert for details on our ("Lee to the Rear") spring trip! The Battle of the Wilderness pitted Lee against Grant for the first time; it is a continuation of our trip last year and promises to be every bit as good as that one was!

After the Fall (Part II)

In 1908, James Smith went to Utica to deliver an address on the battle, as that city was the home of many of the members of the 117th N.Y. Infantry. In September 1909 that city hosted "The Great Reunion" with more than 50 Confederate survivors of Fort Fisher in attendance. When W.H. McLaurin, a Wilmington veteran, was served dinner, he asked what the dish before him was. When told it was Hungarian Goulash, he was still puzzled until he ate it, whereupon he exclaimed it was "beef hash with dumplings! Getting down to business, the Association again called for Congress to act on the Fort Fisher property. One of their first priorities was to push Congress to establish a National Park there.

The 1907 reunion was held in Wilmington. Veterans were clad in blue and gray.

*Weekly Transcript and Messenger

Earlier that year, a delegation had assembled in Washington, D.C. and appeared before the House Military Affairs Committee to lobby for the purchase of Fort Fisher, however, it was soon realized that the money ($40,000) would not be forthcoming. In November Wilmington was honored with a visit from President Howard Taft and it was made sure that one of the sights he saw was Fort Fisher! Along for the ride down to the mouth of the river were H.C. McQueen and Reverend Smith. Unfortunately, there was still to be no National Park on Federal Point. In 1914, Reverend Smith passed away. Although he had accomplished much in bringing public awareness to both the veterans and the fort, he died without seeing his dream fully realized. Earlier that same year, the Kure Land and Development Company commenced work on cottages, streets, a pier, railway and a hotel. Fort Fisher Sea Beach was being readied for the season! By 1917, with sewers, telephone service, wells and electric lighting, over 60 lots had been purchased.

With the passing of Smith, General Curtis and Colonel Lamb, the impetus for a National Park subsided. The legacy of Fort Fisher was carried on by the surviving veterans and their descendants; by the United Daughters of the Confederacy and also Captain Edgar D. Williams. Williams had been a lad during the war and had watched from across the river as the fort was bombarded into submission. In the early 1920s, he was the driving force to have a granite marker placed at the battleground (the dedication was attended by the widow of "Kit" Bland, the man who had twice, under fire, placed a flag near the site); he spoke to school groups and continued the fruitless fight for a national park. By this time, annual memorial services were being held at the wind-swept dunes. A "little wooden shack" had been built to house "Walter's Place," a drink stand and bath house. Nearby was a flagpole (erected due to William's efforts) and it was Walter Winner's job to raise and lower the flag every day! In 1923, in his honor, the "beautiful stretch of boulevard...along the ocean front from Carolina Beach to Fort Fisher, and encircling the mound...has been christened 'Edgar Williams Boulevard.' "

In 1924, 400 acres, which included the fort, was sold for $20,000 to Thomas Orrell, who represented the firm of Alexander Sprunt & Son. In 1928, a macadamized road was built to Fort Fisher using as a foundation, a nearby coquina rock outcropping. Unfortunately, the coquina was part of the fort's protection against the ravages of nature and in years to come, much of the fort would be reclaimed by the Atlantic Ocean. With erosion, many artifacts were constantly being uncovered. In 1929, a Colt revolver was discovered "with a full charge of five cartridges in its chambers." The finder then "proceeded to clean it and also oil the weapon. This having been accomplished, he pulled the trigger, and much to his amazement, the revolver discharged." It was also noted that the pistol had eight notches carved on the handle! In 1929, the Federal Point Lightkeeper's house site was conveyed to the City of Wilmington. The ground encompassed one acre and was to be used as a memorial site to commemorate the battle. Today known as "Battle Acre," the city was to "improve and maintain" the grounds. Four large cornerstones were placed to mark the acre and a large memorial stone (6' by 8') was placed in the center of the field.

Formally dedicated in May 1931, the principal speaker of the day was one of the participants of the battle, Henry C. McQueen. Now a bank president, he recalled how important the fort was to the Confederacy and hoped that the site would become "a sacred spot designed to keep alive the brilliant memory" of the fort. When the bones of an unknown soldier were found at Fort Fisher in 1935, the remains were reburied "near the monument on Battle Acre;" the soldier has since been identified as a Confederate. Attempting to capitalize on the tourist trade, at one point it was proposed to build a tower and county museum, but this too, fell by the wayside. The UDC had expressed an interest in assisting with the work at Battle Acre and they too, had been given land upon which to erect a marker. Their site was atop the "Mound" the 60 foot-high battery at the southern end of the fort. Charles C. Johnson was selected to erect the monument; he had completed the North Carolina memorial at Gettysburg just a few months before. Shortly after the foundation was laid, the site had to be changed. In 1865, the ocean was 700 feet from the Mound, while in 1931, it lay only 150 feet away. A Federal Examining Board was sent to determine what might be done to prevent its loss. The Board noted that a bulwark would cost in excess of $71,000 and that the cost was "not justified [in]...the interest of navigation" and still unprotected years later, the famous Mound Battery, buffeted by the wind simply eroded away (the U.S. Army had hastened its destruction by hauling tons of sand away during WWII to build magazines). The UDC "monument to defeated valor" was twice moved away from the encroaching sea (in 1972, the concrete base of the monument could still be seen at low tide.)

(Wilmington Morning Star, 19 March 1931)

Throughout the decade of the 1930s, the torch of preservation was carried forward by such men as Louis T. Moore, legislator W.R. Doshier and yet another Reverend, Andrew J. Howell. In 1934 Howell, who had been present at the 1907 reunion, organized and became the first president of, the Fort Fisher Memorial Association. A final effort in 1936 once again failed to have Fort Fisher become part of the National Park system; it was said the site was "not considered of sufficient national significance for inclusion."

The 140th anniversary of the Union capture of Fort Fisher will be held on that Saturday (15 January, 2005) and Sunday. There will be infantry and field artillery demonstrations; siege and heavy artillery demos, as well as talks on women, medicine and African Americans in the war. The reenactment of the Federal assault will take place at 3:30 p.m. While there, be sure to take a look at the Armstrong gun behind the Visitor's Center; inside are the Blakely and Whitworth guns and the Colonel Thomas J. Purdie (uniform) exhibit.

Our speaker last month, Jim "Buddy" McNeil gave us an excellent discourse on most of the Lower Cape Fear pilots that ran the blockade during the war. He noted that the profession was so important that when a pilot was captured, they were not exchanged, but ordered to sit out the war in prison. The job of piloting was usually handed down from father to son and after a long apprenticeship, the son took the helm. The pilots lived at Smithville (Southport), at Carolina Beach and along the Sounds. In 1860 at Smithville there were 24 pilots out of a population of 736. During the war the pilots became quite wealthy and it was said that they were "free-spenders." Commenting on a home built from the profits of the trade, one local woman said that it was built by "fast horses and fast women." His recounting of George Bowen being "decoyed" out to a blockader was especially interesting. Bowen was given the choice of prison or a job as a Union pilot; he took the job! He sometimes maintained a communication with his family by putting a message in a bottle! At least one of these missives was found and delivered to his wife. The bottle eventually washed ashore and the note was found and delivered to her. Later in the war he was able to bring his wife and family to Union lines; not one to dishonor himself, it was said that when other pilots were captured, he "never gave up a fellow pilot." Men like C.C. Morse, Archibald Guthrie, Ephram Gause, John Newland Maffitt, Thomas Grissom, Julius Doshier and many others whose names are intimately associated with those vessels that ran the blockade, hold a special place in the region's history. Indeed, it was after the war that the profession suffered its greatest calamity when, in 1872, five pilots were lost at sea in a storm.

We are extremely proud to announce that our Round Table has once again answered the call to preserve our history. We have donated $500 to the Friends of Brunswick Town, Inc. for their noble effort to purchase the original garrison flag (a Second National) of that post. Remember, if you would like to contribute (a tax-deductible donation) in your own name, contact member Richard Long at 910-253-6973.

The General Robert E. Lee Cake: (Men, don't try this at home!)

(From The American Heritage Cookbook, 1964)

2 cups sifted all-purpose flour.

½ teaspoon cream of tartar

1 ½ teaspoon baking powder

8 eggs, separated.

2 cups sugar

grated rind and juice of 1 lemon

dash of salt

Grease and flour four 9-inch cake pans. Sift together flour, cream of tartar and baking powder, four times. Beat egg yolks with a rotary or electric beater until very thick, light and creamy. Add the sugar, a few tablespoons at a time, and continue beating until mixture is smooth and pale yellow, (this is a sponge cake, so thorough beating is imperative.) Stir in lemon rind and lemon juice. Beat egg whites and salt until they stand in peaks. Fold into egg-yolk mixture alternately with the flour until well mixed. Spoon into cake pans and bake in a preheated (350 degrees) oven 20 to 25 minutes or until cake begins to pull away from sides of pans. Loosen edges with a knife and turn out on cake racks to cool while you prepare the filling and frosting.

Lemon Jelly filling

6 egg yolks

2 cups sugar

grated rind of 2 lemons

juice of 4 lemons

½ cup butter

Mix egg yolks with sugar, lemon rind and lemon juice, cook over boiling water, stirring constantly, until sugar dissolves. Add butter and continue cooking, stirring constantly for 20 minutes or until filling is smooth and very thick. Cool, then spread between layers of cooled cake.

Lemon-orange frosting

¼ cup butter

6 cups confectioners' sugar

1 egg yolk

2 tablespoons lemon juice

3-4 tablespoons orange juice

grated rind of 1 lemon

grated rind of 2 oranges

Beat or work butter until it has the appearance of thick cream, stir in confectioners' sugar, a little at a time and continue working until mixture is very smooth. Beat in egg yolk and lemon juice. Stir in enough orange juice to make a spreadable frosting, then add grated lemon and orange rinds. Spread on sides and top of cake. [After printing this recipe, we hope the cake is at the meeting!, Ed.]

Fort Fisher...After the Fall.

(Part I)

Early in 1866, the steamer Chicopee made its way down the Cape Fear River to the landing at Fort Fisher. The fort, which was now garrisoned by Federal troops, was still littered with the remnants of the battle early in the year. A party of gentlemen got off the boat and examined piles of artillery fragments, exploded cannons and iron, which covered the site; they were there to make a bid on the iron. The preceding summer, "hundreds and hundreds of acres...under negro cultivation [produced] this valuable crop." The U.S. Government held the auction and estimated that there was 1,000 tons (that is two million pounds!) of iron; the metal was sold for $20.65 per ton; much of the iron was taken, but there was still a lot left. In June 1867, two men were charged with "stealing iron." When spotted by an army sergeant, they replied that they were merely picking up the iron sold to a Mr. Preston at the government sale. The sergeant let them continue about their business, but the following day, he again noticed the two men by Battery Buchanan and peered into a "pontoon boat" the men were loading with shells. When again questioned, one of the men admitted that the boat was loaded with live 10" Blakely shells, the property of the U.S. Government and that they had taken "all the shells at Fort Buchanan." They implicated several others and eventually three more men were arrested "on suspicion of being concerned in the theft of quantities of iron stolen at different times from the beach on Bald Head and Fort Fisher." They were fined $50 plus costs, or if they opted, three months in prison at hard labor. Perhaps the men had been mistaken by believing that as the garrison was soon to leave the post, anything left was up for grabs! [Note: relic hunting is still illegal at Fort Fisher!] When the fort had been garrisoned, it was used as a quarantine station (which was later reestablished off Southport) and in 1866, when the telegraph line was repaired, a signal station.

The fort had been manned by U.S. troops since it was taken by storm in January 1865. In May 1867, orders were received from Washington that "Forts Hatteras, Fisher and Johnston...are to be abandoned [.]". Later that year at Fisher, another auction was held and several barracks-type buildings were sold. By 1870, the Navassa Guano Company established a fish oil works on Federal Point and began to catch "the peculiar fish...designed for making oil." Although the machinery was in place, the boats and nets had arrived, the fish were not cooperating; the "fat-backs" had simply disappeared! Around this time, the stories of supernatural events began to surface:

About 8 o'clock Thursday night, a ghostly apparition, mounted on a white horse with blood-red spots on him, rode up to the Post-office window and demanded, in sepulchral tones, 'Give me Gen. Whiting's mail for Fort Fisher.' A shot was fired at him without any effect except causing him to vanish. So we are told.

In the mid-1890s, Cliff Thomas went out hunting. As he "waited impatiently for ducks to appear" it grew darker; he finally spotted his quarry and brought down two Mallards. After recovering the game, he realized that it was now quite dark. As he made his way along the river back to camp, the moon cast shadows around him. As the story continued:

Then suddenly, some distance ahead...he saw the figure of a man standing under a large pine....[Continuing towards the man, he soon came] abreast of the silent figure. The moon was just rising over the tree tops and its light fell full upon his features. He had a youngish slender figure but the skin of his face seemed like parchment and his eyeless sockets stared emptily ahead;- a dead man in Confederate uniform.

'My God,' exclaimed Thomas under his breath, 'The Lone Sentinel.' A shiver ran down his spine. He could feel his hair rise [and] panicking with fear, he glanced around. In the distance he saw a flicker of light'

Thomas ran to the light, which proved to be the cabin of a local citizen. When he told the man what he had seen, the old man nodded in agreement and told Thomas that others had reported seeing a ghost also. It was reported that other "ghostly visitants made their appearance" at the fort also. These visitors were said to have been washed ashore in coffins, which "drifted with unnatural regularity...and as many occupants raised their fleshless bones...and formed themselves into columns...marched with noiseless step." These news reports were scare tactics used by the Ku Klux Klan, which, it was said, met (in 1868) at the fort.

Regardless of ghosts and other apparitions, the area was favored for fishing, bathing and excursions, so visitors continued to come to the site. In 1879 "Moonlight and Music" was the theme of the steamer Passport, which, for a quarter, would whisk one on an excursion to the fort. By the early 1880s, a building was erected for the "Federal Point Fishing Club," while the Mayo House soon opened its doors for the steamers that now made regular Sunday trips to the locale. There were bathing, fishing and boating facilities available (as well as the "best liquors and cigars, fish, shrimp, clams and terrapins.") Within ten years, Mr. Mayo was a partner in the Fort Fisher Land and Improvement Company. The land was to be developed, a railway was to be built from Carolina Beach to the fort. A large amount of land around the fort had been purchased, streets and lots were planned. It would not be the last time since 1865 that the fort would be threatened. With the damming of New Inlet (by the construction of "The Rocks" in 1881) erosion became a major problem at Federal Point. Nearly 400 feet of the beachfront was reclaimed by Mother Nature before it halted. Erosion had begun soon after war's end; indeed, Colonel William Lamb noted in the 1870s that the Mound Battery was not as high as it was just a few years earlier.

By the end of the century as international tensions increased, there was talk of rebuilding the fort, but it was decided instead to rearm Fort Caswell on Oak Island. Although the forts were never to see combat again, another battle was brewing. Those who had fought at the fort had begun visiting the site soon after the battle ended. James A. Smith (now a Reverend), a former member of Company D of the 1st Heavy Artillery Battalion, had defended the River Road sally port (Smith was said "to have fired the first shot of the battle at the advancing Union army") and had been wounded and captured at the "Bloody Gate." Upon returning from a visit to the fort in August 1902, he and other Confederate survivors began to seek funds to "erect a suitable memorial" to his comrades. Although the land was now in private hands, the owners agreed to allow a shaft or tablet to be built. The funds, it would appear, never materialized, but Smith and Henry C. McQueen, another survivor and president of the Murchison National Bank in Wilmington, continued to push for recognition. In 1905 the first official reunion of Confederate veterans met at Carolina Beach. One Union veteran, who had lost his leg at the battle, had asked leave to "attend the funeral of a part of himself that was buried at Fisher 42 years ago." On 15 January 1907, Confederate and Union veterans held a joint reunion in Wilmington. At this reunion, the Blue and Gray came together as one; the name of the association was changed to "The Fort Fisher Survivor's Association" and elected President of the Association was the former commander of the fort, Colonel William Lamb. Vice-president was General N. Martin Curtis, the Federal "Hero of Fort Fisher." At the meeting, two Confederates were overheard bantering:

Well, well, well, old friend, how are you? I haven't seen you since the night we spent in the old fort before the surrender...and do you remember what you were singing to yourself that evening?
'Why, no, what was it?' 'Well, you were crooning an absurd little verse that was as follows: 'The Yanks may be strong and they may be bigger; but we'll kill every one, by a pullin' of the trigger.'

It was also at this reunion that James Smith recognized the man who had captured him exactly 42 years earlier. Benjamin F. Seeley, then a member of the 117th N.Y. Regiment, had taken Smith prisoner at the point of his bayonet; the two quickly became fast friends and had a picture taken at the "Bloody Gate" as they clasped hands in friendship." On a later trip to Washington, Smith presented a copy of the photo to President Theodore Roosevelt, who then showed it proudly as proof that the nation was once again reunited.

Welcome Back! It may be hard (for some of us, at least) to believe we are entering upon our tenth year as a Round table, but its true! It was in September 1994 that the first meeting of the RT was held. Fittingly, our first speaker was our current president, Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle. Much credit for getting the whole ball rolling, has to be given to George Slaton, Kemp Burpeau and Gerry Partrick; also deeply involved in those formative years were Ted Lynch and Tommy King. Thanks again to these people for seeing the desire (some might say need) for such a group here in the Lower Cape Fear!

To kick off our season, we present Jack Travis, who will speak on E. Porter Alexander, (Longstreet's Chief of Artillery.) Colonel "Black Jack" Travis, who has been a Confederate reenactor since 1990, specializing in muzzle loading artillery, has served as Battalion Artillery Commander at the 135th Sharpsburg and Gettysburg events (among many others!) Colonel Travis is also a member of the Raleigh Chapter, Sons of the American Revolution, past president of the Wake Forest Rotary Club, past president of the Wake Forest Fourth of July Celebration Committee, and has owned and operated a safety supply business since 1991.

Our (tentative) program of speakers is as follows:

9 September	Jack Travis	E. Porter Alexander
14 October	TBA	TBA
11 November	Buddy McNeil	"Masters of the Shoals"
9 December	Ann Hertzler	Civil War Cookfest
13 January	Paul Branch	Fort Macon
10 February	Wiley Sword	"Bloody Shiloh"
March	Chapter II: Our spring trip to Spotsylvania and The Wilderness.
14 April	Bob Cooke	The Wilmington and Weldon Railroad
12 May	A special "behind the scenes" trip to the Cape Fear Museum.

The Power To Heal.

John S. Robinson of the 52nd Virginia Infantry, became a one-legged Rebel in October 1864, at the battle of Cedar Creek. During the fight he was acting as a mounted courier for General John Pegram, a division commander under General Jubal Early.

After his wounding and subsequent amputation, Robson was sent to a large military hospital to recuperate. While in this facility, he noted that the teasing and joking between patients and doctors seem to do more for the health of the soldiers than the medicine they were given. To illustrate this belief, and to highlight the fun-loving attitude of the staff, he told this little anecdote:

One case...reported was that of a man brought in, dangerously wounded in three places. After the examination by the surgeon, an assistant asked: 'Doctor, is the man badly hurt?' 'Yes,' said the surgeon, 'two of the wounds are mortal, but the third can be cured, provided the man is kept perfectly quiet for six weeks.'

[From Rebel Humor, by Gregory A. Coco].

At a Committee meeting on 6 July, Treasure Dan Geddie presented our balance sheet for the year ending 30 June 2004. A brief synopsis indicates that total expenses ($8,371.46) were greater than revenues ($8,055.60). Revenues are brought in by membership fees, clothing and tour sales, raffles (and gifts); while expenditures go for the newsletter, meeting and speaker's expenses, dinner and tour expenses. We ended the year with a balance of $1,777.01. Copies will be available at the next meeting.

NEW MEMBERSHIP DUES!

Membership dues (still $25) are not due until December-January, but we are now offering two new membership categories: Student and Family: a Student membership is $10; Family (per couple) $35, if you know anyone who might be interested, please pass this information along to them!

HOW WE SPENT OUR SUMMER!

We visited the ram Albemarle, located on the waterfront at Plymouth; unfortunately, the museum was not open when we were there, but we did examine the 63 foot replica gently rocking out back in the Roanoke River. We also took a look at the replica (fiberglass) 6.4 Brooke Rifle out in front. Towards the end of June, we were at Oakdale Cemetery to attend a commemorative ceremony for Union Sergeant William Broughton, a member of the 2nd Virginia Infantry (Union), who died in Wilmington after being released from Andersonville. The occasion was the dedication of a memorial stone and was attended by several RT members, one of whom (Wayne Carver) did much of the research which culminated at Oakdale. We also attended a screening (at Cameron Art Museum) of Confederate Goliath, a documentary film on the Battles at Fort Fisher. The film will air "sometime" in the next few months!

That Indispensable Civil War Coffee!

Ann Hertzler

In 1832 President Andrew Jackson ordered coffee and sugar substituted for the daily liquor ration in the military, thereby introducing into soldier's lives a habit that helped them through the difficult times of the Civil War. During the war, speculators bought up all the coffee for Northern armies in order to charge the U.S. government a high price, but agents in England purchased ship-loads and prevented the action. A Southern woman described the shock in home life when President Lincoln blockaded Confederate seaports on 19 April 1861; by 1862 coffee supplies were exhausted. Coffee prices escalated, often higher in areas densely populated, invaded or occupied by the Union. Price per pound in 1861 was $3.00; in 1862, $1.50 to $4.00; in 1863, $5 to $30.00. By 1864, coffee was going for $12 to $60!

In the 1860s, coffee recipes were written for both the "hearth" and the new "iron stove". Recipes were by weight (one ounce of powder to 3/4s of a pint of boiling water, to make three full "dishes") or household measure ("two great spoonfuls" or "two heaped tablespoonfuls" to each pint of water). Florence Nightingale's 1861 Directions for Camp and Hospital Cooking, used by both the South as well as the (Northern) U.S. Sanitary Commission had a coffee recipe for 100 men. Although water resources (rivers, ponds, puddles) often added to dysentery problems, coffee making was a safety factor because the boiling process killed water-borne pathogens.

In The Camp.

Officers were given a cash allowance to purchase supplies. The Army of the Potomac figured camp rations for every 100 soldiers as "ten pounds of green coffee, or eight pounds of roasted and ground". Inexperienced camp cooks usually made coffee of inferior quality. The same pots used to boil meat, potatoes and soup were used to wash clothes and to boil tea and coffee. Two to three day's marching rations of coffee and sugar were apportioned in piles as soldiers received them and mixed them together in paper, oil-silk, cloth or rubber bags before getting wet, spilled or stolen. At noonday halts or at the end of a days march, the soldier kindled a campfire and brought water to a boil in his tin dipper or "mucket" held on the end of a stick by a wire bail. He then boiled the coffee-sugar mixture to the desired hue, usually getting darker and strong enough to float an iron wedge the longer a man served in the army! A little hot coffee might be poured into his plate to clean it; perhaps hardtack was crumbled into the coffee also.

In the second year of the war, the Union commissary distributed a coffee extract mixed with sugar and milk which looked like axle grease. Called "essence of coffee" and packed in half-gallon tins, a teaspoonful mixed with a cup of hot water produced "instant coffee", a beverage the men would not drink. It was soon discontinued. The Union bought large quantities of the "new" (1856) canned condensed milk from Lewis or Borden, an item seldom available to troops on the march. Soldiers could purchase condensed milk from the sutler or receive it in boxes from home or get milk from the army's dairy herds. Stray cows were even occasionally milked occasionally but were more likely slaughtered for food.

Men under Grant in 1862 in eastern Tennessee and Mississippi confiscated a huge coffee mill in which they ground hard corn, using the meal for making mush, giving most of them the "Miss Quick Step".

In The Hospital.

In 1864 in Richmond's general Hospital No. 9, coffee was served on the "regular" but not on the special diet. Inspection records of Richmond's Jackson Hospital noted that supper consisted only of bad imitation coffee and one slice of baker's bread; breakfast only 3 or 4 ounces of cold coffee in a cup instead of the usual allowance of one pint. In view of scarcity, Confederate Surgeon General Moore directed on 2 December 1863, that coffee should be used solely for medicinal effects as a stimulant. Chimborazo Hospital in Richmond had a barrel of coffee donated by women of the South when food supplies were cut off and sold at exorbitant prices. A July 1863 report said: At Gettysburg we moved up to the depot, close by the town,...a first-rate camping ground, in a large field directly by the track, with unlimited supply of delicious cool water. Here we set up two stoves, with four large boilers, always kept full of soup and coffee....Men (including the Rebels) who missed the trains of ambulances to Harrisburg had their wounds attended to and were bathed and fed. We varied our dinners with custard and baked rice puddings, scrambled eggs, codfish hash, corn-starch, and always as much soft bread, tea, coffee, or milk as they wanted".

The U.S. Sanitary Commission describes improvising coffee preparation in hospital menus in camp kettles suspended from long poles; in cast iron caldrons to boil soup, vegetables, meat and tea in succession ; in fireplaces, on small sheet iron stoves and on small army stoves.

Coffee Substitutes.

Coffee Houses, homes and armies extended coffee with other ingredients or used no coffee beans at all because of availability or to economize. Some described adulterated coffee as delicious, others as nauseating. An 1853 "receipt" book said that no coffee substitute had been found to have the flavor of true coffee.

Doctor Thomas F. Wood noted that the hotels in Richmond were not providing genuine coffee but only miserable rye substitutes. In the North:

The diet-kitchen manager of a large military hospital in Madison, Indiana, discovered that the surgeon-in-charge was tampering with the hospital coffee supply, having kitchen workers dry and reuse the grounds, which they occasionally mixed with logwood. Wittenmyer appointed a USCC woman colleague to the task of determining if charges were true....Ultimately, the investigation resulted in the surgeon's resignation.

In 1833, Mrs. Child offered alternatives for the "frugal housewife"- roasted dry brown bread crusts, rye grain soaked in rum, or peas the same as coffee. Chicory was used as a substitute by poorer classes or to improve flavor. Acorns, barley, beans, beets, bran, chestnuts, chicory, corn meal, cotton seeds, dandelion, okra seeds, sweet potatoes, peas, peanuts, persimmons, rice, rye sorghum molasses, sugar cane seeds, watermelon seeds and wheat berries were parched, dried, browned or roasted to make ersatz coffee.

Recipes

To prepare sweet potato coffee we pared the potatoes, cut into small bits, dried and parched, adding a little butter before taking from the oven and grinding. Tubers, like carrots or yams were cut into small pieces, dried, toasted and ground up. A "receipt" for coffee from ripe acorns was to wash them in the shell, parch until they open, remove the acorns and roast with a little bacon fat. A recipe for rye coffee (1 cup rye= about 1 1/4 cups ground extra fine) was 1 or 2 tbsp. Ground rye/serving; add boiling water and boil 10 minutes. Hunt's breakfast powder consisted of rye (boiled, dried and roasted with a little butter) ground like coffee. Dandelion coffee directions were to cut the roots into small pieces, roast in the oven until brown and crisp as coffee, and grind. Peanut coffee called for 1/2 cup peanuts, 1/2 cup wheat or rye and 1/2 cow peas. Roast all to a rich coffee brown; grind and make as for postum. To more or less habitual coffee drinkers, one-third or one-half real coffee will make the above recipe more acceptable.

[For more information on coffee, see: <http://www.uttyl.edu/vbetts/coffee.html>]

Then of course, there was the opinion of the Macon (Georgia) Telegraph:

TO CHEAPEN COFFEE:- Don't use the stuff. There isn't one cook in five hundred who ever did anything else than abuse it. Some of the papers are recommending substitute- parched beans, peas, rye, breadcrusts, acorns, etc. Swamp mud will blacken water just as effectually, but neither of will make coffee....coffee fills your stomach with mud banks and shoals, against which the bark of human life is often wrecked. The greatest humbug in the world...is coffee! Think of paying forty cents a pound for charcoal to embitter and blacken the water you drink. The practice should be suppressed by the Board of Health, if there were no war to do it. [Quoted in the Wilmington Daily Journal, 3 October 1861.]

The RT still has golf shirts ($30), caps ($15), denim shirts ($35) and jackets ($50) available for sale. See Steve Gunter at our next meeting (or call him at 686-4025) for details!

John A. Richardson: Reluctant Lieutenant Colonel of the 36th N.C.

By Ray Flowers.

Shortly after coming on board at Fort Fisher State Historic Site in 1997, I came across a curious passage in an article by Colonel William Lamb of the 36th North Carolina. Simply entitled "Fort Fisher", Lamb inadvertently posed a riddle within the story that has since proven a Gordian knot to unravel. In relating a pregnant anecdote he wrote, "I had been sent to Fort Fisher to discipline the garrison against the temptations incident to blockade-running. My first act on taking command, July 4th, 1862 was to suspend an officer for being intoxicated and I had him cashiered" Now, who was this intemperate officer? With no other account of this episode known to exist, positively identifying the offender is thus far impossible. However, after following a long circuitous trail of circumstantial evidence, I have since arrived at the conclusion that the officer in question might well have been none other than Lamb's own reluctant Lieutenant-Colonel, John A. Richardson.

Col. John A. Richardson

The genesis of this investigation began where most research for Confederates posted along the Lower Cape Fear begins, with a perusal of Fort Fisher's secular bible: Manarin's North Carolina Troop Roster, 1861-1865, Vol. I, Artillery. Under Richardson's name, his titillating entry as Lieutenant-Colonel reads, "Transferred from 2nd Company I of this regiment upon election as Lieutenant-Colonel May 14, 1862. Dismissed by General Court Martial November 17, 1863. Dropped from rolls January 23, 1864." Unfortunately, though Richardson's inexplicable court martial might be unique, it does not appear immediately damning; after all, Lamb took command of Fort Fisher in July '62 and Richardson was not court-martialed until November '63, almost a year and a half later.

Further convoluting the issue is Lamb's history of the 36th found in Clark's North Carolina Regiments 1861-1865. Assuming the third person, he wrote, "Colonel Lamb remained at Fort St. Phillip, Old Brunswick until 4 July 1862 when he relieved Major John J. Hedrick in command of Fort Fisher and defenses of Confederate Point, including Zeek's Island." This pronouncement beggars the question, if a Lt. Col. (Richardson) was present, why would a Major (Hedrick) be in command? At this point Richardson all but vanished for another five years. In fact, under closer scrutiny, the reluctant Lt. Col. is barely visible throughout his tenure. In September 1862, as commandant of Fort St. Phillip, he wrote a letter of complaint to Governor Vance concerning regimental organization. Then, there is Lamb's succinct explanation for John D. Taylor's promotion and his (Taylor's) superseding Richardson as Lt. Col., "January 23, 1864 Major Taylor was promoted to Lt. Col. In place of Richardson dropped." Little else appears; he is not even mentioned in the Official Records. In post war years, Lamb wrote several histories extolling the exploits of comrades and acquaintances associated with his old command, but nary a word about Richardson. The silence is deafening.

Evidently there was a rift between the Colonel and his Lieutenant, but what was the bone of contention? Like Lamb, Richardson was an attorney, though nine years older; and unlike Lamb, he was a North Carolinian, as were most of the troops and company commanders of the regiment. However, when Major Lamb arrived in Wilmington in October 1861, on the staff of fellow Virginian General Joseph Reid Anderson, he already ranked Captain Richardson. In May 1862, just prior to the regimental elections, Lamb's adjutant, Lt. Thomas Rowland (though born in Michigan, he was raised in Virginia), wrote his mother that his good friend Captain George Parker was to be Lamb's Lieutenant Colonel. Rowland was a talented engineer, a West Pointer and eventually promoted and rotated to another theater of war. Obviously Lamb thought something of the young man, Fort Fisher's Battery Rowland was almost certainly named in his honor and as late as November 1864, his old Colonel remembered him with a gift box of wine and oranges. But where did Rowland get the impression that Parker was to be promoted to the Lieutenant-Colonelcy? Parker was not a Virginian, though he was a graduate of Virginia Military Institute and had relations in Lamb's home town of Norfolk. And while Parker would never be the Lt. Col., he did ultimately assume Rowland's vacated position as adjutant. Could it be that Richardson was a victim of the Old Dominion clique?

For the longest time, it seemed that history had successfully ostracized Richardson. Then about a year and a half ago, several new pieces of the puzzle appeared and helped to flesh out the reluctant Lt. Col. considerably. First, Mr. Chad Johnson, a Fort Fisher employee, UNCW graduate student and Lower Cape Fear Civil War enthusiast acquired a compilation of Richardson's Registers, Returns and Rolls from the National Archives. Two of the documents are compelling: One, a Field and Staff Muster Roll for July and August 1862, dated 31 August reads, "Transferred to Fort Fisher per Special Order No. 345 from District Hd. Qr. Date July 3rd." The other, a Return dated July 1862 reads, "Transferred to Fort St. Phillip July 6, 1862 by order of Brig. Gen. French." Clearly these papers place Richardson at Fort Fisher on 4 July 1862 and almost as important, show him leaving soon after. And while the Return does not indict him for drunkenness, the information did make me a bit giddy!

Next, in January, 2003, an out-of-state researcher, whom I had assisted earlier, reciprocated, sending me a copy of Richardson's Service Record, again from the National Archives. It states in part, "Attempted to resign, letter in record, on 1-20-63 because he had not received his appointment and the Col. And Major had receiver theirs. There is an endorsement, apparently by Lee, that he knew of no reason why the appointment should be denied. Whiting made the appointment on 2-18-63. On 18 August 1864, Richardson wrote to the AIGO (Adjutant and Inspector General's Office) requesting a copy of his CM (Court Martial) transcript in order that he might defend himself. Unfortunately there is no information as to the General Order (number, department and the like) that published the court's findings. Once more, the records are devoid of detail or explanation; yet one can't help but feel that somebody (or bodies) just didn't like Richardson.

This sentiment was confirmed shortly thereafter when Mr. Bob Cooke, Fort Fisher employee (and Lower Cape Fear Civil War enthusiast) produced another letter from Richardson to Governor Vance, two news clippings and yes, a photograph! In the letter, dated 26 November 1863, one week after his court martial, Richardson requests permission to resign his position as well as an exemption from conscription. His excuse for the exemption being that he could not support his family on a private's pay of eleven dollars a month, nor could he afford to hire a substitute. Equally empathetic is his reason for resigning, which he gives as, "...the relation existing between myself and certain of the officers of the Reg't. to which I belong is unpleasant, as much so, indeed to render it exceedingly disagreeable to me to remain longer with the Reg't." In closing, Richardson assures the Governor that should his "Excellency" act favorably upon his request, "I promise to enter the ranks whenever the enemy attempts to attack us in the vicinity of Wilmington." Obviously unimpressed, Vance scribbled his laconic response on the back of the letter. "The Gov. Has no power to excuse him from conscription, ZV".

Less than three months later, Richardson submitted an advertisement to the Wilmington Journal that appeared on 8 February 1864. Apparently, he had been accused of skimming money from the soldiers' bounties. In retaliation, he denied the charges vehemently and offered a one thousand dollar reward to any man who would swear differently in a court of law. "This offer will stand good as long as I live....," he pledged. Was this accusation linked to his court martial, or was it part of the flotsam and jetsam of malicious gossip that followed in its' wake? Moreover, are the alcohol-related incident of 1862 and the court martial in 1863 unrelated issues? Once more, the Lt. Col. Is reluctant to say.

The last we hear of the former Lt. Col. During the war appears in the Journal on 16 January 1865. He was in Wilmington to relinquish five escaped Yankee prisoners that had been recaptured near Elizabeth Town. Ironically, Fort Fisher had fallen the day before and Colonel Lamb and most of the 36th were now prisoners of war. Could Richardson's auspicious appearance in Wilmington be attributed to his promise to the Governor that he would, "...enter the ranks whenever the enemy attempts to attack us in the vicinity..."? If so, he had arrived just a little too late. Perhaps for once, Richardson's reluctance had paid off.

Greg Biggs did show up in Wilmington to speak to our RT, perhaps to get away from 2+ inches of snow in Clarksville, Tn. Where he resides. He brought with him a thorough knowledge of military organization and tactics used by Napoleon's army. After giving an in-depth study of cavalry development in Europe (and some of the personalities involved) he turned to a true cavalry general who worked his unit in textbook fashion. Nathan Bedford Forrest, a self-taught cavalry strategist, who never attended West Point, nor did he have any other type of military training. Greg told us that Forrest carried out most of his raids by generally accepted cavalry tactics and was very thorough in carrying out his objectives. He gave the example of when Forrest tore up railroad tracks, they remained out for nearly eight weeks; compared to other areas where tracks were repaired within a week. Greg also pointed out that Forrest never received the promotion (to Major General) he deserved.

[Thanks to Wayne Carver for the report!]

Did Gen. Pat Cleburne Give His Boots?

The story has been told repeatedly...that Gen. P.R. Cleburne required a barefooted soldier to don his boots, and that he went to his death barefooted. Col. J.A. Watrous of the United States army, quotes a report of it as follows:

"General Cleburne died barefooted. While riding along his division from Spring Hill a few hours before the battle of Franklin, where he was killed, General Cleburne saw several soldiers trudging along with nothing on their feet. Coming to one who was leaving blood in each track, the General stopped, swung his right foot to the side of his left, and said, 'my man, take off my boots.' 'Why General?' 'Never mind why; take them off.' The private with bleeding feet obeyed his general's command reluctantly. 'Put them on; you need them more than I do,' said the division commander. 'And you go barefooted, General?' 'Do as I tell you, and at once, and catch up with your command.' General Pat Cleburne, of Cheatham's Corps, Hood's army, fought his division in his last battle barefooted and died, with his men, at the forefront of that awful battle of Franklin, where seven general officers were killed or wounded. It is said that General Cleburne had a premonition that he would be killed in that battle. [Confederate Veteran, 20:358, 1924]

Riding the Streetcars in Philadelphia- Ninety Years Before Rosa Parks

Last evening a colored man got into a Pine street passenger car, and refused all entreaties to leave the car, where his presence appeared not to be desired. The conductor of the car, fearful of being fined for ejecting him, as was done by the judges of one of our courts in a similar case, ran the car off the track, detached the horses and left the colored man all by himself. [He] still firmly maintained his position in the car, having spent the whole of the night there. The conductor looks upon [his] part...as a splendid piece of strategy. The matter creates quite a sensation...and crowds of sympathizers flock around the colored man.

[Herald of the Union, 26 May 1865]

FREDERICKSBURG-CHANCELLORSVILLE

In preparation for our spring trip, Mr. Ross St. George prepped us on the battles of Fredericksburg and Spotsylvania (mainly following Lane's Brigade). After detailing the history of the brigade, Mr. Ross led us to Mayre's Heights where 70,000 Confederates faced 120,000 Federals in a front that stretched seven miles in length. This battle he indicated, foreshadowed the gruesome struggles of the First World War. After early Union successes, in which Lane's Brigade was shattered by Yankees that had penetrated a gap in the Confederate lines, the day saw the Southerners deal a severe blow to the bluecoats, as division after division was sent in piecemeal to attack on a narrow front (Mr. George's maps were informative at this point). It was during this winter battle that a heavenly harbinger was offered to the Rebels: a very rare (and "spectacular") aurora borealis appeared in the evening skies. Many saw it as a sign from God that theirs was the just cause. After entering into winter quarters for the remainder of the year, the brigade would go on to fight at Chancellorsville in May 1863. It was here that Lee sent his strong "Right Arm" ("Stonewall" Jackson) in a flanking maneuver that routed the Union Army. As the combatants tried to establish their lines later that evening, a cavalry attack by Union troopers had left the 18th N.C. soldiers quite skittish. When General Jackson approached their skirmish line (from the enemy's direction), Major John D. Barry gave the order to open fire. Even though he would be promoted time and again, eventually attaining the rank of Brigadier General, it was this order, which would haunt young Barry for the remainder of his days (he would die in 1866). As for Lane's Brigade, they would suffer nearly one third in casualties at Chancellorsville, more at Gettysburg, more at the Wilderness, Petersburg and Ream's Station.

Civil War Preservation

For those of us who went on our spring trip to Virginia, the work of the Central Virginia Battlefield Trust was apparent. They have acquired land on all four-area battlefields (Fredericksburg, Wilderness, Chancellorsville, Spotsylvania) and are still actively seeking to preserve significant portions of the various battlefields. Several of the sites have been incorporated and compliment the holdings of the National Park Service. Yet another organization, the Civil War Preservation Trust, has taken on the mission of preserving endangered battlegrounds (including the purchase of 318 acres at Bentonville, N.C.) throughout several states. We visited the Mullins Farm on our tour, part of which saw major fighting on 1 May 1863; that farm is slated for development (or sale for 40 million dollars!) CWPT has this site on its most endangered list; also on their list is the New Bern battlefield, which is in danger from commercial development. In short we have to support such organizations in order to have something to pass on to future generations. Visit the Central Virginia Trust at their Website: www.cvbt.org. UPDATE... Member Wayne Carver has sent the following from the CVBT newsletter: CVBT preserves a portion of Jackson's flank attack at Chancellorsville. On May 2, 1863...three miles west of a crossroads called Chancellorsville, Stonewall Jackson launched a daring attack against Federal troops of the Union XI Corps. On February 23, 2004...the CVBT is positioned to save 16.37 acres of this hallowed ground, to preserve it forever. The physical setting is a portion of the Talley Farm ridge, just south of the old Orange Turnpike (State Route 3). The purchase price was $200,000.

CSS Hunley Update

17 April is here! This of course, is the date of the burial of the Hunley crew in Magnolia Cemetery, Charleston. According to The Civil War News (April 2004) scientists are now studying the remains of the eight crewmen; their ages and health problems have been discovered. The bones of Lt. George Dixon have been identified. Confederate records at the National Archives are woefully inadequate, but one of the Hunley team researchers (Linda Abrams) has had experience in identifying POW/MIA remains and has contacted probable ancestors of the original crew, for DNA comparison. As the News reported, "Although the eight men will be laid to rest after 136 years submerged in the H.L. Hunley, the work in uncovering the secrets of their life and death will continue." There will be a series of events taking place before the burial. Monday (12 April) the remains will lie in state aboard the USS Yorktown and there will be a memorial service the following evening (13 April). There will also be talks by the team members who are reconstructing the crewmen's facial features and personal histories. The day of the funeral, fifty cannon will fire a salute and the procession is set to start at 10:30 a.m. The burial will most likely be the last Confederate burial of the Civil War.

WHY ARE THESE PEOPLE SMILING?

BECAUSE THEY ARE ON OUR RT's SPRING TRIP!

A Chicken Couldn't Live on This Field After We Open Fire!
(E. Porter Alexander after viewing Mayre's Heights and his gun positions)

Our spring trip was highly successful! Nearly two dozen members and guests assembled at the Wingate Inn for a weekend tour of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. A few stalwarts even reported in early so as to reconnoiter the other battlefield sites on the way! (Dan Geddie reported that Pamplin Park was a must-see for Civil War Buffs.) Promptly at eight a.m. we boarded our tour bus along with Ms. Elsa Martinez of the National Park Service. Fredericksburg: Where Lee's army of 78,000 faced 120,000 Union soldiers. Our first stop was at Chatham, which sits on atop Stafford Heights, across the Rappahannock from Fredericksburg. The house was used as Union headquarters as well as a hospital during the battle on 13 December 1862 and there are still at least three Federals known to be buried somewhere on the grounds; the home was visited by Abraham Lincoln, Walt Whitman and Clara Barton. From there it was on to the scenes of the battle: first to one of three pontoon crossing made by Burnside's troops, a crossing which was long delayed and had terrible consequences for the Northern regiments (it is believed that Captain Augustus Perkins of the 50th N.Y. Engineers was the first man killed in the battle).

Our excellent tour guide informed us that there were 25 N.C. regiments at this battle; only Virginia contributed more (26 regiments). After viewing a film at the Visitor's Center, which gave an overview of the major battles soon to be fought in the years ahead (Chancellorsville, The Wilderness and Spotsylvania) we were soon whisked to the sites that Ross St. George had briefed us about in February. We were surprised while on a tour of old Fredericksburg when we stopped in at the Baptist Church to hear a talk by John Hennessy, Chief Historian for the Fredericksburg/Spotsylvania National Military Park; Mr. Hennessy spoke of civilian life during the war in Fredericksburg. After leaving the Baptist Church we walked through town (observing two solid-shot cannonballs firmly embedded in a column of the Presbyterian Church!) and wound up at the River. From our vantage point we were shown the boyhood home of George Washington ("Ferry Farm") and the site of a pontoon crossing by the Union army. There were still many sites to see, Mayre's Heights, the Sunken Road and Prospect Hill, (where the Union army came closest to victory).

It was the battle in which the "Gallant" John Pelham enhanced his reputation when, with two guns he enfiladed the Union left flank, moving his guns to prevent enemy gunners from finding his range; it was the battle that saw Thomas Meagher's Irish Brigade assault across a canal and open fields before dying before Mayre's Heights. It was the battle that saw 19 year-old Richard Kirkland, the "Angel of Mercy" succor the distressed wounded; he would later be killed at Chickamauga. After this debacle, one Northern officer said, "The slaughter is terrible- the results disastrous. Until we have good generals it is useless to fight battles." We visited the National Cemetery, a 12-acre site located on Mayre's Heights, where more than 15,000 Federal soldiers are interred; over 85 per cent are unknowns.

After a full day of looking, pondering and asking questions (all of which were answered by our able guide) we took supper at Smythe's Tavern, a Civil War era cottage (built in 1835). After supper, member Bob Cooke gave a short talk on Union cavalryman Dan Underhill, who wrote home about the battle of Fredericksburg and although we did not encounter any of the resident ghosts, we did recognize the Union general hanging upside down in the bar!

In the morning it was time to finish with Fredericksburg and continue on to the next phase of the four major battles which would be fought in this area. Chancellorsville was but a short ride away and on the way the heavily wooded area known as the Wilderness was pointed out to us. General Robert E. Lee followed up his success at Fredericksburg with what many have termed his greatest victory of the Civil War- Chancellorsville. It was also the place where Thomas Jackson was wounded, putting an end to Lee's dependable "right arm." The new commander of the Union army, "Fighting Joe" Hooker attempted to trap Lee in a pincer movement. Leaving 40,000 men in front of Fredericksburg, he slipped off to the west with 90,000 men. After crossing the Rappahannock, "Fighting Joe" (whose name we were told, came not from his military prowess, but rather from the Washington, D.C. barroom fights he squelched as Provost Marshall!) sent his men along the Orange Turnpike where Confederates under General Lafayette McLaws struck them. Hooker immediately pulled back in a tight defensive position with his back to the river. Our bus halted at the spot where Lee and Jackson held their last meeting, which became known as the "cracker-box conference." The stage was set for Stonewall Jackson's famous 12-mile march and attack on Hooker's flank. Union forces, quickly routed, fell back in disorder. The Confederate line, also disorganized, needed to be reformed and later that evening as Jackson rode back from a scout along the Mountain Road, his own men shot him. We were informed that the present-day marker (behind the Visitor's Center) denoting the site of Jackson's wounding is actually in the wrong spot. It should be along the traces of Mountain Road, on the other side of the Center! The battle continued for three more days with Lee driving Hooker back across the Rappahannock. As our tour returned, we passed through hallowed ground that is being developed at a furious pace. Salem Church, the site of major fighting, is still there, but is very close to malls and business establishments. The Church itself is in need of major work to be preserved. Several members discussed the possibility of chapter II-next year on to The Wilderness and Spotsylvania!

USS PETERHOFF AND UNC-W'S CIVIL WAR CANNON

BY David Norris

Quietly sunning itself on a grassy lawn on the campus of UNC-Wilmington lays a very large souvenir of the Civil War- a 30-pounder Parrot rifle. The Parrot rifle was once part of the armament of the USS Peterhoff, a captured blockade-runner assigned to the U.S. Navy's North Atlantic Blockading Squadron.

The Peterhoff was a British-built, iron-hulled sidewheel steamer. She left Falmouth, England on January 27, 1863, bound for Matamoros, Mexico by way of St. Thomas, Danish Virgin Islands. On February 20, the USS Alabama halted the Peterhoff just off the Danish island of St. John's by firing first a blank cartridge, then a shotted gun fired across her bow. Although the Peterhoff was flying the British flag, and was well within Danish waters, they were searched by a Union boarding party. The Federal sailors found nothing wrong and let the ship proceed to St. Thomas.

Also in the harbor at St. Thomas were two U.S. Navy ships, commanded by Acting Rear Admiral Charles Wilkes, who had gained notoriety for his seizure of the British mail steamer Trent in December 1861. (Wilkes removed two Confederate diplomats on their way to Europe; the seizure of the Trent angered the British so much that there was a chance of war breaking out over the "Trent Affair" before cooler heads defused the situation.) In 1863, Wilkes was no less aggressive in searching out potential blockade breakers. As the Peterhoff left St. Thomas on February 25, signals flew between Wilkes and the USS Vanderbilt offshore. The Vanderbilt ordered the Peterhoff to heave to, and another boarding party examined her papers, which stated that the steamer was bound for Matamoros. However, a sailor aboard the Peterhoff told the boarding party that they were really headed for Brownsville, Texas (a port just across the Rio Grande from Matamoros.)

The sailor's testimony was taken as proof that the Peterhoff was intended to run the blockade into Texas, and the ship was seized and sent to Key West, Florida. The incident angered both Denmark and Great Britain, the latter particularly because the Peterhoff was carrying British mail. The Times of London believed that the prize court would quickly release the vessel after such "discreditable proceedings", but the court condemned the ship, which was purchased by the Union Navy. Without a change of name, the prize was transferred to the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron to watch the approaches to the Cape Fear River.

At 5 a.m. on March 6 1864, the USS Monticello was steaming to Beaufort for coal when they spotted a strange steamer in the dim predawn light. The Monticello's officer of the watch, Acting Ensign Joseph Hadfield, believed that they had seen a blockade-runner and set a course to challenge the potential prize. Unfortunately, the Monticello was steaming closer in to shore than they should have been, and they were blundering into the inner line of blockaders watching the approaches to the Cape Fear at New Inlet. Hadfield thought he was closing in on a blockade-runner at anchor, but instead he was dead-set on a collision course with the blockader Peterhoff.

At 5:10 p.m., the Monticello plowed into the Peterhoff, striking her amidships. The Monticello was little damaged, but the Peterhoff sank in five fathoms of water within half an hour. All of her crew was saved, although they lost practically all of their possessions. One hundred and twenty officers and men were packed onto the USS Florida until other billets could be found for them. The Peterhoff's paymaster, Josiah F. Dunham, told the Florida's paymaster and diarist William Frederick Keeler that he had just joined the navy, and thought he'd had "a pretty hard start."

After dusk on the night of March 7, several boats were sent from the blockaders Mount Vernon and Nippon to destroy as much of the Peterhoff as they could, to keep the Confederates from salvaging anything useful. The Union tars found themselves on a dangerous assignment. In the darkness with a "considerable sea rolling over the wreck," they could only work on the forecandle and quarterdeck, and even these were slightly awash even at low tide. They worried about the garrison of Fort Fisher, as there were a considerable amount of signal lights and fires burning busily on the shore all night. The Confederates never fired at the wrecking party. The Yankees cut down the masts and chopped up the rigging. The guns that they could reach, a 30-pounder Parrot rifle on the forecandle and a boat howitzer on the quarterdeck, were spiked and dumped overboard. Just after midnight, the work was done and the boats returned to their ships with some salvaged sails and rigging.

Famed naval raider Lt. William B. Cushing commanded the Monticello at the time of the wreck. Inquiries placed the blame squarely on Hadfield's "inefficiency and carelessness," but he was still on board the Monticello with Cushing in September. On the night of July 15, 1864, the USS Cherokee slammed into the wreck of the Peterhoff. The impact awakened most of the crew, but no serious damage was done. After the war, the United States Supreme Court overturned the prize court's decision regarding the Peterhoff, on the grounds that the sailor's testimony should not have invalidated the ship's papers, which were in order. After this rare reversal of a prize court ruling, the owners were reimbursed for their loss.

Acting Ensign H.S. Borden of the Nippon notified his superiors that the guns on the main deck of the Peterhoff "might be taken off, provided there was a suitable vessel for the purpose, if tended to immediately." Borden's advice went unheeded until 1974. In that year, the 4.2-inch, 30-pounder Parrot rifle was raised by a joint effort of the North Carolina Division of Archives and History and UNC-Wilmington. Although on display on the UNC-Wilmington campus, the gun is on loan from the United States Navy, because it is still owned by that agency. The Visitors' Center at Fort Fisher and the Carteret County Museum of History at Morehead City also have guns from the Peterhoff on display.

[Editor's Note: The Peterhoff has yet another Wilmington connection. In 1862, Simon B. Kahnweiler, a German-born Wilmingtonian merchant ran the blockade and traveled to England and Europe to purchase supplies for the Confederacy. In a business partnership with Wilmington's Mayor, O.G. Parsley, Kahnweiler chartered the Peterhoff for that vessel's first try at running the blockade. She reached the Islands safely and discharged her cargo and returned to England. She was captured on her second run through the blockade and as a U.S. Navy man-of-war, was equipped with seven guns, was sent to the Cape Fear area where, less than a month later she was accidentally sunk. As for Simon, he remained abroad until after the war; it was later said that he made and lost a fortune during that conflict!]

Lest We Forget

That is the theme for the Fredericksburg Area Civil War Weekend (May 27-31, 2004). There will be presentations, exhibits, encampments, walking and living history tours. The weekend will conclude with a Memorial Day Procession and a "Picnic with the POPS!" In all, it is a continuation of our spring trip! Answer to the question on page one: (Plus a little Presidential humor!) The six men who served as Union officers during the Civil War and later became President were: U.S. Grant (we know everyone got him!) Grant served two terms as President, from 1869 to 1877. It was Grant who said, "I know only two tunes; one of them is 'Yankee Doodle' and the other isn't."

Rutherford Birchard Hayes (1877-1881) enlisted as Major of the 23rd Ohio and rose to the rank of brevet major general. Hayes was severely wounded at South Mountain but continued in the war; he was at 3rd Winchester, Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek. Later, as President, Hayes wrote to his wife, "The Boston Post says 'Mr. Hayes will, during the absence of Mrs. Hayes, be acting President.'"

James Abram Garfield (1881) who said, "A pound of pluck is worth a ton of luck," was appointed Lieutenant Colonel of the 42nd Ohio and came out of the war as a major general. He survived the battles of Shiloh, Corinth, Chattanooga and Chickamauga only to be assassinated four months into his Presidency.

Chester Alan Arthur (1881-1885) assumed the mantle upon the death of James Garfield. He had served as Quartermaster General for New York State.

Benjamin Harrison enlisted as a second lieutenant in the 70th Indiana and left the army as brevet brigadier general. It was said that "within a month he fought more battles [as part of Sherman's army] than his grandfather [William Henry Harrison, also President] saw in a lifetime." At a veteran's reunion in 1890 he said, "I cannot recall the names of all of you. You recognize me because there were not so many colonels as there were soldiers- fortunately, perhaps for the country."

William McKinley (1897-1901) also felled by an assassin's bullet, enlisted as a private at the age of eighteen in the 23rd Ohio (do you see a pattern here?) He saw action at South Mountain and Sheridan's Valley Campaign; while under fire at Antietam, he "performed a minor exploit" by taking a wagon full of hot food to the troops; he was soon promoted and was on Hayes' staff. McKinley left the army with the rank of major. As President, he once commented on the state of military affairs, "The Spanish fleet is in Cuban waters and we haven't enough ammunition to fire a salute."

All were Republicans and it is readily apparent that after the war, veterans dominated the nation's highest office, with the exception of Democrat Grover Cleveland's two terms (1885-1889, 1893-1897). This was an indication of the political power of the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR); however, by the turn of the century, the organization's political clout had diminished.

Another Presidential Visit?

We neglected to notice in our issue of yesterday the arrival in our city of Brig. Gen. Harrison, of Indiana, who is on his way to Gen. Sherman's army. He is stopping at Bailey's hotel. We understand he expects to leave, in company with Gen. Prince, for the front to-day. [Herald of the Union, 15 April 1865]

One more U.S. Grant story! When a son was born to Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Grant on April 27, 1822, they were faced with an important decision; what to name their child. It was decided that the family should be consulted in the matter, so a month after the child's birth, Jesse Grant hitched up his horse and wagon and took his family on the ten mile trip to visit the baby's grandparents. When they arrived, they were greeted by not only the grandparents, but also two of the baby's aunts. Everyone knew the purpose of the visit, and they had each chosen a name they thought would be appropriate, but when the time came for them to voice their opinions, each had chosen a different name. After some discussion, a compromise was reached whereby the name would be chosen by ballot. The favorite name of each relative would be written down on a piece of paper and then deposited in a hat. One of the aunts drew a name from the hat and it was announced that the child's name would henceforth be Ulysses. His grandfather so liked the name Hiram that he was displeased with the decision by ballot, and in the end Jesse and his wife consented that it would be part of his name as well. Forty-six years later, Ulysses Grant would once more become involved with the system of casting ballots with his name on them. This time it was not for a name, it was for the office of president of the United States. [Campfires and Campaigns of the Civil War]

This ends our history lesson for this month!

Hang Down Your Head, Tom Dooley.

At our last meeting someone mentioned that a private by the name of Tom Dula was present (at Sugar Loaf) during the battles for Fort Fisher. Indeed, young Tom Dula, born in Wilkes County, N.C., enlisted on 15 March 1862 at 17 years of age and was a member of Company "K," 42nd N.C.T. (Kirkland's Brigade). After two years in the ranks as a private, he was "rated as 'Drummer,'" and the records indicate that he was hospitalized at Williamsburg, Va. on 10 August 1864 and was captured at Wise's Forks. Sent to Point Lookout, Md. he was released on 11 June 1865. The records are quite stark when it comes to young Dula; he returned to Wilkes County and took up with a married woman, Ann Melton (with whom he had an affair before the war). Eventually he lived with yet another young lady, Laura Foster, by whom he contracted syphilis, which he gave to Ann (the song didn't mention any of this!) In May 1866, Laura was last seen riding her father's horse and when asked by a neighbor where she was going, she replied that she was off to meet Dula. The horse returned home, riderless. Several days later, her body was found and it was determined she had been murdered and had been pregnant. A search was begun for Tom and he was found and arrested in Tennessee. Although convicted, he appealed. The North Carolina Supreme Court reversed the conviction; he was retried and again found guilty. After several delays, he was hung in Statesville on 1 May 1868. Even before he died, there was a ballad being sung about Tom, but it would take the Kingston Trio to make Tom Dula's plight known nationally.

Humors of the March

When a company of Home Guards on the Mississippi River had fired upon a gunboat the boat acknowledged by opening on them with shell. The guards immediately got down close to the ground, and one of them said, "Boys, if I ain't flat enough won't one of you please get on me and mash me flatter?"

In the [spring of 1863]...we engaged in a lively little skirmish with Grierson's Federal cavalry. At first they gave way before us in a very satisfactory manner, but being reinforced they sent our boys back...after the latest improved double quick style. A red-headed corporal...dashed by me, and as he halted exclaimed, "Well, Captain, we made one of 'em holler." "What did he say, Tom?" the Captain inquired. Tom looked up, squinted his gray eyes and replied, "He said, 'Forward, skirmishers.'" "

Last To Smoke the Peace Pipe

The surrender of Robert E. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia on April 9, 1865 signaled the end of the contest for the Confederacy. Without hope of victory, the other Southern leaders gradually followed his example and surrendered their forces. One Confederate general was in no hurry to go off the war path, as it were. That man was Stand Watie, a chief of the Cherokee Nation, who finally surrendered on June 23rd, the last general officer of the Confederacy to do so.

Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville Battlefield Tour

Our trip will be on March 20th - 21st and will cover two of Lee's greatest triumphs. We suggest arriving at the hotel on Friday (March 19th) as the tour will commence at 8 a.m. on Saturday. Please remit the $150 cost by 19 February and remember that the special room rate is available ($75, at the Wingate Inn, 800-228-1000) only until that date also. Supper on Saturday night will be at Smythe's Tavern in Fredericksburg. The tour will continue Sunday morning when we wind up our visit to the Chancellorsville battleground.

Another reminder! Our final meeting for the season will be (Thursday) 13 May at the Cape Fear Club. The speaker will be Gordon Rhea, one of the best-known author and speaker "on the circuit." Too Bad To Die!

Gen. Basil Duke, who was with his brother-in-law, Gen. John Morgan, the Confederate raider, in most of his operations and who became commander of Morgan's cavalry after the death of Morgan, told this story at a Confederate reunion at home town, Louisville, a short time before his death:

During one of the Tennessee campaigns Morgan's men surprised and routed a regiment of Federal troopers. In the midst of the retreat one of the enemy, who was mounted upon a big bay horse, suddenly turned and charged the victorious Confederates full tilt, waving his arm and shrieking like mad as he bore down upon them alone. Respecting such marvelous courage, the Confederates forebore shooting at the approaching foe, but when he was right upon them they saw there was a different reason for his fool-hardiness.

He was a green recruit. His horse had run away with him- the bit had broken, and, scared stiff, the luckless youth was being carried straight at the whooping Kentuckians. Jeff Sterritt, a noted wit of the command, stopped the horse and made a prisoner of the rider. Sterritt, who had not washed or shaved for days and was a ferocious looking person, pulled out a big pistol and wagged its muzzle in the terrified Federal's face. "I don't know whether to kill you right now," he said, "or wait until the fight is over!" "Mister," begged the quivering captive, "as a favor, please don't do it at all! I'm a bad character- I ain't prepared to die!"

[Confederate Veteran, 1925]

Our December speaker, Mr. Chad Johnson gave us an excellent discourse on Fort Caswell in war and peace. Beginning with the statement that the Fort Caswell of today looks nothing like the fort did during the Civil War. The Confederates in the Cape Fear area "watched and reacted" to what was happening in other parts of the Confederacy. So when they saw what happened to Forts Sumter and Pulaski, they quickly covered the brick masonry walls of Fort Caswell with layers of sand. Fort Caswell is unique in that it was first taken early in 1861, by the Cape Fear Minute Men, pro-secessionists, only to be given back to the Federal government when so ordered by the Governor of North Carolina. After Fort Sumter was fired upon, the forts were again taken, this time to be held "against all comers." The fort was strengthened by reinforcing the casemates with railroad iron, heavy guns (one of the state-of-the-art 150 pound Armstrong guns was emplaced at the fort) and garrisoned with troops.

Boring duty was interlaced with exciting gun duels with U.S. blockaders, but there was time for hunting and fishing and watching moon rises over the Atlantic! The only time the fort was really in danger was late in 1862 when an Federal attack was thought to be imminent. Interestingly, Sergeant James Reilly, the Ordnance Sergeant who initially surrendered the fort, joined the Southern cause and was in command at Fort Fisher (after the wounding of Colonel Lamb) upon that fort's surrender! In Mr. Johnson's words, it could be said that the war began and (was nearly) ended with Reilly's surrenders! After the war, the fort fell into disrepair and became a popular place to picnic. At the present time, it is one of the few forts in American history that is privately owned!

Civil War Preservation

For some time we have mentioned various local Civil War projects that need assistance of one kind or another (see the bottom of page 4). There are new battles being fought in Virginia and elsewhere as development encroaches on Civil War battlefields. There are sites here in North Carolina and around Wilmington as well that could use some attention. We will be assembling soon (probably in January) at Forks Road to clean up that location once again (mainly underbrush that has grown up). Fort Anderson requires a bit more work; there are several unrestored gun batteries that need attention (and wouldn't it be neat to have a gun or two in a battery?) Fort Fisher will be requiring help for the Armstrong gun which will be on loan from West Point, next year volunteers will be needed to help with the 140th anniversary ceremonies. Veteran's graves at Oakdale Cemetery could use a cleanup also, several groups take part in cleaning them up, if you would like to volunteer for any of these activities, contact them at the numbers below.

Dr. Livingstone's Appeal for His Son.

Dr. Livingstone, the African traveler, is at present in considerable anxiety respecting his eldest son, who was kidnapped in an American port, on board the vessel in which he was serving, by some of those unprincipled agents for procuring substitutes of whom we have heard. He enlisted in the Third New Hampshire Volunteers. He is known to have been present at the skirmish before Richmond on October 7, 1864, but from that time all trace of him is lost, and every mode of sending letters to him has been tried in vain. He is believed to have been made prisoner by the Confederates. It is hoped that if the American papers would give circulation to the above facts the son may be able to send notice through the Southern journals of his present condition and place of abode to his father before he sets out once more for the interior of Africa. [From The Herald of the Union, 4 April 1865.]

Sheathed in Mystery

(Part II of II)

The removal of Louis B. Froelich's Sword Factory or Armory from Wilmington to Kenansville in 1863 may have had root in several factors. First, a fire in February 1863 nearly destroyed his Wilmington operation; secondly, although the yellow fever epidemic had passed, Wilmington was very much a target of the Federals (Froelich had purchased property in Kenansville as early as October 1862, probably to remove his family to safety); lastly, fuel (wood and coal) was becoming very hard to get in Wilmington. By March (1863) he was again ready to begin production at a 2 ½ acre site just south of Kenansville. Located at the crossroads of the Warsaw and Wilmington roads it was within a short wagon trip from the Wilmington and Weldon railroad.

A CARD

Formerly Foreman at the so called Confederate Arms Fab-ricatory.
Dec. 1st, 1861

When the firm moved from Wilmington, competitors moved in!

There were at least two individuals fabricating swords in town;

as Steinmetz was the foreman at Wilmington, it is likely he was fired by Froelich!

It wasn't always arms that Froelich produced: in April of that year, he sold two brass kettles to an army quartermaster for the use of the medical department; the foundry also turned out horseshoes and agricultural implements. Also that month he contracted to provide 550 sets of infantry accoutrements, consisting of cartridge and cap box, belt and bayonet scabbard. The first installment of 150 sets (at $13 per set) was to be delivered on 1 June, and "thereafter at the rate of 50 sets every two weeks," with payment made with one-third in Confederate bonds and two-thirds in cash. Also included in the agreement was the buyer's option of canceling the order, "in the event of an armistice or public notice of peace." It was not peace, however, that canceled the order! On 4 July, Union cavalry from New Bern raided Kenansville and burned down the factory. Union reports said:

The Confederates had established an armory and a saddle manufactory at that place, both were destroyed, burning the former with a large number of sabers, saber bayonets, knives, and all kinds of arms of that description, a large and splendid engine and boiler...all the tools, saddles and all the stock[.]

Swords of Froelich manufacture. (From Albaugh's Confederate Edged Weapons)

Still undaunted, Froelich rebuilt the factory and was again in business after the raid. The raid certainly set back not only production, but profits as well. Early in January, 1864, strapped for cash, he entered into a partnership with Jacob Henry Nicholas Cornehlson. Jacob, who with his brother Christian, ran a "Billiard Parlor and Saloon" in Wilmington, paid nearly $30,000 to gain equal rights in the company. The last known correspondence between Froelich and Confederate authorities took place in June, 1864 and concerned a shipment of knapsacks to Richmond.

After the war, Froelich remained in Kenansville and involved himself in agriculture. In 1866, several prominent citizens of Kenansville met at his home to discuss the possibility of the large-scale production of wine. He proposed establishing a cooperative and hoped that several hundred acres could be brought under cultivation. It would appear that no consensus was reached, but Louis went into the wine business. In November 1869, he exhibited many of his farming products at the Cape Fear Agricultural Society Fair. Listed in the 1870 census as a "horticulturalist," he proudly displayed his scuppernong wine (and was especially proud of his "Sparkling Burgunda") and also showed off his shell and butterfly collection. Louis sold his wine commercially; in 1872 he brought suit for $184 against the Southern Express Company for failing to deliver a barrel of wine to Hartford, Connecticut. He was awarded $187, but the company appealed the decision because Froelich had sued in the wrong court. Learning that the court that he sued in only handled cases of losses over $200, he promptly increased the wine's value to $250! Upon appeal in the States' Supreme Court, Froelich lost.

The house that Froelich lived in while in Duplin County still stands (although not in its original location) and one write has stated:

Some citizens in Kenansville remember seeing an old photograph of the house that could have been made in the 1860s. They described seeing a fence along the front and sides of the house. This fence was different. It was made of dozens of sabers evenly spaced and partially thrust into the ground creating a fence made totally of Froelich's swords.

After the war, still in debt, Louis began to be hounded by creditors. Transferring ownership of his home to his wife only a few months before creditors took his other properties, it may well be that he was trying to escape debt by moving out of Kenansville. Sometime after 1872, he moved to Enfield in Halifax County and it was there, in 1873, at the age of 56, that he died from consumption. The Wilmington Morning Star wrote, "he was among the most useful men of his day and generation." A historical marker denotes the Kenansville site, it was at the junction of highways N.C. 11 and N.C. 24/50. Although crude by 19th century standards, an identified Froelich staff officer's sword today, with scabbard, commands anywhere from ten to thirteen thousand dollars (depending on condition). A Foot Officer's sword (with the CSA lettering on the guard) can bring from 15 to 20 thousand dollars. The high prices are due to their rarity and of course, its Confederate origins. There are still several Froelich swords in existence, some are in the N.C. Museum of History at Raleigh, but at least one is still in Kenansville. The sword of Colonel Thomas Kenan, on display at Liberty Hall in Duplin County, is of Froelich manufacture. Yet another may have achieved fame as the sword that was broken in two at Appomattox (no, it was not turned into a plowshare!)

State Historical Marker (Kenansville, N.C.)

Note: In Kenansville, commercial development threatens what remains of the Froelich site, but there is a movement on to save the property. Mr. Franklin Fussell is responsible for having the site added to the "North Carolina Civil War Trails." His non-profit CSA Sword Factory Foundation, Inc. seeks the purchase of the remaining 1½ acres. To help, you can buy a raffle ticket and possibly win a reproduction Froelich Officer's Sword. Fort Caswell

Our speaker for December is Chad Johnson, probably the area's foremost expert on Fort Caswell during the Civil War. Mr. Johnson, a recent graduate of UNCW, (where he studied Civil War History under Dr. C.E. Fonvielle) wrote his thesis on the subject. Chad, who will be attending graduate school in August, was the Mary Holloway Seasonal Interpreter at Fort Fisher for two years and gave guided tours and served as a temporary Site Assistant. He is originally from Clinton, N.C. but has lived in Wilmington for several years.

Raffle Winners: Richmond Raid, Mary Royal; bottle of maple syrup, John Krohn; While Cannons Roared, Bill Hacker; Gettysburg, Ed Russ; Piedmont Soldiers, Steve Gunter; Civil War: North, Ed Russ. Winner of the 50/50 drawing, Mary Royal ($18).

Due to a scheduling conflict, we were unable to hear about women soldiers during the war, so how about a short story instead?

A Romance of the War.

In the summer of 1861, a young man enlisted in the 1st Regiment of Michigan Engineers and left for the field. He had previously formed an attachment to a young lady, named Margaret Green, and they were engaged to be married. During the summer of 1862, she suddenly disappeared and all the efforts of her parents to discover the whereabouts of their daughter were fruitless. A few days ago she returned. She enlisted in the same regiment with her lover, shared the trials of the battle field with him, and when he was taken sick nursed him in the hospital, when her sex was discovered, and he made her folks acquainted with the facts. He has since been discharged from the regiment, and the couple united in Marriage. - Yankee Paper. [From the (Salisbury, N.C.) Carolina Watchman, 19 December 1864.]

[From The Civil War News, December 2003]

John David Smith was the guest speaker at our November meeting; his subject was the role that African-American soldiers played in the Union army during the war. Having grown up during the Civil Rights demonstrations of the 20th century, he was attracted to the similar struggles of the 19th century. He emphasized that those African-Americans, whether free black or slave, understood that by bearing arms they had reached a "watershed" in their history in this country. Over 178,000 men (most from the 11 Confederate States) served in the Union army. Although much of the time these men were pulling garrison duty, either guarding supply lines or prison camps, they faced 449 engagements and sixteen of them were awarded the Medal of Honor. They faced more than Southern lead however; poorly trained, armed with antiquated weapons, the men also endured discrimination from white troops. They were paid less, received poor medical care (in segregated hospitals) and if captured, faced enslavement (their officers faced death).

Regardless of the risks, they fought. The costliest battle they were in was the Battle of the Crater, where they lost 1,327 killed, wounded or missing. The second was Olustee, Florida, 626 casualties. In April 1864, when Nathan Bedford Forrest captured Fort Pillow, Tennessee (a Union supply depot manned by about 550 troops, half of which were blacks) the black flag was raised and no prisoners were taken. Confederates maintained that the retreating Federals kept firing at them, while Union survivors claimed that many were shot or bayoneted after they had surrendered. After his talk, the lively questions and discussions from the audience kept Doctor Smith on the pulpit for nearly as long as his talk!

Another Misfortune.

We regret to learn that last night, about 12 o'clock, a distinguished personage while attempting to run the blockade was captured off this port. He came from the hyperborean regions of Russia, fresh from her snow-capped hills on a special mission to the juvenile portion of the Confederacy, literally laden with "sweets", and is represented to be a man about sixty years of age, of a most cheerful and benevolent countenance unwrinkled by time, tho'

His head was silvered o'er with age,
And long experience made him sage.

He purposed traveling through the Confederacy in his own conveyance, consisting of a magnificent sleigh lined with sable, and liveried by eight well-matched tiny Reindeer, covered with bells which jingled sweetly in tune to the music of the "bonnie blue flag." He brought over several capacious boxes packed in Paris, filled with the most delicate bon-bons, figs from Smyrna, and dates from Circassia and Afghanistan; lots of toys and curiosities, to say nothing of innumerable dolls intended for good little girls; rocking horses and velocipedes for obedient boys. Unfortunately this welcome visitor, who has shed so much joy and happiness on the surrounding country and expectant friends, fell into the hands of certain harpies cruising off our coast, and he was immediately and "sans ceremonie" gobbled up and sent to New York to await confiscation, condemnation, and a division of prize money. The name of this distinguished captive is St. Nickolas, commonly called "Santa Claus" and the above narrative will doubtless account for many empty stockings, that will hang around our desolate hearths this morning.

[Note: Santa Claus did not live at the North Pole until after the Civil War. Cartoonist Thomas Nast, whose drawings shaped the modern-day image of Santa Claus, made Santa a citizen of the North Pole so that no country could use him for propaganda purposes, as both sides had during the Civil War.]

And to all a very Merry Christmas!

Sheathed in Mystery!

(Part I of II)

Louis Froelich had to be thoroughly dejected. A fire had swept through his workshops and destroyed several buildings. Looking at the ruins, located at the southern end of the town of Wilmington, surely he thought that all his work was for naught. Just who was this man who would become known as the "Swordmaker for the Confederacy?" Even the pronunciation of his name is something of a mystery. Correctly pronounced "Fray-lee," but more often pronounced just as it reads (Fro-lick) he first emigrated from Bavaria to England, where it was said, he worked on the steamship Great Eastern, as a steam engine mechanic. After a stop in New York, by 1861 he was in Wilmington.

With the outbreak of war, Wilmington boomed as a manufacturing center, providing many of the military goods required by the new enlistees. One of those companies was Loeb and Swarzman's "N.C. Button Manufactory," which, "under the direction of Mr. Louis Froelich, a thoroughly educated and scientific mechanic" turned out uniform buttons as well as brass patterns for cannon balls. Towards the end of that first year of war, Froelich entered into a partnership with yet another unknown, Mr. B. Estvan (sometimes spelled Eastvan.) Estvan, a one-time Hungarian fencing master from Richmond, Virginia, seems to have been something of a boaster, but together they formed the "C.S.A. Arms Factory." In September of 1861, they ran an ad looking to buy thousands of pounds of copper, brass, zinc, tin and "5,000 Hickory Lance Sticks, 8 feet long, 1 1/2 inches to taper to 1 inch." The operation was to be a fairly large one the same ad offered jobs for 6 Brass Moulders, 30 Brass Finishers, 5 Machinists and 20 Polishers. Boarding was sought as close to the factory's site as possible, for 100 workers.

By November 1861, the factory was almost ready to begin production. Their chief salesman was a Mr. Newhoff who apparently traveled around the South, selling their wares. On 2 November they received the first boxcar-load of raw materials (and tools) that would make swords, bayonets, lances, pikes and Bowie knives. On 2 November the factory was visited by the Vice President of the Confederacy, Alexander Stephens. Stephens had been delayed in Wilmington and took the opportunity to visit the budding industry:

He was requested by the courteous agent, Mr. Newhoff, to lay the foundation for a new sword making machine, which he did, laying the brick and spreading on mortar in a most workman-like manner, taking occasion to make a few...remarks respecting the welfare of the factory and its importance to the Confederacy. [A] beautiful Sword and Lance were accepted by Mr. Stephens....Holding [them], Mr. Stephens made a spirited address....He complimented the firm on the patriotism and energy displayed in the undertaking[.]

It was something of an advertising coup! Stephens promised to bring the arms presented to him to other parts of the Confederacy so they could "see what the Old North State was doing." In an attempt to foster more State business, the firm prevailed upon one of Wilmington's leading citizens, Doctor William George Thomas, who wrote a letter to his brother-in-law, Governor Henry T. Clark. One of the first orders, 128 lances and 220 "lance boots" were churned out by the factory and sent to Richmond. The total cost to the Confederate States was $1,054. By the end of that month, the factory was turning out 900 sabers every week; this was probably under optimum conditions with no mechanical breakdowns, but this was enough to equip an entire regiment. There were some "bugs" to be worked out (there was a problem with the scabbards) but the operation was going smoothly, the blades were forged, ground and polished. After tempering and attaching handles, the swords were ready for the troopers. The (Wilmington) Journal commented, "The factory has turned out...lances, sabre bayonets, officer's swords, cavalry sabres, artillery swords and we suppose all other cutting, sticking and stabbing utensils." Pikes were not mentioned, but were also made by the Arms Factory. Because of a scarcity of firearms at the beginning of the war, pikes were produced and issued to some men, but never on a large scale. Regardless of what Alexander Stephens may have thought, the authorities were not pleased by the quality of the weapons coming from the factory. In a letter written to the Secretary of War (Judah P. Benjamin), Governor Clark railed against the lack of arms and added:

They are yet without sabers, though we spared neither effort nor money. We did engage from Eastvan and Froelich sword factory at Wilmington, and paid high prices, but three-fourths of the swords proved worthless.

In 1861, bayonets from the Confederate Sword Factory cost $10.50 each.
(National Archives.)

At that very time, Froelich was disassociating himself from Estvan. The man had been exposed as an imposter and had absconded with the company's funds. He made his way north, eventually landing in London where he wrote a book condemning the Confederacy and the "foul and treacherous conspiracy against an excellent, just and equitable government." He wound up at Frankfort-on-Main, Germany, probably very close to where he had started out from! Froelich was forced to start all over again. Being ever inventive, he even devised a thirty-six shot "repeating revolver." It was said to be "accurate and efficient" to 1,400 yards and was mounted in a horse-drawn wagon. Although it was to be brought to Richmond for a demonstration, apparently nothing ever became of it.

The men of the N.C. 18th Regiment (many of whom were from Wilmington) could have used such a weapon on 27 May 1862 at Hanover Court House in Virginia. They were engaged in repulsing Union General Fitz-John Porter's troops and suffered nearly fifty per cent casualties. Upon learning of the battle, people in Wilmington donated foodstuffs and money to aid the stricken soldiers. The employees of the Arms Factory donated over $300 and "a fine sword for the Colonel," Robert H. Cowan. Cowan wrote a letter of appreciation to Froelich and publicly thanked the workers, vowing that the sword given him "shall never be sheathed...until the Confederate States of America are acknowledged among the nations of the earth[.]"

Froelich employed about seventy workers: brass finishers, blacksmiths, molders, carpenters, tinsmiths and common laborers comprised the work force. By mid-1860, blacksmiths were paid $3 per day (later increased to nearly $10) but the big incentive for employment was not the pay but rather the exempt status that went with what would be considered a "war related" industry. Workers were not exempt, however, from yellow fever. That disease struck Wilmington in late summer 1862 and forced the closing of many businesses, including the Arms Factory. In late September, the factory shut down as families dispersed to safer areas. The Factory would not start up again until late November and in an attempt to branch out, Froelich hired about 25 workers to manufacture knapsacks and other leather goods. It has been written that from November 1861 to March 1864, the Confederate Sword Factory "furnished 18 sets of surgical instruments, 800 gross of military buttons, 3,700 lance spears, 6,500 sabre bayonets, 11,700 cavalry sabres, 2,700 officer's sabres, 600 navy cutlasses, 1,700 sets of infantry accoutrements, 300 sabre belts and 300 knapsacks." It was not all work though, for in January 1863 the workers, who had organized into a militia company, paraded through town with pennants attached to their lances and pikes. The following month a fire struck the shops, again putting Froelich out of business. Perhaps looking for another site at the time of the yellow fever epidemic, (October 1862) Froelich had purchased property in Kenansville.

Our guest speaker for November will be John David Smith. Among the Civil War community he needs no introduction! Dr. Smith is currently the Graduate Alumni Distinguished Professor of History at N.C. State University. He has written and edited many books on diverse subjects such as African-Americans and slavery as well as Lincoln, Kentucky Governors, Yankee Ironclads and the health of Civil War soldiers. A complete list of his books, articles and pamphlets would take up about ten pages, so suffice to say he is very well versed in Civil War culture!

Dr. Smith attended Baldwin-Wallace College in 1971, the University of Kentucky in 1973 (A.M. degree) where he also received his Ph.D. (1977). His topic will be Black Soldiers in Blue (published in 2002). Dr. Smith's latest book, due this year, is entitled The Negro in the American Rebellion by William Wells Brown.

Winners of our raffle: Ed Gibson, Listening to Old Pete; Bob Cooke, Tumult and Silence; Chad Johnson, Hampton Legion; David Norris, Sacrifice at Gettysburg; John Craft, Gods and Generals (CD). The next time you are at a garage, library or yard sale, keep an eye out for those Civil War books. If you can pick up a few of them for our RT's raffle, it would be greatly appreciated!

Fork's Road.

Well, the weather has turned a bit cooler and that means it's getting close to the time when we'll ask for volunteers to help out at the Fork's Road earthworks. The really tough work was done last year but the site has become overgrown and needs a "trimming." Any help will be appreciated. A date will be set shortly and if you are able to come, wear your work clothes, bring some yard tools and have a good time!

It doesn't get any better than this! At our last meeting held at the Cape Fear Club and after a great dinner (fried chicken, barbecue, salads and desert) William C. "Jack" Davis held court! Speaking of the last days of the Confederacy and the last-minute politics that continued, he held us all enthralled. Opening with the statement that not much attention has ever been paid to those halcyon days. "It is a political story...of internal politics," we were informed. Although Davis had his faults, he was probably the most dedicated Confederate in the South, he had "invested" in an independent country and refused to see that dream slip away. The government at Richmond was not a two-party system, Jefferson Davis controlled not only the Executive, but the Legislative branch as well; of his 32 vetoes, only one was overturned. The control over his cabinet was nearly absolute, with the exception of the last Secretary of War, John Cabell Breckenridge, who was appointed 4 February 1865.

Something of a cabal developed early in 1865. With the addition of Breckenridge, who saw the coming demise of the Confederacy, tried to maneuver Davis into calling for a negotiated peace, but even he ran into the likes of R.M.T. Hunter, Robert Toombs and Robert B. Rhett. All of them disliked Davis, but even at the end they couldn't work together. Breckenridge, who had served as Vice-president under James Buchanan, realized the coming importance of North Carolina as the authorities would soon have to abandon Richmond. In early April, when Lee's lines around Petersburg were breached, Davis was notified (while at Sunday Service). The government seemed to be taken by surprise as the various departments scrambled to destroy their records by hauling boxes into the streets and burning them (and destroying a good portion of the city as well!) After the last cabinet meeting was held at Danville, Va. (known today as the "Last Capital of the Confederacy") Davis' cabinet melted away. As they fled the Federal forces sent to capture them, the cabinet heads met with various fates. Davis moved south, into North Carolina. At several stops along the way, he was refused entry into homes and was forced to sleep in a railway car. He was captured in Georgia and was imprisoned at Fortress Monroe. Removing about an inch of his huge mustache in an attempt to disguise himself, Breckenridge escaped to Cuba. There, performing the last official act of the Confederacy, he ordered all Southern soldiers to lay down their arms.

Updated Speaker Schedule:

11 December.....Debbie Blanton.....Women Soldiers.
 8 January.....Ray Flowers.....Southern Exposure.
 12 February.....Ross St. George.....TBA.
 March.....Spring Trip.

The Secret of General Butler's Removal

(From the Herald of the Union, quoting the New York Ledger)

Many people suppose that the removal of General Butler was caused by his failure to take Fort Fisher. That is not so. The true reason is this: when General Butler was in command in this city, previous to the last presidential election, a certain article appeared in the New York Herald which the General did not like. As soon as he read it, he at once dispatched one of his aids to the Herald office, to summon the managing editor (Mr. Hudson) to appear at his headquarters. Mr. Hudson obeyed the summons; and on appearing before the high military official he was informed that the Herald must retract the article, or he (General Butler) would suppress the paper. General Butler was not aware when he made this threat that the relations of Mr. Bennett, the responsible editor of the Herald, with the administration were of a very friendly and confidential character, and therefore, in making this exhibition of his "brief authority," he "put his foot in it." Mr. Bennett, of course, never forgave him; but on the contrary, managed to have him removed just as soon as the General's superiors could assign a reason that would seemingly justify his decapitation. General Butler is himself aware of this now, although he did not know the secret of his removal at the time it took place. The offer of the French Mission by our late President to James Gordon Bennett and the endorsement of the offer by Horace Greeley must have opened General Butler's eyes. He will probably let the newspapers alone hereafter.

Member Walt Bullard has generously shared the story of his ancestor with us: Private Dennis L. Carlisle was Walt's maternal great-great-grandfather. While his story is that of the 51st Regiment N.C. Troops, it is also a story of many men, both north and south, who spent their last days in prison. Private Carlisle's story is about the camp at Elmira, but there were other prisons that were every bit as bad; we know most of them by name, Salisbury, Fort Delaware, Florence, Point Lookout and Camp Douglas. It is fitting that all POWs be remembered. The site at Andersonville, Georgia now houses the National POW Museum; it was there that one man said, "...it takes 7 of its occupants [sic] to make a shadow."

One Soldier's Story

Private Dennis L. Carlisle enlisted in a company of Cumberland and Robeson County volunteers on 7 April 1862. Calling itself the "Scotch Tigers," in recognition of the Scottish heritage of many members, the unit became Company "D" of the 51st Regiment, N.C.T. Commanded by Wilmingtonian John L. Cantwell (who was a cotton broker and County Court clerk) the regiment boasted about 800 men at its peak. When surrendered in April 1865 at Durham Station, it mustered only 36 men fit for duty. Initially the men were used as laborers, helping to construct the forts around Wilmington and unloading blockade runners. After a reorganization in October, the unit received its baptism of fire at Kinston when it encountered Union Major General John Foster's men making their way towards Goldsboro.

Pvt. Carlisle was in that battle and shortly after was promoted to Corporal. The Regiment's next meeting with Federals was in Charleston when it was sent to Battery Wagner. Here the men endured constant cannon and rifle fire and it was here that the men manned the parapets to throw back an attack by the 54th Massachusetts (you know that regiment from the movie "Glory"). Did you know that three assaults were made that day? The 51st occupied the center of the Confederate line and received the brunt of the attacks. Battery Wagner held out, but was abandoned later that year. The 51st returned to North Carolina, taking part in General George Pickett's ill-fated effort to recapture New Bern. Their next tour of duty brought them to Petersburg, Virginia. After a quiet winter, there was Drewry's Bluff, Bermuda Hundred and Cold Harbor. While on the defensive, the unit lost only a few men, but when a Confederate attack was mounted (at Cold Harbor) the luck of the 51st ran out. They came up against the new seven-shot Spencer repeaters; close-range blasts of canister and grapeshot killed and wounded many. Both armies continued to struggle in the Virginia heat, with some 7,000 Union dead accounted for the next day. It was at this point that Pvt. Carlisle was captured. Gathered together, the prisoners were sent to Point Lookout, Maryland, thence to Elmira, N.Y. In September 1864, a New York newspaper said of the prison at Elmira:

There are about eight-thousand rebel prisoners at Elmira, and more are coming up daily. They are most able-bodied men, evidently of good families at the South. They are orderly and respectful in their deportment....

The discipline in the camp is very rigid, and there is no intercourse between the prisoners and the public. Few civilians can even get a peep over the high fence...much less get within speaking distance.

The stockade was never meant to hold more than around 4,400 men. Ultimately, more than 12,000 prisoners were enclosed. It quickly became a very sickly place:

"If ever there was a hell on earth," wrote a Texan, "Elmira prison was that hell." No compound struck a deeper chill into the hearts of Confederate soldiers. Opened in July 1864, it occupied 30 acres along New York's Chemung River. Flooding of the river soon left a stagnant pool...in the center of the compound. Into the muck went garbage and thousands of gallons of camp sewerage [contaminating the water supply].

In addition to overcrowding, there were other problems; the wood used in constructing barracks began to crack, and "as new prisoners arrived they were crammed into hastily erected tents." So many

POWs came that many had to sleep outdoors. With the coming of winter, the poorly-clad Southerners suffered greatly; it is no wonder that Elmira "led all Northern prisons in its death rate, an average of about 10 a day." Indeed, one doctor at the camp boasted that "he killed more Rebs than any soldier at the front."

As prisoners died, their bodies were turned over to a black man, John W. Jones, who was the sexton of several cemeteries in the area. Jones, an escaped slave from northern Virginia, had located in Elmira and had become a respected member of the community and was known to be an honest and decent man. His pay was $12 per month, plus $2.50 per burial, and he employed up to 12 men. He and his crew were kept quite busy; he tolerated no horseplay disrespect for the dead, he and his men buried the bodies in individual coffins in neat rows, marking each grave with a wooden board on which was written each man's name, rank and unit. He meticulously recorded the same information in a ledger book that he diligently guarded.

In addition to the debilitating conditions, an observation tower further degraded the prisoners. In July 1864, a large wooden tower was constructed near the fence line and for fifteen cents, visitors could climb to the platform (after having refreshments below).

Since townspeople were strictly forbidden to enter the prison, the tower afforded them a perfect opportunity to see the prisoners... Many of the prisoners reacted with amusement to the zoo-like situation... and engaged in numerous ridiculous feats of acrobatics and ground tumbling[.]. Their performance was "really in derision of being regarded as curiosities." [The tower was such a success that a second tower was built.] Other men whiled away the hours by carving trinkets: rings, buttons, watch chains, chess pieces, pipes and bracelets. They carved the items from bone, gutta percha, shell, wood and even horsehair, sometimes selling their craftwork to guards or civilians.

Elmira- there were 17 escapes from the prison. (Photo taken from the observatory.)

From "Prisons and Hospitals," The Photographic History of the War.

With disease rampant, men were dying by the hundreds. On 29 September, Corporal Carlisle succumbed to "chronic diarrhea" (dysentery probably). By the end of hostilities in the spring of 1865, more than 3,000 had died. Those wooden markers placed by Mr. Jones were replaced in 1904 by white marble gravestones and the Confederate Cemetery is now included within the larger U.S. National Cemetery at Elmira. New graves appear from time to time as the cemetery still accepts the burial of military veterans. Visitors can easily locate their forebears' graves by consulting a directory at the caretaker's office. The Confederates are bounded on three sides by a line of Federal graves, as if on eternal guard around their prisoners. Today the Stars and Stripes fly above all, the gravestones of the old enemies are identical except for the rounded tops of the Federal and the blunt points atop the Confederate. (In addition to Walt Bullard's contribution, the following works were consulted: Time-Life Books, "Tenting Tonight"; John Kaufield, "The Elmira Observatory," Civil War Times Illustrated, July 1977; "Prisons and Hospitals," The Photographic History of the Civil War, ed.)

Commenting on the inventiveness of Northerners, the Wilmingon Daily Journal reported that a "Yankee has invented a machine to remove a boil from a tea kettle! (19 February 1862).

Our guest speaker for October will be William C ("Jack") Davis. Dr. Davis, a native of Independence, Missouri, was educated in northern California, then spent twenty years in editorial management in the magazine and book publishing industry before leaving in 1990 to spend the next ten years working as a writer and consultant. He is the author of more than forty books in the fields of Civil War and Southern history, as well as numerous documentary screenplays. He was the on-camera senior consultant for 52 episodes of the Arts and Entertainment Network/History Channel series "Civil War Journal," as well as a number of other productions on commercial and public television, as well as for the BBC abroad, and has acted as historical consultant for several television and film productions, including "The Blue and the Gray," "George Washington" and "The Perfect Tribute."

He has been twice nominated for the Pulitzer Prize in History, and is the only three-time winner of the Jefferson Davis Award given for book-length works in Confederate History. His most recent book, Look Away! A History of the Confederate States of America (published by the Free Press in June 2002.) Dr. Davis comes to Virginia Tech as Director of Programs for the new Virginia Center for Civil War Studies, as well as serving as Professor of History. As we wrote on our reservation forms, Dr. Davis is indeed an icon when it comes to the History of the War Between the States. He once informed us that he has written a book a year, since the age of sixteen! Dr. Davis' topic "The Last Days of the Confederate Government," is sure to be a crowd-pleaser (especially after a Barbeque/Fried Chicken dinner!)

The speaker at our September meeting, Dr. David Long spoke about the campaign and election of 1860. Opening with "lawyerly" remarks, he presented his case that it was that election that started the Civil War. As there were four candidates for the presidency, three of whom were Democrats, it was a foregone conclusion that Abraham Lincoln would then be elected President. Just how Lincoln went from an unknown Illinois lawyer to the frontrunner at Chicago's "Wigwam," was most interesting; after all, when Lincoln lost the Illinois Senatorial race, he was ready to "recede into anonymity."

But a different fate awaited Lincoln. After his loss to Stephen Douglas, he went on a speaking tour around the country. William Cullen Bryant heard his speech at New York's Cooper Union Hall and noted of Lincoln, "when he stood up, he kept standing!" Bryant also noted the effect of the speech on the crowd. They went wild, rising to their feet to deliver a standing ovation. At the Republican convention, N.Y.'s William H. Seward had expected to get the nomination, but lost due to the efforts of Lincoln's campaign manager, David Davis, who devised a second ballot strategy. "We will be the compromise candidate," said Davis and it worked. Although he led the pack on the first ballot, Seward steadily lost delegates as the balloting went on. Finally, Lincoln pulled ahead as a carefully orchestrated scene unfolded. A huge canvas caricature of Lincoln is rolled down as the crowd (both inside and outside the Wigwam) cheers.

Dr. Long noted that as soon as Lincoln's nomination was announced in the South, newspapers began to publish articles about the validity of secession. He also noted that while the election of 1860 was the most momentous, that of 1864 was the most important. If you want to learn more about Dr. Long's subject, pick up his book, The Jewel of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln's Re-election and the End of Slavery.

We are guessing that most of our members read the article about Fort Fisher's Armstrong Gun (Morning Star, 27 March 2003.) The 150-pounder (that is, it fired a 150 shell!) is presently at the U.S. Military Academy's Trophy Point in New York. It is almost a "done deal" that the gun will be loaned to Fort Fisher for little more than a year. In 1864 that cannon was cutting-edge technology and would certainly be a welcome addition (if only temporary) to the State Historic Site. Our help is needed however. The cost of transporting the gun from West Point to Fort Fisher, as well as preparing the site upon which it will sit will have to be borne by the Fort. Paul Laird, chairman of the Fort Fisher Restoration Committee, has estimated the cost to be about $75,000. It is hoped that enough money can be raised to pay for some of the 140th anniversary activities as well. If you would like to help, donations can be made to the Fort Fisher Restoration Committee, Inc and mailed to the Fort Fisher State Historic Site, P.O. Box 169, Kure Beach, N.C. 28449. For more information you can call the Fort (910-458-5538.)

More Blockade Running Stories!

There have been quite a few books written on the subject of blockade running in the Civil War, many of which took place right here in the Cape Fear area. Some of these you may have already heard or read about, but hopefully most will be new to you! The stories have been profiled in Sprunt's Chronicles of the Cape Fear, as well as his Tales of the Cape Fear Blockade; some have been gleaned from the Wilmington Journal, Tom Taylor's Narrative of a Blockade Runner and the Whiting Papers.

During the last year of war, the Confederacy was in dire straits for all sorts of items, mainly food. It is said that a typical meal consisted of milk, rye coffee, a wheat biscuit with honey and "hominy ad libitum." Suffering even more food hardships was the Army of Northern Virginia. At one point Thomas Taylor, who owned quite a few runners, was informed by the Richmond Commissary General that General Robert E. Lee's army had only enough supplies to last thirty days, with no prospects of relief in sight. Taylor then returned to Wilmington and embarked his ship (the Banshee II) to Nassau. Slipping out of the Cape Fear's western bar, the vessel (which had as passengers ex-Secretary of War George Randolph and wife) was spotted and "hotly" fired upon. Returning within a short time, he brought enough supplies to relieve Lee's anxiety about food for his army. It has been written that this single journey actually saved the Army of Northern Virginia from starvation. What is even more astounding about the trip is that when the Banshee made it's run into Wilmington, it actually passed through Admiral David D. Porter's fleet of over sixty vessels! Porter and Major General Benjamin Butler were winding up an unsuccessful attack against Fort Fisher and were ready to head back to Virginia. One can only imagine the nerves of steel and iron determination needed to steer the Banshee right through the middle of the enemy's ships!

George C. McDougal was the Chief Engineer of the blockade runner Margaret and Jessie, captured by the U.S.S. Fulton in October 1863. The vessel, taken north, was condemned and sold to the U.S. Navy (becoming the gunboat Gettysburg.) The crew of the runner was also taken north to New York where they were confined in the infamous Ludlow Street jail. As McDougal told it:

During our incarceration we were visited frequently by United States deputy marshals, who tried to identify some of us suspected of holding commissions in the Confederate service and of being regularly engaged in blockade running[.] These officers were immediately assailed with questions... 'What are you going to do with us here? Are you going to let us out?' to which they would respond, 'We can not tell -the crew lists have been sent to Washington for inspection[.]'

Those lists would indicate who could be set free and who was to be sent to a prison camp. After a wait of three weeks, the lists arrived and the detainees were assembled in a large hall to hear their fate and have their effects searched for contraband. Again, McDougal:

The entire office force of clerks had been drawn by curiosity from their desks to the other end of the large room, where the inspection was going on; and while my baggage was being examined by an officer, I asked him if he knew who were to be released; to which he replied that he did not know, but that the list... could be found in a large book on that desk, pointing his finger to the other end of the room... I asked if I could go and read the names to satisfy my curiosity. He said there could be no harm in doing so[.]

McDougal, feigning indifference, slowly walked to the opposite side of the room and opened the book. Looking down the list of names, he noted that his was missing. A lengthy prison term loomed before him, but quick-witted as he was, he looked back and saw that no one was interested in what he was doing. He gently guided his hand along the desk until he found a pen. He then inked in his name at the bottom of the list, "imitating as closely as possible the character of the writing before me." He turned and walked away and went back to the crowded end of the room. The deputy then inquired if he had seen his name and McDougal responded with a hearty "YES!" "Then you are all right," said the officer.

That very evening, the entire crew was brought before a judge who called off the names of those who were to be set free. The last name called was George McDougal. He later wrote:

Promptly responding to my name, I at once passed out into the night, leaving my commander, Capt. Robert Lockwood...[and several others] who were sent to Fort Lafayette, where they remained until about the end of the war."

As for McDougal, he made nearly forty more trips as Chief Engineer of the runner Siren before his shipmates were released!

Not all blockade running stories turn out that way, however. In June 1864, the runner Georgiana McCall (or McCaw) was run ashore off Old Inlet by the U.S.S. Victoria. The Pilot of that vessel, Thomas Dyer, was something of a hothead. Described as a "lean, lanky, wiry 'razor-back' native of his own pine woods," he once threatened the British Captain of a vessel lying at a Wilmington wharf; Dyer dared the man to "come ashore you d---d English hog, and I'll make mince meat of you!" The Captain declined and Dyer was discharged from that vessel. He later went aboard the Georgiana McCall and was heard to boast that he "would put a steamer under his charge ashore, before he would be captured." Some aboard heard the remark and remembered it. When the ship was spotted as she attempted to come over the bar, she was run aground. Several of the crew abandoned ship, while the others were taken prisoner by a Union boarding party. Two men, Dyer and the cook (or watchman) remained hidden on board as the steamer was set afire by the Union sailors.

Leaving the vessel in flames, the Yankees returned to their ship. Observers on shore then saw two figures emerge from the smoke; a rescue vessel was sent to their aid, but when it arrived, only one man was there to meet it. The cook claimed that the Yankees had beaten Dyer, indeed he was found dying from three gashes in his head. But something was amiss. Even the Wilmington Journal sensed it:

After the Yankees left...two men were observed on board. They were hailed by some on shore, and told to put out the fire, which they did....The cook's statement, as we learn, is that the Yankees beat them both and robbed them. What appears strange in this is that these two men, Mr. Dyer and the cook, were observed on the boat after the Yankees had left....Mr. Dyer is known to have had a gold watch and some money on his person. Both money and watch were gone, and his pockets were turned inside out. The cook has been arrested, but we do not know whether anything further has been discovered.

Everyone knew something was wrong. One Confederate naval officer wrote, "There is something mysterious connected with the loss of the Georgiana McCaw. [sic] Some say she was boarded and fired by the Yankees; others contend there was treachery aboard....the only responsible witness, the Pilot, was murdered." Although the cook remained in prison for a while, he was never charged with the crime. For many years the identity of the man was not known, as writings of the period deliberately avoided mentioning his name. A man by the name of John H. Fisher had been imprisoned (at Fort Fisher) by the military, but was released after two months. The commander of the city garrison, Major James Reilly, was told to release Fisher, "who has been called as a witness in the murder case which occurred on the Georgiana McCall. You will inform the civil authorities who have the case in hand that Fisher will be released." Apparently there was not enough evidence to hold him. Sprunt summed up the case:

Another man was found on board, unhurt, who professed ignorance of his fellow. This person was the watchman, and it is said he carried ashore a large amount of money. He was arrested on suspicion, but there was no proof. He still lives on the river, but the cause of poor Dyer's death will probably never be known[.]

Steering Committee Contact Numbers.

Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle (792-9091) Mike Budziszewski (458-1370) Dan Geddie (799-5338) Bob Cooke (792-1601) Steve Gunter (686-4025) John Moore (256-6328) Russ St. George, Dale Lear, David Norris.

Dr. David Long will be the first speaker of the season. Dr. Long is presently professor of history at East Carolina University, "teaching courses about the Civil War, reconstruction, the constitutional history of the U.S., and World War Two. He came to that position by way of the Florida judicial system! It seems as though there was a murder case that didn't seem right to a young prosecutor looking at the facts some twenty years after the trial. When the States' Attorney refused to listen to him, he resigned in protest and returned to graduate school where he attained his PhD. in history. Dr. Long's latest work is titled: The Jewel of Liberty: Abraham Lincoln's Re-election and the End of Slavery, a book that has been nominated for the top five awards given for historical monographs (the Pulitzer, Bancroft, Parkman, Bevendge and Lincoln prizes.) He has written articles for The Civil War Times Illustrated and Columbiad magazines and has appeared on the (six-hour) PBS documentary Abraham and Mary Lincoln: A House Divided. Dr. Long also serves on an advisory group for the Abraham Lincoln Bicentennial Commission and is preparing an international conference (to be held at ECU) on Lincoln and the Emancipation Proclamation. The subject of his talk will be the Dahlgren Raid on Richmond (1864.) And by the way, that murder case was looked at by a special prosecutor who agreed with Dr. Long. That prosecutor was Janet Reno and the case propelled her to fame.

Preliminary Schedule of Speakers:

Please note, that in an effort to accommodate our members, we have changed our meeting night to the second Thursday of the month!

We would like to introduce the new members of the Steering Committee: Dale Lear, David Norris and Russ St. George.

Winners of our last raffle! (9 May)

Gold of the Americas- David Norris; Civil War Sites in Virginia- Steve Gunter; Soldiers in Gray (CD) Marshal McMillan; Tarnished Scalpels- Ed Gibson; Confederate Florida, Richard Crouch; Civil War, A to Z- Richard Covell; Glory in the Name, The Story of the Confederate Navy- Bruce Patterson; Southerners, Portrait of a People- Jim Bailey.

Remember we need items for our raffles! Please speak to Dale Lear (our new Raffle Chairman) about any items you may have to offer. We do raise most of our funds in this manner, so thanks again to all those who have donated books and other "things!" for our raffle. And while we're on the subject, you can't win unless you play the game! Buy a few tickets at our meetings, it's a cheap way to add to your Civil War collection.

Our speaker at our May meeting, Mr. Eric Wittenberg discussed J.E.B. Stuart's "Ride At Gettysburg." Upon Stuart's return, it was for certain, said Mr. Wittenberg, that Stuart received a severe "tongue-lashing" from none other than General Robert E. Lee. But was it deserved, questioned Mr. Wittenberg? Up to that point, Stuart had done a creditable job, even as a Corps commander after Stonewall Jackson's wounding in May (1863.) Upon the reorganization of the Army, Stuart did not retain command, so perhaps his "Ride at Gettysburg" was his way of redeeming his reputation. After reviewing the months prior to the battle in Pennsylvania (where Stuart's men successfully thwarted Union efforts to find Lee's Army) Mr. Wittenberg spoke of the orders given to J.E.B. Stuart by Lee. He was to "collect all supplies you can for the use of the Army;" he was to link up with Ewell's Corp and "get between Ewell and Washington." Although there were delays (both weather and Union resistance) which certainly affected Stuart's mission, when all was said and done, he had obeyed his orders "to the letter!" Lee, however didn't see it that way. He saw Stuart not available when he needed him most and that is what most people remember about Stuart's ride!

Throughout this year (2003) we are in the midst of Civil War anniversaries! One hundred and forty years ago (January 1863) President Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation while Burnside's troopers slogged through the mud along the Rappahannock River. February- the U.S.S. Vanderbilt seized the British merchant vessel Peterhoff, setting off yet another international incident. March- The draft becomes law in the North (conscription was already a fact of life in the South, since April 1862) causing the New York riots in July of that year. In April- Acting Rear Admiral David Dixon Porter runs twelve ships past the Vicksburg batteries (only one fails to get through.) May- Chancellorsville and the death of Stonewall Jackson. June- The cavalry battles at Brandy Station, Middleburg, Upperville Thoroughfare Gap and Aldie. July- Gettysburg. August- Lawrence, Kansas is sacked by Quantrill's Raiders. September- Battery Wagner (Charleston) is evacuated and in the west, Federal troops enter Chattanooga. October-At Charleston, a Confederate torpedo boat ("David") attacked the U.S.S. New Ironsides, damaging her severely. In November- Lookout Mountain and Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. December- CSA General Braxton Bragg, unable to work with his subordinates, resigns his command.

For that special Christmas gift, see Steve Gunter! He will be at our September meeting with our RT hats, shirts and windbreakers! Steve will show us what is available and can take your order.

Crime and Punishment

Major Alexander MacRae, commanding the First Battalion (Heavy Artillery) stationed near Wilmington, was incensed. Discovering that several of his men had been severely punished by Major Wilton L. Young, MacRae preferred charges against Young. Young, who commanded the 10th Battalion, (the unit that garrisoned the town) had meted out punishment to two of MacRae's men, for various infractions. Private Robert Bullard often complained of being sick, so after being examined by a doctor, who pronounced him fit for duty and informed the Major that "Pvt. B was in the habit of feigning sickness," Bullard had been lodged in the guard house. On the following day, Major Young had the man hung by his thumbs. Such a penalty involved stringing up the culprit so that his toes just barely touched the ground. It was indeed a form of torture and was quite painful. One writer has recorded that, "the general practice was to tighten the rope until only the toes touched the ground, thus placing a great strain on the wrists or thumbs and causing the cord to cut into the flesh. Little wonder that men subjected to this torture after a while groaned and screamed in agony and that comrades, incensed by the brutality, angrily demanded their release[.]" Major Young wrote:

I then had him in all during the day tied up by the thumbs (5) five hours, two at one time & one hour the last & for the next three days following, I ordered him to carry 2 twenty four Pdr. cannon balls for each two alternate hrs. throughout the day, which punishment I think he richly deserved.

The second man, Private Hugh Flowers (who had joined the army only two months earlier) had been absent without leave. Although he was not strung up, he was forced to carry cannonballs as well; two 24 pounders for several hours a day for six days. Both Confederate and Union officers dealt such punishments and more, out, in what today seems an extremely harsh punishment. But discipline had to be maintained and as Major Young wrote in response to MacRae's charges:

Major MacRae is laboring under a great hallucination of the mind if he thinks enforcing strict obedience to orders with promptness and correcting great abuses will disorganize a command. The great step towards disorganizing a command is for an officer to sympathize with his men.... This officer must know but little about his command if he supposes the course I have pursued will cause his men to become hardened and careless, but on the other hand I have found that it had quite a beneficial effect on the men and with but few exceptions the men have obeyed orders with promptness.

Many officers were quick to inflict severe punishment for a variety of crimes. Drunkenness and insubordination were seen as offenses that required immediate attention. The penalties for such infractions however, were not evenly distributed and depended mainly on the whim of the commanding officers. To see a soldier "bucked and gagged" was a common sight during the war. In this, the miscreant was sat down with his hands tied together with a pole placed, "beneath the knees and over the arms and tying a stick or bayonet in the mouth with a string." When tied in this manner for several hours, the soldier usually couldn't walk and had to be carried to his tent. Another sight to be seen was a soldier perched upon a plank, six inches wide. This was known as "riding the sawbuck" and was most uncomfortable and quite embarrassing. Wearing a barrel "shirt" was also quite embarrassing and usually brought howls of laughter from the unfortunate soldier's comrades. Also inflicted upon those who dared question authority was to be placed spread-eagled upon the spare wheel of an artillery caisson. If the transgression was mild enough, the man might be left upright and not suffer too much. But if the wheel was turned and the wagon driven over the rough roads, it turned into torture.

Desertion was a much more serious matter; but even for that, punishment was seldom uniformly administered. If caught, the men faced prison and hard labor; some spent weeks in jail while others spent years! As desertions increased, the penalty became stiffer. Those that were caught might face the branding iron. If he were to be branded, the soldier would first be shaved and then forever marked with the four-inch letter "D," perhaps on the hip, hand, forehead or cheek. In December 1863, three men of the 13th N.C. battalion were sentenced to two years hard labor and were to be branded as well. Because of a petition of citizens from their home county, the branding was dispensed with, but the final judge as to whether or not the iron was to be used remained in the hands of the officer in command of the district.

Spread-eagled on a wagon wheel.

Wearing a barrel.

Some deserters faced the firing squad. Early in 1864, when the 10th Battalion was ordered to Fort Campbell, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, desertions increased dramatically. Several men were caught trying to slip away to the Union blockaders and having been captured, languished in the town's military prison. Ransom Gallimore, Calvin Cole and Sam Burton of Major Young's command awaited the outcome of a Court-martial convened to decide their fate. Gallimore, convicted of desertion, was shot in January of that year, while Cole escaped the firing squad only because he lay dying in a hospital (he died on 6 April 1864.) Burton escaped from prison and, in company with two others from his company, escaped to a Federal gunboat. As for Private Bullard (one of the men Young had punished) he bided his time and then he too deserted to the enemy (6 August 1864.)

Kilpatrick and Wade Hampton Have a Quarrel.

Wade Hampton reclined on a bench in front of the farmhouse, while Generals Sherman and Johnston consulted inside. Major General Barry (Sherman's Chief of Artillery,) and General Kilpatrick approached Hampton for friendly converse. The South Carolina cavalryman presented a very frigid surface to both, and General Barry left him. Kilpatrick, however, commenced a conversation with him, which finally resulted in a wrangle. The deeds and merits of their respective commands were warmly discussed. Each indulged in reminiscences of thrashings he had given the other, and each desired nothing more than that the settlement of the whole thing should be left to the cavalry in a fair fight. The contagion spread among the respective cavalry staffs, and these gentlemen parted with no increased love for each other. This was the only incident that occurred to mar the harmony of the meeting on the first day. It is consoling to reflect that this bitter feeling is confined to the cavalry of both armies. The prospects for bloody times are dim.

(From Herald of the Union, 3 March 1865)

Please remember that it is that time of year. Dues ($25) can be sent to our P.O. box (see page 1 for our mailing address) or given to Dan Geddle at the next meeting. Bring a friend to the next meeting!

A special thanks to our retiring president, Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle and vice-president, Mike Budziszewski for their untiring efforts on behalf of our RT. They will be sorely missed, as will their wives, Nancy and Karen, who constituted the Refreshment Committee. We have it on good authority however, that the great fudge that we have been enjoying at our meetings might appear from time to time!

Well, with this edition, the RT season comes to a close. We wish everyone a happy and safe summer and we'll see you in September!

Dr. Max Williams intrigued us at our April meeting with his talk on the "Inevitability of Confederate Defeat." Admitting that Southern veterans quickly grasped "the mantle of the 'Lost Cause' as a means of rationalizing defeat," Dr. Williams pointed out that with such valiant soldiers and good leadership, it was believed by many to be the reason for the downfall of the Confederacy. Superior numbers and immensely more materials had to be the reason! But was it? There were times during the war when Confederate victory and independence might have been attainable, indeed at the beginning of the war, the Northern sentiment was to let "the erring sisters go," or perhaps when two Confederate diplomats were forcibly removed from a British mail steamer (the Trent.) Great Britain might have gone to war with the United States over that affair. Even when the war began in earnest, the model of the American Revolution, seventy-five years earlier, was well known by the South. Superior numbers didn't defeat those earlier Rebels, so the 4 to 1 difference in manpower, it was felt, could also be nullified; a defensive war would make up for the difference in those numbers. However, when the difference in numbers is greater when slaves and Southern deserters are deducted from the fighting forces. When the 180,000 African-Americans who fought for the North are counted, the disparity in numbers appears even greater.

Examples of "superior industrial societies" that had failed to conquer agrarian ones were many, so the belief that the Confederacy was "destined" to lose the war is a myth. The overriding factors were the "war-weariness" of the Southern people as well as an insufficient amount of Southern Nationalism (a rich man's war and a poor man's fight.) Dr. Williams summed it up succinctly by remarking, "the will to win was greater in the United States than it was in the Confederacy."

Where was the "Last Grand Review" held? (the answer is on page 3)

Some Humorous Tidbits!

Said a hungry Confederate to the lady who met him at the door, when out foraging one day, "Madam, will you please give me something to eat? I haven't had a mouthful for three days- today, tomorrow and the next day."

A few days before the battle of Gettysburg one of Gen. Lee's soldiers questioned him as to his plans. "Are you a soldier?" asked the General. "Yes." "Then, sir, be one," said the general, as he walked away.

During the retreat of the Confederates through South Carolina, at the time of Sherman's advance, Sgt. McD____, of Western North Carolina, was sent on detail to the town of M____, where a regiment of home guards was stationed. These valorous heroes, seeing a soldier from the front, gathered around him, eagerly inquiring the news. "News?" says Mac, solemnly. "I believe there is none.- Yes, there is a little, too, but it's not of much importance. Old Hardee burned up a regiment of home guards at Florence the other day, to keep them from falling into the enemy's hands." No more questions were asked.

Member Ann Hertzler has generously "loaned" an article to us that was initially published in the newsletter of the Federal Point Historical Society. Although Confederates were more often issued corn bread, hardtack, that much-maligned foodstuff was well known to soldiers on both sides. Read on!

Hardtack

Ann Hertzler

Hardtack, a ration in the Civil War, was actually known by 1800. Sea bread, ship's biscuit or pilot bread was a dehydrated mixture of flour and water which would stay edible for months. Trappers traded their pelts for supplies such as hardtack. Settlers migrating west lived on hardtack to survive starvation.

Northern and Confederate troops received rations of soft bread or hardtack biscuits, or cornbread or raw cornmeal. When food was limited, soldiers depended on hardtack because it was easier to keep them than soft bread. Food shortages, particularly in the South were caused by naval blockades and by transport shortages of railcars, carts, wagons and horses or mules.

The hardtack recipe (one part water to six parts flour) was mixed, kneaded, rolled (3 1/2" x 2 7/8" and 1/2" thick) scored into cracker shapes and baked for 20 to 25 minutes. The crackers were described as hard as brick and indestructibly unappetizing. A hungry man could eat his daily ration of 9 or 10 biscuits in a short time and still be hungry. Hardtack was eaten as is or in several forms to improve the taste - plain or toasted on a forked stick over the fire with coffee; crumbled in soups for thickening; crumbled in cold water and then fried in the juice or fat of meat; soaked in cold water; fried in pork fat, and salted (called "skillygalee") [we are informed that this was "indigestible enough to satisfy the cravings of the most ambitious dyspeptic," Ed.] It could be boiled in water and bacon grease (called "Hell-fire stew") and made into milk toast with condensed milk (although a can of milk cost .75 cents, quite expensive.)

"Confederate Cush" or "slosh" combined bits of Confederate hardtack or cornmeal mush with garlic [one member of the "Stonewall Brigade" noted that "when we broke it, it looked like it had cobwebs in it, Ed.] To make pudding, hardtack was pounded into a powder, mixed with flour (if available) and water; kneaded into dough, made into a piecrust, filled with apples, wrapped in a cloth and boiled for an hour. Hardtack that fell into the fire and got charred was thought good for weak bowels.

Problems with hardtack were several. It could be so hard it could not be eaten without first breaking "with a strong blow of the fist." Secondly, hardtack became moldy or wet when boxed too soon after baking or when exposed to the weather while sitting at a railway station or other supply base. A third problem was insect infestation during storage with maggots and weevils - slim brown bugs (1/8" long) which completely riddled the hardtack. Coffee with hardtack added to it often had weevils swimming on top. The drowned bugs could be skimmed off easily without leaving a distinctive flavor. Eaten in the dark, one could not tell the difference in hardtack with or without weevils.

Jokes about hardtack included names such as "worm castles," "sheet iron crackers," "tooth dullers," "Lincoln Pies," and "McClellan Pies." [John B. Billings, a member of the 10th Massachusetts called it "petrified bread honeycombed with bugs and maggots"] When men who threw their wormy hardtack into the trenches were told to throw it out in order to keep the trenches clean for sanitary reasons, an injured soldier replied, "We've already thrown it out two or three times, sir, but it crawls back."

[Ms. Hertzler consulted the following: American Heritage Press; Hard Tack and Coffee, by John B. Billings; Quantity Feeding During the Civil War.]

[A final story about hardtack (we couldn't resist it!) One soldier noted that "All the fresh meat we had come in the hard bread and I, preferring my game cooked, used to toast my biscuits." Ed.] The "Last Grand Review" of the Army was held near present-day Selma, N.C.

Our speaker for April (the 18th) will be Dr. Max Williams, who will answer the question, "Was Confederate Defeat Inevitable?" Dr. Williams, a native of High Point, N.C. graduated from Duke University and obtained his MA and Ph.D. from UNC Chapel Hill. He spent 34 years teaching at Western Carolina and is now Professor Emeritus of History. His primary teaching fields were Civil War and Reconstruction and the American South. He co-founded, with Peter Carmichael, the Western North Carolina Civil War Round Table and is currently a member of the N.C. Historical Commission. We look forward to his talk!

Winners of the last raffle:

Jackson and Staff (print)- John Moore; Civil War Battlefields- Ed Mahoney; Images From the Storm- Sam Daniluk; Civil War Magazines- Ed Russ and Don Patience; New Market Campaign- Ed Russ.

Once again we call upon our members to donate items for our raffle. Remember, the donations don't necessarily have to be about the Civil War, other items (military oriented preferred) are also welcome.

Did you get a chance to see "Gods and Generals?" What did you think of it? Although it was panned by many critics and Civil War buffs as well, it was a whole lot better than the last movie we viewed ("Jungle Book II.") Let's hope the final film in the trilogy will be made!

Note: Our March trip failed to come off due to low numbers. We seem to have a better response when we schedule our trips to actual battlefields! Maybe we should only visit battlefields? Give us your feedback at the next meeting. In keeping with our cavalry theme this year, Eric Wittenberg will return for another visit and will be our speaker in May. His topic then will be "Stuart's Ride Before Gettysburg: Who Was to Blame."

Message From the President

It has been an honor and a privilege to serve as president of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table for the past three years. Having also served as vice president for as many years, and as program director, however, it is now time for me to step down. I do so with confidence that the organization is in good shape. We continue to bring in some of the finest Civil War historians in the country for presentations, which has always elicited the enthusiastic support of the membership. But the time has come for new ideas and perhaps a new direction from a new leader. I extend my deep appreciation to my fellow members of the steering committee for their hard work and dedication, as well as my best wishes and thanks to the devoted members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

Our February speaker, Jack Thomson, broke out the slide projectors (two of them) and gave us a tour of Charleston, from early in the war through its end. It is surely well known that Charleston was one of the most heavily bombarded city in the Confederacy during the war. Interposing modern-day photographs with those taken by several different photographers, he showed us street scenes of bombed-out homes, offices, shops and churches. Informing us that the city was divided into three artillery zones, (effective range, annoying range and maximum range) it was evident that no one could live in the lower part of the town; that part within the deadly "effective" range of the Federal guns on Morris Island. What was most interesting was something termed "shadow dating." By looking at the length of the shadows cast by the sun, one can determine the approximate month and time of day. Other clues are then examined: trees in bloom or the uniforms of the soldiers in the pictures. Mr. Thomson was able to pinpoint the month, day and hour of one such photo! Several views of the huge 13" Blakely gun (which was mounted on Charleston's Battery) had been taken to create different "saleable" pictures by simply moving the photographer's equipment to another location. Exploded by retreating Confederates, a 500 pound piece of the gun's breech remains to this day, in the roof of one of the houses on the Battery.

As there are very few "combat" photographs of the Civil War, it was most interesting when Mr. Thomson showed a beach scene that at first glance appeared to be not of much interest. Upon a second look, and by blowing up portions of the picture, it became evident that it was indeed, a combat photo! The ironclad New Ironsides was firing at a target. The figures in the shot have all halted to watch the action as smoke pours from the vessel, which has just loosed a broadside! A great piece of detective work and a great show! Thanks Jack!

A Letter To Governor Vance.

Weldon, N.C.
Oct. 21st 1863

Your Excellency Gov. Vance,

Sir, I am under the necessity of asking you to let me have four yds. Army cloth. I am unable to get any unless it would be from heartless speculators, whose prices my salary will not enable me to pay. I have been commissioned for three months and have not been able to get cloth to uniform myself. I can get a furlough to go to Raleigh provided I can get the cloth. I understand you have a small quantity, [I] hope you will oblige. Please let me know, my address D. P. Glass Lt. Co. "K" 35th Regt State Troops Ransom's Brigade[,] Weldon, N.C.

Very respectfully Yours &c.

D.P. Glass

David P. Glass was one of the first to answer his country's call and enlisted in the First N.C. Regiment in 1861, for six months. In May, 1862, he was again signed up, "for the war." He was wounded at Malvern Hill and was later returned to duty. He was promoted to Sergeant that year and was afterwards promoted to Second Lieutenant in June, 1863. He must have been one of those soldiers who was missed, because North Carolina was one of the few States to clothe their own troops. Hopefully, he was able to get an officer's uniform!

The Confederate Treasure

Nine miles from this place, on the Danburg road, a small oak tree was blown down by yesterday's storm. Mr. John Frank saw something shining as he was passing and examined the roots of the same. In the hole left by the tree, he claims to have found almost a peck of gold. The jewels were diamonds, rubies and pearls, and parties who have seen them say they are worth $15,000 to $20,000. The belief expressed by the few who have been fortunate enough to see them is that they are a part of the lot lost by the Confederate Cabinet, as they were on that road when it was lost. It is supposed that the party who buried it was killed soon after, and consequently it was never unearthed.

Would You Believe This?

[From The Dispatch, Newsletter of the CWRT of NY]

Australian journalist Dorothy June Hopkins of Sydney published a book, Hop of the Bulletin, back in 1929. In the book she made several mentions of her father Livingston York Hopkins, a famous Australian magazine illustrator. He had served in the 139th Ohio before emigrating to Australia. His daughter reported on his world tour which included a visit to China.

At Hong Kong he noticed the American flag flying over the American consulate and decided to go in and pay his respects to the representative of his country. He was ushered into the presence of the consul. Sitting at the table was a wizened, feeble old man, his eyes dull with age and lack of interest. The old consul was the terrible, rough-riding, ruthless Colonel (John S.) Mosby. My father confessed that the sight of him made the old bitterness and hatred flare up once more, but it soon gave place to pity for the doddering old man.

Tidbits From the Closet

Although our speaker's themes have been the cavalry, it seems the newsletter has concentrated (this year anyway) on medical aspects of the war, so in keeping with that topic, here's a few more stories:

Medical Examinations for Union Recruits During the Civil War:

General Order #51, dated August 3, 1861 stated "when volunteers are to be mustered into the service of the United States, they will at the same time be minutely examined by the surgeon and assistant surgeon of the regiment, to ascertain whether they have the physical qualifications necessary for the military service." The questions asked were: Have you ever been sick? When and of what diseases? Have you any disease now, and what? Have you ever had fits? Have you ever received an injury or wound upon the head? Have you ever had a fracture, a dislocation, or a sprain? Are you in the habit of drinking? Are you subject to the piles? Have you any difficulty in urinating? Have you been vaccinated, or had the smallpox? Then there was space for any comments on: Head, Ears, Face, Eyes and Appendages, Nose, Organs of Mastication and Voice, Neck Chest, Abdomen, Genital and Urinary Organs, Vertebral Column, Superior Extremities and Inferior Extremities. At the bottom of the form was space for "Remarks" and the examination was signed and dated by the surgeon.

[From The Ramrod, newsletter of The North Carolina Civil War Round Table. The above sounds pretty comprehensive, but then, how did all those women get in the army? Ed.]

[Vaccination against smallpox has been in the news lately and sooner or later we may all have to be vaccinated or revaccinated as the case may be. The following is certainly not meant to scare anyone; it was done at a time of limited medical knowledge among common people. It is taken from a Union surgeon's report, which was delivered to the U.S. Sanitary Commission. The information comes from The U.S. Sanitary Commission Records, microfilm at UNCW's Randall Library.]

[In May 1863] while the regiment [the 100th Illinois Volunteers] was encamped at Mt. Vernon, Kentucky, a member of the Reg't. came from the hospital at Lexington, Ky. With a large ulcer...on his arm, obtained, he said, by vaccination from a fellow patient at the hospital, which vaccination he had performed himself; several members from his company vaccinated themselves from this arm, including the Capt.

In all these case the pustule degenerated to an unhealthy looking ulcer, from the size of a half-dime to a dime, discharging much pus...the surrounding surface being inflamed & swollen. These ulcers proved very obstinate to treatment, finally requiring cauterization with Nitrate of Silver...some of them not healing for two months or more. They finally healed, however, leaving [a scar] far different from the usual scar after vaccination....But every one of those thus vaccinated, who had not been protected by previous vaccination, were seized with variola, in its confluent form & all died, including the Capt. This could not have been vaccination, as it did not possess any of its protecting powers nor could it have been syphilis alone, as no...effects followed[.]

[Apparently the original infected patient was also suffering from syphilis and the others, using what was called "spurious," or self-inoculation also contracted the disease. Spurious vaccination was also practiced by Confederate soldiers, Ed.]

[Report of Camp Inspector Robert Colyer, August 28th 1861. From U.S. Sanitary Commission Records.]

5th New York, Sickles Brigade

This regiment is in poor condition. There is no chief surgeon. The Colonel is in New York recruiting. The men are poorly clad but expect to get their clothes this week. The ground round the camp is very dirty. There is no pride or care of camps or tents; no ambulances, stretchers, surgical instruments, little medicine, no stores for the hospital. The men are so on the damp ground that they must get sick. The Assistant Surgeon is sick [and] there are those nasty cooking pits as usual waiting to kill their percentage of men. This regiment must be seen to closely.

Lastly (and certainly not the least) let us pray for the safe return of all our troops and indeed, give thanks to all who served and who are serving our country.

Our speaker for February will be Mr. Jack Thomson, who will tell us about Charleston during the Civil War years. Mr. Thomson, who was "involuntarily transferred" to that place in 1968 from his native city of Miami, admits that it was the best thing that ever happened to him! He started giving his unique walking tours in 1986; they are unique in that he carries along a volume of photographs taken during the war and points out the very same scenes in his walk. The author of Charleston at War, Jack lives in an 1880-style home, with, as he says, a 1950's model wife. His wife is a native Charlestonian (whom he tells that its fine to tell people you're from South Carolina, but telling them you're from Charleston is bragging just too much!) Mr. Thomson's interests also include blockade running. He worked for three years in the salvage of two runners, the Georgiana and the Mary Bowers. Jack, who will be whetting our appetite for more, will be taking us in March on his walking tour. As he says, we will "walk the same streets and see the same buildings that were part of Confederate Charleston."

Were you among the those who visited Fort Fisher on Saturday, 11 January? We were and got to talk to member Bruce Patterson who also visited. We were able to get there early (and stayed late!) and meet many of the reenactors and staff who made the day a great one. There were field artillery and infantry demonstrations, heavy artillery (the Fort's 32-pounder is the largest gun of its type in the country) and mortars were fired off also. The CSN had a presence and discussed the use of torpedoes in the Civil War. The Huckleberry Brothers band played the old-timey melodies and also gave a brief history of the tunes. The highlights were, of course, in the evening hours when visitors were shepherded to meet the Union brass in the form of Admiral Porter and Lt. Cdr. William B. Cushing, Colonels Curtis, Pennypacker and Bell; General Terry was also on hand, as were the Southern commanders, General Whiting, Colonel Lamb and Major Reilly. For a finale, two field pieces at Battle Acres roared defiance at the night, thrilling the thinning crowd (hey, it was COLD out there!) It was all a dress rehearsal for 2005 when, for the 140th anniversary, there will be a huge reenactment of the battle.

Winners of our last raffle: General William Averell's Salem Raid, Palmer Royal; Guns of the Civil War (video), John Golden; Civil War in the Ozarks, Jim McCallum; A House Divided, Jim McCallum; They Met at Gettysburg, Ed Russ; Little Book of the Civil War, Sam Daniluk.

From the Calendar!

On this date:

Thursday February 13, 1863-The USS Queen of the West destroys the town of Simmesport, La., and several surrounding plantations in retaliation for an attack on the ship the previous day.

Friday February 14, 1864-In plain view of a helpless, outnumbered Confederate general Leonidas Polk, General William T. Sherman occupies and then burns much of the city of Meridian, Miss.

Mr. Horace Mewborn, who, according to George Slaton, has followed in the "horseprints" of John Singleton Mosby for quite some time now, spoke to us at our last meeting about the man who initiated and perfected guerilla warfare in the Civil War. Born in 1833, only ten months later than J.E.B. Stuart, the man who would become his mentor, he showed at an early age that he would not be pushed around! When a local bully threatened to pummel him, he armed himself with a pistol and shot the fellow as he came at him. It was while in jail that he studied law and later became a lawyer. Just prior to the outbreak of war, he joined a militia company commanded by William E. "Grumble" Jones, another man whom he admired. When war came, Mosby's value as a scout was quickly realized and before long, he operated independently, reporting only to the commander of the 1st Virginia Cavalry, J.E.B. Stuart. With his promotion, Mosby continued to report to him and after Stuart's death, would report directly to General R.E. Lee. When Stuart rode around McClellan's army in 1862, it was Mosby who scouted ahead. Beginning his "chaotic enterprise" in January 1863, he knew he would "reap a rich harvest." In an operation carried out on a cold winter night, Mosby, together with 29 men, rode into a Federal camp and captured one general (Edwin Stoughton), 30 men and 59 horses (when President Lincoln was told of the raid he replied, "Well, I'm sorry for that. I can make new brigadier generals, but I can't make new horses.") It was by exploits such as these that Mosby's reputation was made. He was not one to take chances, Mr. Newborn said, it was by virtue of planning that he was able to pull off his raids. By the end of 1863, Mosby was a real thorn in the Union hide and would remain a problem, tying down the equivalent of several regiments. The area of northern Virginia (Fauquier and Loudon Counties) in which he operated became known as "Mosby's Confederacy." Just how he learned his trade remains unknown, but by striking fear in the rear of the Union troops, he epitomized partisan ranger tactics. Mosby survived the war, practiced law and died in 1912.

Part II, Wilmington Hospitals

After Northern troops captured Wilmington, General Joseph R. Hawley was placed in command of the district; his job was not an enviable one. There were many sick and wounded Union soldiers (plus a few Confederates too wounded to move) in town. General William T. Sherman had sent virtually all "contrabands" (former slaves freed by his advancing army) from Fayetteville down the Cape Fear. These and other refugees flocking to Wilmington numbered nearly ten thousand. In addition, in late February and early March, Union POWs (over 7,000) were released at the North East (near Castle Hayne) bridge. Many of these men, from Andersonville and Salisbury needed immediate hospitalization. Those from Salisbury brought Typhoid fever with them and soon the disease appeared among the citizens and newly freed slaves. Is it any wonder the bluecoats were hard-pressed for doctors and hospitals! Part II of our continuing medical series (hey, we're on a roll here!) by Dr. Jim McCallum lists the various hospitals in Wilmington after its occupation by Federal forces early in 1865.

Following the surrender, hospitals were divided among three categories: Confederate, Union and Freedman. The Confederate hospital was located in the Bunting house on Fourth Street while the Union army commandeered all of the former Confederate hospitals and created several more. Dr. Edwin A. Anderson, Jr. (1816-1894) wrote an account of the Federal occupation and the hospitals.

"Present in Wilmington at the entrance of the Federal Army, Drs. Medway, Love, Erkiner, King and Anderson. My office adjoined that of Colonel Randall, the provost marshal, and thus I had full opportunity of witnessing what steps were taken for the cleansing of the city....The federal soldiers were terribly afraid of yellow fever, and hence gave the greatest care to the hygiene of the city. The provost marshal and his assistants had a hundred Negroes constantly employed cleaning the streets and the sewers. Martial Law prevailed: an unlimited supply of wagons, laborers, men and money was at [his] disposal...and used unstintingly. All of the resident physicians were placed on duty in the Federal hospitals and I was ordered by General Hawley, then commander of the city, to organize a hospital for the sick and dying Federal soldiers, taken, as Dr. [W.G.] Thomas forcibly expresses it, from Southern prisons. The hospital I organized contained from six to seven hundred patients, and was in the building, and tents around the building, known as the 'customs house,' in the eastern part of the city, corner of Orange and Tenth Streets. There was also another large hospital in St. James' church; [taken over in large part because of the refusal of its minister, Dr. Alfred Watson, to pray for President Lincoln, Ed.] a third in the Hill building, corner of Mulberry and 4th Sts.; a fourth in the Wright house, a large building on Market St.; a fifth in the MacRae house, also on Market St.; a sixth in the house occupied by Adrian & Vollers, on the corner of Front and Dock; a seventh in the very large building used as the Seaman's Home, occupied at the entry of the Federal Army as a Southern hospital; an eighth in the present Marine hospital; a ninth over the railroad. On the property known as the Dickenson's property, overlooking the Charlotte Railroad Depot.

A tenth hospital was a Negro hospital, under the charge of Dr. King of this city, at the northern end of Front St.--a very large four-story building now occupied by the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad. Kidder's Mill, a very large building, with its numerous outhouses, made an eleventh. Dudley's Mill, a structure with out buildings similar to and of equal capacity to Kidder's, made a twelfth hospital [this was the former site of Louis Froelich's Confederate Sword Factory, just south of the Cape Fear bridge, east of Surry St., Ed.] This last was in charge of Dr. Tucker of the United States Army, as a colored hospital and had at this time, 300 patients. John C. Heyer's house, corner of 4th and Walnut made the thirteenth. The very large four-story house of Benjamin Beery, corner of Nun and 2nd Sts., was occupied by Dr. Savage of the U.S. Army. The depot of the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad, across the river, opposite the foot of Market St., was the fifteenth, used for Negro refugees. The large side-wheel steamer Spaulding, of 1,000 tons capacity, lay at the foot of Orange Street, and was fitted up as a floating hospital in the most complete manner, making 16 hospitals in commission at the time...surely enough for any given amount of sick and dying Federal soldiers. No army in the world for the last century has seen similar hospitals, not even in the Crimea, or [the Franco-German] War, for their comfort and arrangements were admirable. Nothing was wanting, not even luxuries. The Christian Association supplied most liberally every want the Government had overlooked. I had only to sign an order to get whatever I wanted for my sick.

Canned fruits, soup, vegetables of all kinds, milk, preserves, fine wines, liquors, brandy, ale and an unlimited supply of ice. Fresh loaves of bread, equal to any in the world, were served daily to the sick and convalescents by the government bakers; and a large California steamer, the Black Warrior, ran weekly between this city and Baltimore, bringing live cattle on her spacious decks for the use of the troops and hospitals. With 16 hospitals at their command, attended by Southern physicians familiar with the diseases of the climate, and an able corps of army surgeons, with a trained body of nurses and hospital stewards, all under admirable military discipline, what was to be dreaded even if every section of the city was occupied by sick soldiers? For the provost marshal spared neither time, trouble nor money to keep the city in good order, and so it was kept."

There was one hospital that was evidently was not kept in good order early on in its existence, and was the source of controversy---The Freedman's Hospital. Congress established the Freedman's Bureau as part of the War Department in 1865 to protect the interests of the former slaves. It was charged with many responsibilities, few of which were met. Over a hundred hospitals were established, at least one of which was located in Wilmington. The Freedman's Bureau was resented by the white population and it was probably a disappointment to the recently emancipated slaves who had hoped their problems would be solved with a stroke of the pen.

A local physician, Dr. Thomas Wood just recently returned from the war, wrote of the hospital:

One hospital was forced upon the city by the Freedman's Bureau, in 1865... and [was] called the 'Small Pox' Hospital (by the townspeople.) It endured for nine months and received 712 cases of small pox. Five patients died during the first day. Seventy-three Negroes, in all stages of illness, freely intermingled as to sex, were confined in rooms where windows had been boarded up to keep out the cold. No bedding existed except for sleazy army blankets---or rather would have been sleazy had they not been stiff with smallpox fluid. Vermin were disgustingly numerous. The first day of occupation of the city, the food sent consisted of 10 loaves of bread, and three 2-gallon water cans of some sort of soup for 73 patients. The maggots were so thick in the soup that it was directed to be thrown away, to prevent the half-starved convalescents from greedily devouring it. Finally bedsteads with mattresses were provided and blankets. The house was literally 'hoed out,' scoured, and white washed; ventilation was provided, proper food was prepared, and in a few days the hospital was as well off as most pest-houses.

This sketch [parts I & II] of the hospitals in Wilmington during the Civil War period is but a small part of the fascinating story of Medicine and the medical men from our area. The heritage, lives, accomplishments and progeny of more than 75 men, great and small, is well worth reading. If the interest is sufficient, perhaps we'll have a part III, detailing a few of them!

Parting Shots!

Why was the taking of Norfolk a sheepish affair? Because [Mayor] Lamb surrendered to General Wool.

General Rhodes was riding around his brigade, and came up with the conscript who had taken his gun in pieces for the purpose of cleaning and rubbing it up. [Gen. Rhodes] "What are you doing, sir? What are you anyhow?" [Conscript] "I am a sort of a sentinel. What are you anyhow?" [Gen. Rhodes] "I am a sort of a General." [Conscript] "Well General, if you will hold on, I will give you a sort of salute." [Gen. Rhodes] "Well, sir, you hold on a while and I will show you a sort of a guardhouse." The last we heard of the conscript, Gen. Rhodes had him in the guardhouse at his headquarters, bucked and gagged.

Our January Speaker will be Mr. Horace Mewborn, who will share with us his long-standing interest in guerilla (or partisan warfare.) Mr. Mewborn, a native of Kinston, N.C., will talk about the leadership and strategy of John S. Mosby. Mr. Mewborn graduated from Campbell College, spent seven years in the U.S. Army and later returned to college, graduating from East Carolina University. He then began a career with the FBI, retiring in 1997. He has co-authored a work on the 43rd Battalion, Virginia Cavalry (Mosby's command) for the H.E. Howard Virginia Regimental Series. He has also had several articles published in the Blue and Gray Magazine.

Please note that our next meeting only will be the THIRD Friday of the month.

William Lamb, age 97, passed away on Saturday, 9 November 2002. He was the GRANDSON (not Great-Grandson) of Colonel William Lamb who commanded at Fort Fisher. The son of Henry Whiting and Rebecca Lamb, he was born in Norfolk in 1905. He authored a book about his grandfather, titled The Life and Times of Colonel William Lamb, 1835-1909. By the way, if you're looking for a copy of that work, (the only place) it is available is at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site (910-458-55538.)

"I know he is a damned fool, but Kilpatrick is just the sort of man I want for my Cavalry." So said General William T. Sherman in 1864, of General Hugh Judson Kilpatrick. At our last meeting, Mr. Samuel J. Martin brought Kilpatrick back to life. Kilpatrick had bungled his last assignment, a raid on Richmond, which had resulted in the death of Union Colonel Ulric Dahlgren. He opted to redeem his failing reputation in the West, under Sherman. With Kill-Cavalry (so named by his men), there was no middle ground, either one admired or despised him. Called a coward and a lying philanderer by some, others saw only bravery in the man and ignored his mistakes. The one fact everyone is able to agree on is that the man was overly ambitious! Speaking of Kilpatrick's exploits, both on and off the field, perhaps it might have been better to let sleeping dogs lie! Mr. Martin gave us wonderful insights into the man, who, at the first sign of the enemy usually yelled "Charge!" with little regard if he was leading his men into a trap. Released from prison in 1863 (for stealing), sending two squadrons to their deaths (twenty men attacked 4,000 Confederates), and having been soundly defeated by JEB Stuart at Buckland, Virginia, he had just led a failed raid on Richmond. After all this (plus his blatant indiscretions with women) he was kept in high command! Even after the war, while serving as Ambassador to Chile, he took up with a loose woman. She later returned to her profession on the streets of Santiago, causing a scandal when it became public knowledge! Mr. Martin's book, (Kill-Cavalry, The Life of Union General Hugh Judson Kilpatrick) was offered for sale and copies were autographed by Mr. Martin. We await the publication of his next book, which is on General Braxton Bragg, maybe we can entice Mr. Martin back again to hear about Bragg!

While perusing the Wilmington Daily Journal (17 May, 1864) we found this tidbit about Kilpatrick's Raid on Richmond:

One of Gen. Kilpatrick's sergeants was asked if they released any of the Union prisoners in Richmond.-- "No," he replied, "but we reinforced them."

Civil War Preservation Trust

In reading almost any magazine or newspaper devoted to the Civil War, there are constant pleas for donations to help preserve the battlefields of the war. In a recent mailing by CWPT, it is said that the following sites are in danger: Allatoona, Ga.; Mansfield, La.; The Wilderness, Va., Gettysburg, Pa. And Harper's Ferry, W. Va. All are threatened by construction of one sort or another. There have been several successes however, the Murphy Farm at Harpers Ferry and three parcels of land at Fort Donelson, Tenn., have been purchased by CWPT. If you are interested in helping preserve any and all sites, please write to them at 11 Public Square, Suite 200, Hagerstown, Md. 21720 (or telephone, 1-800-606-1400.) You may also contact CWPT online at www.civilwar.org. As they say, "Once we lose a historic treasure...it can never be reclaimed."

What do the gentlemen shown below have in common? Read on!

A Toast to South Carolina's Secession

In the decade before the Civil War, Commodore David Glasgow Farragut, commander of the newly constructed Naval base (located at Mare Island), California, was concerned about his "right-hand man," Richard Porter Ashe. Ashe, who was appointed Naval Agent for the port of San Francisco by President Franklin Pierce in 1853, was the man who disbursed the monies for the project. In June 1856, Ashe had been arrested along with David S. Terry after a confrontation with San Francisco's Vigilance Committee. Both Ashe and Terry (who was a Justice of the California Supreme Court) were opposed to what they considered the "mob rule" of the Vigilantes. Terry had stabbed a Vigilante and both men (Terry and Ashe) wound up in Fort "Gunnybags," the Vigilante prison. Farragut realized that with Ashe in jail, the construction of the Naval base would come to a halt. While Terry languished in jail, the Navy demanded and secured Ashe's release.

Richard P. Ashe had come a long way from Rocky Point, North Carolina. Born in 1823 (near what is today Ashton Cross Rd. and Hwy. 117) to a well known and respected family, he dropped out of the U.S. Military Academy after dueling with another cadet, but went on to obtain a medical degree from Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia. He afterwards migrated to Texas and it was there he met David Terry; both enlisted in the First Texas Rifles and served in the Mexican-American War. In a later biography, his son wrote that it was in that conflict that both men had saved each other's lives! With the discovery of gold in California, the pair made their way first to San Francisco, later settling in Stockton.

As emigrants streamed to the west coast, the Navy quickly realized the importance of a Navy Yard in the San Francisco area. Hundreds of vessels that made the hazardous trip around Cape Horn were in dire need of repair, but more than that, it was the beginning of the two-ocean Navy. Both the land and its commander had already been selected by Secretary of the Navy James Dobbin, himself a North Carolinian. Mare Island was the site; Commander David G. Farragut would supervise construction and would be the first Commander of the Yard. Born in 1801, he had been adopted by Commodore David Porter (Porter had another son, David Dixon) and had been in the Navy for more than forty years. Married in 1843 to Virginia Loyall (of Norfolk), the couple had one son, Loyall.

Farragut arrived at Mare Island in September 1854 and quickly took charge. With Ashe as Naval Agent, the project got underway, even though funds from Washington were slow in coming. All was not work at Mare Island; there was some time for socialization (although there were not many women in the state.) At the Farraguts for dinner one evening were Ashe and several compatriots from Wilmington. A friendship developed between the two men and at one point, Ashe met Virginia's sister, Caroline. Four years later, the two were married. Probably due to Ashe's influence, Farragut's private secretary was a young Wilmingtonian, Richard F. Langdon (there's the connection!) Surrounded as he was by Southerners, he may have been influenced during this period of sectional strife. Still in California after South Carolina's secession, it was said that Farragut joined in a toast to that state and remarked that, "he would be with South Carolina if Virginia seceded." Virginia did eventually secede, but Farragut stayed with the Union. Upon returning east, he found he could not remain in Norfolk. Due to the unrest in Virginia he moved his family to New York. On the very day (22 April) that State troops seized the Federal Arsenal at Fayetteville, North Carolina, he wrote to his brother-in-law (Ashe) giving his reasons:

I have just seen [Caroline] off in the steamer for California.... We were very near being stopped.... Things were growing worse in Norfolk.... We all packed up in 2 hours & left in the evening steamer for Baltimore. When we arrived In [Baltimore] we found that there had been a fight with the Northern troops passing through to Washington, & they had burned the Rail Road Bridges running north. So we had to come on a cannal [sic] propeller 300 persons crowded together so that we had to lie on the Deck & scarcely room for that, Everything is Excitement from one end of the country to the other[,] everybody appears run mad.

In a letter dated six months after the war had begun, he again wrote to Ashe:

I unfortunately purchased $1,500.00 of 'City of Norfolk Scrip' all my savings from my cruise, just before this unhappy outbreak. That recalls to my mind your letter; again you say a truce on politics, but you always say just enough to call forth a reply....When I said I knew all about Civil Wars, I only meant the horrors and uncertainty of their elements, not that I could fathom their workings. I have just given you the best evidence that I did not, by purchasing Norfolk City Scrip.

He went on to explain his change of heart:

I never believed that Virginia would secede...& I firmly believe this day, that there is a majority of Union men in that State.... Now I always like to set myself right on the record; you say my letter of the spring before rebellion, was very different,...from those of the present day. I know it. If you have a difficulty with a man, you are apt...to express [yourself] harshly...but when the amend is made, & you are reconciled, you speak differently.

So it was with me. I thought the South was about to be oppressed & should take ground against the North...& if we could not live in peace, we would have to separate...but when I went south...and saw that there was a determination on the part of the Secessionists to break up the Union...then I left them, for I loved the Union under which I was raised.

He had decided to remain under the old flag. Like many Southerners who opted to stay with the Union, he was initially suspect and was not given a command until later that year (December 1861) but quickly proved his loyalty. Best known for his "Damn the torpedoes" remark, in running past Forts Gaines and Morgan at the battle of Mobile Bay, he was promoted to the rank of Rear Admiral in July 1862. He continued on duty until he returned to New York in December 1864. His health failing (his eyesight was deteriorating), he was promoted to Vice Admiral in 1866, the rank having been created for him. David Farragut died on August 14, 1870. As for Richard Ashe, he attempted to leave California and join the fight against the Yankees, but was arrested and imprisoned for a year at Angel Island. He was released on condition that he not leave the State, after the war he turned to farming his extensive holdings in the San Joaquin Valley. By 1871, his health began to fail and he died that year.

Judge Terry was able to escape to the South and in 1863, joined the Confederate Army. He returned to California after the war and was shot to death by the bodyguard of U.S. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Field (with whom he had a ongoing feud) in August 1889. Several of those at Farragut's dinner table a few years before, would also return and don the gray uniform. His Private Secretary, Richard Langdon, returned to North Carolina, was commissioned as a Quartermaster in the First N.C. Transferred to the Third Regiment, Captain Langdon later served as an artillery officer (Rode's Division.) After the war, he became an auditor with the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad and continued a correspondence with the Farraguts.

[Information on the above came from The Society of California Pioneers; The Huntington Library; U.S. Military Academy; New Hanover County Public Library; Southern Historical Society.]

We are still seeking donations for our raffles, so any Civil War books (or items) you might pick up at a library or yard sale, or if you're looking to clean out a closet would be accepted. Mike Budziszewski reminded us that any historical items (not necessarily Civil War) would be welcome as well!

We hope everyone had a wonderful Christmas and a Happy New Year!

Our December Speaker will be Mr. Sam Martin, his subject will be Hugh Judson ("Kil-Cavalry") Kilpatrick. Mr. Martin, a graduate of Bowling Green and Indiana University, he received a Masters Degree in Business. After service in the U.S. Army, he entered upon a career in business, working for G.E., RCA, Masco and Southwestern Bell. While still working, he started writing articles about the Civil War, including ones for Civil War Times Illustrated, American Civil War, The Kepi and Virginia Country. After retiring in 1990, he began writing biographical books. His works include: The Road to Glory (Richard S. Ewell,) followed by Kill-Cavalry (H.J. Kilpatrick,) and Southern Hero (Matthew Calbraith Butler.) Mr. Martin is presently working on his as-yet-untitled fourth book about another Confederate, Braxton Bragg.

Robert E. Lee honored in Greece!

The largest building at the Near East Relief's orphanage in Syra, Greece, will henceforth be known as the Robert E. Lee Memorial, in recognition of large contributions made towards its erection by the people of the State of Virginia. The building was dedicated with impressive ceremonies. A memorial tablet in the hallway bears a biography of Lee, written by one of the Armenian orphan boys....[It] recounts Lee's public career[.] (Confederate Veteran)

Our November speaker, Paul Anderson, spoke (and has written a book, titled Blood Image) on a worthy Son of Virginia, Turner Ashby. Beginning his talk with a quote from "Stonewall" Jackson's letter to Robert E. Lee, he asked the question why did Jackson back down from his confrontation with Ashby. Jackson, the stern disciplinarian and Ashby the Knight Errant, who couldn't or wouldn't control his men. These were two men whose view of the war was totally different. The answer, he indicated, lies in Ashby's view of that war (plus his influence over his men.) Commanding Partisan Rangers, a fiercely independent band of unknown numbers that melted away after their battles, Ashby saw only the Shenandoah Valley as their battleground. His job was to find Yankees and kill them! He never saw the "big picture" as did Jackson and Lee and he had no sense of conventional warfare, no strategic sense. While Jackson expected his cavalry to be at hand, for courier duty, screening and reconnaissance missions, Ashby was only concerned with finding and attacking the enemy, burning bridges and destroying railroads. To him, the war was bloody, brutal and personal, especially after the death of his brother. A confrontation was inevitable. Yet when Ashby not only threatened to resign, but wrote it out, Jackson backed down. Ashby was very symbolic to the citizens of the Valley, as Dr. Anderson stated, he represented the values of the war, as seen by those in the Valley. He also represented the very best of Virginia culture and after his untimely death in June 1862, a myth grew up around him and his status increased with time. Judging by the questions Dr. Anderson's talk was extremely interesting and thought provoking.

The Winners of last month's raffle: Civil War Video, Dale Lear; Confederate Goliath, Robert Jones; The Civil War, Dick Covell; Civil War Facts, Richard Long; D-Day lighter, Palmer Royal; framed picture of Uncle Sam, Becky Jones. Jim McCallum has done a great deal of research on the state of medicine during the Civil War, and in Wilmington in particular. He has discovered a lot about the doctors (well over 75 of them, the highlights of whom we will present in another issue) who served here, as well as the hospitals themselves. Consider the following Part I, other parts will cover the Doctors and the Federal hospitals in Wilmington.

Medical Facilities, Wilmington 1861-1865.

By Jim McCallum

Dr. Shepard (Joseph Christopher Shepard) was in the midst of a leg amputation when he was captured by the Federals at Fort Fisher in January 1865. He was allowed by his captors to finish the operation before being shipped off with other prisoners to Governor's Island, in New York Harbor. Before the battle he had been at the "Hospital Bombproof," the post's hospital. It was located near "The Pulpit," where the commanding officer, Colonel William Lamb, had his headquarters. It was but one of many hospitals serving Confederate soldiers in the area. There were several hospitals located in the Wilmington area during the war (there were two at Confederate Point, one at Fort Fisher, the other at Camp Wyatt.)

As Captain John Wilkinson wrote, "The staid old town of Wilmington was turned topsy-turvy during the war." This statement was no less true for the Medical community than all other people of the Lower Cape Fear. Many of the young doctors abandoned their civilian practices to become military "Surgeons" (the 19th century term for a doctor) and most were sent to different locations. The town's remaining civilian physicians continued to serve the townspeople as well as offering their services to the military whenever needed. As a result they were hard-pressed to meet the needs of all the patients. Doctors from other areas assigned to troops stationed in the environs assisted the community during their off-duty hours. A considerable number of medical officers served the local military installations, many of whom stayed after the war. Some of the local physicians who took part in the fighting, returned wounded or otherwise changed for the rest of their lives. To say the period 1861-1865 brought dramatic changes is an understatement.

At the onset of the "War for Southern Independence" (Civil War if you wish) there were two hospitals in the area. This is how they came into being. In 1835, Wilmington, a town of less than 2,000 souls, was an active seaport. A group of citizens met in May of that year to organize "The Wilmington Marine Hospital Association." It was formed solely for the relief of sick and suffering sailors who had no family or funds. Mount Terza, a plantation about three miles south of the city (on the east bank of the Cape Fear opposite Cat Island and a short distance south of Dram Tree Point containing about 150 acres) was selected for the hospital. The association failed and the property was conveyed to the "Seaman's Friend Society," an organization formed in 1853 with the same goals. A two-story wooden structure was built by November 1859. It contained a library, chapel and rooms, all neatly furnished. After the onset of hostilities in 1861, this structure was used as a hospital and was known as General Hospital number 4; but continued to be known locally as the Seaman's Hospital. The main building was located at the southwest corner of Front and Dock Streets and Captain Richard P. Paddison gave this description:

About this time (1862) I was appointed hospital steward....I remained at Fort Johnston during the epidemic of yellow fever in 1862...after this I was transferred to General Hospital No. 4...which comprised the Seaman's Home building and buildings on the opposite side of Front Street. Thomas M. Rittenour was surgeon and A.E. Wright and Josh Walker, assistant surgeons. This was one of the largest and best equipped hospitals in the State.

Yet another newspaper article told the story of a man at the hospital who was "under treatment for delirium tremens," and:

under some hallucination, raised the window of the third story, corner Front and Dock St. and pitched out, falling on the pavement and injuring himself so severely that he will probably not recover. As he went out he said he was told to get the horses, and he was going after them.

During the 1862 yellow fever epidemic, this hospital was relinquished by the military for use as a civilian hospital, for the victims of the disease. It was said the wards were clean, airy and comfortable. As might be expected, sometimes even the best intentions went awry. In August, 1863, a blockade runner donated "for the use of the sick in your Hospital," two barrels of limes. A letter to the editor of the Journal, from the Surgeon-in-Charge, told the rest of the story:

The following is a copy of a note accompanying a very valuable donation from Mr. Abe Cohen, Purser of the steamship Arabia...for the comfort of the sick under my charge, for which they tender Mr. Cohen sincere thanks, but complain...very justly, that these luxuries have been forced from them by...Maj. T.B. Venable, and placed in the hands of the Medical Purveyor for distribution, thus diverting them from the destination that the kind donor intended. (signed) M. Ritenour.

It would appear that not only medicine was a precious commodity! Gifts of fruits and other foodstuffs, as well as bandages, medicines and even money were donated to the sick throughout the war.

The second hospital was the United States Marine Hospital, begun in 1857. The U.S. Government had purchased, on the edge of Wilmington, a tract called the Miles Costin farm for the sum of $6,500. This land covered all the area beginning at present-day Eighth and Ann Sts., continuing south along 8th St. to Castle, up to 13th St., thence westerly to Ann St. and down Ann St. back to the beginning. On this property the government erected a masonry structure consisting of a basement and two floors, crowned with a cupola. The building faced 8th St. and on the north side of the wards were placed the tents for outdoor patients, with a laundry building located at the rear of the complex. It had a capacity for about 250 patients and was designated General Hospital No. 5 (locals still called it the Marine Hospital.)

As the war wore on and medical supplies dwindled in the face of a growing number of wounded, military officials determined that steps be taken to decrease the patient population of crowded military hospitals. It was decided to send convalescing soldiers home by rail; however they still needed stopover points for food, change of dressings and bathing. "Wayside" Hospitals were set up along the railroad routes including one at Wilmington. The Wilmington and Weldon Railroad depot (which measured 280 by 80 feet) was selected, as it would minimize moving the men, so cots and bathing and kitchen facilities were installed. The ladies of Wilmington were essential in the smooth operation of moving the men to the facility, feeding and nursing them before they continued on their way. One of the townspeople (Walker Meares) recalled:

[T]he trains were delayed for two hours, to bathe and dress wounds and for a first class meal. By order of the General-in-command...Surgeons were detailed, while the medical men of the city voluntarily offered their services....A telegram from Weldon [by the Virginia border] informed the ladies as to the number on the way, so that on the arrival of the train, all preparations had been made for their comfort among these comforts, not the least was furnishing...clean underclothing....The Ladies never failed in giving this hospital daily attention, and not until the fall of Fort Fisher, and capture of our city, was this hospital abandoned.

Many of the men who passed through town this way recollected the kindness shown them and remarked that it was the only place they received a meal while being transported from Richmond. This hospital was shut down in the winter months when there was a lull in the fighting in Virginia.

Of the four hospitals located here, there is less information available on the Naval Hospital. In the Official (Naval) Records there is a notation listing 135 patients admitted (90 discharged, 3 died) for the 2nd and 3rd quarters of 1864, in the Wilmington Naval Hospital. It also stated that the average daily cost per man was $4.96. It was located on Chestnut, between Water and Front Sts. The Surgeon-in-Charge was Dr. Sandford (likely Dr. John W. Sandford, Jr., stationed here from 1862 to 1864.) This hospital was probably a former residence taken over for hospital use, nowhere near as large as the other facilities.

On 15 January 1865, Fort Fisher fell to the Federals. Thirty-eight days later Wilmington was evacuated and Captain Paddison's narrative continued:

After the fall of Fort Fisher, we had orders to send our sick and wounded to Fayetteville and Goldsboro...we succeeded in getting all except thirty-two removed to safety. These were so badly wounded that it was impossible to move them. I placed these wounded in Ward No. 2 (General Hospital No. 4, Seaman's Hospital) with Mrs. [John] McCauslin, matron, in charge. Supplies were very scarce. Dr. Josh Walker was the last to leave. He went out on Tuesday night and Wednesday morning the streets were swarming with Federal soldiers. About 10 a.m. a surgeon came to our hospital and inquired who was in charge. I replied that I was....He said: 'I want you to move everything out. I want this hospital for our use.' I replied that I had nowhere to go, and no way to move. 'You must find a house,' he replied, 'and at once, and report to me at headquarters. I will furnish you with transportation.' I did not stand on the order of my going. I found a house on Fourth Street near Red Cross, owned by David Bunting, whose family had left the city. I made the report and the Federal surgeon ordered three ambulances. The transfer was soon made. I wish to state that we had courteous treatment from the authorities, but of course we were very short on supplies.

In 1882 (9 June) there appeared the following article in the (Wilmington) Morning Star:

The recently vacated dwelling of Mr. John C. Heyer now being moved from its late position on the corner of 4th and Red Cross Streets to a lot on Red Cross between 6th and 7th Streets, has some historical association connected with it. We learn from the surgeon in charge that it was being used at the time of Lee's surrender at Appomattox as a Confederate Hospital, and from its walls went forth the convalescents to their homes. One informant thinks it was in fact the last Confederate Hospital in use in North Carolina at the close of the war.

[Wouldn't it be interesting if that house is still around? Ed.] Dr. McCallum consulted the following works for his research: The Lonely Road (Diane Cashman, et. al., Eds.; Land of the Golden River, Lewis Phillip Hall; Chronicles of the Cape Fear, James Sprunt; Medicine in North Carolina, Dorothy Lang, Ed., History of the Confederate Navy, J. Thomas Scharf and the Wilmington Journal.)

Our speaker for October, J. Wilson Green gave us a thorough look at the 1864 battles around Petersburg. Beginning by placing North Carolina's role in context, he told us that Petersburg and all Virginia south of the James River were under the same military administration. Wilmington and Petersburg had a lot in common: both were port cities and both contained transportation networks. There were five railroads, like the spokes of a wheel, they led in all directions from Petersburg. By 1864, the main link of the eastern Confederacy was via the Weldon Road. This line of track ran southward, some 62 miles to Weldon, N.C., at which point it continued down to Wilmington. By early 1864, Grant, now in control of all Federal armies, wanted to destroy Robert E. Lee's army. The focus of the northern force was still Richmond, which Grant realized, must be taken. After shifting his army across the James, in a series of maneuvers, he began to surround Petersburg. After unsuccessfully trying to take the city, he decided to cut the city's two main supply lines, the Weldon road and the Boydton Plank road. By August, the rail line was taken and the tracks torn up. There was still a rail connection with the city (the Piedmont railroad) but now it would take much longer to get in and out of the city.

As Grant extended his lines, Lee was forced to do likewise. Lee however, had far fewer men to move about. As the armies settled in to winter quarters, Mr. Green told us, the war was much like the battlefields of WWI—abatis or cheveaux-de-frise (sharpened stakes and felled trees) in front with telegraph wire used as trip wire and miles of trenches! Indeed, the armies now faced each other on a 45-mile front. Throughout 1864, there were 79 battle-sized actions plus numerous others, resulting in seventy thousand casualties. The fighting continued during an early thaw (Hatcher's Run) and as early as January 1865, Lee informed President Jeff Davis that he would not be able to maintain the defense indefinitely and that he would have to leave Richmond and Petersburg undefended. Outnumbered 2 to 1, Lee opted to attack and attempted a breakout for he knew to "stand still was death" to his army. The battle of Fort Stedman (25 March 1865) resulted and turned out to be a Confederate disaster. Lee next planned to shorten his lines and slip away to join Joe Johnston in North Carolina, but Grant kept the pressure on. Dinwiddie Court House, plus Sheridan's victory at Five Forks on 1 April (it was here that Sheridan removed General G.K. Warren from command) and finally Horatio Wright's massive attack, (with 150 guns in support) "broke the back of the Rebellion." It was here, as Union troopers streamed through the lines, that Confederate General A.P. Hill was killed. On that Sunday, Lee sent word to Davis to evacuate Richmond immediately. Mr. Green's story of the Prentiss brothers and their battlefield reconciliation was poignant and a fitting end to the horror of Civil War. Mr. Green noted that part of the Petersburg battlefield is now included in the Pamplin Historical Park and Museum of the Civil War Soldier.

Our November speaker, Mr. Paul Anderson, might well be called a Wilmington native. Born in Lima, Ohio, he came here at nine years of age. After schooling at Trask and Laney (class of '86) he went to UNC Chapel Hill and attained a degree in history. His first career was in journalism when, for a year, he covered the town of Kittery, Maine for the York County Coast Star. Returning to graduate school at the U. of Mississippi, (says he, "I knew nothing more about it at the time than it was in Mississippi and I wanted to see Mississippi") graduated with a Master's degree in 1994. His thesis, "The Savagery in Romance" became the basis for his book. After a brief stint working for the Winston-Salem Journal in Boone ("a year in the mountains") it was back to Mississippi, where he finished up his doctoral degree in 1998.

After teaching for a year at Ole Miss, and a year at the University of Alabama-Birmingham, Mr. Anderson moved on to Clemson University, where he is an assistant professor of history. Blood Image is the title of his book. He has also written two children's books, Robert E. Lee: Legendary Commander of the Confederacy and a yet-to-be-titled book on George Armstrong Custer. Paul is married to the former Keri Bradford of McComb, Mississippi. Married since 1995, they have no children yet, but do have two Labrador Retrievers (Mandy & Gracie) who, he says, "act more like kids and less like dogs!" Mr. Anderson's talk will focus on the command relationship between Turner Ashby and Stonewall Jackson.

TO MAKE GOOD BISCUIT.—Take one quart of flour, half a tea-spoonful of salt, the size of a hen's egg of sweet lard and cold water, and mix to a proper consistence, so as to make a stiff dough; then work or beat with the end or edge of a smoothing iron until blisters rise in the dough; then make and shape with the hand, and bake with a slow fire until thoroughly done. The biscuit will be white in the inside, light, well done, spongy and wholesome; but if rolled out with a rolling pin and cut in shape with a knife, they will be crisp, but not spongy. If biscuits are preferred brittle or moderately hard, temper them with more or less lard. These biscuits will keep sound a month in July or August, and mothers may send a lot to their sons in the army. I feed the sick on them crumbled in coffee or tea. Butter and new milk may be substituted for the lard and water; if butter, use double the quantity, but would likely keep sound long. Get a dressed poplar plank four or five inches thick and two feet square to beat the dough on, and to beat the dough long and well is the great secret of biscuit making. Soda or saleratus should never be used in biscuit; the human stomach being an unfit soap kettle.—Southern Rural Gentleman.

Scratch made biscuits, 1861 style!

Our Round Table has reached a plateau. We now have a logo (proudly sported on our clothing line!) and a name for the newsletter. In the summer of 1994, several gentlemen got together and came to the conclusion that there was enough interest in the Civil War here in Wilmington to form an RT. Thanks are due to those who worked hard to bring forth such an organization. A special thanks to George Slaton, Tommy King, Kemp Burpeau and Jerry Partrick, the original founders! And who had the honor of being the RTs first speaker? Why, Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, of course!

Take implements, Prepare to load! Load! Advance the round!, Fire!

The voice of the Corporal serving as Gunner could distinctly be heard as there were no other sounds except those of the men serving the piece and they were hard at work. I was recently invited to attend (I think it was a recruiting ploy) a living history/reenactment by the modern-day members of Co. D, Adam's Battery. It was an extremely hot day in August, a day that the Battery had come to Fort Anderson to show visitors what was involved in the firing of a civil war cannon. BOOM! The echo ("rolling thunder") could be heard as it rattled across the Cape Fear River. Woe to any pleasure craft that happened to be in the area! We arrived a little after 10 am and met with Lieutenant Colonel Donnie Shannon (of Oak Island) and First Sergeant Jim McKee (Southport) who informed me that the Battery was here to hone their skills for the Sharpsburg battle. For the 140th anniversary of that battle, the unit traveled to Maryland in September and joined more than 100 guns and anywhere from 10 to 15,000 (both Union and Confederate) reenactors. Colonel Shannon, the "old man," has been reenacting for more than ten years now!

The unit has three guns, a six-pounder, a 3" Ordnance rifle and a 10-pounder Parrott rifle. For the upcoming trip, the Battery will field two guns, crewed by some thirty members. The men at Fort Anderson, clad in Confederate Gray, were there for a variety of reasons. For John Hawes (Oak Island) it is because he is a history buff, who feels that history books neglect things and for that reason a part of Southern history is fast slipping away or being ignored. For Bill Eakins (Hampstead) it was a trip to Antietam in 1996. The battlefield was eerily similar to that during the war and after talking to a few reenactors, he decided to give it a try and caught the bug. Richard Long (a member of our Round Table) who, in addition to having a love of the area's rich history, wanted a more active unit than the infantry outfit he belonged to (plus it's closer to home!) Others in the unit joined for many of the same reasons. At the Fort on that hot Saturday were (in addition to the above) Dick Holloman (Kure Beach) Richard Long (Winnebow) David Camp, George Willis, Roger Hawes (John's brother) and Alan Hillburn (Wilmington.)

The Piece! A 3" Ordnance Rifle.

This is how its done!

Later in the day (as if on schedule,) the Union Army appeared in the form of Fred Johnson (from Wilmington.) Fred, a member of the unit's spin-off battery, the 2nd U.S. Colored Artillery (formed mainly of former men of the 54th Massachusetts) has a most compelling reason to be a reenactor, as his ancestors were with 3rd, 24th and 25th USCTs. Not to be outdone, the men of Adam's Battery can also change their allegiance. They sometimes display their skills as Federal Battery E of the 3rd U.S. Light Artillery.

The original Battery, raised in Beaufort County was reorganized in April, 1862 and elected Z.T. Adams as Captain. Most batteries took the name of their commander, hence "Adam's" battery! They were stationed mainly in eastern N.C. and took part in the attacks on Washington and New Bern. In 1864 they returned to Fort Fisher in time for the attacks of December and January. At those battles, they manned Battery Bolles (which consisted of two 10-inch rifled Columbiads) and Battery Purdie. This last battery contained the famed 150-pound Armstrong gun, a gift from it's English manufacturer. During the battle of Fort Fisher, men from the battery were at the main Sally Port, manning light artillery. Elements of the Battery also fought at Bentonville before war's end.

On Saturday, in addition to loading and firing the cannon to the delight of the visitors, the men were always glad to answer any questions put to them by their audience. We were shown the various functions of the men as they prepared, loaded and fired (and cleaned) the piece. It takes about seven men to properly maintain a firing rate of two (aimed shots) or four (unaimed) shots per minute. A Gunner (usually a Corporal) would direct the four men at the gun, while two men remained at the ammunition caisson. A sergeant was the "Chief of the Piece," while a Lieutenant or Captain was in overall command. The day continued with Wet Sponge! Dry Sponge! Ram, round, ready! Pick, prime. Prepare! Fire! BOOM! And plenty of smoke! Finally, Secure the piece! Everyone there knows everyone else's job; drills with 7, 6, 5, 4, 3 and even two man drills are held. Such was the attrition rate among artillerymen. Nowadays The thirty-three members of the Battery stress safety and have been called the most professional battery in Alexander's Battalion (of Longstreet's Corps,) to which they are attached.

BOOM!

Battery Headquarters at Fort Anderson.

In between firings (the gun was probably fired close to twenty times that day) the men held their meeting about Sharpsburg. Schedules, driving directions and set-up locations were distributed and many questions were answered. Authenticity is a strict requirement. There would be no plastic water bottles in evidence, no wristwatches and even one's eyeglasses had to conform to the period. The present-day Battery is always looking for new members, so if you are interested in getting a real feel of black powder artillery, you can visit their website at www.geocities.com/adamsbattery.geo or contact Jim McKee at batwing@southport.net. After an initial outlay of about $500 (for a period uniform,) you too can smell the powder. It is not all work though, there is time to play. The unit holds an annual get-together for food and fun (at Fort Anderson, which the men consider home.) If you do decide to try it out, be prepared to thoroughly enjoy yourself! Check the website or call, but the next scheduled appearance is set for Secessionville, S C, (Nov. 23-24.) Around three p.m., time to shut down operations, we watched as the men began to clean the cannon. That was our signal to depart, before we were enlisted and put to work!

P.S. In addition to reenactments, the men speak to school and civic groups and appear at special functions around town. Next April they will be at the School of the Piece at Fort Anderson. See Richard Long for a complimentary newsletter (and application.)

Thursday October 3 Meeting, Cape Fear Club (206 Chestnut Street, corner of 2nd)
Social Hour 6:30 p.m., Program 7:00 p.m.

Attention! Attention! Attention! Attention! Attention! Attention!

Please note the meeting date, as it is Thursday.

Our October meeting will be held at the Cape Fear Club. It will be a dinner meeting and your money ($19.50) will have to be in by 27 September. Please note also that the meeting begins at 7 p.m. Dinner will include chicken, barbeque, baked beans, slaw, soft drinks, coffee and cake. We apologize for the short date. Our speaker will be A. Wilson Greene (see below.)

Our speaker at our September meeting, David Norris, now a resident of our fair city, gave us an in-depth look at Major General John Gray Foster's raid on Goldsboro. Foster, an 1846 graduate of West Point found himself in command of the (Union) Department of North Carolina in 1862. Mr. Norris told us that it was probably Foster's desire to use the men under his command before their enlistments ran out, that prompted his decision to attack Goldsboro, or more specifically, the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad-General Robert E. Lee's lifeline to the troops in Virginia. Foster had an idea on how to bring the war to a conclusion. He would cut the railroad, move back to New Bern, board vessels which would take him to Wilmington and then attack that city! By cutting the road, Confederates would not be able to speedily reinforce that city. The plans were ambitious, but never came to fruition. Gathering most of his men (some eleven thousand infantry and cavalry along with forty pieces of artillery, covered by several gunboats) Foster advanced on 11 December 1862, following the Trent River. After sharp skirmishes at Southwest Creek, Kinston and Whitehall (present-day Seven Springs) he moved on to the railroad bridge at Goldsboro. His attack was made in conjunction with General Ambrose Burnside's push to Fredericksburg. Even though Foster had received word of Burnside's failure, he continued on.

Approaching the tracks of the W&W, he sent two columns southward to strike at depots below Goldsboro (Everettsville and Mount Olive,) he moved with his main column, targeting the railroad bridge over the Neuse River. There he met Confederate troops under Generals "Shanks" Evans and Thomas Clingman, entrenched on the north side of the bridge. After a stubborn battle lasting several hours, a Union trooper managed to set the bridge afire and Foster, not wishing to press his luck decided it was time to leave. The Confederates didn't know that Foster's men were nearly out of ammunition. Making their way back to their New Bern enclave, the Federals would never again make such a large movement from their eastern bases. As Mr. Norris posed, was the raid successful? The planned attack on Wilmington fizzled out, but the railroad bridge was destroyed and one or two miles of track had been torn up, with several buildings and warehouses burned. At Whitehall, the Federals had damaged the gunboat (the CSS Neuse) being built there, but none of the damage was permanent. The railroad bridge was rebuilt and the road was back in operation in a short time and the gunboat was eventually completed. Foster was later transferred to the Department of the South and would ask to be relieved of duty due to injuries from a fall from a horse. He died in 1874 in Nashua, New Hampshire.

Our October speaker will be A. Wilson Greene. Mr. Greene is a Chicago native who received his B.A. in history from Florida State University and M.A. in History from Louisiana State University. He worked for 16 years for the National Park Service as a historian and Park Manager, including three years at Petersburg National Battlefield and 8 years at Fredericksburg & Spotsylvania National Military Park. He left the Park Service in 1990 to serve as the first president and executive director of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites, now the Civil War Preservation Trust. In 1995 he became executive director of the Pamplin Historical Park and the National Museum of the Civil War Soldier.

Mr. Greene is the author of six books and more than two dozen articles on Civil War history. His most recent book is "Breaking the Backbone of the Rebellion: The Final Battles of the Petersburg Campaign," which will be the subject of his talk. He is currently working on a history of Petersburg during the Civil War. He is a frequent lecturer and tour guide for the Smithsonian Institute and a variety of other organizations.

Please join us in welcoming Steve Gunter as the newest member of the Steering Committee.

Patriotism or Piracy?

The U.S. mail steamer Roanoke pulled out of Havana harbor in November 1864, bound for New York. After about four hours, a man, dressed in a Confederate officer's uniform shouted, "In the name of the Confederate States of America, I demand the surrender of this vessel as a lawful prize!" Several other men with him moved quickly throughout the steamer disarming and rounding up the crew. One crewman resisted and "four balls pierced the body of the man." He was the only casualty of Lieutenant John Clibborn Braine's plot to seize a ship out from under the noses of the Yankees and bring it to Wilmington, N.C. He found, however, he could not get into the port of St. Georges in Bermuda, so after disembarking the crew and passengers on a passing brig, he set the ship afire.

It was not John Braine's first seizure of a northern steamer. In December 1863, he had boarded the steamer Chesapeake in New York. She was bound for Portland Maine, when Braine and his accomplices, took over the ship. He steamed the vessel northward, dropping the passengers and crew at St. John's (New Brunswick) where he attempted to get coal and other provisions. Massachusetts Governor John Andrew wrote to Navy Secretary Gideon Welles, "I pray immediate orders for pursuit to be made...and that proper requisition be made on British Government for the pirates[.]" Welles quickly ordered all available vessels to steam out in search of the Chesapeake. Braine's action in taking the vessel on the high seas caused the U.S. Navy to panic; orders went out to every port on the northeastern seaboard to dispatch any and all available warships to find the Chesapeake. In all, some fifteen ships were quickly readied to go. From New York harbor, the USS Vicksburg, Sebago and Grand Gulf went out; from Charlestown and Gloucester, Massachusetts, went the Acacia, Cornubia (a recently captured blockade runner) and Magara. From Portland the Agawam and Dacotah began their search. Yet another former blockade runner, the Ellie and Annie was also dispatched, but many of the vessels sent out were not ready for duty. The Acacia sent word to the Navy Department that they were sinking, while the Sebago found it necessary to return to port and it was thought best to recall the Vicksburg as well. The Acacia made it to a wharf where the local fire department assisted in pumping out water to keep her afloat.

The remaining ships scoured the areas thought to be likely havens, but the Chesapeake was on the move also. Braine didn't know it at the time, but his actions set off an international incident that would bring the United States and Great Britain to the brink of war. At St. John, He had sought money from the Confederate agent there, but had been refused aid. The Annie and Ellie (renamed the U.S.S. Malvern) came upon the Chesapeake near Halifax and as most of the Confederates had already fled, arrested the sole member aboard and put him "in double irons." A prize crew was then put aboard the Chesapeake and both ships began to make their way back to Boston (breaking several international laws.)

The U.S.S. Decatur found the two vessels and informed Lieutenant Nichols of the Malvern to bring the ship to Halifax, Nova Scotia instead. British feathers were immediately ruffled when, "Three war steamers bearing the flag of the United States having arrived here, and no officer belonging to either of them... reported...to the administrator of the government[.]" After the reason for coming to Halifax was explained (denying that they had captured any prisoners in Canadian waters,) the British took charge of the Chesapeake. When the U.S. Navy ships attempted to leave the harbor, the British demanded the release of the prisoners. When this request was ignored, the military governor had the forts at the mouth of the harbor readied for action! For a while, it looked like a battle might erupt. A Canadian lawyer wrote to Confederate Secretary of State Judah P. Benjamin that the prisoner, who, when given over to the British authorities, was charged by the Federals with murder and piracy. When he landed ashore, "one or two of our [sympathizers] stepped between him and the constables....[T]o the infinite amusement of the bystanders and the chagrin of the Federal consul and a few Yankee spies that follow in his train here [he was spirited away.]"

British and U.S. lawyers then took up the fight. Was it piracy or was it a legitimate act of war? Another sympathizer wrote George Davis (later to become the Confederate States Attorney General) of the case, requesting that the Confederate government be advised. If the men were acting on behalf of their government, the seizure was legitimate; if not, the men would be extradited to the United States and face murder charges. In addition, the Chesapeake and its cargo, said to be worth more than $150,000 was also at stake. J. P. Holcombe, well-versed in admiralty laws, was sent as a special commissioner to Halifax to declare that the Richmond authorities assumed responsibility for the act. The case, which began in February, 1864 turned out to have several surprises in store. It was revealed that of all the men who took part in the seizure (some 14 or 15) only one could claim to be a citizen of the Confederate States. The main organizer of the affair, one Vernon Locke (also known as John Parker) had a Confederate "letter of marque," but that document was for another vessel, the Retribution. In addition, it was revealed that Locke, a Canadian, had enlisted the men in that country, a violation of neutrality laws. The fact also emerged that the men had sold a portion of the cargo (to try to purchase coal and food,) further painting them as pirates. The Confederate Commissioner, Holcombe, decided not to intervene in the case and admitted to Benjamin, "it appears to have been a capture made for the benefit of the Confederacy by a body of men without any public authority, and who, with [a] single exception...were British subjects." After reviewing the facts of the case, Benjamin agreed:

The steamer Chesapeake, after her capture, landing passengers in the Bay of Fundy (From The Confederate Navy, A Pictorial History.)

The case...seems to be simply that of men who, sympathizing with us in a righteous cause, erroneously believed themselves authorized to act as belligerents against the United States by virtue of Parker's...letter of marque[.]"

The British courts returned the captured steamer to its original owners and the men under Braine and Locke were released from custody. Braine, who early in the war had spent six months in prison because of his Confederate leanings (he was released when he advised his captors that he was a British subject,) again embarked on his career when he took the mail steamer Roanoke, late in 1864. Once again he ran into Confederate bureaucracy. Even though he had a legitimate appointment as an acting master, from Secretary of the Navy Stephen R. Mallory and orders to, "proceed to Wilmington, and there make the necessary arrangements to capture upon the high seas the Federal steamer Roanoke," the agent at Havana declined to assist him and warned him against recruiting any Cubans for the operation! Forced to burn the steamer at St. George (Bermuda) he was arrested but escaped. He would continue to be a problem for the Union, capturing two schooners in the Chesapeake Bay, in late 1865. He made his way to England, remaining there until after the war, when he returned to the United States. He died in poverty in Tampa, Florida in 1906.

(Much of the above came from the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies and The Confederate Navy, A Pictorial History, by Philip Van Doren Stern.)

The Tennessee-What General Sherman Says

General Sherman says the Tennessee was built cut sharp at the bow and plated to be used as a ram. She had heavy engines and sat well down in the water. But the heavy engines were then taken out and light ones put in, and when that was done, she stood above the mark of steadiness in the water. In other words she was top heavy, and the engines were too light for the vessel. As she had a very light load on this trip, the effect in a heavy sea can easily be imagined.

Friday September 13 Meeting, St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7 p.m., Program 7:30 p.m.

Please note the meeting date as it has changed (see below.)

Our speaker at our May meeting, Eric Wittenberg (an acknowledged expert on the battle) gave us a detailed look at the two-day battle that took place at Trevilian Station (sixty miles west of Richmond) on 11 and 12 June 1864. Noting that it was the largest cavalry fight of the war, it was also the first large battle after the death of Jeb Stuart. Some 9,300 Federals fought 6,300 Confederates in what Mr. Wittenburg described as a "strategic battle." In an attempt to move south, General U.S. Grant used his cavalry as a diversion while he slipped across the James River. While Wade Hampton came to prominence in this engagement, Phillip Sheridan's reputation was damaged. Indeed, as Mr. Wittenburg informed us, Sheridan accomplished none of his objectives. He did not destroy the Virginia Central Railroad nor did he link up with General David Hunter. Grant, however, was successful in crossing the James. One interesting anecdote mentioned the plight of General George A. Custer. He found himself cutoff and surrounded by the enemy. An attempt was made by the federals to break through to him, but it failed. The relief column was led by a Captain Marcus Reno, who in 1876, would again fail to get through to Custer. Mr. Wittenburg autographed copies of his book, Glory Enough for All: Sheridan's Second Raid and the Battle of Trevilian Station after his talk.

Our September speaker will be David Norris. Mr. Norris was born in Charlotte, N.C. He graduated from East Carolina University with a BFA in art. After living in Greenville for a long time, he and his wife Carol moved to Wilmington about two years ago. He has written numerous magazine and encyclopedia articles (including articles for The State, American History Illustrated, America's Civil War, Military Images and N.C. Historical Review) over the past decade, mainly on Civil War or North Carolina topics. Besides writing, he spends his spare time in his art studio, playing guitar or attempting to maintain a garden! Mr. Norris will speak on Foster's Raid to Goldsboro. His article on the raid appeared in the August issue of Civil War Times.

In an effort to accommodate as many members as possible, our meeting date has been changed (again!) to the second Friday of the month. We apologize for any inconvenience.

Included in this month's issue is a membership application form, which might also serve as a gentle reminder that its dues time again. If you haven't paid your dues for the year, you may mail a check or money order (to Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, P.O. Box 10535, Wilmington, N.C. 28405) or pay Dan Geddie at the next meeting. Dues are still twenty-five dollars, still a bargain for the price! Also, its raffle time again. If you have any items (books or prints in particular) suitable for donation, please call Mike Budziszewski (458-1370) or simply bring them to the next meeting!

By 1864 we know what the South felt about Braxton Bragg's military prowess. Denigrated throughout the Confederacy, in February of that year he was appointed President Jefferson Davis' military advisor. In July, he was sent to Atlanta to investigate General Joe Johnston's failure to stop Sherman. What was the Northern reaction? The following news excerpt is from the New York Times, 22 July 1864.

The Inevitable Bragg

The most encouraging piece of news which has reached us with regard to SHERMAN'S position in Georgia, is that Gen. BRAGG has gone to Atlanta to exercise a personal supervision over the movements of the rebel army. This only is sufficient to remove all doubts as to the ultimate success of Sherman's operations. There are not many Generals to whom the Union cause is more deeply indebted than to Gen. Bragg, and the assistance which he has rendered it is all the more creditable to him, as his sympathies must of course be altogether on the rebel side. No matter how this war may end, no true Unionist can forget the valuable cooperation which Gen. Rosecrans received from him in Tennessee...and it was...in no small degree to the masterly combinations of the Confederate leader that we got into Chattanooga without firing a shot....Finding our army was in great straits at Chattanooga, he let us have Lookout Valley, and believing that Longstreet's presence on Missionary Ridge was probably embarrassing us, he dispatched that...personage for Knoxville and left himself for Dalton when requested to do so by Gen. Grant.

We consider, therefore, the arrival of such an old and tried friend at Atlanta as a happy omen. We may feel satisfied that...he will, before many days "supervise" the city, if not the garrison, into Gen. Sherman's hands....When Bragg appears in the field, he "means business," not talk. Instead of making propositions, he hands us over States, fortresses, rivers, armies and cities, anything and everything that comes in his way. [Many believe that's the real reason Fort Bragg received its name! Ed.]

A Message From Our President

The Civil War armies stopped fighting more than 137 years ago. The last of the war's veterans died forty-three years ago. For the past eight years, members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table have been meeting to learn about the war and those who fought it. Now the organization is ready to begin its ninth season of study and fellowship. With it perhaps we will be more enlightened as to why those brave men in blue and gray fought so desperately and reflect on what their sacrifices meant to our nation. The Civil War's battles ended long ago, but in many ways the struggle is not over. We Americans still deal with issues over which the war was fought: liberty, equality and national purpose. At the end of the year, however, I suspect we will again better appreciate what one important American wrote so eloquently during the Civil War, that is, that our great nation is still the best hope for mankind on earth. Welcome back members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

Be sure to bring a little extra money to our first meeting. We have a surprise in store!

How We Spent Our Summer Vacation!

Our summer vacation began early this year. Last May was Confederate History Month here in town. There were several Civil War themed talks hosted by the Library, Fort Fisher, the Cape Fear Museum and the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society. We didn't get out to all of them, but did get to the grand reopening of the exhibits at Fort Fisher. The new laser light show was superb! Of course, it was interesting to once again view the cargo of the wrecked blockade runner Modern Greece, but an added attraction was the (temporary) display of General N. Martin Curtis' Medal of Honor and Colonel Charles F. Fisher's sword. We did get there just in time to join John Winecoff, (in costume as Major General Alfred H. Terry) as he led the last tour of the day.

Also at Fort Fisher was researcher Henry Mintz, whose lecture and slide presentation on "Confederates of the Lower Cape Fear" was very well received. More interesting was what he mentioned about his time researching at the National Archives in Washington, D.C. He informed us that one of the mainstays of Civil War research, the Official Records, is only the tip of the iceberg! To start, there are 300 reels of surname indexes, and then there are the Confederate Adjutant Inspector General's files, the U.S. Secretary of War files and several other files that only the most die-hard researchers know about. Mr. Mintz even went so far as to indicate which Federal researchers were the most helpful!

The last lecture attended was that given by noted author William C. Davis. He spoke about the writings of the Civil War. Would it surprise you (as it did us) that the first Civil War book was written in 1808! Titled Memoirs of the Northern Kingdom, the book was only sixty pages long, but was a portend of things to come. One of the reasons so much has been written about the war is because, said Mr. Davis, "It's the best story America had!" There were several other meetings held around town, so if you attended one, let us know how it was!

Our real summer vacation began with a trip to Columbus, Georgia. The driving time was just about eight hours, right to "Port Columbus." Our first stop was, naturally enough, to the National Civil War Naval Museum (formerly known as the Confederate Naval Museum.) The museum is home to the remains of the ironclad C.S.S. Jackson (or Muscogee) and the gunboat Chattahoochee. The Jackson was built at Columbus and was launched 22 December 1864, but before it had its armor and guns, it was destroyed (by fire) as the Union troops approached the city in April 1865. There are replicas of Admiral Farragut's flagship, the U.S.S. Hartford as well as the C.S.S. Albemarle (where we went through the Ironclad Combat Simulator.) We were there in time to view a large model of the U.S.S. Monitor, donated to the Museum by Turner Productions. The model was used in the TNT show, "Ironclads," shown a few years ago. As we strolled through the exhibits, we couldn't help but notice the beautiful artwork adorning the walls. A huge mural depicting virtually all of the Confederate States' Naval vessels takes up a portion of the wall, but there are paintings (which are for sale) and a gift shop, which also make the trip worthwhile.

National Civil War Naval Museum, Columbus, Ga.

Stone Mountain, (near Atlanta.)

If you ever go to Columbus, be sure to visit the National Infantry Museum, on the base at Fort Benning. In addition to a fine Civil War collection, there is something for everyone there, from Colonial days to the present. But that's not all! Although we didn't go there, from Columbus it is only about an hour and a half to Andersonville (ten miles north of Americus.) Here you will find the National Prisoner of War Museum, the Andersonville National Cemetery and the prison site itself. While you are in the neighborhood, you might as well visit Plains, home of President Jimmy Carter, another National Historic Site. On our way back we stopped at Atlanta (there is a fine Civil War museum here also) and Stone Mountain (you just have to take the cable car ride to the top!) In all, it was a very (Georgian) Civil War summer!

North Carolina State Issue, 1863. This five-dollar note, printed by J.T. Patterson & Co. is known to collectors as the "Wilmington Waterfront Note." "Flanked by the goddess of liberty and a portrait of N.C. Treasurer Daniel W. Courts," some collectors believe it is simply a generic one, while others believe it shows the actual waterfront. (From Documenting the American South, UNC Chapel Hill.)

Be sure to check next month's issue to find out just who John C. Braine was!

Cavalry Operations in the Civil War

Mr. Eric J. Wittenburg is a student of cavalry operations in the Eastern Theater of the War. He is a native of southeastern Pennsylvania and was educated at Dickinson College and the University of Pittsburgh School of Law. He is an attorney in private practice in Columbus, Ohio. His first book, Gettysburg's Forgotten Cavalry Actions, won the third annual Batchelder-Coddington Literary Award (1998) as the best new work interpreting the battle of Gettysburg. Subsequent works include studies of the Michigan Cavalry Brigade, the fight on East Cavalry Field at Gettysburg and Glory Enough For All: The Battle of Trevilian Station and Sheridan's Second Raid, which was selected as a premium offered by the Civil War Preservation Trust. Mr. Wittenburg is involved with the preservation of Trevilian Station battlefield and works with the Foundation to preserve and interpret the battlefield.

Civil War Prisons

Mr. Lonnie Speer began his talk on Civil war prisons by admitting that although Northern "propaganda" was better than that of the South, both Northern and Southern prisons were bad. More than 674,000 soldiers suffered the fate of being taken prisoner during the war: over 211,000 Union troops were taken by Confederates while over 262,000 Southerners became POW's. Breaking down the numbers of prisons, Mr. Speer informed us that there were seventy-five prisons on each side and at least 20 of those could be termed "notorious." Both sides initially used existing jails (such as the Henrico County jail, or the Tombs in N.Y.C.) but after the parole system was halted, both sides had to find space to contain their prisoners. Prisons and then forts were used, (such as Castle Pinckney in Charleston Harbor) These sites eventually became overcrowded, with (late in the war) as many as 25 per cell which before the war, held six or eight convicts. As the war ground on, things got worse for anyone captured in battle. Mr. Speer pointed out that soldiers stood a better chance of surviving a battle than they did in captivity (the death rate of prisoners reached thirteen percent versus five percent killed in battle!) Existing buildings were used with probably the most famous (at least in the South) being Libby prison in Richmond, while Old Capitol in Washington soon gained notoriety.

When the parole system was abandoned, new prisons were sorely needed. In Camp Douglas (Illinois) barracks were built on stilts (to prevent tunneling.) By mid war, stockade enclosures were used to herd prisoners. In Salisbury prison, there were barracks, tents and even caves, where soldiers tried to survive the elements. In Elmira, some Southerners lived year-round in tents, while in Andersonville, they lived under makeshift shelters. Both sides, said Mr. Speer, utilized the infamous "Dead Line," to keep the men away from the wall. Early on, both Richmond and Washington agreed to feed their prisoners as they did their own troops; however, by mid war, the South was in a desperate way. Their crops and animals were destroyed; storage and processing facilities were gone; transportation was nonexistent. Though the people themselves suffered, it was the POW's in the South who felt it the most. In retaliation, Northern prisons cut food rations again and again, until the soldiers were on quarter rations. These men, on both sides, were forgotten or ignored by their governments (although one or two attempts were made to free them, all failed.) It would not be until wars end that relief for these men came. Mr. Speer's new book, War of Vengeance, Acts of Retaliation Against Civil War POWs will be available in September.

This just in! An Appraisal Fair and Collecting Symposium will be held on 31 May (5 p.m. to 9 p.m.) & 1 June (9 a.m. to 4 p.m.) at the Lattimer House (126 s. 3rd St.) The public is also invited to sample an old-fashioned pig pickin' in the Gardens, on Friday evening. Call 762-0492 for tickets and more information. D.C. North, an expert on decoys & Jim Nichols, a toy collecting authority will speak on Friday night, with their expertise. On Sat. experts will appraise, display & sell an eclectic array of collectibles, including estate jewelry, silver, maps, postcards, Oriental rugs, porcelain, furniture, heritage plant & much, much more.

Fork's Road

Congratulations are in order to our town's newest treasure, the Louise Wells Cameron Museum of Art. Congratulations also to Mr. Bruce Cameron and Museum officials for their foresight in allowing the Confederate earthworks (located on the property) to remain and not be destroyed in the name of progress! As members of any preservation society realize, once these relics of the past are gone, well "...they don't make 'em anymore!"

Although not a battle on the scale of those in Virginia, this action was significant not only for the fate of Wilmington, but also for the fact that the mettle of African-Americans was again tested by combat. The battle at Fork's Road, although essentially a delaying action by Confederates, pitted about 900 battle-hardened veterans of Clingman's Brigade (Hoke's Division) against the men of the Fourth, Fifth and Twenty-seventh U.S. Colored Troops of Wright's Brigade (Paine's Division)

Fort Fisher had fallen the month before and Confederates, (consisting of the 8th, 31st, 51st and 61st Regiments) after being forced from the Sugar Loaf (Carolina Beach) line, knew the Yankees would not be long in coming! They dug in and dug in deep, behind breastworks constructed by throwing the sand about four or five feet high; there was also a ditch dug in front of the works, to further obstruct any attackers. While they made their stand along the Federal Point Road, Confederates in town (only three miles away) were busy shipping out military stores on the already-overtaxed rail system. The skirmishing began on 20 February when the 5th U.S.C.T. advanced toward the works. They got to within 150 yards before cannon and small arms fire halted their advance.

As Dr. Fonvielle has recounted in his book, The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, it was also the location where brother fought brother. The Horne boys, Jacob and Hosea found themselves on opposite sides of those entrenchments. Hosey was with the Wilmington Horse Artillery while Jacob was in the Second N.C. (U.S.) Infantry.

By February twenty-second, the breastworks were abandoned. Wilmington had been flanked by Union troops coming in from the west. The city, now at the mercy of the Federals, was surrendered on 22 February. The Fork's Road site, protected because of its remoteness, remained almost pristine; we say almost because relic hunters did dig in the area. It was through the efforts of Dr. Fonvielle that the site, at one time scheduled to be developed, was preserved. With the construction of the Museum, visitors will now have the opportunity to indulge in the arts and to also step outside and be transported back in time! Restoration work has been ongoing for some time now, with our RT as well as students from Dr. Fonvielle's history courses. It is hard work, using virtually the same tools (shovels and bushhogs) that were used in the original construction. When completed, the earthworks will be covered with grass (to prevent erosion) and will be maintained by our RT. We have put together some photos (see below) of the work. If you have not already been in the trenches, don't worry, the work will be ongoing for a while longer. Come on down!

C.S.S. NORTH CAROLINA

The Inglorious Career of a Confederate Ram

By Richard Long

By February 1862 the "War for Southern Independence" was not going well in North Carolina. Federal gunboats had made short work of Flag Officer William F. Lynch's "Mosquito Fleet" at Elizabeth City and most of the towns around the sounds had been occupied. Wilmington residents were nervous and began developing their own plans for defense of the port. The Daily Journal called for "immediate and effective action." Impressed by the performance of the C.S.S. Virginia against the Yankees at Hampton Roads, the newspaper proposed that a Committee be formed to collect funds to build a similar vessel on the Cape Fear. Realizing that the Virginia drew too much water for local use, the Journal suggested an adaptation. "While of course a vessel for our purposes ought not to draw more than half that much water, if even that, and ought to be in everything but power of resistance far smaller than the 'Collosus of the Roads.' No matter how rough or ugly she looks. She don't want more than two guns, but they must be rousers." Ram fever had come to the Cape Fear! A "Gunboat Fund" account was opened at the Bank of the Cape Fear and donations were solicited. A sense of patriotism swept the region as civilians and military alike, submitted donations. One local planter, short on cash, offered ten bales of cotton to encourage other locals to donate "other articles, to be converted into money." By April 1862, residents began to doubt the ability of the Army's fortifications to protect them and the desire to build "one or more" ironclad steamers reached a fevered pitch.

Local citizens got a morale boost in April when the Journal informed them the "whole matter has been undertaken by the Confederate government." In early May, Wilmington shipbuilders began gathering materials to construct two ironclad rams of a design similar to the C.S.S. Richmond. Based on an 1846 design of Naval Constructor John L. Porter, it would be a vessel of medium length, low profile and shallow draft. By war's end, a total of six such vessels would be completed. The Navy ordered two of these ships to be built at Wilmington, the Raleigh would be built by the Cassidey yard on the east bank of the river while the contract for the North Carolina went to Beery & Bros., whose yards were on the west bank of the river (just south of Battleship Park.) Some historians have claimed that these yards were ill equipped for this work, as they were used to building only small coastal vessels and river steamers. A closer look at the Wilmington area indicates that had raw materials and labor been more abundant, these two vessels could have been completed locally. In Wilmington, there were sawmills, iron works, machine shops and experienced boat wrights. Indeed, the area had everything required, except raw materials and time.

Like others of the Richmond class, the rams were designed to have an overall length of 174 feet, providing a ram forward and propeller protection astern. The hull length was 150 feet below the main deck with a beam of 32 feet. Above the main, a 20-inch thick, 105-foot casement, angled to 35 degrees was to be covered with four inches of armor. The deck itself was plated with two inches of armor, while two engines driving a single prop shaft furnished motive power. Both ships were to contain a battery of four guns, one each fore and aft (mounted on pivots) and one each athwart ship on each side. Thusly armed, the rams were capable of a three-gun broadside in either direction or fire from all quarters. When completed, the vessels displaced 800 tons and had a draft of 13 feet. The "shallow draft" of these vessels would prove inadequate in a river whose average depth was twelve and a half feet outside the main channel.

Work at Beery & Bros. began in June, but this ram, the North Carolina, was doomed to failure almost immediately. Shipbuilding throughout the Confederacy was hampered by a lack of significant labor and material shortages. In addition, when materials were found, poor overland transportation, combined with stiff competition (in the form of the army) for those scarce resources proved nearly insurmountable. In August 1862, the arrival of the blockade-runner Kate brought more than just much-needed supplies. The dreaded Yellow Fever spread throughout the town and soon reached epidemic proportions. By the end of September, seven hundred were dead. Citizens fled the town, commerce with the port was cut off and all work on the rams ceased through the summer. By January 1863, workers were back at their jobs, but progress was slow. Even so, the North Carolina must have at least looked handsome in her ways. Her 12x12 inch keel was made of gum while white oak and pine formed her beams and floors. Planks were made of juniper and ash, with the interior finished with cherry wood. Unfortunately, all of the available timber was green.

In the history of shipbuilding, green wood has been used for ship hulls and planking. Beam and ribs are easier to shape when green; hull planking is caulked with material like oakum. When the hull is put in water, the green boards swell and squeeze the joints watertight. However, once formed to shape, ribs must be given time to dry and the hull planks need to swell evenly. In addition, the bottom of wooden ships must be copper clad or otherwise treated to resist rot and worms. Ships also needed maintenance; this procedure involved beaching the vessel and cleaning its bottom. The North Carolina had been built too quickly, was not treated and was too heavy to be dragged ashore once launched. She was also woefully underpowered having been fitted with the engine from the 124-ton tug, Uncle Ben. By June 1863, the C.S.S. North Carolina was completed and launched. The engine was cursed with frequent breakdowns and the formidable looking ram was often towed from one post to another. Within six months she began to "hog" at the bow, a condition where the bow is lower than the stern, giving the appearance of a hog rooting around his pen. By December the warping and splitting of beams had caused planking to twist and leak. It was decided to remove the armor plating forward of the casement to bring the bow up.

Even with her problems, the federal fleet was quite concerned about the presence of ironclads in the Cape Fear River. The closest the North Carolina ever came to firing a shot in anger was early in 1864, when local Confederate forces faced off against each other. In the first months of the war, Navy Secretary Stephen Mallory had turned cotton onto currency to pay for overseas war materiel. Blockade-runners were required to hold a portion of space for government cargo. In March 1864, the runners Alice and Hansa refused to take on their share of cotton belonging to the Navy. Newly appointed Naval Agent William Peters informed Secretary Mallory of the situation and was instructed to hold the runners. Peters was also told to call on Commander Lynch for assistance, if needed. The situation quickly deteriorated when, on March eighth, Lynch thought the runners might be attempting to slip away, without the Navy cotton.

Lynch ordered the Alice to anchor near the North Carolina. Her Captain refused, so Lynch sent Marines aboard to take control of the ship. As this was taking place, Major General William Whiting (the area's Army commander) received an order from Lynch to stop and detain the Hansa. The two men had had a strained relationship for months and Whiting had no idea what had taken place. In his demand for an explanation, he wrote, "I will permit no interference with any vessel not belonging to the C.S. Navy by any authority but my own, or by orders of the War Department." Commander Lynch explained his position and Whiting sent soldiers aboard to guard the Hansa. Throughout the day, the two commanders argued as to whom was in charge. Lynch gave orders to use any means to stop the vessels, while Whiting insisted the Marine guard be removed and moved troops near the Navy Yard to expel the Marines by force if necessary. Sometime during the night, both vessels were returned to the quartermaster's wharf and the troops were reduced to a small detachment each. The next morning, the Army and Navy stood poised to do battle with each other as Lynch had the North Carolina towed over and moored close by the Hansa. The North Carolina was ordered to "sink her if she moves!" There they remained until Inspector General Samuel Cooper intervened, ordering the two branches of the service to return to their posts.

In June 1864, a crewman wrote home, "Our ship is not worth much, her decks are beginning to give way so much that we can hardly work the guns." Only a month later the North Carolina was moved to a shoal off Smithville (Southport) where her guns were removed and the remaining crew began stripping her armor. The Raleigh (which had been completed in 1864) struggled over the bar at New Inlet and with three smaller gunboats engaged the Union fleet off Fort Fisher. The ten-hour "engagement" was unremarkable and the Raleigh ran aground on her return, becoming a wreck in short order. As for the North Carolina, things got worse. Toredos (shipworms) turned the unprotected hull into a honeycomb-like sieve and the constant leaking required the pumps to be run at all times. In July, she was moored off Battery Island opposite Smithville as engineers continued the fight to keep her afloat. She finally settled on a shoal in September and what was left of her crew removed the last of her guns and continued stripping her armor plating. For a while, the North Carolina was used as a picket station, but her days as a warship were over. She remained at her last post until she was burned to the waterline in 1871. The Editor of the Morning Star wrote, "We hate to see the old relics of the late 'unpleasantness' thus disappearing."

In October 1995, a 15,000-pound anchor was dropped into her hull and the Army Corps of Engineers thought it a good time to document the wreck. It was discovered that significant damage had occurred and documentation was begun in July 1997. Today, the C.S.S. North Carolina lies at the edge of Battery Island in 12-

16 feet of water, partially buried in silt. There is a surprising amount of the lower hull remaining, as well as many artifacts. There appears to be as much of her left as remains of the C.S.S. Neuse and the documentation provides good insights into her construction. Interestingly, the Wilmington-built ram was not the only C.S.S. North Carolina to be built, if not commissioned. The Confederate government had ordered twin 2750-ton, ironclad, turret ships from Laird Shipbuilders in England. These steam and sail barks were to be named North Carolina and Mississippi and were nearly completed when seized by the British government in October 1863. A few months later, the would-be North Carolina was commissioned by the Royal Navy as H.M.S. Scorpion, assigned to the Channel fleet until 1869 when she was moved to Bermuda. H.M.S. Scorpion served the Royal Fleet until she was sunk as a target in 1901. In 1903 she was raised and sold for scrap, but was lost at sea while being towed to the United States.

The Yankees had their own U.S.S. North Carolina! Launched in 1821, she was a 102-gun Ship-of-the-line, formerly the Flagship of the Pacific Fleet. The ship served in the Pacific until she was returned to New York in 1839, where she continued to serve until decommissioned in 1865. Her figurehead, a bust of Sir Walter Raleigh, was presented to the North Carolina in 1909.

Other "iron" warships to bear the name North Carolina in service to the United States include:

U.S.S. North Carolina, ACR-12. An armored cruiser launched in 1906 and served through WWI until being scrapped in 1930.

U.S.S. North Carolina, BB-52 (you didn't know we had two battleships, huh?) This ship was ordered in 1918 and the keel was laid in 1920. Work however, was halted in 1922 because of the treaty limiting Naval Armament. Yep, the same treaty the Axis ignored! BB-52 was sold for scrap in 1923 (and probably came back as the Japanese aircraft carrier Ryujo!)

U.S.S. North Carolina, BB-55. The battleship we all know and love was laid down in 1937, launched in 1940 and served with distinction throughout WWII. In her first action in the Solomon Islands campaign, she sunk the Ryujo (that'll teach 'em!) She was decommissioned in 1947 and in 1961 was sold to her namesake state. Some of us remember sending in our cards full of pennies [It was asked that children send in ten cents and the money poured in with over 700,000 students contributing. The campaign raised $330,000! ed.] and for those who don't, you might not know that the "Fighting Lady" did not go to her final berth quietly. She sunk one more vessel before retiring. As tugs were turning her into her new home, her stern slammed into a floating restaurant called Fergus Ark. It is the only known restaurant to be sunk by a U.S. warship!

Judging by remarks made at our last meeting, we were on target when we said the trip was one of the best ever. Once more, thanks to Dr. John Krohn, Tommy King, Dan Geddie and all who made the trip possible! See below!

Civil War Prisons

Lonnie Speer is an author and historian who has written for such publications as Civil War Times Illustrated, America's Civil War, The Civil War Book Review and a wide range of other history-related magazines. He is the author of Portals to Hell, published by Stackpole Books in 1997, which culminated more than twelve years of research into the military prisons of the American Civil War and is now considered the first modern-day unbiased account of the prisons of both sides. The book was originally chosen as an alternate selection in the History Book Club.

His next book, War of Vengeance, Acts of Retaliation Against Civil War POWs, also published by Stackpole, will be available this September. Lonnie and his wife, Melba, reside in the Blue Ridge Mountain range of western North Carolina.

Gettysburg

Well, I told you so! After whetting our appetite for more at our February meeting, Dr. John Krohn delivered! Despite the intense cold, our spring trip to Gettysburg was one of the best ever. The drive to Pennsylvania, took one through "Mosby's Confederacy," (Fauquier and Loudoun Counties) in Virginia. Although I wanted to stop several times, it was on to Gettysburg (for now at least.) After dinner Thursday evening, author and guide Mr. Paul Cooksey jumped right into the first day's battle, with a description of Rode's Division (Daniel's Brigade in particular) and it's attack on the Union forces occupying Oak and McPherson (pronounced 'fer', not fear, as Dr. Krohn related, there's no "fear" in a McPherson!) Ridges. In what can only be described as utter confusion which was caused in part, as Mr. Cooksey pointed out, by the topography as well as the unexpected appearance of Union troops (from the Army of the Potomac!) With further attacks by Iverson and Ramseur's Brigades, the blue-clad troopers were driven off the ridges, through town and onto the high ridges south of Gettysburg. At the end of the first day's battle, controlling eight of the ten roads into Gettysburg, it appeared that the South had won the day.

On Friday, Dr. Krohn led us out to Cashtown, so we could approach just as the Confederate army did. Driving the seven miles from Cashtown to Gettysburg, Dr. Krohn soon had us walking the ridges: Herr, Oak and McPherson. Then it was on to the Railroad Cut and Willoughby Run. The tour was as billed; we concentrated on the North Carolina regiments and followed the route of Iverson and Daniel's Brigades as they advanced and were repulsed with heavy losses. On McPherson Ridge (defended by the Iron Brigade) the Twenty-sixth (Pettigrew's Brigade) also suffered heavy losses. All the officers of the regiment save one, were killed or wounded, while fourteen of the regiment's color bearers were casualties. Indeed, the casualty rate reached eighty-five percent, the highest in the army of Northern Virginia. Dr. Krohn pointed out the approximate position where young Colonel Henry Burgwyn was killed.

There are more than 1,300 monuments in the Gettysburg National Military Park. Several have been recently installed, including one to the Twenty-sixth. Another North Carolina monument that attracted our attention was Borglum's masterpiece situated on Seminary Ridge; the spot at which Pickett's Charge was launched. Dr. Krohn promised that we would walk the entire route of the charge, but not today! Instead, it was on to the Round Tops, both Big and Little, then to Devil's Den. It was at Little Round Top that the Twentieth Maine, immortalized in the movie, held the line and saved the day for the Union. Many historians view this action as crucial, saying the South came very close to winning the war at this point. Tomorrow we would be visiting yet another missed opportunity.

It was on Saturday, with tour guide Charles Fennell that we examined the action at Brenner's, Culp's and E. Cemetery Hills. It was at Culp's Hill that Johnson's Division, in a night attack, ran up against Union General George S. Greene's brigades of New Yorkers. The Yankees were entrenched behind breastworks (which proved highly effective) when Confederates found themselves under fire from two and sometimes three directions! The First North Carolina (Steuart's Brigade) came within a few hundred yards of the Baltimore Pike, the main Union army supply line. Had that road been taken, North Carolinians and Virginians would have been in the rear of Meade's army! This was as close a call to the Union army as was the action on Little Round Top. A special honor reserved for the tour was to visit the Confederate burial site where over 900 Southerners were hastily buried (they were later reburied in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond.) Likewise, it was a treat to be shown the boulder where a soldier of the First N.C. carved his name! (Pvt. A. Lucian Coble carved it at a reunion in 1913.)

Then, as promised, Dr. Krohn had us back on Seminary Ridge. Preparing to follow Pickett's Charge, we looked out at the "Copse of Trees," one mile away. We walked the entire route of the charge, no one faltered, but many thought about the courage it took in 1863 to keep on going. While it took us fifteen minutes, back in '63 it took twenty minutes to get to the High Water Mark.

The tour went on and on! We visited the National Cemetery and Dr. Krohn pointed out the gravestone of George Nixon of the Seventy-third Ohio. He was President Richard Nixon's great-grandfather. Sgt. A. Humiston, father of the "children of the battlefield" is here, as well as several Confederates (the Cemetery was to be for Union soldiers only) who were somehow buried here! Later that evening, we dined at the historic Montford Farm. The barn was one of the largest Confederate Field Hospitals, with over 1,300 wounded occupying not only the barn, but the house and space around the farm. Finally with the tour ended, many decided to shop (some had opted to visit the Eisenhower Farm earlier that day) we packed up and headed south. Congratulations and kudos to Dr. Krohn, Tommy King and Dan Geddie, as well as the others who were instrumental in making the trip the huge success it was!

Fork's Road

For the second time, a stalwart band appeared at the Fork's Road earthworks to do their duty! The day was perfect for the work. At ten sharp, several members of the Round Table, Chris Fonvielle, Dan Geddie, Albert Jewell, Bob Cooke, Steve Gunter, as well as Jonathon Adams (UNCW History student!) and D. "Mule" Skinner (who came down from Topsail) began clearing the brush. On the Round Table's first visit, the west side of the earthworks, to the old Federal Point Road, had been cleared. On Saturday (16 March) we began work on the east side of the road. Several more trips and we'll have the entire section of the line exposed! Apologies to those members who were not contacted by phone, we received permission to work on the site a little too late to include in the last newsletter.

$5 Reward.

STRAYED or stolen from the undersigned Saturday evening the 17th inst, or Monday morning the 19th inst.,

The Tomb of Our Country's Hopes

As we approach the one hundred and fortieth anniversary of the dedication of the Oakdale Cemetery Confederate Memorial, it might be time to look back at that ceremony which took place on that brutally hot day, May 10, 1872. Member Wayne Carver has researched the occasion and has written the following:

When was the memorial built? Who was behind getting this grand item? Who sculpted it? When was it dedicated? Who gave the dedication address? Hopefully the following will address these questions and more.

The Confederate Memorial was the idea of the Ladies Memorial Association. This band of faithful women who had worked under Mrs. Armand J. deRosset as the Soldiers' Aid Society during the late unpleasantness, organized a permanent Memorial Association in July, 1866 with the purpose of rescuing from oblivion the names and graves of the gallant Confederates who were buried in and around Wilmington. The Association obtained a Charter from the Legislature through Col. William L. Saunders in order that they might hold the deed for a "Confederate lot," for which they had lobbied the Oakdale Board of Directors. The Cemetery Board actually gave the Association four lots and this now comprises the current site. They began raising funds for bringing the soldiers, known and unknown, and some type of Memorial to Oakdale.

After several years of fund raising and planning, the Association concluded this effort with the unveiling of the beautiful Confederate Memorial on May 10, 1872. This was done on the sixth anniversary of Confederate Memorial Day services held at Oakdale. According to the May 11, 1872 edition of the Wilmington Star a total of 466 Confederate Unknowns had been interned in one mass grave on the four lots held by the Association. At this time the plot was known as the Confederate Cemetery within Oakdale.

In the early days of the celebration of Confederate Memorial day, the old soldiers, officials and civilians would meet in downtown Wilmington and have a parade out to Oakdale. On May 10, 1872 everyone gathered downtown and were organized under the direction of Col. Edward Dudley Hall, former Colonel of the Forty-Sixth North Carolina Regiment. The group formed and proceeded to the old entrance being led by the Cape Fear Cadets under Gen. R.E. Colston. As they entered the gate, the Wilmington Light Infantry Cadets under direction of Capt. James D. Cumming, former member of Cummings' Battery of the Thirteenth Battalion of Heavy Artillery presented a cannon salute. Colonel John J. Hedrick was Chief Marshall of the Parade. The group proceeded to the Lodge where the service began. An anthem was sung, led by the First Presbyterian Choir. The Rev. Mr. James Dickson, Pastor of First Presbyterian led the Prayer. The Choir then sang an original ode, which had been specially written for the service. At this point the Address was given by Major Charles W. McClammy, former Major of the Third North Carolina Calvary. After another anthem the group proceeded to the top of the hill where the new monument was to be dedicated. Col. Hedrick unveiled the statue and as quiet settled over the crowd of between 2,500 and 4,000, the Wilmington Light Artillery sounded another salute from a hill just west of the monument. Another original ode was then sung by the Choir, followed by the laying of the flowers (a custom of all the early Memorial Services) and then the Benediction by Rev. Dickson.

The Monument was made of North Carolina granite, taken from a quarry of Mr. P. Linehan near Raleigh. The granite was shaped by Mr. Linehan and shipped by rail to Wilmington. The statue, according to James Sprunt was cast from cannon captured during the War (Sprunt says this was not revealed until 1899). The statue was designed by a Mr. Donovan from Virginia and executed by Maurice J. Power of New York. It is of an Infantryman standing at ease with an Austrian rifle in hand, wearing an Army overcoat with a belt around his waist, a bayonet sheathed, cartridge box attached in the rear and an ordinary military fatigue hat with the letters NC. The die on the east and west show the faces of R.E. Lee and Thomas J. Jackson. In the lower corners were weapons and munitions of war.

Also on the monument are the words it took to get the monument completed. "Self-denial, work, prayers, tears and heart's blood."

The steps surrounding the monument itself were erected in 1958 by the Bryan Newkirk family and presented as a memorial to Capt. Abram Francis Newkirk of the Third North Carolina Calvary and later an M.D. (James Sprunt, Chronicles of the Cape Fear River; Wilmington Morning Star, May 10, 1872; N.H.C. Library files)

Some other things you may not have known about the memorial:

The statue itself is of "heroic" proportions, that is, it is "larger than life," (seven and a half feet tall).

The sculptor, Maurice (or Morris) Power, also sculpted the statue of Samuel F.B. Morse in 1871 (which is also bronze and "heroic" in size), which stands in New York City's Central Park. [New York Times, June 7, 1871]

The Memorial Association began raising money for their project by having bazaars and concerts.

In 1948, Mrs. George Davis reported that her first husband, Percy Cowan (later a sheriff of New Hanover County) had posed as a model for the statue. He told her that, "...when he was a lad of 18 years...he was a student in General Colston's Cape Fear Academy...Mrs. Davis said...Cowan told her he wore General Colston's old Confederate army coat and had a false mustache when he posed for the artist...Major [Charles P.] Bolles...is understood to have drawn the design for the monument." Mrs. Davis also said that there were others in town who claimed to have been the model. [From the Bill Reaves Collection, "Oakdale Cemetery" file, New Hanover County Public Library]

We have also been told that the statue may have been cast from a common die, hence there may be other Confederate statues that look remarkably similar.

Another news article destroyed the myth that the statue was "cast from metal obtained from Yankee cannon," as the statue was made of bronze. [Wilmington Morning Star, April 6, 1948]

At least two of the Unknowns buried in the Confederate lot are known. In an 1897 news article, the Superintendent of Oakdale, Timothy Donlan wrote that when he looked over some old records, he found the names of two McDowell County men who were interred there. Roland (or Rowland) Harrison and Troy Loftin became ill while in Wilmington; Harrison (who was 45 years old) died on November 3, 1864, Loftin followed on November 7. Back home, both men lived within two miles of each other and Harrison was thought (for thirty-one years) to have deserted to the enemy!

Questions for you die-hard buffs! What kind of a rifle is the soldier holding? Why is May 10th Confederate Memorial Day? (Answers next month!) While we're on the subject of Confederate Memorial Day, ceremonies are usually held on the Sunday closest to 10 May. Check the newspapers as the date gets closer, but 12 May will probably be the day. See you there!

GETTYSBURG

Dr. John Krohn will speak at our next meeting on the battle of Gettysburg. Dr. Krohn, born in Cloquet, Minnesota, graduated from Carleton College (Northfield) and received his MD from the University of Minnesota. After an Internship (at St. Luke's) and Residency (at the Mayo Clinic), interrupted by tours of duty (Vietnam and the Middle East) with the Navy, he settled in Wilmington. Dr. Krohn is a member of many local organizations and will give a talk on one of his favorite subject, the battle of Gettysburg. Not only is he a Round Table Committee member, but is also a Licensed Battlefield Guide at Gettysburg! As this will be the last meeting before our Spring Trip (see insert), come prepared for a thorough examination of the battle and its participants!

Have you been to the Graystone Inn recently? Well, our Round Table has been invited to a reception and membership drive on Thursday, 28 Feb. (no charge, 5-7 p.m.) hosted by the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society. Wines and hors d'oeuvres will be served and there will be door prizes for new members (and those that bring new members!) Come by for a visit, 100 So. Third St.

At our January meeting Mr. Andrew Duppstadt, Assistant Site Manager at the CSS Neuse State Historic Site spoke about the Confederate gunboat's career during the '60's. The 18 and 1960's, that is! The construction of the vessel, he indicated, was reflective of the problems that beset the Confederacy. Of the 50 ironclads that were laid down, only 22 were completed, due in large part to a lack of skilled labor, iron, transportation and even seasoned timber. Construction of the Neuse, (of the same class as it's more famous sister the Albemarle) was begun at White Hall, (present-day Seven Springs) N.C. in October, 1862. Moved to Kinston in 1863, she finally steamed down the Neuse River in late April, 1864. As luck would have it, the Neuse grounded on a sand bar where it remained for a month. Inactive for nearly a year, it's last commander, Captain Joseph Price, fought a rear-guard action, later setting the vessel afire in the river at a location that became known as "Gunboat Bend." The Neuse remained at that spot for almost a century. An unsuccessful attempt was made in 1956 to remove the ship, but it wouldn't be until 1963 that the boat was literally pulled from the riverbed. Unfortunately, much of the boat was destroyed in the recovery. The State eventually gained control of the Neuse (three-fourths of the hull remain) and restoration efforts were begun. Now on display in Kinston along with over 15,000 artifacts found at "Gunboat Bend," the future of the boat is still in question. After surviving salvagers, vandalism, hurricanes and high water, the plans to build a new museum for the ironclad are stalled. Although it has been treated for preservation, humidity and temperature controls are vital to the conservation for future generations. Mr. Duppstadt indicated that even had the south been more successful in it's shipbuilding program it is highly doubtful that the outcome would have been different. As long as there are Managers like Andrew, the Neuse is in good hands!

Well, it's official: Member Wayne Carver contacted the Department of the Army with a question about Braxton and Fort Bragg. The response:

The post was named in honor of CAPTAIN Braxton Bragg, U.S. Army, an artillery officer from North Carolina who exhibited great skill and courage during the Mexican War. The same individual later became a general in the Confederate army, but the orders naming the fort explicitly named it for him in his earlier capacity.

Naval Issues

As far as Civil War naval history is concerned, "out of sight, out of mind" seems to be the norm. There are no battlefields to examine; however, with both the C.S.S. Hunley and the U.S.S. Monitor in the news, (as well as other vessels) comes a renewed interest in the subject. So, for you nautically-minded members, here goes!

The latest on the C.S.S. Hunley is that there were only eight crew members aboard, not nine as had previously been thought. The sub had only seven cranking stations and remains of only eight people were found. Those remains will eventually be interred in Charleston's Magnolia Cemetery, where earlier crews are buried. The $20 gold piece (a true "gold piece" of history) that Lt. Dixon carried was found and is said to be worth "millions." Inscribed with Dixon's initials, it also carries the legend "Shiloh April 6, 1862 My Life Preserver." Lt. Dixon's remains have been found and removed from the boat and the mystery as to why she sank still perplexes researchers. The skeletons of the other crew members were found seated at their cranks.

My wife and I were among those lucky enough to have visited the Hunley at the old Charleston Navy Yard (after Project Historian Mark Regan spoke to our Round Table, and yes, we had problems getting tickets!) and the first thing that struck me when I saw the boat was that it looked very much like a submarine. Many years ago in Germany, I saw a WWI "pigboat" of the German Navy and do you know what? They looked pretty similar (except for the batteries and that the Hunley was not as long as the U-boat). We've since learned that the Hunley could steer underwater because they had a compass and that it contained a depth gauge. Indeed, even the shape of the vessel was more "aerodynamic" than had previously been known.

What has always amazed and confounded me is the lack of credit that we give to our ancestors. Would you believe that as early 1852, the forerunner of a torpedo was invented? It was invented by an ingenious Yankee named W.O. Stone. Stone, who lived in Charlestown, Massachusetts developed what he called a "submarine rocket" which worked on the same principle of the "common air rocket." It was weighted down and buoyed up by a float, with a black powder head and sulphuric acid center. A "fusee" supplied the propulsion, "by means of which it was driven through the water." What if the technology of the Civil War mated those early torpedoes with the Hunley?

One last item on the Hunley. The Museum of Mobile, Alabama has obtained a replica of the boat (and also has artifacts from the C.S.S. Alabama) but the original vessel will be housed at the Charleston Museum. Mobile was where the H.L. Hunley was first constructed. [From The Civil War News; (Wilmington) Tri-weekly Commercial, August, 1852; The Ramrod, newsletter of the N.C. Civil War Round Table].

And now on to other treasures of the deep...

"I went forward to the cabin and found water just above the soles of my shoes, which indicated there must be more than a foot of water in the vessel....all hands were put to bailing-bailing out the ocean, as it seemed....the Rhode Island (a vessel that had been towing the Monitor)...now lay her whole length against us...but not a man would be the first to leave his ship, although the captain gave orders to do so."

[The (N.Y.) Times Herald Record, July 25, 1999, quoting an account of the USS Monitor's sinking in 1862, written by Francis Butts, a crew member.]

Lost in a gale off Cape Hatteras in December 1862, the USS Monitor went down with sixteen crewmen. For many years, since being located in 1973, (by researchers from Duke University) the Union ship managed to thwart divers attempting to remove artifacts. At 230 feet deep, the vessel was safe from salvagers, but not from time, hurricanes and saltwater (and also depth-charging from WWII). After many false starts, U.S. Navy divers raised the engine, along with many other items. The wreckage is in danger of collapse, even though parts of it have been shored up. The steam engine, some thirty tons in weight, is said to be the best preserved from that period. It will be on display at the Mariner's Museum in Norfolk, Virginia, while undergoing conservation. The ship's anchor, successfully retrieved earlier, is already on display at the Museum. This ship was really at the center of naval evolution. Not only was it completely ironclad, but it relied totally on steam for power. Combined with a rotating turret it was, at the time, the cutting edge of naval technology. I guarantee you that it will be found to be more advanced than was thought. It has already been determined that the vessel's head, (or toilet to you landlubbers) was "one of the earliest below-the-waterline-toilets on a ship"(!)

Directions

As you know, our spring trip deadline is fast approaching. All monies must be in by 19 February and your reservations made by 20 February. You will make your own way to Gettysburg, the travel time is just about eight hours. Dr. Krohn suggests the following route: I-40 to I-95. North on I-95 to I-295 (about 10 miles south of Petersburg, Va.) I-295 to I-95 north, to Fredericksburg, Va. Take the first exit (Hwy. 17 west, Warrenton) immediately after crossing the Rappahannock River. This exit will then split, you want to stay to the left, cross the overpass and exit to the right.

Continue on Hwy. 17 to Opal, Va., about 35 miles (4-lane highway). Make a right at Hwy. 15 north at Opal. About 2 miles past Battlefield Baptist Church (on your right), Hwy. 15 will turn left at a stoplight. Remain on 15 north to Gettysburg. You will pass through Leesburg, Va. And Frederick, Md. (do not take Business 15). In Leesburg, watch for 15, it takes a right turn just before you go under an overpass. In Frederick, Hwy. 15 will make a left turn. Continue north on 15 to the Baltimore Street exit for Gettysburg, where you will leave Hwy. 15.

Turn left at the exit stoplight and proceed into Gettysburg (3 miles). As you come over the top of Cemetery Hill (you will see the Cemetery gatehouse on your left) the Holiday Inn will be about one block ahead on your right. The telephone number of the hotel is: (Holiday Inn-Battlefield) 717-334-6211. Be sure to ask for the CFCWRT rate! This trip is shaping up as one of the best excursions ever!

Recovering the Monitor

Designed by John Ericsson, and launched on Jan. 30, 1862, the Monitor paved the way for steam-powered ironclads to replace wooden battleships. Famous for its battle with the Confederate ironclad, Virginia (formerly the Union Merrimack) at Hampton Roads, the ship was sunk in a storm off the coast of North Carolina on Dec. 31, 1862, taking 16 crew members with it. Since the Monitor's discovery in 1973, scientists have documented the rapid deterioration of its metal, creating an urgency to recover items from the wreckage. A look at the Monitor:

A MILITARY FIRST

One of the many innovations incorporated into the design of the Monitor was the revolving gun turret. A look at the turret:

MAJOR PHASES OF RECOVERY

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration proposed a recovery plan that would bring key components of the ship to the surface for preservation at the cost of approximately $22 million. A look at the proposed plan:

Other Shipwrecks...

There is the U.S.S. Maple Leaf which was discovered in 1984 in about eight feet of mud, near Jacksonville, Florida. To date, more than 30,000 artifacts have been recovered, including papers, books, photos, clothing and leather goods. For one researcher, the find solved a battlefield puzzle. Dr. Lawrence E. Babits (George Washington University) has determined that soldiers were not accidentally dropping the bullets, but were probably throwing them away. After examining several cases of bullets recovered from the site, it was discovered that many of those manufactured in 1861 had a larger diameter than those made in 1863. In 1863, he reported, "federal arsenals made bullets 1/100 of an inch smaller" to more easily fit a rifle barrel.

The Black Warrior, a part of North Carolina's Mosquito Fleet, was sunk in the Pasquotank River and is now being examined by students and staff from East Carolina University. Before the war, a commercial schooner, it was converted into a gunboat to protect Elizabeth City. [The ECU Report, Summer, 2001]

The C.S.S. Alabama has been in the news recently. A joint research effort, between France and the United States is underway (the Alabama was discovered in French territorial waters). Already, "deck lights, dishes, stoneware, cups, coins," as well as a cannon and an antler have been recovered! ECU sources reported that "Capt. Raphael Semmes and his officers...were invited to go big-game hunting during a brief visit to Cape Town," [South Africa]. The antler "could be from a Spring Bok or some other South African animal." [The ECU Report, Fall, 2000]

Our Raffle winners were: Campaigns of the Civil War, Dr. Carl Rust; The Zulu War, Richard Long; Civil War Medical Equipment, Richard Covell; Mathew Brady's Civil War, Ed Russ; Century war Book, Polly Rust; C.S.S. Neuse, A Question of Iron and Time, John Burns.

Fort Anderson

It was hard work, but all agreed the results were astounding! Fifteen stalwart members, disregarding the threat of rain, met at Fort Anderson on Saturday to begin restoration (that's the wrong word, we did no restoration, merely clearing away years of undergrowth.) Shortly after ten, the group made it's way to Battery "A." It was quickly apparent that the gun chambers and ramparts were pretty much indistinguishable from the surrounding forest, but soon the sounds of chainsaws and trimmers were heard and the thick underbrush was slowly peeled away. One of the first discoveries was the collapsed entrance to the bombproof or powder magazine. When the sounds of modern tools were diminished (tightening chains or changing blades) one could almost imagine being back in 1862 (especially those of us with bushogs or machetes!) We soon worked our way up to the top of the mound, which overlooked the Cape Fear River! About that time, a tugboat towing a barge, following the same channel that blockade runners would have, passed within one hundred yards of where we stood. During the War, that channel was further obstructed by torpedoes.

But it was soon back to work and by mid-afternoon the growth had been cleared away, revealing a pristine mound, rampart and gun chamber! All agreed the work was well worth the sight. THE GUNBOAT CSS NEUSE

Our guest speaker, Mr. Andrew Duppstald, Assistant Site Manager of the CSS Neuse State Historic Site will speak about the vessel, its career as a Confederate ironclad and later as a state historic site. Mr. Duppstald has a BA in history and an MA in public history from the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. Previously, he has served as a part-time historic interpreter at both Fort Fisher and Tryon Palace and was also the Executive Director of the Carteret County Historical Society. Along with his duties at the CSS Neuse, he is also an adjunct instructor at Coastal Carolina Community College and Campbell University.

Construction of the Neuse, one of twenty-two Confederate Navy ironclads, was begun at White Hall, N.C., in 1862 and completed (at Kinston) by late 1864. It's fate was similar to that of the CSS North Carolina (and to some extent, the CSS Raleigh), in that all were plagued by bad luck. Near war's end, the Neuse was scuttled in the river of the same name and remained there for nearly one hundred years. The hull (about three-quarters of it) was raised, preserved and is now on display in Kinston. Along with the remains of the vessel are many of the artifacts recovered at the site.

Have southerners always been more "militaristic" than the rest of the country? That question was part of Rod Andrews presentation at our December meeting. The author of Long Gray Lines pointed out that prior to the outbreak of war in 1860, there were over ninety-six military academies in the south and only fifteen in the north. Throughout the 1850's northerners were quick to make the charge that the south was preparing for war, but a look at the curriculum shows that only regular academic topics were the norm. Indeed, many of the graduates became lawyers, teachers, surveyors and farmers, not soldiers!

Those academies produced what the south wanted: young men who had courage, a respect for authority, men of character with high moral values. Since southern youths were felt to be "wilder," many of them were sent to military schools to instill discipline. It was realized, he commented, that southern boys would only obey the rules only if they were in uniform and armed! It is obvious that Mr. Andrews has really done his research, which centered from the early 1840's up to the first World War.

His talk also covered the actions of the students during the war. Much of the time they were given (boring) provost duty or guarded prisoners. They were quite useful in drilling new recruits as well, but it was at New Market, Virginia (May, 1864) that the cadets of the Virginia Military Institute were thrust into the war. When the Corps of Cadets reported for duty, they were teasingly serenaded by musicians playing "Rock-a-Bye-Baby." Soon ordered to attack, by General J.C. Breckenridge (who stated, "Put the boys in and may God forgive me for the order!") they lost ten killed and forty-seven wounded, but became part of the war's legends (the names of the ten are part of a stained-glass window in the Institute's "Hall of Valor"). It was also interesting when we were reminded that General George C. Marshall attended VMI (while another soldier named George S. Patton went there for a year).

A Proud Poverty Now Proudly Overcome

Gutzon Borglum jumped in his car and roared down the road. The man was fleeing for his life! It was 1925 and Borglum had been in Atlanta working on a massive sculpture at Stone Mountain. Due to a conflict with the Stone Mountain Executive Board, the impetuous artist had destroyed the casts for the project. The Board quickly obtained a warrant for his arrest, hence Borglum's quick departure from Georgia! Racing to the haven of North Carolina, he later wrote:

I...picked up my personal effects hastily, got into a car, and got...out of there. I was pursued by these men who fired several shots at my car...and only by the grace of God, Josephus Daniels...and [North Carolina Governor] Angus McLean (who said he would call out the militia if necessary), did I escape them.

Borglum was safely ensconced in North Carolina. He would never finish the Stone Mountain project, but did go on to carve a national monument at a place called Mount Rushmore. But what has this got to do with the War Between the States, and with North Carolina in particular? Well, Borglum was the artist chosen to execute the memorial to those valiant North Carolinians who fought at Gettysburg. Dedicated on 3 July, 1929, (former Governor) McLean delivered the dedicatory address and recognized that it was mainly through the efforts of the Daughters of the Confederacy that the project was completed. He also acknowledged that the work was long overdue. It was due to a "proud poverty now proudly overcome," and went on:

The memorial...is the work of Gutzon Borglum, who has...interpreted in bronze the spirit and purpose of the North Carolinians engaged in this great battle. The heroic group represents five typical North Carolina soldiers. Four of the group have just emerged from a small wooded area. As they come out into the open, they suddenly see the awful struggle in front of them....The field has been torn with shot and shell. The leader...pushes forward...the younger man just behind him is stunned momentarily at the awful sight; the bearded soldier to his left, realizing what is taking place in the youth's mind, draws close to him and whispers confidence. The color bearer in the rear presses forward....At their right, one knee on the ground, is an officer encouraging his men, his presence and wounds indicating that the struggle has been in progress some time.

Situated on Seminary Ridge, where Longstreet's assault began, the memorial is acknowledged to be the most beautiful on the battlefield. Near this spot, the "high water mark of the Confederacy," stands the statue of General Lee. Across the expanse stands the statue of Union General George G. Meade. Borglum said that "the face of each of the five figures was carved on the lines of pictures of Southern soldiers, the color bearers face being modeled from an old daguerreotype of Orren Randolph Smith of Henderson, N.C., who designed the stars and bars of the Confederacy."

If you visit the Vicksburg National Park, be sure to look for the N.C. memorial there, it was also done by Borglum. Don't think, however, that he sculpted only southern themes; he also did "Sheridan on Horseback," (located in Chicago) as well as a bust of Lincoln (in Newark, N.J.) and many others. Interestingly, when Borglum "refugeed" in N.C., there was talk of him carving a Confederate war memorial on "the granite cliffs of Chimney Rock." Unfortunately, talk is all it was. As for Stone Mountain, he never went back, but the work, depicting the likenesses of Davis, Lee and Jackson, was finally finished in 1970.

Seen in a bookstore recently! "The Idiot's Guide to the Civil War," and "The Civil War for Dummies." Well, I guess it had to happen sooner or later!

Past Tidbits

In our November issue, there was a story about Pvt. James Keelari, the man who single-handedly defended the railroad bridge over the Holsten River. We have been informed that for his actions, "The South's Horatius" was awarded the Confederate Medal of Honor on 20 August, 1994. It is on permanent public display in the UDC Confederate Museum in Knoxville, Tennessee. [See Valor in Gray by Gregg S. Clemmer]

In our December issue, there was a story of Lt. F. Harney, who captured the colors of the 150th Pa. Regiment at Gettysburg. That flag was sent to President Davis, as Harney had requested. When Davis fled from Richmond, it was in his luggage and was found when Davis was captured. The flag was on display in the state Capital Building in Harrisburg, Pa. as late as 1978. Governor Vance's Visit to Fort Fisher

We sometimes had our fun in camp. Zeb Vance visited us not long after his election as Governor of North Carolina. He wore a black stove-pipe hat on the side of his head as he came sauntering through the Fort. It was the first appearance of a beaver in the garrison. He had not gone far before, from behind the barracks came the command, "Come out of that hat! I see your legs! Come out of that hat!" and presently concealed voices in different directions caught up the cry, "Come out of that hat! I see your legs! Come out of that hat!" Good natured Zeb rather enjoyed the joke, but it was not the reception I desired to give the Governor of the State, and I had the drums beat the quarters and the battalion formed for review, which effectively squelched the fun.

Next evening, at dress parade, an order was read threatening any soldier with condign punishment who should call out to a visitor to "come out of his hat." Everything remained serene and quiet after that order despite the visits of several clerical gentlemen to the garrison with rusty stove-pipe hats, until one morning I espied a bowlegged blockade running captain, who had got safely in during the night, coming up from the beach with a great shade hat on his head, which looked for all the world like an inverted coal scuttle. He was about opposite one of the barracks when a sepulchral voice growled out, "Stay in that hat!" "Against orders to come out of that hat!" "I see your legs!" "Stay in that hat!" which was repeated along the line with startling emphasis as the bewildered Britisher made haste to reach headquarters. I surrendered with discretion and never issued another order on that hat question.

Fort Anderson

As mentioned in our last newsletter, we'll be meeting at the fort on Saturday, 19 January. Chainsaws, rakes, bushhogs (and whatever else you can think of!) will be needed, so bring 'em if you've got 'em! Let's hope for a good day for a great project. We will meet at 10 a.m. and will soon transport Battery "A" back in time. It may be interesting to note that we will be doing the same sort of labor the soldiers themselves did 140 years ago, they did it out of necessity, ours will be a labor of love!

The Raffle Winners were: Ed Russ, Jacob's Ladder; Les Harris, Paintings of Mort Kunstler; Ed Hartz, Maps of Civil War Battlefields; Park Downing, To Take Charleston; Palmer Royal, Century Magazine War Book (1894); Ed Russ and David English, C.S.S Hunley Christmas ornaments.

Spring Trip

There are a few members whose wives want to attend the dinners, but don't want to go on the tour (there is plenty of shopping available in Gettysburg). Tommy King has gone back and juggled the figures and if your wife (or husband) wants to come along for the dinners (and speakers) on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings they can do so for $75. Please remember to make your hotel reservations by 20 February (2002) and have all your money ($150) to Dan Geddie by 19 February.

General Stonewall Jackson was well known for his disdain of those who took the oath of loyalty to the United States. On one occasion:

A sergeant brought in a 'plain simple minded old man.' The soldier informed Jackson that the man had freely taken an oath of loyalty to the United States. 'Is that so?' Jackson asked. The man answered: 'Why you see Mister, the Yankees came to my house.' 'I don't wish to know about the Yankees,' Jackson interrupted. 'Have you taken the oath?' The man persisted. 'Why you see, Mister, the Yankees came to my house and made my wife get a rope and....' Again Jackson broke the conversation.

'I do not wish to know anything about your wife or the rope. Did you or did you not take the oath?' 'Well Mister, I suppose I did.' Jackson snapped, 'You have no business being on this side of the Potomac River.' Several of the man's neighbors were present. They were quick to tell Jackson that the Federals had threatened to hang the man if he did not sign the loyalty pledge. In addition, the man had two sons then in Confederate service.

A pause, then Jackson asked, 'Will you take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States?' Back came the quick reply, 'Why Mister, I'll take two or three of them!' Jackson smiled and sent the man home.

December 11 Meeting, St. Andrews On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour, 7:00p.m., Program, 7:30 p.m.

Our featured speaker, Mr. Rod Andrews Jr., will speak on a subject that has long begged research: Southern Military Academies. These were the schools that turned out many of the young leaders of the Confederacy. The Citadel and the Virginia Military Institute are two of the better known schools, but there were more and Mr. Andrews will share his research with us.

Rod Andrews Jr., is a native of Wilmington and a graduate of Hoggard High School. He has degrees in history from UNC-Chapel Hill and Clemson University and received his PhD from the University of Georgia in 1997. He has taught at Georgia and The Citadel and is now an assistant professor of history at Clemson University. Andrew served on active duty in the Marine Corps from 1987 to 1991 and is now a Major in the U.S.M.C. Reserve. He is the son of Rod Andrew Sr., (of Wilmington's Andrew and Kuske, Consulting Engineers.) His book, which uses the history of southern military schools to examine the "southern military tradition," is Long Gray Lines (UNC Press, 2001)

At our November meeting, Dr. Fonvielle spoke about one of his favorite people: William Barker Cushing. How did Cushing, who in 1861 (six weeks before graduation) was thrown out of the Naval Academy, become, by war's end, the country's "Darling?" Born in 1842, he entered the Academy at age fourteen and quickly gained a reputation as a prankster and problem child. With the coming of war, he was allowed to re-enlist as a Midshipman.

Spending most of his naval career with the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron, off Cape Fear, it was here that he began to exhibit that daring that brought him to the attention of higher-ups. It was Cushing that captured the first Blockade Runner (a tobacco schooner) in the area and of course, most of us know about his encounter with the "Albemarle." Cushing enjoyed remarkable success (with a large helping of luck) throughout the war, rising to the rank of Lieutenant Commander, but his luck ran out after the war. By 1868, his health began to fail and by 1874, Cushing had become violent and abusive to those around him. Confined to an Institution, he died in Washington, D.C. on December 17, 1874. Dr. Fonvielle's slides (some of which have never been published) were exceptional and contributed greatly to his talk.

Raffle Winners:

Lincoln's Commando—Jim McLaren; Guns of 62—Les Harris; Confederate Goliath—Les Harris; The Embattled Confederacy—Walt Bullard; Chancellorsville—Ed Gibson; Flag Pins—Palmer Royal, Bob Quinn; Embroidered Flag—Les Harris (Give us a break, Les!); N.C. Flag—Ed Gibson; United We Stand (sticker)—Bob Quinn. Thanks to those who donated the gifts for our raffle!

Reminder!! Dues are Due!!

We would like to remind those that have not yet paid their dues that the time has come! You can send a check (for $25) to the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, c/o Mr. Dan Geddie, P.O. Box 10535, Wilmington, N.C. 28405. Considering the quality of speakers we have scheduled, as well as planned activities, this is a bargain!

Alternate Date for Fort Anderson

We will be going to Fort Anderson on Saturday, January 19, 2002. Our original date in December couldn't be accommodated (we should have listened to those members who said to put it off until after the holidays!) There will be more on this project in the January newsletter.

Gettysburg Trip

There is a slight change in the itinerary. Paul Cooksey will give his presentation on Rode's division on Thursday evening rather than Friday evening, since we will be following that division's maneuvers on the battlefield on Friday.

[A Letter From President Jefferson Davis to Governor Zebulon Vance]

His Excellency Z.B. Vance, Governor of North Carolina

Richmond, Va. August 19th, 1863

Sir:

In the action of the 1st July near Gettysburg, the sharpshooters of Brig. Genl. Ramseur's brigade under command of Lt. F. Harney, 14th N.C. Vols. dispersed the 150th Penn. Regt. That gallant officer with his own hands wrested the standard from the color-bearer of the Penn. Regt. and soon afterwards fell, mortally wounded.

Gen. Ramseur...informed me that it was Harney's last request that the flag should "be presented in his name to the President." The wish of the dying hero has been complied with. The flag is in my possession and will be treasured by me as an honorable memento of the valor and patriotic devotion which the soldiers of North Carolina have displayed on many hard fought fields.

I have thought it due to the lamented officer...to express through you to his State, his comrades, and his family the sincere sympathy I feel with them for the loss of one so worthy of their admiration and esteem. Such deeds illustrate a people's history, justify a people's pride and sustain a country's cause.

I remain,

Very Respectfully & Truly Yours,

Jefferson Davis

[Vance's Reply to Davis]

His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President, C.S.

Raleigh, N.C. August 28th, 1863

Sir:

Your letter of the 19th inst. has been received, informing me of the gallant conduct, and heroic death of Lt. F. Harney, 14th N.C. Troops, on the field of Gettysburg; and asking me to make known to his family your sympathy with them for the loss of one as brave and worthy of their esteem.

I do not know, Sir, that he has any relatives whatever in N.C. He was born in Kentucky and saw some service as a soldier under Gen. William Walker, during his campaign in Central America. At the commencement of hostilities he was residing in the town of Ashville N.C. pursuing his occupation of carpenter, and joining the company which I had the honor to raise, he was made Orderly Sergeant, and by good conduct and hard fighting, won his way to 1st Lieutenant. Though without kindred in this, his adopted State, I assure you She will be proud to see his name placed on the long list of her heroic dead, and all will welcome his memory among their bravest sons, and mourn him as a noble brother slain for her defense

I am Sir,

Very Respectfully Yours,

Z.B. Vance

(Harney was killed in the first day's action, northwest of Gettysburg. Ramseur's Brigade attacked the Union XI Corps, driving them off. They continued the attack, pushing to an unfinished railroad cut. It was probably in this area that Lt. Harney met his death. In Clark's North Carolina Regiments, it was recorded that Lt. Harney and his sharpshooters "...pursued the enemy, and Harney captured with his own hand the colors of the Sixty-eighth Michigan [this is an error, the captured flag was likely from the 150th Pa. Regiment, of the "Bucktail Brigade"] and sent the captured flag to President Davis with his last breath.")

Flag Of Truce

The Wilmington Journal of Tuesday says: On Sunday morning, the 21st instant, a boat with a flag of truce, and containing seven persons, came ashore near Fort Caswell. The seven persons were Lieutenant Lynch, one midshipman and five sailors, all belonging to the Federal steamer Daylight, commanded by Capt. Lockwood, now off the mouth of the Cape Fear River. The object of the visit was to give the commandant of Fort Caswell, (Col. Iverson) official notice of the fact that our port is now in a state of actual blockade.

[The (Tarboro) Southerner, August 3, 1861]

(Some thought the name Daylight was appropriate, since it was in such condition that daylight could be seen through the vessel, ed.)

Member Ray Flowers has brought to our attention that there is a new book out about the Confederate hero of Fort Fisher, Colonel Lamb. Titled, The Life and Times of Colonel William Lamb, 1835-1909, the book is authored by Lamb's "true grandson and namesake" William Lamb! Detailing Lamb's life, from his upbringing in Norfolk, Virginia, through his schooling (he obtained a law degree from William and Mary College), to his service in the Confederate army, as well as his life after the war, this book is, as Ray states, a must for Wilmington and Lower Cape Fear Civil War enthusiasts. Containing many "vignettes and obscure anecdotes," the 195 page paperback sells for $19.95 and is available only at the Fort Fisher State Historic Site gift shop. (Tel. 910-458-5538) Thanks Ray!

Cushing Returns To The Cape Fear!

[Due to a scheduling conflict, Will Green will be unable to address our November meeting]

On Tuesday, November 13, our speaker will be Dr. Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr. who will speak on "The Life and Times of Lt. Cmdr. William B. Cushing." Cushing emerged from the Civil War better known than any U.S. Navy officer except Admiral David G. Farragut. The bold and brazen sailor (one of Lincoln's favorites), was the precursor of unconventional, commando type warfare. Dr. Fonvielle has termed him an early Navy Seal! A respected naval commander as well as a popular celebrity, Cushing was best known for destroying the Confederate ironclad Albemarle in 1864. But he spent most of his wartime career with the Cape Fear Blockading Squadron off Wilmington. Dr. Fonvielle will talk about Cushing's exciting life, career and tragic end. He will have copies of his books for sale and signing.

Dr. Fonvielle is the author of several books, including The Wilmington Campaign, Last Rays of Departing Hope and Fort Anderson, as well as numerous magazine and newspaper articles. He received his M.A. in American History at East Carolina and his Ph.D. from the University of South Carolina. Chris currently teaches (History, of course!) at U.N.C. Wilmington and is also the current President of our Round Table.

At our last meeting, Dr. Harry Daniels spoke of his twenty years of collecting "stuff" about Confederate Generals. According to Dr. Daniels, there were 425 men who attained the rank of Brigadier or higher. As he pointed out, it is interesting to note that many of the men initially promoted met President Jefferson Davis' important criteria. They were West Pointers (as he was) who fought in the Mexican War (as he had) and most of them had remained in the United States Army (Davis had been Secretary of War under Pierce) until secession. Several were political appointees, but these were the exception. Towards the end of the War, many of the promotions were made by battlefield performance (and through attrition). He noted the difference between Davis and Lincoln; Lincoln learned and grew during the war, Davis remained Davis.

Several of his favorites were discussed and he noted that of the 425, there were 12 sets of brothers and 27 sets of brothers-in law, which made for quite a network of social interactions! It was a little difficult to pin Dr. Daniels down to one favorite, but he indicated that it might be Patrick Clairbourne. He also stated that it was probably North Carolina that produced the best Generals! When one thinks of Hoke, Hill, Pender or Pettigrew we must agree. But then, he had to bring up Braxton Bragg!

The raffle winners were: Steve Gunter, Smoker/Grill Set; Dr. John Krohn, magazines;

Palmer Royal, Bloody Hill (by William Brooksher); Sylvia Bellows, Vicksburg (by Susan T. Puck);

The set of flag pins were won by Vesta Burroughs, Ed Russ and Ed Gibson.

Thanks to David Barefoot, also a winner!

Spring Trip

As mentioned in an earlier newsletter, space on our Spring trip is limited to 45 persons. So, if you are going, please reserve a place by sending thirty ($30) dollars to Dan Geddie. The total cost is $150 (you make your own hotel reservations, $57 per night, plus tax) and can be paid in installments if preferred. Final payment must be made before February 20 (2002). There are already about 15 people who have signed up!

Updates

We will shortly be working on one of the most important Civil War sites in the area. Our Round Table will be going to Ft. Anderson to do restoration work and the date will be announced at our next meeting. This Brunswick County site, which figured prominently throughout the war, as a quarantine station as well as in defense of Wilmington is fast becoming one of the largest tourist draws in the area. Let's see if we can get it back to its former glory!

Tidbits

From the Morning Star, January 3, 1872 :

A War Incident

An old claim, arising from the war, was settled yesterday in a somewhat unusual manner. While an officer in the army, nearly ten years ago, Gov. Warmouth was passing a farm house and saw grazing in the yard a very beautiful horse. As "impressment" on such occasions was allowable in the service, he appropriated the animal to his own use, and rode it during his stay in the army. When he quit the service the horse was turned over to the quartermaster. But the Governor says his conscience always reproached him for the act, and a year ago he caused inquiries to be set on foot which resulted in ascertaining the name of the owner of the horse and his present residence. A correspondence was then commenced, the Governor frankly acknowledging that he was the culprit, and expressing a desire to pay for the animal. Several letters passed and finally a price was agreed upon, and yesterday the Governor forwarded to Mr. Freckland a check for $300, that amount being considered an equivalent for his war charger. —

N.O. Picayune

From the Daily North Carolinian, January 26, 1865 :

One wit described the war as hard tack for the soldiers and hard taxes for the citizens.

Storm in the Mountains

That is the title of a book I recently read (and enjoyed). It concerns the Civil war in the western part of North Carolina and eastern Tennessee. The book is subtitled Thomas' Confederate Legion of Cherokees and Mountaineers (authored by Vernon H. Crow) and chronicles the Legion throughout the war. There is one page in the book devoted to the heroics of a man named James Keelan.

East Tennessee in late 1861 was a hotbed of activity. Confederate troops that had been stationed there to quell any Union partisans that might show themselves, had recently been sent away. There were many such sympathizers in the area and as Federal activity increased, it emboldened many to strike a blow for their beliefs. One such movement involved the burning of railroad bridges and to prevent this, guards were stationed at the most vulnerable sites. Keelan was placed at the structure which spanned the Holston River, at the Strawberry Plains depot (northeast of Knoxville). Union General Ambrose E. Burnside called this bridge, some 1,600 long the "most important on the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad."

Total darkness and silence descended as he stood at his post, but around ten p.m. a band of Unionists approached the bridge:

While the others kept a lookout Pickens [one of the Unionists] and a man named Montgomery scrambled to the top of the embankment. The night was black, so Pickens lit a match to see his way. No sooner had he struck the match than the report of a pistol was heard. Pickens fell to the timbers wounded. In a moment Keelan sprang upon the injured saboteur but Montgomery, realizing his comrade was about to die, jumped on Keelan, slashing the guard with his knife. While they struggled on the embankment....lights began to appear in [in a nearby house.]

Prudence dictated that Keelan should have retreated, as had the other sentry, but to him, his duty was clear. In the pitch black he fought off the attackers with his now empty pistol and his knife. He didn't know it, but he had been wounded in the head and right arm and his left hand was nearly cut off. But he had done his duty and the bridge-burners had been driven off. Some time after the attack he related that:

he did not stop to count them....there were about fifteen....It was very dark, and I Could only see dark forms approach me, so I [carried] my left arm up and down to shield my head and face until I heard the crack of a bowie knife...and thrust my knife into him[.]

Four of the attackers were killed and as for James Keelan, he survived his wounds and although his left hand was amputated, he served for a year with the Confederate army. The all-important span survived until 1863 when it was burned by Union troops. For his bravery, Keelan was awarded a small farm where he lived out his life until 1895. A monument was erected over his grave in East Hill Cemetery, Bristol, Virginia.

Social Hour, 7:00p.m., Program, 7:30 p.m.

Civil War Generals

Mr. Harry Daniel, an ordained Presbyterian minister and an acknowledged expert on the subject of Civil War Generals, will speak about those men who attained that rank during the war. Mr. Daniel, a graduate of Davidson College (1963) went on to receive his M.A. and Ph.D. from Vanderbilt University. He has achieved numerous scholastic awards and has still found time to publish many articles on his research. Mr. Daniel is currently serving as a minister of the First Presbyterian Church in Washington, North Carolina.

IMPORTANT NOTICE (From Headquarters, Dept. of Cape Fear)

Due to a scheduling conflict at St. Andrew's Church, we will be meeting on the second Tuesday of every month. We apologize for any inconvenience due to this change. The meeting for November will be on the 13th.

Our September meeting combined several of the local Historical groups, including the Round Table, the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society and the University's History Department. About one hundred and ten attendees enjoyed a chicken dinner while greeting old friends and making new ones. Our speaker, Mr. Dan Barefoot, began with a tribute for those lost in the September 11 attacks. Noting that prior to this, one would have had to go back to the Civil War to surpass such a loss of American lives on a single day (September 17, 1862, at Sharpsburg/Antietam) he harkened back to those words inscribed on a tattered cloth carried by our forefathers: DON'T TREAD ON ME.

Mr. Barefoot's talk on General Robert F. Hoke and the Wilmington campaign was comprehensive and enlightening. If only, if only! If only General Hoke had been allowed one more day in his siege of New Bern (May, 1864), it is quite possible that the Union army would have been driven out of North Carolina. If only Hoke had been allowed to construct defenses along Masonboro Sound (the Union landing site). If only Hoke had been allowed to attack! If only General Braxton Bragg had not been given command of Wilmington!

Spring Trip

Wilmington, 1863

Just before Christmas 1863, Sewall Fremont sat working at his desk in the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad depot, when suddenly he heard screams from the station below. Springing to his window, he was just in time to see several soldiers firing down Nutt Street! He looked to see what they were shooting at, but saw nothing.

As a former U.S. Army officer and Chief Engineer and Superintendent of the Road, he was concerned for the safety of the passengers who milled about the platform. As did many railroad men during the war, Fremont held the rank of Colonel in the Confederate Army. It was probably his military background that compelled him to write to Major General William H.C. Whiting, commander of the Cape Fear District:

I beg to call your attention to an affair that occurred at our passenger depot this morning....A guard engaged in arresting citizens...and firing down the street filled with people.

If the life of the citizen is...in jeopardy because the guard cannot do its duty without arms loaded, I think we are in hourly danger of being slaughtered by our own people.

He ended by requesting that the soldiers be kept away from the depot, "as much as possible." This was an unusual request, earlier that year, Fremont wanted more soldiers around his railroad terminals, especially those within reach of Yankee raiders operating from New Bern.

He waited for several days and did not receive a reply from Whiting. Losing patience, he wrote to Governor Zebulon Vance's Aide-de-Camp, Colonel George Little, in Raleigh. He had by this time, learned more about the incident and related that that about fifteen minutes after the firing, there was another commotion. The soldiers had apparently captured their man. Fremont noted, "...the Guard brought up a man that seemed to be hurt about the head. I was told...that this man's skull [sic] was broken and that he died from its effects."

He had also spoken to the doctor that cared for the poor unfortunate and reported that the man had been wounded by a bayonet in the temple! The doctor was unsure if the man had lived or died, as he had been taken away by the squad of soldiers that had brought him there. The one thing he was sure of was that the man had been drunk. In closing his letter to Col. Little, Fremont added, "I am informed that a similar case occurred about the same time in Market Street with a drunken man who was shot, wither [sic] fatally or not" he did not know.

Such scenes were becoming more and more common in the bustling blockade-running center. The town hosted a large contingent of soldiers and sailors, "thieves, rogues and prostitutes...and crime became rampant." Many of the town's wealthier citizens went "refugeeing" further inland to get out of harm's way. Gunshots were heard more frequently as fights broke out. Also, with the new conscription law in effect, the army was also looking for deserters that might be trying to get out of town. Hence, the railway terminal was a good spot to catch these "sculkers." Indeed, as the war went on, many deserters resorted to hiding in a casket that was placed on board a train. When they heard the depot bell ring, signaling the train was pulling out, they knew they were safe.

There was no mention of such occurrences in the newspapers, (this was not unusual, most publishers withheld any news which might help the enemy) except for a brief paragraph later that month:

We have heard complaints of the manner of enforcing the Conscript Law, So far as the demanding of papers, etc., is concerned....We cannot conceive of any necessity [to] resort to...muskets...where no attempt is made to escape.

The paper suggested that "mutual courtesy and forbearance" would prevent violence. Unfortunately for both Colonel Fremont and Wilmington, things were going to get a lot worse in the coming years before getting better.

We would like to note that the majority of this research was done at U.N.C.W.'s Randall Library, which now has available (on microfilm) the Papers of Zebulon Vance. In addition, the library has a great collection of nineteenth century newspapers on microfilm. We understand that General William H.C. Whiting's Letter Books might soon be coming to the library! That would certainly be a wonderful addition to their ever-expanding research material.

The following is also from the Wilmington Journal, December 28, 1863:

A sentimental young lady in Northern Georgia indites the following to some of her admirers in the Ridgeament:

'Tis hard for youens to sleep in camp;
'Tis hard for youens to fight;
'Tis hard for youens thro' snow to tramp;
In snow to sleep at night;
But harder for weans from youens to part;
For youens have stolen weans heart.

Round Table member Porter Harned has donated his Orphan Brigade [First Kentucky Brigade] photo collection to the American Civil War Institute at Campbellsville University. The Institute is making plans to properly store and display this great collection of rare photos of one of the War's most famous fighting units. The Civil War community owes Porter a debt of gratitude for his labor of love in putting this collection together and then for insuring that it will be preserved for future generations.

Coming Up Shortly

The Louise Wells Cameron Museum of Art (Independence Blvd. And S. 17th St.) will soon be completed. Included on the property are nearly 200 yards of Confederate earthworks, thrown up as a last defense of Wilmington, by General Robert Hoke's Division. Nearly lost to history, the earthworks have been preserved (in large part due to the efforts of our current President) and are at present surrounded by protective fencing.

Our Round Table has been chosen as the organization which will maintain the site. The works are to be restored as nearly as possible to February, 1865. To do this, volunteers will be needed (to cut brush and trees, move dirt, etc.). Sorry, no relic hunting, so leave your metal detectors home, but feel free to bring your wheelbarrow, rakes, shovels and chainsaw! There will be more on this project in coming newsletters, so stay tuned!

Included in this month's newsletter is a questionnaire to see "how we're doing." Please take the time to fill it out as your input will help us go in the direction YOU want us to go!

TIDBITS

An illustration of the tremendous force of gunpowder in explosions is afforded in the discovery in Charleston harbor a few days since of a whole broadside of the ironclad Charleston, blown up at the evacuation in 1865. A ripple on the water first excited the attention of the wreckers. This was at a distance of four hundred and fifty yards from the scene of the explosion. The Broadside, on being raised, was found to weigh 212,750 pounds. The whole was intact. The wrecker, Mr. Maillefert, is now engaged in looking at the same distance on the other side for the other part of the sunken vessel.

[Wilmington Weekly Star, March 28, 1873]

During the War, the staff of General [Henry] Wise was riding through a rather forlorn part of North Carolina and a young Virginian of the staff concluded to have a little fun at the expense of a long-legged specimen of the genus homo who wore a very shabby uniform and bestrode a worm fence at the roadside. Reining in his horse, he accosted him with "How are you North Carolina?" "How are you Virginia?" was the ready response. The staff officer continued, "The blockade on turpentine makes you rather hard up, don't it?" "No sale for tar now?"

"Well-yes-" was the slow response. "We sell all our tar to Jeff Davis now." "The thunder you do! What on earth does the President want of your tar?" North Carolina answered, "He puts it on the heels of Virginians to make them stick on the battlefield." The staff rode on.

[from Campfire and Battlefield]

Did you know that nearly 190,000 men were at Gettysburg? On the Union side were 112,735 (95,799 engaged); Confederates 75,000 (69,700 engaged). Over 50,000 men were either killed, wounded or missing (23,000 Union and 28,000 Confederate).

Gettysburg: The High Water Mark of the Confederacy

"First at Bethel, Farthest at Gettysburg and Last at Appomattox" is a well known part of the North Carolina soldier's saga. We are especially fortunate this year to have Dr. John R. Krohn, now a licensed Gettysburg Tour Guide (as well as a member of our Steering Committee) to lead a tour group to that battlefield. Make plans to reserve March 21-24 for the trip, as it promises to be one of the best we've had. See page four for our planned itinerary.

Spring Tour

On Thursday, March 21, (2002), members will arrange for their own transportation to the Holiday Inn in Gettysburg (telephone number 717-334-6211). Allow at least eight hours for the trip. The motel, at 516 Baltimore Street, is located near the Visitor's Center. The cost of the rooms will be $57 (plus tax), double occupancy and the tour will be limited to 45 persons. There will be a banquet on Thursday evening.

On Friday morning we will board a tour bus and Dr. Krohn will give an overview tour of the battlefield in the morning. In the afternoon, we will follow in particular, the movements of the North Carolina regiments engaged in the battle. That evening there will be another banquet dinner.

On Saturday we will continue to examine North Carolina regiments, there will be box lunches on both Friday and Saturday. On Saturday evening dinner reservations have been made at the Montford Farm restaurant. The restaurant was a Confederate field hospital during the war. Return on Sunday.

THE TWENTY-SIXTH NORTH CAROLINA REGIMENT

An Evening With Rod Gragg ✓

Thursday, May 17 ✓
St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm...Program 7:30 pm

Figuring prominently in the annals of Lee's Army of Northern Virginia, the 26th North Carolina Regiment was a superb fighting unit. Especially noteworthy was this regiment's participation in the Battle of Gettysburg where, engaged with the Iron Brigade on the first day and making a valiant assault in the Pickett-Pettigrew Charge on the third day, it sustained unusually high casualties.

Rod Gragg's recent Covered With Glory: The 26th North Carolina Infantry at the Battle of Gettysburg (Harper/Collins) has won a wide audience of readers. Rod will bring copies of his book for sale and signing.

Rod lives with his family in Conway SC. He holds an M.A. in American History from the University of South Carolina. Rod's Confederate Goliath: The Battle of Fort Fisher was published in 1991. This dramatic narrative won the New York City Civil War Round Table's coveted Fletcher Pratt Award. His The Confederate Illustrated Reader won the Douglas Southall Freeman Award for History.

Rod is a popular and engaging speaker who has appeared before numerous Civil War Round Tables around the country. We look forward to his visit!

Special Note: We call upon our members to bring extra cookies and/or dessert items to the meeting! A group from Minnesota will be joining us, so we need to provide more than the usual fare.

BATTLE REPORT April 19 Meeting

We had a great turnout as usual for our monthly meeting when Edward Longacre presented an interesting slide program on Major General William Dorsey Pender, CSA. Raffle winners were Bill Clark (Confederate Veteran magazines by David Cameron), John Moore (Siege of Petersburg by Rich Triebe), Ed Gibson (Charleston: The Civil War on Folly Island by Mary and Palmer Royal), Conway Ficklen (The Civil War at Charleston by Mary and Palmer Royal), John Moore (Photo of Fort Fisher Monument Dedication 1932 by R. Lamb) and Bob Cooke (Battle in the Wilderness by George Slaton).

IN MEMORIAM James Campbell Steadman

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table extends its deepest condolences to Linda Earle Steadman following the death of her husband, Jim. Both Jim and Linda Earle have been active members in the Round Table, attending regular meetings as frequently as Jim's medical condition would allow.

Jim was deservedly proud of his ancestor, Colonel Reuben P. Campbell, the commander of the 7th North Carolina Regiment. Colonel Campbell, a native of Iredell County NC and a graduate of West Point (Class of 1840) was engaged at the Battle of Gaines Mill in June, 1862 when, "picking up the fallen colors and advancing in front of his men," he was mortally wounded.

Jim researched his ancestor's history and visited the battlefields where he exercised command. On June 12, 1999, he convened a rededication of Colonel Campbell's monument in the cemetery of Snow Creek Methodist Church near Statesville.

In the spirit of his Confederate forebear, Jim Steadman struggled courageously against cancer and maintained an active life in his church and community during his long illness. We will miss his warm presence and his enthusiasm for the Civil War.

SABRE STROKES

Our congratulations to John Krohn who has recently become a Licensed Gettysburg Battlefield Guide! John persevered during the long and arduous process of written and oral examinations, and we're proud of his achievement.

Tonia Smith, a long time CFCWRT member and Pinehurst resident, founded the Rufus Barringer CWRT last year. The group is named in honor of the Cabarrus County native and CSA brigadier general of cavalry in the ANV. Under Tonia's enthusiastic leadership, the membership has grown rapidly! Tonia also edits the newsletter, The Barringer Provisional.

Good news from the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond. Its R.E. Lee: The Exhibition, which opened in January, 2000, has been extended to run through 2001. This exhibition presents the largest compilation of Lee's personal effects ever assembled. And, just recently, the MOC has issued an expanded version of its A Catalog of Uniforms, first published in 1987 and describing 215 items from its collections. The first edition sold out in three years. Call (804) 649-1861 or visit www.moc.org.

The Western North Carolina CWRT is sponsoring The North Carolina Presence: 1861-1865, a conference to be held September 7-9, 2001 in Asheville NC. Speakers will include Brian Wills, Mark Bradley, Jeff Crowe and others. WNCCWRT, Box 3709, Cullowhee NC 28273 or www.wnccwrt.org.

The well-known Central Virginia Battlefields Trust is celebrating its purchase of a significant parcel of property on the Talley Farm at Chancellorsville. The site was the scene of intense action when Stonewall Jackson's troops stormed into the Federal position on May 2, 1863. CVBT is also supporting the National Park Service's recommended restoration of the famous Sunken Road in Fredericksburg. The City of Fredericksburg is being asked to close this short section of the roadway. You may want to contact Mayor William Beck, Box 7447, Fredericksburg VA 22404 to support the NPS request to close the road.

A great travel destination for the summer is the brand new National Civil War Museum in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. This $36 million facility has 11,000 artifacts including Pickett's kepi, Lee's Bible, Stuart's sword, Grant's sword belt and more. The museum's 65,000 square feet makes it the largest Civil War museum in the world. Call (866) 258-4729 or visit www.nationalcivilwarmuseum.org.

The Civil War Preservation Trust accomplished much in battlefield preservation during the year 2000. One significant purchase was an additional 245 acre tract at Malvern Hill in the area where Jackson's infantry attacked the Union right flank. The property is partly wooded and mostly open farmland. The Trust has made great strides in protecting our CW battlefields. Contact CWPT at (202) 367-1861 or visit www.civilwar.org.

See you in September as the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table begins its eighth year!

WILLIAM DORSEY PENDER Major General, CSA

Thursday, April 19
St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm...Program 7:30 pm

Students of the Civil War who hail from North Carolina are fond of a native son, William Dorsey Pender, who was one of the most capable combat generals in Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. A full-length biography of this superb officer, long overdue, is scheduled to be published this spring.

Edward Longacre, well-known historian and author of thirteen previous books on the Civil War, has penned this new work on Pender. Ed won his Ph.D. in American History from Temple University and, since 1980, has been employed as an historian for the US Air Force. Since 1992, he's been stationed at Langley Air Force Base, Virginia. His home stands adjacent to the outer line of Confederate works in Yorktown.

Ed's interest in the Civil War dates from his discovery, at age 16, in the attic of his New Jersey home, several books that his great-grandfather, a sergeant in the Union army, had "borrowed" from the home of the mayor of Williamsburg VA in 1862! He soon began his study of the war by researching his ancestor's regiment, the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry. Thirty years later, after moving to Virginia, he was offered an adjunct position in the history department of the College of William & Mary and taught there for three years. He considers this a generous gesture on the part of the college considering that his great-grandfather's regiment looted the campus in 1862 and burned down the science building and the library!

We look forward to learning more about William Dorsey Pender at our April meeting. We're also excited to learn that we can anticipate additional biographies on CSA commanders, Wade Hampton and Fitzhugh Lee, as well as a history of the 4th US Colored Troops.

OAKDALE CEMETERY TOUR Sunday, April 22

Wayne Carver will complete his tour of Oakdale Cemetery, featuring gravesites of Confederate soldiers and officers, on the Sunday morning following our April meeting. The tour begins at 9:30 am. Participants should meet at the cemetery entrance. Wayne estimates that the tour should be concluded by noon.

THE WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN SPRING TOUR

This excellent conference, sponsored by the CFCWRT, began Friday evening with a dinner at The Oceanic where a choice of seafood, chicken, or steak platter was served. Members enjoyed a social hour and an overview by tour leader, Ed Bearss. Ed discussed the various personalities who figured prominently in planning and executing the Wilmington Campaign.

Next day, the group toured the remaining Confederate defense line near Dow Road, as well as Fort Fisher, Fort Johnston, Fort Anderson, the Battle of Town Creek, and the Battle of Forks Road. Ed Bearss has declared that Fort Anderson is "the finest earthen fort in North America." Group members trekked a total of 4.6 miles that Saturday!

The Oakdale Cemetery tour, led by Wayne Carver, was postponed on the following day due to rainy weather, but was held the next Sunday.

BATTLE OF TREVILIAN STATION

Civil War Preservation Trust

!!! Your Chance to Save A Battlefield !!!

At Trevilian Station, on June 11 and 12, 1864, CSA cavalry under the command of General Wade Hampton met and stopped the advance of USA cavalry forces led by General Philip Sheridan. This large and decisive engagement prevented the Union forces from making a strategic link with a corresponding force in the Shenandoah Valley, a combination which might have forced Lee from his defenses around Petersburg and Richmond, thereby ending the war much earlier. Wade Hampton, who had just been given command of the Confederate cavalry corps by RE Lee following the death of Jeb Stuart a month earlier, proved his ability in a two-day struggle between 13,000 cavalymen, each side suffering more than 1000 casualties.

Located in Louisa County, Virginia, west of Richmond, Trevilian Station is one of those virtually unprotected Civil War battlefields threatened by development. Already, homes and industrial structures are encroaching on the site.

The Civil War Preservation Trust, the nation's largest CW preservation organization, has joined with a local preservation group, The Trevilian Station Battlefield Foundation, already the owner of 245 acres at the site, to purchase 521 acres of the core battlefield. TSBF has secured considerable funding from federal and state grants to buy the property. CWPT is seeking to raise $136,000 by June 30, 2001 to finalize the purchase.

CWPT is requesting contributions from CW buffs. Any contribution, of course, will be appreciated. However, contributors of $50 or more will receive a copy of the soon-to-be-published Battle of Trevilian Station by cavalry historian, Eric Wittenburg, and an autographed and numbered Special Preservation Edition of Glory Enough For All: Major General Philip H. Sheridan's Trevilian Raid. That's obviously a great deal!

Contributions can be forwarded to Civil War Preservation Trust, Box 1477, Hagerstown MD 21741. It's also an opportunity to join this premier CW battlefield preservation organization.

THE CIVIL WAR IN DEPTH A Slide Presentation By Bob Zeller

Thursday, February 8
St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm....Program 7:30 pm

With his discoveries in Civil War photography, his work as a motorsports writer and his award-winning investigative newspaper reporting, writer and journalist Bob Zeller finds hidden stories and brings them to light. Zeller's highly acclaimed The Civil War In Depth, Vol I, was the first 3-D photographic history of the war ever published. It has captivated thousands of Civil War buffs who were unaware that the greatest wartime photographs were created in 3-D. The Civil War In Depth, Vol II, complete with a 3-D viewer, was recently published by Chronicle Books. This new volume features more photographic discoveries, as well as a chapter of wartime views in color.

Bob Zeller, a native of Washington DC, is a graduate of the University of Missouri School of Journalism. He was an investigative reporter (1976-1990) at The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson, Mississippi and The Press-Telegram in Long Beach, California. As a motorsports writer (1991-1998) for Landmark Newspapers, he covered the NASCAR Winston Cup series. In late 1998, Bob left his newspaper career to become a freelance writer. Bob resides in Pleasant Garden NC.

We're pleased to have Bob with us again. Members enjoyed his presentation to our group in November, 1998, and we look forward to another program and slide show featuring Bob's fresh discoveries. Copies of his new book will be available for sale and signing.

BATTLE REPORT January Meeting

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table enjoyed hosting Mark Bradley and his wife, Nancy, at our meeting on January 11. A large crowd was present for Mark's program about the last days of the war in North Carolina. Mark's work in this area has been ground-breaking, since no one has ever before examined in such depth the events leading up to the surrender of Joseph Johnston's army to William Sherman near Durham NC. Mark pointed out that, though the surrender at Appomattox has received so much attention through the years, the Bennett Place surrender, in military and political terms, is far more interesting. Many of our members purchased Mark's book after the meeting.

THE SWORDS OF GRANT AND LEE

Forever sheathed those famous blades that led the eager van,
They shine no more among the glades that fringe the Rapidan;
Today their battle-work is done, go draw them forth and see
That not a stain appears upon the swords of Grant and Lee.

The gallant men who saw them flash in comradeship today,
Recall the wild, impetuous dash of valorous blue and grey,
And 'neath the flag that proudly waves above a nation free,
They oft recall the missing braves who fought with Grant and Lee.

They sleep among the tender grass, they slumber 'neath the pines,
They're camping in the mountain-pass where crouch the serried lines;
They rest where loud tempests blow destruction in their glee
The men who followed long ago the swords of Grant and Lee.

Methinks I hear a bugle blow; methinks I hear a drum,
And there, with martial step and slow, two ghostly armies come;
They are the men who met as foes, for 'tis the dead I see,
And side by side in peace repose the swords of Grant and Lee.

Above them let Old Glory wave and let each deathless star
Forever shine upon the brave who led the ranks of war.
Their fame resounds from coast to coast, from mountain tops to sea;
No other land than ours can boast the swords of Grant and Lee.

Today no strifes of section rise, today no shadows fall
Upon our land and 'neath the skies one flag waves over all;
The Blue and Gray as comrades stand, as comrades bend the knee,
And ask God's blessing on the land that gave us Grant and Lee.

THIS ASTOUNDING CLOSE: THE BENNETT PLACE NEGOTIATIONS

Thursday, January 11
St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm... Program 7:30 pm

Mark Bradley is an old friend of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table. He led our third program (December, 1994) which featured the Battle of Bentonville and a battlefield tour (March, 1995) which included sites at Averasboro and Bentonville. We're fortunate that Mark, a highly considered and widely read Civil War historian, will return to our RT this month.

This Astounding Close: The Road to Bennett Place (September, 2000), published by UNC Press, is Mark's second major work. It follows his Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville (1996) and a number of articles for Blue and Gray Magazine and Civil War Regiments. Mark's program will cover the time period from the end of the Battle of Bentonville to the surrender of Joseph Johnston's CSA Army of Tennessee and focus on the negotiations between Johnston and William T. Sherman.

Mark Bradley graduated from N.C. State University with a B.A. in History and is currently in the Ph.D. program in History at UNC-Chapel Hill. Mark and his wife, Nancy, live in Raleigh where he has just finished a term as President of the North Carolina Civil War Round Table. Copies of This Astounding Close: The Road to Bennett Place will be available for sale ($35) and signing.

THE VICKSBURG CAMPAIGN

An Evening With
EDWIN C. BEARSS

Thursday, December 14
St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm....Program 7:30 pm

Edwin C. Bearss, former Chief Historian of the National Park Service, long ago achieved a legendary status in the Civil War community. His matchless and memorable battlefield tours, his numerous publications on military history, his countless appearances and interviews on television have endeared him to everyone who has had the good fortune to meet him, to enjoy his inimitable style of presentation, and to marvel at his amazing and encyclopedic knowledge of Civil War history.

Born in 1923 in Billings, Montana, Ed Bearss joined the Marine Corps just after his high school graduation in 1941. He served with the First Marine Division on Guadalcanal and was subsequently selected to join the 3rd Raider Battalion, an elite combat group. He was so seriously wounded in action on New Britain that his recuperation in a military hospital required a two year stay. During his recovery, Ed immersed himself in CW literature, reading Douglas Southall Freeman's recently published R.E. Lee and Lee's Lieutenants.

At war's end, Ed received a degree in Foreign Service from Georgetown University and an M.A. in history from Indiana University. His master's thesis was on CSA General Patrick Cleburne. His first NPS position was historian at Vicksburg in 1955. During his service at Vicksburg, Ed led the effort to locate and raise the US ironclad, Cairo, from the Yazoo River. After retirement from an illustrious career, Ed continues as Special Assistant to the Director of Military Sites, National Park Service, and continues to actively raise awareness of battlefield preservation, serving as a consultant to elected officials and CW preservation groups.

Everywhere you look, you'll find something that Ed has published. If you go to Cowpens Military Park in SC, you'll find his published account of that decisive Revolutionary War battle. If you go to Richmond National Battlefield Park, you'll find his series of detailed troop movement maps of Malvern Hill. Among his other works are accounts of Nathan Bedford Forrest's victory at Brice's Crossroads MS, U.S. Grant's capture of Forts Donelson and Henry, and other engagements in Mississippi and Arkansas.

Ed's major work is the three-volume The Vicksburg Campaign (Morningside Press), the definitive account of the campaign which many historians consider the turning point of the War Between the States.

Our December program featuring Ed Bearss will be a real treat! We look forward to seeing each of you then!

BATTLE REPORT November 9 Meeting

Our members enjoyed a slide presentation and program on the history and recovery of the Confederate submarine, CSS Hunley, given by Mark Ragan. Raffle winners were Mary Royal, Wayne Brown, Beverly Blanton, Dan Geddie, Jack Kuske, and John Krohn. They received prizes donated by Ed Gibson, Rich Triebe, and Palmer and Mary Royal. Keep in mind that we continue to rely on your contributions for the monthly raffle, so look through your collection and find an item or two which you'd like to give to Mike Budziszewski who handles our raffle. A wonderful variety of refreshments was prepared and served by Mary Royal, Janine Van Der Molen, Joan Brown, and Bernice Carver! The refreshments continue to be coordinated by Karen Budziszewski and Nancy Fonvielle.

We must draw our members' attention to a most unfortunate incident which occurred at our November meeting. Karen Budziszewski's purse was stolen, resulting in the loss of innumerable items, only a few of which could be painstakingly replaced. This theft was deplorable enough, but we are most aggrieved because it affected two of our most active and generous members. So take a moment at the December meeting to share your concern with Karen and Mike and to thank them for their help at our monthly meetings. (Karen's purse, a large black cloth handbag which resembled a camera bag, was at the refreshment table along the wall near the entrance of the meeting room. If you recall seeing anyone carrying this bag, please report it to Mike and Karen, Home: 458-1370).

SABRE STROKES

The RT recently received a letter from Mort Kunstler, the well-known CW artist, urging support for HERITAGEPAC which was established in 1989 by Jerry L. Russell, the founder and chairman of Civil War Round Table Associates. HERITAGEPAC is the only political action committee registered with the Federal Election Commission which is concerned with battlefield preservation. Your financial contributions are not used for salaries or office overhead, but goes exclusively toward the cost of production, printing, and processing of mail to CW enthusiasts throughout the country, outlining actions that need to be taken to protect battlefields from urban sprawl and development. Gifts of $5, $10 or more are welcome. Send to HERITAGEPAC, Box 7281, Little Rock AR 72217. You can get on HERITAGEPAC's email list by contacting: heritagepac@aristotle.net.

The RT also received a current catalogue from Morningside Bookshop (Box 1087, Dayton OH 45401) which carries a full range of CW titles. Its Morningside Press has published Ed Bearss' work on Vicksburg, as well as numerous other CW books. Morningside also publishes The Gettysburg Magazine twice a year. Each issue contains eight to fifteen authoritative articles on the Battle of Gettysburg. A four-issue subscription is $30. Another mailing came to us from The Longstreet Society (Box 191, Gainesville GA 30503, Ph. 404-531-0100, www.longstreet.org) The non-profit Society preserves Longstreet-associated sites in the general's postwar hometown of Gainesville and sponsors battlefield tours.

A recent note in The Ramrod, the newsletter of the North Carolina CWRT, gave news of the death of Rufus Barringer 82, the grandson of CSA General Rufus Barringer. Mr. Barringer of Rocky Mount NC spoke to the third meeting of our RT in January, 1995. The same issue announced the formation of a new CRWT in Durham. Meetings are held the third Thursday of each month. Look for the new web site of the Richmond VA CWRT at <http://members.tripod.com/~gcowardin/rcwrt>.

Mark your calendar for the March 2-4, 2001 Wilmington Campaign Conference and Tour led by Ed Bearss. Headquartered at the Hampton Inn, Landfall, the conference will include a dinner, a reception, and tours of battle sites and Oakdale Cemetery. The first 48 people who provide a paid registration will be guaranteed seats on the bus with Ed Bearss. For more information, contact Tommy King (O.763-7318 and H. 762-2930 or email HTKing@aol.com). You'll be hearing more about this event in the coming weeks.

THE LAST GENERATION: LEE'S YOUNG OFFICERS CORPS

An Evening With Peter S. Carmichael

Thursday, October 12

Cape Fear Club

Corner of Second & Chestnut Streets

Dinner 7:00 pm....Program 7:30 pm

! Paid Dinner Reservations Required By Monday, October 9 !

Peter S. Carmichael is one of the rising stars among Civil War historians. Awarded his Ph.D. from Pennsylvania State University where he studied with Gary Gallagher, Peter is an acknowledged expert on the Army of Northern Virginia. We're fortunate to have him as the speaker for our annual Fall dinner meeting at the Cape Fear Club.

Currently, Peter is an assistant professor of history at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. He is the author of Lee's Young Artillerist: William R. J. Pegram (University of Virginia Press, 1995) and has contributed numerous articles to Civil War Times Illustrated, North and South Magazine, and the University of North Carolina's Military Campaigns of the Civil War Series. He is currently finishing a group biography of young Virginians during the 1850's and the Civil War. Copies of Lee's Young Artillerist: William R. J. Pegram will be available ($25.00) for sale and signing.

Peter's presentation will focus primarily on Virginia men who came of age during the 1850's, the contentious political decade before the Civil War. They were the last white generation to grow up with the institution of slavery. By Fort Sumter, they had a strong sense of being Southern and they consequently wanted their state to leave the Union when others preferred a moderate course. During the war, they became the zealots of the Confederacy, the Young Lions who recklessly fought on the battlefields while never losing faith in the South, even when the cause appeared hopeless. Why these young men saw themselves as crusaders for the Confederacy, the defenders of a Southern nation that they believed was the last bastion of Christendom will be the subject of Peter's talk. Their experience parallels that of many other young men who fought in the Southern ranks. And when appropriate, Peter will make comparisons to North Carolina officers who served in Lee's army.

This dinner meeting will be one of the highlights of the Round Table year. As usual for these events, we're expecting a large crowd. Bring your friends!

Remember that your paid dinner reservation of $20.00 must be received by Monday, October 9. Your check is your reservation. Only those members and guests with prior paid reservations can be served dinner, so please don't come for dinner if you have not paid by the Monday deadline. (Members are welcome to attend the program only). The menu will feature a choice of Barbeque Pork or Chicken with all the usual delicious fixings. So send your check right away to CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404 or bring to Hanover Iron Works!

BATTLE REPORT

The first meeting of the 2000-2001 Round Table year attracted one the largest crowds we've ever had! Eighty members and visitors were on hand, and we were pleased to see the many familiar faces of members and particularly many new faces who were attending the RT for the first time. Dan Geddie, our Treasurer, reported that a large number of those in attendance joined the RT or renewed their memberships. President Chris Fonvielle gave a hearty welcome and a good overview of the superb lineup of programs for the coming year, as well as some opportunities for RT members to work with local Civil War projects. The refreshments served by Karen Budziszewski and Nancy Fonvielle were a big hit with everyone who came for the social gathering before the program. Mike Budziszewski's raffle consisted of a Joshua Chamberlain print (donated by Mike), The Bermuda Hundred Campaign (donated by Chris Fonvielle), and More Terrible Than Victory: North Carolina's Bloody Bethel Regiment (donated by Mary and Palmer Royal). Winners were David English, Ed Gibson, and Richard Long. Speaker Clint Johnson gave a most interesting account of various North and South Carolinians who played some colorful part in the War Between the States.

Members are encouraged to contact Mike with donations for the raffle. And Nancy and Karen will appreciate your offer to help provide refreshments for the programs coming up this year.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Greetings fellow members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table from your new president, Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr.! This year, our seventh, promises to be one of our best ever. We have some of the nation's most respected and finest historians lined up to speak to our organization. Your steering committee worked hard this summer to duplicate the enlightening and enjoyable programs we have had the past six years. The new season also presents new challenges. Our long-time president, George Slaton, has retired from command for a much deserved rest. I know I speak for the entire membership in extending a heartfelt appreciation for all that George has done for the Round Table, from founding it to running it. Fortunately, George has agreed to remain on the steering committee, which has also been bolstered by the addition of two new members, John Moore and Bob Cooke. Mike Budziszewski, your new vice president, and I consider it a great honor to help lead the Round Table into the new year. We also have a new meeting place, at St. Andrew's On-The-Sound Episcopal Church. The church is located at the intersection of Oleander Drive and Airlie Road on Wrightsville Sound. Anxious to get the season started, the leadership looks forward to seeing y'all on September 14 for a great program and a new beginning.

! BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION ALERT !

From the Civil War Preservation Trust (CWPT) comes this urgent message: The Conservation and Reinvestment Act (CARA) makes good on a promise by Congress 35 years ago to fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund (LWCF) which has been the source of millions of battlefield preservation dollars for decades. CARA passed the House with overwhelming bi-partisan support (315-102) in May. CARA will provide for $15 million annually for battlefield preservation specifically. Yet the bill is now in jeopardy in the Senate, delayed and opposed by several senators from western states. If the Senate fails to take up CARA this fall, the next Congress must start from scratch with a new bill in January.

CWPT urges Civil War buffs to write a letter to their Senators indicating support for the Senate version of the bill with its $15 million for the battlefields before the October adjournment. Send to The Honorable —, United States Senate, Washington DC 20510.

HIDDEN BENEATH THE WAVES An Overview of Civil War Naval Activities in North Carolina

May 11 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

Richard W. Lawrence began working with the Division of Archives and History in 1975 at the Underwater Archeology Unity (UAU) in Kure Beach. In 1976 he was made a permanent member of the staff as an underwater archeologist and in 1981 he was promoted to archeological supervisor. Richard has a B.A. in Anthropology from the University of Colorado at Boulder.

Over the past 25 years, Richard has been involved in a variety of projects throughout the state and has investigated hundreds of underwater archeological sites which have included prehistoric canoes, colonial sailing vessels, numerous Civil War shipwrecks, and coastal and river steamboats. Richard was among the first divers to explore the USS Monitor in 1979. Thirty-nine lockout dives were made on the wreck from a four-man submersible, resulting in the establishment of an on-site baseline, excavation of a five-foot-by-five-foot test square, photographic documentation, and recovery of archeological artifacts. In 1993, he directed the Cape Fear River Comprehensive Survey. Over ninety shipwrecks were documented, from the city of Wilmington to the river's mouth, including two Confederate ironclads, a blockade runner, and numerous steamboats, work boats, and barges.

In 1996 a private research group discovered a shipwreck in Beaufort Inlet thought to be Blackbeard's flagship Queen Anne's Revenge. Since that time Richard has been involved in all phases of research and management for that site and he serves on its advisory committee.

Under Richard's direction, the UAU has continued to expand its historical and archeological database and increase its services to the public and to governmental agencies. Over 3000 square feet of lab and storage space have been added to the UAU facilities at Fort Fisher, and in 1989 an underwater archeology exhibit was opened that attracts approximately 80,000 visitors every year.

Richard's program will cover Civil War era shipwrecks, including blockade runners, the CSS Raleigh and North Carolina, naval actions in the sounds and rivers of NC's central and northern coast, and the USS Monitor.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS

The Nominating Committee is proud to present a slate of new officers for election at the May 11 meeting! Additional nominations may be made from the floor. The slate includes:

THE SOUTH'S MOST POPULAR CITIZEN VISITS WILMINGTON One Hundred and Thirty Years Ago

In March, 1870, just months before his death, Robert E. Lee began a last tour of the South. What was originally conceived as a vacation to restore his health turned out to be a very public tour by rail with stops in a number of Southern cities. Great, cheering crowds gathered at train depots along the route, even in towns and cities where Lee was unable to stop. Fortunately for the citizens of Wilmington, Lee paused here to spend a day and night in late April. Following are excerpts from the Wilmington Daily Journal, April 29-30, 1870.

"Telegrams were received in this city yesterday announcing the fact that General Lee would arrive here from Charleston on the Southern train last night. A special train was arranged, through the courtesy of Colonel Fremont, the Superintendent, to start from the depot of the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad for the accommodation of those who wished to greet the great ex-chieftain upon his arrival. This train started at 8 o'clock, and proceeded to Meares Bluff - there to await General Lee's arrival, having on board a large crowd of friends and the Cadets of the Cape Fear Academy, under charge of General Colston.

After some time spent in waiting, the train from the South arrived, and General Lee, by invitation, came to the special train. A suppressed whisper of admiration, respectfully restrained, first greeted his approach. There were only a few in the car at the time, but soon the curious crowd who had rushed outside to catch the first glimpse of the noble General and hurried and thronged around his seat. The corps of Cadets were on the platform and received him with arms presented, while the band played an air. We think that General Lee was affected by the sight of the grey worn by the Cadets, which no doubts called forcibly to mind many recollections of the days when "old Marse Robert" was held in such veneration and confidence by the thousands of noble and manly hearts which beat beneath many a grey jacket. But the demonstration seemed not altogether pleasing to him. The gratifying news soon spread through the car that General Lee had determined to stop here, but would probably leave tonight. On the arrival at the depot the Cadets formed in line and proceeded to escort him to the residence of Honorable George Davis whose guest General Lee is. From respect to the feelings of the old warrior, no further demonstration which people might otherwise wish to desire to make was insisted on, but the Cadets headed the crowd in a march downtown, and General Lee was left in peace. (4/29)

Thousands of friends and admirers of the man who possesses the devoted affection of his own people and the admiration and respect of his former enemies, availed themselves of the privilege of visiting the sterling old patriot at the residence of Honorable George Davis yesterday. It was a reception which truly did the heart good. No formal demonstrations, no sycophantic protestations, but purely and simply the homage of hearts overflowing with veneration and true affection, with humble and unselfish reverence of the noble representative of a past made glorious by deeds of romance and heroic sacrifices - a people forgetting the present and memory reverting to the past were enshrined and embodied in this ever faithful leader of the armies. However strongly the hearts of our people may have previously inclined and clung to General Lee this feeling could be but increased and a most favorable personal impression created by his manner of receiving those who called yesterday. There was a tender warmth and cordiality in the grasp of his hand, a gentle dignity in the form of greeting and due regard for feelings and appreciation for attentions which will ever be remembered. None could fail to be charmed with delight and the popular heart here swells with increased emotion at the name of General Lee.

The General will take leave of our city today. He leaves on a special train this morning, accompanied by his daughter, on his return home, but will probably stop in Richmond. We regret that he could not have been here longer, but are pleased that we have at least seen this much of him and seen him so favorably." (4/30)

*Note. George Davis, a former Attorney General of the Confederacy, was a Wilmington attorney after the war. His home in 1870 was on Second Street between Red Cross and Walnut Streets.

SABRE STROKES

We were delighted to host Dr. Francis Carroll at the April meeting. He introduced us to the intricacies of the "British Intervention During the Civil War." Many of our members participated in the raffle, and the winners were: Ray Martin (Relic Box from the Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Dick Covell (Civil War Centennial Stamps from Wilbur Jones), Clayton Callaway (Bruce Catton's Grant Takes Command from John Krohn), Wayne Carver (Civil War broadside from the Cape Fear Civil War Shop), James McLaren (NC cupholder from the Cape Fear Civil War Shop), and Robert Batchelder (Gabor Borritt's The Gettysburg Nobody Knows from Mary and Palmer Royal). Raffle total was $115.00! Thanks especially to Linda Rand and Mary Royal who prepared and brought some delicious refreshments for our members to enjoy! We're very grateful to Bernice and Wayne Carver who have coordinated the refreshments at our meetings this year.

Our members, especially those who attended the Christmas Open House at the Bellamy Mansion in December, will want to know that Southern Horizon, the wonderful period vocal and instrumental group which presented a stirring concert of Civil War music, has just released its first CD. "Do They Miss Me At Home?" features seventeen songs. The CD ($15) or the cassette tape ($10) plus $2 shipping can be ordered directly from John C. Robison, 2207 Wren's Nest Road, Richmond VA 23235, (804) 320-4680, Email: MINSTRAL@aol.com. The group's web site, www.southern-horizon.com, lists a full description of the new release.

The December newsletter reported the merger of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) with the Civil War Trust into a new and enlarged Civil War preservation organization known as The Civil War Preservation Trust (CWPT). In retrospect, the merger appears to have been more a takeover of APCWS by the Trust. Some frustration and grief, as well as resentment, has been expressed by longtime members of APCWS, a popular and effective grass-roots organization which was founded in the late 1980's. Your editor, an ardent supporter of APCWS, has made some inquiries over the last few months about the transition and current status of the CWPT. It seems that one of the primary reasons for the merger was that some influential members of Congress have been insisting that the Civil War preservation movement achieve greater unity and cohesion before committing more federal funds for saving battlefields. It is thought by many that a larger national organization will prove to be more effective overall. Many former APCWS members are taking an optimistic wait and see attitude.

The CFCWRT Annual Spring Tour in March to sites of the Bermuda Hundred Campaign near Chester VA was once again a great experience for all who attended! Mark Jacobson and Jerry Netherland were very enthusiastic guides to a battleground which has been significantly urbanized. The visit to Pamplin Park, the site of the Union breakthrough at Petersburg in April, 1865, was a delight as well. The park preserves the section of CSA breastworks held by Brigadier General James H. Lane's brigade of North Carolinians. Those attending the tour were Tommy King, Dan Geddie, George Wolf, Ed Mahoney, Richard Triebe, Mike Budziszewski, Bob Quinn, , Jim McCallum, James McLaren and guest, Owen Hardy of Louisville KY, Palmer and Mary Royal, Bert and Ellen Williams and their guest, Jim Brandon of West Palm Beach FL, John Moore, and George Slaton. Our special thanks to Tommy and Dan for planning and executing another enjoyable tour.

Congratulations to Chris Fonvielle whose Fort Anderson: Battle for Wilmington has won the coveted Clarendon Award from the Lower Cape Fear Historical Society! This marks the third time Chris' work has achieved this award. The award presentation at the Latimer House on Sunday, May 7, at 1:30 pm and Chris' lecture shortly afterwards at 3:30 pm on Fort Anderson at the Cape Fear Museum are open to the public. For those of you who want a limited (500), numbered, and signed copy of the hard bound edition of the book, they will be available at our May 11 meeting.

Congratulations also to RT member, Richard Long, who has taken the editorship of the monthly newsletter of the local George Davis Camp No. 5 of the Sons of Confederate Veterans. It's entitled The Cape Fear Defender.

RT members who attended our Annual Spring Tour to the Seven Days Campaign near Richmond VA in 1997 may be interested to learn about the improvements at the Gaines' Mill and Malvern Hill battlefields. The trail at Gaines' Mill which leads around to the Union left has been extended now to the area where Brigadier General Cadmus Wilcox's Alabama brigade assaulted the Federal defenses. An attractive stone marker commemorating Wilcox and his troops has recently been erected. At Malvern Hill, a loop trail has been blazed which encircles the battlefield. Additional guide markers have been placed at various points along the trail. Of particular interest is the marker in front of the ruins of The Parsonage indicating the area where Wilmington native, Colonel Gaston Meares of the 3rd North Carolina, was killed by Union artillery fire.

As you know, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table breaks for the summer. During that time, the Steering Committee will be working to put together a program schedule of Civil War topics and speakers for the 2000-2001 year which begins in September. We look forward to seeing each of you then!

A PARTING SHOT

(Willie Morris, one of the preeminent Southern writers of our generation, grew up in Yazoo City, Mississippi, a small town about which he has written with warm affection. Though Morris, who lived in New York City for some years while he edited Harper's Magazine, often commented on the faults and foibles of Southern culture, there was never any doubt that he was always drawn towards his native region. The following excerpt, describing his visit to Gettysburg to deliver the commencement speech at Gettysburg College, is taken from his New York Days, Little, Brown and Company, 1993)

...I stayed with a college family who every year planted a large vegetable garden in the back of their house, where they frequently dug up minie balls and shell fragments; recently they had found a rusty old belt-buckle with "CSA" on it. The chairman of the history department took me on an afternoon's tour of the battlefield, my first visit to that most American of terrains. Late that night, against the park regulations, I drove my car over there and got out. I had the place all to myself. It was springtime and the grass was heavy with dew. The fireflies were out, and rabbits and squirrels bounced haphazardly among the monuments and artillery pieces. In a spooky half-moon I wandered around Little Round Top, Big Round Top, Devil's Den, and the Wheatfield, then paused at the crest of Cemetery Ridge and gazed across at the rounded green valley where the Charge had been, and its dreadful harvest of death. A handful of Mississippi boys in the first wave had made it into these final embattlements, but they had not lasted too long, and I remembered the lingering fealties and funny contradictions of one's boyhood, and history arrested and suspended for me in that one hushed moment before that majestic and dismembering assault. The quiet earth before me left me breathless with lonely sorrow and understanding. I thought of the nation now in that year of 1968, the terrible brevity of its attention spans, and what this heuristic ground must have meant to it, or not meant to it at all.

Suddenly, from around a bend, came a car, its blue lights flashing. It came to a halt. A park policeman got out. He examined me from a distance with a flashlight.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded. It's midnight." Did he think I might be the last surviving Mississippian, still tarrying here on Cemetery Ridge after all the years?

"I don't know why I'm here, officer. It was compulsive.

"I'm supposed to take you in, you know."

"Well, I'm giving the commencement speech at the college tomorrow. Can you let me off on good behavior?"

"Okay, okay," he said brusquely, yet not without a trace of amusement. "But try not to come in again after dark, will you?" I was about to get in my car when he addressed me again, "It happens all the time," he said. "And it's always Southerners. Why always you Southerners?"

"But I'm an American now, officer," I replied. "I promise I am," and after a whimsical and rather tender silence we both laughed.

BRITISH INTERVENTION IN THE CIVIL WAR

April 13 Meeting

St. John's Episcopal Church

Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

We are indeed fortunate to welcome as our April program speaker a scholar who is traveling all the way from Canada to be our guest! Francis M. Carroll, Professor of History at St. John's College, University of Manitoba, will give a presentation on British Intervention in the Civil War.

Dr. Carroll and John Krohn, a member of the CFCWRT, have remained close friends since their childhood days in Minnesota. Dr. Carroll and his wife are visiting with John and Dorene Krohn.

Francis Carroll was educated at Carleton College (B.A.), University of Minnesota (M.A.), and Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland (Ph.D.). His long and eminent teaching career began in the United States and then culminated in a nearly thirty year tenure at the University of Manitoba from which he recently retired. He continues to hold the position of Senior Scholar at the University. He has authored nearly forty books, essays, and scholarly articles as well as numerous reviews of historical publications. Dr. Carroll's primary field of expertise is Irish-American diplomacy. John adds that, "as the commanding officer of a small sailboat on a northern Minnesota lake, Dr. Carroll has had a lifelong interest in naval history." He has researched and published on the legal claims arising from the activities of the famous raider, CSS Alabama.

We look forward to meeting Dr. Carroll and enjoying his presentation on a fresh and fascinating subject! Come early, bring a friend or two, and join other members for refreshments at 7:00 pm.

BATTLE REPORT

Beverly Tetterton's presentation at our March meeting on tracing Civil War ancestors was a comprehensive look at methods and resources of historical research and was illustrated memorably with an account of Beverly's own examination of the life of Colonel John Hedrick, a Wilmington native and CSA artillery officer who served in the Cape Fear District during the war. Beverly began with Hedrick's inscribed sword, which is in the Cape Fear Museum's collection, and then began the fascinating process of uncovering enough information about the colonel to create an interesting memoir.

Raffle prize winners were: Polly Rust (Friendly Fire in the Civil War donated by Palmer and Mary Royal), Richard Triebe (Gettysburg: Culp's Hill and Cemetery Hill donated by Mrs. Ted Lynch in memory of her husband), Palmer Royal (Harper's Pictorial History of the Civil War donated by Mrs. Ted Lynch in memory of her husband), Jim McCallum (Civil War Times magazines donated by Mrs. Ted Lynch in memory of her husband), and Polly Rust (Flags of the Confederacy donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop). Thanks to everyone who participated in the raffle which brought in $98.00

A hearty welcome was extended to David Heard who attended the meeting and joined the Round Table!

NOTES ON THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES CAVALRY

Cavalry was of little value during the Colonial wars with the French and Indians due to the denseness of the wooded areas and lack of roads in America. During the early portion of the Revolutionary War, the Americans were completely ignorant of the value of mounted troops. Only after several defeats in New York did Congress, in 1777, authorize the formation of four regiments of dragoons which were modeled on the European pattern. These regiments were each composed of six troops with a total authorized strength of 279 men and officers. They were armed with heavy sabers and flintlock pistols carried in saddle holsters. In 1780, after the British proved the value of cavalry in South Carolina, small mounted units sprang up spontaneously. These mounted bands of rarely over a hundred white and/or black men, owning their own horses and rifles, would approach the enemy, dismount, and leave their horses in a secure place with a few comrades. They would attack and, whether victorious or defeated, would hurry back to their horses and quickly ride away. After the surrender of Cornwallis in 1781, the American cavalry faded away to near non-existence until 1832 when the "Mounted Rangers" were reinstituted to fight the Indians and Mexicans. The Mounted Rangers were composed of six companies (the term "troop" was dropped and not revived until after the Civil War) with a total strength of 685 men.

The next year, 1833, Congress increased this mounted body to a regiment and called it the 1st Dragoons. Henry Dodge of Michigan was the colonel, Stephen W. Kearny of New Jersey was the lieutenant colonel (he was the uncle of Major General Philip Kearny who was killed in 1862 at the Battle of Chantilly), and Richard B. Mason of Virginia was the major. Nathan Boone, a son of Daniel Boone, was a captain commanding one of the companies. Among the lieutenants of this regiment were Jefferson Davis (afterwards President of the Confederacy) and Philip St. George Cooke of Virginia (later a major general in the Union Army during the Civil War, considered the "grand old man of the cavalry," and was the father-in-law of J.E.B. Stuart). During the early 1840's, the 1st Dragoons was the only mounted unit in the U.S. Army. It had an authorized strength of 750 men, all well-mounted in companies of matched horses (white, sorrels, grays, blacks, bays, and creams) superbly equipped, and armed with a breech-loading, smoothbore carbine of .69 caliber (the first percussion arm in the service) especially made for this regiment by Simon North of Millerstown, Connecticut.

In 1836, another mounted regiment, the 2nd Dragoons, were authorized by Congress primarily to fight the Seminole Indians in Florida. Due to the terrain, they fought as infantry until they were remounted in 1844 and moved to the Western Territories. Congress authorized the formation of the Mounted Rifles in 1846 for the purpose of guarding the Oregon Trail, but this mission was waived with the advent of the war with Mexico. The Mounted Riflemen, having refilled their ranks depleted by the Mexican War, rode westward in 1849 to establish a chain of posts along the Oregon Trail under the command of Lieutenant Colonel William Wing Loring (a future Confederate general who was born in Wilmington NC in 1818).

Congress, in March 1855, authorized two new mounted regiments, but to confuse things even more they were named the 1st and 2nd Cavalry Regiments. Now is perhaps a good time to contrast the three different mounted units. Dragoons were basically mounted infantry. They carried a shoulder weapon known as a musketoon (a shortened musket) in their early days and later carried carbines. Their horses were used primarily to move rapidly from one place to another and not for fighting. Most, if not all, of the fighting was done dismounted. The major difference between the Dragoons and the Mounted Riflemen was armament. The Mounted Riflemen carried long-barreled muskets or rifles. The Cavalry (sometimes called Light Cavalry) served an entirely different purpose. It was primarily intended to scout and screen an army's advance and to do its fighting mounted with sabers and pistols.

Jefferson Davis was the Secretary of War under President Franklin Pierce at the time these cavalry units were organized and was afterwards accused (probably falsely) by his enemies of packing these new regiments with his favorite officers who later went with the Confederacy. The first colonel of the 1st Cavalry was Edwin Vose Sumner of Boston and the two majors were John Sedgwick of Connecticut and William H. Emory of Virginia (who had written a report of General Philip Kearny's march to the Pacific and later acted as "astronomer" in running the boundary line with Mexico after the peace in 1848 and again in 1853 for the Gadsden Purchase). George B. McClellan of Pennsylvania, later commander of the Army of the Potomac, was a captain. All of these officers remained loyal to the Union. However, the lieutenant colonel was Joseph E. Johnston, and J.E.B. Stuart was a captain; both of these Virginians rose to high rank in the Confederate army.

With the 2nd Cavalry, which was called "Jeff Davis' Own," it was a more one-sided story. The colonel was Albert Sidney Johnston of Kentucky, the lieutenant colonel was Robert E. Lee of Virginia, Earl Van Dorn of Mississippi was brevet major, Edmund Kirby Smith of Florida was a captain, Theodore O'Hara of Kentucky (wrote the poem "The Bivouac of the Dead," and later served on A.S. Johnston's staff) was a lieutenant, as were Charles E. Travis of Texas (son of William B. Travis, the hero of the Alamo), John B. Hood of Kentucky, and Fitzhugh Lee of Virginia (a nephew of Robert E. Lee). All of these officers except Travis won fame in Confederate service.

After the fall of Fort Sumter in 1861, President Lincoln issued a call for volunteers and ordered an increase in the regular army to include another mounted regiment, the 3rd Cavalry. David Hunter (he presided over the court-martial of Fitz John Porter and the Lincoln conspirators - by design to secure guilty verdicts - and ordered the burning of V.M.I.) was appointed colonel and William H. Emory (of border surveying fame) the lieutenant colonel.

On August 3, 1861, Congress passed a bill organizing all the mounted troops - dragoons, mounted riflemen, and cavalry - into one branch, all to be called cavalry and to be numbered by seniority:

Original Name	Date of Origin	New Name
1st Dragoons	1832	1st Cavalry
2nd Dragoons	1836	2nd Cavalry
Mounted Riflemen	1846	3rd Cavalry
1st Cavalry	1855	4th Cavalry
2nd Cavalry	1855	5th Cavalry
3rd Cavalry	1861	6th Cavalry

The Cavalry yellow was designated as the color of the new corps, and the facings of the other uniforms - orange for the dragoons and green for the riflemen - were ordered to be changed accordingly. These six regular cavalry regiments were soon swamped by a deluge of volunteer mounted regiments which brought the strength of the Union cavalry to about 80,000 men by the end of the war.

During the Civil War, the regular mounted troops served with distinction. The 1st, 2nd, 5th and 6th Cavalry regiments were brigaded together as the Reserve Brigade, First Division of the Cavalry Corps in the Army of the Potomac, serving under Wesley Merritt, John Buford, and Alfred Pleasonton. The 6th Cavalry was decimated on July 3, 1863 during an engagement with W.E. "Grumble" Jones' Brigade at Fairfield (Millerstown), Pennsylvania. The 3rd Cavalry Regiment was assigned to General John A. Logan's XV Corps headquarters, Army of the Tennessee. Also serving in the Western Theater, the 4th Cavalry served in the First Brigade, Second Division, Army of the Cumberland.

Following the War Between the States, the mounted regiments fought with honor and with pride in all the wars, hostilities, insurrections and (in the case of Pancho Villa) invasion. General "Black Jack" Pershing was the last to lead a large body of mounted troops into a military engagement. Though the last "horse cavalry" unit was not disbanded until 1942, the horse soldiers were through. No troop horses were taken to France; some of the cavalry rode patrol in the Philippines during the war; some were dismounted and used in France for military police and similar duties. No horses went to the Second World War either, though the troopers drilled on horseback daily until they went overseas, and saber charges were practiced.

The screening and intelligence functions of the horse soldiers had been taken over by aviation; the ride to the battle to fight dismounted was done in a truck, tank, half-track, glider or helicopter. The Cavalry name is still carried on! In World War II, light armored or tank outfits had the old horse designations; in the Vietnam struggle the 1st Cavalry was airborne infantry.

What happened to one of those very early mounted regiments, Wilmington's own William Wing

Loring's first command? The Mounted Riflemen originated in 1846 became the 3rd Cavalry in 1861. Among its Civil War duties, the regiment served in Tennessee, Mississippi and Alabama. During the Spanish American War, the Third led the attack up San Juan Hill, and it went to Europe during World War I. As machines replaced the horse, the regiment became the Third Armored cavalry. Following in Loring's footsteps, George S. Patton served as colonel of the Regiment during the 1930's (in 1862, Patton's grandfather, George, briefly served under Loring in West Virginia). During World War II, the Third Armored Cavalry became the first element of Patton's Third Army to cross into Germany. More recently, this regiment played a major role in Desert Storm.

Though the years and the battles change, the courage, duty and honor of the "old horse regiments" live on unblemished. Viva les chevaux!

ROUND TABLE ELECTION AT MAY MEETING President and Vice President

After six years of service as president and newsletter editor, I will be stepping down from the role of president as the current RT year ends next month. At the May 11 meeting, the membership will hold an election for a new president and a new vice president.

If you would like to submit your name or the name of a fellow RT member (all members are eligible) for either office, please contact the Nominations Committee composed of Tommy King (O. 763-7318) Chairman, and Jim McCallum (H. 686-1597).

The Steering Committee has nine seats, seven of which are occupied. The two new officers will join the Steering Committee. If a current Steering Committee member is elected, then an additional person will be elected to fill the ninth seat.

We hope that you will give careful thought to any nomination you make. Both president and vice president will have considerable responsibility. Presiding at meetings, leading and moderating the Steering Committee, co-ordinating RT events, public relations, and being available to answer questions and provide information to members and visitors - these are some of the responsibilities involved. Of course, the hard-working members of the Steering Committee also share much of the work of the officers, so neither position is a lonely one! I will be happy to provide as much guidance and orientation as new officers desire.

The Steering Committee welcomes your nominations. Please submit names before the end of April. We want our membership to continue to grow and we want more and more of you to participate in carrying forward the tradition of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table.

TRACING YOUR CIVIL WAR ANCESTOR

March 9 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

Beverly Tetterton has served as librarian in the North Carolina Room at the New Hanover County Public Library for twenty years and, in this capacity, she has provided help to thousands of researchers seeking information about local and family history. Beverly's comprehensive knowledge of research methods and resources enable her to guide people in their quest to know more about their ancestors who served in the American Civil War.

Beverly is a graduate of the College of William and Mary with a B.A. in History. She received her Masters in Library Science from NC Central University. Beverly has been a mainstay in Wilmington's historic preservation efforts. She has been the longtime Chair of the Wilmington Historical District Commission and she serves as Chair of the Historic Wilmington Foundation's committee to place plaques on historic structures. Beverly is currently President of the North Carolina Genealogical Society and she has served on its board for many years.

This program will provide an opportunity for our members to learn how to begin or deepen the search to identify and find information about Civil War ancestors. Knowing more about a soldier ancestor who served the Union or the Confederacy heightens one's interest in both the study of the war and visits to the battlefields. Don't miss this chance to learn how to trace your own Civil War ancestor!

SPRING BATTLEFIELD TOUR The Bermuda Hundred Campaign Registration Deadline March 10

It's time to register for our annual spring tour to be held March 24-26! That Friday, RT members and their guests will be arranging transportation on their own to the Howard Johnson Hotel at I-95 and Hwy 10 in Chester VA (about 15 miles south of Richmond). At 7:00 pm, we'll have dinner with Jerry Netherland and Mark Jacobson who will orient us to the Saturday field trip. Our group will spend all day Saturday touring sites of the Bermuda Hundred Campaign. That evening, again at 7:00 pm, we'll host one of the historians from Petersburg's Pamplin Park who will speak to us about the Union breakthrough at Petersburg. Then, Sunday morning, we'll head to Pamplin Park for a tour of the new museum and the well-preserved Confederate entrenchments and a walking tour of the field of combat.

The cost is $150 for double occupancy and $210 for single occupancy. You may forward your payment to Treasurer Dan Geddie, CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404 or bring to the March meeting. We hope that many of our members will plan to attend. The RT spring tours are always a lot of fun!

Remember, the absolute deadline for registration is Friday, March 10, the day after our monthly meeting. Call Dan Geddie (H. 799-5338) for a trip itinerary.

CENTRAL VIRGINIA BATTLEFIELDS TRUST

Recent Battlefield Land Acquisitions

Two years ago, members of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table responded to a $250.00 challenge gift from another one of our preservation-minded members and sent a total of $1000.00 to the Central Virginia Battlefields Trust (CVBT), assisting in their effort to purchase 100 acres in the heart of the Chancellorsville battlefield. The effort was successful, and this hallowed ground is now preserved as a part of the national battlefield park.

Last fall, CVBT purchased a 25 acre portion of the Talley Farm at Chancellorsville over which the Confederate brigades of Ramseur, Colquitt, and Doles advanced as a part of Stonewall Jackson's victorious flank attack against the Union Eleventh Corps. The newly acquired property connects with National Park Service property across the Orange Plank Road and an earlier 5 acre tract already secured by CVBT. These purchases are timely because most of the area of Jackson's flank attack remains in private hands and is increasingly subject to development. The Talley Farm property includes the only surviving earthworks of the Union Eleventh Corps' first line. The acreage joins the National Park Service's property at the site where General Jackson surveyed the route of his attack. Interestingly, the Talley Farm site, which lies south of the Orange Plank Road, retains difficult terrain features which figured in a rather faltered Confederate attack as contrasted to the more successful attack by Jackson's brigades just north of the road.

More recently, CVBT purchased a sliver of land where an energetic young Confederate artillery officer gained the sobriquet, "the gallant Pelham." In the early morning of December 13, 1862, USA Major General Ambrose Burnside directed an assault on Lee's defensive line at Fredericksburg which resulted in a climatic battle. USA Major General George G. Meade's Division of Pennsylvania Reserves constituted the Federal army's left, or southern flank. Major John Pelham hurried one twelve-pounder Napoleon about a mile forward of the Confederate line with the object of enfilading the attacking Pennsylvanians. At great personal risk to himself and his twenty gunners, Pelham frustrated the Union assault for nearly an hour before his ammunition was depleted. During the engagement, when Union artillery return fire disabled some of his gunners, Pelham sighted the single gun himself. Little wonder that Robert E. Lee, observing the action from Prospect Hill, turned to Generals Stonewall Jackson and A.P. Hill and remarked, "It is glorious to see such courage in one so young." The area where this gallant action took place is seriously threatened with development.

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust is a non-profit 501(c)(3) organization which is justly proud that its entire staff is composed of unpaid volunteers. Located in Fredericksburg, Virginia, it's uniquely positioned to monitor the availability of battlefield property and act quickly to make purchases. You can join CVBT and make a contribution by contacting its office at Suite 1, 604-A William Street, Fredericksburg VA 22401. Phone: (540) 374-0900. Website: www.cvbt.org.

BATTLE REPORT

February 10 Meeting

One of our largest crowds in recent memory was present for Dr. Tracy Power's riveting slide presentation and talk about the men in the ranks of the Army of Northern Virginia. Tracy focused on the relationship between the enlisted men and their commanding general, Robert E. Lee, recounting the episodes at the Wilderness and Spotsylvania when Lee, exposed to enemy fire, took the field and rallied his troops.

The raffle brought in an impressive $128.00! Winners were Linda Rand (Robert E. Lee print donated by Mike Budziszewski), Richard Bellows (Confederate Treasure in Danville donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Dan Geddie (Life of Johnny Reb and Billy Yank donated by John Krohn), Cliff Mabry (Reproduction CSA buckle donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), John Moore (North Carolina Proclamation donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Jim McCallum (Gold Dollar donated by Ed Russ), and Todd Brohaugh (Gold Dollar donated by Ed Russ). Congratulations to our seven winners and thanks to everyone who bought raffle tickets.

THE BATTLE OF SUNSHINE CHURCH Or: Iverson's Revenge

Well-known to many who follow Tarheel regiments through the course of the Civil War is the disaster that befell the 20th North Carolina on the first day at Gettysburg. That excellent and battle-tested regiment, serving in General Alfred Iverson's Brigade, Rodes' Division, was participating in the advance just northwest of the town of Gettysburg against the 2nd Division of the Union First Corps along the Mummasburg Road when a large body of blue infantry commanded by General Henry Baxter, concealed behind a stone wall, suddenly rose up and delivered a punishing volley from fifty yards which decimated their ranks and set the stage for the capture of many more when Baxter's troops swarmed out and captured large numbers from the 5th, 12th, 20th, and 23rd NC regiments. One postwar account describes the sight of seventy-nine dead North Carolina soldiers lying in a perfectly straight line across the field.

This humiliation was not reflective of Iverson's record. The prewar veteran of Western Campaigns against the Comanches and Kiowas was elected Colonel of the 20th NC in June, 1861 at Smithville (Southport) NC. Iverson's troops, garrisoned at Forts Johnston and Caswell, spent their first year of service guarding the Cape Fear River. The regiment's quiet coastal duty ended when it was ordered to Richmond and assigned to General Samuel Garland's Brigade, D. H. Hill's Division.

In 1997, members of our Round Table, on its spring tour of the Seven Days Campaign, hiked to the little-visited site on private property at Gaines Mill where the 20th NC experienced its initial combat engagement. These NC troops made a valiant and costly attack against the Union right flank, capturing a battery and achieving one of the first penetrations of the enemy's formidable defenses. In fact, the 20th NC was the only Confederate regiment to achieve a breakthrough on this portion of the Union line; it occurred about the same time as General John Bell Hood's better known and more celebrated breakthrough with his Texans on the Union left flank. The 20th NC's 272 casualties were the second highest of any Confederate regiments engaged at Gaines Mill.

Our Round Table tour of the Antietam Campaign last year took us to Fox's Gap where we walked along the stone wall behind which the 20th NC put up a stiff defense against USA General Jacob Cox's Kanawha Division before it was finally overwhelmed and routed. And we walked through the Cornfield area at Antietam where Iverson's troops were once again engaged. General Alfred Iverson, within six weeks, his reputation as a combat officer assured, was promoted to Brigadier General and given command of his brigade.

Yet, Iverson's poor performance at Gettysburg cost him General Robert E. Lee's confidence, and Iverson was transferred out of the Army of Northern Virginia. Though Iverson's prospects looked dim, it was fortuitous that Iverson was ordered to Georgia, his native state. For it was there, in fact, very near his birthplace in Clinton, Georgia, that Iverson was to reap a victory which would restore his reputation.

In July, 1864, USA General William T. Sherman, frustrated in his attempts to capture Atlanta, directed units of his cavalry to drive south of the embattled city in an effort to destroy the railroad lines toward Macon. USA General George H. Stoneman commanded one wing of this cavalry movement. He vowed to proceed deep into southern Georgia to Andersonville where he planned to free Union prisoners and somehow bring them to safety. Stoneman's progress was halted on the outskirts of Macon by CSA General Howell Cobb's hastily assembled militia and homeguard units. Stoneman quickly abandoned his Andersonville objective and turned back north toward his home base. Little did he know that Alfred Iverson was waiting for him.

About twenty miles northwest of Macon, in the rolling hills of the Georgia Piedmont, there is a small hamlet called Round Oak. Just south, along present-day Hwy 11, Iverson arrayed his outnumbered force of 1300 men in a V formation, the open end yawning toward Stoneman's approach. Iverson wisely placed his artillery in the center and on the flanks of his defense line.

General Stoneman, leading 2100 troopers, stormed into the V, attempting to drive through Iverson's ranks and continue his northward journey. Yet, the Yankee cavalymen found themselves funneled into the Confederate trap, increasingly damaged by enfilading fire. For several hours, both sides parried, until Iverson sent the 1st and 3rd Georgia Cavalry in an encircling movement. Stoneman's men, pressed in their rear by the gray troopers, and believing they were under attack by Rebel reinforcements from Macon, panicked, large numbers of them fleeing the battlefield. Stoneman considered his force hopelessly outnumbered and surrendered his entire immediate command of 600 troops. It is said that General Stoneman sat down on a log and wept in despair when he learned that his campaign had been thwarted by a force much smaller than his own.

I visited the battlefield at Sunshine Church a few months ago. Sadly, the ground is marked by only a couple of Georgia Historical Commission markers, but it's not very difficult to pick out the ridge where Iverson's cavalymen waited for Stoneman. As you follow the highway south about one mile, you will note Stoneman Hill on your left where the Union general surrendered. (For a more complete description of the present-day field, see The Campaign for Atlanta, William R. Scaife, 1993).

Alfred Iverson, having suffered a severe reversal during the climactic Battle of Gettysburg, won a stunning victory on his own ground in middle Georgia. It's unfortunate that his achievement there has received such little attention, for it has rightly been called one of the greatest cavalry successes of the entire war. Iverson, who became an orange grower in Florida in later years, perhaps found some comfort in knowing that his last major engagement was conceived and executed in a fashion reminiscent of the finest in Confederate tactics during the American Civil War.

A PARTING SHOT

The battle (Perryville KY) began at break of day by an artillery duel, the Federal battery being commanded by Colonel Charles Carroll Parsons and the Confederates by Captain William W. Carnes. Colonel Parsons was a graduate of West Point and Captain Carnes was a graduate of the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I took position upon an eminence at no great distance, commanding a fine view of the engagement, and there I watched... Captain Carnes managed his battery with the greatest skill, killing and wounding nearly all the officers, men and horses connected with Parsons' battery. Parsons fought with great bravery and coolness and continued fighting a single gun until the Confederate infantry advanced. The officer in command ordered Colonel Parsons to be shot down. As the muskets were leveled at him, he drew his sword and stood at "parade rest," ready to receive the fire. The Confederate Colonel was so impressed with this display of calm courage that he ordered the guns lowered, saying, "No! you shall not shoot down such a brave man!" And Colonel Parsons was allowed to walk off the field.

LEE'S MISERABLES

Life in the Army of Northern Virginia From the Wilderness to Appomattox

An Evening With J. Tracy Power

February 10 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

"This is one of the dozen best books ever written about Lee's fabled army." With these remarkable words, Robert K. Krick describes Dr. J. Tracy Power's peerless contribution to the literature on the Army of Northern Virginia. Lee's Miserables: Life in the Army of Northern Virginia From the Wilderness to Appomattox was published in 1998 by the University of North Carolina Press and is now in its second printing.

Tracy Power is a historian with the State Historic Preservation Office at South Carolina Department of Archives and History where he works with the National Register of Historic Places and directs the SC historic marker program. A native Georgian who has lived in SC since 1981, Dr. Power was educated at Emory University (B.A. 1980) where he was a student of the legendary Bell I. Wiley and the University of South Carolina (M.A. 1984, (Ph.D. 1995). He has also taught American history at USC and at Midlands Technical College in Columbia. He serves as a consultant to the Time-Life Series Voices of the Civil War. Dr. Power has just begun work on a biography of Robert E. Lee's eldest son, George Washington Custis Lee.

Lee's Miserables was the second-place prize winner of the 1999 Lincoln Prize from the Lincoln and Soldiers Institute, Gettysburg College; it also received the 1998 Jefferson Davis Award from the Museum of the Confederacy, the 1998 Richard Barksdale Harwell Award from the Atlanta Civil War Round Table, and the Jerry Coffey Memorial Book Award from the Grady McWhiney Research Foundation.

Robert Krick's review continues: "It displays on every page the salutary results of exhaustive research, judicious analysis, and adroit prose. Lee's Miserables is certain to be an instant classic." And Gordon Rhea writes: "Power has put his finger on the pulse of the Army of Northern Virginia and captured the spirit of Lee's army during its final year."

You're encouraged, as always, to bring your friends to what will be a superb program!

R.E. LEE: THE EXHIBITION is a major presentation on the life of General Robert E. Lee which opened on January 16 at the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond VA. It's the centerpiece of the Museum's year-long focus on Lee.

The Museum has the world's largest collection of Lee's wartime possessions. Lee's camp chest and equipment, hat, boots, and saddle, Colt's revolver and holster, his Appomattox sword and coat and the pen with which he signed the surrender documents are among the items long displayed in the Museum's permanent exhibit, "The Confederate Years." In addition to these, the exhibiton will feature original photographs (most notably, the few so-called 'source images' of Lee), paintings and prints which trace Lee's changing physical appearance. Newspapers, magazines, postcards, sheet music covers, and other popular media document the use of Lee's image during his own life and in the 130 years since his death.

The Museum library's collection is a particularly rich source of featured items. Manuscripts from the library include signed copies of Lee's General Orders No. 9, the original page of the Appomattox parole list signed by Lee and his staff officers, a pre-war calling card of Colonel R.E. Lee, USA, a map that Lee drew during his service in the Mexican War, Lee's commission as a full general, and the December 1862 document by which Lee emancipated the 63 slaves of his late father-in-law, George Washington Parke Custis. Also featured in the exhibit is Lee's April 20, 1861 draft letter of resignation from the US Army to his commanding officer, General Winfield Scott.

Reflecting the Museum's origins during the postwar "Confederate Memorial Period," the collections are also rich in Lee souvenirs. Some of these are literally souvenirs of Lee himself (locks of hair and autographs) or his beloved horse, "Traveler" (locks from his mane and tail). Most are souvenirs of the several Lee monuments erected throughout the South and of the organizations, especially Richmond's R.E. Lee Camp No. 1, Confederate Veterans, that borrowed Lee's name and image.

Finally, the exhibit will not only present the life of Robert E. Lee himself, but will introduce the people who were close to Lee: his family, his military staff, and some of his closest or most colorful lieutenants. Showcased among the latter are effects of Stonewall Jackson, Jeb Stuart, AP Hill and Richard S. Ewell.

For more information, call (804) 649-1861 or visit the museum on the web at www.moc.org.

Selected engagements of the decisive battle will be fought again by costumed reenactors on portions of the original battlefield. "Morgan's Stand" will be held on Saturday afternoon and "The Fight at Morris Farm" on Sunday afternoon.

Staged only once every five years, this reenactment is sponsored by the State Historic Site and the Bentonville Battleground Historical Association, a preservation group. Tickets are available through Ticketmaster at $10 per person per day or $20 for the weekend. Children under 10 admitted free. Call (910) 594-0789 or see the website: www.ah.dcr.state.nc.us/sections/hs/bentonvi/bentonvi.htm.

THE NORTH CAROLINA CIVIL WAR TOURISM COUNCIL holds its sixth and largest annual conference in Raleigh NC on April 14-15. Over thirteen different topics will be featured, ranging from CW medicine to the role of railroads to an indictment and defense of Braxton Bragg. Speakers include Joseph Glathaar, Mark Grimsley, Robin Reed and others. Richard McMurry will present the keynote address. The program will also include first person interpretations at the State Capitol, a pre-session on genealogy, and tour options for Sunday.

COLONEL JOHN SINGLETON MOSBY, CSA A Fresh Appraisal

I just finished reading a brand new book on John S. Mosby, the legendary Confederate partisan raider. James A. Ramage, whose fine account of the wartime exploits of John Hunt Morgan appeared a few years ago, has just published this biography of Mosby which, in the words of Lee and Stuart biographer, Emory Thomas, "represents the very best on Mosby that can be done." Thomas does not exaggerate. Ramage's work goes far beyond a mere recounting of Mosby's wartime activities, many of which have been described exhaustively in previous accounts, and gives us a good interpretive biography tracing Mosby's development, not only as an interesting personality, but as a tactician and fighter.

Ramage demonstrates how Mosby, a frail and delicate boy, learned how to aggressively defend himself from the taunts of his peers. The inclination to counterattack, combined with a lifelong dislike of any sign of bullying or injustice, led to the well-known incident in which Mosby, while at the University of Virginia, shot a fellow student who threatened to thrash him. This same pattern was later reflected in Colonel Mosby's wartime successes, creating fear in his Union opponents who never knew when he and his command would appear as if from nowhere, sweeping down on their camp or formation and scattering, killing or capturing them.

Mosby seemed to possess an innate sense of how to wage guerrilla warfare. Though he deeply admired his mentor, the flamboyant Jeb Stuart, he was himself a very careful, secretive and no-nonsense commander. He developed a number of rules for combat which he followed and from which he never strayed. Early on, Mosby recognized, for instance, that the saber was obsolete for his tactical purposes and, from then on, he scorned the cavalry saber charge. His innovation was to arm each of his men with two Colt revolvers, thereby increasing the firepower of a small group of men on fresh horses who stormed through the enemy and won victory after victory.

In October, Jim McCallum and I attended a Conference on the Art of Cavalry Command in Middleburg VA where Dennis Frye, a leading Mosby authority, gave a presentation on the partisan commander. Though Dennis argued convincingly that Colonel Mosby's postwar claim to have tied down half of USA General Philip Sheridan's 40,000 troops in 1864 and preserved Richmond from capture by six months was an exaggeration, it can be said that, given his more limited actual wartime objectives, Mosby enjoyed incredible success as an effective raider.

Frye credited Mosby with a number of useful tactics. Mosby had one rule "from which I never departed," and that was to always charge the enemy, even when vastly outnumbered or in a tight spot. Further, the Confederate commander practiced thorough scouting before he planned a raid, sometimes riding fifty miles a day to identify his targets and analyze routes of attack and exit. Mosby confided his plans to no one; his men only learned their destination when they neared their objective, sometimes after many hours in the saddle. Mosby's larger goals, said Frye, were to destroy supply trains, sever communications, and isolate the Union army from its base.

I found James Ramage's Mosby biography particularly fascinating because he writes at length about the veteran's postwar career. As is well-known to many students of the war, Mosby joined the Republican party in the early 1870's and became friends with his old enemy, President Ulysses Grant, outraging many former admirers throughout the South. Drawing on his career as an attorney, he served as consul in Hong Kong, worked for the Southern Pacific Railroad, directed the Land Office in Akron, Colorado, and worked at the Justice Department in Washington DC. Interestingly, Mosby's inclination to right injustices and prosecute corruptive abuses whenever he encountered them led to more than one dismissal. In his later years, fortunately, Mosby enjoyed a resurgence of appreciation by Southerners and Northerners alike. Living until 1916, he was a familiar and well-loved figure on the streets of the nation's capitol.

This Confederate partisan chieftain remains one of the best known and admired figures of the War Between the States. Gray Ghost: The Life of Colonel John Singleton Mosby (James A. Ramage, University of Kentucky Press, 1999) deserves a place on your bookshelf.

BATTLE REPORT January 13 Meeting

RT members enjoyed a fascinating overview of the Bermuda Hundred Campaign, the 1864 clash between PGT Beauregard's Southern troops and Ben Butler's Army of the James. A slide presentation enhanced the program led by Mark Jacobson and Jerry Netherland. Mark and Jerry will be our tour guides when we journey to Chester VA in March for the spring tour.

Wayne and Bernice Carver have done a great job this year of coordinating refreshments for our meetings. Sally Mack and Mary Royal served up a feast of delicious homemade goodies at our January meeting, and we thank them both for their efforts! Mike and Karen Budziszewski continue to make superb selections for our monthly raffle, and Mike has donated many of the raffle items himself. In January, Palmer Royal and Wilbur Jones contributed raffle items, and Jean Lynch gave two books from her late husband, Ted's, library. We apologize for not having the names of our raffle winners, but the raffle receipts totalled $104.00. Thanks to all of you who buy raffle tickets to benefit the RT.

We are very pleased to welcome new member, Drew Pierson, into the ranks of the CFCWRT!

SPRING BATTLEFIELD TOUR The Bermuda Hundred Campaign

It's time to sign up for our annual spring tour to be held March 24-26! That Friday, RT members and their guests will be arranging transportation on their own to the Howard Johnson Hotel at I-95 and Hwy 10 in Chester VA (about 15 miles south of Richmond). At 7:00 pm, we'll have dinner with Jerry Netherland and Mark Jacobson who will orient us to the Saturday field trip. Our group will spend all day Saturday touring sites of the Bermuda Hundred Campaign. That evening, again at 7:00 pm, we'll host one of the historians from Petersburg's Pamplin Park who will speak to us about the Union breakthrough at Petersburg. Then, Sunday morning, we'll head to Pamplin Park for a tour of the new museum and the well-preserved Confederate entrenchments and a walking tour of the field of combat.

The cost is $150 for double occupancy and $210 for single occupancy. You may forward your payment to Treasurer Dan Geddie, CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404 or bring to the next RT meeting. We hope that many of our members will plan to attend. These events are wonderful firsthand learning experiences, and members always enjoy getting to know each other better during the weekend.

A PARTING SHOT

En route to Gettysburg, (CSA Brigadier General Cadmus Marcellus) Wilcox directed that none of his men leave camp to forage for fruit or even for a pair of chickens that patriotically wished to give themselves to the Confederate cause. In plain violation of all warnings and orders, Wilcox caught Private Pat Martin near HQ with a handsome string of chickens. Pat was small and young and had been assigned to drive the HQ wagon because of his tender years and immaturity. If, now, Pat was old enough to go foraging, he was old enough to take his place in the line of battle. So reasoning, Wilcox reprimanded the boy and sent him back to his regiment. The next sight the General had of the forager was at the most furious stage of the battle of July 2. Wilcox was under heavy fire. One courier had been killed, another had a bloody wound. The General's bridle rein had been cut by a bullet; his horse was rearing. In this confusion, with shells bursting everywhere, Pat appeared with a file of men whom he promptly ordered into line to face Wilcox. Smartly, the boy saluted. "Here are your chickens, sir," he said. They were sixteen Federal prisoners he was conducting to the rear.

BERMUDA HUNDRED THE CAMPAIGN OF LOST OPPORTUNITIES

January 13 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

Guest program speakers, Jerry Netherland and Mark Jacobson of Chester, Virginia, will introduce us to the Bermuda Hundred Campaign, a subject they've been researching intensively for six years with the plan of eventually publishing a campaign study.

Jerry has a B.S. in Administration of Justice from Virginia Commonwealth University. He's a ten year veteran with the Chesterfield County Police Department. He's also a member and past President of the Richmond Civil War Round Table. Jerry currently lives between the defense lines on Bermuda Hundred, and it is this close proximity that has sparked his interest in the 1864-1865 campaign.

Mark, a graduate of the College of William and Mary with a degree in Business Administration, is an accounting supervisor with the Federal Bureau of Prisons. A native of Fayetteville NC, he's an active member of the Richmond Civil War Round Table. His interest in the Civil War stems from his descendance from three North Carolina veterans of the war.

This RT program year is unique in that we have planned a monthly program to introduce us to the campaign site we'll be visiting for our Spring Weekend Tour, March 24-26. The visit to the Bermuda Hundred area will be an initial one for many of our members.

In the spring of 1864, USA General Ulysses Grant planned to drive Lee's army south toward Richmond. The battles at the Wilderness and Spotsylvania were his initial thrusts. Grant proposed, as a second feature of his overall strategy to tighten his vise on Lee and the city of Richmond, to land the Army of the James, 39,000 strong, commanded by USA General Ben Butler on the peninsula between the James and Appomattox Rivers just fifteen miles south of Richmond. Butler was to proceed north and besiege or capture Richmond.

CSA General PGT Beauregard, in command at Petersburg, rushed forces under CSA General George Pickett to halt Butler's progress. Pickett handled his assignment well, and Butler decided to entrench. Soon Beauregard himself arrived at the Drewry's Bluff defensive line where he counterattacked, stopping Butler's forays. Beauregard effectively "bottled up" Butler and held the line against Union troops for the remainder of the war. Many men from the ranks of the Army of the James served in the Wilmington Campaign less than a year later.

To prepare for the program and the spring tour, you may wish to read Back Door to Richmond: The Bermuda Hundred Campaign April-June 1864, by William Glenn Robertson (LSU Press, 1987), an excellent history of the struggle south of Richmond between the armies of Beauregard and Butler.

NORTH CAROLINA AND THE CIVIL WAR

Museum of History Exhibit

On September 17, the North Carolina Museum of History in Raleigh opened an exhibit that tells the stories of North Carolinians who lived, served and sacrificed during the nation's bloodiest conflict. North Carolina and the Civil War brings these stories to life by showcasing personal belongings, photographs, military items and close-up accounts of Tar Heels who endured the conflict.

In addition to information about many North Carolinians, the exhibit follows the dramatic wartime experiences of fifteen selected individuals. Museum visitors will meet these North Carolinians in the exhibit's introductory section, examine their wartime ordeals within the exhibit and learn of their fate in the concluding area. These highlighted North Carolinians include Orderly Sergeant Alfred May, the son of a prosperous Pitt County landholder; Abraham H. Galloway, a slave from Brunswick County who escaped to Canada and returned to NC during the war; and Catherine Ann Devereux Edmondston, a staunch secessionist who lived on Looking Glass Plantation in Halifax County.

The 3500 square foot exhibit guides visitors from prewar North Carolina to the return of peace in 1865, highlighting the diverse roles North Carolinians played both in battle and on the home front. It also includes depictions of a soldier's life in camp and battle, wartime industries, struggles at home and the uncertainties of postwar life. North Carolina and the Civil War explores the experiences of some 15,000 white and black North Carolinians who served in Federal regiments as well.

"Most natives and newcomers will likely be surprised to discover that North Carolina furnished four white and four black Federal regiments during the war," says Tom Belton, curator of military history.

Three hundred and fifty-eight artifacts serve as vivid reminders of this pivotal period in our state's history. The items range from a split-oak cotton basket used by slaves in Rowan County to Confederate soldiers' weapons and a captured Union flag. Many of the exhibit's flags and uniforms have undergone extensive conservation, such as the 6th Regiment N.C. State Troops' flag made from a silk shawl and the bloodstained, war-torn vest of Major John Thomas Jones of the 26th Regiment N.C. State Troops.

The collection of photographs in the exhibit reveals the true picture of life throughout the war for many North Carolinians. Here, in black and white, the faces of young and old soldiers, freed slaves, and husbands and wives show determination, joy, fear, homesickness and grief.

Two computer stations in the exhibit gallery provide additional information about the war. Museum-goers can use the touch screens to discover more about the museum's extensive collection of Civil War flags, explore military information in further detail, or test their Civil War knowledge in a trivia quiz.

The NC Museum of History is located in downtown Raleigh at 5 East Edenton Street. Hours are Tuesday-Saturday 9 am til 5 pm and Sunday 12 noon til 5 pm. Phone is (919) 715-0200.

THE MANY INTERPRETATIONS OF THE CIVIL WAR

Cape Fear Museum Symposium

Saturday, January 22

The conflict that divided the United States between 1861 and 1865 goes by many names and has many interpretations. Differences about the war started before the war ended; what caused it, why battles were lost and won, and so on. Even today, people debate issues about the war, and no doubt, these discussions will continue well into the new century.

Who deserves a monument on today's hallowed battlefields? What role do women play in discussions about the war? How accurately does Hollywood portray the conflict? Where do African Americans fit into the four years of hostility and its aftermath? What does it all mean to the United States today?

On Saturday, January 22, from noon until 5:00 pm, speakers will examine many opinions about the Civil War at a symposium which brings together several schools of thought on the subject. Speakers include Dr. John Coski, Director of the Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond and moderator of the symposium; Dr. Robert Toplin, UNC-W History, on how the war is portrayed in media and film; Dr. John Haley, UNC-W History, on the African American experience; Ms. Brenda Kean, independent scholar, on women's role in the war; Mr. John Goode, site manager at Bentonville Battlefield, on challenges faced by historic sites when interpreting the war; Mr. Gregg Clemmer, Chief Historian of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, on all things Confederate.

The symposium concludes at the historic Bellamy mansion with a grand reception complete with Civil War reenactors and notable personalities from the "Late Unpleasantness." Fee for the entire day includes free admission and a tour of the Civil War galleries at Cape Fear Museum, free admission to the Bellamy Mansion, lectures and private reception. CFM Associates members and Friends of the Bellamy Mansion Museum $20 and non-members $25. Call the Cape Fear Museum to register. Space is limited. Phone 341-4350.

THE CIVIL WAR ON THE NORTH CAROLINA COAST

Crystal Coast Civil War Symposium

Saturday, January 29

This event is sponsored by the Carteret County Historical Society and Carteret Community College. Speakers are Dr. Chris Fonvielle, Dr. David Long, Mr. Paul Branch, and Mr. Kim Kimball. Location is Joslyn Hall, Carteret Community College, Morehead City NC. A lunch and reception/book signing are included in the registration fee of $30. Seating is limited. BATTLE REPORT

The antebellum Christmas Open House at the Bellamy Mansion, held Friday evening, December 10, was a splendid occasion, attended by approximately one hundred RT members and their guests! The 1860's period music presented by Southern Horizon carried us back to the Civil War years. One unexpected feature of the evening was the attendance of several reenactors. Randolph and Becky Sawyer of Wilmington reenacted a soldier in the 6th Wisconsin and a civilian, respectively. Perhaps the real hit of the evening was the serendipitous attendance of reenactors, Paul and Janine Stier. Paul and Janine first met at a reenactment some time ago. Paul, a reenactor with the 3rd US Regulars Infantry, wandered over one evening to the camp of Janine's 27th Virginia where she reenacted as a CSA civilian. It seems Paul found the Southern camp to be more lively than his own. A real life courtship ensued, and the couple came to Wilmington on their honeymoon. On Friday, just hours before the Open House, Janine and Paul were touring the Bellamy Mansion and learned about the festivities planned by our Round Table for that very evening. So they dressed in their finest period attire and joined us. Paul, as a 3rd US Regular, and Janine, as a belle of the 1860's, the North and South come together, danced almost the entire evening to the tunes of Southern Horizon!

Our special thanks to Tommy King for his efforts in planning the Open House! We're also grateful for the financial sponsorship of Tommy's company, Hanover Iron Works, which gave significant support for the event. And we express our appreciation as well to Tommy and Ann King, Wayne and Bernice Carver, Mike and Karen Budziszewski, and Joyce Binkley for generously preparing and serving all the delicious homemade refreshments! And a hearty welcome to new and first-time member, Don Hessenflow!

A PARTING SHOT

Soon the Yankee batteries ceased firing and we heard shouting behind us where our line lay across the road. I caught the words "look out, he's coming!" ...There was a straight stretch of road behind us, and there came in sight a magnificent bay horse running at top speed, with a Yankee officer lying down in the saddle with his head well down beside the horse's mane on the side toward Patterson. ... I shot after he had passed Patterson, waiting just enough to insure that Pat was not in range, and on the instant Pat shot.

On plunged the horse while the officer did not change his position. As they came more out into the open, there were several shots fired, but the horse kept on running, and the man kept in the saddle until they passed out of sight on the Yankee side of the creek. Had we all missed so large an object as a man and a horse, and at such such short range? ...I shot to kill as was my duty. Yet I hope in my heart that the man and the horse got through without a scratch. It was such a courageous dash in the face of such fearful odds.

Then we heard a sound in the woods occupied by the Yanks, as of a mighty rushing wind. As it drew nearer we could distinguish the clang of accoutrements and the voices of the officers shouting, "Steady men. Keep your places." There came into view the magnificent spectacle of a heavy line of infantry moving down in the open toward us. Our batteries opened with shrapnel, we opened with rifles, yet on they came and got to the creek before they broke.

They rushed pell-mell back to the woods, leaving many dead and wounded on the field. Then we saw three men come running from the woods toward us. They had no weapons. Word was passed along our lines not to shoot. The three men ran down to the creek and picked up a man from off the ground and went as fast as they could with their burden back to the woods. We cheered. The old field was well sprinkled with little heaps of Yankee blue uniforms. In some places singly, and in some places in piles. It is strange how small and insignificant a dead man appears on a battlefield. The line of Yanks never came out of the woods again.

Southern Horizon has performed for many years for numerous Civil War Balls, Living Histories, and related events. John Robison, who is practiced with vocals, banjo, guitar, autoharp, pennywhistle, and harmonica, began his musical career during the folk boom of the 1960's in the coffee houses of suburban Washington DC. Save Chancellorsville Battlefield

THE TIME TO ACT IS NOW!!

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust (CVBT) in its continuing quest to save hallowed ground has acquired 25 acres of the Talley Farm in the Chancellorsville Battlefield. The Talley Farm is where Stonewall Jackson launched his famous flank attack. We need your help in completing this purchase. The CVBT has 501(c)3 status from the Internal Revenue Service, so all donations are tax deductible.

"On May 2, 1863, General Stonewall Jackson marched clear across the front of Joe Hooker's Federal army and dealt it a savage blow on the flank. The result has been called Lee's greatest victory. The CVBT's initiative in preserving this tract deserves support from everyone who cares about America's historic heritage."

Edwin C. Bearss, Chief Historian Emeritus, National Park Service

"Stonewall Jackson's surprise onslaught at Chancellorsville was the most dramatic Confederate moment of the war in Virginia. Saving this piece of the Talley Farm, right where Jackson struck, is a tremendous achievement that will be of benefit to the American public for centuries to come!"

THE REBEL YELL

Though it originated in a particular period of history, the Rebel Yell has endured as a tradition down to the present day. I have never seen a written description of its true history, nor have I ever heard an authentic demonstration. Yet it lives on as an integral part of Confederate folklore and culture.

We know that it was heard at First Manassas and in every subsequent battle and was considered one of the most effective Confederate weapons. The yell has been described as a high-pitched shout or call and was probably a variation of the Southern fox hunter's cry. It might have been a variation of the small farmer calling his hogs from the back corner of his farm. Its origin may well remain one of the little mysteries of that turbulent era.

Though there is no record that the Yankees ever turned tail upon hearing it, invariably it produced an eerie feeling within the enemy lines. One of the best commentaries is from the memoirs of Private Levi Wagner of Company A, First Ohio Infantry, who vividly recollected the famous yell:

"We never could quite equal the rebel yell. You who have never heard it may wonder where lies the difference, but I assure you there is a great difference. You all know what it is to cheer anything that is smart, sharp or witty, some great feast or public event, such as a political speech or a victory at the polls. Also at some great religious demonstration we love to cheer, it does us good, quickens the pulse, clears the mind, brightens the eye, makes the blood flow freely and we feel like new creatures; but did you ever hear a man yell who was in mortal pain or fear, or when he is about to engage in some fiendish, inhuman deed? Such was the rebel yell, just as if the fiends of darkness had been turned loose, bent on death and destruction. Of course, it was like a spontaneous combustion, come like a flash and was gone."

For good or bad, the rebel yell will always be a part of our Southern heritage as it was in the memory of all those who heard it at the crossroads of our nation's history.

- Jim McCallum

BATTLE REPORT November 11 Meeting

After dining on some delicious refreshments provided by Bernice and Wayne Carver, our members enjoyed another enlightening program. The raffle, conducted by Mike Budziszewski, took in $107.00 for the RT. The winners and donors (in parentheses) were Don Patience (The Battle of the Wilderness by Jean Lynch in memory of Ted Lynch), John Moore (Year 2000 Kunstler Civil War Calendar by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Bill Oakley (1st National Flag License Plate by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), and Ed Gibson (Sheet of CW Centennial Postage Stamps by Wilbur Jones).

We were very pleased to welcome John Allred as a first time member of the RT! We also enjoyed having as guests at the meeting Rod and Neil Andrew, direct descendants of CSA Major General Bryan Grimes, the subject of our program. Other guests who indicated an interest in membership were Charlie Harrison and Don Hessenflow.

The presentation on Bryan Grimes by Dr. Harrell Allen was excellent. Dr. Allen focused on Grimes' personal qualities as he traced the general's career from childhood and education at the University of North Carolina, which he entered at age 15, to his brilliant and exceptionally courageous service to the Confederacy, first as an officer in the "Bloody 4th" North Carolina Regiment, then as brigade and division commander, and, finally, his postwar life and tragic death. Harrell noted that Grimes' extensive postwar correspondence never contained any reference to the war, reflecting his modesty and his ability to transcend any rancor or regret.

SABRE STROKES

Thanks and congratulations to Dr. Harrell Allen who declined to accept reimbursement for travel expenses to the November program and suggested a contribution to battlefield preservation instead! So we have sent a check for $100.00 in Dr. Allen's honor to Central Virginia Battlefields Trust (CVBT), the Fredericksburg VA group which was the recipient of a large gift from the CFCWRT in 1998.

You'll notice CVBT's latest plea from active members, Ed Bearss and Bob Krick, in the current newsletter. This is an excellent preservation group which can boast that, because each of its officers are volunteers, all contributions received go to battlefield preservation. CVBT has been successful in saving battlefield property in the Fredericksburg-Chancellorsville area since its inception.

Member Chris Fonvielle has kept a busy schedule in recent months giving talks to various Civil War and historical groups. Chris was the guest speaker for the November meeting of the Richmond VA CWRT, his second presentation for that group. Chris gave a program on The Life and Times of Lieutenant Commander William B. Cushing, USN, the subject of his current research and writing.

Palmer and Mary Royal were honored at the October meeting of the CFCWRT at the Cape Fear Club. Treasurer Dan Geddie observed that Palmer and Mary have attended every monthly meeting and every event of our RT since its beginning in October, 1994! Congratulations to these very enthusiastic members who are the only ones among us with a perfect record of attendance!

Louisiana State University Press, which publishes numerous classic CW titles, has just issued a special Civil War sale catalog which lists books at "devastatingly low prices." Write LSU Press, Box 25053, Baton Rouge LA 70894. Telephone orders not accepted. The sale ends February 14, 2000.

The big news on the CW battlefield preservation front is the Civil War Preservation Trust, arising from the merger of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) and the Civil War Trust. Carrington Williams, an attorney in Richmond VA and a board member in both organizations, will serve as chairman of the new 40 member board. James Lighthizer, former vice chairman of the Civil War Trust, will serve as president. The new and enlarged non-profit organization is positioned well to utilize the $8 million dollars in federal money which Congress recently appropriated for battlefields. These funds must be matched by $16 million in private contributions, so it's easy to imagine that the new group will be planning some heavy fund-raising endeavors.

LEE'S LAST MAJOR GENERAL: BRYAN GRIMES

NOVEMBER 11 MEETING

St. John's Episcopal Church

Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

Dr. T. Harrell Allen, Chair and Professor of Communication at East Carolina University, will be our guest speaker on Thursday, November 11. Dr. Allen's program will focus on the subject of his recent and well-received biography, Lee's Last Major General: Bryan Grimes of North Carolina. Dr. Allen received his Ph.D. from Ohio State University in 1973. He taught for many years at California State Polytechnic University and is the author of three books and numerous articles in the communications field.

Bryan Grimes, a native of Pitt County NC, was commissioned a major in the 4th North Carolina in 1861. His steady rise through the officer ranks culminated in his appointment as major general in February, 1865, the last such appointment in Lee's Army of Northern Virginia. Bryan Grimes was a fierce fighter and a superb field commander, his courage in combat well-known throughout the army. Dr. Allen's biography awards this NC general the stature he has long deserved.

Robert E. L. Krick, who penned the foreword to Dr. Allen's book writes, "Lee's Last Major General is a biography of unusual relevance. Because Grimes was neither a career soldier nor a bombastic politician, some readers may reach an empathic understanding with the general. A man of modest background and firm beliefs, he found himself sucked into a situation in which his natural talents emerged to an uncommon degree. The fascinating story of that blossoming, together with Bryan Grimes' singular battlefield record and tragic postwar death, unite here in a meaningful and deserved biography." Dr. Allen will have available copies of his book for sale and signing.

BATTLE REPORT October 14 Meeting

The annual fall meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table was attended by 85 members who enjoyed a satisfying BBQ dinner and a lot of good fellowship. We were also pleased to welcome the following new members to our ranks: Sylvia Bellows, Paul Burton, Raymond Cegelski, Vaiden Kendrick, Brett Knowles, Billy Mason, Kenny Morris, Kenny Morris Jr, Ken Newbold, Harry Stovall, and Mike Tickle!

Our raffle took in the largest total ever - $146.00. The winners were Parks Downing (Confederate Print donated by Mike Budziszewski), Gray Dixon (Official Records Battlefield Atlas donated by Jean Lynch in memory of her husband, Ted Lynch), James MacLaren (Bushwhacker's Civil War in the North Carolina Mountains donated by Palmer and Mary Royal), Ed Gibson (a North Carolina 1862 #1 Currency Note donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop), and David English (CD of Civil War Music donated by Cape Fear Civil War Shop). Congratulations to our winners and thanks to those who donated raffle items.

Two reminders. We need more donations of raffle prizes from our members! Please contact Mike Budziszewski (H.458-1370) with items you can contribute to the raffle or bring them to the next meeting. Your raffle donations will be acknowledged in the newsletter. We also ask members to volunteer to bring refreshments. Wayne and Bernice Carver (H. 383-0105) are coordinating refreshments, and they would appreciate your contacting them to sign up for program dates when you can help us out with homemade goodies.

Many members agreed that Gordon Rhea's presentation on the battle at Spotsylvania Courthouse was one of the very best programs the RT has ever enjoyed! He wove together the tragic personal experiences of a South Carolina rebel with the epic story of what was perhaps the most horrendous combat of the war. I was myself most impressed with Gordon's appraisal of Ulysses S. Grant's generalship. He spoke of how Grant presented Lee with new and awesome challenges during the campaign from the Wilderness to Cold Harbor. Whereas Lee had always dealt with Union generals who were content to rest their armies after a major battle, Lee now had to contend with a general who continued to maneuver and attack despite huge losses. And, though Grant has been characterized heretofore as a simple-minded slugger who gave little regard to his own army's casualties, Rhea helped us understand the Union hero as a general who formulated a deliberate and winning strategy and intended to pursue it, against all objections by the press and the politicians, until he achieved final victory. Gordon, who has led numerous battlefield staff rides for the military, suggests that modern U.S. military strategy is not only a legacy of Grant's Civil War campaigns, but that most leading military officers in this country consider Grant a more skillful general than Lee.

Indeed, I have developed a new appreciation for General Grant since first reading Gordon Rhea's two campaign studies. And, fortunately for us, Gordon will follow his first books with further studies on the North Anna Campaign and Cold Harbor. Gordon Rhea is the first historian who has explored this four month foray by Grant which finally led to the Union army's ultimately successful siege of Petersburg.

Another reminder! Mark your 2000 calendar for the upcoming Annual Spring Battlefield Tour March 24-26. We'll be touring sites of The Bermuda Hundred Campaign south of Richmond. You'll be hearing more about the campaign and the tour in future newsletters.

AUGUSTA, GEORGIA A Confederate City

Recently I spent two days in Augusta, pursuing family history and searching for sites associated with the wartime city. Though Augusta escaped the destruction wrought in some southern cities, it nevertheless figured prominently in the war effort.

It's pretty well accepted that, were it not for the Augusta Powder Works and its huge production of gunpowder, the Confederacy would not have survived until 1865. George Washington Rains, trained as an engineer at West Point, deserves the credit for designing and constructing the Powder Works along a two-mile stretch on the Savannah River, just on the edge of Augusta. By mid-1863, this factory was producing 5000 pounds of gunpowder daily, a total of 2,750,000 pounds for Confederate small arms and artillery. Sadly, today, all that remains of this manufacturing complex is a 176-foot high obelisk chimney which stands as a lonely sentinel along the river's edge.

Another, much smaller, factory in wartime Augusta is known only to a handful of Confederate arms collectors. The Leech & Rigdon revolver, described as "the original Confederate Colt," was manufactured in a building (which has long since disappeared) near the corner of 12th and Walker Streets. The history of this arms maker is somewhat confused. Originally known as Memphis Novelty Works and famous for its Confederate-made swords, the factory moved first to Columbus, Mississippi, thence to Greensboro, Georgia, and finally to Augusta. Leech & Rigdon's revolvers are very rare and highly prized by today's collectors.

If you drive to Summerville, a suburb situated on an elevation just west of downtown Augusta and a late 19th Century mecca for northern tourists, you will see Augusta College (2500 Walton Way) on whose grounds stand the U.S. Arsenal, built between 1827 and 1829. The Arsenal buildings now serve as administrative buildings for the college. Just across the road, on the grounds of Reid Memorial Presbyterian Church, is the antebellum Montrose (2249 Walton Way), the post-war home of Colonel Charles Colcock Jones, an antiquarian and Georgia historian who collected important Confederate manuscripts, as well as historical curiosities of every kind, and was active in the United Confederate Veterans.

A good source of wartime Augusta lore is The Secret Eye: The Journal of Ella Gertrude Clanton Thomas. Thomas was born into the planter elite, and her journals provide a good portrayal of life in Augusta before, during, and after the war. She records her attendance at a reception honoring Jefferson Davis during his post-war visit to Augusta held at the venerable old Planter's Hotel, the site of which is indicated by a historical marker just a half block off Broad Street.

Some of our members are interested in the Union and Confederate monuments erected in towns and cities after the war. Surely there is no taller one than the 76 foot Confederate monument which stands on Broad Street, between Seventh and Eighth. The women of Augusta raised almost $20,000 to erect this Italian marble structure which features life-sized figures of several Confederate generals. The figure on the very top of the monument, however, is that of a private soldier.

Just east of downtown is Magnolia Cemetery, an expansive burying ground from antebellum times. Seven Confederate generals are buried here, perhaps the most important of which is Edward Porter Alexander, Lee's Chief of Artillery. I searched in vain to discover where Alexander made his home in Augusta during the post-war years. Maybe next trip!

The Augusta-Richmond County Museum is well worth a visit. Some years ago, when I toured the museum, it was in very cramped quarters with mediocre displays. Since then, the museum has moved to a superb new facility. Its current displays make it one of the best city museums I've ever visited. Exhibits include good coverage of the prehistoric AmerIndians and the Revolutionary War. The Confederate collection is small, but rich. Flags of the Clinch Rifles and Cobb's Legion, both units with local connections, are displayed. Along with a variety of Civil War guns and swords, the museum prominently displays the sword and boots of General W.H.T. Walker who was KIA during the Battle of Atlanta.

Finally, I can't fail to recommend Sconyer's. I've been a fan of good barbeque for many years, but I declare I've never seen or enjoyed a plate of barbeque like the one they serve up at this restaurant, an Augusta landmark since 1956. A plate features a veritable mountain of barbeque with all the fixings. It's almost worth the trip to Augusta! Located at 2250 Sconyers Way, it's open only on Thursday, Friday, Saturday from 10 am til 10 pm. (706) 790-5411. If you're ever in Augusta, you gotta go!

IN MEMORIAM Ted Lynch

Ted Lynch was an avid Civil War enthusiast. He came to the first meeting of the Cape Fear CWRT in October, 1994 and regularly attended our meetings until declining health forced him to curtail many of his activities. Even then, he stayed closely in touch with the RT. Ted served on the RT steering committee for several years and was the inspiration and a major financial supporter for the two concert programs by the 11th NC Regiment Band. He instituted our RT raffle, and, in a generous and fitting gesture, Ted's wife, Jean, has recently contributed a number of excellent books from Ted's CW library for our monthly raffles in memory of her husband. Ted studied not only the Civil War period, but read widely in early European history and religion. He was very proud of his notable Confederate ancestry. Ted had a particular interest in Gettysburg and Antietam, visiting both sites frequently and participating in numerous conferences at Gettysburg where he studied that field in great detail. We will miss Ted's fund of knowledge, his unmistakable presence, and his irrepressible good humor.

! SAVE CEDAR MOUNTAIN BATTLEFIELD ! APCWS Seeks To Raise $290,000 For Purchase

(We've recently received the following important letter from Alan E. Hoeweler, Chairman of APCWS, America's leading CW preservation organization)

It was a hard-bitten, daylong fight that pitted the stubborn Federals of Major General Nathaniel Banks against the leather-tough veterans of Major General Thomas "Stonewall" Jackson. It was also Stonewall's last independent command. The engagement occurred when Major General John Pope's army moved into Culpeper County VA to put pressure on Richmond. In response, General Robert E. Lee sent Jackson's command toward Culpeper. On August 9, 1862, Jackson's men collided with Banks' corps.

Artillery fire soon echoed off Cedar Mountain as the opposing lines pitched into each other with howling intensity. Banks' men, in a driving attack by Crawford's brigade and Auger's division, hammered the Southern line, throwing its defenders into confusion. It seemed that the indomitable Stonewall was headed for defeat, but he rode into the seething mass of retreating Confederates, brandishing his sword and rallying his men with the cry, "Jackson is with you!" Helped by an onrush of reinforcements led by Major General A.P. Hill, Jackson's men pushed back the Northern tide. By the end of the day, 2500 Union and 1400 Confederate soldiers had become casualties.

The Cedar Mountain region remains relatively pristine, but is zoned for low-density housing subdivisions and commercial ventures. Development is already crawling slowly but steadily along Route 5 toward Cedar Mountain. A large residential development has been constructed close to the battlefield. APCWS wants to save and interpret the core battlefield. Can you help us raise the $290,000 to save these 150-plus acres from the bulldozer? ...we want to obtain full title to the land that trembled under the footsteps of Crawford's punishing attack and Hill's tide-turning counterblow. A monument to CSA General Charles S. Winder, killed leading Jackson's division, is also on the property.

$50.00 Contribution. Your name will be placed in a drawing for a Don Troiani print of Jackson at Cedar Mountain.

$500.00 Contribution. You will be entered into the Troiani drawing and your name will be inscribed on a permanent marker placed at the site.

$2000.00 Contribution. You can select the very acre you want to save on a first come/first serve basis. A map displaying your name or the name of an organization or Civil War ancestor will appear on the permanent marker, a lasting testament to your concern for our heritage.

Contributions of any amount are welcome. Send to Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites, Suite 200, 11 Public Square, Hagerstown MD 21740. (301) 665-1400. Website: www.apcws.com. Email: apcws@intrepid.net

THE BATTLE OF SPOTSYLVANIA COURT HOUSE

An Evening With Gordon Rhea

Thursday, October 14

Cape Fear Club

Corner Second & Chestnut Streets

Dinner 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

! Paid Dinner Reservations Required By Monday, October 11 !

Every year members look forward to our annual fall meeting when a leading Civil War historian joins us for dinner and a special presentation. This year, we're proud to announce that Gordon Rhea, whose Civil War battle and campaign studies rank among the best ever written, will speak to our group on one of the hardest fought engagements between Lee's Army of Northern Virginia and Grant's Army of the Potomac.

Gordon Rhea, a Virginia native, graduated from Indiana University summa cum laude in 1967 and received his M.A. in history from Harvard University as a Woodrow Wilson Fellow in 1968. He received his J.D. from Stanford University Law School in 1974. Mr. Rhea has served as an Assistant United States Attorney and as Special Assistant to the Chief Counsel, Senate Select Committee on Intelligence Activities in Washington DC. He has lectured extensively on military history at the US Army Training and Doctrine Command and has spoken to numerous historical societies and Civil War Round Tables around the country.

Mr. Rhea is perhaps best known for his impressive The Battle of the Wilderness: May 5-6 1864 (LSU Press, 1994) and The Battles of Spotsylvania Court House and The Road to Yellow Tavern: May 7-12 1864 (LSU Press, 1997) both of which have won several awards. Robert K. Krick's review, "Gordon Rhea's Spotsylvania is a splendid piece of historical research and writing. It unquestionably will be the definitive word for decades to come on that pivotal confrontation between Lee and Grant, and is destined for recognition as one of the great military classics on the Civil War in Virginia," reflects his praise of both of these important studies. And by the way, if you have these volumes in your library, you may wish to bring them to the meeting for signing.

Remember that your paid dinner reservation of $15.00 must be received by Monday, October 11. Sticky Fingers will serve up a delicious and filling meal which includes Memphis-style barbecue pork and chicken with baked beans, cole slaw, potato salad, iced tea or lemonade! We had a huge turnout for our dinner meeting last fall. Don't miss this one! Send your check right away for $15.00 to CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404.

! MEMBERSHIP RENEWALS AND SIGNUPS NOW DUE !

Don't delay! Mail your check for $25.00 for your 1999-2000 membership to the RT address above or bring it to the October meeting. Your membership entitles you to all the privileges of the RT, including the monthly meetings, tours and newsletter. Thanks to everyone who pays their dues promptly.

THE STORY OF THE OFFICIAL RECORDS

(The OR's, as they are popularly known to students, both browsers and serious researchers, of the Civil War is the richest available compilation of primary source material of the 1861-1865 conflict. Sid Sidlo, Editor of The Ramrod, the newsletter of The North Carolina Civil War Round Table which meets in Burlington NC, is the author of the following fascinating story of how the OR's were compiled. It is reprinted here with Sid's permission)

The three compilations of The Official Records of the War of the Rebellion - the 127 volume OR-Armies, the one (large) volume OR-Atlas and the thirty-volume OR-Navies, all including both Union and Confederate documents - are indispensable to students of the Civil War. In spite of the OR's limitations, most scholars regard them as the only full, accessible, and unbiased documentation of the war.

How did the Official Records come to be collected and published? In a very handy little book called A User's Guide to the Official Records of the American Civil War (paperback, $12) Alan and Barbara Aimone of West Point not only provide a succinct guide to understanding and using the records, but tell us their fascinating history, only a part of which I'll relate here.

Compilation of the records was first proposed by Major General Henry Halleck in 1863. A law to collect Union Army records was signed by Lincoln on 20 May 1864. After the fall of Richmond, Halleck ordered Confederate papers to be gathered and sorted, although many were destroyed when the city was set on fire. Yet that still left 500 "boxes, hogsheads, and barrels" of Confederate papers that reached the War Department by August.

Scholars owe much to Halleck. Even during the war, he prevented destruction of many captured Rebel records. Later he spent some of his own personal fortune to see that they were properly preserved and published.

Work began immediately after passage of the 1864 law, but delays led Congress in 1866 to pass a law calling for effective organization of the work and development of a long-range plan and cost estimates. Then for a few years the project came to a halt for lack of leadership and the government's focus on Reconstruction.

It is not a slight on Halleck or other early collectors to note that the records were originally intended for memoir-writing officers, not professional historians. The historical profession was then in its infancy. Lobbying by Union and Confederate veterans' organizations restarted the project after it stalled. In 1874 Congress appropriated funds to pay for publication of the Army records. By 1877 thirty-seven preliminary volumes of Union records and ten of Confederate had been generated. But all material was ordered chronologically, not by campaigns or battles.

By 1877, seeing that results to date were unwieldy and unsatisfactory, the War Department appointed a full-time curator, Lt. Col. Robert N. Scott, who had been aide-de-camp to Halleck during and after the war. The very capable Scott was familiar with military bureaucracy and the "records management" practices of many of their officers.

Early on, Scott made two important editorial decisions. First, he specified that the records would be organized topically - all reports of a campaign or battle, Union reports followed by Confederate, were to be placed together for a connected account; in the same volume, related correspondence in chronological order would follow the reports. This was a critical decision for historical research.

Second, Scott established criteria for selecting meaningful documents. Not only must the document be official and significant, but it must have been generated during the war, and no more than a few weeks or months after the events it covered. He realized that human memory is unreliable even after a short time.

While there were some disputes over what was and was not significant, the most controversial policy was over the issue of wartime production. Scott believed rightly that unaltered documents revealed leaders' knowledge and understanding of the situation at the time of action, and so best served veterans and historians who could then understand the bases for wartime decisions, whether the data was correct or not. All of this meant that there were to be no after-the-fact corrections or alterations to the original documents. Many officer veterans had tried to supplement records with post-war "corrections" and retrospection. Scott and later editors did, however, permit annotations, such as notes about individuals vindicated by postwar commissions. They also allowed correction of misspellings and bad grammar.

From the beginning, Scott employed both Confederate and Union former officers to promote impartiality and balance in selection and editing. The job was daunting, to say the least. The papers to be compiled were "counted not by documents or boxes, but by tons, roomfuls, or the contents of buildings." Every document included in the Official Records was authenticated as much as possible; this required time-consuming research and correspondence by a staff that averaged six officers and sixty-nine clerks. Never has there been serious questioning of the authenticity of the vast majority of material collected and published.

In Scott, the government had clearly found the man for the job. Both qualified and completely dedicated to the task, he left his mark on others to follow. He supervised completion of the first 18 volumes (the first volume was distributed in July, 1881) and did significant work on the next 18. When Scott died in 1887, a succession of other editors continued the task until the last of the 128 volumes, the General Index, was published in 1901. The project had taken thirty-seven years and cost three million dollars, a bargain by today's standards. In 1903, after eleven thousand sets of the army records had been published and distributed, the printing plates were destroyed by law; modern editions are facsimile reproductions.

SABRE STROKES

Now it's easier than ever to obtain the complete military service records of your Union and Confederate ancestors. No longer do you have to wait six to eight weeks to receive the records from the National Archives. Service records are now available through Broadfoot Publishing Company. CSA records have a one-day turnaround while USA records are only two weeks. The cost is $25.00 for the first ten pages with an additional charge for more. For order forms, call 686-9591 or order by fax 686-4379. Take a look at Broadfoot Publishing Company's website at <http://broadfoot.wilmington.net>.

Since there's a considerable overlap of interest in Civil War and Indian War buffs, those who have enjoyed the excellent quarterly, Civil War Regiments, published by Savas Publishing Company will want to know about the premier issue of Journal of the Indian Wars, just available from Savas and featuring Custer at the Washita and Little Bighorn with a number of articles on this subject.

Browsing through the newsletters of other RT's, we find an interesting note in The Long Roll, published by the Piedmont CWRT (Charlotte NC). Frank Vandiver, professor at Texas A&M and a CW historian of note, was interviewed recently by the Charlotte Business Journal. One question posed to Vandiver was, "Do you think Robert E. Lee was sincere when he offered his resignation after losing at Gettysburg?" Vandiver's response? "I think he was in a real mental funk and I don't think he would have been surprised if President Davis had accepted it. It was a terrible letdown: the whole ethos of Lee's army was wrecked. Long after the war, Davis wrote to another one of his former generals and said that Lee had never mentioned before, during or after that battle what the tactical strategy was. Davis was baffled by that. Even fifteen, twenty years later, he nursed some resentment."

One of the more interesting articles I've read recently is A Question of Rhetoric: Joshua Chamberlain and the Surrender at Appomattox in the fine monthly CW magazine, North & South (June, 1999). William Marvel, author of nine books on the CW including the recent biography of USA General Ambrose Burnside, makes a convincing case that the well-known story of Chamberlain's gallant reception of the Confederate surrender at Appomattox was a fanciful tale. Chamberlain first claimed this honor in 1903 at a meeting of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion in New York. The five USA general officers, including General Grant, who could have disputed Chamberlain's claim were dead, the last one having passed away only ten months before the MOLLUS meeting. Marvel observes about "the benevolent victor of Appomattox" that "we recognize him in this way because that was the way he presented himself. There seems no doubt that he acted courageously on the battlefield, but the details by which he painted himself such a heroic figure seem to have suffered a little embellishment." So often the origin of accounts of CW events and their persistent appeal through the years is more interesting than the purported events themselves.

For those desiring an indepth look at Confederate Wilmington, the Lower Cape Fear Region During the Civil War, a UNCW Pathways course to be taught by Dr. Chris Fonvielle, will be of particular interest. The course is scheduled for Monday evenings 6:30-8:30 from October 11 to November 15. The cost is $55.00, and the registration deadline is September 24. Register with credit card by calling 962-3195 or send check to Division for Public Service & Extended Education, UNCW, 601 South College Road, Wilmington NC 28403.

You might also enjoy attending the series Memory and Monuments: Shaping the Past and the Future in the South, 1865-2000 and Beyond, sponsored by the 1898 Centennial Foundation and the UNCW Philosophy and Religion Department. The first of these is Race and Reunion; The Meaning of the Civil War in American History (David W. Blight) NH County Museum, September 24, 7:30 pm, followed by three additional lectures in October and November which explore the theme of racial reconciliation by notable historians of the South. Call the museum for further details.

The current issue of Scuttlebutt, published by the Friends of NH Public Library, features an article by Beverly Tetterton of the Local History Collection and a friend to many of us historical researchers thanking the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table and other donors who met the $14,000.00 goal to keep two important wartime Lower Cape Fear maps at home. Last fall, our members contributed a little over $1000.00 to this project. You can view the maps in the library's North Carolina Room.

BATTLE REPORT September 9 Meeting

Our first meeting of the new RT year was a lot of fun! Sixty-one members greeted friends after the summer break. (We've had just at sixty members at all our meetings since January, a consistent fifty per cent attendance rate which is excellent for a RT!) They enjoyed wonderful refreshments, prepared and served by Nancy Fonvielle and Karen Budziszewski. Thanks Nancy and Karen! Greeters Jack Kuske and Parks Downing welcomed visitors Ray Ceqelski, Mike Tickle, and Cliff Winefordner. Raffle winner Palmer Royal won a print entitled Confederate Winter (Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Jules Laskey a Year 2000 CW Calendar (Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Dan Geddie a relic box (Cape Fear Civil War Shop), Bill Clark a copy of Moore's Guide to Bentonville (Cape Fear Civil War Shop) and Richard Long a North Carolina cupholder (Cape Fear Civil War Shop). Thanks to Mike Budziszewski of the Cape Fear Civil War Shop for donating the raffle items. The raffle total was $123.00!

Don Koonce gave us a superb history of the Third North Carolina Regiment. Though this unit sustained 60% casualty rates at Antietam and Gettysburg and 50% at Chancellorsville, it could boast one of the lowest desertion rates, only 150 of the 1700 men who served.

The regiment was mustered in May, 1861, one of the first ten organized in NC. The officers, generally from Wilmington, were from prominent families, though the enlisted men were, overwhelmingly, farmers from the Cape Fear region. The battleworthiness of the regiment was largely due to the strict discipline and daily drill ordered by Colonels Gaston Meares, Robert Cowan, William Lord DeRossett, William Murdoch Parsley, and Major Stephen Thruston. Don told us that the 3rd never fled a field of engagement.

At Antietam, the regiment carried its assault into the Cornfield where it was caught in a terrific crossfire. Of its officers, only three escaped disabling wounds. After participating in Stonewall Jackson's flank attack at Chancellorsville, the 3rd was posted near the area where Jackson was wounded, and the regimental surgeon, Dr. Thomas Fanning Wood, Don's great-grandfather, was just across the pike. When he received word that an unidentified officer had been wounded, Wood sent his ambulance driver, Thomas Jefferson Capps of Wilmington, who removed Jackson from the field. This celebrated CSA regiment was also in the Mule Shoe at Spotsylvania where it was overwhelmed by USA General Winfield Scott Hancock's early morning Second Corps attack. All but thirty of the regiment were casualties. The 3rd NC ended the war at Appomattox where it surrendered fifty-five enlisted men and four officers.

The wartime journal of Thomas Fanning Wood, edited by Don Koonce, will be published later this year by the University of Kentucky Press. You'll want a copy for your library!

A PARTING SHOT

(The ever acerbic CSA Major General Daniel H. Hill was finally transferred from the ANV because of his frequent criticisms of Lee and fellow officers in the high command. John Courtney, a member of the Piedmont CWRT in Charlotte, reports the following quote from Milestones by Lew Powell. Hill replies on March 24, 1863 to USA General J.G. Foster's censure for burning Plymouth NC)

You forget, sir, that you are a Yankee and that Plymouth is a southern town. It is no business of yours if we choose to burn one of our own towns. A meddling Yankee troubles himself about everybody's matters except his own and repents of everybody's sins except his own. We are a different people. Should the Yankees burn a Union village in Connecticut or a codfish town in Massachusetts, we would not meddle with them but rather bid them God speed in their work of purifying the atmosphere.

Your second act of forgetfulness consists in your not remembering that you are the most atrocious house burner as yet unhung in the wide universe.

FORT ANDERSON: BATTLE FOR WILMINGTON

An Evening With Chris Fonvielle

Thursday, April 29
St. John's Episcopal Church

Social Hour 7:00 pm.....Program 7:30 pm

No place was more important to the Confederacy by 1864 than Wilmington, North Carolina. Robert E. Lee himself sent word to the Cape Fear District military authorities that the survival of his Army of Northern Virginia depended on the survival of Wilmington.

To protect the Confederacy's lifeline, engineers constructed a vast network of forts, batteries and fieldworks in and around Wilmington. One of them was Fort Anderson, an imposing earthen bastion on the west bank of the Cape Fear River fifteen miles below the city.

Historian Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr. grew up exploring the mammoth fort and studying its fascinating story. His new book Fort Anderson: Battle for Wilmington (Savas Publishing, 1999) is the result of his interest. It chronicles Fort Anderson's history from its origins in 1862 to its rediscovery by archeologists in the 1950's.

Erected on top of the ruins of the colonial ghost town of Brunswick, England's main port of entry before the American Revolution, Fort Anderson today is a tranquil state historic site. During the Civil War, it was the largest and strongest interior fort guarding Wilmington. It was also the scene of a massive Union naval bombardment and ground assault just five weeks after the fall of Fort Fisher.

Dr. Fonvielle, author of The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope and a lecturer at UNC-Wilmington's History Department, will give a slide presentation on Fort Anderson at St. John's Episcopal Church on April 29. He will highlight the Battle of Fort Anderson in February, 1865, the colorful characters who controlled the fort's destiny and anecdotes surrounding its history. Oddly enough, it was the only Confederate fort surrendered by the U.S. Army to the U.S. Navy and had several eerie connections to President Abraham Lincoln's assassination.

The trade edition of Fort Anderson: Battle for Wilmington is a soft bound, wraps book. At Fonvielle's request, however, Savas Publishing produced a 500-copy hard bound, numbered limited Cape Fear edition of Fort Anderson. Copies will be available only through the author and will make their debut at the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table meeting this month.

Join us for this exciting presentation of local Civil War history by the foremost historian of the Wilmington Campaign!

THE ANTIETAM CAMPAIGN SPRING BUS TOUR Report From the Field

On Thursday, March 25, just after noon, twenty-five members and guests of the CFCWRT boarded a bus for the RT's annual spring battlefield tour. They included Jim Brandon of West Palm Beach FL (guest of Bert Williams), Bernice and Wayne Carver, Bonnie and David English, Conway Picklen, Dan Geddie, Owen Hardy of Louisville KY (guest of James MacLaren), Tommy King, Dorene and John Krohn, Dale Lear, Richard Long, Cliff Mabry, James MacLaren, Jim McCallum, John Moore, Bob Quinn, Linda Rand, Mary and Palmer Royal, Ed Russ, George Slaton, Bert Williams, and George Wolf. Our destination was Hagerstown, Maryland, near the site of the Antietam Campaign of 1862. Our bus reached the Sheraton Inn before 9pm, and, as we settled into our rooms, we learned that the Hagerstown CWRT was just then finishing its monthly dinner meeting and program in the Sheraton's conference room. This RT, established in 1956, currently has 95 members.

Throughout the tour, we tried to be aware of where CW soldier ancestors of our tour group members were engaged during the fighting. They will be listed in this summary, followed by the name of the RT member/descendent in parenthesis

Early Friday morning, we climbed aboard the bus at 8 am to be greeted by Timothy Reese, an expert on the Antietam Campaign sites, his specialty being the fighting at Crampton's Gap which he has covered in a recently published book. Tim took us to White's Ford where CSA General Robert E. Lee's army crossed the Potomac River to begin its first incursion into a border state. We found it very moving to stand at this obscure and out of the way site where rebel soldiers waded or swam across the river and then found themselves on what some of them considered northern territory. And it was at this point that Tim paused to describe the military and political situation which led to Lee's decision to invade the North.

In the late summer of 1862, the South could rejoice that it had repelled Union efforts to invade Virginia. Lee felt ready to move north, and his goal was to draw the forces of USA General George B. McClellan northward in pursuit to the Cumberland Mountains in Pennsylvania where he hoped to turn and defeat the Federals. Tim pointed out that Lee's purpose was not, as some have conjectured, to take Washington, but to defeat the Union army on Union soil, thereby gaining recognition from England and France. In fact, Tim's research has demonstrated that England was then poised to send troops to aid the South, a reality not formerly appreciated by historians.

Tim also shared his perspective of the deeper significance of the campaign. The famed Lee's Lost Order, which McClellan used to his advantage, led to the unraveling of Lee's strategic plans. Antietam, said Tim, was the real turning point of the Civil War, and the engagement at Crampton's Gap was the linchpin of the campaign. Lee, insisted our guide, had no intention to fight at Antietam, yet the loss of Crampton's Gap forced him to fight a defensive battle there.

We then drove through Frederick where Tim pointed out the general site where the Lost Order was discovered. The area, near South and Franklin Streets in southeast Frederick is now an industrial site. Tim's research has turned up strong evidence that the site of the Lost Order was not the Best Farm on the Rockville Pike, as many historians have believed.

We then journeyed to Turner's Gap where CSA General Daniel H. Hill directed the stalwart defense of two gaps in the South Mountain range. Though he was vastly outnumbered, he held off two assaulting Federal corps which sought to punch through these gaps and attack Lee's separated forces to the west. At Turner's Gap we saw the old South Mountain Inn which served as Hill's HQ as well as the slopes where Hill's forces fought a successful delaying action. Here Angus and Archibald McIntyre (Jim McCallum) of the 6th Alabama in CSA General Robert Rodes' Brigade were heavily engaged against USA General Joseph Hooker's 1st Corps. In fact, Rodes Brigade bore the brunt of the fighting at this location.

We drove south, just one mile as the crow flies, to Fox's Gap where CSA General Samuel Garland's brigade took advantage of a stone wall, still standing, to deflect the advance of Federal troops from the 9th Corps whose acting commander was USA General Jesse Reno. General Garland was killed during this fierce action in which Peter Philo Hoke (Richard Long) of the 12th North Carolina participated. A Rebel sharpshooter's bullet killed General Reno as he rode forward toward the CSA lines near the end of the fighting; a monument to Reno erected after the war stands in the area where he was struck.

Our next stop was Crampton's Gap where the Federal 6th Corps under USA General William B. Franklin finally succeeded in breaking through the Confederate defenses. Tim gave us a new understanding of this CSA debacle. CSA General Howell Cobb, a Georgian political general, has always been blamed for the loss of Crampton's Gap. But the southern collapse actually began as a result of CSA Colonel Thomas Munford's unwise placement of dismounted Virginia cavalry below the gap. When the Virginians were overwhelmed, the troops of Cobb's command, fighting valiantly, could not stem the flow. As a result of the poor strategic CSA defense, the gap fell quickly to the Federals. The CSA division commander, Lafayette McLaws, though a Georgian, collaborated in the scapegoating of Howell Cobb, and Munford never received any blame. Tim pointed out the slopes where CSA Colonel William McRae, of Wilmington, mounted a temporary defense against the Union onslaught with his 15th North Carolina; they were finally driven off with 32% casualties in 30 minutes.

We did a drive-through of Harper's Ferry, and Tim showed us the site where Joseph B. McCallum (Jim McCallum) participated in the siege of the little town with his 24th North Carolina. John Stuart Hard, Ben Hard, both officers, and Aquilla Seigler, (John Krohn), all of the 7th South Carolina and John Calvin Clark of the 8th South Carolina in Kershaw's Brigade succeeded in taking Bolivar Heights which towers above Harper's Ferry. Our bus then proceeded to Weaverton Heights where Jacob and Hiram Williams (Bert Williams) and William Hansell Bryant (Jim McCallum) were stationed with the 1st North Carolina Cavalry. We passed through Keedysville where nearly every home was commandeered as a hospital for the wounded after Antietam.

We ended a bright, sunny day's tour with a delicious meal at the Sheraton where Tim Reese gave a summary of the campaign and responded to questions.

Saturday morning we were on the bus and ready to ride again at 8 am. This day would be devoted to the Battle of Antietam! We approached the battlefield from the north and stopped at the Visitor's Center for an orientation by our guide. Standing behind the Center, we looked down into the shallow valley below where CSA General Roswell Ripley's Brigade (containing the 3rd North Carolina of Wilmington renown) passed the night before the battle. Our group then walked across the Hagerstown Pike to the Dunker Church which became the focal point for three major assaults by Union troops during the first phase of the fighting at Antietam.

Boarding our bus once again, we drove to the edge of the famous Cornfield which was the scene of terrific fighting as Union and Confederate troops swept back and forth across the ground, always seeking an advantage. In the early morning hours, the Federal 1st Corps began the offensive, slamming into CSA General Alexander Lawton's Brigade in the Clover field just south of the Cornfield. Here William Henry MacLeod (George Slaton) of the 61st Georgia was mortally wounded; he was later captured by Federal troops and died the next month in a US Hospital in Frederick, MD. Shortly afterwards, Ripley's Brigade, on the Confederate right, moved into the Cornfield alongside the East Woods. In this attack, Colonel William Lord DeRosset received a disabling wound which put him out of active service for the remainder of the war; his 3rd North Carolina took high casualties. William Croom (Jim McCallum) of the 1st North Carolina and Isaac Croom (Jim McCallum) of the 3rd North Carolina saw combat in this phase of the heavy fighting in the Cornfield. Peter Philo Hoke's (Richard Long) 12th North Carolina also assaulted the East Woods sector. During the first phase of the fighting through the Cornfield, the Clover field, around Dunker Church, and into the West Woods the troops from both sides slugged it out. The casualties mounted moment by moment. Thomas J. Shemwell (John Moore), serving in the 48th North Carolina of Walker's Brigade, was mortally wounded near Dunker Church; he died in a hospital in Charlottesville VA.

As the fighting died down from the morning's assaults, the activity shifted to the center portion of the Confederate line around a sunken farm road known thereafter as Bloody Lane. There two divisions of USA General Edwin Sumner's 2nd Corps sought to dislodge CSA General Daniel H. Hill's Georgians, Alabamians, North Carolinians, and Mississippians who were firmly entrenched in the sunken road. We walked slowly along the southern length of the road where the Federal attacks were furious, the Rebel defense courageous, and the casualties on both sides very heavy. John Wesley Mallard (Tommy King) of the 30th North Carolina, William Atkins (Jim Brandon) and Jacob Long (Richard Long), both of the 14th North Carolina, Angus and Archibald McIntyre (Jim McCallum) of the 6th Alabama, Samuel Davis McCallum and Henry Scott McCallum (Jim McCallum) of the 12th Mississippi were all engaged at Bloody Lane. Finally, the Federals succeeded in pushing the Rebels out of the sunken road. A few hundred yards behind the road, on the Piper Farm, General Hill, picking up a rifle himself and led remnants of several CSA units in a counterattack which contributed to an eventual Federal retreat back to the area of Bloody Lane.

Thus far we had visited the sites of the first two phases of McClellan's offensive battle against Lee, the Cornfield area and Bloody Lane. Now, our bus turned towards the southernmost portion of the field where McClellan's third phase attack was directed toward what became known as Burnside's Bridge.

USA General Ambrose Burnside's 9th Corps was chosen for the assault on the Confederate right at the bridge, then lightly defended by CSA General Robert Toombs' two regiments of Georgia troops. John Wesley Wilcox's (Tommy King) famed Washington Artillery was guarding Snavelly's Ford, just below the bridge. Though the Yank's initial assaults failed to take the bridge, finally the 51st Pennsylvania and the 51st New York rushed across, followed by other 9th Corps units. Soon the fighting was swirling in the fields west of Antietam Creek, and the Rebels were about to be overwhelmed by the full weight of Burnside's troops. Then, arriving from Harper's Ferry, to save the day for Lee, the Light Division of CSA General A. P. Hill pitched into the fighting. William Long (Richard Long) and his 34th North Carolina were part of this successful effort to halt the Federal onrush.

As our two-day battlefield tramp ended, everyone agreed that our Fifth Annual Spring tour was a winner! Thanks to Tommy King who conceived of and made arrangements for the weekend and to Dan Geddie who worked tirelessly to facilitate our group through planning and execution! We also appreciated the efforts of Wayne Carver, whose technological know-how saw us through the calamity of a bus breakdown. And thanks to Ed Russ who provided extra eats and a CW video for members during the long bus trip.

Let's get ready for Spring, 2000!

CIVIL WAR LETTERS AND DOCUMENTS

George Slaton

The March meeting will feature our own RT members who will reflect on collecting items about the Civil War or from the Civil War period. They will also bring numerous pieces from their collections for display.

Tom Broadfoot is the premier Civil War book dealer in America. For nearly thirty years, Tom has bought and sold the rarest books in his field. His Broadfoot Publishing Company offers the most comprehensive selection of reprints of Civil War books anywhere, including individual titles as well as the large classic sets such as the Official Records and Confederate Veteran.

Mike Budziszewski recently moved to the Wilmington area from Pittsburgh where he was active in a local Round Table. Mike has specialized for years in artifacts such as guns and swords. His partner in the Cape Fear Civil War Shop in Carolina Beach, Bennett Langley, grew up near Fort Fisher and is a longtime collector of relics of the war found in the Cape Fear area, including bullets, buckles, buttons, and artillery shells.

George Slaton has a twenty-five year interest in Civil War manuscripts such as official military field orders and original letters from both common soldiers and general officers.

Come early for refreshments at 7:00 pm, Thursday, March 11, followed by the program at 7:30 pm. The meeting will be held as usual in Elebash Hall, St. John's Episcopal Church, located at the corner of Forest Hills Drive and Park Avenue.

EXTRA RATIONS

We welcome new members, Doc Howell, Graham Phillips, Howard Rush, and Don Sloan! Our membership is now closing in on the 120 mark.

Tommy King wants to remind all of you that there are still seats available on the bus for the Antietam Battlefield tour March 25-28, so give him a call (O. 763-7318) if you would like to go. By special arrangement, the motel will keep extra rooms open for us until March 12.

The March meeting will feature another raffle for our members. Several items will be raffled, including sheets of U.S. Commemorative postage stamps from the 1961-1965 Centennial. These were donated to the RT by member, Wilbur Jones. Our February raffle raised $83.00!

PRESERVATION AND OTHER NEWS

Did you know that our RT is part of a network of about 275 RT's around the nation which are affiliated with Civil War Round Table Associates, established in 1968, and led by Jerry L. Russell of Little Rock, Arkansas? Jerry has guided the creation of many RT's, including our own Cape Fear Civil War Round Table! In 1993, the CWRT Associates celebrated its 25th Anniversary by holding its annual Congress here in Wilmington. The conference featured a work group to advise local CW buffs on establishing a RT. This work group inspired the creation of our Cape Fear CWRT just a year later in the fall of 1994. We maintain our tie to CWRT Associates through modest annual dues and we receive a newsletter on a periodic basis. The Associates sponsor an annual Congress featuring speakers and battlefield tours; this year the Congress will be held in Gettysburg with Ed Bearss and Licensed Battlefield Guides as speakers and tour guides. We'll print the details as they are announced.

Jerry Russell has been a powerful force for the preservation of America's battlefields. You can personally join CWRT Associates (12.50 regular, $20 sustaining, $50 contributing, $100 life) by contacting him at Box 7388, Little Rock, AR 72217, 501-225-3996). Also at jlrussell@civilwarbuff.com. His HERITAGEPAC sponsors preservation alerts via large mailings. Jerry always welcomes every $5 and $10 gift to help with mailing costs.

Jerry's recent Digest contained some interesting preservation news, some of which is excerpted here below.

The Brandy Station Foundation recently acquired 17 more acres on the once-doomed battlefield near Culpepper VA which in 1863 saw the largest cavalry clash in American history. The $70,000 purchase marks the first land preserved on Fleetwood Hill which was Jeb Stuart's headquarters. The Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) bought 560 acres of the battlefield in its largest acquisition of CW property and has placed another 1000 acres under historic covenant. Yet there are still areas of the field which lie unprotected. Congratulations to the Capital District CWRT in Albany NY which raised $10,000. for Brandy Station!

The non-profit Brandy Station Foundation (BSF) has been a very effective organization and deserves the support of preservationists. Contact BSF, Box 164, Brandy Station VA 22714.

Another hard-working private non-profit group is the Central Maryland Heritage League, Box 721, Middletown MD 21769. The group has helped protect more than 1200 acres of the South Mountain battlefield (which we'll visit on our Antietam tour) where many NC troops were deployed by CSA General D. H. Hill.

The Museum of the Confederacy in Richmond VA has of course for years preserved priceless records and memorabilia from the war. Its fourth annual fund-raising Tar Heel Ball, to be held March 20 at the Tredegar Iron Works Gun Foundry, will celebrate the contributions of NC to the Confederacy. Each year the Ball honors a southern state. And, by the way, the MOC has created a new exhibit called North Carolina: First...Farthest...Last which depicts its collection of NC documents and artifacts. Contact MOC, 1201 E Clay Street, Richmond VA 23219, 804-649-1861. Your membership in the MOC supports their programs.

Jerry also reminds us of two upcoming conferences which may be of interest to our members. The National Museum of Civil War Medicine, Box 470, Frederick MD 21705 will host its Seventh Annual Conference on Civil War Medicine in Shiloh TN August 6-8. They have an interesting lineup of speakers, including their keynote, Wiley Sword, the award-winning historian of books on Shiloh and Franklin. The museum invites your membership as well. Call 800-564-1864.

And the 50th Anniversary meeting of the Company of Military Historians will be held April 22-25 in Atlanta. The event will include visits to the DuBose CW Collection at the Atlanta History Center and Kennesaw National Military Park. Write: CMH, North Main Street, Westbrook CT 06498.

The Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) took the lead in getting Congress to approve $8 million in federal funds to be used to buy endangered battlefield property. Every dollar of the $8 million must be matched by $2 at the local level, creating a $24 million program to buy battlefield land in ten states. Among the sites to receive protection are Perryville KY, Bentonville and Aversboro NC, Spring Hill TN, Brandy Station, Cedar Creek and Third Winchester, in VA, Port Hudson LA, and Corinth MS.

COLLECTING THE CIVIL WAR

Shortly after the Civil War began, people, both military and civilian, began collecting its artifacts. Many surviving soldiers' letters mention sending home to family and friends items combatants had found after a battle, during the occupation of a city, or even after looting a home. Soldiers sent back captured letters and photographs, bits of enemy flags, buttons, swords, guns, and a host of other items. In the decades following the war, a number of collectors began accumulating vast numbers of artifacts. The Confederate general, George H. "Maryland" Steuart, for instance, put together perhaps the largest collection of near mint condition Confederate arms and accoutrements in existence; this collection is now housed at the Virginia Historical Society in Richmond.

In the last twenty-five years, the collecting frenzy has accelerated. Because of scarcity and rising prices, most collectors have found it necessary to concentrate on collecting in specific areas. While some collectors will focus on a particular theme such as medical, artillery, or cavalry artifacts, others will search for specific items such as canteens, spurs, certain firearms, or CSA postal history.

Many non-collectors, upon attending a Civil War collectors' show, are astounded at the abundance of original material from the war. There is a booming market among dealers, auction houses, and collectors in Civil War memorabilia. The burgeoning market in contemporary Civil War art with its vivid scenes of combat attract many enthusiasts who are interested in particular battles, regiments, or personalities.

Much of the interest in collecting Civil War items has stemmed from metal detecting which became popular in the 1950's. Relic hunters began detecting Civil War skirmish and camp sites, finding a wide range of original artifacts. As a result, many general collections of artifacts have been formed. Yet, some relic hunters, through trading with fellow collectors, look for particular items. Large collections can be formed around bullets or artillery shells, since there are hundreds of types and variations. Another popular collecting category is that of buttons and buckles; many designs and patterns were produced during the war.

Collecting Civil War guns and swords has always been popular. Premiums are paid for especially rare weapons such as the large French-made LeMat revolver, generally carried only by Confederate officers such as Jeb Stuart. Any weapon, in fact, which can be identified to a particular veteran, commands a premium. Advanced collectors pay large sums for weapons which were carried by notable officers and generals, both North and South.

The really high dollar Civil War items are regimental flags and uniforms. Officers' uniforms are highly prized, but items worn by Confederate enlisted men are extremely scarce and are likewise very desirable. In this area, as well as in most other collecting categories, Confederate material is more scarce and, consequently, more expensive than Union items.

Demand for the finer Civil War collectibles has made many artifacts so scarce that collectors in recent years have turned to items which were formerly ignored. An example is the escalation in prices, in the last decade, of GAR (Grand Army of the Republic) and UCV (United Confederate Veterans) badges and ribbons which were inscribed with the dates of various veterans' reunions during the postwar years.

Another traditional collecting area is that of Civil War books. While some collectors insist on original or first editions of regimentals or memoirs published in the late 19th and early 20th Centuries, other collectors seek to build libraries combining these rare books with more recently published works. A related area is that of manuscripts. Collectors search for original soldier letters and diaries, official military correspondence, and documents signed by Confederate and Union generals. Still another area is that of photography. Portraits in albumen, ambrotype, and tintype formats abound of Civil War soldiers.

Why is Civil War collecting so popular? Most collectors would probably say that finding or owning an artifact helps close the distance between the present day and the war years. Artifacts are a direct link to the war itself and to the combatants who struggled and died on many a field. Collectors have discovered that the items they once admired in museum cases when they were children are readily available for private ownership. Collecting, at its best, becomes yet another way of studying the Civil War, an event which still fascinates so many of us.

THE TENNESSEE STATE MUSEUM Civil War Collection

I've visited this state history museum twice in recent years and, believe me, I'll visit it again next time I'm in Nashville. It's just the finest collection and presentation of state history I've ever seen, and the Civil War collection is really outstanding, certainly the best outside of Richmond's Museum of the Confederacy. Unlike so many contemporary state museum whose minimal exhibits are centered around sometimes obscure themes, the Tennessee museum's exhibits have great depth. For instance, whereas North Carolina's history museum in Raleigh may exhibit several pieces of 19th Century silver to generally illustrate the NC silversmith's art, the Tennessee collection of silver includes pieces from every Tennessee silversmith in the state's collection; the silver exhibit is contained in its own gallery with special lighting.

The Civil War collection, in a similar way, is almost overwhelming in scope with choice Confederate items in profusion. I left the museum feeling the sensory overload I experience every time I visit the Museum of the Confederacy. Here are some of the outstanding pieces in their collection:

There's A.P. Hill's trunk, Patrick Cleburne's kepi, Nathan Bedford Forrest's two Navy Colts, Albert Sidney Johnston's capbox, Gideon Pillow's LeMat revolver, Otho French Strahl's officers' frock coat, John Adams' general officer's coat, George W. Gordon's sword, John Hunt Morgan's dress shirt, the sword that A.P. Stewart donated to the Tennessee Historical Society, the magnificent flag of the CSS Alabama, and probably the finest engraved presentation Henry rifle in existence.

The museum owns approximately fifty Confederate flags, many of which are displayed. It has a beautiful exhibit of Tennessee-manufactured Confederate swords. Then there's John Morton's College Hill sword. Morton was N.B. Forrest's artillery chief. And one of the rarest and most dramatic pieces on display is the Twelve-pounder bronze Napoleon used by Morton when he campaigned with Forrest! And there is much more.

Of particular interest to students of the Revolutionary War, the Tennessee State Museum owns the largest collection of items from the Battle of Kings Mountain aside from the National Battlepark's accumulation at the South Carolina site.

A visit to the TSM is well worth a visit of a few hours or a whole day next time you're in Nashville. It's located in downtown Nashville at 505 Deaderick Street. No admission is charged. Phone (615) 741-2692.

YELLOW JACK

February 11 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00.....Program 7:30

"I recollect well, having stood in our home on Market & Fifth Streets, watching the wagon-loads of corpses go by to Oakdale Cemetery, of those who had died of that malignant disease." Thus spoke John D. Bellamy of the 1862 yellow fever epidemic in Wilmington NC.

Our February speaker will be Dr. John R. Krohn, a retired Wilmington surgeon, who will relive these horrible times from August to November, 1862. One third of the population of our city became sick and one in ten died. Dr. Krohn will discuss the conditions which produced the epidemic, including the controversy surrounding the blockade runner Kate and will describe how Wilmington coped with this tragedy in a time before medical knowledge of viruses and disease transmission by mosquitoes.

Dr. John R. Krohn is a graduate of Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota (site of Jesse James' last bank robbery) and the University of Minnesota Medical School. Trained in plastic surgery at the Mayo Clinic, he practiced in Wilmington from 1975 to 1996. He is a student of the Battle of Gettysburg and Civil War medicine.

ORGANIZATION OF TROOPS FROM THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA 1861-1865

(If you've ever researched North Carolina Confederate soldiers or the regiments in which they served, you've probably been confused by the regimental designations. I floundered about for years with the distinction between the NC Volunteers and the NC State Troops, but Jim McCallum, who has studied NC soldiers for many years, set me straight on the designations. Indeed, Jim is one of the most meticulous Civil War researchers I know, and his account of the formation of troops in the Tarheel state, which follows, will no doubt be just as helpful to you)

North Carolina furnished eighty-four full regiments, thirteen battalions, and at least thirteen unattached companies to Confederate service. There were also listed by the Adjutant General of North Carolina 3,103 men from NC serving in regiments of other states.

Of the regiments, the 10th, 36th, and 40th were artillery and the 9th, 19th, 41st, 59th, 63rd, 65th, and 75th were cavalry regiments.

The 70th, 71st, 72nd Regiments were Junior Reserves composed of boys seventeen years of age. The 73rd, 74th, 76th, 77th, and 78th were senior reserves; men between the ages of 45 and 50. The "Reserves" were created on 17th February 1864 by the Confederate Congress. A breathing spell was given, allowing those who wished, to volunteer. The Junior Reserves were called in April and May of 1864 and the Senior Reserves were left at home until August or September to permit the harvesting of much needed crops. As they entered the army, these reserves were locally organized into companies, then sent to training centers and placed into battalions composed of three to six companies. These battalions were numbered 1st, 2nd, 3rd Junior Reserves, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th Senior Reserves. As the recruits increased, they became the regiments listed above.

Besides these, there were regiments and battalions of Home Guards composed of those exempt from Confederate service by reason of being State officers or for other reasons, who rendered active service occasionally for short periods of time at the order of the Governor. In early 1862, there was a mobilization of the Militia for a short time in various parts of the state.

In November 1864, orders came from Richmond to place in Regiments the 3,117 men who had been detailed to North Carolina for various reasons. As a result the 81st Regiment of N.C. Troops (1st Regiment Detailed Men), 82nd (2nd Detailed), and 83rd (3rd Detailed) were formed.

The NC Legislature on May 8 authorized Governor Ellis to raise ten regiments of State Troops through "an Act to raise 10,000 men to be divided into eight regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and one of artillery to serve during the present war unless sooner discharged." The governor was given the power to appoint all the commissioned officers created by the last-mentioned act. Major James G. Martin, on his arrival at Raleigh following his resignation from the US Army, was appointed Adjutant-General of this corps.

The regiments of Volunteers were formed under an act of the General Assembly, ratified May 10th, 1861 and entitled "An Act to provide for the public defense." These men were to be enlisted for twelve months and tendered to the Confederate States of America. The field officers were to be elected by the company commissioned officers who were in turn elected by the men of the individual company. The captain of the company then appointed the non-commissioned officers.

The First Volunteers (Bethel Regiment) was organized ahead of any other regiment in the state: the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th soon followed. The Bethel Regiment volunteered on April 17, 1861 and was sent to Virginia by May 21 and fought and won the first land battle of the war on June 10. The 8th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th Volunteers were organized June 15-18, 1861.

The double sets of numbers 1,2,3,4, etc. State Troops and 1,2,3,4 etc. Volunteers created confusion, especially in Richmond, where they were unable to keep up the distinction. This led to an understanding between the War Department and the NC Adjutant-General's office that the State Troops would retain the numbers 1 through 10 and the First Volunteers be numbered 11th Regiment North Carolina Troops (First Volunteers), etc. This caused some dissatisfaction at first among the volunteers, but it was short lived. There was some irregularity about the election of field officers of the 9th Volunteers, so the governor withheld the commissions. Into the vacant number was placed Spruill's Regiment, the 19th North Carolina Troops (Second Cavalry). After the irregularities were corrected, the 9th Volunteers took the next number which, at that time, was the 27th. The designation of a number and the word "Volunteers" placed parentheses after the infantry regiments was soon dropped with only the cavalry and artillery retaining such designation.

The State's Battalion designation can be even more confusing than the Regiments, in that some bore the name of their organizing officer and some were numbered. As battalions were combined, they would assume the number of the unit having the greater number of companies or be given a new designation. An example was Woodfin's Battalion with three companies originally formed in 1861. When three additional companies were added it was designated the Fourteenth Battalion. In the spring of 1865 four additional companies were added, giving it the ten companies needed for regimental status and thus the designation, Seventy-Ninth Regiment (Eighth Cavalry). The war ended before it saw action as a regiment so it never achieved wide-spread recognition.

There were twenty-five numbered Battalions in service at one time or another during the years 1861-1865. Some of these twenty-five Battalions were given official numbers and some were given unofficial numbers and officially designated by other names. I will attempt to clarify on an individual basis.

OFFICIALLY NUMBERED BATTALIONS

1st Battalion (Sharpshooters) organized in April 1862 from the 21st Regiment which had twelve companies. Continued to fight with the 21st.

2nd Battalion - composed of eight companies of infantry and fought in many of the Va. battles in Rodes Division. Organized in 1861.

3rd Battalion (Light Artillery) three batteries organized in Feb. 1862. Fought in N.C.

4th Battalion (Wright's) joined the 8th Battalion (Nethercutt's) and some independent companies to become the 66th Regiment N.C.T.

5th Battalion combined with the 7th Battalion on 3 August 1863 to become the 65th Regiment (6th Cavalry).

10th Battalion (2nd Bat. Heavy Art.) organized in 1862.

12th Battalion formed in 1862 (three cavalry companies). In July 1864 two companies transferred to the 59th Regiment (4th Cavalry) and one company to the 16th Battalion.

13th Battalion (Starr's Bat. of Artillery) composed of six batteries (companies) organized 1 December 1863.

14th Battalion - see above- Woodfin's to 14th Bat. to 79th Reg. (8th Cav.)

15th Battalion (Wynn's Cavalry) organized July 1863 and composed of six companies.

16th Battalion (Cavalry) was formed in 1864 from five companies of the 7th Confederate Cav. and three companies from the 62nd Ga. and one company from the 12th Battalion. One of the companies from the 62nd Ga. was large enough to divide into two companies, but due to administrative "foul ups" it was never designated a regiment "officially." All of these were N.C. men.

UNOFFICIALLY NUMBERED BATTALIONS

6th Battalion officially designated Armory Guards was composed of seven companies stationed in Fayetteville N.C. There was another 6th Battalion which became the 60th Regiment.

9th Battalion was officially designated the 1st N.C. Heavy Artillery organized March 25 1863 from four unattached companies which had existed since early 1862. They were stationed throughout the war in the Cape Fear area until the fall of Fort Fisher, thereafter fighting as infantry in the Battle of Bentonville. Another battalion was called the 9th Battalion (Reserves) but later designated 1st Battalion of Reserves and later as the 20th Battalion.

11th Battalion (Whitford's) became the 67th Regiment on 18 January 1864, being composed of nine infantry companies and one cavalry.

17th Battalion (Avery's) was composed of two infantry companies and one cavalry used as guards for N.C.'s western mountain passes.

18th Battalion (MacRae's) was composed of three infantry companies of two of cavalry organized in Nov. 1863 to protect the mountain areas.

19th Battalion (Mallet's or Hahr's) composed of five companies of "Light Duty Men" who acted as camp and provost guards.

21st Battalion (Erwin's Senior Reserve) organized in July 1864.

22nd (Hill's Senior Reserve) Battalion and 23rd Battalion (Littlejohn's Senior Reserves) were transferred to the Senior Reserve Regiments.

24th Battalion (Rencher's) became part of one of the Regiments of Detailed Men.

25th Battalion (Bingham's) was composed of three companies organized to protect Watauga and adjacent counties in winter of 1864-1865.

There were several other Battalions not numerically listed whose existence was soon merged into regiments. These were Singletary's Battalion which became the 27th Regiment; William T. Williams' Battalion which was raised into the 32nd Regiment; Roger's Battalion, later the 47th Regiment; and Evan's Battalion, later became the 63rd Regiment. I am sure there were others of which I am not aware.

From a military age population of 115,369, North Carolina furnished 125,000 men for the cause of the Confederacy.

EXTRA RATIONS

We extend a hearty welcome to new members Richard Bellows, Gene Bush, H.L. McConnell, and Jerry Wine! Our paid membership for the 1998-1999 year stands now at 113.

A reminder to members that we have a table at each monthly meeting featuring newsletters from other RT's across the country. Take a moment to look through them and learn more about the programs and activities our fellow RT members are enjoying. One of the best of these newsletters is The Maryland Line, published by the CWRT of Montgomery County, Maryland, and its December issue recounts the group's 1998 field trip to Gettysburg. They did a 1.2 mile Pickett-Pettigrew Charge walk from the CSA lines to the USA defenses. Carrying one of their flags was Lucas Meredith, Jr. whose father carried a flag during the actual Pickett-Pettigrew Charge in 1863 for Kemper's Brigade in Pickett's Division! Lucas is one of three known surviving children of veterans of the legendary assault. Also in attendance was Colonel Jeb Stuart IV, a direct descendent of the great cavalry commander, and Dan Paterson, great-grandson of General James Longstreet. What a day!

Our monthly raffle will return at our February meeting! Some interesting items will be available, and we encourage all our members to buy a raffle ticket ($1.00 each) or two. The raffle helps bolster our RT treasury.

THE BENTONVILLE BATTLEFIELD SYMPOSIUM March 19-21

We now have more information about the Bentonville conference which we announced in the December newsletter. The tour guide will be the legendary Ed Bearss, Chief Historian Emeritus of the National Park Service. Other conference leaders will be Mark Bradley, author of the recent book on the Battle of Bentonville, John Marszalek, the biographer of William T. Sherman, Craig Symonds, the biographer of Joe Johnston and Patrick Cleburne, John Goode, and Fred Burgess.

The conference will open on Friday, March 19, at 12 pm with presentations that afternoon. Saturday will feature walking tours of the Battles of Aversboro and Bentonville, more presentations that evening, then further walking tours on Sunday. The conference is being held on the anniversary of the 1865 battle.

Cost for the conference is $199.00. Proceeds will benefit the preservation efforts at Bentonville. Motel rates are additional. For more information, call Bentonville Battleground State Historic Site at 910-594-0789.

A PARTING SHOT

After the battle [Spotsylvania Courthouse] was over and the wounded very well cared for and night had closed around us, one of our bands began to play "The Dead March" just in the rear of the "death angle." You could hardly ever hear a man speak, and it seemed that we all wanted to shed tears of real sorrow; some that had lost relatives or dear friends did have to wipe their eyes. When our band ceased playing, one of the Union bands played "Nearer, My God, to Thee;" then our band began to play "The Bonny Blue Flag," after which the Union band played "The Star Spangled Banner;" and then our band played "Dixie Land," and the Union band finally struck up "Home, Sweet Home;" this probably brought tears rolling down many powder-blackened cheeks in both armies.

When the Union band played "The Star Spangled Banner" we could hear their soldiers huzza, and when our band struck up "Dixie" it looked like it cheered every man, and we raised a yell; but oh! how different when "Home, Sweet Home" was played.

Can anyone, either Union or Confederate, ever forget these historic times?

JAMES B. GORDON NORTH CAROLINA'S GREATEST CAVALRYMAN

January 14 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00.....Program 7:30

We welcome to the January meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table a well-known historian, author, and expert on North Carolina cavalry. Chris J. Hartley is the recent author of the highly acclaimed Stuart's Tarheels: James B. Gordon and His North Carolina Cavalry (Butternut & Blue, 1996). Chris, a graduate of the University of North Carolina, has published several articles on the war and is a frequent speaker to groups like ours. His current long-term projects include two new histories, one on the First North Carolina Cavalry and the other on USA General George Stoneman's 1865 raid in North Carolina and Southwest Virginia. Chris Hartley lives in Clemmons NC.

James Byron Gordon was born in Wilkesborough NC in 1832. He served several terms in the NC legislature. He enlisted as a private in the Wilkes Valley Guards and was later appointed major in the First NC Cavalry. His regiment was transferred to Virginia to serve in Jeb Stuart's brigade in the fall of 1861. Gordon served with great distinction in the engagements of Stuart's cavalry. After the sprawling Battle of Brandy Station, Gordon took command of the 1st NC Regiment. In September, 1863, this outstanding North Carolinian was promoted to brigadier general and led his brigade until he was mortally wounded near Richmond in May, 1864.

Jeffrey D. Wert, in the six-volume The Confederate General, describes Gordon's service in these terms: "Gordon was one of a handful of non-Virginians in Stuart's cavalry corps who had distinguished himself. At every level of command he had performed capably, with marked distinction on a few occasions. Had he lived, Gordon might have attained higher rank during the war's final months. Wade Hampton, who had replaced the fallen Stuart, knew Gordon well, and the attrition in the officer ranks offered opportunity for such solid officers as James Gordon."

Don't miss our first meeting of the New Year! Refreshments will be served at 7:00 and the program is at 7:30. As usual, you're encouraged to bring guests. Chris Hartley will have copies of his Stuart's Tarheel's available for sale and signing.

LETTERS FROM OUR MEMBERS

I'm finding Fredericksburg VA a fascinating place to live in. There are so many things to do and see plus the opportunity to get involved in preservation efforts firsthand.

Just before I moved here I joined the Rappahannock Valley CWRT. It's a great organization. They work hand in glove with the National Park Service and the Friends of the Fredericksburg Area Battlefields. All three organizations are dedicated to preserving as much of the battlefields as possible.

Speaking of research, I'm proud to announce I will be working as a volunteer with NPS historian, Noel Harrison, on a research project. The focus of the project is claims filed against the Federal and Confederate governments for damages suffered by private citizens of Fredericksburg during the battle. It's really a two part project. One part deals with tracking down the claimants and the type of damages they were seeking and the other is following up on claims that actually went into litigation.

I'm also doing the Virginia research for an author in Columbus OH who is writing a book on the Battle of Trevilian Station. I'm also working on a project of my own which the NC State Archives is interested in. There's a Confederate cemetery at Spotsylvania Court House where over 160 Tarheels are buried. My idea is to put the names of the NC soldiers together with the information found in Manarin's in a booklet form.

Last month I gave a program on the First NC Cavalry to the Loudoun County CWRT. There were about fifty members there, and they're a very knowledgeable group. My knees were knocking together so hard I was afraid they would drown out the microphone I had to wear because they tape all of their programs for a local TV station. ...I had only one moment of real panic. For the life of me I couldn't remember the word Gettysburg so I had to refer to it as the Pennsylvania Campaign. That drew a few chuckles from the crowd. All in all, I enjoyed doing the program and will probably do it for my own RT in the spring.

Best wishes to all my friends at the Cape Fear CWRT. Hope to see some of you at Antietam this spring.

-Tonia Smith

As a member of the CFCWRT and a few other organizations, I find that they are all striving toward a common goal. In brief, it is a goal of preserving history for present and future generations. They also share the common problems of recruiting new members and choosing new projects. In twenty-five years of working within volunteer organizations, I have learned three things about the recruiting and retention of new members. The most important of these is that without a constant influx of new, enthusiastic members, an organization will wither and die. Second, a new member must feel that he or she is a welcomed part of the group, free to make a contribution. Finally, it is the responsibility of officers and veteran members to ensure that the new person is introduced to the group at large. In many organizations, someone acts as a sponsor to the new member, introducing him or her to others, perhaps inviting them to sit on committees. Assuring newcomers that they are needed helps them become an active part of the group. As veteran members and officers, we should ask ourselves the following. Did the new member get whatever he should have been issued at the first meeting? Is the new member kept aware of meetings and events? If we see a member at church, work, or on the street, do we say hello?

Then there are projects to be chosen. Depending on perspective, it is either fortunate or not that there are so many things that need to be done in NC. It sometimes seems that our state has been ashamed or apathetic about its CW history. We can change that, and there is ample work to go around. Without meaning to slight the needs of the rest of the state, let me discuss my own little corner. I recently petitioned the state for a marker at the site of the Battle of Town Creek in Brunswick County. They were very kind in their rejection, saying the battle was not significant, considering that Fort Anderson had already been marked. The marker commemorating the involvement of colored troops at the Battle of Forks Road in Wilmington has been removed and not replaced for ages. While battlefields and fortifications along the Cape Fear River are in danger of the developer's bulldozer, we defenders of NC history make donations to save Virginia battlefields. Could it be that there is something amiss with our priorities.

I envision as a sort of master project a well-marked driving tour of the two routes of the Wilmington campaign. Small parcels of land, large enough for pull offs could be secured along highways where handsome story boards would be placed. Funds could be collected to buy land where battles, even small skirmishes, occurred. To assist fund-raising, the museums at Forts Fisher and Anderson could sell a map/story book and tape of the campaign to close the last major port of the Confederacy. We must hasten to work though. It is hoped that a re-enactment to rival this year's celebration at Gettysburg will be planned. What an exciting time to announce our joint project! What an excellent time to draw thousands of tourists to the largest re-enactment in Wilmington and Brunswick County history. Imagine hundreds, perhaps thousands, of re-enactors battling along both banks of the Cape Fear. Unless we act immediately, a real opportunity will slip away.

Yet another project would be to commission a full scale model of the ironclad CSS North Carolina. With recent underwater archeology studies of the vessel near Southport, enough information was gathered to build an accurate facsimile. The model could be placed near the battleship moored near the location where the ironclad was built.

BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION AT ANTIETAM

The Roulette Farm, one of the most significant pieces of Civil War battleground in private hands, was purchased September 3 and donated to the Antietam National Battlefield. The 179 acre farm, across which Union troops assaulted the Confederate defensive position in Bloody Lane, was acquired for $660,000.00 by the Richard King Mellon Foundation which turned it over to the park the same day. NPS Director, Robert Stanton said, "We can be proud of the results of this true partnership between private landowners, a private-sector group, and the federal government in the protection and preservation of this hallowed ground of the American Civil War."

The Conservation Fund acted as agents for the Mellon Foundation. Both the Conservation Fund and the Richard King Mellon Foundation have made major purchases at Antietam before. In 1991, they bought and donated to the park 320 acres of the West Woods and the Cornfield. The purchase brings the park's holdings to 1600 acres within the 4100 acre park boundary. The park holds easements on much of the land within its boundary, while 300-400 acres are still in private hands. The Roulette Farm, where 5400 Union soldiers became casualties in their effort to take Bloody Lane, will be open to the public on the battle's upcoming September 17, 1999 anniversary.

A PARTING SHOT

In the North one hears the war mentioned, in social conversation, once a month; sometimes as often as once a week; but as a distinct subject for talk, it has long ago been relieved of duty. There are sufficient reasons for this. Given a dinner company of six gentlemen today, it can easily happen that four of them - and possibly five - were not in the field at all. So the chances are four to two, or five to one, that the war will at no time during the evening become the topic of conversation; and the chances are still greater that if it become the topic it will remain so but a little while. If you add six ladies to the company, you have added six people who saw so little of the dread realities of the war that they ran out of talk concerning them years ago, and now would soon weary of the war topic if you brought it up.

The case is very different in the South. There, every man you meet was in the war; and every lady you meet saw the war. The war is the great chief topic of conversation. The interest in it is vivid and constant; the interest in other topics is fleeting. Mention of the war will wake up a dull company and set their tongues going, when nearly any other topic would fail. In the South, the war is what A.D. is elsewhere: they date from it. All day long you hear things "placed" as having happened since the waw; or du'in' the waw; or befo' the waw; or right aftah the waw; or 'bout two yeahs or five yeahs or ten yeahs befo' the waw or aftah the waw. It shows how intimately every individual was visited, in his own person, by that tremendous episode. It gives the inexperienced stranger a better idea of what a vast and comprehensive calamity invasion is than he can ever get by reading books at the fireside.

THE STORY OF LEE'S LOST ORDER The Intelligence Coup that Redirected the Course of the Civil War

December 10 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00.....Program 7:30

Wilbur D. Jones, Jr., a University of North Carolina history graduate, is an author and military historian in Wilmington NC. A retired Navy Captain, he has written numerous books and articles on military history and defense issues, specializing in World War II, the Civil War, and weapons acquisitions.

He served in political positions in the Nixon and Ford Administrations, including as assistant to President Ford, served as an assistant to two Cabinet secretaries, and two California Members of Congress. In 1996 he retired after nearly 41 consecutive years of service to the Department of Defense, the last 12 as a professor at the Defense Systems Management College, Fort Belvoir VA.

He is the author of the highly acclaimed book Gyrene: The World War II United States Marine, a study of the personal, social, and cultural life of the war's enlisted Marine; and Giants in the Cornfield: The 27th Indiana Infantry, a human interest treatise of the Union Army's common soldier. Both books are published by White Mane. Of Gyrene, General Ray Davis, USMC (Ret), writes: "This book surely will take its place in the annals of Marine Corps history and...with other landmark works of WWII."

Wilbur has written and edited two other WWII books, the memoirs of former faculty colleagues who fought on the German side, to be published in the coming months by White Mane. His book Arming the Eagle: A History of U.S. Weapons Acquisitions Since 1775, a military history of the United States, will soon be published by the Department of Defense.

In September 1997 he returned to Wilmington, his native home. He and his wife Carroll have been married 39 years. They have three adult children and have custody of their granddaughter Carrie, a freshman at Hoggard High School.

Wilbur leads WWII battlefield tours for Military Historical Tours, Inc., and lectures on military history at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. He has been an active member of the Cape Fear CWRT.

St. John's Episcopal Church is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive, on the corner of Park Avenue. Come at 7:00 pm for refreshments; the program begins at 7:30 pm.

Special Notice to members who have signed up for the Spring Bus Tour to Antietam: Plan to come at 6:30 pm for a meeting to determine the March weekend and other arrangements for the trip!

The Union Army's discovery of a copy of Confederate General Robert E. Lee's Special Orders No. 191 near Frederick, Maryland, on September 13, 1862, outlining the disposition of his thin and widespread Army of Northern Virginia, precipitated the Battle of Antietam four days later.

The revelations of the orders, called the "Lost Order" in the North and the "Lost Dispatch" in the South, prompted Union commander Major General George B. McClellan to pursue Lee's divided army and force that fateful clash from which the South never fully recovered.

The results of Union victory at Antietam reaped political consequences exceeding this bloody battlefield of the Civil War. President Abraham Lincoln used the military success to sign the Emancipation Proclamation, injecting slavery as an emotional and moral war issue. Powerful European nations eventually refused political recognition of the Confederacy and its military and economic benefits. Lee withdrew his battered forces back into Virginia, his first foray into the North a strategic failure. Antietam thus redirected the course of the war and ultimately led to the downfall of the Confederacy.

How No. 191 was lost, and who caused it to be lost, has remained one of the war's enduring mysteries, and its discovery is considered to be the war's most profound intelligence coup.

Wilbur Jones has thoroughly researched and written on the Lost Order. Members of the 27th Indiana found it, which Jones engages extensively in Giants. In the journal Civil War Regiments, Vol. 5, No. 3 (1997), Jones identifies through clever detective work the Confederate who lost it and how. He is the first historian to solve the mystery. His lecture on the Lost Order involves both its loss and its discovery.

Wilbur will give a complimentary copy of the journal article to those wishing to purchase a book at the close of the program. Both his books, Giants in the Cornfield and his Gyrene, will be available for purchase.

Symposium and Walking Tour

Bentonville Battlefield March 19-21, 1999

Join Edwin C. Bearss, author and Chief Historian Emeritus of the National Park Service; John Marszalek, author of Sherman: A Soldier's Passion for Order; Craig Symonds, author of Joseph E. Johnston: A Civil War Biography; Mark Bradley, author of Bentonville: Last Stand in the Carolinas; and others for this rare opportunity to walk the pristine fields of Bentonville, where the armies of Generals William T. Sherman and Joseph E. Johnston met one last time on March 19-21, 1865.

Long neglected by historians, the Battle of Bentonville saw 80,000 troops engaged in a fierce three-day fight that proved to be the last ditch effort to turn aside Sherman's relentless march through the Carolinas, and the war's last major offensive by Confederate forces. Bentonville is a National Historic Landmark and was ranked by the U.S. Civil War Sites Advisory Commission as number six of 384 sites in need of nationwide preservation action.

Cost of the three-day symposium and walking tour is $199.00, which includes two lunches and two dinners. All proceeds benefit the preservation of Bentonville. BATTLEFIELD PRESERVATION IN THE FAR WEST

Custer Battlefield Preservation Committee

Fascination with Colonel George Armstrong Custer's 7th Cavalry defeat by an overwhelming force of Sioux and Cheyenne warriors led by Crazy Horse and other notable chiefs in 1876 on the Little Bighorn River is nearly as intense as the national interest in the Battle of Gettysburg. In fact, these are probably the two most studied engagements of all those fought on American soil. And, of course, Custer, a hero to some and an object of disparagement to others, had notable careers in both the Civil War and in the Indian Wars which followed in the years afterwards. It seems appropriate, since many students of the Civil War are familiar with the Little Bighorn battle, to share with our members an important present opportunity to help preserve a portion of this Montana site.

The chairman of the Custer Battlefield Preservation Committee is James V. Court, a former and well-loved Superintendent of the Little Bighorn Battlefield (1978-1986). Though Jim is retired, he has remained very active in Little Bighorn affairs, leading private tours and seeking to preserve the battlefield itself. Those of you who have visited the battlefield know that only a portion of it is preserved as a national military park. Much of the battlefield property and much of the surrounding area is privately owned. These areas are threatened with development and/or a compromise of their view shed and historical integrity.

The Custer Battlefield Preservation Committee (CBPC) has, over the years, purchased 2200 acres surrounding and including the battlefield. These areas include Weir Point, Medicine Tail Coulee, Water Carrier's Ravine, and the Second Reno Crossing. Those of you who are familiar with the battle understand the significance of these areas.

Now, several hundred additional acres are available. These too are crucial areas. They include the sites of Sitting Bull's Sioux village and most of the area associated with the Valley Fight: Major Marcus Reno's skirmish lines, his fight in the timber, and his route to the bluffs where he set up his defense lines. These are areas begging for preservation. Already a portion of Reno's skirmish line where he attacked the Sioux village is obliterated by Interstate 90. Other areas available include Crazy Horse's route to Last Stand Hill. The asking price is just over one million dollars.

CBPC is asking for generous contributions to this effort to preserve the Little Bighorn battlefield. Contributions of $50. or more will entitle the donor to a Lifetime Membership in CBPC. You can contact the Custer Battlefield Preservation Committee, Box 7, Hardin MT 59034. Phone 406-665-1876, Fax 406-665-3133. Contributions are tax-deductible.

And if this facet of American history interests you, you may wish to join the Order of the Indian Wars, founded in 1979. This group is led by Jerry L. Russell who is also the national chairman of Civil War Round Table Associates. It's a spiritual descendent of the original Order which was made up primarily of actual veterans of the Indian Wars. OIW has held sixteen national assemblies with programs by historians and field tours. Write Order of the Indian Wars, Box 7401, Little Rock AR 72217. Phone 501-225-3996. Dues are $20. per year and include a newsletter.

Yet another superb organization which all Little Bighorn devotees should join is the Custer Battlefield Historical and Museum Association (CBHMA), also a non-profit group. Members receive an informative quarterly newsletter and an annual journal, Greasy Grass, (Sioux term for Little Bighorn River) which is devoted to the history of the battle. This organization maintains a huge stock of books on all aspects of the Indian Wars on the Plains at discounts to members. And it sponsors annual week-long field trips to Indian War sites. Write CBHMA, Box 902, Hardin MT 59034. Phone 406-665-2060. Dues are $12.50/year or $20/two years and $200/Life Membership.

As you know, there are great efforts underway all over the country by battlefield preservationists to preserve sites associated with American military history. They deserve our continuing interest and support.

EXTRA RATIONS

We're delighted to welcome ten more first-time members to the ranks of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table! They are: J.B. Axsom, Barbara Baker, Bernice Carver, Sandra Culbreth, Bush James, E. R. Johnston, Keith Murray, John Shawver, Bob Spencer, and Robert Stansbury.

Members were given an opportunity at the last two meetings to contribute towards the purchase of two map charts from the U.S.S. Susquehanna of Fort Fisher fame. They'll be preserved at the New Hanover Public Library. Members contributed $550.00 and the RT matched this amount with $500.00, a total of $1050.00. Thanks to all the contributors for their generosity!

At future RT meetings, look for a table featuring monthly newsletters from RT's around the country. We're currently exchanging newsletters with the Piedmont CWRT, Charlotte NC; the CWRT of North Carolina, Raleigh NC; the CWRT of Rocky Mount, Rocky Mount NC; the CWRT of Louisville, Louisville KY; CWRT of Chicago, Chicago IL; Eastern Pennsylvania CWRT, Allentown PA; and the Jackson CWRT, Jackson MS. We're requesting newsletters from several other RT's as well. Take a moment and browse through these communications and see what kind of programs and activities other RT's are enjoying.

A number of RT members attended the 18th Annual Civil War Show in Richmond, Virginia, November 20-21, sponsored jointly by the Museum of the Confederacy and the Northern Virginia Relic Hunters Association. Mike Budziszewski had a table featuring items for sale from his Cape Fear Civil War Shop in Carolina Beach. Tom Broadfoot had an extensive stock of Civil War books, including many recent issues from Broadfoot Publishing Company. Chris and Nancy Fonvielle held down the Savas Publishing Company table from which Chris sold numerous copies of his Last Rays. Prowling the aisles for original CW items were Eddie White, Albert Jewell, and George Slaton.

About twenty-five RT members have signed up for the Spring Bus Tour to Antietam and South Mountain. They are encouraged to come at 6:30 pm to the December meeting for a brief planning session. We still need to choose a weekend in March and work out some other details.

A number of our regular RT members have not yet sent in their dues for the 1998-1999 year. Please submit them at your earliest convenience! You may, of course, bring your check for $25.00 to the December meeting or mail to CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404. The member dues subsidize our dinner meetings, provide for refreshments, pay speaker expenses, and underwrite the cost of printing and mailing the monthly newsletter.

A PARTING SHOT

(No soldier, North or South, had a more discerning eye for the ironies of war, than Private Sam Watkins, 1st Tennessee Regiment, whose Co. Aytch: Or, A Side Show of the Big Show, published in Nashville TN in 1882, is perhaps the finest memoir of a common soldier in the CSA Army of Tennessee)

"Why, hello, Corporal, where did you get those two yellow stripes on your arm?"

"Why, sir, I have been promoted for gallantry on the battlefield, by picking up an orphan flag, that had been run over by a thousand fellows, and when I picked it up I did so because I thought it was pretty, and I wanted to have me a shirt made out of it."

"I could have picked up forty, had I known that," said Sloan.

"So could I, but I knew that the stragglers would pick them up."

Reader mine, the above dialogue is true in every particular. As long as I was in action, fighting for my country, there was no chance for promotion, but as soon as I fell out of ranks and picked up a forsaken and deserted flag, I was promoted for it. I felt "sorter" cheap when complimented for gallantry, and the high honor of Fourth Corporal was conferred upon me. I felt that those brave and noble fellows who had kept on in the charge were more entitled to the honor than I was, for when the ball struck me on the ankle and heel, I did not go any further. And had I only known that picking up flags entitled me to promotion, and that every flag picked up would raise me one notch higher, I would have quit fighting and gone to picking up flags and by that means I would have soon been President of the Confederate States of America.

THE CIVIL WAR IN DEPTH
A Slide Presentation by Bob Zeller
And

NINETEENTH CENTURY WILMINGTON THROUGH THE STEREOGRAPHER'S EYES
A Slide Presentation by Jonathan Noffke

St. John's Episcopal Church
Thursday, November 12
Social Hour 7:00 pm..... Program 7:30 pm

Bob Zeller is the author of the highly acclaimed The Civil War in Depth, the first 3-D photographic history of the war ever published. Many Civil War buffs have been unaware that the greatest Civil War photos were created in 3-D. The book includes a dozen Civil War photos never before published. It features the first war combat photos ever taken and includes a chapter on Abraham Lincoln in 3-D. The Civil War in Depth, which comes complete with a 3-D viewer, was published by Chronicle Books in October, 1997, and is in a fifth printing, with 60,000 copies in print. Zeller is currently at work on The Civil War in Depth, Vol. II, to be published by Chronicle in the fall of 2000.

Zeller is one of the leading private collectors of original Civil War photography. Three pieces from his collection were featured in the Smithsonian Institution's exhibition on Matthew Brady in Washington, Boston and New York in 1997 and 1998. He had his own one-man show at the Southeast Museum of Photography in Florida in 1995.

Bob Zeller is a native of Washington DC and a graduate of the University of Missouri School of Journalism. From 1976 to 1980, he was an investigative reporter at The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson, Mississippi and from 1980 to 1990 at The Press-Telegram in Long Beach, California. From 1991 to 1998, he covered the NASCAR Winston Cup series as a motorsports writer for Landmark Newspapers. He's been involved with well-received biographical studies of NASCAR drivers Mark Martin, Jeff Gordon, and Rusty Wallace. He lives in Pleasant Garden, NC.

Jonathan Noffke, the Director of the Bellamy Mansion Museum, will provide a special treat for everyone interested in Wilmington history. A number of photographers were actively recording stereoviews of Wilmington scenes in the 1870's and 1880's. Jonathan will present a slide program developed from the current exhibition of Wilmington stereoviews at the Bellamy Mansion Museum.

Members are invited to come early and socialize before the 7:30 pm program. As always, feel free to bring guests with you. Our RT programs on Civil War photography have always been popular.

! MEMBERSHIP RENEWALS AND SIGNUPS NOW DUE !

If you've not yet paid your $25.00 membership dues for the 1997-1998 year, please submit them as soon as possible. You may pay Dan Geddie, Treasurer, at the next RT meeting or mail to Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404 (note new zipcode).

ROBERT E. LEE'S CIVIL WAR Book Review

(Kemp Burbeau, who penned this review, was one of the founders of the Cape Fear CWRT. His astute comments on Lee will be appreciated by our members. Kemp, a local attorney, recently completed his M.A. in U.S. History from UNC-Wilmington. Reprinted with permission from The Civil War News)

To some commentators, Lee was a virtually infallible military genius, especially competent on the offensive, who could only be defeated by a vastly superior, well-equipped army. In Robert E. Lee's Civil War, Bevin Alexander presents Lee as a general whose tactics were still mired in the absolute Napoleonic tradition.

The Confederate commander is especially faulted for his frontal assaults at Malvern Hill, Gettysburg and the Wilderness, apparently failing to learn from comparable Northern and Southern errors such as Burnside's attack on Marye's Heights at Fredericksburg. Being a descendent of Lee, this reviewer will make a good faith effort to maintain objectivity having provided such a disclaimer of self-interest!

Alexander asserts that Jackson, not Lee, was master of the attack. Relying on Stonewall's adept use of the flank attack, Lee did well at Second Manassas and Chancellorsville. Yet without his able lieutenant, Lee uncreatively reverted to archaic frontal assaults almost doomed to failure given the odds favoring the defensive due to the deadly impact of concentrated rifle fire, artillery (especially canister and grape shot), and protective earthworks.

Alexander acknowledges Lee's skills, but says the attributes were best exhibited on the defensive, consistent with Longstreet's notions, and not on the attack as customarily believed. Alexander apparently feels Lee bled the Army of Northern Virginia with his costly frontal offensives, lacking the finesse offered by Jackson-style flanking. Nevertheless, he also criticizes Lee for not abandoning Richmond prior to being forced to do so by Grant, indicating the Confederate army could have then enjoyed offensive mobility rather than suffer the ultimate, virtually inevitable defeat entailed in trench warfare.

Despite Alexander's studied and insightful criticisms, Lee's tactics perhaps can be defended. From Malvern Hill through Pickett's Charge and the Wilderness, Lee did undertake frontal attacks. Although costly, these attacks did either force the Union armies to withdraw or at least temporarily jolted them off balance. Such tactics were consistent with the Confederate commander's not unreasonable belief that the South needed a quick victory, obtainable only by an offensive capable of dampening the Northern will to continue the war.

Lee knew a war of attrition would be difficult for the South to win, and accordingly only undertook a defensive stance in 1864-65 when compelled to do so due to limited food supplies for men and beast, and inadequate transportation.

As to criticism of his frontal charges, Lee was as competent as his contemporaries in that regard, with Sherman having his Kennesaw Mountain, Grant his Cold Harbor, and World War I generals their many comparable blood baths. Moreover, Lee should not be condemned as a bureaucratic detail general for not embracing guerilla war.

With justification, he recognized that such a black flag total fight to the death would engender generations of active hatred between the North and South, while taking untold additional lives and further devastating the Southern countryside and cities. Lee rightfully perceived that only a government relatively able to defend its territorial integrity would be acceptable to Southerners as an alternative to surrender. Unlike the Revolutionary era, by the mid-19th Century, guerrilla warfare was not an acceptable option to most Americans.

Bevin Alexander's work is a brilliant, provocative work challenging both the scholar and enthusiast to rethink the generalship of R. E. Lee. The author provides clear, insightful, well-documented discussions of Lee's campaigns. He is to be especially commended for his perception that Lee recognized that slavery was the ultimate divisive element in North/South relations and that an equitable, democratic reunion would be possible upon abolition of that odious institution.

Readers are advised to ponder this finely written, comprehensive, and controversial book. Whether readers agree or disagree with Alexander, they will surely find this bold consideration of Lee's military ability most rewarding. (Robert E. Lee's Civil War, Bevin Alexander, Adams Media, 1998)

SAVE THE SUSQUEHANNA CHARTS

At the October meeting, Chris Fonvielle spoke to the membership about the significance of the U.S.S. Susquehanna map charts which the Friends of the New Hanover County Library are currently raising money to preserve and display at the main library branch. The charts were originally used by Commodore Sylvanus W. Godon whose U.S.S. Susquehanna participated in the Union naval blockade along the coast of the Cape Fear region and saw further action in the attacks on Fort Fisher. The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has committed to match up to $500 in donations from individual RT members toward the $7000 the Friends are seeking to raise. Members' contributions are fully tax deductible and can be forwarded to Beverly Tetterton, New Hanover County Library, 210 Chestnut Street, Wilmington NC 28401.

You will have an additional opportunity to make your contribution to the Friends' campaign at our meeting on Thursday, November 12. We hope that you'll assist the Round Table in making a large contribution to save a part of Cape Fear Civil War history.

SPRING BUS TOUR TO ANTIETAM

Fifteen members have already signed up to journey by bus to Sharpsburg, Maryland in March, 1999 for a two-day tour of Antietam and nearby South Mountain battlefields! An excellent tour guide has already been engaged to lead our group. Those of you who have attended our previous spring tours know how much fun these events are. Walking the ground with a knowledgeable historian is so much more rewarding than seeing a battlefield alone. And, of course, the fellowship is an added benefit!

You must sign up for the tour by December 1, 1998! The transportation and trip details will be planned around those who sign up. The group will also select a March weekend for the trip. So don't tarry on this one. See or call Dan Geddie (H. 799-5338) for a sign-up form and register for another unforgettable spring battlefield tour.

THE BATTLE OF PICKETT'S MILL A Report from the Field

In early May, 1864 USA General William T. Sherman started his three armies - the Army of the Cumberland, the Army of the Tennessee, and the Army of the Ohio - from Chattanooga, Tennessee toward a prize goal, the important city of Atlanta. Resisting his advance was CSA General Joseph E. Johnston's Army of Tennessee. Sherman succeeded in outflanking his opponent after a series of engagements and, within a few weeks, had progressed south through north Georgia to an area just west of Marietta. Here the Dallas-New Hope-Pickett's Mill Line became the site of severe confrontation between Johnston and Sherman.

At the urging of RT members, Jim McCallum and Wayne Carver, I recently visited the battlefield at Pickett's Mill. It's a wonderful site! Acquired by the state of Georgia in the 1970's, this 765 acre historic site very closely resembles the field as it appeared in 1864. Well-marked trails lead from the visitor's center into the area where bitter fighting took place. The trails, in fact, lead the visitor chronologically through the sequence of combat from the beginning to the close of the battle. Certainly, Pickett's Mill is one of the best preserved Civil War battlefields in the country.

Hapless USA General Oliver O. Howard planned to flank the Confederate defense lines with his 4th Army Corps. Little did he know that CSA General Patrick R. Cleburne had carefully aligned his troops in two lines of entrenchments and his artillery in similarly well-conceived positions. Three furious attacks by Union troops not only failed to dislodge their foes, but resulted in 1600 casualties; CSA losses were 500. The fighting in a large ravine, featured in the walking tour, where USA General W.B. Hazen's brigade was trapped, was especially intense.

This is a gem of a battlefield an easy hour's drive northwest of Atlanta! Contact Pickett's Mill Battlefield State Historic Site, 2640 Mt. Tabor Road, Dallas GA 30132, 770-443-7850.

A PARTING SHOT

Ralph Geoffrey Newman
1911-1998

(The Civil War community recently sustained a great loss in the death of Ralph Newman, for he was the founder of The Civil War Round Table movement. It was Ralph Newman who invited a few friends to gather at his Abraham Lincoln Bookshop in downtown Chicago on December 5, 1940, to start a Civil War discussion group which later evolved into The Civil War Round Table of Chicago, whose members we joined on the battleship last May. Now, there are nearly 300 Round Tables across the country! Unfortunately Mr. Newman, because of a serious illness, was unable to accompany his friends to Wilmington for that recent field trip.

Ralph Newman was an internationally known rare book and manuscript dealer as well as an accomplished Lincoln scholar. He appraised the papers of six U.S. presidents. The Pulitzer Prize-winning historian, Mark Neely, once said, "He has been at the hub of Lincoln interest for over five decades." Ralph Newman led a varied and productive life, as the following excerpts from his memorial service on August 2, 1998 reflect)

Eulogy by Dr. John Y. Simon

I knew Ralph Newman for more than half a century, and he never ceased to amaze me. He was an American original, a self-made man, and a public relations master. His fabulous career defied imagination...and one had to know him to believe in his reality.

Like many other bookmen, Ralph Newman drifted into business by chance. After graduating from high school in 1929, he attended Crane College for one year without finding anything there that interested him, then worked in a downtown bank until he discovered that nobody missed him when he left one afternoon to watch a baseball game. One year at Northwestern University provided little beyond two free summers to play minor league second base for Tucson and Wichita.

Returning to Chicago, he stumbled across an old, well-stocked bookstore that had succumbed to the Depression and was for sale cheap. He approached friends in the bank for money to buy it, but could get the money at usurious interest only on condition that he apply all receipts to the loan until it was repaid. Newman immediately slashed prices so drastically that rival booksellers staggered out of his shop with armloads of books and crocodile tears for the young man's ignorance. In a few weeks, however, Newman had repaid his loan and still had eighty percent of his stock.

With $500 of additional borrowed capital, Newman opened his own bookshop in 1933 on Lincoln's birthday in the Chicago Daily News building. The date was coincidental; Newman planned to sell a general line of second-hand books. The course of the enterprise was altered, however, by two employees of the Daily News who became regular customers: Carl Sandburg and Lloyd Lewis. Sandburg had already published the first two volumes of his Lincoln biography and was preparing four more; Lewis, author of Myths After Lincoln and a biography of Sherman, was beginning to focus on General Grant. Newman added Lincoln and Civil War stock to accommodate them and attracted more Civil War customers. In 1940, he abandoned his general line and renamed his enterprise the Abraham Lincoln Bookshop. As the shop became more specialized, it took on the characteristics of a club of Civil War enthusiasts. In 1940, these bibulous bibliophiles organized The Civil War Round Table. So loyal were Newman's customers that they ran his shop for him while he served in the Navy during World War II.

...Some people came as tourists to visit the only bookshop included in a guide to Civil War sites. Old friends came to socialize, prompting the frequent lament, "I ought to sell drinks and give books away." Genuine customers, sometimes dismayed that books bore no prices, waited until the boss reluctantly assigned one. If those prices caused dismay, the boss intoned that "It'll never get cheaper," a prediction verified by time.

In 1962, Newman joined Civil War Centennial cronies in founding a Ulysses S. Grant Association, co-signing a bank note for initial funding. For 28 years he served as the Grant Association's president, and all its publications are a credit to his steadfast patronage of history. He brought vigorous, resourceful, and imaginative leadership to each of his historical activities. Those skills gave him an honored place on the dais at many gatherings where, during after-dinner speeches, he habitually fell asleep and never missed anything important.

As his hearing worsened, Mr. Newman developed a disconcerting habit of ending telephone conversations by hanging up the phone without saying goodbye or giving others that chance. We have met here today to say goodbye.

Remarks by James Nethery, President, The Civil War Round Table of Chicago

I'm the new kid on the block. I discovered the Civil War and Ralph Newman only about ten years ago, and I became president of The Civil War Round Table about a month ago. So I am the new kid on the block and the smart thing for the new kid to do is to talk with those who have been there before. So I talked with some of the past presidents to see what the Round Table should do. I thought we might say thanks to Ralph for the many things he has done for the Round Table, beginning with its creation 58 years ago; I thought we might say thanks for sharing his knowledge with us. I can tell you that one of the first things I did after joining the Round Table was to take a tour, led by Ralph, of the Lincoln sites in Springfield and for me that was truly a memorable occasion.

But then I talked with Joe Wiseheart, one of our past presidents, who said, "Yeah, you could say all that, but what Ralph gave me was some of the best friends I have." I thought that was right on the mark. Ralph gave us each other, the members of The Civil War Round Table. So for all those things, and especially for that - for giving us each other - for creating the Round Table family, on behalf of the more than 400 members of The Civil War Round Table of Chicago, I say, "Thank you, Ralph."

Dinner 7:00pm & Program 7:30pm

! Reservations Required By October 5 !

We're very fortunate to have as the guest speaker for our annual special October meeting Kent Masterson Brown, a leading light in Civil War scholarship. Kent received his J.D. from Washington & Lee University School of Law in 1974. He has been active in Civil War affairs for many years. He is a founder and president of the Perryville Battlefield Preservation Association, the past chairman of the Gettysburg National Military Park Advisory Commission, and the Director of the American Civil War Institute of Campbellsville University. Kent hosts an annual seminar at Gettysburg for the Civil War Education Association. His Cushing of Gettysburg established him as a foremost authority on the Battle of Gettysburg. His forthcoming book, Lee's Retreat from Gettysburg, is eagerly awaited by the Civil War community. It promises to be a groundbreaking study of this little researched, but extremely important final phase of the Gettysburg Campaign.

Kent's program will follow a delicious catered full dinner featuring chicken as the entre. The cost is $10.00 per person, payable at the door Thursday evening. Make reservations by calling the offices of Hanover Iron Works, 763-7318, and leaving your name with the secretary or, on the weekend, with Tommy King's voice mail. Deadline for reservations is Monday, October 5, at 12:00 noon. The RT is on the line for an accurate count.

First Presbyterian Church is located downtown at Third and Orange Streets just down, appropriately enough, from the Confederate monument! The church parking lot is accessible most easily from Third Street or also from Fourth Street through Carriage Lane. Additional parking is available along Third Street. Enter the church through the office annex adjacent to the church parking lot, then take the elevator to Gilmour Hall on the second floor.

If you've not yet paid your $25.00 membership dues for the 1997-1998 year, please submit them as soon as possible. You may pay Dan Geddie, Treasurer, at the next RT meeting or mail to Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28404 (note new zipcode). SAVE THE SUSQUEHANNA CHARTS

The Friends of New Hanover County Library need our help to save two important Cape Fear Civil War artifacts. The Friends have committed to purchase a huge battle chart of the 1864-1865 attacks on Fort Fisher and an 1864 blockade disposition chart of the Cape Fear from a local publisher and rare books dealer. Both of the charts were used by Commodore Sylvanus W. Godon of the U.S.S. Susquehanna, which served in the Cape Fear blockading squadron and saw action in the naval attacks on Fort Fisher. These extremely rare items are currently on display in the local history room of the library's main branch. The Friends need to raise $7,000 to finalize the deal, and the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has offered to match up to $500 in donations from its members. Monetary contributions are tax deductible and should be made out to the Friends of the New Hanover Library. Please send to the attention of Beverly Tetterton, 210 Chestnut Street, Wilmington NC 28401, or bring your check to the Cape Fear Round Table meeting on October 8. The Friends will host a reception for donors. A fuller description of the charts is on the following page.

EXTRA RATIONS

We had a very strong turnout for the September meeting and program on blockade running. There were 84 members and visitors in attendance. It's shaping up to be another great year! We will probably continue to use St. John's Episcopal Church primarily for our monthly meetings as the space is good for a social hour and refreshments.

Many of you are still talking about the May meeting on the battleship with our new friends from the CWRT of Chicago! The Chicagoans were amazed at the turnout from our RT; some said that, in light of their experience with joint RT meetings, they were expecting 15-20 of our members. But there were 75 of you on hand that evening!

A word about the newsletter. We do the best we can in getting it out to members promptly. However, sometimes between the printer, the mailing service, and the post office, a mistake or delay results. We try to consistently send out the newsletter on the Wednesday a week before the meeting, thereby insuring that you receive it on Thursday or Friday. If you haven't received your newsletter by Friday, or Saturday (a week ahead) at the latest, call one of us on the steering committee. If your copy of the newsletter gets lost, we'll try to send you a replacement.

Our spring bus tour to Antietam will be held in March. The steering committee has decided to change our strategy on planning the tour this year. Instead of reserving a large bus and then trying to fill the seats, we're asking you to sign up for the tour by December 1. Then, those of us who've signed up will plan the tour in more detail. We'll plan transportation to reflect the number who have committed to go. More on this in the November newsletter.

Most of you have probably received a flyer regarding the 1998 North Carolina: The Civil War Connection Conference sponsored by the NC Civil War Tourism Council to be held in New Bern November 6-8. A number of our members enjoyed last year's conference here in Wilmington. Once again, the conference will feature a great line-up of speakers and bus tours to sites such as the Battle of New Bern and the Battle of Wyse Forks, as well as visits to the CSS Neuse, Fort Branch, and Fort Macon. The keynote speaker on Saturday evening is James I. Robertson, author of the superb new Stonewall Jackson biography. Registration deadline is October 9. Call 919-788-9643 for more information.

Wilbur Jones, a member of the RT and the author of both a CW regimental history and a WWII account of US Marines is currently researching Wilmington during the 1941-45 wartime period. He's trying to contact veterans who were stationed in and around Wilmington during the Second World War. If you can provide Wilbur with names of veterans, contact him at 793-6393.

A hearty welcome to our eleven new members! They are Jim Hash, Clayton Callaway, Harold Pearman, Darrell Mack, Phil Smith, Brian Autry, Darryl Bruestle, Will Jones, Bill Purdom, James Steadman, and Richard Triebe.

U.S. NAVY'S PLAN OF ATTACK ON FORT FISHER, JANUARY 12-15, 1865

A large 43" x 29 1/2" printed and hand-drawn chart on heavy stock paper showing the U.S. Navy's plan of attack on Fort Fisher, North Carolina, January 12-15, 1865. Matted with archival acid-free matting, handsome gold-leaf frame.

Fort Fisher was the Confederacy's most powerful seacoast fortification, and the main guardian of Wilmington, North Carolina. Wilmington was the most popular blockade running seaport, and by the summer of 1864, the Confederacy's last major port still open to maritime trade with the outside world. Fort Fisher protected New Inlet, the northeast passageway into the Cape Fear River used by blockade runners.

Fort Fisher's mile-long-line of artillery batteries mounted forty-seven heavy seacoast guns. So immense and strong was the earthen fort that both Union and Confederate officers deemed it virtually impregnable. They called it the "Gibraltar of the South."

The Federals attacked Fort Fisher twice with all the military might they could muster in an effort to close Wilmington to blockade running. In the largest naval bombardment of the Civil War, sixty-five warships commanded by Rear Admiral David D. Porter spent Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, 1864, shelling the huge fort. They fired more than 20,000 shot and shell at the defenses. But an army support force, led by the controversial Major General Benjamin F. Butler, declined to follow-up the navy's efforts. After a landing party reconnoitered the fort, General Butler concluded that it had not been damaged enough to warrant a land assault. He aborted the expedition.

General Grant quickly renewed the attack, replacing Butler with Major General Alfred H. Terry and increasing the land force. Admiral Porter intensified his bombardment of Fort Fisher between January 12-15, 1865, finally driving the overwhelmed defenders into underground bombproofs. On the afternoon of January 15, 5,000 Union soldiers and 2,200 sailors and marines attacked Fort Fisher. After five and a half hours of hand-to-hand combat with the vastly outnumbered defenders, the Union ground forces captured the fort. Six weeks later Wilmington fell.

Admiral Porter gave each of his gunboat commanders a plan of attack showing battle stations for their respective ships and lines of fire on the fort's batteries. This chart came from the U.S.S. Susquehanna, and was most likely used by Commodore Sylvanus W. Godon, commander of the side-wheel frigate and the Fourth Division of the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron. Susquehanna is marked four times on the reverse of the chart, once in ink and the remainder in pencil. Marked in ink also are battle stations and line-of-fire for each warship, comprising three main lines plus a division of reserve vessels.

Sixty-six vessels are also marked on the chart, though it is now clear that not all of them participated in the bombardment. Some of the gunboats had been crippled in the first attack, and were undergoing repairs elsewhere when the second battle occurred. The chart also includes adjustments made to the original plan, perhaps indicating what Commodore Godon believed to be the final positions of the gunboats.

The chart mistakenly notes Fort Fisher as being an enclosed four-sided earthwork flanked by a line of batteries and rifle pits along the shoreline. Only when the fort was captured did the Federals discover that it was just a two-sided work, and from a birds-eye view looked like the number 7. Someone, perhaps Godon, roughly penciled-in the land face batteries on the chart after examining the fort.

Overall the chart is in good condition, the paper having browned slightly with age. There are tiny nicks along the edges, minor foxing in places, minimal moisture stains, and four tears. Two 12" tears—one from left to right and another from right to left—as well as a 3 1/2" tear on the left border have been professionally repaired with acid-free tape, one tear retains the old tape.

A handsome and important battle plan. We find no record of another such as this.

U.S. NAVY BLOCKADE DISPOSITION CHART OF CAPE FEAR, NORTH CAROLINA

A 22" x 26 1/2" partially printed partial manuscript chart on heavy stock paper showing deployment stations for Union gunboats "on the blockade" at Cape Fear, N.C.

Wilmington was the Confederacy's last major seaport open to trade with Europe during the Civil War. For more than three years the U.S. Navy had been unable to stop blockade running ships carrying military products and civilian goods so vital to the South's war effort from making their way into Wilmington.

Then, on October 12, 1864, Rear Admiral David D. Porter was assigned to command the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron, with orders to capture Wilmington. While the navy and army planned an amphibious attack, Admiral Porter strengthened the blockade of Wilmington in an all-out attempt to close the port to blockade running.

This chart of Porter's disposition plan, showing the stations of blockaders from Cape Lookout to Shallotte Inlet just south of Cape Fear. The chart notes a heavy concentration of bar-tenders at Old Inlet and New Inlet, the two passageways into the Cape Fear River and Wilmington's harbor. Chase vessels comprised the second line of the dragnet, while cruisers watched the shipping lanes further out to sea. Of the forty-six blockaders noted on the chart, all but eight of them would later participate in the attacks on Fort Fisher, the key to Wilmington's defenses.

The unpublished chart is slightly soiled, has minor moisture stains and two tears which have been professionally repaired. Condition is fine overall, and its rarity makes it a most desirable item. We find no record of another chart such as this one. Acid-free mat, handsome gold leaf frame.

A PARTING SHOT

(David Holt, a private in the 16th Mississippi Regiment, CSA, came from a wealthy plantation family near Woodville. He served through the entire war, later fathered ten children, became a priest in the Episcopal Church, moved to California and Florida, and died in 1925. His A Mississippi Rebel in the Army of Northern Virginia: The Civil War Memoirs of Private David Holt, from which this excerpt is taken, was published by Louisiana State University Press in 1995. The following incident took place in May, 1864, a few days after the Battle of Spotsylvania Courthouse)

A Yankee sharpshooter ventured out into the field to pick off a Johnnie. I being the man he was looking for. He crept from bush to bush until he had gotten about thirty steps from me. I was flat on the ground and the bush was between us. He raised up a little with his gun pointed and moved around to get a better view, thereby exposing himself to Tommy on my right. Tommy fired and the Yank fell. There were many shots fired by the Yanks in response for a few minutes.

Then the firing ceased, and we heard the wounded Yank say in a feeble voice, "Oh, for the sake of God, come to me! Come quick, please come."

"Captain," said Tommy, "let me crawl out to him. I shot him."

The captain gave consent. Tommy pulled off his accoutrements, laid down his gun and crawled out to the Yank. They were so close that I heard every word spoken.

"What can I do for you?" Tommy said in a low voice.

"Put your hand into the breast pocket of my jacket and get out the daguerreotype of my wife and child and hold it before my eyes," answered the Yank in a weak voice.

As Tommy complied with his request and held the picture for the dying man to see, we plainly heard the Yank sob, "My darlings, Oh, my darlings! It's hard to leave you." Then he said to Tommy, "My sight is failing and I am dying. I want you to promise me man to man that you will send this picture back to her. The address is on some letters that you can take off of my body, and I give you all my belongings and money. Tell her that I died gazing fondly on her dear face, and her name was on my lips." Then he said, "Mary," and died. Tommy took all his possessions and crawled back.

It was very pathetic, and I found tears in my eyes. After all we were Americans and brothers. Underneath all the sectional hatred and political strife was the broad foundation of blood relation. To get through the accumulated super strata that had been piled on by ambition and selfishness and reach the living bedrock, it required a death scene and a pathos that could touch the heart. The death scene of our Saviour draws all men unto Him and to one another. It is the one place where strife is forgotten and the love of brotherhood is supreme.

Tommy laid on the ground and cried like a baby. He seemed to be struck with horror at the idea of war and bloodshed.

"Damn war and shooting your brother man," he said. "It never came from God and can't be justified. I had no quarrel with that fellow. Why couldn't he stay in ranks where he belonged and not come trying to pick off a Reb, as though he had a personal grudge."

"Tommy," spoke up another, "he would have settled Dave Holt's hash if you hadn't got him. You can go North after the war and marry the widow. She will sure marry some fellow; she is too pretty to stay single. Then you can show your good feelings by raising his baby."

Which made Tommy mad, and he said some things that are not heard in the best society. He placed the letters together with the picture in the oilcloth case that the Yank carried, and he would not let any of us read the letters, saying they were sacred. To Tommy that package became a heavy burden, weighing on his heart. In the siege of Petersburg, when we got to exchanging coffee and tobacco and swapping papers, Tommy got in touch with the Yank's command and sent back everything the Yank had, to every cent of his money.

BLOCKADE RUNNING DURING THE CIVIL WAR

September 10 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church
Social Hour 7:00-7:30 pm
Program 7:30 pm

The first meeting of the 1998-1999 year of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will feature blockade running, a topic of great interest to many of our members. And we are fortunate to have as our guest speaker, Stephen R. Wise, Ph.D., the leading authority on the Confederacy's use of blockade runners!

Throughout the Civil War, the Confederacy was forced to sustain its armies through the use of innovative steam-propelled blockade runners. Dr. Wise will provide an overview of the extensive supply system that allowed the Confederacy to wage a successful war effort. Not only was blockade running vital to the South's war effort, but it also provided the nation with a folklore that centered around daredevil captains, brave men, and fearless crews. The talk will cover the individuals involved in blockade running, the specialized vessels, how the system was financed and what it did to support the South. Special emphasis will be placed on Wilmington and its position as the Confederacy's primary blockade running port.

Dr. Stephen R. Wise, an historian who lives in Beaufort, SC, is the director of the museum at Parris Island SC, and the Cultural Resource Manager for the Marine Corps Recruit Depot located at Parris Island. A native of Toledo, Ohio, Dr. Wise received his bachelors degree from Wittenberg University and his masters degree from Bowling Green State University. Drawn to the University of South Carolina to study under the direction of the late Thomas L. Connelly, a noted author and CW historian, Wise earned his doctoral degree in 1983.

Dr. Wise's first book, Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War, was highly acclaimed as a comprehensive account of the Confederate effort to deliver supplies through the northern blockade. A second book entitled Gate of Hell: The Campaign for Charleston Harbor 1863, which covers the 1863 campaign that found northern troops battling on Morris Island for the control of Charleston harbor, was published by the University of South Carolina Press in June, 1994. Gate of Hell was given an award by the South Carolina Historical Society as the best book written in 1994 on South Carolina history. A future work will feature photographs of Beaufort, SC during the Civil War.

A well-known lecturer, Dr. Wise has been the featured speaker on Cunard passenger liners and Windspirit cruises. He has appeared on the Arts and Entertainment Channel as a featured speaker for the television show Civil War Journal and in various South Carolina Education Television productions. In 1996, he received the Daughters of the American Revolution History Medal for his service in promoting the history of the United States. Dr. Wise also teaches history as an adjunct professor at the Beaufort campus of the University of South Carolina and serves on the board of the Historic Beaufort Foundation and the South Carolina Battlefield Preservation Trust. He is also active in Civil War Round Tables and local historical societies.

PAMPLIN PARK CIVIL WAR SITE Petersburg Campaign

On April 2, 1865, USA General Ulysses Grant, encouraged by the Confederate debacle the day before at Five Forks, ordered his entire army forward against the Southern defenses around Petersburg. The huge attack, signaled by the Union commander's momentous words to his staff, "I have ordered a general assault along the lines for tomorrow morning," was the culmination of the ten month siege of the beleaguered city. Grant directed General Horatio Wright's VI Corps to attack the Confederates south of Petersburg in an area defended by CSA General Samuel McGowan's South Carolina brigade. The 4:00 am assault overwhelmed the Southerners, creating a gap in their lines which was later exploited by USA General John Gibbon's XXIV Corps which in turn overran the heroic Confederates at nearby Fort Gregg.

The area of Wright's initial breakthrough is today preserved as Pamplin Park, a privately owned site. The Pamplin Foundation has created an interpretive center with a small, but superb, museum, reconstructed CSA winter quarters, and left intact the extensive CSA trench lines. Tudor Hall, the HQ of General McGowan is also open to the public. A series of trails and interpretive markers lead visitors through the battlefield. The park, ably directed by A. Wilson Greene, the founding president of APCWS, will soon feature an expanded Museum of the Common Soldier, one of the first of its kind.

CONFEDERATES IN THE ATTIC: Dispatches From the Unfinished Civil War Book Review

Run, don't walk, to the nearest bookstore or to the library for a copy of this recently published book on the Civil War, one which defies any easy categorization! Authored by Tony Horwitz, a Pulitzer Prize winner, it's both a moving and entertaining account of an experienced journalist's travels through the South and his encounters with a variety of most interesting people who pursue an all-consuming interest in the old Confederacy and its traditions. Horwitz meets and interviews a host of colorful characters, from a "super hardcore" reenactor who is always searching for another "period rush" to that fascinating embodiment of the Old South himself, author Shelby Foote. I guarantee that, once you start reading it, you won't be able to put this book down and when you do, you'll be planning a jaunt to some Civil War battlefield the very next weekend. Horwitz maintains an objective, though sympathetic stance towards everyone he interviews, yet leaving the reader with the distinct impression that the author is as hooked on the Civil War as all the rest of us. It confirmed for me that it's OK to be at least a little crazy about this compelling subject! (Pantheon, 1998).

CONFEDERATE MUSEUM EXHIBIT Wilmington Light Infantry Bazaar, 1893

(The following news item from The Wilmington Messenger, May 16, 1893, comes to us courtesy of the Bill Reaves Collection, New Hanover Public Library. The Wilmington Light Infantry was a pre-war unit which entered the Confederate service and continued its existence long after the war. The article's highlights are reproduced below).

The grand military bazaar of the Wilmington Light Infantry opened last night at the Champion Compress under the auspices of the Wilmington Light Infantry. The spacious hall was ablaze with electric lights, Chinese lanterns, lamps, etc., and was resplendent with gorgeous decorations and beautifully arranged booths. The most interesting and instructive feature of the whole fair is the CONFEDERATE MUSEUM under charge of Mrs. Gaston Meares...and the ladies of the Memorial Association. Miss Minnie Brown as the "Daughter of the Regiment," was dressed in a suit of Confederate Gray and carries war relics in the way of canteens, etc. Among the most interesting exhibits are:

The bullet-riddled battle flag of the Third North Carolina Regiment - A bullet which wounded Colonel William Lord DeRosset and a Colt's revolver captured from a Yankee soldier by Colonel DeRosset - Colonel Cantwell's ante bellum uniform worn by the WLI - A portrait of General Whiting, the table on which he wrote his orders, his sword, spurs, cane, field glass, etc. - The musket which was presented to the WLI by Mr. H. Walters of Baltimore. This gun is described by the following which is engraved on a plate on the butt: "This gun drew the first blood of the war, in Baltimore, April 19th, 1861. A soldier of the Sixth Massachusetts shot and killed with it Phillip Thomas Miles, 19 years old. It was buried four years in a cellar of W.T. Walters & Co., 68 Exchange Place, Baltimore, Md." This gun is a curiosity - Photographs of President Davis and a Medal for his service in promoting the history of the Confederacy - First also teaches history as an adjunct professor at the Beaufort campus of the University of South Carolina and serves on the board of the Historic Beaufort Foundation and the South Carolina Battlefield Preservation Trust. He is also active in Civil War Round Tables and local historical societies.

THE CHICAGO CIVIL WAR ROUND TABLE

Founded 1940

The Chicago Civil War Round Table, founded 58 years ago, was the first of well over 200 Civil War Round Tables now meeting regularly in this country and around the world. Its current membership is well over 400, the only requirement being a genuine interest in the American Civil War. Activities include ten monthly dinner meetings which feature prominent guest speakers, annual tours to Civil War battlefields and associated sites, the publication of a monthly newsletter, and other programs of interest to its members. Distinguished guest speakers have included: Edwin C. Bearss, Douglas Southall Freeman, James I. Robertson, Robert K. Krick, James McPherson, Wiley Sword, Gary Gallagher, Shelby Foote, William C. Davis, Alan Nolan, and many others. Mark Bradley and Chris Fonvielle were guest speakers in 1997. It is considered a distinct honor for any Civil War historian to be invited to address the Chicago Round Table.

The Civil War Round Table movement began in 1940 when Ralph G. Newman, proprietor of the Abraham Lincoln Book Shop in Chicago began hosting lunches where his customers discussed Civil War topics. By December, 1940, the impromptu lunches had become so popular that Newman and twelve friends decided to hold regular monthly dinners. Each dinner featured a presentation by a RT member or a guest historian. "Worldwide, there's a fascination with the Civil War that just won't go away. People who appreciate military history realize that it was the last old-fashioned war and the first modern war, and they were fought simultaneously," said Newman recently.

The Round Table was formally established on the evening of December 3, 1940 when members gathered at the Bismarck Hotel in Chicago. The Chicago Tribune, under the impression that sixteen Civil War veterans would meet there for the evening, sent a reporter and a photographer! The first meeting featured a program on Stonewall Jackson's Valley Campaign by Percival G. Hart, a founder of the RT.

One of the Chicago RT's first field tours was to Richmond, Virginia in 1953 where members were invited to the home of Douglas Southall Freeman, the great Lee biographer and ANV historian. Dr. Freeman, though himself a teetotler, directed his servants to serve mint juleps to his visitors from the North. Freeman gave what proved to be his last speech; it focused on the reliability of witnesses and writers on the Civil War, as well as the task of the historian. Five weeks later, Freeman died, and Elmer Gortz, a well-known Chicago attorney and civic leader attended the funeral as a representative of the Round Table.

Annual tours began in 1951, the first to Nashville, Franklin, Stones River, and Chickamauga! In the early days, RT members traveled by railroad in private cars. Member Elmer Gordon, then general passenger agent for the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad, made the arrangements. A later tour had the use of the Chicago White Sox plane.

A 50th Anniversary celebration was held in October, 1990. The banquet honored the two surviving founders, Ralph Newman and Elmer Gortz. A symposium included presentations by James Robertson, Robert K. Krick, Jerry Russell, and Ed Bearss. Another banquet featured an address by James McPherson.

Recently, the RT honored Shelby Foote with its Nevins-Freeman Award. The much-admired novelist and author of The Civil War: A Narrative had addressed the RT in 1963, 1968, and 1974. "Shelby Foote is living proof that history is too interesting to be left to the historians," Newman said in introducing Foote to a record Round Table crowd of 460 at the award dinner.

The Chicago RT also has its own published history! Barbara Hughett, a Lincoln scholar, authored The Civil War Round Table: Fifty Years of Scholarship and Fellowship in 1990. The book includes biographies of the founders, information on meeting places, awards, publications, speakers, and field trips. An important contribution to Civil War cultural history, this account provides considerable insight into how 20th Century Americans have studied and memorialized the Civil War. Barbara also serves as Editor of the monthly newsletter.

It is indeed an honor for the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table to spend an evening with such a splendid group of fellow CW enthusiasts as the Chicago Civil War Round Table! The evening will become a memorable part of our own history as a Round Table.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF CIVIL WAR SITES

Quarterly Magazine Hallowed Ground

APCWS just published Volume One, Number One of its sumptuous new magazine, Hallowed Ground. James McPherson, a former vice-chairman of APCWS, penned a lead article about the importance of preserving Civil War battlefields. Other extensive articles by Clark B. Hall and Dan Beattie focus on the Battle of Brandy Station, the largest cavalry engagement on the North American continent. APCWS has put together a $6.2 million package to preserve forever 1,543 acres of the field at Brandy Station.

The inside rear cover features a recent photograph of the forlorn monument to Colonel George W. Gowan of the 48th Pennsylvania, located on Crater Road in Petersburg, Virginia. The monument is completely surrounded by asphalt and the sprawl of urban development. It's a reminder of what we will lose unless we make battlefield preservation a priority.

As Jerry Russell, the Chairman of Civil War Round Table Associates, has often said, "We who study must also strive to save."

You can join the nearly 12,000 members of this superb organization by sending a $30.00 basic annual membership to APCWS, Suite 200, 11 Public Square, Hagerstown, MD 21740. Phone (888) 606-1400.

A PARTING SHOT

This feature of our monthly newsletter is usually a light-hearted anecdote about the Civil War. Let's close the RT year and honor Memorial Day with a thoughtful and sobering excerpt from a 1997 Memorial Day speech at Fredericksburg, Virginia National Cemetery. James Pates, city attorney for Fredericksburg, is vice president of Central Virginia Battlefields Trust, the recipient of our recent $1000.00 gift by members of the RT. He generously gave us permission to quote extensively from his very moving speech which follows.

This cemetery was created in 1866 - just one year after the war - largely because of outraged Northerners who came here after the war, looking for their lost relations. What they found was desecration of the dead, utter devastation and resentment. They learned that the ground in front of Marye's Heights, where thousands of Union soldiers had died, was about to be turned into a fairground. They wrote to Congress and demanded that the government seize the hill and protect the memory of their loved ones. As one visitor wrote, "The Mayor and Council are all disloyal and will consent to and encourage any act calculated to disgrace the remains of our brave soldiers."

The quartermaster of the Army soon did seize this hill, disinterred hundreds of bodies buried in a mass grave along Kenmore Avenue, dismantled two other temporary cemeteries in Spotsylvania, and moved the bodies from there and from the City Cemetery to this hilltop, which thousands of Union soldiers had died trying to reach. The following year, Congress formally authorized the creation of this and other national military cemeteries. By 1873, the cemetery that you see here today had largely taken shape. A high wall had been constructed to keep out pigs (and, presumably, disloyal residents), the bodies had all been reinterred, the terraces re-established, and the headstones erected.

By the 1890's, some of the most bitter animosities between North and South had begun to fade, and veterans, nearing the end of their lives, longed to commemorate their dead comrades (and themselves). A host of Civil War monuments began to dot the landscape. On May 25, 1900, the cornerstone of the large monument at the foot of this hill was laid, commemorating the U.S. Army Fifth Corps and donated by its commander, Gen. Daniel Butterfield. The ceremony attracted national attention, not because of the dignitaries in attendance, which included President McKinley, but because it took place at the 31st annual reunion of the Army of the Potomac, the first reunion of that group ever held south of the Mason-Dixon Line. Thus, that ceremony and that memorial represented a significant shift in attitudes between North and South and how this community remembered the war.

At about the same time, a separate movement was initiated, again in part by local residents, to create a new memorial here, a national campaign to create a park for the four battlefields. Thirty years later, in 1927, the Fredericksburg & Spotsylvania National Military Park was finally established.

There is no question but that today, another Great Awakening of battlefield preservation is taking place, both nationally and here in Virginia. And it is fitting that part of this movement should be taking place on this hilltop.

But why is it happening? Why now?

Doubtless there are many reasons for this reawakening, but I am convinced that part of the reason lies in the peculiar history of this area and within our own personal histories. For many years, this region was so devastated by the war that most local residents considered it something best forgotten. Only recently have we sufficiently recovered enough economically that battlefield preservation can be a luxury we can now afford.

But for those of us who grew up here, this prosperity carries with it a certain poignancy. Every day, we can see our past - our collective memories - destroyed before our very eyes, as one battlefield after another gives way to shopping centers and parking lots. Just as those Northern visitors were outraged that a fairground could be placed on top of their dead kinsmen's graves, so now we too are outraged that ground so steeped in our nation's history and so much a part of our own local birthright can be so thoughtlessly forsaken.

Just several weeks ago, my father was telling me - for the first time - a family story about his great-great-uncle, Rowe Perry. He said, "You know, Uncle Rowe lived on Plank Road between our home place at Five Mile Fork and Salem Church. After the battle there, he was hired to load up the bodies from the trenches that had been built around the church and to haul them to the City Cemetery for burial. He said they were stacked up three feet deep. He loaded them up, like so many cords of wood, and hauled them." As I look around here today, I can't help but think that some of those bodies are now buried here.

While this story may carry highly personal meaning for me, I find that the sentiments it arouses are shared by many others here. Ours is a community that was shaped by so traumatic an event, so much larger than ourselves and our families, that we shouldn't be surprised that it remains a formative part of our collective consciousness and has helped to render Fredericksburg a place we consider home. The war remains a room, if you will, in this community's collective house of memories.

This hill also touches us deeply as a community because it stands out at a time when it is becoming so much harder for this, or any community, to preserve its own uniqueness. In so many ways, our world today is growing flat all over again, where the mountains are sinking and the valleys rising. You could call it the "homogenization of America," where one place looks pretty much like the next and where our personalities and beliefs are increasingly shaped by the great machines of mass culture. And it means that the place where I grew up, the South, is becoming little more than a figure of speech.

But deep down, I cannot believe that we really want to be like everyone else or that we want to live in a place that looks just like the next.

This hill stands today as both a cemetery and as a living, changing memorial to the men who fought here. But it is also our hill, with a Fredericksburg history, an actual physical part of our psychological landscape that has imparted meaning to our lives. It is not a California hill or a Guatemalan hill, it is a living part of each one of us who lives here. And just because the park service owns the land doesn't mean that the place belongs to it. It belongs to all of us, especially to those who live within its shadow.

On this Memorial Day, let us recognize that it is the responsibility of all Americans, as the heirs of the men who died here, and of our community, as the descendants of those who lived in this town 130 years ago, and of myself, as the heir of Rowe Perry, to reclaim our stake in this hill, to tend it as our own, to keep it from being leveled, to see it with fresh eyes, to walk it, to stand here and look eastward as they did in 1862, so that we can all draw strength, purpose, and wisdom from our past and prepare ourselves to face tomorrow.

THE SHENANDOAH VALLEY CAMPAIGN OF 1864

Early and Sheridan

April 9 Meeting

UNCW

At our April meeting, we will explore an exciting chapter in Civil War history, one our RT has never before examined! And our speaker, Ev Smith, is one of the nation's leading authorities on our subject for the evening, the 1864 Shenandoah Valley Campaign which featured a series of important battles in which USA General Philip Sheridan and CSA General Jubal Early struggled for control of this vital portion of Virginia.

A native of Washington DC, Dr. Everard H. Smith has lived in North Carolina for more than 25 years. He received his B.A. degree, magna cum laude, from Yale University and his Ph.D. in history from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. After coming to Wilmington in 1991, he served for three years as a senior administrative officer and adjunct professor of history at UNCW. While at the university, he team-taught a course on local history in partnership with Chancellor James R. Leutze. In 1994, he co-hosted a trip to Normandy for 30 local residents, including a dozen veterans, to attend the 50th anniversary celebration of the D-Day invasion.

Dr. Smith is a resident of the downtown and the owner of a 145-year-old home on Dock Street, the Larkins House. He has been active in the movement to preserve the Community Arts Center, originally the Wilmington USO Building, and was recently elected chairman of the Community Arts Center Accord, composed of local stakeholders in the fine and performing arts.

Dr. Smith's first love remains the Civil War. He contributed the article on the Shenandoah Valley Campaign of 1864 to Volume V of The Image of War, published by the National Historical Society. He was a consultant to "Civil War: The North Carolina Story," a documentary produced and broadcast by the North Carolina Center for Public Television. His work has appeared in Civil War Times, Civil War Magazine, The North Carolina Historical Review, and The American Historical Review, among other publications. His most recent article, "The Burning of Chambersburg," appeared last year in Volume I of True Stories from the American Past, a college-level reader published by McGraw-Hill. He has frequently spoken before local groups, including the 19th Annual Congress of Civil War Round Tables here in Wilmington in 1993.

The meeting will be held Thursday, April 9, in Room 123, Cameron Hall, UNCW. The room will be open at 7:00 pm and the program begins at 7:30 pm. (We're unable to meet at St. John's Episcopal Church because of Maundy Thursday services that evening, and the steering committee regrets that we did not check the date more closely when this program was planned last spring).

*Oh, days of great and glorious deeds,
Of valiant men and gallant steeds,
As back to yon my memory leads,
My blood throws off its chill;
And I'm again a sturdy blade,
In loyal Blue once more arrayed,
As when by danger undismayed,
I rode with "Little Phil."*

We Rode With Little Phil And Other Poems, 1912, by Cyrus B. Lower, late Private, Company K, 13th Pennsylvania Reserves, Medal of Honor Winner

STEALING A MARCH May 1 Meeting

The May program will be a joint meeting with the Chicago Civil War Round Table on the USS North Carolina. Dinner (approximately $15.00) will be followed by a program on the North Carolina Campaigns led by Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley. Details in the May newsletter.

CIVIL WAR PRESERVATION NEWS Recent Developments

Efforts to preserve Civil War battlefields continue to make the news. Here are some news briefs from a number of sites.

Last fall, two U.S. senators came close to setting aside $50 million to buy unprotected battlefield property. Robert Torricelli (D-NJ) and James Jeffords (R-VT), a CW enthusiast, sought to earmark these funds from the $12 billion Land & Water Conservation Fund to acquire land at Gettysburg, Antietam, and Fredericksburg.

The effort got its start in April, 1997, when former NY congressman, Robert Mrazek, another CW buff and co-author of the landmark 1988 legislation to acquire land planned for development on the Manassas battlefield, arranged for one of his periodic battlefield tours for friends. During the tour at Antietam, Robert K. Krick served as guide. Torricelli was in the group. "We had a wonderful tour," recalled Krick. "The drama of Bloody Lane was being described when Torricelli spotted a 'for sale' sign within six feet of the historic lane. It was the Roulette Farm, scene of intense battle action, privately owned, yet inside the park boundary. 'This was a kind of epiphany for him,' Krick said. 'He was really dismayed and shocked,' recalled a Torricelli staffer. 'He was really shocked that this could be for sale.'"

Torricelli, in a statement to the Senate on September 17, said, "The battlefields of America, which define this country...may be lost to history." On the same day, Jeffords told his colleagues in the Senate that setting aside millions for the battlefields would represent "a giant stride in preserving our history."

"I am proud to say that there is in this land a great wellspring of caring for the places where freedom was won and defended," Jeffords said. Millions of Americans have, in recent years, become aware of the hallowed ground of our Civil War battlefields, have visited them, read of them, many have written of them."

The three battlefields mentioned above still have unprotected property. According to Krick, the area of Stonewall Jackson's celebrated flank attack at Chancellorsville is largely unprotected. At Gettysburg, there are 1327 acres still privately held, including 80 acres within the CSA battlelines on Herr's Ridge, 12 acres at the Lutheran Seminary, and a 77 acre farm where Union cavalry and artillery attempted to threaten the right flank of the CSA army as it prepared for Lee's assault on the third day. And at Antietam, about 450 acres of the park remain in private hands. This includes the 165 acre Roulette Farm which went on the market in recent months.

Near Marietta, Georgia, an antebellum plantation that survived the Battle of Kennesaw Mountain and served as Union HQ might not survive the development wars of the 1990's. The historic William G. McAdoo House on Powder Springs Road saw the Battle of Kolb's Farm swirl around its front door. It sits now on a low hill overlooking a formerly rural intersection. Several shopping centers have sprung up, and the 57 acres surrounding the house have become too valuable to remain as pasture. Development plans include a grocery store, two low-rise office parks, and seventy homes. Fortunately, the developer plans to preserve the McAdoo House, though the surrounding acreage will probably be compromised. The Battle of Kolb's Farm was the scene of CSA General John B. Hood's attack against Union entrenchments. CSA casualties were 870, Union losses 350.

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust is planning an unprecedented recreation of Stonewall Jackson's famous flank march at Chancellorsville Sunday, May 3. The event will assist CVBT in raising funds to purchase 100 acres at Chancellorsville. Participants will be expected to supply financial support, each being required to raise $110 in order to attend the event. An encampment and interpretive programs are also planned. Adult admission $5.00. Call (540) 374 0900 for details.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONFEDERATE RELIC ROOM Columbia SC

This small, but wonderful, museum has a rich collection of SC Confederate material exhibited for visitors. It seems that, in the 1890's, the only major repositories in the South searching for CSA artifacts were the Museum of the Confederacy and what is now called the SC Confederate Relic Room. In those early years, both museums collected priceless items before they were lost or destroyed. I recently visited the Relic Room for the second time, and here are some of the treasures I found.

The museum has probably, with the exception of the Museum of the Confederacy, the largest collection of CSA regimental battleflags anywhere, all of them from SC. Though many of its flags are in the process of being conserved, several are exhibited, including the flag of the 24 SC Infantry Regiment (Gist's Brigade, Army of Tennessee) and the 8 SC Infantry Regiment (Kershaw's Brigade, Army of Northern Virginia). Captain H.M. Stuart's brass spur, a product of the melted brass from the captured USS Keokuk, sunk near Morris Island, is on view, as well as a spur taken from the mortally wounded General William Dorsey Pender of NC when he was mortally wounded at Gettysburg. General Wade Hampton's Whitney Navy revolver and General Matthew C. Butler's Manhattan revolver are featured in the collection of arms.

One of the most spectacular artifacts in the Relic Room's collection is the officers' frock coat worn by General Micah Jenkins when he was killed at the Wilderness. His bullet-riddled sword and scabbard rests in the same display case. Another superb item is the original telegram written and signed by General John Bell Hood to General John S. Preston informing him that his son, Major William C. Preston, had been killed in action. Hood was then engaged to "Willie's" sister, Sally "Buck" Preston.

The extensive collection of Dr. Benjamin H. Teague, a Confederate veteran and passionate collector of unusual relics, is also represented in the museum. Teague collected everything, it seems, including General PGT Beauregar's tooth extracted by his dentist in 1890!

Next time you're in Columbia, take the opportunity of visiting the SC Confederate Relic Room, located corner of Sumpter and Pendleton Streets. Hours are Monday-Friday, 8:30-5:00. No admission is charged, though donations are accepted. You'll find the staff very friendly, knowledgeable, and available for questions.

SPRING TOUR TO LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA

Eleven RT members traveled to Lexington last weekend for a tour of this charming 19th Century town where Jackson taught at VMI before the war and where Lee served as President of Washington College during the last five years of his life. In spite of rain on Friday afternoon, the group enjoyed an informative tour with guide, Richard Lewis, of Lee and Jackson sites in Lexington. The group included: John Moore, James MacLaren, John and Dorene Krohn, Palmer and Mary Royal, Tommy King, David and Becky Barefoot, Dan Geddies, and Joyce Binkley.

CIVIL WAR BOOK SALE

The University of North Carolina Press is offering on sale its Civil War books at a 20% discount. The sale runs through April 30. UNC Press publishes some of the choicest titles in Civil War literature from the recent Pickett's Charge In History and Memory (Carol Reardon), Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain (Robert Krick), and Richard S. Ewell: A Soldier's Life (Donald Pfanz) to such appealing classics as The Civil War in North Carolina (John Barrett), Two Great Rebel Armies (Richard McMurray), and Stephen Dodson Ramseur: Lee's Gallant General (Gary Gallagher). Call (800) 848-6224 for the sale catalogue.

THANKS FROM ROBERT K. KRICK!

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table received the following letter of thanks from Bob Krick, Chief Historian at Fredericksburg and Spotsylvania National Battlefield and leading authority on the Army of Northern Virginia, for the RT's gift of $1000.00 towards the Central Virginia Battlefields Trust's purchase of a 100 acre tract in the heart of the Chancellorsville battlefield. I recently spoke with Bob by phone, and he shared the good news that CVBT has closed on the property, thereby insuring its preservation!

"Bless you, bless you, bless you for your help with the Chancellorsville preservation project. I have been pleasantly startled by the degree of commitment of the local fellows, who have been fabulously dedicated and generous. Contributions from distant strangers are especially valuable for keeping them going; not only is the financial support important, but it encourages them to recognize that what they are working on is of consequence to people of substance all across the country."

"We are in about the last decade during which the primary Virginia battlefields can be saved to some extent. By then, everything not preserved outright will be under a solid coat of asphalt. The Shenandoah Valley sites and some others will survive much longer, giving us a later window of opportunity, but anything on or near the I-95 corridor is on the final chapter. It's depressing, of course, but ardent efforts are accomplishing some good. I keep asking myself why on earth didn't we (myself included) begin working this hard 25 years ago. Hindsight is 20/20, of course.

THE THREE BATTLES OF WINCHESTER A History and Guided Tour

Much of the fighting in the Shenandoah Valley Campaign of 1864 took place around Winchester, Virginia. And the city saw considerable combat earlier in the war as well. Now, The Three Battles of Winchester: A History and Guided Tour, by Brandon Beck and Charles Grunder (2nd edition), a guided driving tour, is available for battlefield buffs.

If Dr. Smith's program this month leads you to plan a visit to the area, you'll want to order a copy ($12.00 plus $3.00 postage) from The Civil War Foundation, Box 770, Berryville VA 22611, phone (540) 955-1176. Profits from sale of the book go directly to Kernstown Battlefield Association, a nonprofit preservation group.

A PARTING SHOT

The following newspaper story affords some insight into one of the Confederacy's more colorful generals, Roger A. Pryor, a practicing attorney after the war. Bear in mind, as you read this post-war account, that General Pryor's descendent, Ted Lynch, is a member of our RT.

General Pryor Rampant

Ex-General Roger A. Pryor, late of Virginia, had some words with counsel to whom he was opposed in a case on hearing before Judge McCunn, in the special term-rooms of the Superior Court, this morning, says a New York paper of Thursday, 18th inst. When the case had been disposed of the two counsel met just outside the door of the courtroom, and the dispute was renewed. General Pryor waxed wroth, seized counsel by the nose, tweaked that organ violently, then grasped the victim by his coat lapels, giving him a vigorous shaking, and showering epithets, remarkable for their vigor and terseness, upon his unfortunate head. Counsel threatened the vengeance of the law upon the belligerent general, but the latter turned upon his heel and walked away, thus ending the scene.

LEE AND JACKSON IN LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA Spring Bus Tour

Twelve RT members are signed up for the March 20-21 bus tour to Lexington to visit sites associated with two legendary Confederate generals. We've now chartered a 15-passenger van for this trip, and registration is closed. Dan Geddie will forward trip details to each registrant.

WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN TOUR Report From The Field

A large contingent of RT members and friends braved the early morning rain last Saturday to follow the steps of long-ago soldiers who clashed in battle during the Union assault on Confederate defenses in the Lower Cape Fear. A stop at the Cape Fear Civil War Shop, operated by RT member Mike Budziszewski, in Carolina Beach afforded everyone the opportunity for fresh coffee and a look at the shop's Civil War memorabilia. Everyone enjoyed Chris Fonvielle's stirring account of the Wilmington Campaign. Those registered for the trip included: Ann Boseman, Ray Brackett, Mike Budziszewski, James Burroughs, Frank Conlon, Anthony Coppola, Richard Covell, Dan Geddie, John Krohn, Dale Lear, Richard Long, James MacLaren, John Moore, George Penick, Richard Rand, Mary and Palmer Royal, Chet Rudolf, Ed Russ, Palmer Smith, Bart Streb, John D. Taylor, George Wolf, and Eddie White.

ROUND TABLE MEMBERSHIP GROWS TO 114

Our RT membership has reached an all-time high! Last year's membership of 90 has grown by more than a quarter to the current 114, making our RT considerably larger than many RT chapters in much larger cities. I think we are all impressed at the burgeoning interest in the American Civil War. Personally, I am continually amazed at the number of people I meet who share this interest. Hopefully, the CFCWRT will continue, through its programs, tours, and support of preservation, to contribute to a deeper understanding and appreciation of this pivotal event in our nation's history.

APRIL AND MAY MEETINGS

Our Thursday, April 9 meeting will begin at 6:45 pm with a social hour at St. John's Episcopal Church. The program will begin at 7:30 pm. Dr. Everard Smith will present a program on the Shenandoah Valley Campaign of 1864. Details in the April newsletter.

And make plans to attend the final meeting of the RT year which will be held on Friday, May 1, on the USS North Carolina. There we'll join the Chicago Civil War Round Table for dinner and a program on the 1865 NC campaigns led by Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley.

CONTINUING PRESERVATION AT BENTONVILLE BATTLEFIELD

The March, 1865 clash between CSA General Joe Johnston and USA General William Sherman was climactic in more than one way. It was the largest land engagement in Civil War North Carolina and it marked the culmination of Sherman's March northward from Savannah. For the Confederates, it meant one of those rare occasions when the Army of Tennessee was combined with elements of the Army of Northern Virginia and it was unique in that CSA coastal defense forces from Charleston and Wilmington joined in the fray as well. Our RT journeyed to Bentonville in March, 1995 where Mark Bradley, Lauren Burgess, and the battlefield staff gave us an unforgettable field tour.

The Bentonville Battleground Historical Association (BBHA), under the energetic leadership of President Lauren Burgess, is making great strides in preserving the battlefield! Here are some of the exciting developments.

In February, 1997 the American Battlefield Protection Program, an agency of the National Park Service, granted $24,000 to BBHA to complete a survey of Bentonville battlefield using Global Positioning Satellite (GPS) technology. GPS methodology has been applied to ten Civil War National Battlefield Parks since 1990. When completed, survey information will create computer-generated overlays detailing the exact location of every historic house, creek, roadbed, and trench line on the battlefield, providing a highly accurate "photograph" of its historic resources. NPS technicians will request landowners' permission to physically walk the length of the trench lines. Already, the GPS has recorded three miles of trenches, sixty rifle pits, and several artillery emplacements on the battlefield!

Further, a comprehensive preservation plan for Bentonville undertaken by BBHA in 1997 is nearing completion. Funded by a grant of $26,000 from the American Battlefield Protection Program and a $5,000 donation from Johnston County NC, the final plan will serve as a blueprint for all future efforts to preserve this important CW resource. Throughout the planning process, area landowners provided invaluable input and expressed interest in BBHA's efforts to preserve Bentonville's rural complexion and its history. The process has led to a recommendation to continue BBHA and state efforts to acquire and/or accept donations of historically significant property. Another recommendation involves developing a master plan for five roadside pull-offs to improve road safety in the area for both residents and visitors. Visitors are currently threatened by fast-moving traffic if they slow down to read historic markers or view areas where fighting took place.

And, even more exciting, the battlefield is growing through acquisitions! The NC Natural Heritage Trust approved a grant last fall for the purchase of two tracts totaling 13 acres. The first is a 4.1 acre property adjacent the the northern boundary of the USA 15th Corps tract acquired by BBHA at public auction in 1995 and incorporated into the State Historic Site. Though it no longer contains trenches, it was the site of the CSA defensive line on the second and third days of the battle. The second tract for which a grant has been approved is 8.9 acres adjacent to the State Historic Site where the first shots of the battle were fired.

And the acquisitions get even better! BBHA has the opportunity to acquire major properties that contain extensive remains of USA and CSA field fortifications that are in a nearly pristine state of preservation. This property is in key areas of the battlefield where extensive fighting occurred.

Just south of the Harper House Road lies a 32.5 acre property that has been offered to BBHA by its owners. Initially occupied by the division of USA General James D. Morgan, this land witnessed desperate fighting when the CSA Army of Tennessee's Last Grand Charge crossed the Harper House Road and hit Morgan's tenuous position from the flank and rear. As Morgan's position, and with it the entire Union line, appeared on the verge of collapse, the Union brigade of General William Cogswell arrived on the field and rushed to the attack. Cogswell's brigade struck advancing Confederate forces in their exposed right flank and drove them in confusion to their previous positions north of the road. Veterans would later attest that Cogswell's counterattack saved not only Morgan's beleaguered division, but also the entire Left Wing of Sherman's Army. The timing and ferocity of the counterattack that occurred on this property arguably prevented a Confederate victory on the first day of the battle.

You can join BBHA by sending $20.00 or more to 5466 Harper House Road, Four Oaks NC 27524. BBHA is an unstaffed, all-volunteer not-for-profit organization; gifts are tax-deductible. (Taken from the BBHA newsletter, The Battle Cry, Winter, 1998, Lauren Burgess, Editor.)

THE JOSHUA CHAMBERLAIN HOUSE

No trip to Maine would be complete for a student of the Civil War without a stop in Brunswick at the home of Major General Joshua Lawrence Chamberlain. Although born in nearby Brewer, Chamberlain moved to Brunswick in 1848 to attend Bowdoin College, graduating four years later. Following theological training in Bangor, he became an instructor in logic at Bowdoin in 1855.

The Chamberlain house, across the street from the college, was built in 1825. Beginning as a simple one-story dwelling in the Cape Cod design, it had been occupied by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow in the 1830's. Chamberlain purchased the house in 1859.

After the war, Chamberlain added a red Maltese cross, his Fifth Corps insignia, on the chimney. Needing a larger house but not wanting to disturb the roofline which he admired, Chamberlain simply raised the entire house eleven feet in the air and built a Victorian Gothic/Italianate first floor underneath.

After his death, the house was occupied by family members until 1939, when it was sold by his granddaughter. Unfortunately, the new owner held a yard sale to get rid of the old furnishings and then converted the house into seven apartments which were rented to college students.

Over the next forty-plus years the house deteriorated and by 1983 was threatened with demolition. It was rescued from the wrecking ball by the Pejepscot Historical Society and has been undergoing restoration ever since.

Of special interest now are the many Chamberlain artifacts in the house, some tracked down from the notorious yard sale. His wartime saddle sits in a corner, across from a large glass case. It is the contents of the case that made my trip worthwhile.

His shoulder straps and assorted uniform regalia were there. And so was the minie ball that had traversed both hips, pelvis, and bladder in June, 1864, at Petersburg, resulting in lifelong urinary tract complications that finally killed him in 1914.

But I was drawn mostly to his boots, for they were the boots worn at Little Round Top, where I knew he had been wounded in the foot by a shell or rock fragment. And there, on the right instep, the leather had been patched! I suddenly felt that 134 years had just been erased from time. I had connected with the "Fighting Professor." My trip to Brunswick was complete.

CIVIL WAR WALKING TOUR Charleston SC

Some of you who attended our February program on the Charleston Campaign will want to follow up with a visit at some time to the city itself. When you're there, you might consider joining Jack Thomson for a fascinating walking tour of Civil War sites in Old Charleston.

I took Jack's tour in 1990 and found it very enjoyable. The one and a half mile tour begins at the Mills House Hotel, proceeds down cobblestoned Chalmers Street to East Bay, down to the Battery and back up Meeting Street, returning to the Mills House. Jack tells intriguing stories about each stop along the route. One of the unique features of Jack's tours is his collection of 118 photographs of Charleston during the war years. He makes good use of many of these photographs during his tours by stopping at the exact 1860's camera positions and giving tour-goers the opportunity of comparing the modern and wartime views. Jack concentrates on the human interest aspects of tour sites and creates a living history experience for his audience. His knowledge of wartime Charleston is quite impressive.

You can arrange to participate in the walking tour (cost is $12.50 per person) by contacting Jack Thomson at 17 Archdale Street, Charleston SC 29401, phone (803) 722-7033.

A PARTING SHOT

During the Atlanta Campaign, General William T. Sherman conducted his usual personal reconnaissance in the Cassville area, where he showed that his determination to fight a total war did not preclude his genuine affection for the people in his path. Sherman stopped at a small plantation house and had a friendly conversation with an old woman inside. "Well, have the boys taken much from you?" he asked.

"Almost all I have," she answered. "Sherman himself was here; he is a right nice 'un. The poor man said he was hungry, so I got him something to eat." "Sherman said his men needed food too", the woman continued, "so he took even more, but he left me something he called a 'purtection' paper."

At this she pulled out a rumpled scrap and handed it to Sherman. It read: "Sergeant Take-Them-All gives general protection to this poor, lone widow, with her husband in the army, and to her helpless chickens and roosters; that is, what's left of them."

"All the soldiers who read this 'purtection,'" she said, "just laughed at it; it 'pears like they have drefful little respect for their general."

"I'm afraid so, madam," Sherman replied. "If you give me some paper, I'll write one they won't laugh at."

"And are you an officer?"

"Yes, Ma'am."

BATTERY WAGNER: THE BATTLE AND THE SIEGE Friday, February 13 Meeting

Tim Bradshaw, author of Battery Wagner: The Siege, The Men Who Fought, and The Casualties, will present a program on the fighting at Battery Wagner during the Charleston Campaign, a subject which has received growing interest in recent years.

Tim is a native of Hamlet, NC and now resides in Elgin, SC. He served in the US Marine Corps and worked in the Public Affairs Office at Quantico, VA. His great-great grandfather served in the 51st North Carolina Regiment, was wounded at Battery Wagner, and subsequently suffered the loss of his leg by amputation. Tim's investigation of his ancestor's fate led to his extensive research and writing on the campaign.

Battery Wagner was the site in July, 1863, of bitter and bloody combat as Union troops stormed the Confederate garrison which served as a key to the defense of Charleston. A series of Union attacks, one spearheaded by Colonel Robert G. Shaw's 54th Massachusetts, failed to carry the fort. A siege of nearly two months led to a final Confederate evacuation.

Copies of Tim's book on Battery Wagner will be available for sale and signing.

The meeting will be held on Friday, February 13, in Room 123, Cameron Hall, UNCW. (A good map of the UNCW campus is in the center section of your BellSouth directory). The room will open at 7:00, and the program begins at 7:30. As always, you're encouraged to bring interested friends along with you.

WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN TOUR Saturday, February 28

A bus tour of sites associated with the Wilmington Campaign will be led by our own Dr. Chris Fonvielle, leading authority on the campaign and author of The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope which most of you have in your CW library!

The bus will depart at 8:30 am from the parking lot on the west side of Roses at the corner of Oleander and Independence Drives. We'll visit the sites of the Battle of Forks Road, Sugar Loaf, Fort Fisher, Fort Anderson, the Battle of Town Creek, and stop in at the Cape Fear Civil War Shop. The bus should return to Roses about 4:00 pm.

Cost for the tour is $25.00 and includes a box lunch. Bus seats are first come-first served, and your check for $25.00 is your registration. You can bring payment to the February meeting or mail to Dan Geddie, Treasurer, CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405.

Don't delay in submitting your check! About forty people have shown a strong interest in going on the tour, so the seats (only 47!) should go fast. This will be the only written notice of the tour.

The cost for the tour is $175.00 (double occupancy) and $205.00 (single occupancy). This will cover transportation, motel, three meals, and tour guide. You can sign up for the tour by giving your check to Dan Geddies, Treasurer, at a RT meeting or mailing it to him at Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405.

This will be another great RT tour, so don't miss it! The one-night stay should be convenient for most RT members.

Wilbur D. Jones, Jr.

The Division for Public Service and Extended Education at UNC-W is presenting this lecture series on Mondays, March 9-April 13 (six sessions) from 7:00-9:00 pm. Wilbur, an active member of the RT, is the author of Giants in the Cornfield: The 27th Indiana Infantry and Who Lost the Lost Orders?: Stonewall Jackson, His Courier, and Special Orders No. 191. The latter is a fascinating article which appeared in a recent issue of Civil War Regiments.

The cost for the series is $60.00. For more information or for registration, call 962-3195 at the University. Flyers featuring a sign-up form will be available at the February meeting.

STATES RIGHTS TO SECESSION
THE SOUTH'S ELOQUENT AND FIERY ROAD TO FORT SUMPTER

An important Civil War conference sponsored by the American CW Institute of Campbellsville University and focusing on the South's movement toward a four year conflict with the North will be held at The Mills House in Charleston in late August. The conference will feature such notable historians as Kent Masterson Brown, William C. Davis, Dennis Frye, Gary Gallagher, Charles Roland, Clyde Wilson, and John Simon who will discuss particular political issues facing the South, such as secession, slavery, states'rights, and the formation of the Confederate government. Registration for this event is $395.00. Further information is available from the University's Office of Advancement (800) 264-6014. Thanks to John Krohn for bringing this conference to our attention.

CHANCELLORSVILLE CHALLENGE
!!! Round Table Member Pledges $250.00 Matching Gift !!!
Your Chance to Save a Battlefield

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust of Fredericksburg, VA, a 501 (c)(3) not-for-profit preservation group has a contract to secure 100 acres of property in the heart of the Chancellorsville battlefield for $450,000.00. A $100,000.00 down payment was made in 1997. CVBT made another purchase agreement payment of $50,000.00 on January 20, 1998. The remaining $300,000.00 is due by March 20. CVBT is prepared to mortgage the property as it continues its fund-raising efforts.

Robert K. Krick and Edwin C. Bearss, both leading CW historians, sent an appeal to RT's across the country asking for help with this effort. The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table steering committee voted to challenge our membership to raise $1000.00 for Chancellorsville.

Seven RT members have sent tax-deductible gifts and/or memberships to CVBT, as of January 30, totalling $440.00! Originally, proceeds beyond expenses for the January Band Concert were to go to Chancellorsville; however, our expenses exceeded our income.

So let's raise the remaining $560.00 or more! It shouldn't be difficult. One of our RT members has anonymously offered a matching gift of $250.00. So every contribution we receive will be matched by this generous member up to $250.00.

Make a tax-deductible contribution of $10, $15, $25, or more! Bring your check made to "CVBT" to the February 13 meeting or send to: CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405. (An Annual Membership in CVBT is $35).

This is your chance to help save a Civil War battlefield! Robert K. Krick has written that "Robert E. Lee personally directed the Southern units that fought across the ground, and gained what has aptly been called Lee's greatest victory."

Contributors' names will be listed in a forthcoming issue of this newsletter. Let's meet the challenge of our fellow RT member and join together to save this hallowed ground!

THANKS TO BAND CONCERT SPONSORS!

The 11th North Carolina Regiment Band Concert sponsored by the RT and held at UNC-W's University Center was attended by 192 people, about twenty-five of whom were RT members. The band gave its usual excellent rendition of music dear to the hearts of soldiers and civilians both North and South. Many of those who attended lingered afterwards for coffee and dessert and socializing with friends. Our thanks to Chris Fonvielle and Wilbur Jones who contributed $60.00, a portion of sales from their books, to the RT.

We are grateful to the following generous sponsors who made this event possible!

JOHN R. KROHN Gettysburg Licensed Battlefield Guide

Congratulations to RT member, John Krohn, for his entrance into the elite ranks of the Association of Licensed Battlefield Guides of Gettysburg, PA! This is indeed a real honor, both for John and for our RT. Beginning in 1915, the federal government began testing and licensing battlefield guides to ensure that visitors receive accurate tours and information. The required written examination is extremely rigorous. Most applicants study the minutest details of the Battle of Gettysburg for years before undergoing the test, and very few applicants pass the test when it's administered every three years. As a result, the guides are virtual "walking encyclopedias" of the battle! Each guide must serve a minimum of 80 hours a year, guiding visitors on the battlefield. Our RT can now boast of two Gettysburg LBG's in its membership. Tom Prisk of Raleigh, who has presented several programs for us, is also a licensed guide. John, a retired physician, is an active member of the RT and serves on the steering committee.

A PARTING SHOT

By some hook, or crook, or blockade running, or smuggling, or Mason and Slidell, or Raphael Semmes, or something of the sort, the Confederate States Government had come in possession of a small number of Whitworth guns, the finest long range guns in the world, and a monopoly by the English Government. They were to be given to the best shots in the army. One day Captain Joe P. Lee and Company H went out to shoot at a target for the gun. We all wanted the gun, because if we got it we would be sharpshooters, and be relieved from camp duty, etc.

All the Generals and officers came out to see us shoot. The mark was put up about five hundred yards on a hill, and each of us had three shots. Every shot that was fired hit the board, but there was one man who came a little closer to the spot than any other one, and the Whitworth was awarded him; and as we just turned round to go back to camp, a buck rabbit jumped up, and was streaking it as fast as he could make tracks, all the boys whooping and yelling as hard as they could, when Jimmy Webster raised his gun and pulled down on him, and cut the rabbit's head entirely off with a minnie ball right back of his ears. He was about two hundred and fifty yards off. It might have been an accidental shot, but General Leonidas Polk laughed very heartily at the incident, and I heard him ask one of his staff if the Whitworth gun had been awarded. The staff officer responded that it had, and that a certain man in Colonel Farquharson's regiment - the Fourth Tennessee - was the successful contestant, and I heard General Polk remark, "I wish I had another gun to give, I would give it to the young man that shot the rabbit's head off."

THE REGIMENT BAND of the 11th NORTH CAROLINA TROOPS

IN CONCERT AT THE UNIVERSITY CENTER, UNCW
Saturday, January 24
7:00-8:30 p.m.

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is presenting this period band in concert for the enjoyment of RT members and the general public on January 24!

The band of the 11th North Carolina Regiment was re-activated in 1982 and took the field for the first time this century at a reenactment of the Battle of Bentonville. Since that time, the band has been in demand for other reenactments, balls, period church services, parades, formal concerts and numerous events consistent with its impression of a Confederate band of music from a NC regiment. Concerts have been presented at Manassas, Gettysburg, Fredericksburg, and Petersburg. The band has been involved in three movies, the most recent the TNT production, Ironclads. Other appearances have included the Confederate White House in Richmond VA and the morning service at the National Cathedral in Washington, DC.

The group dresses in replicas of uniforms known to have been worn by NC soldiers during the war and plays a mixture of original and replicated instruments of the period. It has one of the largest repertoires of period band music available and includes music both North and South.

Two Civil War authors from our Round Table will be present with their books for sale and signing. Wilbur Jones, author of Giants in the Cornfield: The 27th Indiana Infantry, will have this fine regimental history available. Chris Fonvielle, author of Last Rays of Departing Hope: The Wilmington Campaign will again give attendees the opportunity to purchase his history of the war in the Lower Cape Fear. Both authors will donate a portion of the sales of their book to the RT.

We hope that every RT member will come and bring family members. Plan to sell tickets to friends and to anyone who's interested in attending. This band provides a really wonderful performance! Coffee, punch, and dessert will be served after the concert.

Tickets are $8.00 each, two for $15.00, and are available at Hanover Iron Works, 1851 Dawson Street, or by mail at CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405. Tickets can be purchased at the door; however, you will help us estimate food count early by purchasing tickets beforehand.

Proceeds, after expenses, will be contributed to the Central Virginia Battlefields Trust's effort to purchase 100 acres of battlefield property at Chancellorsville. (See article on page 3).

STEALING A MARCH

The RT has a great lineup of programs for Winter/Spring 1998. The February 13 program will feature Tim Bradshaw who will speak on the subject of the Charleston Campaign and Battery Wagner. Saturday, February 28 is the tentative date for an all-day bus tour of Wilmington Campaign sites to be led by Chris Fonvielle. The spring annual bus tour, March 20-21, will take us to Lexington, Virginia. Everard Smith, an authority on the Valley Campaign of 1864, will lead us in an overview of that clash between Early and Sheridan on April 9. And we'll wrap up the RT year on May 1 by enjoying an evening joint meeting, featuring Chris Fonvielle and Mark Bradley, and dinner with the Chicago Round Table on the USS North Carolina!

! SAVE CHANCELLORSVILLE BATTLEFIELD !

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust (CVBT) has signed a contract to buy a 100 acre tract at the heart of the Chancellorsville Battlefield for $450,000. "This was our first real test of fire," said trust president Enos Richardson, referring the Fredericksburg group's first acquisition since it began operating early last year.

John Hennessey, assistant superintendent at Fredericksburg & Spotsylvania National Military Park, said the federal government would not have been able to buy the land. He termed the acquisition "just magnificent." Hennessey said "the tract is the most visible, most developable piece of land on the Chancellorsville battlefield." He added that, with the rapid pace of development and escalating land prices in Spotsylvania County, "the preservation community is going to have once chance to get" such historic properties before they are developed.

The parcel of open ground extends south of Route 3 to McLaws Drive, a park road, and it abuts the park on the west. The trust intends eventually to donate it to the park. According to Noel Harrison, the park's cultural resources specialist, the tract is unlike almost any other on the battlefield in that all three significant phases of the battle are represented there.

On April 30, 1863, Union General Joseph Hooker seized the advantageous ground but abandoned it to the Confederates May 1. On May 2, Robert E. Lee directed feints across the property to draw attention from Stonewall Jackson's secretive, 12 mile flank march. Skirmishing grew so heavy that Confederate General Lafayette McLaws had to intervene, "coaxing" his men back, Harrison said, lest they brought on a general engagement.

And on May 3 there were repeated Confederate attacks through the area toward the Chancellor House. Park Chief Historian Robert Krick noted that Lee "personally directed the Southern units that fought across the ground, and gained what has aptly been called Lee's greatest victory."

Because of fast-moving development, particularly along the Route 3 corridor, the park is ranked seventh among National Park Service sites nationwide - and first in the region - in the need for land acquisition. Of the 8500 acres within the park boundary, fully 1500 are privately owned.

CVBT signed a contract to buy the land in late August, after several months of negotiations with the Roderick Ashley family. The $100,000 down payment was raised from directors and members and includes a personal loan that will have to be repaid.

Richardson said raising the funds will be "a lot of hard work," but he said the price would have been even higher "if we had lost this property to another shopping center. I have no doubt in my mind that if we hadn't stepped in and bought this site now, it would have been lost forever."

The 100 acre site includes the ground over which the Confederate brigades of Posey, Semmes, Wofford, Mahone, Kershaw,, and Wright attacked the Union brigades of Greene, Kane, Candy, Caldwell, Brooke, and Zook. These units comprised troops from New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Delaware on the Federal side and and South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, and Virginia on the Confederate side. The site was central to Lee's efforts to focus Hooker's attention on McLaws' and Anderson's troops while Jackson made his celebrated march and flank attack.

The Central Virginia Battlefields Trust was formed in January, 1997 by concerned citizens in the Fredericksburg area. Their first project was to preserve Willis Hill, a nine-acre tract which constituted the center portion of Marye's Heights and overlooks Sunken Road, the bulwark of the Confederate defensive position during the December, 1862 Battle of Fredericksburg. (The Civil War News, October 1997, reprinted by permission).

In December, the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table received a plea from historians Robert K. Krick and Edwin C. Bearss, through Civil War Round Table Associates, for contributions towards the purchase of the 100 acre tract at Chancellorsville. The RT steering committee voted to challenge our membership to raise $1000.00 towards this effort. The proceeds, after expenses, from the January Band concert will comprise a portion of this total. Members are urged to make their own tax-deductible individual contributions to CVBT or to join CVBT. Contributions and memberships will all count toward the $1000.00 goal. Contribution and membership forms will be available at the concert. Memberships are available at different levels, the basic one being the Annual Member at $35.00. Central Virginia Battlefields Trust, Suite 1, 604-A William Street, Fredericksburg VA 22401, can also be reached at Toll Free (888) 374-0900.

WILBUR JONES PUBLISHES REGIMENTAL HISTORY

Giants in the Cornfield: The 27th Indiana Infantry

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is fortunate to have another published Civil War author in our ranks! Wilbur D. Jones, Jr., a Wilmington native, is a retired Navy captain who has written numerous books and magazine articles on military history and national defense issues. Wilbur retired as a professor at the Defense Systems Management College after 41 years at the Department of Defense. He served in political positions in the Nixon and Ford administration, serving as special assistant to President Ford.

Giants in the Cornfield adds a fresh dimension to CW literature with this extensive social study of the young, uneducated farmers of the 27th Indiana. The work focuses on the interactions of a single unit of Hoosier common soldiers: neighbors from the same county, village, and family. Wilbur weaves a special regimental personality, character, profile, and history by utilizing thousands of letters, official and family records, diaries and memoirs, to research soldiers' family and love life, morale, discipline, religion, morals, medical care, internal politics, camp life, guard duty, and POW experiences.

The army's tallest regiment, called Giants, the 27th Indiana gave and received ghastly casualties in Antietam's Cornfield on America's bloodiest day. Just four days before, members of the regiment had found General R.E. Lee's "Lost Orders." The 27th went on to fight in many major Eastern and Western battles, including Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, and Sherman's Atlanta Campaign. Giants in the Cornfield is a thoroughly researched and conclusive study of the life and culture of the Union common soldier.

Wilbur's Giants will be available at the concert. This is a great opportunity to purchase a signed copy of an excellent book for your CW library!

LEE AND JACKSON...LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA

Spring Bus Tour

In keeping with our RT tradition of offering a weekend tour each spring, members will travel to Lexington, Virginia March 20-21 to see sites associated with both Lee and Jackson. Our bus will leave early Friday morning. In Lexington we'll see the Friday 4 pm parade of VMI cadets, tour the VMI campus and visit the museum where many of Jackson's possessions are on display, tour Lee's Chapel where Lee is interred and visit Lee's W & L College office. Our tour leader, Richard Lewis, will speak after dinner on Friday night. We'll tour Jackson's home and see the church where Jackson worshiped, as well as Jackson's grave in a cemetery where many CSA notables are also buried. Then we'll depart for Wilmington on Saturday at 5 pm.

The cost for the tour is $175.00 (double occupancy) and $205.00 (single occupancy). This will cover transportation, motel, three meals, and tour guide. You can sign up for the tour by giving your check to Dan Geddie, Treasurer, at a RT meeting or mailing it to him at Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405.

VICTORY AT MALVERN HILL AND GLENDALE

Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites

"The largest private Civil War preservation effort in American history. No group or individual has attempted to save as many acres or raise as many dollars on behalf of a single acquisition without government assistance," exclaimed Edwin C. Bearss, former chief historian of the National Park Service, as he described APCWS's challenge to preserve two large and important sites of The 1862 Seven Days Campaign near Richmond. The Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites raised $2,000,000 in four years to purchase 715 acres at Malvern Hill and Glendale (Frayser's Farm). This hallowed ground which saw the clash of armies in two separate engagements will be gifted to the American people (through Richmond National Battlefield Park).

UNITED CONFEDERATE VETERANS REUNION Wilmington NC 1916

In front of the City Hall, General Metts with Major H. A. London, his adjutant and chief of staff, of Pittsboro, and other staff officers, all in full dress uniforms of grey, which are so dear to them, reviewed the followers of the Confederate Generals Lee, Jackson, Stuart, Johnson, Hood, Longstreet and others, as they went past with uncovered heads as marks of respect for the commanding officers.

On the City Hall steps were hundreds of ladies and school children, who sang "The Old North State" and "Dixie" as the procession of cars containing the "Vets" went by.

Promptly at 10 O'clock the procession moved from Fifth and Market streets, where it formed, headed by General Metts and Major London, and passed down Market street to Front, up Front to Walnut, on Walnut to Third and on Third by the City Hall. Thousands of persons lined the sidewalks and lustily cheered the old soldiers as they passed along, most of them with happy smiles on their faces.

In the parade besides the veterans were the Daughters of the Confederacy with the sponsors and maids of honor here with the veterans and many sons of veterans.

In one of the automobiles were six veterans in their grey coats, each with an old rusty musket, while in another was a veteran who happily played upon a fiddle as the car which he was in passed up the street. All of them received loud applause.

Nearly the entire gathering of "Vets" boarded special cars last night at 7 o'clock and were taken to Lumina, Wrightsville Beach, where they were highly entertained by a committee of ladies headed by Mrs. Cuthbert Martin, chief marshal, who more than lived up to her reputation of handling such events.

As the veterans filed into the pavilion, which was prettily decorated with Confederate Stars and Bars, Stars and Stripes, and the North Carolina State flags, they were greeted by the State officers of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, the matrons and maids of honor, and officers of the local UDC who were in the receiving line.

To the tune of old Southern melodies the veterans and Daughters of the Confederacy formed into line on the ball room floor and took part in a grand march. As the vets passed around there was cheer after cheer from the 2000 spectators.

Featuring the evening was an old-time square dance in which the veterans and a number of elderly and young ladies took part. There was a real figure caller on hand and when Don Richardson's orchestra struck up a real square dance tune the vets could not make their feet behave and several could not refrain from "cutting the pigeon wing." (Wilmington Evening Dispatch, July 27, 1916)

A PARTING SHOT

Several years ago I bought for my collection a Union soldier letter written from Chapel Hill NC on May 2, 1865. I knew that Chapel Hill had been occupied by USA General Smith Atkins' brigade of Kilpatrick's cavalry at war's end. In fact, during the weeks of occupation, General Atkins courted Eleanor Swain, the daughter of President Swain of the University of North Carolina. Their marriage caused a real scandal among the locals whose war-time animosities still burned bright. Anyway, I was curious to learn more about the writer of the letter.

I found Quincy A. Brown's military records at the National Archives. I discovered that he was a Sergeant in Company B, 9th Ohio Cavalry. I was surprised to learn that he was given his discharge in Concord NC, my hometown! It seems that the 9th Ohio Cavalry was transferred to Concord after its stint in Chapel Hill. It was easy to imagine Quincy riding about the streets of the little town where I grew up.

Sergeant Brown had, of course, participated in Sherman's March from Savannah GA into eastern NC. After arduous months of constant duty, he must have sensed that the war was winding down. He writes jubilantly, "our command left Mt. Olive on April 12, moving out on the Smithfield Road, then on the Raleigh Road, our advance driving the reb's Pickets. We heard the news of the fall of Richmond just as the rebs were making a stand with our advance. Our Colonel proposed three Cheers for the Success of our armies. The rebs heard our cheering and Lit out as fast as legs could conveniently carry them..."

STONEWALL JACKSON

The Man, The Soldier, The Legend A ROUND TABLE PANEL DISCUSSION

Our November meeting will feature a Round Table panel and general discussion of the life and military service of this legendary Civil War general. Bill Clark, Wilbur Jones, Joe Morrison, and Don Schmitt have enthusiastically agreed to serve on our panel. Members will be free to share their own perspectives about Jackson in our first RT panel discussion and are urged to read Stonewall Jackson: The Man, The Soldier, The Legend (McMillan, 1997), by James I. Robertson, or other Jackson biographies prior to the meeting.

The meeting will be held at UNC-W, in Cameron Hall, Room 123. (A good map of the UNC-W campus is in the center section of your BellSouth directory). The room will open at 7:00, and the program begins at 7:30 pm.

! SPECIAL GUEST !

The Reverend Joseph Graham Morrison, a panel member, is the grandson of Captain Joseph Graham Morrison, CSA, who was the brother-in-law of Stonewall Jackson and served on Jackson's staff. Captain Morrison is mentioned extensively in Robertson's biography. You will enjoy meeting Joe and hearing his perspectives about Jackson!

*And men will tell their children
Though all other memories fade
How they fought with Stonewall Jackson
In the old Stonewall brigade.*

THE BIRTH OF THE CONFEDERACY

William C. Davis

One of America's leading CW historians, William C. (Jack) Davis, was the keynote speaker for the recent North Carolina: The Civil War Connection conference sponsored by the North Carolina Civil War Tourism Council and held in Wilmington. The large crowd warmed to Davis' presentation which combined humor with serious scholarship.

Davis began by noting that little study has been devoted to the process by which the Confederacy came into being. Since there are few records which shed light on the work of the Continental Congress eighty years before, a look at the proceedings in Montgomery, Alabama in early 1861 is an opportunity to watch Americans create their own democracy.

Davis pointed out that there was no coordination between the seceding states regarding their function as an independent nation. The state delegates met in Montgomery because Robert Barnwell Rhett suggested honoring William Lowndes Yancey, an Alabama secessionist. Alabama was also the geographical center of the first six seceding states. Delegates were sent to a "conference" in Montgomery simply to look at the matters of defense, interstate trade, and the prevalence of Unionism.

The delegates met in the Senate Chamber of the Alabama State House. Politics immediately came into play with coalitions forming quickly. The delegates were given no authority to act. Alexander H. Stephens, a guiding light of the Confederacy, wanted action, promoting the need to form a government. He was given the chore of writing a Provisional Constitution.

Davis described the framers of the CSA Constitution as a mix of reactionaries and idealists. As Congress could not make appropriations, there was no possibility of pork barreling. It was an easy process to impeach the President. The Constitution created a Supreme Court which was never convened. Congress had one house, the Senate.

Georgia had the biggest delegation, ten of the fifty attending delegates. Since Georgia luminaries, Howell Cobb, Alexander Stephens, and Robert Toombs were delegates, everyone expected a Georgian to become President. But the Georgia delegation was divided. Toombs may well have been elected, but it was soon observed that his frequent public intoxication would render him poor at foreign diplomacy. Jefferson Davis was elected by the states 4-2. He was a political moderate and was apparently not eager to serve as President.

Jack Davis made an interesting observation about the President's choices of the men with whom he would serve. Jefferson Davis appointed a Cabinet composed of six men, two of whom he had never met, two of whom he barely knew, and, finally, two of whom he had previously challenged to a duel!

In the early days of the Confederacy, there were so many volunteers eagerly clamoring to serve in the military that, at least briefly, the CSA army outnumbered the USA army.

Robert Barnwell Rhett of South Carolina had worked for thirty years to achieve secession. An extremist, he believed that he should have been elected President. Predictably, it was Rhett who formed the anti-Davis faction.

Jefferson Davis was elected to a six-year term as President. He was never able to settle the issue of secession within the Confederacy itself. Ironically, because it threatened the existence of the Confederacy, he dodged the issue altogether.

One of the interesting points that William C. Davis made concerned Virginia's decision to join the seceding Southern states. Virginia recognized that its secession would insure that its territory, given such close proximity to Washington DC, would become a battleground. So Virginia insisted on Richmond as the Capitol of the Confederacy. The President could then take command of the army because he was near the seat of war. The Confederate Congress voted to move to Richmond on May 21, and the delegates left Montgomery within hours, leaving the citizens of the former capitol stunned and resentful. The government, said Davis, literally embarked for Richmond overnight. And, ironically, while Montgomery survived the war unscathed, Richmond was left in ruins.

Jack Davis concluded his presentation with the observation that the story of the creation of the Confederacy was the saga of fifty remarkable men who rose to a crisis with great imagination.

Much more can be found regarding these early weeks of the Southern republic in Jack Davis' "A Government of Our Own: The Making of the Confederacy" (Free Press, NY, 1994).

SPRING BUS TOUR TO LEXINGTON, VIRGINIA

RT members will visit some notable sites associated with both Lee and Jackson in Lexington, March 20-21. Our bus will leave Wilmington at 8 am Friday and return Saturday about 9:00 pm. This trip, with its one-night stay, should be easy for most members. We'll visit VMI and the Friday full dress parade, the museum with features Jackson artifacts, Lee's Chapel, Jackson's home, church, and grave, and have Friday dinner with our tour guide. The cost will again be reasonable. Go ahead and put this weekend on your calendar. More details will be provided in the coming weeks.

LEE AND JACKSON A Recently Discovered Letter

A note from Robert E. Lee to Stonewall Jackson that surfaced in August indicates for the first time that the two legendary figures came very close to being photographed together. In the two-sentence note, written two weeks before Jackson's death, Lee tells his subordinate that he received too late Jackson's invitation to join him in having images taken by an "artist." Jackson consequently went alone to the photo session, which resulted in the second and last wartime photo of the great military commander.

"The tantalizing and exciting thing about this is that there has never been a notion that there was a prospect of the two of them being together for a photo," said Robert Krick, historian at Fredericksburg & Spotsylvania National Military Park and leading authority on the ANV. "That would have been one of the most famous photographs in all of American history, and the Confederate photo of all time."

The note was donated in August to Washington & Lee University by Mary Fray of Culpeper. The small, folded page was passed down through Fray's family, which was close to both Jackson and Lee. Fray's great-great uncle, John Thomas Lewis Preston, a founder of VMI in Lexington, and Thomas J. Jackson, a professor at VMI, married the Junkin sisters, daughters of the head of neighboring Washington College before the war. During the war, Preston served as a staff officer under Jackson.

(Jackson's first wife) Elinor Junkin Jackson died in childbirth in October, 1854. ...After Jackson's wounding, Mary Anna Jackson (his second wife) returned to Lexington and stayed several months with the Prestons while she broke up her house, according to Fray. Upon returning to her father's home in NC, she gave the Prestons, "as a token of appreciation," Jackson's shaving stand, a beaded string purse that Fray said he was supposed to have been carrying when he was mortally wounded, and the note sent a week beforehand from Lee, which Jackson had kept.

"From my earliest memory," Fray said, "I was aware that we had those possessions. My father valued them highly, though not in a monetary way at all. The note, particularly, was like the ark of the covenant." It was kept in a tin box, and Fray said there was an understanding in the family that the note, shaving stand and purse were among the most precious things in the household and were foremost among items to be rescued in case of calamity.

The note is in Lee's hand and is headed by the hour, 11:20 (a.m.), and the date, "25 Apl '63." It begins, "Genl," and reads, "I have just rec'd your note. It is too late for me to get to the Artist by the hour designated. Vy truly RE Lee."

Krick said the last photograph of Jackson was taken that day at Belvoir, a private home south of Fredericksburg where Jackson was staying during a visit from his wife. It was she who persuaded him to have his photo taken, and apparently Jackson invited Lee to come as well. Mary Anna Jackson later described the three-quarter view as the image of her husband that was "the most soldierly looking," partly because where he was seated the wind blew in his face, "causing him to frown." She arranged Jackson's hair, and he wore a handsome new uniform, a gift from Gen. J.E.B. Stuart.

Fray said that while some urged her to sell the note at auction, "It never was considered of monetary value," and she felt more comfortable donating it. She made the gift to W&L in the name of her family in honor of her nephew, John Holt Merchant, professor of Southern history at W&L.

Krick estimated that the note would have brought $15,000 to $20,000 at auction. (Reprinted by permission, The Civil War News, October 1997).

MORE BOOKS ON THE WESTERN THEATER

If Craig Symonds' stirring presentation on Patrick Cleburne at our October meeting whetted your appetite for reading more deeply about the war in the West, you'll want to know about three recent and outstanding books on that subject.

For over twenty years, Wiley Sword's Shiloh, Bloody April was the sole authoritative book on the first big battle in the West. Now Shiloh, by Larry Daniel, (Simon & Schuster) joins the fray. Daniel's earlier work, published in Soldiering in the Army of Tennessee, established him as one of the leading historians of the Confederate army in the West. In his current book, Daniel captures the importance of this Union victory.

The Darkest Days of the War: The Battles of Iuka and Corinth (UNC) is a masterful study by Peter Cozzens, who has written similarly solid campaign accounts of Stones River, Chickamauga, and Chattanooga. This 1862 Confederate campaign, which pitted CSA generals Sterling Price and the colorful, but sometimes ineffective, Earl Van Dorn against USA generals Ulysses Grant and William Rosecrans, has long been neglected by historians. The poor coordination by the Confederate command and the high losses they incurred led not only to another Union success, but it left Union supply and communications in Mississippi intact and set the stage for Grant's aggressive Vicksburg campaign.

A recent main selection of the History Book Club is Sherman's Horsemen: Union Cavalry Operations in the Atlanta Campaign, authored by David Evans (Indiana University). This is an important addition to the growing scholarship devoted to the Atlanta Campaign, another formerly neglected area of study. Evans gives good accounts of Sherman's raids into the heartland of Georgia during a seven-week period in the summer of 1864. There is considerable information about the operations of Joe Wheeler CSA cavalry operations as well.

THE WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN

Upcoming Bus Tour With Civil War Historian, Chris E. Fonvielle, Ph.D.

Our members' continuing interest in the Wilmington Campaign is very apparent! Forty of you have signed up for a bus tour to be led by Chris Fonvielle in the near future! Though the date for the tour has not yet been set, your interest guarantees that the steering committee will soon be planning this all-day Saturday tour to sites associated with the 1865 capture of Wilmington and Forts Fisher and Anderson. To sign up, call Chris Fonvielle (H. 792-9091) or George Slaton (O. 452-7370). Or, better still, put your name on a sign-up sheet which will be available at the November meeting of the RT. We'll get more information to you soon.

A PARTING SHOT

This story comes to us courtesy of Conway Ficklen, a RT member and long-time student of the Civil War. At war's end, one of Stonewall Jackson's men was required to take the Oath of Allegiance to the United States before he could vote. After taking the oath, he asked the Union officer, "Does that make me a Yankee?"

"Well, yes, I guess it does," replied the officer.

Then the veteran of the old Stonewall brigade said loudly, "Well, Old Jack sure did whip the hell out of us in the Valley of Virginia, didn't he?!"

STONEWALL OF THE WEST PATRICK CLEBURNE AND THE CIVIL WAR An Evening With Craig L. Symonds

Cape Fear Club

Corner Second & Chestnut Streets

Tuesday, October 21

Social Hour 6:30-7:30 pm, Hors d'Oeuvres

Program 7:30 pm

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is proud to host at its October 21 meeting the recent biographer of one of the Civil War's most renowned combat generals! Craig L. Symonds is the author of Stonewall of the West: Patrick Cleburne and the Civil War, which appeared in Spring, 1997.

Wiley Sword, leading historian of the CSA Army of Tennessee, lauds Symonds' book, writing, "At last Pat Cleburne, who ranks as one of the Confederacy's best fighting generals, is getting the serious attention he deserves. Symonds' account is fresh and thought provoking. Cleburne's worthy story should be an inspiration to all who appreciate the highest virtue and character under extreme hardship and disadvantage."

And Albert Castel, who wrote the definitive history of the Atlanta Campaign, describes Dr. Symonds' accomplishment as, "The finest biography of one of the Confederacy's finest fighting generals that has been written or is likely to be written."

Craig Symonds is currently Professor of History at the U.S. Naval Academy (since 1986). He began teaching at the USNA in 1981, following a year as Assistant Professor at the U.S. Naval War College. Dr. Symonds has been a Visiting Professor at Britannia Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, England. He was an active duty officer in the U.S. Navy, 1971-1974.

Dr. Symonds, a California native, received his Ph.D. from the University of Florida. His Joseph E. Johnston: A Civil War Biography, published in 1994, is the best known work on Johnston. He has won numerous academic honors, edited and contributed to a number of books, written articles and reviews for many leading military journals, and given more than a hundred professional papers on military history at national conferences.

The social hour from 6:30-7:30 pm will feature lots of food and drink. Come early and socialize! And feel free to bring a guest to this special program.

BROTHER AGAINST BROTHER

The crisis that split the Union split many families as well, particularly in the divided border states.

At Gettysburg, the 7th West Virginia (Union), commanded by Lt. Col. Jonathan Lockwood, drove back the Confederate 7th Virginia. A Lt. Lockwood, CSA, and nephew of the regimental commander, was wounded and captured by his uncle's troops.

The Crittendens of Kentucky were another case. Maj. Gen. George B. Crittenden went with the South, while Maj. Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden and Col. Eugene W. Crittenden fought with the Union army. Their father, John J. Crittenden, was a U.S. Senator.

Maj. Gen. John C. Breckinridge, the former vice-president, and his three sons fought with the Confederacy, while their two cousins, Presbyterian ministers, stayed in the Union. One of these had two sons in the Confederacy and two in the Union army. A Yankee Breckinridge captured his Confederate brother in the battle before Atlanta. A daughter, Margaret E. Breckinridge, was a Sanitary Commission worker.

In the Monitor-Merrimac battle, the latter was commanded by Franklin Buchanan, C.S. Navy, while his brother, McKean, who had remained with the Union Navy, was killed in the sinking of the Congress.

William R. Terrill, Brig. Gen. USA, was killed at the Battle of Perryville, 8 October 1862, and his brother, James B. Terrill, Brig. Gen. CSA, was killed near Bethesda Church in May, 1864. Chester Hardy, Bvt. Brig. Gen. USA and son of the noted portrait painter, had one brother in the Union army and two in the Confederate.

Mrs. Abraham Lincoln, a native of Kentucky, had one full brother, three half-brothers, and three brothers-in-law in the Confederate army. Her half-sister Emilie, widow of the Confederate general, Ben Hardin Helm, visited her in the White House in the winter of 1863-64.

Confederate commissioner, John Slidell, was the paternal uncle of Union Gen. Ranald Slidell Mackenzie and Union naval officer Alexander Slidell Mackenzie.

Virginia-born Philip St. George Cooke chose to stay with the Union while his son, John R. Cooke, and his son-in-law, J.E.B. Stuart, went with the South. All three became generals. Philip St. George's nephew, John Esten Cooke, also chose the Confederacy and later wrote Wearing of the Gray.

Edwin V. Sumner's son-in-law, Armistead Long, resigned from the U.S. Army while serving as Sumner's aide and rose to be a Confederate general.

Henry B. McClellan became J.E. B. Stuart's Chief of Staff, and, after Stuart's death, was on R.E. Lee's staff and then Chief of Staff to Wade Hampton at the surrender of Johnston in North Carolina. He had four brothers who served in the Union army, one of them, Carswell, as adjutant general of Maj. Gen. A.A. Humphreys, commander of II Corps, Army of the Potomac. His first cousin was Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan, twice commander of the Army of the Potomac.

NORTH CAROLINA: THE CIVIL WAR CONNECTION

A Field Report

The Civil War conference, held the weekend of September 26-28 in Wilmington, was an enjoyable experience for well over one hundred CW enthusiasts from around the country. The speakers and the battle tours held the interest of participants, in spite of rainy weather.

The CFCWRT sponsored a silent auction, organized and led by Tommy King, to cover the costs associated with featuring William C. Davis as keynote speaker for the conference. The auction raised over $1500.00! The RT gives a special thanks to Tom Broadfoot, Chris Fonvielle, Albert Jewell, Tommy King, and Jim McCallum for donating significant items to be auctioned.

And the RT was well-represented at the conference! Tonia Smith, a key member of the NC Civil War Tourism Council, was a driving force behind putting the conference together. Jim McCallum and George Slaton volunteered during registration. Conference participants included Bob Cooke, Palmer and Mary Royal, Carolyn Godwin, Tom Carr, Ed Gibson, Bill Clark, Bert Williams, Beverly Tetterton, Gene Van der Molen, Carol Ringberg, Tom Morgan, Ed Russ, Bob Quinn, Tommy King, James McLaren, Bob and Linda Rand, and Joyce Binkley.

SHELBY FOOTE'S 80TH BIRTHDAY A Reporter's Interview

(The following newspaper story, written by Bill Thomas, appeared in an October, 1996 issue of The Commercial Appeal in Memphis TN, the home of Shelby Foote. Tommy King brought it to our attention, and the managing editor graciously allowed us to quote portions of it).

When I arrived, he was sitting in the room at the back of his magnolia-shaded house where he'd written the third and last volume of his monumental history, Civil War: A Narrative, a work so good it gives you the feeling he must have been there. Taking notes. I went to see Foote because he comes about as close to being a survivor of the Civil War as you can get without having actually been there and shot somebody or gotten shot yourself.

...Foote "fought" the Civil War as a writer five times longer than any soldier in the field. And when it was over, it had become the defining event of his writer's life. "There is no doubt but that that three-volume history of the Civil War defines me on the American literary scene," said Foote, who started out as a novelist and then spent 20 years researching and writing a war that took only four years to fight. He did it in style too, writing 1 and 1/2 million words in dipped pen and ink, which helps explain why it took so long.

"I was in more battles than any veteran of the war," noted Foote, who studied every engagement from both sides of the fence. His interest in the war bloomed early - his great-grandfather fought at Shiloh, where he got the tail shot off his horse and came home. "One Shiloh was enough for him," Foote said.

Foote started his first volume in the spring of 1954, and by the time he finished the last one in 1974, he'd become anti-war and was ready to put it all behind him. "I wanted to forget the Civil War," he said, "but then along came Ken Burns and that TV thing. Up to then, the book had sold well. But after that, it took off like a skyrocket."

The TV series brought Foote a flood of speaking offers, opening a new career at a time when most people should have welcomed it. Although "it pays well and is a great temptation," he turns down most of the offers because it interferes with his writing. However, he said, "I'll speak if (1) I feel an obligation to do it, (2) if it's in a place where I always wanted to go, and (3) if it's so much money I'd be a fool not to."

As for his 20-year immersion in the Civil War, Foote says, "My God, what a subject. Where am I going to find characters like William Tecumseh Sherman or Pat Cleburne? There was just a host of wonderful people to write about."

The work has made him internationally famous. "A German professor came by here and told me they now have American Civil War re-enactments in Germany. Problem was, everybody wanted to be a Confederate soldier. So they passed a rule: You had to do two years as a Federal soldier before you could become a Confederate."

Although pushing 80, Foote writes a lot, lectures a little and occasionally fights to keep Civil War battlefields from being destroyed by commercial developers. A while back, he helped stop a Disney theme park from encroaching on historic ground; more recently, he helped block a racetrack at the site of the Battle of the Big Black River outside Vicksburg, Miss. He is dismayed that the perimeter of Gettysburg is "one big hotdog stand."

Foote also comes to the defense of Civil War figures such as Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest when he feels they're being unfairly attacked. "Blacks would like to get rid of the memory of Forrest, and I can understand that," he said. "But they don't know Forrest, don't know what he stood for, and they don't understand the predicament people were in after that war. Forrest was probably the first imperial wizard of the KKK, but he dissolved it, and it should not be confused with the later Klan that did all the lynchings in the 1920's."

Asked if his life as a writer had turned out like he'd expected, Foote said, "I never worried about being rich or poor or any of those things. I just watched it unfold. Somebody is always asking would you do things differently if you had it all to do over again. Looking back, I don't think I'd change a single thing, including the wicked and sinful things."

Foote laughed at some unspoken memory. "In one of those letters (to Percy) I said, 'every sin I ever committed, I'm very glad I did. I just wish I'd done more.'" Copyright, 1996 The Commercial Appeal, Memphis TN. Used with permission.

ROUND TABLE PANEL DISCUSSION ON STONEWALL JACKSON November 13 Meeting

As many of you know, this past spring saw the publication of a monumental biography of Stonewall Jackson. James I. Robertson's Stonewall Jackson: The Man, The Soldier, The Legend, will probably never be surpassed by any future writer on the general. Each of you who have already picked up this book will surely agree with William C. Davis who exclaims, "Truly a stunning achievement. Stonewall Jackson must stand as one of the half-dozen preeminent 'lives' of the Civil War, and in its own right a landmark in American biography."

The November meeting will feature a Round Table panel and general discussion of the legendary Confederate general. We hope that members will consider buying or borrowing a copy of this biography and reading it before the meeting. Some members may just wish to brush up on what they already know about Jackson, and of course, some may come just wishing to learn more. Whatever you do, spend some time over the next month sorting through your ideas and knowledge about Stonewall so you'll be prepared for some rousing discussion and debate.

THE WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN

Upcoming Bus Tour With Civil War Historian, Chris E. Fonvielle, Ph.D.

Chris Fonvielle, whose Last Rays of Departing Hope: The Wilmington Campaign is doubtless on the bookshelf of nearly every member of the CFCWRT, has generously offered to lead another tour of sites associated with the 1865 campaign in the Cape Fear area. Our early members will remember the enjoyable Saturday bus tour in February, 1995 when Chris took us to these sites. Once again, on a Saturday, we'll be treated to a six-hour plus tour of the Forks Road battlesite, Sugar Loaf, Fort Fisher, and Fort Anderson.

If you are interested in signing up for this tour, call Chris Fonvielle (H. 792-9091) or George Slaton (O. 452-7370). Or, put your name on a sign-up sheet which will be available at the October meeting of the RT. As we get some idea of the number of members who wish to go, we'll plan and announce a tour date, which will likely be a weekend in the next three months.

THE 425+ GENERALS OF THE CONFEDERACY Described, Categorized, and Analyzed

September 18 Meeting
St. John's Episcopal Church

Who were these men, some of whom were immortalized and lionized in the mystique of the Lost Cause and some of whom faded forgotten into the past? Fame and notoriety, skill and incompetence, courage and cowardice, youth and old age, aristocrat and commoner, Southerner and Yankee, American and foreign, well-educated and poorly-educated, they are all represented in this group of 425 men. It is a group marked by contrast and diversity.

Harry Daniel, a member of the CFCWRT, has for many years researched the fascinating lives and fortunes of these Confederate commanders. He has traveled to their hometowns, visited their gravesites, and tracked their family connections, educational backgrounds, their pre and post-war careers. Harry's research has gleaned a wealth of knowledge and understanding, and his program will provide us with new perspectives about this group of men.

Harry, an ordained minister, is known throughout the Presbyterian Church in the southeastern states as a consummate teacher and Biblical scholar. He received his M.A. and Ph.D. from Vanderbilt University following his undergraduate work at Davidson College, his seminary training at Columbia Theological Seminary, and graduate work at the University of Chicago. He has won numerous academic awards and honors and published a number of articles in scholarly journals. Harry has taught at three seminaries and served churches in Louisville and Paducah, KY, Decatur, GA, Auburn, AL, and is currently serving as Interim Minister at St. Andrews-Covenant Presbyterian Church in Wilmington.

St. John's Episcopal Church, Elebush Hall, is the location for our first meeting of the new RT year. Refreshments will be served at 7:00 pm, and the program will begin at 7:30 pm. The steering committee is experimenting with a new location for the RT monthly meetings. This particular location provides free and easy space for social time and refreshments before the program. Come early and chat with your friends!

St. John's Episcopal Church is located at 1219 Forest Hills Drive, on the corner of Park Avenue. Parking is available on the median along Park Avenue or on the grassy lawn on the north side of the church which is accessible through the paved parking area behind the church. Please do not park in the paved area! Enter Elebush Hall through the covered archway in front (west side) of the church.

CUSHING FOR SALE!

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will sell at the September meeting copies of the summer '97 issue of Blue & Gray Magazine featuring historian Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr.'s article "William B. Cushing: Commando at the Cape Fear." Although best known for sabotaging the Confederate ironclad Albemarle at Plymouth NC in 1864, Cushing spent most of his wartime service with the U.S. Navy's Wilmington blockading squadron. The audacious commando made several daring raids behind enemy lines at the Cape Fear and later played a key role in the Wilmington Campaign. Dubbed the "darling of the American Navy," Cushing emerged from the Civil War better known and more popular than most admirals. Copies of the magazine are $5, with all proceeds donated to the RT.

BOOK REVIEW

THE WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN: LAST RAYS OF DEPARTING HOPE

Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr.
Savas Publishing Company, 1997

There it was. It was as if I'd always known it would be there for me. Why had it taken so long?

I rounded one of the countless corners on the Appalachian Trail as it coursed through western North Carolina. What I saw was not a soul-stirring vista, although there are plenty to enthrall the eye. I didn't even come across a black bear, although I'm still anticipating my first ursine encounter.

And there it was. Almost hidden amongst the lush springtime foliage was a pink Lady's Slipper, a lone mauve sentinel in a sea of green.

As a boy growing up in woodsy northern Minnesota, I had memorized that the Lady's Slipper was the state flower. And in years of rounding countless woodsy corners, there and elsewhere, I had never seen one and had never really given it much thought. So here I was, face to face with a reality, which heretofore had been just a vague neural connection, stored away years before for perhaps some future resurrection. Should I take its picture? No, better to savor the moment. Better to, in the words of inveterate hiker Colin Fletcher, (The Man Who Walked Through Time), put it on the "emulsion of my mind."

The Appalachian Trail is only one of my current journeys. Equally enjoyable is my journey through Civil War literature. As on the trail, there are lots of literary flowers, most of them rather generic reds and yellows, each important but few spectacular. But then, I rounded the corner and there stands another of those mauve sentinels, surpassing in scholarship or in storytelling or in just the fine tuning of the English language, the more generic of the latest "definitive work." Civil War scholar, Wilmington native and fellow Cape Fear Civil War Round Table member Chris Fonvielle has added another Lady's Slipper to the bookshelf.

Cover up the author's name and open the book to any page. What you will find is "comprehensive but succinct, scholarly without being pedantic...compellingly readable." These are the very words from the New York Times Book Review of James M. McPherson's Battle Cry of Freedom. They also apply to Fonvielle's new book. Read on. You'll soon discover that this work is "a model of historical presentation of the American Civil War, worthy to stand alongside the great works of narrative history." These words come from the dust jacket of Shelby Foote's Stars in Their Courses: The Gettysburg Campaign. They also apply.

So what has author Fonvielle done to be placed with such lofty company? Simply stated, he has woven in a most compelling fashion the elusive mixture of primary source material, photographs (many previously unpublished), maps and diagrams into a narrative tapestry that holds the reader captive from the opening chase of the blockade runner Advance to gain the protective umbrella of Fort Fisher's batteries to the Stars and Stripes hanging in Thalian Hall. In places, the language is almost poetic, reminiscent of Boris Pasternak as Zhivago struggles in revolution-torn Russia. The narrative, a surely difficult undertaking when faced with stacks of notecards, flows smoothly and with sufficient intrigue and expectation to hold the reader it its grasp. In his Foreward, North Carolina author Mark Bradley sensed this too, when he wrote that "Chris' narrative pulls readers into his drama and transports them..." Not since Killer Angels have I sat at the feet of such a masterful storyteller.

Like most of you, I'm usually plowing through two or three Civil War books at any time. And usually, given my ploddingly slow reading speed, I calculate how many weeks it's going to take me to "get through this one." flogging myself through another "classic" that everyone else seems to have read. And then came Last Rays of Departing Hope and I found myself wanting to stretch it out, make it last longer, savor the moment and imprint it on the "emulsion of my mind." It's that kind of flower. You've seen all the others. Turn the next corner. It's waiting for you there.

-John R. Krohn

UNION AND CONFEDERATE GENERALS: MEXICAN WAR CONNECTIONS May 8 Meeting

Thomas J. Prisk, a Licensed Gettysburg Battlefield Guide and member of the CFCWRT, will present our May 8 program! He will focus on the personal and professional military relationships of numerous Civil War generals, both North and South, who were senior U.S. Army officers during the Mexican War period. This is an area of pre-war history which is fascinating to those of us who have an interest in the lives and personalities of these men. The early experiences and relationships of these senior officers often prefigured the working relationships of those later generals who served in the same armies, as well as those who served on opposite sides in the conflict. We will learn about the dimensions of these friendships: pre-war cavalry, infantry, and artillery service, Mexican War decorations, West Point associations, wedding attendance and participation, and family connections.

Tom is an excellent and interesting speaker, and his past presentations to the RT have been well-attended. Tom, of course, has a particular expertise in Gettysburg history, but, since his move to North Carolina two years ago, he's also been researching NC Civil War history. Tom and his wife, Christine, live in Chapel Hill. He owns a company which provides computer training for industry.

Plan to attend this meeting, our last one until September, at 7:30 pm on Thursday, May 8, Room 132, Cameron Hall, at the UNC-W. Feel free to bring a friend!

JEFFERSON DAVIS VISITS WILMINGTON

It being understood that President Davis had left Charleston yesterday morning for Florence, our people looked for his arrival here about 7 or 8 o'clock last evening, and as a consequence, Market Street from the dock up to Second Street was filled by an immense concourse of people, while tar barrels and all other sources of illumination lit up the darkness. About 7 o'clock, a presidential salute from the guns of Southerland's Battery indicated the arrival at the depot of the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad of the President. He had been met on the road, we presume, by a delegation of the citizens, and was received at the depot by Gen. Whiting and staff, and by the mayor and a committee of citizens. As soon as the boat which conveyed him over the river touched the wharf on this side, a shout went up, and thus escorted by the authorities and accompanied by the people, President Davis proceeded to the residence of Gen. Whiting on Market Street below Second.

In a few minutes, the President made his appearance on the balcony, where he was welcomed in an appropriate manner by William A. Wright, Esq.

After his speech, a loud call was made upon Maj. Gen. Whiting who returned thanks for this evidence of regard, but insisted that he could not presume to address the audience after the able and eloquent speech of his Commander-in-Chief, President Davis. He could only pledge himself to do all in his power for the defense of Wilmington.

By nine o'clock, the street was cleared and the President left to rest and recruit himself. This morning, he accompanied Gen. Whiting down the river to examine the various works put up for its defense. (Wilmington Daily Journal, November 8, 1863)

PARTING SHOTS

Everyone agreed that our April meeting, featuring Chris Fonvielle and the debut of his Last Rays of Departing Hope: The Wilmington Campaign, was one of the best ever! We had the largest attendance in our history, with the exception of the band concert last year, ninety-five members and visitors. A dozen newcomers expressed interest in membership during the coming year. Many in attendance mentioned how much they enjoyed the social hour before the program. Our steering committee is trying to plan for more opportunities for future casual get-togethers.

As you know, Chris donated a portion of the proceeds of the book sale and signing to the RT. Our thanks to Chris for this contribution of $180.00! Chris will have some remaining numbered copies of his book at the May meeting for sale and signing; once again he will donate $3.00 from the sale of each book to the RT.

Many of you have asked about the Oakdale cemetery tour to be led by Wayne Carver. If his father's health stabilizes, Wayne will be at the May meeting and hopes to announce then an Oakdale tour on Saturday, May 10. (Hey, that's Confederate Memorial Day!) If the tour can't be held or if you're unable to go that day, Wayne plans to lead another Oakdale tour in the early fall.

One of the features of our May meeting will be the large display of photographs taken by Ed Gibson on our spring bus tour to Richmond and the Seven Days Campaign. Ed and his brother, Buzz Gibson, are veteran RT campaigners, having attended all the RT tours to date. Ed tells me that he has about three rolls of photos, so be sure to see them at the meeting. Many of you enjoyed seeing Ed Russ' photos from the tour at the April meeting. Maybe the display will convince more of you to go on our battlefield tour next year!

Some of you are taking other opportunities this spring to visit the battlefields or do CW research. John Krohn, Ted Lynch and Tom Prisk are going to Gettysburg for a two-day tour focused just on the second day's fighting in the Wheatfield! Dan Geddies recently visited Forts Pulaski and McAllister near Savannah and also did a walking tour of CW sites in the city. Bob Cooke is continuing his research on local CSA notable, Sewall Fremont; we hope Bob will share the results of his research with the RT. Tonia Smith is registered for the APCWS Conference in Hagerstown, Maryland. It's the 10th Anniversary of the founding of the preservation organization, and about 400 members from around the country have registered. Wayne Carver is ranging widely in his search for more Lower Cape Fear CW veterans and their burial sites. A couple of days ago, he was in Onslow County, tracking down the burial sites of veterans of the 3rd NC Cavalry which was raised in this area. Jim McCallum was thrilled to see his Confederate ancestor's photo in Chris' Last Rays. James Dallas Croom, Jim's great-grandfather, served in Co. B, 1st NC Heavy Artillery. We heard this week from Jerry Partrick, a founder of the RT. Jerry has recently moved to Chapel Hill where he lives within walking distance of the Southern Historical Collection at Wilson Library; the SHC is a major source of CW manuscript material. Jerry will be spending many hours researching his varied historical interests. Chris Fonvielle and George Slaton attended the 25th annual NVRHA Collectors' Show in Chantilly, Virginia. Chris signed copies of his book at the table of Savas Publishers. You'll remember that Ted Savas of San Jose, California, who also published Mark Bradley's book on Bentonville, was the speaker at our RT meeting in January. The NVRHA show is the oldest in the country, its first meeting was held in a fire station in 1972 in Fairfax, Virginia and was attended by many now old-time collectors. This show, having outgrown its second site in Fairfax, this year moved to a larger facility in Chantilly and doubled the exhibit tables available. Arrayed on dealer tables were CW documents, firearms, swords, uniforms, excavated relics, and other items for every level of CW collector. Tom Broadfoot of Broadfoot Publishing Company had his usual extensive stock of CW books available. The show location is situated near the site of the Battle of Chantilly which took place the day after Second Manassas, when Stonewall Jackson's corps pursued John Pope's retreating Union army.

In addition to Chris Fonvielle's busy April schedule which includes signings at area bookstores, Chris was a featured historian in a recent weekend tour held by the Civil War Education Association. He joined Mark Bradley, Mark Moore, and Ted Savas for a bus tour of the Aversboro and Bentonville battlefields. Then, the bus turned southward and brought the participants to Wilmington Campaign sites such as Fork's Road, Sugar Loaf, Forts Fisher and Anderson, and Town Creek. Chris says that the group was a determined bunch; they insisted on trudging through the rain for the 2.2 mile round trip to Sugar Loaf!

I've rambled on enough! Have a great summer and plan to join the Round Table in September for the 1997-1998 year. Look for the next newsletter in late August.

THE WILMINGTON CAMPAIGN An Evening with Chris Fonvielle

Golden Hawk Room
Trask Coliseum, UNC-W
Thursday, April 3
Social Hour 6:30-7:30 pm, Hor d'Oeuvres
Program 7:30 pm

What is certainly the most important event in Civil War history in Wilmington NC since the CW itself is about to take place! The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope, Chris Fonvielle's long awaited and eagerly anticipated history of the Wilmington campaign, is fresh off the press! And this comprehensive and ground-breaking book will debut at the April meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table!

The Wilmington Campaign: Last Rays of Departing Hope is the first study to examine, in sweeping detail, the entire campaign designed to capture one of the Confederacy's most important and heavily defended seaports. Prior books and articles have focused solely on the epic struggles for Fort Fisher, leading many students of the war to conclude that the campaign ended when that mighty bastion fell in January of 1865. In many respects, the campaign was just beginning.

Author Chris E. Fonvielle, Jr., a Wilmington native, has spent decades studying this complex campaign and walking its terrain. His research has uncovered a vast array of previously unused battle reports, correspondence, diaries and journals. The entire saga, told largely through the eyes of the fascinating personalities involved, includes complete coverage (with significant new information) of both battles for Fort Fisher, the first detailed examination of the attack upon and defense of Fort Anderson, a blow-by-blow account of CSA General Robert Hoke's gallant defense of the Sugar Loaf Line against overwhelming odds, comprehensive coverage of the operations of the powerful blockading fleet of Federal warships, a tactical study of the hand-to-hand engagement at Town Creek, dozens of the finest battle maps ever created, including a double-sided foldout featuring the defenses of the Cape Fear region and a meticulous map of Fort Fisher by cartographer Mark A. Moore, and scores of photographs, many of them unpublished!

James M. McPherson, the dean of Civil War historians in America, exclaims in a recent review: "Chris Fonvielle's narrative of the Wilmington Campaign is a splendid achievement! Most accounts end with the fall of Fort Fisher, but for Fonvielle that is only the dramatic beginning of the important effort to capture the Confederacy's leading port and turn it into a base to resupply Sherman's northward advance. This gripping chronicle of the five-weeks' campaign up the Cape Fear River adds a crucial dimension to our understanding of the Confederacy's collapse." What a ringing endorsement of Chris' contribution to CW scholarship!

Chris received his Ph.D. from the University of South Carolina and currently resides in Wilmington with his wife, Nancy, and their two daughters, Mary Katherine and Anne Fletcher.

The RT is hosting a reception to honor Chris' achievement. Members and their guests are invited to attend the reception, to begin at 6:30 pm, and then, at 7:30 pm, Chris' program on the Wilmington campaign. At the book-signing afterwards, Chris is generously offering to make your personal copy of his book a special one! The first 100 copies sold and signed at the RT meeting will be hand numbered 1-100 to signify forever that your book was acquired at its debut at a meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table! This will really be a memorable event. Come early and socialize with your RT friends!

CONFEDERATE RICHMOND AND THE SEVEN DAYS CAMPAIGN

The Round Table Spring Tour

On Friday morning, March 21, twenty-three members and friends of the CFCWRT boarded a chartered bus for our annual spring tour in Virginia. Our destination was Richmond, the old Capitol of the Confederacy, and the site of Lee's first campaign with the Army of Northern Virginia as he drove McClellan's Army of the Potomac away from the outskirts of the city.

On arrival, we met Jim Dupriest, our tour guide of Confederate Richmond. On both Friday afternoon and Sunday morning, Jim escorted us through the city, pointing out sites of interest and leading several walking tours. Richmond, Jim told us, was not only the South's third largest city, but its largest industrial center; its iron foundries and flour mills were indispensable to the war effort. We saw numerous wartime buildings, the site of Libby Prison, the House of Delegates chamber in the Capitol where Lee accepted command of the Confederate forces in Virginia, Second Presbyterian Church where Stonewall Jackson worshiped (and often, because he was fatigued, slept through the sermon!), the White House of the Confederacy, the site of the old Spotswood Hotel where Confederate luminaries often congregated, the post-war Confederate Soldiers' Home, Tredegar Iron Works, and, finally, Hollywood Cemetery where thousands of Confederate soldiers are buried. We visited the graves of Jefferson Davis, Jeb Stuart, and many other figures from the Confederate period. Our group also toured St. Paul's Episcopal Church near the Capitol where the pews of Lee and Davis bear brass plaques.

On Friday evening, Robert E. Lee Krick, a well-known CW historian and our tour guide, presented an overview of the Seven Days campaign. We got a taste of how thrilling our battlefield tour would be! And Saturday was a full day of walking the fields and getting a firsthand feel for what was the largest campaign of the CW. Our first visit was to Seven Pines where CSA Gen. Johnston finally attacked McClellan a month before Lee took command. This site is entirely compromised by development, but we saw the area where CSA Gen. D.H. Hill's troops, many of them North Carolinians, assaulted USA Gen. Silas Casey's redoubt and entrenchments. The next stop was the Dabbs House, Lee's HQ, where the CSA commander planned the coming campaign. At Beaver Dam Creek, we saw the area where the 1st and 3rd North Carolina regiments took heavy casualties as they sought to force the USA 5th Corps from the heights above the creek. Then we went to the magnificent battlefield of Gaines' Mill. There we walked a mile or so to a rarely visited site on private property where CSA Gen. Samuel Garland forced a breakthrough on the extreme Federal right. Here the 20th North Carolina regiment (composed of troops from Duplin, Columbus, and Sampson counties) was successful in taking a Federal battery. And we visited the better known site of CSA Gen. John B. Hood's dramatic breakthrough on the Federal left.

After lunch, we went to Savage's Station, a site nearly obliterated by I-64. We stopped at White Oak Swamp where Jackson's tardiness helped undercut chances for Confederate success. We then arrived at the battlefield of Frayser's Farm. Here, many historians believe, Lee had his greatest chance to rout or destroy a Federal army; however, poor command communication caused a breakdown in coordination. Yet the fighting at Frayser's Farm was fierce, and Bob Krick took us to the area where CSA Gen. Cadmus Wilcox's troops engaged in hand-to-hand fighting with Pennsylvanians defending Randol's battery. Our Saturday tour ended with a walking tour of the climactic Malvern Hill. Recently, the battlefields of Frayser's Farm and Malvern Hill were enlarged by 750 acres through the efforts of APCWS whose members raised $2,500,000.00. Most of both battle sites had been in private hands. This purchase includes the area around the Parsonage where D.H. Hill's troops massed for the attack against strong Federal defenses on Malvern Hill. Here, Col. Gaston Meares (3rd NC) of Wilmington fell mortally wounded.

Members were entranced with Bob Krick's stirring first-person accounts of the fighting during the Seven Days. He guided us to sites where some of our soldier ancestors' regiments were engaged. Bob's encyclopedic knowledge and expertise, as well as his attention to members' particular interests guaranteed an enjoyable and successful tour. Let's start packing for next year!

TOUR OF OAKDALE CEMETERY

March 15 Meeting

9:45 a.m.

As announced earlier, the members of the Round Table are invited to take a tour of Oakdale Cemetery, visiting the graves of Union and Confederate soldiers on Saturday morning, March 15, with Wayne Carver who presented our February program on the many Civil War personalities of the Lower Cape Fear area interred at Oakdale Cemetery. That program introduced members to numerous obscure, but important, local figures from enlisted men through colonels who are buried at Oakdale. And we'll also see the gravestones of some of the well-known general officers.

Meet at the entrance to Oakdale Cemetery (at the end of 15th Street north of Market Street) at 9:45 a.m. We'll then begin the tour promptly at 10:00 and should be finished by noon. Rain date is Sunday, March 16, at 2:00 p.m. This will be a nice outing for everyone. Bring friends and family if you wish.

DR. JAMES MCCALLUM'S BOOK RECENTLY REPUBLISHED

Martin County During The Civil War

Jim McCallum, an active member of the RT who serves on the steering committee, authored Martin County During The Civil War in 1971. He completed this book after extensive research into Martin County, NC's contributions to the war effort. A notable achievement in Jim's research was his "discovery" of Fort Branch, a CSA earthwork fortification perched on the Roanoke River to guard against the approach of Federal gunboats. The site of Fort Branch was virtually lost to history until Jim found its location and, through years of effort and cleanup, preserved an impressive Civil War site that is appreciated to this day by many visitors.

Jim's excellent Martin County, a hardbound book of 188 pages, has been republished by the Martin County Historical Society. The book includes a survey of the county's history, wonderfully detailed service histories of every company raised in the county, and a good account of the fighting within the bounds of Martin county. Readers will also find a lengthy account of Fort Branch; a diagram drawing is included. Rosters and sketches of Martin County soldiers complete this CW history which is available through Fort Branch Battlefield Commission, Box 355, Hamilton NC 27840 at $20.00 plus $4.00 postage. Proceeds go towards the preservation of Fort Branch.

UPCOMING PROGRAMS

The RT year will close with two excellent programs! On Thursday, April 3, the RT will have a special meeting and reception featuring Chris Fonvielle as speaker. Chris will have on hand his new book, Last Rays of Departing Hope: The Wilmington Campaign for sale and for signing. In fact, Chris is honoring the Round Table by debuting his book at our April meeting which will be held in the Golden Hawk Room at Trask Coliseum! More about this in next month's newsletter. Then, on Thursday, May 8, we're fortunate once again to have Tom Prisk of Raleigh to present a fascinating program on the Generals, both Blue and Gray, and their personalities, careers and friendships before the war. Put both these events on your calendar!

WOMEN OF WILMINGTON

In addition to giving six of her sons to the cause of the Confederacy, Mrs. Armand J. DeRosset was endowed with such leadership and organizational abilities that it was often said of her, "She should have been a general!" Under her direction, the Soldiers' Aid Society in Wilmington was early organized, and for four years did its work with unabated energy. With the assistance of the women of Wilmington, large supplies were obtained, made and kept on hand. Canvas bags were made to be filled with sand and used in the fortifications of Fort Fisher. Canteens were covered, haversacks made, also cartridges for the rifles, and powder kegs for the great columbiads were made by the hundreds.

Mrs. DeRosset had a large room in her own home fitted up as a store room, seizing every chance to secure supplies through the blockade.

Mrs. DeRosset's ability to overcome difficulties in getting all she needed for the men was the constant wonder of those who assisted her. One example displays this. After the first attack on Fort Fisher, the garrison, in great peril, was to be reinforced with Junior Reserves. The wires brought the news that in a few hours they would arrive, hungry and footsore. When Mrs. DeRosset was asked if the ladies could feed them, the ready reply came, "Of course we can." And through the energy and resources of herself and assistants, she proved equal to the task.

In addition, they nursed through the harrowing scenes of hospital life and tenderly buried the dead. When all was over, the band of faithful women, in July, 1866, organized a permanent memorial association with the purpose of rescuing from oblivion the names and graves of the gallant soldiers who are buried in and near Wilmington.

(Compiled by Wayne Carver from North Carolina Women of the Confederacy and Chronicles of the Lower Cape Fear River).

SPRING BUS TOUR March 21-23

There are still a few seats remaining on the bus for the RT spring tour to Confederate Richmond and the Seven Days Campaign. Our plans are now to take a 23-passenger bus. Those signed up for the tour are: Bill Clark, Lee Johnston, John Krohn, Palmer and Mary Royal, Don Patience, Tonia Smith, Ed Russ, George Wolf, Gene and Jean Van Der Molen, Dan Geddie, Wayne Carver, and George Slaton.

This will be a super tour with Robert E. Lee Krick, a well-respected CW historian. Mr. Krick will give us an overview of the Seven Days Campaign on Friday night, then accompany us on Saturday to the several battlefields of the struggle between Lee and McClellan. On Friday afternoon and Sunday morning, we'll do a tour of Confederate-era Richmond. Those who take the tour will come home with a much richer understanding of this campaign which involved more total fighting men than any other campaign of the war. (I've personally taken this tour twice before with historians and can't get enough of it!)

So give it some further thought and consider joining the tour. Call Dan Geddie (H. 799-5338) or George Slaton ((O. 452-7370) and send in your check for sign-up. But hurry!

BATTLEFIELD LAND PURCHASE AT BENTONVILLE

The acquisition of ten key acres recently by the Bentonville Battleground Historical Association is highly significant because this portion of the field was the scene of the Grand Charge of Gen. William B. Taliaferro's South Carolina and Georgia Confederates against the Union 20th Corps commanded by Gen. Alpheus Williams. The tract of land lies directly behind State Historic Marker #10 which notes that the Confederates made five attacks against this Union position. As Mark Bradley writes, "For more than an hour, Taliaferro's men...charged into a 'leaden hailstorm' of Yankee bullets and shrapnel." This land is being transferred the State of North Carolina. You can join BBHA, Box 432, Newton Grove NC 28366 with a contribution of $20. or more.

CIVIL WAR SOLDIERS AT OAKDALE CEMETERY

February 13 Meeting

8:00 pm

Wayne Carver, a member of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, has spent many hours in recent weeks creating an inventory of Civil War veterans, both Confederate and Union, buried in Wilmington's Oakdale Cemetery. Wayne has been locating these veterans at Oakdale, then researching their personal biographies at the public library's North Carolina Room.

At our February meeting, Wayne will present a program about some of the very interesting discoveries that he's made about soldiers at Oakdale. He has unearthed some fascinating war stories about some of these enlisted men, lieutenants, captains, majors, and colonels. Though many of us are familiar with the war records of some of the more well-known local heroes, there is a wealth of information about lesser known soldiers whose lives and military service was often just as colorful and adventuresome.

Wayne will discuss such local men as Captain James I. Metts, Commander Joseph Price, CSN, and Octavius Wiggins who fought in 22 battles, was captured at Gettysburg, and later made a successful escape!

Note the shift in the meeting time for the February meeting to 8:00 pm. (We have a conflict this month at our regular 7:30 pm time). The meeting will be held in Cameron Hall on UNC-W campus, Room 132, 8:00 pm, on Thursday, February 13.

SPRING BUS TOUR: RICHMOND AND THE SEVEN DAYS CAMPAIGN

Tour March 21-23.....Sign-Up Deadline Monday, March 3

The Seven Days campaign is a fascinating one. For those of you who have read accounts of the Seven Days, but have never been able to grasp the sequence of events from the beginning to the end of the campaign, this tour will orient you to the the flow of the fighting from one battlefield to another. Gaines' Mill and Malvern Hill are particularly well-defined battlefields with dramatic terrain. Gaines' Mill was fought on steep slopes where Union troops were well-entrenched; the determined and aggressive fighting of Garland's North Carolinians and Hood's Texans broke the Union line and routed the Federals. Malvern Hill was the site of another well-entrenched Union infantry and artillery line where uncoordinated Confederate attacks cost the lives of thousands of southerners, leaving the Federals in command of the hill.

If you've never been on a concentrated CW battlefield tour like the one we'll have in March, you may not realize its benefits. One benefit is the cost. Most weekend tours like ours charge $175.00-$200.00 for the tour alone; your transportation and lodging are additional. Another benefit is that of being in a small group where you have greater access to the tour guide, more opportunity to ask questions of particular interest to you. And a third benefit is of course the chance to get to know your fellow RT members better!

The tour's cost is $185 per person double occupancy and $235 single occupancy. This includes two nights at the Sheraton Inn, dinner Friday night, Saturday box lunch, dinner Saturday night, and guide service fees. Sign-up deadline is Monday, March 3. Your check (given or sent to Dan Geddie, CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405) is your reservation. Don't miss it!

EXTRA RATINGS

* Just as planned, "Little Billy," the light twelve-pounder Napoleon named for CSA General WHC Whiting, who fought at Fort Fisher until the bitter end, boomed away with a hefty gunpowder charge at 10:00 am on January 10 in Oakdale Cemetery! The event was a dedication of this cast bronze reproduction artillery piece mounted on a hand-crafted carriage purchased by the Fort Fisher Restoration Committee. The cannon has now become a permanent display at Fort Fisher Historic Site. Present were RT members Tom Morgan, Bob Cooke, Palmer Royal, Dan Geddie, Chris Fonvielle, Wayne Carver, and George Slaton.

* How's this for a Christmas gift?! Tonia Smith of Pinehurst, one of our most enthusiastic and knowledgeable RT members, was surprised this Christmas with some unique CW gifts from her husband. She's now the delighted owner of an original 1864 Springfield-type .58 caliber musket manufactured by Colt and a Model 1860 Light Cavalry Sabre; both arms were widely used during the Civil War! Tonia will not only enjoy owning these artifacts from the war, but she'll also be utilizing them as she presents public school enrichment programs on the Civil War for children, grades 3 through 7. Tonia is also an active member of the North Carolina Tourism Council which is promoting Civil War sites in the state.

* Some years ago, Bob Cooke, RT member, purchased a group of Union soldier letters in a bookshop. Daniel Isaac Underhill of Long Island, NY enlisted in the Harris Light Cavalry (2nd New York Volunteers) in 1862. Soon he was writing letters home to his family. Dan participated in the great cavalry battle at Brandy Station in June, 1863 and was soon after wounded in the fighting at nearby Aldie, Virginia. His letters describe his battle experiences and his hospitalization. After recovering from his wound, Dan continued serving with the Harris Lights during the early months of 1865 up until Appomattox. In the summer of 1868, Dan was found unconscious in Central Park in New York City and died three days later. Ironically, after years of combat on horseback, he had apparently fallen from his horse during an evening ride. Bob researched Underhill's life and located his gravestone in an Oyster Bay, Long Island, cemetery. He's also written a biographical sketch on this Union cavalryman, Daniel Isaac Underhill (1833-1868): A Soldier of the Harris Light Cavalry.

* Look in the most recent issue of North Carolina Historical Review (No. 4, October 1996) for an interesting and lengthy article titled "Confederate Shipbuilding on the Cape Fear River." The article gives a good account of wartime ship-building activities at the Beery and Cassidey shipyards in Wilmington.

* An increasingly popular hobby for many CW students is that of "necrolithology," which involves tracking down burial places of Union and Confederate soldiers, especially officers. In 1985, Steve Davis of Atlanta began publishing Grave Matters, a newsletter for people hunting for burial sites of generals. The readership of the newsletter, published for six years, was around 300. Publication lapsed in 1991. However, Philip Arnold of Fallbrook, California, has now resumed publication of Grave Matters and has 250 subscribers. This quarterly newsletter, devoted primarily to the burial places of USA and CSA generals, is available at $10.00 year from Grave Matters, 405 South Main Street, Fallbrook, CA 92028.

* The RT is planning a tour of Oakdale Cemetery to be led by Wayne Carver. We hope to plan this for a Saturday or Sunday in March, thereby giving an opportunity for an outing for members who are unable to travel to Virginia for the bus tour. The Oakdale tour will not be held, however, on the Virginia tour weekend (March 21-23), so that members can take in both tours if they want! The Oakdale tour will be a great follow-up to Wayne's program this month.

* Ted Lynch will once again offer raffle tickets on behalf of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table at the February 13 meeting. Several books, donated by Tom Broadfoot of Broadfoot Publishing Company, will be raffled. Tickets are only $1.00 each, the proceeds of which go to the Round Table.

TWENTY-TWO DAYS OF TERROR: THE SAGA OF THE C.S.S. ARKANSAS January 9 Meeting

Theodore P. Savas is the editor of the popular Civil War Regiments: A Journal of the American Civil War, a quarterly devoted to the scholarly examination of Union and Confederate regiments in particular battles or campaigns as well as other CW subjects. His Savas Publishers produced Mark Bradley's book on the Battle of Bentonville and will be printing Chris Fonvielle's forthcoming book on the Wilmington Campaign. Ted, an attorney in San Jose, California, has authored numerous Civil War articles and book reviews and co-edited The Campaign for Atlanta & Sherman's March to the Sea (1994). He served as Project Historian for the recent expedition to find the submarine CSS Hunley, off Charleston, SC, in August-September, 1994. Ted is well-known to many in the Civil War community and is regarded as one of the nation's authorities on the American Civil War. Ted co-founded the San Jose Civil War Round Table several years ago and he's been a presenter at many RT's and CW conferences around the country.

Ted's topic for our January meeting will be the brief, but exciting career, of the CSS Arkansas which operated in the summer of 1862 in the Yazoo and Mississippi Rivers. In its first engagement, this Confederate ironclad encountered three Union vessels; it disabled the Carondelet and caused the Tyler and the Queen of the West to retreat.

Ted is a very lively and dynamic speaker, and we're fortunate to have him visit us from the West Coast. He will also bring a number of his recently published Civil War titles which will be available for purchase by RT members.

Our first meeting of the New Year will be held in Cameron Hall on UNC-W campus, Room 132, 7:30 pm, on Thursday, January 9. (Cameron Hall is located 200-300 yards east (or behind) King Hall, where our meetings were held last year. Parking Lot R is just in front of Cameron Hall, while Parking Lot S is the next closest to our new location).

SPRING BUS TOUR: RICHMOND AND THE SEVEN DAYS CAMPAIGN ! Time to Sign Up !

The Seven Days Campaign marked the debut of Robert E. Lee as the field commander of the legendary Army of Northern Virginia. In a series of aggressive initiatives, Lee attacked McClellan's huge Army of the Potomac at Beaver Dam Creek, Gaines' Mill, Savage Station, Frayser's Farm, and Malvern Hill. On our Saturday tour with Robert E. Lee Krick we'll visit each of these sites.

Our tour will also cover Confederate Richmond; on Friday afternoon and Sunday morning, we'll see numerous sites in the old Capitol of the Confederacy associated with the war.

We leave Wilmington at 8:00 am Friday, March 21 and return about 4:30 Sunday afternoon, March 23. We've reserved rooms at the very comfortable Sheraton Inn where we'll enjoy Friday dinner with Mr. Krick who will provide an overview of the Seven Days Campaign.

The cost is $185 per person double occupancy and $235 single occupancy. This total includes two nights at the Sheraton, dinner Friday night, Saturday box lunch, dinner Saturday night, and guide service fees. Sign-up deadline is Monday, March 3. Your check (given or sent to Dan Geddie, CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405) is your reservation. Let's fill up the bus!

CONFEDERATES AT OAKDALE CEMETERY

On Sunday afternoon, November 24, at 3:00 pm, local members of the McRae family, as well as Dan Geddie, Harry Daniel, John D. Taylor, Wayne Carver, Chris Fonvielle, and George Slaton of the Round Table gathered at Oakdale for a rededication of the gravemarker for CSA Brigadier General William McRae. General McRae, a Wilmington native, was a hard-fighting brigade commander in Lee's army. This ceremony resulted from the efforts of Chris Fonvielle and Hugh McRae of Wilmington and Scott Mauger of Richmond to secure an attractive marble tombstone for the general. Hugh McRae, a descendent, gave a summary of General McRae's life and military service. A CSA reenactment color guard was on hand and fired volleys from their period muskets. It was an impressive ceremony.

Afterwards, several of us gathered with Scott Mauger to look for other Confederate soldier tombstones in the cemetery. Scott is a well-known necrolithologist, a Civil War enthusiast who searches out the burial places of Union and Confederate soldiers, especially generals and other officers. He has personally visited the gravesites of every CSA general, about 425 in number! As our group walked through the cemetery, encountering a number of officers' gravesites, our enthusiasm grew. We talked about the possibility of researching and recording all the CW soldiers' burial at Oakdale.

The next day, Wayne Carver was out at Oakdale bright and early! Armed with a very brief list of Confederates compiled by the Oakdale staff, Wayne began systematically walking through the cemetery, looking for the small CSA marble markers placed by the United Daughters of the Confederacy at the foot of soldiers' graves. Wayne then moved back and forth from the graves to the cemetery office, gathering information and plotting locations. Soon, he was using James Sprunt's 1914 Chronicles of the Lower Cape Fear to determine the names and service of Wilmington area CSA officers who were likely buried at Oakdale. Day after day, Wayne visited Oakdale, finding more and more CSA officer burials. To this date, Wayne has located the burials of 160 Confederates, mostly officers, in Oakdale Cemetery! These include at least 3 generals, 17 colonels, 7 lieutenant colonels, 14 majors, 46 captains, 38 lieutenants, 8 surgeons, 2 chaplains, 4 sergeant majors, 1 spy, and 1 attorney general! Recently, Dan Geddie and I spent four hours following Wayne through Oakdale as he pointed out the gravesites of many of these veterans. Dan is now compiling a list of CSA enlisted men buried at Oakdale.

Our idea eventually is to make a complete list of these CSA burials and then add a brief biographical sketch of each soldier found. Wayne has already done considerable research in the North Carolina Room at the public library with the help of Beverly Tetterton.

And Wayne's enthusiasm is already taking him beyond Oakdale! Several days ago, Wayne tracked down the grave of CSA Captain Edward C. Armstrong, a well-known local officer who was killed at Spotsylvania Courthouse in May, 1864. He found Armstrong's grave in a small and obscure family cemetery in Pender County, probably on the site of the former Armstrong plantation.

We hope to plan a spring tour of Confederate Oakdale for RT members. In the meantime, if you're interested in joining Wayne Carver in his searching and researching, he would be happy for you to contact him at 791-0105 (home). This is a big project which has room for several volunteers.

And one thing leads to another. The morning that Wayne, Dan and I were at Oakdale, an elderly lady stopped her car to ask directions to the grave of General WHC Whiting. Turns out she was a Whiting family descendent visiting from Pennsylvania. After a long discussion about Whiting, we led her to his grave and helped her do a rubbing of the inscription. She confessed that, though she herself is proud of her connection to the general, the published history of the Whiting family, which has strong roots in the North, left out any mention of General Whiting who was seen by other family members as 'that Rebel general!'

And speaking of Oakdale Cemetery....you may be interested in visiting the cemetery on Friday, January 10, at 10:00 am. You'll witness the dedication of 'Little Billy,' a reproduction Model 1857 light twelve-pounder Napoleon bronze cannon which will become a permanent display at Fort Fisher Historic Site. The cannon, of course, is named for General Whiting! The cannon will likely be fired at Oakdale during the dedication, a sight and sound to behold.

That Saturday, January 11, 3:30 pm, there will be a reenactment at Fort Fisher of the Union infantry charge of the fort. Both Union and Confederate reenactors will take part. A Civil War encampment will be held Saturday and Sunday for the public. It's free and sounds like fun.

LAST CALL FOR MEMBERSHIP Sign up Now!

The September and October newsletters were mailed to 160 known Civil War enthusiasts in the larger Wilmington area. This number includes 90 paid members from the 1995-96 year, as well as former members and other interested persons.

The Round Table meets monthly from September through May. Monthly meetings feature programs reflecting various aspects of the American Civil War. Our membership seems to favor programs about battles and military/political leaders of the war. We've had a number of programs on CW naval subjects. The RT has also provided three bus tours. During the first year, we took Saturday tours to sites of the Wilmington/Fort Fisher campaign, led by Chris Fonvielle and to Bentonville, led by Mark Bradley. Our second year offered a weekend tour of the Battle of Petersburg/Lee's Retreat in Virginia led by Chris Calkins. Each of these tour leaders are the acknowledged authorities on the battles featured in their tours.

The current 1996-97 Round Table year once again provides opportunities for members to enjoy monthly programs as well as a weekend tour of the Seven Days Campaign (Richmond Va area) in March, 1997 to be led by Robert E. L. Krick. The cost of membership is only $20.00 and covers primarily the cost of the monthly newsletter and speakers' expenses during the year.

The RT has succeeded in bringing some top-flight Civil War historians to Wilmington. We feel that the quality of our programs improves each year and we're proud to say that we have some very active members who drive 75-125 miles for our meetings.

Our RT, one of approximately 225 Round Tables across the country, is devoted to taking a serious look at fascinating CW topics. It's a non-partisan group which welcomes men and women with ties both North and South. Our membership reflects everyone from the casual reader to the inveterate researcher.

The Round Table officers for this year are George Slaton, President, (O. 452-7370), Dan Geddie, Treasurer (H. 799-5338), Tommy King (H. 763-2930), Ted Lynch (H. 762-6445), Chris Fonvielle (H. 792-9091), Jim McCallum (H. 686-1597), and James McLaren (H. 686-9359). Call us with any questions about the RT.

Remember.....you must send in your check for $20.00 by October 31st in order to receive the next issue of the newsletter. Of course, you can join the RT at any time after that, but only those who have joined by Oct 31st will be included in the November mailing. If you have an interest in the American Civil War, you should take a look at joining the RT for the current year. We'd like to welcome you into our ranks!

.....And Looking Ahead.....the November 14 RT program will be The Union Sixth Corps at Gettysburg. Tom Prisk, our speaker, asks that members read up on this subject. A good source is the classic The Gettysburg Campaign, by Edward Coddington. Also, we hope to reschedule Dr. Stephen Wise's program on Blockade Running and the Civil War which was canceled due to Hurricane Fran.

Mail the form below along with $20.00 membership fee (Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405) or present to Treasurer, Dan Geddie at the next meeting!

GENERAL ROBERT F. HOKE: LEE'S MODEST WARRIOR December 5 Meeting

Daniel W. Barefoot, in his recently published General Robert F. Hoke: Lee's Modest Warrior, has made a significant contribution to Civil War history in highlighting this underappreciated Confederate general from North Carolina. His book is a long overdue portrait of a forgotten American hero whose life and military service merits the study and attention that Hoke is beginning to receive. Mr. Barefoot is a graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill where he was Phi Beta Kappa and the University of North Carolina School of Law. A resident of Lincolnton, Mr. Barefoot has published two previous books about his native state. We're fortunate to have Daniel W. Barefoot as our guest speaker for the December meeting of the RT.

General Hoke was the youngest major general in the Confederate army. Ulysses Grant said he suffered the "worst whipping of the war" at this man's hands. The march Hoke led from New Bern to Kinston was taught at West Point as one of the most rapid troop movements in the history of warfare. It is even a longstanding tradition in North Carolina that Hoke was Lee's personal choice to take command of the Army of Northern Virginia in the event of Lee's death or disability. Yet too few people are aware of Robert F. Hoke.

Two weeks before his 24th birthday, Hoke witnessed the first Confederate casualty at the first battle of the war at Big Bethel, Va. It was Hoke who provided the rear guard as Joseph E. Johnston surrendered the bulk of the South's fighting men at Bennett House in Durham, the last surrender of the war. In between, Hoke saw action in virtually every significant battle in the East. He missed Gettysburg because of a serious injury he sustained at Chancellorsville. Ironically, Col. Isaac Avery was riding Hoke's black warhorse when he was killed leading Hoke's brigade in its famous charge up Cemetery Hill.

After he returned to action, Hoke was sent to recapture Plymouth and New Bern in eastern NC. After capturing Plymouth, Hoke was laying siege to New Bern when Lee ordered him back to Virginia. After holding off Grant at Cold Harbor, Hoke returned to his native state to defend Fort Fisher. Hoke commanded the Confederate forces in the Sugar Loaf area north of Fort Fisher and there resisted Federal attacks. Then Hoke continued to defend Wilmington as he retreated toward the city. Hoke will forever be associated with the Wilmington campaign. Afterwards, General Hoke played a conspicuous role in temporarily halting Sherman's advance at Bentonville. In this last battle of the war, Hoke commanded most of the North Carolina troops, including the "Red Infantry," under the command of Wilmington's Colonel John D. Taylor.

Just as admirable as his wartime achievements was the life Hoke led after the war. Despite being from a family who had long been prominent in state and national political affairs, Hoke refused to run for any political office. He became a champion of economic rebirth in the South, playing an instrumental role in the rebuilding of railroads and the development of the mining industry. When he died at the age of 75, the downtown streets of Raleigh were draped in black for his funeral, the flags in the state capitol were flown at half mast, and the state legislature was closed.

Hoke is a Civil War figure who clearly deserves the attention he will receive when the RT gathers in Cameron Hall on UNC-W campus, Room 132, at 7:30 pm, on Thursday, December 5. Mr. Barefoot will have his book on hand for purchase and signing. (Cameron Hall is located 200-300 yards east (or behind) King Hall, where our meetings were held last year. Parking Lot R is just in front of Cameron Hall, while Parking Lot S is the next closest to our new location).

THE HISTORIANS SPEAK

Panel Discussion

The annual conference of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites was held in Nashville during the last week of April, 1996. The focus for the weekend was Hood's Tennessee campaign. One of the features of the conference was a panel discussion led by Western Theater historians: Wiley Sword, Kent Masterson Brown, Brian Steel Wills, Edwin Bearss, Joseph Glatthar, Herman Hattaway, John Marzalek, and Jack Hurst. The panelists entertained questions from the audience. Here's a sketch of the discussion.

The first question was: Where was the war won, in the Eastern or Western Theater? Ed Bearss pointed to the efforts of Sherman, observing that when Sherman arrived in Goldsboro NC after his march from Savannah, Grant had pinned Lee down at Petersburg. "Sherman cut the heart out of the South, destroying the South's will to fight." Wiley Sword pointed out that the Army of Northern Virginia and the Army of Tennessee were the pillars that propped up the Confederacy. Both were vital. The war, he said, was lost in the West when the Army of Tennessee was defeated at Franklin and Nashville. John Marzalek observed that many historians agree now that the war in the West was crucial to the final outcome and that this view represents a turnaround from the former traditional focus on the war in the East.

In response to a question about the current and ongoing fascination with the Civil War, Kent Masterson Brown mused that, "We are a people who are characterized by rebellion, who don't like central authority, a people who are spellbound by an idea." He said that there are many people who, though they know little about the Civil War, are still captivated by it because it's about a group of people who felt they could accomplish something by rebelling. "That's a major cultural theme." Also, "there's something spellbinding about Jeb Stuart running rings around George McClellan." Herman Hattaway added that Lincoln spoke to the people about "the transcending meaning of the Union."

To the question: Did the Confederacy have a chance to win the war?, Joseph Glatthar responded, "Yes, if they could have convinced the Northern public that the price was high enough. If the South had won at Antietam, he suggested, the North might have lost its will to fight. Herman Hattaway agreed that the South could have won. "It was an interesting war because it was a close call." He added that Lincoln's election in 1864 signaled the end of the war.

Someone posed the question: Which was the better army, the Army of Northern Virginia or the Army of Tennessee? Wiley Sword stated that the AOT displayed great character and fortitude in facing its defeats. While the ANV so often dealt with success, the AOT was "the best in dealing with adversity." Ed Bearss reminded the audience that, though the AOT was not endowed with good high command leadership ("there was no charismatic father figure like RE Lee"), the rank and file of the AOT was as good or better than the ANV. Arthur Fremantle, the British journalist who visited both armies, said the AOT was as good as its eastern counterpart, but that there were no corps commanders equal to Jackson or Longstreet.

Joseph Glatthar, responding to the question: "Was Hood's Tennessee campaign a good idea?" said that Hood felt he had to go after Sherman's supply lines. The problem was, he said, that Sherman had decided he could operate without his supply lines, and so Sherman out-manuevered Hood by letting him go to Tennessee.

Most of the historians on the panel responded to a question about the Confederate flag issue. They seemed to agree that the misuse of this historic symbol has led to a polarization of the issue. One panelist added that the flag's use by radical groups has made it hard for others to fly the flag simply out of pride. Another panelist observed that "good people should have stopped radical groups from using the flag" for political reasons.

A final question was: "Why should we preserve CW battlefields?" Ed Bearss said that, "until you have seen and walked the terrain, you cannot understand a particular battle." He reminded us that Lincoln told his audience at Gettysburg that, "the land has been consecrated by blood." Bearss then told a very moving story about a Vietnam veteran who had lost one leg below the hip and the other leg below the knee. This veteran was seen walking, with great difficulty, the Pickett/Pettigrew field at Gettysburg. He finally reached the picket fence near the Union lines where he fell trying to climb the fence, and "there was no one there to pick him up." Bearss said that it's no wonder that people like this veteran have no patience with developers who are eager to convert a battlefield to a project site.

THE UNION SIXTH CORPS IN THE GETTYSBURG CAMPAIGN November 14 Meeting

Our speaker for November will once again be Tom Prisk of Chapel Hill. You'll remember Tom from the two captivating programs he presented last year on the Battle of Gettysburg. Tom is a Licensed Battlefield Guide at Gettysburg, one of an elite corps of field historians whose encyclopedic knowledge of the battle is astounding.

Tom will trace the career of the Union Sixth Corps from June 3, when the Sixth Corps crossed the Rappahannock River in Virginia while on reconnaissance to ascertain whether Lee still held Fredericksburg in force, through its participation at Gettysburg on July 2 and 3, its leadership in the Federal pursuit of Lee on July 5 and 6, and then its further activities to July 14, 1863. The Sixth Corps is noted for its herculean 34 mile march in 18 hours from Westminster, Maryland to Gettysburg. Tom will examine the underappreciated role of the Union Sixth Corps in the campaign.

Also, Tom promises that he will entertain any queries that RT members have about any aspect of the Battle of Gettysburg. So, this is your opportunity to pose any unanswered questions you may have about this popular subject!

The meeting will be at 7:30 pm, Thursday, November 14 at UNC-W. See location below.

!!! NEW ROUND TABLE MEETING SITE !!!

This year, our monthly meetings will be held in Cameron Hall, Room 132, at UNC-W. Cameron Hall is located 200-300 hundred yards east (or behind) King Hall, where our meetings were held last year. Parking Lot R is just in front of Cameron Hall, while Parking Lot S is the next closest to our new location. The meeting room is semi-circular in shape with graduated rows which we hope will provide for greater camaraderie and discussion during our programs.

THE SEVEN DAYS CAMPAIGN Spring Weekend RT Bus Tour

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is offering another spring weekend tour, again to one of the most important campaign sites of the Civil War. The Seven Days Campaign included the Battles of Beaver Dam Creek (or Ellerson's Mill), Gaines' Mill, Savage Station, Frayser's Farm (or Glendale), and the climactic Malvern Hill. The campaign represents CSA General Robert E. Lee's first experience as a commander of the Army of Northern Virginia as well as his successful bid to push USA General George McClellan's huge army away from the Confederate capitol at Richmond.

RT members will travel to Richmond by bus on Friday morning, spend two nights at the Sheraton Inn on Laburnum Road, and return to Wilmington on Sunday afternoon. Friday afternoon, Jim DuPriest, will guide us to important sites of Confederate-era Richmond. Friday evening dinner at the Sheraton will feature Robert E. Lee Krick, a well-known historian from the Richmond National Battlefield, who will give us an overview of the Seven Days. Then, we'll spend all day Saturday touring all the Seven Days' battlesites! Sunday, we'll tour more Civil War sites in Richmond, then head for home.

So mark your calendar for March 21-23, 1997. Details regarding costs and sign-up will be announced. This tour will be every bit as good as the one to Petersburg/Lee's Retreat last year!

THE BATTLE OF BRANDY STATION

Your Chance to Save a Battlefield!

One of the most memorable experiences I've had personally in my pursuit of the Civil War was that of standing on the battlefield of Brandy Station in 1990, sharing a map of the field with James Ewell Brown Stuart, IV, the great grandson of the general himself. There we stood, looking to our right, where Stuart's legendary cavalry lined up by regiments to meet the Federal assault. The event was a weekend tour of Brandy Station/Cedar Mountain sponsored by the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS).

The Battle of Brandy Station, the largest cavalry battle ever fought on the North American continent, took place on June 9, 1863 near Culpepper, Virginia. It was a prelude to the Gettysburg campaign. Nearly 20,000 troopers from the commands of USA General Alfred Pleasanton and CSA General JEB Stuart clashed on the fields at Brandy Station. Though Stuart, after an all-day fight, managed to repulse Pleasanton's ambitious assault, many students of the war point to Brandy Station as the battle where the Union cavalry reached a parity with the heretofore dominant Southern cavaliers.

Well, the second Battle of Brandy Station, this one of nine years' duration, has just been fought and, thankfully, won, not by the North or the South, but by and for the whole nation!

This second battle was a harrowing experience. In 1987, a large portion of this pristine battlefield was bought by a California developer who planned a huge office/residential complex. When those plans began to fall apart, it appeared that the property would then go to an entrepreneur who wanted to develop a Formula 1 racetrack. All along, these efforts towards development, and of course, defacement, of this historic ground was resisted by the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) and the Brandy Station Foundation (BSF). Many CW enthusiasts felt the cause was hopeless.

Then, some weeks ago, an agreement was reached between APCWS and the developer! Brandy Station, comprising 1543 acres of threatened battlefield, was saved. The price, $6.2 million, however, was high. To meet this challenge, APCWS has pulled out all the stops. First, it put together a consortium of farmers who will pay about $3 million for about half of the property; the required easements will keep the land in permanent agricultural use which corresponds to the status of the land in 1863. Second, the Civil War Trust is expected to devote a grant to pay for a portion of the cost. Third, an anonymous donor, a Life member of APCWS, has agreed to match individual contributions up to $500,000, providing a good start on the payments which will have to be made over the next three years to pay for the property.

Now, all of you know by now how unabashedly partial I am to APCWS. This national group, now headquartered in Hagerstown, Maryland has been the most successful preservation group in buying up and protecting CW battlefields. Founded in 1987, APCWS has participated in the acquisition of more than 5,900 acres of land, totaling more than $14 million in value. Brandy Station is the 44th site acquired by APCWS. With over 10,000 members and such Board members as Katie Couric, Ted Turner, Ed Bearss, Dennis Frye, Robert Krick, Gary Gallagher, and James McPherson, this organization has been very aggressive and very successful in preservation. Its new Board Chairman, Tom Richards, was formerly the head of the Nature Conservancy, and brings years of experience and expertise to a continuing campaign to Save the Battlefields!

Here's your chance to participate in the success at Brandy Station as well as to join APCWS. APCWS has announced that, if you make a contribution of a minimum of $50.00 by December 1, your check will be matched dollar for dollar by the aforementioned donor. And....you will receive a free one-year membership in APCWS!

Send any contributions to APCWS, Suite 200, 11 Public Square, Hagerstown, MD 21740. The phone number is (301) 665-1400.

I know that several of you are already members of APCWS, but friends, you're all needed in the front line to save Brandy Station!

BLOCKADE RUNNING DURING THE CIVIL WAR September 5 Meeting

The first program of the 1996-1997 year of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table will feature blockade running, a topic of great interest to many of our members. And we are fortunate to have as our guest speaker, Stephen R. Wise, Ph.D., the leading authority on the Confederacy's use of blockade runners.

Throughout the Civil War, the Confederacy was forced to sustain its armies through the use of innovative steam-propelled blockade runners. Dr. Wise will provide an overview of the extensive supply system that allowed the Confederacy to wage a successful war effort. Not only was blockade running vital to the South's war effort, but it also provided the nation with a folklore that centered around daredevil captains, brave women and fearless crews. The talk will cover the individuals involved in blockade running, the specialized vessels, how the system was financed and what it did to support the South. Special emphasis will be placed on Wilmington and its position as the Confederacy's primary blockade running port.

Dr. Stephen R. Wise, an historian who lives in Beaufort, SC, is the director of the museum at Parris Island SC, and the Cultural Resource Manager for the Marine Corps Recruit Depot located at Parris Island. A native of Toledo, Ohio, Dr. Wise received his bachelor degree from Wittenberg University and a masters degree from Bowling Green State University. Drawn to the University of South Carolina to study under the direction of the late Thomas L. Connelly, a noted author and CW historian, Wise earned his doctoral degree in 1983.

Dr. Wise's first book, Lifeline of the Confederacy: Blockade Running During the Civil War, was highly acclaimed as a comprehensive account of the Confederate effort to deliver supplies through the northern blockade. A second book entitled Gate of Hell: The Campaign for Charleston Harbor 1863, which covers the 1863 campaign that found northern troops battling on Morris Island for the control of Charleston harbor, was published by the University of South Carolina Press in June, 1994. Gate of Hell was given an award by the South Carolina Historical Society as the best book written in 1994 on South Carolina history. A future work will feature photographs of Beaufort, SC during the Civil War.

A well-known lecturer, Dr. Wise has been the featured speaker on Cunard passenger liners and Windspirit cruises. He has appeared on the Arts and Entertainment Channel as a featured speaker for the television show Civil War Journal and in various South Carolina Education Television productions. In 1996, he received the Daughters of the American Revolution History Medal for his service in promoting the history of the United States. Dr. Wise also teaches history as an adjunct professor at the Beaufort campus of the University of South Carolina and serves on the board of the Historic Beaufort Foundation and the South Carolina Battlefield Preservation Trust. He is also active in Civil War Round Tables and local historical societies.

Don't miss this first program of the year! It will be a super one, the first in a great lineup of Civil War programs for the RT in 1996-1997. We urge you to bring a friend or two along.

!!! NEW ROUND TABLE MEETING SITE !!!

This year, our monthly meetings will be held in Cameron Hall, Room 132, at UNC-W. Cameron Hall is located 200-300 hundred yards east (or behind) King Hall, where our meetings were held last year. Parking Lot R is just in front of Cameron Hall, while Parking Lot S is the next closest to our new location. The meeting room is semi-circular in shape with graduated rows which we hope will provide for greater camaraderie and discussion during our programs.

THE YEAR AHEAD[®]

A Preview of RT Programs

The September meeting will mark the beginning of our third year! Last year, the RT grew to 85 members. And, there's an exciting year ahead! The steering committee, composed of Tommy King, Dan Geddie, Ted Lynch, Chris Fonvielle, Jim McCallum, James McLaren, and George Slaton, has been meeting during the summer months to plan events for 1996-1997. You'll enjoy

More opportunities for getting to know each other.....

This year, members will be furnished with a printed nametag at each meeting. Visitors will be given a nametag as well. We feel that nametags will give members a better chance to get to know each other, while we can all more easily welcome visitors to the meetings. Even better, we're going to have at least two dinner/program meetings during the year. This more informal setting should help us have a more user-friendly Round Table!

A raffle at each meeting.....

Tom Broadfoot of Broadfoot Publishing Company is once again providing the RT with quality Civil War books for the raffle we hold at our monthly meetings. The raffles have been a lot of fun! Ted Lynch will be offering raffle tickets at $1.00 each before the meetings begin; then we'll have a drawing at the end of the evening. Thanks once again to Tom Broadfoot for his support and generosity!

Some stellar programs.....

September's program will feature the top historian in the field of CW blockade-running. Then, the October 16 program will give us the rare opportunity to meet and hear the leading authority on the CSA Army of Tennessee, Richard McMurray, a well-known historian of the war in the Western Theater and biographer of John Bell Hood. This October meeting will be a pig-pickin' at a choice location (to be announced)! Tom Prisk, licensed Gettysburg battlefield guide, will be with us again on November 14, sharing a program about the lives of Union and Confederate generals before the war, especially their relationships at West Point and during the Mexican War. You'll remember Tom from his well-attended program last year on the Battle of Gettysburg. Wow! Ready for more? On December 5, Charles Peery, M.D. of Charleston, SC, one of the world's authorities on Confederate naval history will present a stirring program. And, at our January 9 meeting, Chris Fonvielle, our own resident CW expert, will be our program speaker; Chris will also have a signing of his forthcoming new book on the Wilmington Campaign.

And then there's the spring weekend bus tour.....

The weekend of March 21-23 will find our RT members in Richmond enjoying a tour of the Seven Days Campaigns, touring CW sites in Richmond, and battlefields at Beaver Dam Creek, Gaines' Mill, Savage Station, Fraysers' Farm, and Malvern Hill! We're taking a roomy and comfortable 47-passenger bus and we've booked rooms at the Sheraton Inn.

So renew your membership by.....

BATTLE SITES OF GENERAL JOHN B. HOOD'S 1864 TENNESSEE CAMPAIGN May 23 Meeting

Tommy King and George Slaton, who attended the annual conference of the Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) in Nashville in late April, will present a program on CSA General John Bell Hood's ill-fated bid to drive USA General George H. Thomas' Union forces from Middle Tennessee. They will discuss their visits to various important sites of the campaign, such as Columbia, Spring Hill, and Franklin, with conference historians. Following will be a general discussion of the RT, especially the year we've just completed and the year ahead. Your thoughts, ideas, and suggestions will be helpful as we plan the next program year.

Remember that the May meeting of the RT will be the last one of the 1995-1996 year. As usual we'll break for the summer and begin our 1996-1997 year in September.

The meeting will be held Thursday, May 23, at 7:30 pm in Room 101, King Hall, University of North Carolina at Wilmington.

EXTRA RATIONS

Mark your fall calendar now for The First Annual East Carolina Civil War Symposium to be held the weekend of October 11-13 at East Carolina University. Dr. David B. Long, Civil War historian at ECU is putting together this symposium in conjunction with the Department of Continuing Education and the Institute for Historical and Cultural Research on campus. The theme will be "Eastern North Carolina in the Civil War." The symposium will feature prominent Civil War historians such as John Barrett, Clyde Wilson, Mark Bradley, Chris Fonvielle, and others. Members of the RT will receive by mail brochures describing the event. As you can see, study of the Civil War is alive and well and growing by leaps and bounds!

The United Daughters of the Confederacy is currently compiling a list of burial locations for Confederate soldiers. You can help by sending any information available such as soldier name, company & regiment, county & state of residence, birth & death dates, service record, and location of cemetery to Mrs. Charlotte Carrere, 1612 Woodland Road, Garner, NC 27529.

The RT steering committee will be working through the weeks ahead to plan a full schedule of programs and tours for the coming year. Some exciting things are already in the works!

WHAT TO DO ABOUT THE SUMMERTIME BLUES

Hopefully, summer will provide you with greater opportunities to pursue your interests in the Civil War. Take the family to visit a battlefield. Join a preservation organization. Browse the extensive collection of CW books at the public library and at UNC-W. Research a favorite regiment or battle. Write the National Archives for military service records of ancestors who served the Blue or the Gray (General Reference Branch, National Archives & Records Administration, 7th and Pennsylvania Ave NW, Washington DC 20408, for applications). Watch or participate in a reenactment. Attend a Civil War show. There's no excuse for summertime blues if you're a Civil War enthusiast.

FAVORITE GENERALS JOHN BUFORD (1826-1863)

Although his family had Virginia roots, John Buford was born in Kentucky and grew up in Illinois. He spent several years on the western Frontier after graduating from West Point in 1848. He rose rapidly in ranks and was wounded at 2nd Bull Run.

Buford was similar to JEB Stuart in his ability to rapidly recognize strategic portions of a battlefield. This was particularly true at Gettysburg on the first day when he arrived almost simultaneously with the Confederates (Early) and immediately surveyed and recognized the importance of the terrain. It is felt that he contributed as much as any Union leader in the victory at Gettysburg. In defending these early positions, he allowed Union access to the more strategic positions at Gettysburg.

Similar was his concept of defence and the ability to see the importance of tactical moves on the battlefield. At Brandy Station, Buford led the northern wing which included the 2nd Division across Beverly's Ford early in the morning. Unknown to him, the concentration of the Confederate cavalry was less than a mile from him rather than ten to twenty miles from him at Culpeper as he was told. When he crossed the ford, he was immediately challenged by pickets of the Confederates. Within moments, he was in the thick of battle where not only did he hold his own, he advanced to positions that Rooney Lee, Fitz Lee and Hampton held. The position at Ewe's Hill that Rooney held was an excellent defensive position. Buford recognized it as such and made only probes at this position. Imagine his surprise when just at the moment it seemed that the Confederates had a commanding defensive position, Buford saw them pulling out of those positions. Actually the surprise was more than likely momentary as he realized that Gregg was achieving his objective of flanking the Confederate right on Fleetwood Hill, no thanks to General Beverly Robertson near Kelly's Ford, who watched Duffie's cavalry pass his position with very little interference. Buford saw the situation quickly and reacted expeditiously. With Rooney Lee disengaging slowly from Ewe's Hill to protect the extreme left flank of the Confederates on Fleetwood, Buford took advantage of his frontal position by keeping Rooney's men occupied preventing Rooney from giving full aid to Stuart. Buford maintained his position until later when Pleasanton gave orders for him to disengage.

These abilities of instant recognition and reaction were major components of his command talents. Buford was a hard fighter who, like Sheridan in his tactical methodology, was very aggressive with the ability to recognize victory. Unlike many Union commanders at this time, he pursued his enemy in their "Strategic" withdrawals and took advantage of the factors in his favor. It was sad for the Union and probably beneficial for the Army of Northern Virginia when he died of Typhoid Fever six months after Gettysburg, on December 16, 1863. With his many faults, one credit that Alfred Pleasanton can take is the recognition of the talents of John Buford. Sheridan would have loved him and they would have made a good team. I hope he is in the Heaven that I envision; he is one I want to talk to if I make it there.

CAPTAIN JOHN N. MAFFITT & THE CONFEDERATE STATES NAVY April 25 Meeting

Last April's meeting focused on the well-known Raphael Semmes, commander of the CSS Alabama, the scourge of the US Navy. This April, we'll have the opportunity to learn more about one of our own local wartime heroes, John Newland Maffitt, blockade runner and commander of the CSS Florida, a cruiser which was also deeply feared by the Federal Navy.

William A. Hall III, a local historian who has researched Maffitt and his naval career for the last ten years, will present our program for the evening.

Unfortunately, Captain Maffitt has not had the fame that Semmes has long enjoyed. Yet, Maffitt was an extremely successful Confederate raider who put a sizeable dent in US commerce during his service in the CS Navy. He deserves greater credit than he's received for his exploits. Maffitt, who married in Wilmington and later lived on Bradley Creek, is buried in Oakdale Cemetery.

Make plans to attend the April meeting of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table on Thursday, April 25, 7:30 pm, in Room 101, King Hall, at UNC-W.

MORT KUNSTLER GETTYSBURG CALENDAR PRINTS Sale To Benefit the Round Table

Harry Clements, a member of our RT, will have available for sale at the April 25 meeting a selection of twelve different Gettysburg Calendar Prints by the well-known Civil War artist, Mort Kunstler. The prints are double-matted and mounted in quality frames with TruVu glass and ready to hang on your wall. The price for each print is $40.00 of which $5.00 will go to benefit the RT.

Harry will be on hand at 7:00 in Room 101 so that any of you who are interested can see this selection of prints and he'll also be available following the meeting. Come early and pick out a CW print!

EXTRA RATIONS

Recently, the RT received a check for $100.00 from The Friends of the Public Library, our share of the profits from the sale of the Fort Fisher calendars last fall. We're grateful to Beverly Tetterton at the library for her leadership in the calendar campaign.

Those of you who have an interest in the medical history of the Civil War should know about the development of the National Museum of Civil War Medicine in Frederick, Maryland. The museum will display and preserve thousands of CW medical artifacts in a building where CW casualties were brought after the Battle of Antietam. You can become a charter member of the NMCWM, a non-profit organization, by writing to Box 470, Frederick MD 21705-0470 or calling 301-695-1864.

The Bennett Place State Historic Site in Durham will commemorate the 131st anniversary of the Bennett Place Surrender at the site, Sunday, April 28. Mark Bradley, the anniversary speaker, will present "General Joseph Johnston in North Carolina: From Bentonville to Bennett Place." Mark's talk will be held at 1:30 and 3:30 pm. For more information, call Bennett Place 919-383-4345.

THE LAST DAYS OF THE CIVIL WAR IN VIRGINIA

The RT Spring Tour of Lee's Retreat Route

Nineteen members of the CFCWRT boarded a chartered bus early Friday morning, March 8, for our Spring Tour in the Petersburg/Appomattox area, the site of Grant and Lee's final struggle.

We arrived in Petersburg at noon, and after a quick lunch within view of a venerable home which served as HQ for both USA Generals U.S. Grant and George G. Meade, we headed out to the battlefields. Chris Calkins, our tour guide, promised to show us important sites which figured in the Petersburg Campaign down to its last days. Driving west from Petersburg, we saw "Indiana," the ante-bellum home near which CSA General A.P. Hill left his HQ in a cottage on the surrounding plantation, to ride to his death. Further west, we drove by "Edgehill," the Turnbull house where Lee had his HQ during the latter part of the Petersburg siege. We drove through a modern subdivision, then parked on the edge of a wooded hill, and walked down to the marker which stands at the site where A.P. Hill was killed by Union soldiers during a morning ride with one of his aides. Further on, we passed the Venable house, CSA General Henry Heth's HQ. We crossed over Hatcher's Run where one of the campaign engagements took place. Then, we drove on to the site of the Battle of Lewis Farm on the Quaker Road and saw the dilapidated house where USA General Joshua Chamberlain spent the night after the battle. We passed the large field where CSA General Wade Hampton delivered hundreds of head of what was once USA cattle after his "Beefsteak" cavalry raid. We stopped at the site of the Battle of White Oak Road where CSA General Robert E. Lee rallied his troops and sent them forward. Our final destination for the day was the Five Forks battlefield. Chris led us through the woods to "The Angle," where CSA General Robert Ransom's North Carolina troops anchored the Confederate left flank. These troops were overwhelmed in the victorious attack led by USA General Philip Sheridan. We toured the small Five Forks visitor center, just adjacent to the slight elevation where CSA Colonel Willie Pegram fell mortally wounded while commanding his artillery in an effort to slow the Union attack. Then our bus made its way up a long country lane to "Burnt Quarter," an 18th Century plantation house where USA General George Custer clashed with Confederate cavalry.

The evening was capped with a delicious banquet! Chris Calkins and his wife joined us and Chris answered many of our remaining questions about the Petersburg battles.

Saturday morning saw us boarding the bus and heading toward Appomattox Court House. On the way out of town, Chris pointed out numerous wartime buildings and homes which still stand, including the Gas Works, located just behind our motel, and the focal point of Union artillery barrages during the siege. The old brick building still bears marks of damage by artillery projectiles. As we left Petersburg, we stopped at several places on Lee's retreat route. One of these was Sutherland Station where NC and SC troops were outflanked and forced to retire. Another was Namozine Presbyterian Church, where CSA General Rufus Barringer's NC cavalry was forced back. The quaint little church, used as a hospital after the fighting, still has visible bloodstains on its floors. We made several stops at the Saylor's Creek battlefield, and Chris gave us some fascinating accounts of the exploits of some individual soldiers there.

And then we drove into Appomattox, the site of Lee's surrender to Grant. What a moving place that is! We toured the buildings, including the McLean House and the bookstore. We walked down the slope where Confederate troops ascended from the valley below to lay down their arms to the Union soldiers. We saw where USA General Joshua Chamberlain stood in a place of honor to receive the CSA soldiers as their Army of Northern Virginia passed out of existence. After a couple of hours at Appomattox, we headed back toward Petersburg.

Sunday morning, we toured the Petersburg National Battlefield, again with Chris Calkins. We stopped at Fort Stedman as well as the Crater. Then we turned southward on I-95 and started for Wilmington.

The tour was all that we imagined it would be...and more! Chris Calkins was a delightful host and guide, a constant fund of information and good humor. Many of us got to know each other better during the weekend. Everyone agreed the tour was a success, and we're already beginning to think about the next one!

Our special thanks to Tommy King and Dan Geddie who did so much to plan and coordinate this very enjoyable trip!

PETERSBURG CAMPAIGN & LEE'S RETREAT March 8-10

Since the bus tour to Virginia is the RT program for March, there will be no regular scheduled meeting during the month at UNC-W. The April program will be announced in the next newsletter.

The RT is leasing a smaller bus than the large one we originally planned to use, and the seats on this bus are sold out. We're anticipating a great tour with Chris Calkins, noted Petersburg/Appomattox author and historian. A summary of the tour will be included in the April newsletter.

MAPS FOR THE BENTONVILLE STUDY

(Many of you have already acquired a copy of Mark Bradley's recently published Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville. If you've seen the book, you've no doubt been impressed by the number and, especially, the quality of the battlefield maps. This collection of maps is probably the best I've ever seen in a Civil War battle or campaign study. They're very detailed and trace the movements of US and CSA regiments across the battlefield, enabling readers as well as visitors to the site to have a clear picture of the flow of battle. Mark Moore, whom some of you met last March during our bus tour to Bentonville, is the author of these exceptional maps. I asked Mark to describe his cartographic research of Bentonville, and here is his account).

Mark Bradley and I began our independent research on Bentonville for the same reason: nothing already published on the subject provided the level of understanding each of us craved. Interestingly enough, we adopted polar approaches to the study. While Mark Bradley began a massive compilation of diverse and neglected resources on the battle, I opted for a cartographic approach to clarify my understanding (and misunderstanding) of what happened on the field. There is no better way to find out what you know - and don't know - about a Civil War battle than to draw a map of the action. The limitations of your knowledge will shine immediately. This is an effective method because it allows you to "visually" represent the holes in your information, and therefore keep research goals clear.

I started with a complete dissection of the Bentonville material in the Official Records, drawing section-maps and location sketches. As I gained a passable understanding of these accounts, I could slowly incorporate additional sources I'd collected from various places. (I had also talked a great deal with John Goode of Bentonville battleground who, by the way, gets the credit for introducing two independently-working Bentonville students named Mark!).

Our different avenues of study allowed the best possible circumstance for a collaboration. We were both surprised at how quickly the different pieces of the "puzzle" began falling into place. As work progressed, we swapped sources and walked the battlefield more times than I can count, and eventually I graduated from hand-drawn to computer-generated maps.

Luckily, Mark Bradley and I have forged a highly productive working relationship, and I am continually amazed by his insight and instinctive writing ability. The wealth of information he's amassed is impressive in the extreme. (Mark A. Moore)

$1.7 MILLION RAISED FOR MALVERN HILL Another APCWS Success!

The Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) has successfully completed a $1.7 million fund-raising campaign for 500 acres of the Malvern Hill battlefield, in what APCWS President Dennis Frye called "the largest grassroots fund-raising effort in the history of Civil War battlefield preservation."

"We are absolutely elated," said Frye. "Nothing compares to this success." The drive, begun in late 1993, was completed in December, nearly two years ahead of schedule.

Frye said he expected to close on the property at once. He thanked the owners, the Jack Ferguson family, for "recognizing the value of this property" and allowing APCWS to structure a successful deal. APCWS will eventually donate the open pastureland, cropland, and woods to Richmond National Battlefield Park.

Malvern Hill is recognized by Congress as a "priority one" Civil War site, signifying the battle's importance as well as the extreme threat of development in the Richmond area. The National Park Service currently preserves about 100 acres at Malvern Hill.

The property acquired by APCWS comprises the majority of the ground at the foot of Malvern Hill and the sloping hillside itself where Confederates assaulted Union artillery and infantry on July 1, 1862, in the last battles of the Seven Days. On APCWS's tract occurred "the vast proportion of Confederate casualties" that were suffered in the bloody assault into the cannons' mouths, of which Confederate General D.H. Hill declared, "This is not war; this is murder."

Frye said APCWS received "thousands" of contributions from its 10,000 individual members, totaling about $1.1 million. "This epitomizes the commitment and caring of our members," he said. "Their loyalty to the cause is demonstrated by their willingness to give."

Major funding, $419,000, came from the sale of U.S. Mint's 1995 issue of CW commemorative coins. The grant was made by the Civil War Trust. Another quarter of a million dollars came from APCWS's raffle of a painting donated by military artist Don Troiani, "The Southern Cross," depicting fighting at neighboring Glendale. APCWS also provided prints of the painting to CW Round Tables and reenactor organizations, generating an additional $50,000, Frye said.

Funds also came in the form of several $50,000 matching grants from philanthropist Richard Gilder, a member of APCWS's national advisory board and a man whom Frye said is "one of our staunchest believers in the power of APCWS and its members to protect historic battlefields;" a preservation march last fall in which 500 participants generated $50,000 for the campaign; and a $100,000 donation by a Richmond foundation that Frye said wished to remain anonymous in its support of preservation.

Frye indicated that there would be no haste in transferring the tract to the park. The property has changed in appearance since the time of the battle, he noted, and APCWS has drafted a landscape restoration plan, reviewed by NPS, that will involve cutting some woods and replanting others on a total of about 50 acres.

Frye stressed that the public will have immediate access to the new tract. APCWS hopes to implement later this year an interpretive plan for a self-guided trail with brochures and wayside exhibits.

Frye said APCWS had moved quickly to buy the property, despite the fact that it was "ten times larger than any previous APCWS obligation. We were willing to assume the risk based on the faith in our loyal members," Frye said. "We believed firmly that they would answer the call. This proves beyond doubt that we can assume risk and meet our obligations."

"Success goes beyond the property lines at Malvern Hill," he added. "This $1.7 million acquisition is a project we can take into a corporate or foundation board room and show with pride. Success breeds success."

APCWS is also working to buy 250 contiguous acres associated with the battle of Glendale. Frye said about half that $750,000 purchase cost has been raised.

APCWS, Box 1862, Fredericksburg VA 22402, (540) 371-1860, founded eight years ago, has preserved land at 39 battlefields in 11 states.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN February 8 Meeting

Probably no American has been the subject of more biographical analyses than Abraham Lincoln who led the Union through four years of struggle and warfare with the Confederacy. Bob Toplin, Professor of American History at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington will focus in our February 8 meeting on how public perceptions of Lincoln's leadership evolved during the war years. Though Lincoln was an unpopular leader early on in his presidency, he emerged, as we all know, in the last period of the war, as an extraordinary figure in American history. Dr. Toplin will survey Lincoln's emergence as a military and political leader.

Dr. Toplin, an accomplished historian, has been on the faculty at UNCW since 1978. He's authored eight books, the most recent being Ken Burns' Civil War, an examination of television's treatment of the war. This book is a main selection of the History Book Club, a high tribute to Dr. Toplin's scholarship. His History By Hollywood: The Use and Abuse of the American Past, will be published shortly. He has also written several scripts for various historical programs produced by public television. Wilmington is fortunate to have an historian of Dr. Toplin's caliber, and the RT will likewise be fortunate in hosting him as our February speaker!

So make plans to attend another riveting presentation on CW history by the RT on Thursday, February 8, 7:30 pm, King Hall, Room 101, at UNCW. Feel free to bring a guest!

(Also, if you wish to reserve a copy of Mark Bradley's "Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville" at the February meeting, please call Dan Geddie at 799-5338 (home, evenings).

A STIRRING CONCERT! The 11th Regiment North Carolina Band

All of us RT members who were present for the concert of the 11th Regiment N. C. Band on Saturday night, January 27, were thrilled both by the music and the attendance! A large crowd of 230-40 turned out for the performance. Everyone seemed to enjoy hearing this authentic CW brass band whether they were playing the mournful tunes of Who Will Care for Mother Now?, the romantic melody of Aura Lea which Elvis Presley later used in his Love Me Tender, hymns like Rock of Ages, or the stirring strains of Dixie and Bonnie Blue Flag! And many people lingered afterwards for conversation and refreshments. The concert was really a great event.

ASSOCIATION FOR PRESERVATION OF CIVIL WAR SITES

Unrivalled In Saving CW Battlefields

There has been no greater or more successful leader in the campaign over the last several years to save and preserve for all of us our natural CW heritage than the Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS). I've been a member of APCWS since its inception in 1988 and I hope that all of you will consider joining this outstanding organization.

Founded by such respected historians and authors like Gary Gallagher, Robert Krick, Brian Pohanka, Dennis Frye, Wilson Greene, Alan Nolan, and Donald Pfanz, the association has done wonderful things for CW preservation. In more recent years, such luminaries as James McPherson, Ed Bearss, Katie Couric, J.E.B. Stuart IV, Ted Turner, James I. Robertson, Senators Dale Bumpers and James Jeffords, and our Petersburg/Appomattox tour leader for our coming bus trip in March, Chris Calkins, have joined the boards of APCWS.

Recognizing that important and historic Civil War landscapes were being lost to development at an alarming rate, APCWS began at once the huge task of raising funds and planning acquisitions of CW battlefields. APCWS functions much like the Nature Conservancy in that it buys threatened battlefield properties outright and then transfers them to local, federal, or state agencies which preserve and interpret them for the public. APCWS has also helped numerous smaller preservation organizations in many states acquire battlefield land. It's noteworthy that APCWS seeks to work with landowners to protect battlefield properties.

In the last couple of years alone, APCWS has succeeded in purchasing 90% of the battlefield at Brice's Crossroads in Mississippi where Nathan Bedford Forrest won his greatest victory, over 700 acres at Glendale and Malvern Hill near Richmond where Lee battled McClellan, and over 200 acres which comprise a major portion of the Third Winchester field. In all APCWS has preserved 36 sites in 11 states totalling 3918.49 acres at a cost of $7,427,804.00.

And I've enjoyed my membership in APCWS! Not only can I feel a sense of real accomplishment in helping to save battlefield land by making contributions as finances allow, but I've had numerous opportunities to enjoy several superb battlefield tour weekends sponsored by the association. With APCWS, I've done a one-day tour of Petersburg and weekend tours of the Seven Days Campaign, Cedar Mountain, Brandy Station, McDowell, Port Republic, Corinth, and Brice's Crossroads. There's nothing more exciting than to stand on the field with knowledgeable historians and get a first-rate description of the struggle which took place there!

No wonder that the membership of APCWS, folks like you and me, has grown by leaps and bounds to over 10,000 members. The organization's successes have brought many members on board, resulting in a doubling of the membership since 1993.

Annual individual memberships in APCWS are available in categories from $30.00 to $1000.00. All members receive the bimonthly Hallowed Ground and can participate in tours and seminars sponsored by the association. Write to APCWS at Box 1862, Fredericksburg VA 22401 or call (703) 371-1860 or (703) 371-3489 FAX.

APCWS needs you! It needs your interest and support....and it needs your dollars. It will put your dollars to work to save battlefields that you and I can not only see in our mind's eye as we read an account of a battle or a campaign but that we can actually visit and enjoy and more thoroughly understand.

Join APCWS and be a part of a remarkable and successful undertaking to preserve the battlefields we love!

THE REGIMENT BAND of the 11th NORTH CAROLINA TROOPS

IN CONCERT AT THE UNIVERSITY CENTER, UNCW
Saturday, January 27
7:00 - 9:00 p.m.

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table is presenting this period band in concert for the enjoyment of RT members and the general public on January 27!

The band of the 11th N.C. Regiment was re-activated in 1982 and took the field for the first time this century at a reenactment of the Battle of Bentonville. Since that time, the band has been in demand for other reenactments, balls, period church services, parades, formal concerts and numerous events consistent with their impression of a Confederate band of music from a NC Regiment. Concerts have been presented at Manassas, Gettysburg, Fredericksburg, and Petersburg. The band has been involved in three movies, the most recent the TNT production, Ironclads. Other appearances have included the Confederate White House in Richmond VA and the morning service at the National Cathedral in Washington D.C.

The group dresses in replicas of uniforms known to have been worn by NC soldiers during the war and plays a mixture of original and replicated instruments of the period. It has one of the largest repertoires of period band music available and includes music both North and South.

Mark Bradley, author of the recently published Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, will be present with copies of his book for sale and signing. (If you already have a copy, Mark will be happy to sign for you). Coffee, punch, and dessert will be served.

Tickets are $8.00 each or two for $15.00. Tickets can be purchased at Hanover Iron Works, 1851 Dawson Street, or by mail at CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405. (If you are certain that you will attend you can call and reserve tickets to be held at the door, but remember that we're financially obligated for a per-person count before the event).

We hope that every RT member will come and bring family members. Plan to sell tickets to friends and to anyone who's interested in attending.

LAST CALL FOR SPRING BUS TOUR TO VIRGINIA

Hurry and send in your check for our March 8-10 bus tour to the Battle of Petersburg and Lee's Retreat to Appomattox! We've now reserved a 23 passenger bus, and there are only seven seats remaining. Your check for $150.00 is your reservation. Sign-up deadline is Monday, February 5.

Tommy King has enjoyed this tour with Chris Calkins, historian at Petersburg and Appomattox, and he tells me that, in addition to all the major battle sites described in previous newsletters, we'll be visiting little-known sites like a house where Lee & Longstreet had breakfast, where CSA Gen. James Dearing was killed, a hotel from which USA Gen. Ulysses Grant waded to his troops, the site of Willie Pegram's artillery at Five Forks where Pegram was killed, the woods where NC cavalry were surrounded and fought their way out, the spot where USA Gen. Joshua Chamberlain stood at the McLean house and another house where he spent the night at Five Forks. Wow! Don't miss this super tour.

TOM PRISK DESIGNATES EXPENSE CHECK FOR BENTONVILLE Contribution for Battlefield Preservation

Our fellow RT member and featured speaker on the Battle of Gettysburg during October and November, Tom Prisk, asked that the RT reimbursement for his expenses in traveling to Wilmington from his home in Chapel Hill be given to the Bentonville Battlefield Historical Association (BBHA). So our check for $165.00 was recently mailed to BBHA where it elicited a delighted response from the Association's secretary, Lauren Burgess who, with husband, Fred, has recently joined the CFCWRT.

Since moving to NC, Tom has met Mark Bradley, Bentonville historian, and has visited Bentonville and studied the battle closely. He's very aware of the battlefield's critical importance. The Civil War Sites Commission has designated the field at Bentonville 6th in importance out of the 300 unprotected battlefields it has listed. Tom's generosity reflects his commitment to Civil War history and to battlefield preservation.

You can join BBHA, Box 432, Newton Grove NC 28366 by sending a check for $20.00 for membership which also purchases one-square foot of land. Contributions to BBHA for battlefield interpretation and preservation are tax-deductible. Organizations like this always need your help!

CAPITOL OF THE CONFEDERACY CIVIL WAR COLLECTORS SHOW

During the weekend of November 18-19, I attended the 16th annual Capitol of the Confederacy Civil War Show in Richmond, Virginia sponsored by the Central Virginia Relic Hunters Association and the Museum of the Confederacy. This show, held at the state fairgrounds in two large halls, has become through the years one of the largest and best quality shows in the country. It's an event of great interest to CW collectors, students, and general browsers.

Displayed on 400 dealer tables is an astounding array of material from the Civil War period and before. You see guns and swords, excavated relics from camp and battle sites, non-excavated relics from trunks and attics, buttons and buckles, books and manuscript material, period clothing, the list goes on and on.

Tom Broadfoot, member of our RT from Broadfoot Publishing Company has thousands of books on four tables, including sets like the Official Records and Confederate Veteran, which Tom has reprinted in recent years. Henry Mintz' table features the recently published photographic history of NC soldiers for which Henry supplied a third of the images. Henry told me that the first printing by Archives & History of 2000 copies has already been sold out. Chris Fonvielle is scouting tables for material on Fort Fisher and Wilmington. The author of the new biography on CSA artillerist, Willie Pegram, sits at one table inscribing copies of his book for buyers. At another table, I have the once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see the extremely rare autograph of CSA Brigadier General Hiram C. Granbury which is trading hands at the show. Granbury was killed at the Battle of Franklin, and only five or six of his autographs are known to collectors. Another dealer shows a photograph of a rare North Carolina Civil War button which was recently picked up for $4.00 in a Connecticut flea market; the dealer has recently been offered $8500.00 for this piece! The Museum of the Confederacy has a display from its rich collection and sponsors seminars throughout the day for show attendees.

Whether you're a casual CW buff ambling through the aisles of tables or a collector feverishly searching for another addition to a growing collection, a visit to a Civil War show adds to your knowledge of the arms and equipment and other material history of the war and fuels your enthusiasm for deeper study and understanding of your particular CW interests.

ZEBULON VANCE, WARTIME GOVERNOR OF NORTH CAROLINA December 7 Meeting

Dr. Joseph Mobley from the N.C. Division of Archives and History will present a program covering the wartime career of Zeb Vance who was Governor of NC from 1862-1865. Vance's views on states' rights and his political stance with Jefferson Davis' administration make him an interesting figure during the war years. His competence in mobilizing his state's military resources has given him a reputation as one of the more effective CSA governors. Dr. Mobley has edited the papers of Vance and is a well-known authority on this famous and colorful North Carolinian.

The meeting will begin at 7:30 pm on Thursday, December 7, in Room 101 of King Hall at UNC-W. Bring a friend or two with you! We'll also be discussing our plans for the upcoming Petersburg/Appomattox bus tour.

THE BATTLE OF PETERSBURG AND LEE'S RETREAT TO APPOMATTOX Spring Bus Tour

The RT bus tour to Virginia, March 8-10, is just around the corner! The deadlines for sign-up are even closer! This comprehensive tour of the closing days of the war will be led by Chris Calkins, the acknowledged authority on the Battle of Petersburg and Lee's final retreat and a historian with the National Park Service. On Friday, Chris will take us to Five Forks battlefield, Dinwiddie Courthouse, White Oak Road, and the Gilliam Farm. Saturday's tour will follow the exact route of Lee's retreat toward Appomattox, taking in the site of the cavalry clash at Namozine Church, Saylor's Creek battlefield, the fields and woods where Lee's army encamped and where the surrender itself took place. On Sunday, we'll tour the Petersburg battlefield, visiting the Crater and Fort Steadman.

We'll travel from Wilmington to Petersburg by Five Star Motor Coach, spend two nights at Best Western Petersburg, and return home mid-afternoon Sunday. The cost is $150.00 per person (subject to change if we're unable to fill the bus); this covers the cost of the bus, motel, two meals, tour by Chris Calkins.

Sign up soon! After our December 7 meeting, we'll open the tour to the general public. So, to guarantee yourself a seat on the bus, you should send your check for the full amount by then; your check serves as your reservation. Dan Geddie will be on hand at the December 7 meeting to help you complete your reservations. Or you can send your check to CFCWRT, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405. This will be an unforgettable tour. Plan to join us!

CIVIL WAR CALENDARS Scenes from Fort Fisher

Many of you have seen and purchased copies of the 1996 Fort Fisher calendars which the RT along with the Friends of the Library are offering for sale this year. The calendars sell for $10.00 each, and we hope that each member will buy one for themselves. The calendars will also make fine Christmas gifts for friends and family members. Profits from the sales will be divided between our RT and the Friends of the Library. Calendars will be available again at the December meeting or at the public library in the Local History room (on the second floor).

BRANDY STATION: PROLOGUE TO GETTYSBURG A Visit to the Battlefield

In the predawn hours of June 9, 1863, Gen. John Buford prepared to lead three brigades of Union cavalry supported by a crack infantry brigade across the Rappahannock River. Acting as the right wing of a two prong assault force, Buford would cross the Rappahannock at Beverly's Ford. Once across the river, he was to move up the country road to the railway station located in the sleepy hamlet of Brandy Station. Buford was to secure the town and wait for the left wing commanded by Gen. David Gregg and Col. Alfred Duffie. The left wing was to cross the Rappahannock at Kelly's Ford, six miles away, simultaneously with Buford around 4:30 am. Buford was to attack the Confederate camps north of Brandy Station from the front while Gregg and Duffie swing around the Rebel right flank and hit their rear.

This bold and daring plan was the brain-child of Gen. Alfred Pleasonton, only recently given command of the Union cavalry corps. The plan was a good one on paper. Trap your quarry between your forces, destroy as many as you can, and disperse the rest. By destroying Stuart's cavalry, the Union army would leave Lee blind and without a protective screen to move his army. If Pleasonton's plan was successful it would end Lee's hopes of a strong incursion into the North.

Before the first Union soldier crossed the Rappahannock, Pleasonton's plan was in shambles. He had broken the first cardinal rule of engagement. The new cavalry corps had not confirmed the location of his enemy through good military intelligence. Assuming that Stuart had gathered his forces at Culpepper Court House, some twelve miles away, the thirty-nine year old Pleasonton, anticipating only sporadic picket resistance, led his men into the teeth of the entire Confederate cavalry.

From the outset the assault was doomed. Buford crossed his men as planned, but Gregg was delayed for over two hours waiting for Duffie, who had become lost in the dark on his way to Kelly's Ford. Things went from bad to worse. Not only two hours late, but once across the river, Gregg allowed Duffie's brigade to move on toward Stevensburg instead of staying in his support as originally planned, thus seriously reducing the size of his force.

This was the opening sally of the greatest cavalry battle to take place on American soil. The battle would mark the birth of the Union cavalry as a force to be reckoned with for the remainder of the war. Stuart, still flush with the success of the 'grand review' of his elite corps, would exhibit a coolness and brilliance under surprise attack that would far exceed his abilities to date, a brilliance that was to be forever extinguished in eleven short months at Yellow Tavern.

These facts are but a few I was privileged to learn when I attended the Fall Tour (Oct 13-15) sponsored by APCWS (Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites). There were thirty of us present including Bill Rodgers, another member of our RT. The tour included Brandy Station, Catlett Station, Aldie, Middleburg, and Upperville. The speakers included Clark "Bud" Hall, the expert on Brandy Station, Robert O'Neill (Aldie, Middleburg, Upperville), Horace Mewborn, co-author of a book on Mosby's command, and Dan Beatty, secretary of APCWS and an expert on Union cavalry. Perhaps the greatest thrill of all was meeting JEB Stuart IV, great-grandson of Gen. JEB Stuart, who spoke to our group on Saturday night.

What is so very special about the area surrounding Brandy Station is that so much of it is in pristine condition. On a dry day you can walk down to Beverly Ford and see the spot where USA Lt. Henry Cutler was mortally wounded and became the first casualty of the Gettysburg campaign.

With a little imagination you can visualize young CSA Lt. Robert Allen, a single bullet left in his pistol, ride out of the tree line (still there), straight at USA Col. B.F. "Gimes" Davis sitting on his horse in the bend of the road to Brandy Station. Davis, so intent on exhorting his 8th NY to stand firm, did not hear Death riding pellmell for him until it was too late. His men, seeing Davis felled by a bullet to the brain, were so demoralized that they broke and ran for the river, giving the Confederates valuable time to send reinforcements. This lovely, special road is already bordered on one side by an unnecessary private county airport. The land on the other side of the road is threatened by a developer wanting to build a Formula One race track.

Fortunately for posterity, the area around St. James Church, the scene of fighting involving "Grumble" Jones and Wade Hampton with our own NC 1st Cavalry, is protected by the membership of the church. Fleetwood Hill, Stuart's HQ, which changed hands so many times that day, is still privately owned farmland. But that is subject to change at any time.

America is a land of many resources, some renewable, others not. CW sites fall under the latter category. Through 20/20 hindsight, students of the CW easily see the importance of various battles, their impact on the war as a whole. Tours arranged by organizations like APCWS or the Civil War Society can give us some small insight into the conditions these men fought under.

In all the battlefields that I've been privileged to visit, whether they were well-cared for and protected like Manassas or Harper's Ferry or endangered like Brandy Station, they have one thing in common. There is an uncommon hush that pervades the area. A quiet that calls to you. Only listen and you can hear the voices of men (and in some cases women) long gone, whispering "we are here."

I can't help but feel each time we allow one of these sites to slip away we tell these men of uncommon valor that we don't care anymore. What they did is not important, no longer matters in the grand scheme of things. To me that is an unforgivable tragedy.

Anyone interested in learning more about efforts to preserve these disappearing resources can contact: APCWS, Box 1862, Fredericksburg VA 22402.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG - THE SECOND AND THIRD DAY November 9 Meeting

The second program focusing on the Battle of Gettysburg will once again be led by Tom Prisk of Chapel Hill, a member of our RT and a Licensed Gettysburg Battlefield Guide. The October program was attended by a large crowd of members and visitors who listened as Tom led us step-by-step through the first, and part of the second, days of the fighting at Gettysburg, introducing us to little-known and interesting new facts and perspectives about the battle. The two-hour program was riveting as Tom lectured, as panel members John Krohn and Ted Lynch posed provocative questions and as RT members added their own comments and interpretations.

The November meeting will explore the struggle for Culp's Hill on the second day and the Pickett-Pettigrew assault on the third day. Tom is extremely knowledgeable and gives an outstanding presentation. You can be sure you'll learn something new!

Join us at 7:00 pm (earlier than our usual meeting time) on Thursday, November 9, in Room 101 of King Hall at UNC-W. Feel free to bring a guest. The meeting will last til 9:00.

THE SALE OF CIVIL WAR CALENDARS WILL BENEFIT THE ROUND TABLE!

Several months ago, the RT steering committee entered into an arrangement with Beverly Tetterton and the Friends of the Public Library to jointly publish a 1996 calendar illustrated with graphics and engravings depicting events of the Wilmington Campaign. Beverly brought copies of the new calendar to the October meeting for members to see and to purchase.

These calendars are full of great Wilmington Civil War scenes with captions written by Chris Fonvielle and Bill Reaves! They're priced at $10.00 each. Plan to buy a copy for yourself and consider buying additional copies for Christmas gifts.

Profits will be divided evenly between the Round Table and the Friends of the Public Library. Both organizations are listed on the calendar as sponsors.

You can purchase your calendars at our RT meetings (see Dan Geddie) or at the public library in the North Carolina Room (on the second floor).

Our thanks to Beverly Tetterton for providing this opportunity for us to educate the public about the Civil War in Wilmington and about the activities of the RT as well as to raise some revenue!

BENTONVILLE BATTLEGROUND HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION Recent Battlefield Land Purchase

The BBHA recently purchased a three-and-a half acre portion of the Bentonville battlefield which contains well-preserved trenches in an area where Union and Confederate troops clashed on the second and third days of the battle. The land was bought at public auction by BBHA, paid for with a grant from the North Carolina Natural Heritage Trust, and turned over to the State of NC.

The BBHA is a 501(c)(3) non-profit organization devoted to the preservation and interpretation of the Battle of Bentonville. You can join the Association by sending $20.00 to BBHA, Box 432, Newton Grove NC 28366. Your $20.00 will buy one square foot of land at Bentonville and you'll receive a frameable certificate of ownership. This is a superb local preservation group which will focus greater regional and national attention on the significance of the Battle of Bentonville!

SOME CIVIL WAR HUMOR

At the Expense of the General We All Love to Hate

Two old ladies were recently conversing on the Battle of Chickamauga. Said one, "I wish, as General Bragg is a Christian man, he were dead and in heaven. I think it would be a Godsend to the Confederacy." "Why, my dear," said the other, "if the General were near the gates of Heaven and invited in, at the critical moment he would fall back!"

After the battle of Chickamauga, a soldier who had been within the enemy's lines and escaped, was carried before General Bragg and questioned in relation to what he saw. He said the rout was complete and the enemy in full retreat when he left. The general asked him if he knew what a retreat was? He looked at the general with surprise and said, "Why, General, haven't I been with you in your whole campaign?" Wilmington Journal, November 12, 1863

CFCWRT NEWS

This issue of the newsletter is enhanced by the addition of a wonderful first-person account of a special battlefield visit provided by member, Jerry Partrick. Jerry is one of the founding members of the RT and spends his leisure time (readily available now that Jerry has recently retired!) traveling to archives where he researches various CW interests and to battlegrounds where, as you can tell from his article, he can still hear the guns! You'll enjoy Jerry's article. We invite other members to submit similar articles about CW ancestors, battlefield visits, etc. etc.

Our treasurer, Dan Geddie, tells me that 75 members have joined for the 1995-96 year. Many of these are new members whom we heartily welcome to our ranks! By the way, we're grateful that Dan has agreed to serve as treasurer of the RT. It's a more time-consuming job than you might think.

Our thanks also to John Krohn and Ted Lynch who are serving on the panel for the Gettysburg programs! Both Ted and John have particular expertise on Gettysburg and visit the battlefield frequently. In fact, Ted is the steering committee member who originally conceived of the twin programs on Gettysburg and arranged with Tom Prisk to serve as leader. Thanks, Ted!

Tommy King worked hard through the summer months to put together our Petersburg and Appomattox bus tour coming up in March. He's taken this tour with Chris Calkins of the Petersburg National Battlefield and knows firsthand how fascinating this jaunt will be for RT members. Be sure to put this March 9-10 tour on your calendar. We'll be publicizing the tour over the next weeks. Remember, the cost is only $150.00 per person (if we fill up the bus); this covers the bus trip, the guided tour by Chris Calkins, two nights at the hotel, and two meals.

We're pleased that Chris Fenvielle, RT member and professional historian with particular interest in the Wilmington Campaign, and his family have moved back to Wilmington where he belongs! Chris is doing historical consulting work from his office downtown.

The article about the RT by Lee Roberts in the Wilmington Star-News in early September really put us before the public. Many visitors came to our first meeting as a result of that article. Lee has researched some of his own CW forebears; most of you saw his very moving article about a Confederate ancestor who surrendered at Appomattox which appeared last spring in the Star-News on the anniversary of the surrender.

Mark Bradley's book, Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, should be coming out from the printer any day now! You can order a copy by calling the publisher (800) 848-6585.

Thanks to Ed Russ for donating CW materials for upcoming raffles at our RT meetings. We'll try to resume the raffles soon.

George Slaton was recently elected to the Board of Directors of the Bentonville Battleground Historical Association.

Several members reported that they didn't receive last month's newsletter. The mailing of the newsletter is timed so that it will reach you on Thursday-Saturday the week before each meeting. If you don't receive a newsletter, please let me know.

THE BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG - THE FIRST AND SECOND DAY October 12 Meeting

The RT is presenting two superlative programs covering the Battle of Gettysburg at the October and November meetings! We're fortunate to have Tom Prisk of Chapel Hill, a Licensed Gettysburg Battlefield Guide, as our speaker for both programs. Tom's a new member of our RT.

The October program will highlight Lee's strategy for the invasion of Pennsylvania, his approach to Gettysburg, the first day's battle, and Longstreet's assault on the second day. This will be an intensive and in-depth study of the battle, incorporating new perspectives and fresh scholarship which will be new for many of us. The program format will be a combined seminar and round table discussion of the battle led by Mr. Prisk and a panel of RT members.

Licensed Gettysburg Battlefield Guides are walking encyclopedias of the Battle of Gettysburg! They know the battle in incredible detail, minute by minute and regimental movement by movement. The guides are comprised of an elite group of historians who complete an exhausting and rigorous examination which few applicants manage to pass.

So pull out your books on Gettysburg, familiarize yourself again with the battle, and attend this exciting program! Because of the comprehensive nature of the program, we'll begin 30 minutes earlier than usual.....at 7:00 pm.....on Thursday, October 12, in Room 101, King Hall, at UNC-W. The program will extend to 9:00-9:30 pm.

LEE'S RETREAT TO APPOMATTOX Spring Bus Tour

Our bus tour this spring, March 8-10, 1996 will take us to Petersburg, Virginia for a comprehensive tour of the closing days of the war. On Friday, we'll visit Five Forks battlefield, Dinwiddie Courthouse, White Oak Road, the Gilliam Farm. Saturday's tour will follow the exact route of Lee's retreat toward Appomattox, taking in the site of the cavalry clash at Namozine Church, Saylor's Creek battlefield, the backroads leading to the surrender site, the fields and woods where Lee's army encamped, and where the surrender itself took place. On Sunday, we'll tour the Petersburg battlefield, visiting the Crater and Fort Stedman.

Our tour leader will be Chris Calkins, the acknowledged authority on Petersburg and Lee's Retreat and a historian with the National Park Service. We'll travel from Wilmington by Five Star Motor Coach, spend two nights at Best Western Petersburg, and return home mid-afternoon on Sunday. The cost is $150.00 per person (subject to an increase if we're unable to fill the bus). Reservations are available for the first 48 persons who submit a check for the full amount. So plan ahead for this unforgettable Civil War tour! (More information available on request).

MEMBERSHIP RENEWALS DUE

It's time for last years' RT members to renew and for prospective members to join for the new year, 1995-1996! The November newsletter will be sent to those who have joined the RT by October 27. So send a check for $20.00 to Dan Geddie, Treasurer, Cape Fear Civil War Round Table, Box 10535, Wilmington NC 28405-3757. Welcome to our 18 new members so far this year!

A RAMBLE THROUGH REBELDOM

In the last newsletter I mentioned attending the annual conference of the Association for Preservation of Civil War Sites (APCWS) held in May in Tupelo, Mississippi. Since the conference was a weekend event, I decided to take a few extra days and visit some of the battlefields in the Western Theater of the war.

My first stop was in Columbus, Mississippi, a beautiful town full of ante-bellum home. Columbus was also the residence of CSA General Stephen D. Lee after the war. I visited his home there and then went out to Friendship Cemetery where Lee is buried. I had forgotten that Confederate Memorial Day had begun at this cemetery when ladies from Columbus placed flowers on the graves of Union, as well as Confederate, soldiers buried there. Soon, news of this gesture circulated through the nation, creating good feeling both north and south.

The conference was a great experience! On Saturday, we toured sites around Corinth, Mississippi associated with the siege and battle of Corinth, as well as Battery Robinette where a sharp fight took place. The woods north and east of Corinth are still full of distinct breastworks and artillery positions which the park service out of Shiloh Battlefield are recording via satellite. We tramped back into the woods, watching out for ticks and dodging huge hills of fire ants, to remote earthworks. Sunday we enjoyed a tour I had been looking forward to for a long time! APCWS has purchased and will be paying for 90% of the battlefield at Brice's Crossroads where Nathan Bedford Forrest defeated the Union forces under Gen. Samuel Sturgis and sent them packing back to Memphis. Lt. Col. Parker Hills, of the Mississippi National Guard, and a historian in his own right, guided us over the battlefield which still looks as it did during the war. We started on foot at the point where Forrest's dismounted cavalry moved forward through the fields and woods and followed the route where his units fanned out and created a double-envelopment around the Union forces. At several wood or fence lines, we would stop and see how Forrest coordinated his attack. The battleground is still largely unmarked, but with a knowledgeable tour guide, it became apparent how brilliant Forrest's tactics were. What a day!

Late that afternoon, I drove to Pulaski, Tennessee, the home of CSA Brig. Gen. John Adams, who was killed at Franklin. I found his grave in the city cemetery. Just a few yards away, stood the spectacular marble statue and grave of CSA Major Gen. John C. Brown who led a division in the Army of Tennessee. As I was standing by Adams' grave, a fellow walked up, and we began talking about the CW. As many CW enthusiasts in Tennessee often do, he started talking in glowing terms about Forrest. He told me about a site south of Pulaski where Forrest had ambushed Federal cavalry pursuing Hood's army after the CSA defeat at Nashville. Coincidentally, only a few months before I had read about this skirmish in Wiley Sword's Embrace an Angry Wind. The Battle of Anthony's Hill is one of those many CW battle sites whose locations are remote and largely unknown, and when I told him how much I'd like to visit the site, he agreed to take me there. Sure enough, as the modern road entered a group of hills, it was easy to imagine Forrest choosing this location for a perfect ambush which successfully repelled the opposing cavalry.

Later that day, I drove north to Columbia, Tennessee, flushed with excitement about this serendipitous visit to an obscure CW site. In Columbia, I hoped to find the building where Forrest had a well-known encounter with Lieut. Gould in 1863, when Gould shot Forrest and Forrest managed to stab and ward off Gould with his penknife. Once again, I felt fortunate that, serendipitously, I ran into a local historian, who knows local Columbia history like the back of his hand, doing research at the library. We walked out into the streets of downtown Columbia, and he showed me the site of the Masonic building where the encounter took place, the old tailor shop across the street where Gould went for help and where Forrest later confronted him again and spared his life. He showed me the house where Forrest was staying with his family and where he recovered from his wound. And finally, we walked down to the Nelson House, a hotel built in 1828, and still standing, where Forrest visited Gould and apologized for the disagreement shortly before Gould died at the hotel. At this point, I felt like the trip was already a complete success!

Then I drove out to Ashwood, a small settlement south of Columbia, site of the historic St. John's Episcopal church which began under the leadership of CSA Gen. and Bishop Leonidas Polk who lived nearby. I had read in Sword's book that, during Hood's advance toward Franklin, some of his officers, including CSA Maj. Gen. Patrick Cleburne, "the Stonewall of the West," stopped at the church and walked through the cemetery. Cleburne especially remarked at the beauty of the place and said he would like to be buried there. Within a day or two, Cleburne was dead, killed in the assault at Franklin, along with John Adams and four other CSA generals. Cleburne was briefly buried at the little church cemetery in Ashwood. It's still a lovely spot, worth a visit if you're ever in the vicinity.

From Columbia I drove north along the route of Hood's advance, through the little village of Spring Hill where still stands the magnificent ante-bellum home where CSA Major Gen. Earl Van Dorn was assassinated by a jealous husband. Then on to Franklin, one of my favorite CW sites. The site of the Confederate assault, larger and more ambitious even than the Pickett-Pettigrew charge at Gettysburg, is pretty much covered over with neighborhoods now. The spot where Cleburne fell is now the parking lot of a Pizza Hut. But the Carter House, around which the battle at Franklin swirled, still stands; nearby is a museum. The Carnton House, on the outskirts of town, is another early and magnificent home on whose porch the bodies of the six CSA generals killed at Franklin lay after the battle.

In Nashville, the next day, I walked up the steep slope of Shy's Hill, one of the few remaining sites of the Battle of Nashville. Here is where the victorious Union troops broke through the CSA line and routed Hood's forlorn Confederates. My last stop before heading for home was also in Nashville...at the Tennessee State Museum which has an impressive collection of CW material as well as very extensive displays from other periods of Tennessee history.

I arrived home tired, but enthusiastic, and looking forward to more opportunities to visit CW sites. One of those opportunities will be our RT trip to Petersburg/Appomattox in March! Don't miss this chance for a thorough and comprehensive tour with a leading CW historian.

General Grant began his 1864 Spring Campaign by crossing the Rapidan at Ely's and Germanna Fords on May 3rd and 4th giving General Lee a mild surprise. As Lee recovered, JEB Stuart noticed Meades' supply train and Hampton and Fitz Lee attempted unsuccessfully to capture these supplies while the Union Cavalry guarded the wagon train.

Phil Sheridan had recently come from the West with a reputation for aggressiveness and stunning victories. He couldn't bear having his cavalry relegated to such a menial task. Grant gave Sheridan verbal permission to create a raid on Richmond as a diversion to Stuarts' attack on his train. Sheridan boasted that he could capture Richmond as well and his cavalry proceeded to destroy a large amount of Confederate supplies. The raid also resulted in one of the great losses of the Civil War, the death of JEB Stuart on May 11 and the commander of the North Carolina Cavalry Brigade, General James B. Gordon received a mortal wound on May 12 at Brooke Church.

The North Carolina Cavalry Brigade plagued the rear of the Union Cavalry column. On May 11, a heavy skirmish occurred in Sheridan's rear which involved the North Carolina Cavalry and elements of the Union Second Cavalry Division at Ground Squirrel Church.

One hundred and thirty-one years later as I drove about the Virginia countryside looking for Ground Squirrel Church, I thought about those North Carolinians. My great grandfather was one of those North Carolina Cavalrymen. He was wounded during that skirmish. As a result of that leg wound, he was hospitalized for a month and walked with a painful limp until his death in 1918. I had always wanted to see that battleground.

Once before I had been over many of these same roads but I could not find Ground Squirrel Church. I wished the Confederate and Union Armies would have gotten together sometime early on and decided what to call the battlefields. They never did and the Confederates went on naming the battlefields after towns and taverns and churches and the Union just kept naming them after rivers and streams. Today it's not easy to drive up to some of these lesser known skirmishes following their descriptions of the locations of the fights. Afterwards I searched the literature and studied the maps references, trying to get a better handle on this skirmish. This time, I thought I knew where Ground Squirrel Church was located.

The back roads of Virginia from Lexington are beautiful in the fall of year. A keen sense of history enhanced this slow, deliberate journey into the past. It seemed as if every crossroad that passed was a name that related to the Civil War. I slipped further and further into history as this modern automobile led me down the road. As I came to Route 33, I paused before I turned south onto this road, known then as the old Plank Road or the Mountain Road. As I sat there, only a few cars passed. They were going fast. Lost in my thoughts, I heard the soft whine of a car in the distance get louder and louder until the swoosh of the car passing woke me from my reverie.

I came to Ground Squirrel Bridge over the South Anna River. I must be getting near. There are embankments on either side of the river on the east side of the bridge where an old bridge could have stood. In 1864, the bridge had been burned early in the morning on May 11th and General Gordon had found an old ford near but the banks were fairly steep and high. The accounts say the fording was difficult. General Gordon was the first to jump his horse down the bank, cross the stream and climb the other bank. No sooner did the 5th North Carolina Cavalry reach the stream and begin to climb the other bank, than the First Maine, the Union rear guard, began to fire at them. The North Carolina Cavalrymen dismounted and Paul Means says in North Carolina Regiments, "In splendid style we swung out into line on the right of that road and went at their dismounted men with a steady step and fire, and drove them" As I stood on the bridge, I heard a strange sound, like men working hard but it must have been an echo or something far off.

I drove slowly south passing Gieman road on my right and Mill Road on my left and soon I was at the intersection of Ashcake Road and the Plank Road or Route 33. Only a few hundred yards before the intersection, there was a small paved road that branched to the right off 33. That was an important landmark. It was on the old maps.

I was getting close. I turned right on Ashcake and eased forward a few yards to the next junction, which was a crossing of the small road I had seen above the intersection. On the right, just beyond should have been Ground Squirrel Church!

There was a lovely little church just where it was supposed to be but it was a relatively new brick church named Cavalry Christian Church. I turned into the newly paved parking lot. Just ahead was a very small cemetery with ten or twenty graves and stones, enclosed by a cinderblock wall and a wrought iron gate. A chain with a big old lock hung around the gate but I could see the graves. One of the gravestones marked the resting place of a Soldier of the Fourth Virginia Cavalry. I saluted him in my heart and wondered when he had died. I couldn't see the date.

I sat on the cinderblock wall for a little while. The late morning sun was getting warm and I felt a little mellow. Earlier that day, as I drove slowly reliving history, I secretly looked for squadrons of cavalry in every clearing, across fields and down dirt roads. I listened for sounds of riders and the noises their swords, rifles and accouterments made as they banged and slapped together.

I let myself off the wall, sat on the ground, stretched my legs out and leaned against this warm wall. I could swear I heard men shouting and yelling. The field to the north and a little west of the church suddenly filled with smoke and dust and men and horses. The pop of small arms fire in the distance was almost drowned by the nearer musket fire and suddenly...

HONK!! HONK!! My wife blew the horn of that damn automobile. She was tired of waiting.

I tried to get back to wherever I was (I think I know) but I couldn't. I will though. I just need a little more time and maybe I'll see a certain old Confederate. Want to come with me? I don't like to talk when I get to those places so I'm not very good company but I'll show you the way.

SEPTEMBER 7 MEETING Photographs of North Carolina Confederate Soldiers

The Cape Fear Civil War Round Table begins the year with a fascinating program led by Henry Mintz, a member of our RT, who will lecture and present a slide show featuring photographic images of Tarheel soldiers. The program will be a rich introduction to a wonderful new book just published by N.C. Division of Archives & History, State Troops and Volunteers: A Photographic Record of North Carolina's Civil War Soldiers, authored by Greg Mast. This sumptuous collection is comprised of over 600 images of soldiers gathered from private and public collections.

Henry Mintz, in collaboration with Greg Mast, spent several years scouring the countryside for soldier photographs and contributed a large portion of those images for this book. For those of you who don't know Henry, he's an inveterate Civil War historian who is currently traveling for the Time-Life series hunting down Civil War material in archives across the land. Weymouth Jordan of NC Archives & History describes Henry as a researcher "of whom it can be truly said that if he did not exist, he would have to be invented!"

The slide show, highlighting many of the images in the book, is a real treat! The interesting stories Henry will share, gathered from intensive research about each soldier, adds a poignancy to these haunting images.

Henry will also have on hand a number of copies of State Troops and Volunteers for sale at the list price of $50. The meeting will be held Thursday, September 7, at 7:30 pm in Room 101 of King Hall at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington. Come and bring a friend!

THE ROUND TABLE BEGINS ITS SECOND YEAR!

Our RT membership reached 84 during the first year. Current members should send in renewals as soon as possible. This September issue of the newsletter is an invitation for prospective members to join our ranks!

The steering committee...Dan Geddie, Ted Lynch, Tommy King, Kemp Burbeau and George Slaton...has been meeting every two weeks since May to plan upcoming programs. The October and November programs will focus on the Battle of Gettysburg and will be led by Tom Prisk of Chapel Hill who is a licensed Gettysburg guide and an authority on the battle; his programs will provide an in-depth look at this pivotal event in the war. Joe Mobley, of Archives & History in Raleigh, will present December's program on Zebulon Vance, the wartime governor of N.C.; Joe has recently edited the Vance papers. In January, we'll host the 11th Regiment North Carolina Band in concert at UNC-W! RT members and the community-at-large will have the opportunity to socialize after the concert. Abraham Lincoln will be the focus of Bob Toplin's program in February; Bob is a professor of history at UNC-W and a frequent speaker to RT's around the country. Then in March, we'll take a two-day bus tour to Petersburg and Lee's Retreat Route to Appomattox led by Chris Calkins, foremost authority on this last chapter of the war in Virginia. And on and on.....!

We hope this tempting line-up of programs will lead you to join the Round Table with its focus on CW scholarship, unique tours led by CW historians, and battlefield preservation. We're an informal group of serious CW buffs who want to deepen our understanding of the war, its personalities, battles, campaigns and politics. So fill out the membership form on the reverse and send it in or bring it and yourself to the September meeting!

CIVIL WAR STUDY GROUP

Several RT members have suggested the formation of a study group within the RT of approximately six to twelve members which would meet on a regular basis to discuss subjects, books, etc. of CW interest on an informal, yet focused, basis. Jim McCallum has offered to co-ordinate and moderate this group.

Jim, a retired physican from Elizabeth City and one of the prime movers in the creation of the CSA Fort Branch site on the Roanoke River, has been very active in the RT and has a long-standing interest in studying the war. If you're interested in this small discussion group opportunity, call Jim at 686-1597 (home) or see him at the September meeting.

WHERE WAS THE WAR WON?

APCWS Annual Conference Panel Discussion

In early May, I attended the annual weekend conference of the Association for the Preservation of Civil War Sites held in Tupelo, Mississippi. Friday night, we were treated to a panel discussion led by CW historians, William C. Davis, James McPherson, Wiley Sword, Wilson Greene, Shelby Foote, Larry Daniel, and Herman Hattaway. The question from the audience, "Where was the war won?" elicited some interesting responses.

William C. Davis felt that the war was actually won in the Western Theater, arguing that the war in the East was a four-year stalemate. In the West, he said, the Confederacy lost territory on an almost daily basis. Larry Daniel had a similar view. He held that the turning point of the war was the Union capture of Forts Henry and Donelson; with the loss of these forts in early 1862, CSA General Albert Sidney Johnston lost a third of his force, leading to his weakness at Shiloh and subsequent defeat there. James McPherson argued that the timely Union victories at Gettysburg and Vicksburg won the war because they prevented an impending erosion of public support in the North. The turning point theory should be downplayed, responded Herman Hattaway. For Hattaway, the Confederate loss of Atlanta led to the re-election of Lincoln in 1864, thus ensuring a final Union victory.

The APCWS conference featured tours of the Battles of Brice's Crossroads and Corinth, Mississippi. APCWS has recently bought for preservation 90% of the site of the Battle of Brice's Crossroads where Nathan Bedford Forrest won his brilliant victory over superior Union forces. The site, still farm and woodland just as it was at the time of the battle, will eventually become a park open to the public. More on APCWS in a later newsletter.

MAY 11 MEETING

The May meeting will be the last regular one before our summer break. We will hold a general business meeting and discussion to summarize our first year's experience and to solicit suggestions for programs, events, and projects for the coming RT year which begins in September. Members of the steering committee will lead the discussion and Tommy King will give a Treasurer's report. Plan to attend this relaxed meeting and to share your thoughts and ideas for the RT. The meeting will be Thursday, May 11, 7:30 pm, King Hall, Room 101, University of North Carolina at Wilmington.

CFCWRT NOTES

The inaugural year of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table has been a good experience for many of us. The steering committee, currently composed of Dan Geddie, Ted Lynch, Tommy King, Kemp Burpeau, and George Slaton is beginning to plan programs for the coming year and is seeking to put together a balanced agenda which will reflect the many interests of RT members.

Thanks to Kemp Burpeau for arranging Roger DeMik's visit to the RT last month. Thanks also to Paul Laird who contributed Confederate Goliath for our book raffle.

Several of our RT members had a memorable tour of Virginia battlefields in March. Tom Craven, Conway Ficklen, David Barefoot, and Tommy King journeyed to Fredericksburg where they engaged a National Park Service guide for a two-day comprehensive tour of the field at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. They explored the Prospect Hill area in Fredericksburg, south of Marye's Heights, where Lee's defenses were temporarily penetrated by Meade's attack and they followed the route of Jackson's flank march which preceded his legendary attack on Hooker's right.

Our new RT year will begin with the September 7 meeting. Meetings and publication of the newsletter will cease through the summer. In late August, you'll be receiving the next issue of the newsletter.

Remember that the New Hanover County Public Library and the UNC- W library both have superb collections of CW books. The summer months will be a good time to catch up on your CW reading! (See the reading list in this newsletter).

BATTLE AND CAMPAIGN STUDIES Best Books

In recent years, students of the American Civil War have witnessed a new era of CW scholarship as one definitive study of the war after another has become available. We're fortunate to have some gifted historians who are bringing fresh interpretation and insight to every aspect of the Late Unpleasantness. More original material ...letters, diaries, reports...has surfaced in the last couple of decades, adding to our understanding of the war. Scholars are taking a more objective approach in researching their subjects. As a result, the new accounts of CW battles and campaigns are generally more exhaustive and authoritative than those of just two decades ago. In fact, many of the more recently published works have easily supplanted earlier studies. At the risk of being presumptuous, I'd like to suggest, in no particular order, some recent books which are generally accepted to be definitive. I'll probably leave something out, but here goes!

Seven Days Campaign. To the Gates of Richmond: The Peninsula Campaign, Stephen W. Sears. Ticknor & Fields, 1992.

Atlanta Campaign. Decision in the West: The Atlanta Campaign of 1864, Albert Castel. University of Kansas, 1994. Contains fresh interpretation of Sherman's generalship.

Franklin, Spring Hill, Nashville. Embrace An Angry Wind: The Confederacy's Last Hurrah, Wiley Sword. Harper/Collins, 1994. The narrative account of the Confederate charge at Franklin is one of the most riveting I've ever read.

Second Manassas. Return to Bull Run: The Campaign and Battle of Second Manassas, John J. Hennessy. Simon & Schuster, 1993.

Chickamauga. This Terrible Sound: The Battle of Chickamauga, Peter Cozzens. University of Illinois, 1992.

Brice's Crossroads. Forrest at Brice's Crossroads and North Mississippi in 1864, Edwin C. Bearss. Morningside, 1990.

Gettysburg. Gettysburg: Culp's Hill & Cemetery Hill, Harry W. Pfanz. University of North Carolina, 1993.

Gettysburg. Gettysburg: The Second Day, Harry W. Pfanz. University of North Carolina, 1987. Unbelievably exhaustive in its description of Longstreet's flank attack.

Bentonville. Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, Mark L. Bradley. Savas/Woodbury. To be published June, 1995. You may order a copy at the pre-publication price of $25.00 before May 31 from SW Publishers, Suite 204, 1475 South Bascom Avenue, Campbell CA 95008. (800) 848-6585.

Five Forks. Battle of Five Forks, Edwin C. Bearss and Chris Calkins. H.E. Howard, 1987.

Wilmington Campaign. The Last Rays of Departing Hope: The Campaign for Wilmington, Chris E. Fonvielle. Savas/Woodbury. To be published in Fall, 1995.

First Manassas. Battle at Bull Run, William C. Davis. publisher not known, 1985.

Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge. The Shipwreck of Their Hopes, Peter Cozzens. University of Illinois, 1994

Antietam. Landscape Turned Red: The Battle of Antietam, Stephen W. Sears. Ticknor & Fields, 1983.

Fort Fisher. Confederate Goliath: The Battle of Fort Fisher, Rod Gragg. Harper Collins, 1991. Includes wonderful first-person narratives.

Cedar Mountain. Stonewall Jackson at Cedar Mountain, Robert K. Krick. University of North Carolina, 1990. Anything by Krick is not likely to be improved on!

Spotsylvania. If It Takes All Summer, William Matter. University of North Carolina, 1988.

South Mountain. Before Antietam: The Battle for South Mountain, John M. Priest. White Mane, 1992.

The Wilderness. The Battle of the Wilderness, Gordon C. Rhea. Louisiana State University, 1993.

Stones River. No Better Place to Die, Peter Cozzens. University of Illinois, 1990.

Vicksburg. The Vicksburg Campaign, Edwin C. Bearss. Morningside, 1986. 3 volumes

Shiloh. Bloody April, Wiley Sword. Original publisher not known, revised 1993.

New Market. The Battle of New Market, William C. Davis. Stackpole, 1993.

APRIL 7 MEETING

Roger DeMik to Speak on the C.S.S. Alabama

Roger L. DeMik, a specialist in Civil War naval history, will present a program on the exploits of the C.S.S. Alabama at our April meeting. Roger is an attorney with Eastman Kodak in Kingsport TN and has studied the C.S.S. Alabama for 25 years. He is the past president of the Tri-Cities Civil War Round Table in Kingsport and one of its founding members.

The C.S.S. Alabama was one of the most important American warships to sail the sea. According to the Guinness Book of Records, the Alabama has the distinction of being "The Most Famous Surface Raider of all Time." In the 666 days from her commissioning on August 24, 1862 to her destruction by the U.S.S. Kearsarge off Cherbourg, France on June 19, 1864, the C.S.S. Alabama raided Union commerce from the North Atlantic to the Indian Ocean.

Mr. DeMik will discuss the history of the Alabama's cruise, including the controversies surrounding her captain, Raphael Semmes, one of the most colorful characters in CW history, subsequent attempts to raise the Alabama after she was sunk, the international controversy generated by her discovery by the French Navy in 1884, and the battle over her ownership between the US and France. Roger has lectured in Europe and in the United States. He has also contributed to numerous articles on the C.S.S. Alabama, including the article in the December, 1994 issue of National Geographic.

Roger will lecture and give a slide presentation. The program promises to be outstanding, and we feel very fortunate to have Roger DeMik as a guest speaker! Plan to attend on Friday, April 7, at 7:30 pm in Room 101, King Hall, UNC-W. (Note the change in meeting date).

BENTONVILLE BUS TOUR A Field Report

On Saturday, March 25, a group of 35 members and guests of the Cape Fear Civil War Round Table visited the Bentonville battlefield for a superb interpretative tour! The tour was led by Mark Bradley, a member of our RT, who followed up his December RT program on Bentonville with this on-site look at the key locations associated with this two-day battle. Our group visited the Confederate breastworks where the Army of Tennessee veterans massed for attacks against the Union flank. These breastworks are extensive and very well preserved. We also visited impressive Union breastworks, the site of a furious Confederate attack from Hoke's Division, led by Colonel John D. Taylor of Wilmington, his 36th North Carolina Regiment, and the 1st Battalion North Carolina Heavy Artillery. Mark's enthusiasm for this important major engagement of the war was contagious! We all gained an orientation and understanding of the battle that was refreshing and exciting.

Our RT deeply appreciates Mark's generosity in giving us such an enjoyable day on the battlefield! We're also grateful to John Goode and Fred Burgess of the Bentonville State Historic Site who assisted in leading the tour, as well as Nancy King and Lauren Burgess who made us aware of the efforts of the Bentonville Battleground Historical Association to interpret and protect the battlefield. Thanks to Tom Broadfoot who donated copies of his published guidebook to Bentonville for sale to our members; the sale netted $55.00 for the RT. And thanks go to Tommy King for once again making arrangements for our transportation and comfort on the tour.

Mark's definitive book, Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, March 19-21, 1865, will be published this summer. The book is hard cover, 456 pp, 15 detailed maps, 30 photos. Prepublication offer is $25.00 ($29.95 after May 31) from Savas Woodbury Publishers, Suite 204, 1475 S. Bascom Avenue, Campbell CA 95008 or (800) 848-6585. Also, Mark has directed that $5.00 from each sale will be donated to the Bentonville Battleground Historical Association. This will surely be a book without which you cannot live. Mark has offered to do a signing at one of our fall RT meetings!

THE SOUTH'S MOST POPULAR CITIZEN VISITS WILMINGTON

One Hundred and Twenty-Five Years Ago

In March, 1870, just months before his death, Robert E. Lee began a last tour of the South. What was originally conceived to be a vacation to restore his health turned out to be a very public tour by rail with stops in a number of Southern cities. Great, cheering crowds gathered at train depots along the route, even in towns and cities where Lee was unable to stop. Fortunately for the citizens of Wilmington, Lee paused here to spend a day and night. Lee arrived in Wilmington in late April. Following are excerpts from the Wilmington Daily Journal.

"Telegrams were received in this city yesterday announcing the fact that General Lee would arrive here from Charleston on the Southern train last night. A special train was arranged, through the courtesy of Colonel Fremont, the Superintendent, to start from the depot of the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad for the accomodation of those who wished to greet the great ex-chieftain upon his arrival. This train started at 8 o'clock, and proceeded to Meares Bluff - there to await General Lee's arrival, having on board a large crowd of friends and the Cadets of the Cape Fear Academy, under charge of General Colston.

After some time spent in waiting, the train from the South arrived, and General Lee, by invitation, came to the special train. A suppressed whisper of admiration, respectfully restrained, first greeted his approach. There were only a few in the car at the time, but soon the curious crowd who had rushed outside to catch the first glimpse of the noble General hurried and thronged around his seat. The corps of Cadets were on the platform and received him with arms presented, while the band played an air. We think that General Lee was affected by the sight of the grey worn by the Cadets, which no doubt called forcibly to mind many recollections of the days when "old Marse Robert" was held in such veneration and confidence by the thousands of noble and manly hearts which beat beneath many a grey jacket. But the demonstration seemed not altogether pleasing to him. The gratifying news soon spread through the car that General Lee had determined to stop here, but would probably leave tonight. On the arrival at the depot the Cadets formed in line and proceeded to escort him to the residence of Honorable George Davis whose guest General Lee is. From respect to the feelings of the old warrior, no further demonstration which people might otherwise wish to desire to make was insisted on, but the Cadets headed the crowd in a march downtown and General Lee was left in peace. April 29, 1870.

Thousands of friends and admirers of the man who possesses the devoted affection of his own people and the admiration and respect of his former enemies, availed themselves of the privilege of visiting the sterling old patriot at the residence of Honorable George Davis yesterday. It was a reception which truly did the heart good. No formal demonstrations, no sycophantic protestations, but purely and simply the homage of hearts overflowing with veneration and true affection, with humble and unselfish reverence to the noble representative of a past made glorious by deeds of romance and heroic sacrifices - a people forgetting the present and memory reverting to the past were enshrined and embodied in this ever faithful leader of the armies. However strongly the hearts of our people may have previously inclined and clung to General Lee this feeling could be but increased and a most favorable personal impression created by his manner of receiving those who called yesterday. There was a tender warmth and cordiality in the grasp of his hand, a gentle dignity in the form of greeting and a due regard for feelings and appreciation for attentions which will ever be remembered. None could fail to be charmed with delight and the popular heart here swells with increased emotion at the name of General Lee.

The General will take leave of our city today. He leaves on a special train this morning, accompanied by his daughter, on his return to his home, but will probably stop in Richmond. We regret that he could not have been here longer, but are pleased that we have at least seen this much of him and seen him so favorably." April 30, 1870.
